

OXFORD

Sixth Edition

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, AND HUMAN RIGHTS

A critical introduction

IAN LOVELAND

About the Online Resource Centre

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS online resource centre

Search Online Resource Centres

Home > Law > Public Law > Loveland: Constitutional Law, Administrative Law, and Human Rights 6e

Student resources

Mind maps

Examples of a learning tool developed by the author to help with exam preparation

Online Casebook

A fully-linked online casebook, with edited versions of leading cases and relevant legislation. See the book for password details

Lecturer resources

The following resources are password-protected and for studying lecturer use only

Not yet registered for a password? Please complete the two steps below:

1. Return your local sales representative that you are adopting this casebook. You may wish to do this via the OXFORD SALES REPRESENTATIVE FORM
2. Complete the registration form. Please note your registration can only be processed if your sales representative is aware of your adoption.

Find out more, see the book directly from the website, or order a free registration card if you are a lecturer, all from the OXFORD website

Sample Content
Chapter 2: Parliament

To access the casebook, please follow these instructions:

- 1) Go to: www.oxfordtextbooks.co.uk/orc/loveland6e/
- 2) Click on the Online Casebook link
- 3) Enter the login details below (both are case sensitive) Username: loveland6e
Password: casebook
- 4) Scroll through the list of cases and click on the link you are interested in

This book is complemented by an Online Resource Centre that provides a fully linked online casebook, a collection of mind-maps for revision, and a series of sample seminar classes for lecturers. In the casebook, carefully edited versions of vital legislation and case law that are discussed in the main text are listed under the same chapter headings that are in this book.

The Online Resource Centre is intended to enhance the value of the textbook as a teaching resource, and to free law schools and students from the time and expense of compiling hard copy versions of the leading cases and legislative provisions. The casebook is fully paginated for ease of reference in a classroom context.

These resources are all available FREE of charge, and provide extensive support for the student or tutor of constitutional and administrative law.

Loveland: Constitutional Law, Administrative Law and Human Rights 6e: Online Casebook

Table of Contents

London Tramway Co. v London County Council [1898] AC 375

The sole issue before the court was whether there were any circumstances in which the issue of locus standi might override or decline to follow its own precedents.

EARL OF HALSBURY L.C. — My Lords, for my own part I am prepared to say that I adhere in terms to what has been said by Lord Campbell and assented to by Lord Macmillan, Lord O’Connor, Lord Chelmsford and others, that a decision of this House once given upon a point of law is conclusive upon the House afterwards, and that it is impossible to raise that question again as if it was not made and could be regarded, and the House is added to reverse its own decision. That is a principle which has been, I believe, without any real decision to the contrary, established law for some centuries, and is a foundation of justice that in the case it is not competent for us to refuse and for counsel to reargue a question which has been recently decided...

My Lords, no more comprehensive case could arise, I think, than what occurred in the case of Beaman v. Beaman (1914, 11 C. 274) in that case some of the learned Lords were of opinion that Reg. v. Miles (1875, 13 F. 534) was wrongly decided, but nevertheless they acquiesced in that decision — that is to say, they held themselves bound by that decision in the subsequent case of Beaman v. Beaman, and treated that decision of your Lordship’s House as conclusive upon the question then under appeal.

My Lords, it is totally impossible, as it appears to me, to disregard the whole current of authority upon this subject, and to suppose that what some people call an “outstanding case,” an “isolated case,” a case somewhat different from the custom, or the opinion of each judge in fact, is sufficient to justify the refusing and rearguing before the final Court of Appeal of a question which has been already decided. Of course I do not deny that cases of individual frailty may arise, and there may be a current of opinion in the profession that such and such a judgment was erroneous, but what is that occasional error when set against what is perhaps abstractly, but in a practical sense, the acquiescence — of having each question subject to being reargued and the stability of marked precedent doubted by reason of different decisions, so that in such and in fact there would be no real final Court of Appeal? My Lords, “interest no public” that there should be “no issue” at some time, and there could be no “no issue” if it were possible to reargue in each case that it might be reargued, because it is “not an ordinary case,” whatever that may mean, unless these circumstances I am of opinion that we ought not to allow the question to be reargued.

My Lords, I only wish to say one word in answer to a very ingenious argument which the learned counsel set before your Lordships. It is said that this House might have omitted to notice an Act of Parliament, or might have acted upon an Act of Parliament which was afterwards found to have been repealed. It seems to me that the answer to that ingenious suggestion is a very straightforward one, namely, that that would be a case of a mistake of fact: if the House were under the impression that there was an Act when there was not such an Act as was suggested, of course they would not be bound, when the fact was ascertained that there was not such an Act or that the Act had been repealed, to proceed upon the hypothesis that the Act existed. They would then have ascertained whether it existed or not as a matter of fact, and in a judgmental case they would set upon the law as they then found it to be.

Should you experience any difficulty in accessing this resource, please contact orc.help@oup.com for assistance.

To Carol, Madison, and Daniel

Constitutional Law, Administrative Law, and Human Rights

A Critical Introduction

Sixth edition

Professor Ian Loveland

City University, London Barrister, Arden Chambers

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Great Clarendon Street, Oxford, OX2 6DP,
United Kingdom

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship, and education by publishing worldwide. Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press in the UK and in certain other countries

© Oxford University Press 2012

The moral rights of the author have been asserted

Third Edition published by Butterworths 2004

Fourth Edition published 2006

Fifth Edition published 2009

Impression: 1

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press, or as expressly permitted by law, by licence or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department, Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this work in any other form and you must impose this same condition on any acquirer

Public sector information reproduced under Open Government Licence v1.0
(<http://www.nationalarchives.gov.uk/doc/open-government-licence/open-government-licence.htm>)

Crown Copyright material reproduced with the permission of the Controller, HMSO (under the terms of the Click Use licence)

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

Data available

Library of Congress Control Number: 2012935804

ISBN 978-0-19-960640-5

Printed in Great Britain by CPI Group (UK) Ltd, Croydon, CR0 4YY

Preface to the Sixth Edition

The sixth edition of this book is—like its immediate predecessors—a slightly expanded and modified version of the previous edition.

There have been some minor substantive changes to many parts of the book to take account of developments since 2009, but I have again tried to resist the temptation to turn the book into an exhaustive catalogue of every case or statutory provision there has ever been on particular topics. An (in my opinion!) insightful review of the fourth edition characterised it as more concerned with analysing principle than with describing detail, and I would hope that comment remains accurate in respect of this new edition. That means, of course, that much detailed material which many observers would regard as important is omitted. Those of us who teach public law must now perhaps be reconciled to the reality that there is just too much material to be fitted within a year long class on the subject. The material in this book reflects the choices I have made in respect of the course I teach to my students at City University Law School.

I did not feel tempted at any point to make the book ‘easier’ in any substantive intellectual sense. I remain happily wedded to the view that public law is a challenging, multi-disciplinary topic, and that attempts to simplify it in analytical terms do a disservice both to the subject and to the reader. The sixth edition therefore retains the first edition’s initial concern to provide a cross-disciplinary introduction to the subject of public law, with a continuing emphasis placed on material drawn from political theory, political science and legal and social history. Insofar as the book has a particular target audience, that audience would be able and industrious undergraduate and graduate students who have an innate enthusiasm for thinking about the moral and political underpinnings of our constitutional system, a willingness to read widely and critically around the core of their subject, and also a readiness to accept that a good deal of what they learn about that subject will seem to be (at least initially) confusing and contradictory.

With that particular audience in mind, I have significantly expanded the examination given in chapter three to the defensibility of the various techniques of statutory interpretation used by the courts, and to the legitimacy of innovation at common law. Chapter twenty-one, which introduced readers to the Human Rights Act 1998, has been substantially redrafted to correct what I would now regard as a number of unhappily imprecise assertions in its predecessor. There is also in chapter twenty-two a substantial new section addressing the impact of the Human Rights Act on the content and methodology of the common law. Both of those addenda have been prompted in part by the very positive and often illuminating responses made by my graduate students in classes and term papers dealing with those topics, and also in part by the fact that the topics touch upon matters with which I have been involved as counsel in the higher courts.

The lists of recommended reading at the end of each chapter have been expanded a little. The readings continue to be organised in an order which reflects my own view of their value. The online resource centre (ORC) has also been enlarged to reflect the amended content of the book, and continues to include a selection of seminars that I have used over the years for various topics and a series of revision sheets (which have been styled as ‘mind maps’) which may prove of some assistance to students who are looking to fasten an impression of the topography of particular topics in their respective minds.

My thanks are again due to editorial staff at OUP, especially Tom Young, for their handling of the messy business of turning my drafts into a finished text. Those efforts notwithstanding, I do not doubt that there will be some errors in the text for which of course I accept responsibility. I hope they prove to be minor and do not detract from the overall impact that the book may have.

Ian Loveland
London, Spring 2012

Outline Contents

PART ONE THEORETICAL PRINCIPLES

| | | |
|---|--|----|
| 1 | Defining the Constitution? | 3 |
| 2 | Parliamentary Sovereignty | 21 |
| 3 | The Rule of Law and the Separation of Powers | 50 |
| 4 | The Royal Prerogative | 86 |

PART TWO THE INSTITUTIONS AND OPERATION OF NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

| | | |
|---|----------------------------|-----|
| 5 | The House of Commons | 119 |
| 6 | The House of Lords | 155 |
| 7 | The Electoral System | 194 |
| 8 | Parliamentary Privilege | 228 |
| 9 | Constitutional Conventions | 260 |

PART THREE THE GEOGRAPHICAL SEPARATION OF POWERS

| | | |
|----|--|-----|
| 10 | Local Government | 301 |
| 11 | The European Economic Community 1957-1986 | 338 |
| 12 | The European Community after the Single European Act | 388 |
| 13 | The Governance of Scotland and Wales | 421 |

PART FOUR ADMINISTRATIVE LAW

| | | |
|----|---|-----|
| 14 | Substantive Grounds of Judicial Review | 445 |
| 15 | Procedural Grounds of Judicial Review | 475 |
| 16 | Challenging Governmental Decisions: The Process | 510 |
| 17 | Locus Standi | 535 |

PART FIVE HUMAN RIGHTS

| | | |
|----|---|-----|
| 18 | Human Rights I: Traditional Perspectives | 559 |
| 19 | Human Rights II: Emergent Principles | 588 |
| 20 | Human Rights III: New Substantive Grounds of Review | 616 |
| 21 | Human Rights IV: The Human Rights Act 1998 | 636 |
| 22 | Human Rights V: The Impact of the Human Rights Act 1998 | 661 |
| 23 | Human Rights VI: Governmental Powers of Arrest and Detention | 709 |
| 24 | Conclusion | 744 |

Contents

| | |
|--|-------|
| Preface to the Sixth Edition | v |
| Table of Legislation | xxi |
| Table of Treaties and Conventions | xxvii |
| List of Cases | xxix |

Part One Theoretical Principles

| | |
|---|----|
| 1 Defining the Constitution? | 3 |
| I. The meaning(s) of 'democracy'? | 4 |
| What is democratic governance? Some hypothetical examples | 5 |
| A constitution as a social and political contract? | 7 |
| II. The first 'modern' constitution? | 9 |
| The problem—majoritarianism | 10 |
| The solutions—representative government, federalism, a separation of powers, and supra-legislative 'fundamental' rights | 10 |
| Conclusion | 19 |
| Suggested further reading | 20 |
| Academic and political commentary | 20 |
| Case law and legislation | 20 |
| 2 Parliamentary Sovereignty | 21 |
| Pre-1688—natural or divine law | 21 |
| The Diceyan (or orthodox) theory | 22 |
| The political source of parliamentary sovereignty—the 'glorious revolution' | 24 |
| I. Legal authority for the principle of parliamentary sovereignty | 29 |
| Substance or procedure? the enrolled Bill rule | 30 |
| The doctrine of implied repeal | 31 |
| Inconsistency with international law | 32 |
| II. Entrenching legislation—challenges to the orthodox position | 34 |
| Jennings' critique and the 'rule of recognition' | 35 |
| Is parliamentary sovereignty a British or English concept? | 43 |
| Women's enfranchisement | 46 |
| Conclusion | 48 |
| Suggested further reading | 49 |
| Academic and political commentary | 49 |
| Case law and legislation | 49 |
| 3 The Rule of Law and the Separation of Powers | 50 |
| I. The Diceyan perspective: the rule of law in the pre-welfare state | 50 |
| Entick v Carrington (1765) | 52 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| Dicey's rule of law—process or substance? | 53 |
| The 'independence of the judiciary' | 54 |
| II. The rule of law in the welfare state | 56 |
| Hayek —the road to serfdom | 57 |
| Jones —the rule of law in the welfare state | 57 |
| 'Red light' and 'green light' theories | 59 |
| III. Judicial regulation of government behaviour: the constitutional rationale | 59 |
| IV. Principles of statutory interpretation | 62 |
| The literal rule | 63 |
| The golden rule | 66 |
| The mischief rule | 67 |
| Purposive (or 'teleological') interpretation | 68 |
| Liversidge v Anderson (1942) | 69 |
| R v IRC, ex p Rossminster Ltd (1980) | 71 |
| Conclusion | 73 |
| V. Stare decisis | 74 |
| The London Tramways judgment (1898) | 74 |
| The 1966 Practice Statement | 75 |
| VI. Parliamentary sovereignty v the rule of law | 75 |
| Ouster clauses— Gilmore (1957) and Anisminic (1969) | 76 |
| VII. 'Retrospective' law-making | 78 |
| Retrospectivity in legislation—the War Damage Act 1965 | 78 |
| 'Retrospectivity at common law'? Rape within marriage and conspiracy to corrupt public morals | 79 |
| 'Retrospective' or 'prospective' overruling? | 83 |
| Conclusion | 85 |
| Suggested further reading | 85 |
| Academic and political commentary | 85 |
| Case law and legislation | 85 |
| 4 The Royal Prerogative | 86 |
| The source of prerogative powers | 86 |
| Post 1688—the revolutionary settlement | 90 |
| I. The relationship between statute, the prerogative and the rule of law | 93 |
| Re Petition of Right (1915) | 93 |
| The Zamora (1915) | 94 |
| The superiority of statute over prerogative: A-G v De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd (1920) | 94 |
| Extending De Keyser : Laker Airways Ltd v Department of Trade (1977) | 98 |
| Extending Laker : R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Fire Brigades Union (1995) | 99 |
| II. The traditional perspective on judicial review of prerogative powers: and its erosion | 100 |
| 'Limited' rather than 'full' review of prerogative powers | 100 |
| Developments in the 1960s and 1970s | 102 |
| Conclusion—the 'constitutionality' of reform | 105 |
| III. Full reviewability—the GCHQ case (1983) | 105 |
| The 'nature' not the 'source' of power as the determinant of reviewability | 106 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| IV. Post-GCHQ developments | 107 |
| R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p | |
| Northumbria Police Authority (1988) | 108 |
| Foreign affairs? | 109 |
| Excluded categories: a shrinking list? | 110 |
| V. 'Justiciability' revisited—are all statutory powers subject to full review? | 111 |
| Conclusion | 112 |
| Suggested further reading | 115 |
| Academic and political commentary | 115 |
| Case law and legislation | 115 |

Part Two The Institutions and Operation of National Government

| | |
|---|-----|
| 5 The House of Commons | 119 |
| Crown and commons—the original intent and the subsequent rise of 'party' politics | 119 |
| The fusion of powers, the rise of the party system and cabinet dominance of the Commons | 121 |
| I. Setting the context | 124 |
| The sources of the Commons' procedural rules | 124 |
| The Speaker | 125 |
| Resources | 126 |
| II. The passage of legislation | 129 |
| Second reading | 131 |
| Standing committees | 131 |
| Report and third reading | 132 |
| Conclusion | 133 |
| Private members' Bills | 133 |
| Private Bills | 135 |
| Hybrid Bills | 136 |
| Delegated legislation | 136 |
| 'Henry VIII clauses' | 139 |
| Conclusion | 140 |
| III. Controlling the executive | 140 |
| Motions on the floor of the house | 140 |
| Emergency debates and adjournment debates | 141 |
| Questions to ministers | 141 |
| Prime Ministerial accountability on the floor of the house | 143 |
| Early day motions | 145 |
| Questions for written answer | 145 |
| Informal processes | 145 |
| The departmental select committee system | 146 |
| Conclusion | 151 |
| Suggested further reading | 154 |
| Academic and political commentary | 154 |
| 6 The House of Lords | 155 |
| Bicameral legislatures: a functionalist justification | 155 |

| | | |
|----------|---|-----|
| I. | The historical background | 156 |
| | Co-equality to complementarity: a conventional change | 157 |
| | Lloyd George and the 'people's budget' | 160 |
| | The Parliament Act 1911 | 163 |
| | The Salisbury Doctrine and the Parliament Act 1949 | 166 |
| II. | The House of Lords in the modern era | 167 |
| | Life peerages | 168 |
| | The 1968 reforms | 169 |
| | The 1974–1979 parliament | 170 |
| | The House of Lords and the Thatcher governments | 172 |
| III. | The work of the House of Lords today | 174 |
| | Deliberation | 175 |
| | Revision of legislation | 176 |
| | Control of delegated legislation | 177 |
| | Scrutiny of the executive | 178 |
| IV. | The 1999 reforms | 179 |
| | The 'reformed' House of Lords | 182 |
| | The recommendations of the Wakeham Commission | 182 |
| | The 2001 White Paper | 184 |
| | One parliament or three? Jackson v Attorney-General | 187 |
| | Conclusion | 191 |
| | Suggested further reading | 193 |
| | Academic and political commentary | 193 |
| | Case law and legislation | 193 |
| 7 | The Electoral System | 194 |
| I. | The evolution of a 'democratic' electoral system? | 194 |
| | The Great Reform Act 1832 | 195 |
| | The 1867–1884 reforms: towards a universal 'right' to vote and a 'fair' electoral contest | 200 |
| II. | The contemporary electoral process | 203 |
| | Apportionment—drawing constituency boundaries | 203 |
| | The contents and conduct of election campaigns | 206 |
| | Counting the vote | 217 |
| | The 2010 election: a hung Parliament and a coalition government | 220 |
| | Alternative voting systems | 221 |
| | Conclusion | 226 |
| | Suggested further reading | 227 |
| | Academic and political commentary | 227 |
| | Case law and legislation | 227 |
| 8 | Parliamentary Privilege | 228 |
| | Article 9 of the Bill of Rights 1689 | 230 |
| I. | The admission, retention and expulsion of members | 232 |
| | Ashby v White | 232 |
| | Paty's case | 232 |
| | John Wilkes | 233 |
| | Charles Bradlaugh | 234 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| Freedom from imprisonment, arrest and molestation | 236 |
| II. The principle of informed consent? | 239 |
| III. The justiciability of 'proceedings in Parliament' | 240 |
| Actions in defamation | 240 |
| What are 'proceedings in parliament'? | 241 |
| 'Redefining parliament'— Pepper v Hart (1993) | 244 |
| IV. 'Contempt' of the house | 248 |
| The 1967 report of the Privileges Committee | 250 |
| V. The regulation of MPs' ethical standards | 250 |
| The register of members' interests | 251 |
| 'Cash for questions' and the report of the Nolan Commission | 252 |
| The report of the Nicholls Committee | 255 |
| Parliamentary privilege and the expenses scandal | 256 |
| The Bribery Act 2010 | 257 |
| Conclusion | 258 |
| Suggested further reading | 259 |
| Academic and political commentary | 259 |
| Case law and legislation | 259 |
| 9 Constitutional Conventions | 260 |
| The Diceyan perspective—laws and conventions distinguished | 261 |
| The functions and sources of conventions | 261 |
| I. Collective ministerial responsibility | 262 |
| Confidence | 263 |
| Unanimity | 264 |
| Confidentiality | 267 |
| II. The Monarch | 269 |
| III. Collective ministerial responsibility revisited: from Cabinet to Prime Ministerial government...? | 274 |
| ... And back again? | 276 |
| IV. Individual ministerial responsibility | 278 |
| Issues of competence | 278 |
| Errors of judgement | 280 |
| Issues of morality | 282 |
| Reforming the executive: 1—the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration | 283 |
| Reforming the executive: 2—'next steps' and privatisation | 285 |
| V. Can conventions become laws? 2: Patriating the Canadian constitution | 287 |
| Patriating the Canadian constitution | 287 |
| VI. From ministerial responsibility to ministerial accountability? | |
| The Matrix-Churchill controversy | 291 |
| VII. Turning convention into law: the 'Ponsonby rule' and the Constitutional Reform and Governance Act 2010 | 293 |
| Conclusion—the conventional basis of parliamentary sovereignty? | 295 |
| Suggested further reading | 297 |
| Academic and political commentary | 297 |
| Case law and legislation | 297 |

Part Three The Geographical Separation of Powers

| | |
|--|-----|
| 10 Local Government | 301 |
| I. Localism, tradition, and the 'modernisation' of local government | 302 |
| The Municipal Corporations Act 1835 | 303 |
| II. Local government's constitutional status in the early twentieth-century—law and convention | 306 |
| The physical boundaries of local authorities | 308 |
| III. Taxation and representation: the fiscal autonomy of local government | 309 |
| IV. The role of the judiciary | 311 |
| V. Council housing | 313 |
| VI. From 'ambivalence' to 'authoritarianism' | 316 |
| VII. Financial 'reform' 1: grant penalties and ratecapping | 318 |
| Ratecapping | 318 |
| VIII. Collective politics and individual rights: the judicial role | 320 |
| 'Fares fair': Bromley London Borough Council v Greater London Council | 320 |
| IX. Institutional 'reform'; the abolition of the GLC and metropolitan counties | 322 |
| X. Privatising local government | 323 |
| The Widdicombe Report | 323 |
| Housing—individuated and collective privatisation | 324 |
| XI. Financial 'reform' 2: the community charge | 327 |
| A step too far? The demise of the poll tax | 328 |
| Conclusion | 329 |
| XII. The Blair government's reforms | 330 |
| The Local Government Acts 1999 and 2000 | 331 |
| The governance of London | 332 |
| Conclusion | 334 |
| Suggested further reading | 336 |
| Academic and political commentary | 336 |
| Case law and legislation | 337 |
| 11 The European Economic Community 1957–1986 | 338 |
| I. The Treaty of Rome 1: founding principles | 339 |
| The types of EEC law and law-making processes | 340 |
| The status of EC law within the legal systems of the Member States | 345 |
| Questions of accessibility 1: the 'direct effect' of treaty articles | 349 |
| Questions of hierarchy 1: the 'precedence' or 'supremacy' of treaty articles over domestic legislation | 352 |
| Laws, conventions and 'ultimate political facts': the 'empty chair crisis' and the Luxembourg accords | 355 |
| Questions of accessibility and hierarchy 2: the direct effect and precedence of decisions, regulations and directives | 357 |
| Member State judicial reaction to the direct effect and precedence of EEC law | 360 |
| Conclusion | 365 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| II. United Kingdom accession | 365 |
| EEC membership and parliamentary sovereignty: the legislators' views—and their votes | 366 |
| The European Communities Act 1972—the passage | 368 |
| The European Communities Act 1972—the terms | 369 |
| Parliamentary sovereignty: a non-justiciable concept? | 370 |
| The 1975 referendum | 371 |
| III. The Treaty of Rome 2: precedence and direct effect revisited | 372 |
| Confirming the direct effect of directives | 372 |
| The horizontal direct effect of treaty articles— Walrave and Koch (1974) | 373 |
| The justiciability test and the horizontal direct effect principle reaffirmed and expanded— Defrenne v Sabena (1976) | 375 |
| Immediate precedence: Simmenthal (1977) | 375 |
| Effet utile before the Conseil d'etat : the Cohn-Bendit controversy | 376 |
| IV. EEC law, parliamentary sovereignty, and the UK courts: phase one | 377 |
| The end of the doctrine of implied repeal? Macarthys v Smith (1979) | 378 |
| A matter of interpretation? Garland v British Rail (1983) | 379 |
| V. Direct effect—the saga continues | 380 |
| The horizontal and vertical direct effect of directives? | |
| Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority (1986) | 381 |
| Making sense of Marshall ? the emergence of 'indirect effect' | 382 |
| An analytical overview: 'normative' and 'decisional' supra-nationalism | 384 |
| The reduction of the 'democratic deficit' and the emergence of human rights as general principles of EEC law | 385 |
| Conclusion | 386 |
| Suggested further reading | 386 |
| Academic and political commentary | 386 |
| Case law and legislation | 387 |
| 12 The European Community after the Single European Act | 388 |
| I. The Single European Act—the terms | 388 |
| Reducing the democratic deficit—Treaty amendment | 391 |
| Domestic disquiet: Margaret Thatcher's Bruges speech | 392 |
| II. Normative supra-nationalism—the ECJ continues | 393 |
| The 'indirect effect' of directives—continued | 393 |
| Reducing the democratic deficit: judicial initiatives | 394 |
| III. EC law, parliamentary sovereignty and the UK courts: phase two | 395 |
| Duke v GEC Reliance Ltd | 396 |
| Pickstone v Freemans | 397 |
| Litster v Forth Dry Dock and Engineering Co Ltd | 397 |
| Pickstone and Litster —usurping the legislative function? | 398 |
| IV. The end of parliamentary sovereignty? Or its reappearance? | 399 |
| The demise of the legal doctrine? Factortame | 400 |
| The reappearance of the political doctrine? Monetary union, collective ministerial responsibility and the fall of Margaret Thatcher | 407 |
| V. The Francovich remedy | 410 |
| Francovich | 410 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| VI. Maastricht and Amsterdam | 413 |
| The terms of the Maastricht Treaty | 413 |
| The ratification and incorporation of the Maastricht Treaty | 415 |
| The Treaty of Amsterdam | 416 |
| Conclusion | 417 |
| Suggested further reading | 420 |
| Academic and political commentary | 420 |
| Case law and legislation | 420 |
| 13 The Governance of Scotland and Wales | 421 |
| The Scotland Act 1978 and the Wales Act 1978 | 422 |
| I. The Scotland Act 1998 | 423 |
| The terms of the Act | 426 |
| The first Scottish parliament and government | 432 |
| The 2003 and 2007 elections | 434 |
| Conclusion | 435 |
| II. Devolved government in Wales after 1998 | 436 |
| The Government of Wales Act 1998 | 436 |
| The Government of Wales Act 2006 | 439 |
| Conclusion | 441 |
| Suggested further reading | 441 |
| Academic and political commentary | 441 |
| Case law and legislation | 442 |
| Part Four Administrative Law | |
| 14 Substantive Grounds of Judicial Review | 445 |
| I. Illegality | 446 |
| Excess of powers | 446 |
| Unlawful delegation of powers | 455 |
| Fettering of discretion | 458 |
| Estoppel | 461 |
| II. Irrationality | 464 |
| Irrationality and 'the merits' of a governmental decision | 465 |
| III. Proportionality—a new ground of review? | 470 |
| Bringing the courts closer to the 'merits' of a decision | 470 |
| Conclusion | 473 |
| Suggested further reading | 473 |
| Academic and political commentary | 473 |
| Case law and legislation | 473 |
| 15 Procedural Grounds of Judicial Review | 475 |
| I. Audi alterem partem —the right to a fair hearing | 477 |
| The initial rise, dilution and fall of the audi alterem partem principle | 477 |
| The re-emergence of the principle? Ridge v Baldwin | 482 |
| The emergence of the procedural fairness doctrine and the appearance of the legitimate expectation | 484 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| Legitimate expectation—an entitlement to a procedural benefit or a substantive benefit? | 487 |
| The content of procedural fairness—legal representation and an obligation to give reasons for decisions | 499 |
| Conclusion | 502 |
| II. The rule against bias | 502 |
| Direct financial interests | 502 |
| Indirect financial interests—a mere suspicion or a real likelihood | 503 |
| Clarifying the law? the Gough formulae | 505 |
| Ideological bias in ‘judicial’ decisions | 505 |
| Further clarifying the law? the Porter v Magill formula | 507 |
| Bias in non-judicial proceedings | 508 |
| Conclusion | 508 |
| Suggested further reading | 509 |
| Academic and political commentary | 509 |
| Case law and legislation | 509 |
| 16 Challenging Governmental Decisions: The Process | 510 |
| The turning point? Barnard v National Dock Labour Board | 513 |
| The Order 53 reforms | 514 |
| The initial Order 53 case law | 516 |
| I. O’Reilly v Mackman (1982) | 517 |
| Exceptions to the general principle? | 520 |
| II. The Post- O’Reilly case law | 521 |
| The flip side of the O’Reilly coin | 523 |
| A ‘nature’ not ‘source’ of power test—the Datafin (1987), Aga Khan (1993), Servite Houses (1999) and Wachmann (1993) decisions | 524 |
| III. Retreating from O’Reilly ? The Roy case | 528 |
| IV. Public law principle as a defence in criminal proceedings | 529 |
| Conclusion | 532 |
| Suggested further reading | 533 |
| Academic and political commentary | 533 |
| Case law and legislation | 534 |
| 17 Locus Standi | 535 |
| I. The ‘old’ case law | 536 |
| Declaration and injunction—a restrictive test? | 537 |
| Certiorari and prohibition—an expansive test? | 541 |
| Mandamus—a broad or narrow test? | 543 |
| II. Section 31(3) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 and the Inland Revenue Commissioners case | 544 |
| Should standing be a threshold issue? | 545 |
| Standing in the private law stream | 547 |
| III. Post- IRC developments | 548 |
| A ‘citizen’s action’ test for standing under s 31(3)? | 548 |
| ‘Representative standing’ | 550 |
| Conclusion | 553 |

| | |
|-----------------------------------|-----|
| Suggested further reading | 555 |
| Academic and political commentary | 555 |
| Case law and legislation | 555 |

Part Five Human Rights

| | |
|--|-----|
| 18 Human Rights I: Traditional Perspectives | 559 |
| I. Public protest and public order | 560 |
| The classic dilemma— Beatty v Gillbanks (1882) | 561 |
| The Public Order Act 1936 | 562 |
| The Public Order Act 1986 | 566 |
| II. Privacy | 567 |
| Speech and communication | 567 |
| Sado-masochistic sexual behaviour | 569 |
| III. Freedom of speech | 571 |
| Official secrecy | 572 |
| The Official Secrets Act 1989 | 577 |
| Blasphemy | 578 |
| Contempt of court | 580 |
| Political libels | 583 |
| Conclusion | 586 |
| Suggested further reading | 586 |
| Academic and political commentary | 586 |
| Case law and legislation | 587 |
| 19 Human Rights II: Emergent Principles | 588 |
| I. The European Convention on Human Rights— introductory principles | 588 |
| Institutional and jurisdictional issues | 589 |
| The jurisprudential methodology of the Convention | 590 |
| II. The initial status of the ECHR in domestic law | 594 |
| Political responses—why did Parliament not ‘incorporate’ the ECHR? | 595 |
| Legal responses—the ECHR as a source of principle at common law | 596 |
| III. The impact of the ECHR on domestic law 1: privacy | 599 |
| Speech and communication | 599 |
| Sado-masochistic sexual behaviour | 601 |
| IV. The impact of the ECHR on domestic law 2: freedom of expression | 601 |
| Official secrecy | 602 |
| Political libels | 602 |
| Contempt of court | 605 |
| Blasphemy | 607 |
| Conclusion | 611 |
| Suggested further reading | 615 |
| Academic and political commentary | 615 |
| Case law and legislation | 615 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| 20 Human Rights III: New Substantive Grounds of Review | 616 |
| I. Judicial incorporation of the Convention? | 617 |
| The Convention in domestic law | 617 |
| II. The (re-)emergence and consolidation of fundamental human rights as an indigenous principle of common law | 619 |
| Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers Ltd in the House of Lords | 620 |
| R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Leech (no 2) | 621 |
| R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants | 623 |
| III. The 'judicial supremacism' controversy | 623 |
| Judgments of the ECJ and the ECtHR | 624 |
| Judgments in domestic courts on immigration policies | 626 |
| A judicial response | 631 |
| Lord Mustill's analysis | 632 |
| Conclusion | 634 |
| Suggested further reading | 634 |
| Academic commentary | 634 |
| Case law and legislation | 635 |
| | |
| 21 Human Rights IV: The Human Rights Act 1998 | 636 |
| I. The terms of the Act | 637 |
| An 'incorporation' of 'fundamental' rights? | 637 |
| Sections 1 and 2: 'Convention Rights' under the HRA and Convention articles under the ECHR | 639 |
| Section 3—new rules of statutory interpretation? | 640 |
| Section 4—the 'declaration of incompatibility' | 643 |
| The inter-relationship between s 3 and s 4 | 644 |
| Convention Rights and the common law | 644 |
| Section 6—the reach of the act: vertical (and horizontal?) effect | 645 |
| Convention Rights and the common law... again... | 647 |
| A special status for churches and the press? | 652 |
| Questions of procedure | 653 |
| On the separation of powers | 655 |
| Political entrenchment? A new 'rights' culture within government and parliament | 656 |
| Conclusion | 657 |
| Suggested further reading | 660 |
| Academic commentary | 660 |
| Case law and legislation | 660 |
| | |
| 22 Human Rights V: The Impact of the Human Rights Act 1998 | 661 |
| I. Convention Rights and Convention articles under s 2, statutory interpretation under s 3 and the use of declarations of incompatibility under s 4 | 661 |
| The initial judicial reaction | 662 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| A more structured approach to the meaning of 'possible' in s 3? | |
| A distinction between 'systemic' and 'individuated' consequences | 665 |
| II. The notion of 'deference' to legislative judgment | 672 |
| The question of precedent | 677 |
| III. The horizontality of the Act | 680 |
| IV. Proportionality as a ground of review of executive action | 693 |
| The initial judicial response: the Daly and Alconbury cases | 694 |
| A more elaborate approach: the Denbigh High School and Miss Behavin cases | 695 |
| Blurring the issue? Doherty v Birmingham City Council (2008) and Manchester City Council v Pinnock (2009) | 697 |
| Conclusion | 699 |
| Judicial supremacy revisited? | 700 |
| Conclusion | 703 |
| Suggested further reading | 707 |
| Academic commentary | 707 |
| Case law and legislation | 707 |
| 23 Human Rights VI: Governmental Powers of Arrest and Detention | 709 |
| 'Liberty' under Art 5 ECHR | 710 |
| The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 | 711 |
| I. Deprivation of liberty for 'ordinary' offences | 712 |
| Powers of arrest | 712 |
| Powers of detention after arrest | 722 |
| Powers of detention without arrest | 724 |
| II. Deprivation of liberty for 'terrorist' offences | 729 |
| Powers of arrest and detention in the 1945–1977 era | 730 |
| Powers of arrest and detention in the post-1977 era | 736 |
| Conclusion | 742 |
| Suggested further reading | 743 |
| Academic commentary | 743 |
| Case law and legislation | 743 |
| 24 Conclusion | 744 |
| I. Entrenchment of fundamental law re-visited | 744 |
| Issues of legality and legitimacy | 744 |
| Questions of legitimacy | 749 |
| Conclusion | 752 |
| Suggested further reading | 753 |
| Academic commentary | 753 |
| Case law and legislation | 753 |
| Bibliography | 755 |
| Index | 779 |

Table of Legislation

STATUTES

- Abortion Act 1967 ... 66, 134
s 1(1) ... 66, 67
- Acquisition of Land Act 1919 ... 31
s 7 ... 31, 369
- Act of Settlement 1700 ... 54, 55, 59, 231
- Act of Union 1707 ... 43, 46, 302, 421, 748
- Act of Union 1800 ... 730
- Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1938–
s 9 ... 515
- Agriculture Marketing Act 1958 ... 450
s 19(3) ... 450, 451
- Aliens Restriction Act 1914 ... 480
- Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979 ... 551
- Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 ... 739, 740, 742
s 23 ... 739–42
- Arbitration Act 1889 ... 453
- Audit (Local Authorities) Act 1927 ... 313
- Bill of Rights 1689 ... 26, 27, 90, 92, 231, 238, 453, 748
Art 1 ... 91
Art 4 ... 88, 91
Art 9 ... 165, 230, 231, 237, 238, 240, 242–46, 255–58, 289, 467, 585, 600, 745, 747
Art 13 ... 91
- Board of Guardians (Default) Act 1926 ... 313
- Bribery Act 2010 ... 257, 258
- British Nationality Act 1981–
s 44(2) ... 501
- British North America Act 1867 ... 287, 429, 430
s 24 ... 429, 430
- Broadcasting Act 1981–
s 29 ... 467, 599
- Canada Act 1982 ... 290
- Chancel Repairs Act 1932 ... 680
- Children Act 1989 ... 666
- Children and Young Persons Act 1963–
s 1 ... 460
- Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 ... 135
- Cinematograph Act 1909 ... 455
- Civil Authorities (Special Powers) Act (Northern Ireland), 1922 ... 730, 731
s 1 ... 730
Sch (Regulations for Peace and Order in Northern Ireland)
reg 10 ... 731
- reg 11 ... 731
reg 11(1), (2) ... 731
reg 12 ... 731
- Civil Aviation Act 1971 ... 98
s 3(1), (2) ... 98
s 4(3) ... 98, 112
- Colonial Laws Validity Act 1865 ... 36–38
s 5 ... 36, 37, 403
- Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962–
s 2 ... 484
- Communications Act 2003
s 319 ... 215
- Constitution Statute 1855 ... 36, 37
- Constitutional Reform Act 2005 ... 192, 752
Pts 3, 4 ... 192
- Constitutional Reform and Governance Act 2010 ... 112, 293, 294
s 20 ... 294
s 20(1) ... 294
s 20(1)(c) ... 294
s 20(4) ... 294
s 22 ... 294
- Consumer Credit Act 1974–
s 127 ... 663, 664, 674, 688
s 127(3) ... 674
- Constables Protection Act 1750–
s 6 ... 716
- Contempt of Court Act 1981 ... 607
s 2 ... 607
s 2(2) ... 607
s 10 ... 573, 613, 614, 650
- Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act 1883 ... 201, 202, 209, 213
- Criminal Justice Act 1988–
ss 108–117 ... 99, 100
s 171 ... 99, 100
- Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008
s 79 ... 611
- Criminal Law Act 1967 ... 716
s 2(4) ... 717
- Crown Proceedings Act 1947 ... 511, 628
- Defence Act 1842 ... 95, 96
- Defence of the Realm (Consolidation) Act 1914 ... 96, 97
s 1 ... 96
s 1(2) ... 96
- Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 ... 140
- Education Act 1902 ... 305
- Education Act 1980 ... 495
- Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections Act 1867 ... 201, 202

- Electoral Administration Act 2006 . . . 207, 225
- Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 . . . 500
- Equal Pay Act 1970 . . . 378
- European Communities Act 1972 . . . 368–70, 377–79, 396, 398, 399, 401–403, 405, 406, 418, 419, 435, 445, 595, 624, 639, 748, 749
- s 1 . . . 369, 391
- s 2 . . . 379, 380, 395, 396, 400, 640
- s 2(1) . . . 369, 419
- s 2(2) . . . 397
- s 2(2)(a) . . . 369
- s 2(4) . . . 369, 396
- s 3 . . . 380, 396, 398, 640
- s 3(1) . . . 369
- European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978–s 6 . . . 385, 391, 415
- European Union Act 2011 . . . 419, 639
- ss 2, 18 . . . 419
- Finance Act 1964 . . . 33
- Firearms Act 1968 . . . 727
- Fixed Term Parliaments Act 2011 . . . 225
- s 1 . . . 225
- Foreign Compensation Act 1950–s 4(4) . . . 77
- Foreign Compensation Act 1969–s 3 . . . 78
- Gender Recognition Act 2004 . . . 669
- Government of Ireland Act 1914 . . . 166
- Government of Ireland Act 1922 . . . 730
- Government of Wales Act 1998 . . . 436, 437, 439, 748
- s 22 . . . 437
- s 80 . . . 437
- Sch 2 . . . 437
- Government of Wales Act 2006 . . . 439–41
- Pt 2 . . . 439
- Greater London Authority Act 1999 . . . 332
- ss 3, 4, 17 . . . 333
- ss 59–69 . . . 332
- ss 82–84 . . . 333
- Pt VI (ss 310–27) . . . 332
- Sch 2 . . . 333
- Health and Social Care Act 2008–s 148 . . . 686
- Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act 1889 . . . 32, 33
- Homicide Act 1957 . . . 672
- House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975 . . . 123, 207
- House of Commons (Removal of Clergy Disqualification) Act 2001 . . . 207
- House of Lords Act 1999 . . . 182, 194
- ss 1, 2 . . . 182
- Housing Act 1925 . . . 31
- Housing Act 1930 . . . 31
- Housing Act 1936 . . . 314
- s 83 . . . 314
- Housing Act 1980 . . . 325, 326, 522
- s 23 . . . 325, 326
- Housing Act 1985 . . . 501
- s 21 . . . 454
- s 21(1) . . . 452
- Housing Act 1988 . . . 326, 686
- Pt III . . . 326
- Housing Act 1996 . . . 65
- Housing and Town Planning Act 1909 . . . 478, 479
- Housing Finance Act 1972 . . . 315
- Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 . . . 135, 460, 516
- s 3(4) . . . 516
- Human Rights Act 1998 . . . 427–29, 498, 634, 636–60, 661, 664, 665, 668–70, 672, 673, 674, 677–80, 682, 684, 686–99, 701, 703, 704, 707, 714, 715, 718, 727, 739, 740, 742, 748
- s 1 . . . 639
- s 1(1) . . . 664
- s 2 . . . 640, 645, 659, 661, 664, 668, 675–77, 692
- s 2(1) . . . 640, 676
- s 3 . . . 640–46, 649, 661–72, 674, 680, 687, 688, 692, 693, 699, 705, 740
- s 4 . . . 643, 644, 647, 661, 663, 665, 666, 669, 671–74
- s 4(5), (6) . . . 643
- s 6 . . . 645, 646–50, 659, 678, 680–88, 693
- s 6(1) . . . 645–49, 680, 682, 688
- s 6(2) . . . 646, 647, 649, 688
- s 6(3) . . . 647, 648, 692
- s 6(3)(a) . . . 688
- s 6(3)(b) . . . 646, 649, 681–85
- s 6(5) . . . 646
- s 7 . . . 646, 653, 682
- s 7(3) . . . 654
- s 7(5)(a), (b) . . . 655
- s 8 . . . 646, 654
- s 10(2) . . . 656
- s 11 . . . 653, 667, 668
- s 12 . . . 652, 659
- s 13 . . . 652
- s 14 . . . 740
- s 19 . . . 656, 657
- s 21 . . . 647
- s 21(1) . . . 641
- s 22(3) . . . 658
- Sch 1 . . . 639, 640
- Pt I–
- Art 6 . . . 662, 663, 675, 676
- Art 6(1)(3)(d) . . . 676
- Art 8 . . . 666, 667, 676, 677
- Art 12 . . . 667, 668
- Part II, para 1 . . . 663
- Hunting Act 2004 . . . 188
- Immigration Act 1971 . . . 97, 598
- Immigration Act 1988 . . . 458
- Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 . . . 665

- Industrial Development Act 1966–
s 1(1) . . . 459
- Interception of Communications Act
1985 . . . 601, 602
- Judicature Act 1873 . . . 60, 231
- Judicature Act 1875 . . . 60, 231
- Licensing (Consolidation) Act 1910 . . . 243
- Life Peerages Act 1958 . . . 168, 183, 194
- Local Government Act 1888 . . . 305
- Local Government Act 1958 . . . 308
- Local Government Act 1972 . . . 309, 315, 320
- Local Government Act 1985 . . . 322
- Local Government Act 1999 . . . 331
- Local Government Act 2000 . . . 331
- Local Government Finance Act 1982 . . . 318
- Local Government Finance Act 1988 . . . 328
- Local Government and Housing Act
1989 . . . 324, 326
- Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 . . . 318, 325
- London Council (General Powers) Act 1890 . . . 459
- s 14 . . . 459
- London (Transport) Act 1969 . . . 320–22
- ss 1, 3 . . . 320, 321
- s 7 . . . 320
- Lord Brougham's Act 1850 . . . 47, 63
- s 4 . . . 47
- Magistrates' Court Act 1952–
s 38 . . . 723
- Magistrates' Court Act 1980–
s 1 . . . 716
- s 43 . . . 722, 723
- s 43(4) . . . 723
- Magna Carta . . . 24–26, 89, 748
- Art 14 . . . 24
- Matrimonial Causes Act 1973–
s 11 . . . 668
- s 11(c) . . . 667, 668
- Mental Deficiency Act 1915–
s 9 . . . 530
- s 56 . . . 530
- Mental Health Act 1983 . . . 207, 664
- s 73 . . . 664
- Merchant Shipping Act 1894 . . . 400
- Merchant Shipping Act 1988 . . . 400, 401, 405, 624
- Metropolis Management Act 1855 . . . 477
- s 62 . . . 312, 447, 454
- s 76 . . . 477
- Metropolitan Police Act 1839–
s 66 . . . 728
- Metropolitan Public Carriage Act 1869 . . . 480
- Ministerial and other Salaries Act 1975–
s 1 . . . 123
- Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 . . . 672
- s 23 . . . 728
- s 23(2) . . . 727
- Municipal Corporations Act 1835 . . . 303–305, 335
- Municipal Corporations Act 1882–
s 191(4) . . . 482
- National Assistance Act 1948–
s 21 . . . 526, 527, 681, 684–86
- s 21(1) . . . 681
- s 26 . . . 526, 681
- National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1948 . . . 76
- s 36(3) . . . 76
- Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002–
s 55 . . . 700
- s 101 . . . 701
- Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act
1973 . . . 731
- Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act
1978 . . . 732
- s 11 . . . 733
- s 11(1) . . . 733
- s 31(1) . . . 732
- Northern Ireland (Temporary Provisions) Act
1972 . . . 731
- Offences Against the Person Act 1861 . . . 569, 571
- s 20 . . . 64, 569–71
- s 47 . . . 64, 569–71
- s 58 . . . 66
- Official Secrets Act 1911 . . . 572, 573, 577
- s 1 . . . 111, 572
- s 2 . . . 572–75, 577
- Official Secrets Act 1989 . . . 577, 578
- s 1 . . . 577
- s 1(1)(b) . . . 577
- ss 2–4 . . . 577
- Overseas Development and Co-operation Act 1980–
s 1 . . . 448, 449
- Parliament Act 1911 . . . 163–67, 171, 172, 180, 185, 187–91, 205, 272, 306
- s 1 . . . 163–66
- s 1(1) . . . 189, 190
- s 1(2) . . . 163
- s 1(3) . . . 163, 164
- s 2 163–66, 189
- s 2(1) . . . 164, 189, 190
- s 2(2) . . . 164
- s 3 . . . 164, 165
- ss 4, 7 . . . 164
- Parliament Act 1949 . . . 166, 167, 169–72, 180, 185, 187–90, 205, 271, 287, 658
- Parliament (Qualification of Women Act)
1918 . . . 202
- Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967 . . . 283
- s 5 . . . 283
- s 8 . . . 284

- Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986 . . . 203, 204
s 4(7) . . . 204
Sch 2, rr 1, 4–7 . . . 203
- Parliamentary Papers Act 1840 . . . 243
- Parliamentary Privilege Act 1770 . . . 237, 238
s 1 . . . 237, 238
- Parliamentary Standards Act 2009 . . . 128, 254, 255, 257
s 1 . . . 256
s 3 . . . 254
s 10 . . . 255
- Parliamentary Voting Systems and Constituencies Act 2010 . . . 224
ss 10–14 . . . 225
- Planning Act 1968–
s 64 . . . 464
- Police Act 1964 . . . 108, 109
s 4 . . . 109
s 51 . . . 714, 724, 725
- Police Act 1996–
s 89 . . . 714
s 89(2) . . . 714
- Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 . . . 711, 712, 716–24, 728, 729, 735
s 1 . . . 728, 729
s 1(2) . . . 728
s 2 . . . 728
s 2(9) . . . 729
s 3 . . . 729
s 23 . . . 728
s 24 . . . 716–19, 734, 735
s 24(4) . . . 716
s 24(5) . . . 717, 720
s 24(5)(e) . . . 720
s 24(6) . . . 716, 717
s 24(7) . . . 716
s 24A . . . 719, 720
s 25 . . . 716, 718–21
s 25(3) . . . 718
s 26 . . . 716, 721
s 28 . . . 721, 722
ss 30, 35–36 . . . 723
ss 41, 42, 43 . . . 723
s 67(11) . . . 712
Code A . . . 728
para 1.6 . . . 728
para 1.7 . . . 729
paras 2.1–2.3 . . . 729
paras 3.1, 3.3, 3.5 . . . 729
para 4 . . . 729
- Political Parties, Elections and Referendums
Act 2000 . . . 205, 206, 209, 211, 213–216, 225
Pt V . . . 214
Sch 8 . . . 214
- Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 . . . 305
- Post Office Act 1969–
s 80 . . . 600
- Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 . . . 741
s 1 . . . 741
- Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1979 . . . 736
- Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 . . . 736
s 12 . . . 734, 735, 736
s 12(1) . . . 733
s 12(4), (5) . . . 735
- Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 . . . 624, 732, 733
- Prison Act 1952 . . . 454, 622
s 47 . . . 453, 454, 621, 622
- Privilege of Parliament Act 1512 (Strode’s
Act) . . . 229, 230
- Promissory Oaths Act 1868 . . . 234
- Public Order Act 1936 . . . 562–64, 566
s 3 . . . 563, 565, 566
s 3(1), (3) . . . 563
s 5 . . . 563–66
- Public Order Act 1986 . . . 562, 566, 567
s 5 . . . 566, 567
ss 11, 12, 14, 39 . . . 566
- Race Relations Act 1965–
s 6 . . . 539
- Radioactive Substances Act 1960 . . . 552
- Rates Act 1984 . . . 318, 319
- Reform Act 1832 (Great Reform Act) . . .
47, 158, 194, 195, 200, 234, 235, 262, 269,
303, 335
- Reform Act 1867 . . . 47, 200, 201, 266
- Reform Act 1884 . . . 202, 221
- Registration of Political Parties Act
1998 . . . 209
- Rent Act 1977 . . . 670, 688
Sch 1, para 2 . . . 688
Sch 1, para 2(2) . . . 670, 671
- Representation of the People Act 1918 . . . 202, 206
s 34(1) . . . 210
- Representation of the People Act 1948 . . . 206
- Representation of the People Act 1969 . . . 704
- Representation of the People Act 1983 . . .
209–12
s 3 . . . 704, 705
s 7 . . . 207
s 75 . . . 210, 212
s 76 . . . 209, 211
s 76(1) . . . 210
s 82 . . . 210, 211
s 106 . . . 216, 217
s 115 . . . 209
s 118 . . . 210, 211
ss 159–160 . . . 217
Sch 1, r 6(2), (3) . . . 208
- Representation of the People Act 1985 . . . 206
- Representation of the People Act 2000 . . . 206, 207, 225
s 6 . . . 207
- Representation of the People (Scotland) Act 1868 . . . 47
- Royal Titles Act 1953 . . . 45

- Scotland Act 1978 . . . 422, 423
 Scotland Act 1998 . . . 423, 426–32, 435, 436, 441, 748
 ss 1–10, 19, 22–27 . . . 427
 s 28 . . . 427, 432
 s 28(7) . . . 431, 432
 s 29 . . . 427–29, 432
 s 33 . . . 427
 s 35 . . . 428
 ss 36, 44–58 . . . 427
 s 63 . . . 428
 ss 64–80 . . . 427
 s 101 . . . 428, 430
 Sch 5 . . . 427
 Sch 6 . . . 428
 Septennial Act 1715 . . . 91
 Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 . . . 719 Sex Discrimination Act 1975 . . . 378–80, 396, 397
 s 6(4) . . . 396
 Sexual Offences Act 1967 . . . 135
 s 1 . . . 569
 s 1(1) . . . 569
 Statute of Proclamations 1539 . . . 139
 Statute of Westminster 1931 . . . 38, 39, 287, 288, 425
 s 2 . . . 38
 s 4 . . . 38, 288, 431
 Statutory Instruments Act 1946 . . . 138
 ss 8, 9 . . . 138
 Sunday Entertainment Act 1932–
 s 1 . . . 61
 Sunday Trading Act 1950 . . . 548
 Supreme Court Act 1981 (now Senior Courts Act 1981) . . . 510, 536
 s 31 . . . 515, 519, 520, 545
 s 31(3) . . . 545–48, 549, 552, 553, 654
 Taxes Management Act 1970– s 20C . . . 71–73
 Television Act 1964–
 s 3 . . . 539
 Terrorism Act 2000 . . . 736, 737
 s 1 . . . 736, 737
 s 1(4) . . . 737
 s 41 . . . 737
 Sch 8 . . . 738
 Terrorism Act 2006–
 s 23 . . . 738
 Theft Act 1968 . . . 256
 s 17 . . . 255
 Town and Country Planning Act 1947–
 s 14 . . . 466
 Town and Country Planning Act 1990–
 s 172 . . . 531
 Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 . . . 171 Transport (London) Act 1969–
 s 1 . . . 449
 Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1958 . . . 278, 500
 Triennial Act 1641 . . . 25, 230
 Triennial Act 1694 . . . 91
 Universities (Scotland) Act 1889 . . . 47
 Wales Act 1978 . . . 422, 423
 War Damage Act 1965 . . . 78, 79, 169, 177
 Welsh Church Disestablishment Act 1915 . . . 166
 Wheat Act 1932–
 s 5 . . . 453
 Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949 . . . 451
 s 1 . . . 451
 Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999–
 s 41 . . . 662–64
 s 41(3)(b) . . . 662
- Statutory Instruments
- Civil Procedure Rules 1998 (SI 1998/3132)
 Pt 54 . . . 533, 552
 Defence (General) Regulations 1939 (SR & O 1939/927) . . . 69, 455 reg 18b . . . 69–71, 73, 510, 721, 731
 reg 51 . . . 457
 regs 62, 66 . . . 455
 Detention of Terrorists (Northern Ireland) Order 1972 (SI 1972/1632) . . . 731, 735
 Magistrates' Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 (SI 1981/1675 (NI 26))–
 Art 131 . . . 735
 Prison Rules 1964 (SI 1964/388) . . . 518
 r 33 . . . 453
 r 33(3) . . . 621, 622
 r 37 . . . 453
 r 37A . . . 621
 Rules of the Supreme Court 1965 (SI 1965/1776) . . . 510
 Ord 24–
 rr 1–3, 8 . . . 529
 Ord 53 . . . 514–26, 528, 531–33, 536, 545, 547, 552, 653
 r 1 . . . 515
 r 8 . . . 515, 516
 r 9(5) . . . 515
 Social Security (Persons from Abroad) Miscellaneous Amendments Regulations 1996 (SI 1996/30) . . . 623 Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 (SI 1981/1794) . . . 397

reg 5(1) ... 397, 398
 reg 5(3) ... 398
 reg 8(1) ... 398

Orders in Council

British Indian Ocean Territory (Constitution)
 Order 2004 ... 114
 s 9 ... 114
 British Indian Ocean Territory (Immigration)
 Order 2004 ... 114
 British Indian Ocean Territory Order 1965–
 ss 1, 11 ... 113

Foreign Legislation

Austria

Criminal Code Art 111 ... 603
 New South Wales Constitution Act 1902 ... 36
 s 7A ... 36, 37

Belgium

Constitution ... 346, 362

Canada

Constitution ... 287, 288, 301, 431, 644

Ceylon

Bribery Amendment Act 1958 ... 40

Constitution ... 39, 40
 ss 29, 55 ... 40

France

Constitution ... 355, 362, 363
 Art 55 ... 363, 364, 413

Germany

Basic Law ... 359, 360, 361, 386, 415, 499

Italy

Constitution ... 353, 354, 364, 376
 Art 11 ... 376

Netherlands

Constitution ... 349, 355
 Arts 65–66 ... 346

New Zealand

Bill of Rights Act 1990 ... 642

South Africa

Appellate Division Quorum Act 1955 ... 56
 High Court of Parliament Act 1952 ... 55
 Senate Act 1955 ... 56
 Separate Representation of Voters Act 1951 ... 39
 Separate Representation of Voters Amendment
 Act 1956 ... 56
 South Africa Act 1909 ... 37–39
 ss 33–34 ... 37, 38
 s 35 ... 37–39, 55, 56
 ss 137, 152 ... 37–39, 55

Spain

Criminal Code, Art 162 ... 604

United States

Bill of Rights 1791 ... 16, 17, 40, 555, 559, 560,
 586, 588
 Constitution ... 10, 12–19, 21, 39, 149, 155, 156, 239, 287, 301, 347, 348, 559, 560, 750
 Art III ... 348
 Art V ... 16, 17, 301, 560
 Art VI ... 347, 348
 Amendments
 First ... 16, 571, 572, 577, 578, 582, 584, 602, 606, 607, 614, 742
 Fourth ... 16
 Fifth ... 16, 19, 710
 Sixth ... 16
 Eighth ... 16, 18
 Fourteenth ... 651

Table of Treaties and Conventions

- Anglo-Irish Agreement 1985 . . . 109, 110
- Bermuda Agreement 1946 . . . 98, 103
- Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union . . . 417, 559
- Community Charter of Fundamental Social Rights of Workers 1989 . . . 393, 414, 415, 625
- EC Treaty 1957 (Treaty of Rome) . . . 339–61, 363, 364, 366–70, 372–74, 377–82, 384–86, 388–92, 394, 395, 404–408, 410–14, 451, 498, 559
- Preamble . . . 339, 350
- Art 2 . . . 339
- Art 3 . . . 339
- Art 3b . . . 414
- Art 5 . . . 348, 352, 356, 382, 396, 401, 405, 411
- Art 7 . . . 360, 373
- Art 8a . . . 389
- Art 12 . . . 349, 351, 352
- Art 13 . . . 416
- Art 48 . . . 372, 373, 377
- Art 48(3) . . . 372, 373, 377, 470
- Art 56 . . . 372
- Art 59 . . . 373
- Art 86 . . . 378
- Art 95 . . . 363, 364
- Art 100a . . . 390, 391, 625
- Art 100b . . . 390
- Art 113 . . . 395
- Art 118a . . . 625
- Art 119 . . . 360, 375, 378, 380, 381
- Art 138(3) . . . 344
- Art 144 . . . 342
- Arts 148, 151 . . . 340
- Art 155 . . . 342
- Art 157 . . . 341
- Art 157(2) . . . 342
- Art 158 . . . 341
- Art 163 . . . 342
- Art 164 . . . 344, 360
- Art 169 . . . 345, 350, 351, 356, 397, 401, 410, 411
- Art 170 . . . 345, 350, 356, 364, 590
- Art 173 . . . 344, 394
- Art 174 . . . 344
- Art 177 . . . 345, 349, 350, 359, 372, 402, 410, 428
- Art 186 . . . 401
- Art 189 . . . 342–44, 351, 354, 357, 358, 372, 377, 380–82, 384
- Arts 200, 203 . . . 342
- Art 215 . . . 345
- Art 235 . . . 395
- Art 236 . . . 340, 343, 353, 356, 389, 406, 411, 415
- European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) . . . 385, 392, 416, 427–29, 431, 568, 586, 588–607, 610, 614, 616–19, 626, 633, 634, 636–60, 661–67, 669–75, 677–79, 682, 688–97, 700, 704–707, 714, 715, 720, 727, 729, 732, 739, 740, 742, 751, 752
- Art 2 . . . 588, 591, 626, 685, 690
- Art 2(2) . . . 626
- Art 3 . . . 588, 678, 700
- Art 5 . . . 588, 664, 710, 711, 714, 715, 718, 721, 722, 724, 725, 726, 729, 731–34, 738–41
- Art 5(1) . . . 730, 739
- Art 5(1)(c) . . . 714, 724, 733, 734
- Art 5(2) . . . 720–22
- Art 5(3) . . . 724, 736
- Art 5(4) . . . 626
- Art 6 . . . 588, 621, 622, 625, 662–66, 672, 673, 675, 676, 694
- Art 6(1) . . . 625, 664
- Art 7 . . . 588, 592
- Art 8 . . . 588, 591, 599–601, 645, 648, 650, 666, 670, 676, 684, 685, 690–92, 694, 698, 700, 710
- Art 8(2) . . . 600, 694
- Art 9 . . . 589, 648, 685, 695–97, 715
- Art 9(1), (2) . . . 696
- Art 10 . . . 589, 591–93, 597, 599, 602–609, 611, 612, 614, 622, 641, 645, 650, 658, 659, 685, 691, 692, 696, 697, 710, 715, 726, 727
- Art 10(1) . . . 591, 608
- Art 10(2) . . . 591–93, 602, 605, 608, 610
- Art 11 . . . 589, 597, 641, 715, 726, 727
- Art 12 . . . 589, 667, 668
- Art 13 . . . 678
- Art 14 . . . 670, 685, 740
- Art 15 . . . 591, 729, 730, 732, 736, 740, 741
- Art 25 . . . 653
- Art 26 . . . 589
- Art 34 . . . 682
- Art 41 . . . 593
- Protocol 1
- Art 1 . . . 663, 664, 674, 680
- Art 3 . . . 704, 705
- European Social Charter 1961 . . . 392
- Geneva Convention 1949 . . . 33

| | | | |
|---|--------------------------------------|--|-----------------------|
| Single European Act 1986 . . . | 386, 388–94, 406, 408, 412–14 | Art XIX . . . | 44 |
| Preamble . . . | 392 | Art XXII . . . | 43 |
| Titles I, III . . . | 390 | Art XXV . . . | 44 |
| | | Treaty of Utrecht . . . | 157, 158, 162 |
| Treaty of Accession (UK) 1972 . . . | 370, 548 | | |
| Treaty of Amsterdam . . . | 388, 416, 417, 619, 752 | Regulations | |
| Treaty on European Union (TEU-Maastricht) | | Reg 1612/68 . . . | 373, 374 |
| 1993 . . . | 338, 388, 395, 410, 413–17, 548, 619 | | |
| Preamble . . . | 619 | Directives | |
| Art A . . . | 413 | Dir 64/221 . . . | 372, 377 |
| Art F(2) . . . | 619 | Art 3 . . . | 372, 373 |
| Protocol on Social Policy . . . | 414, 415 | Art 9 . . . | 624 |
| Treaty of Lisbon 2007 . . . | 388, 418, 419 | Dir 76/207 (Equal Treatment Directive) . . . | 381, 382, 396, 625 |
| Treaty of Paris 1951 (Treaty establishing the European Coal and Steel Community) . . . | 339 | Dir 77/187 . . . | 397 |
| Treaty of Union 1707 . . . | 34, 43–46, 302, 421, 424 | Art 4(1) . . . | 397 |
| Arts I, II . . . | 44 | Dir 80/987 . . . | 410, 411 |
| Art III . . . | 45 | Dir 93/104 . . . | 625 |
| Art VI . . . | 44 | | |
| Art XVIII . . . | 44, 46 | | |

List of Cases

- A v Secretary of State for the Home Department (2004), HL . . . 739, 742
- A v United Kingdom (Human rights: punishment of child) (1998), ECtHR . . . 651
- Abrams v United States (1919) . . . 335
- Administration des Douanes v Societe Cafes Jacques Vebre . . . 363
- A-G v Aspinall (1837) . . . 304, 312
- A-G v De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd (1920), HL . . . 94–98, 100, 101, 109, 294, 395, 453
- A-G v Fulham Corpn (1921) . . . 446, 447, 449, 452
- A-G v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (1987); revsd (1987), CA; affd (1987), HL . . . 574, 575, 576, 577, 602
- A-G v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2) (1990); on appeal (1990), CA; affd (1990), HL . . . 576, 578, 602, 611, 612
- A-G (ex rel McWhirter) v Independent Broadcasting Authority (1973), CA . . . 539, 540, 542, 543
- A-G v Jonathan Cape Ltd (1976) (Crossman Diaries Case) . . . 268, 283, 287, 290, 574, 575
- A-G v Jones (2000) . . . 211
- A-G v Times Newspapers Ltd (1973), DC; on appeal (1973), CA; revsd (1974), HL . . . 580–82, 592, 607
- A-G (ex rel Tilley) v Wandsworth London Borough Council (1981); affd (1981), CA . . . 460
- A-G v Wilson (1840) . . . 304, 312
- A-G v Wilts United Dairies (1922), HL . . . 452
- A-G for New South Wales v Trethowan (1931); affd (1932), PC . . . 36, 37, 40–43, 156, 289, 746, 749
- A-G of Hong Kong v Ng Yuen Shiu (1983), PC . . . 492, 493
- Ahmad v United Kingdom (1981), ECtHR . . . 696
- Air Canada v Secretary of State for Trade (No 2) (1983), HL . . . 519
- Akumah v LB of Hackney (2005), HL . . . 452, 454
- Albert v Lavin (1981), HL . . . 725, 726
- Algemene Transport-en Expeditie Onderneming van Gend en Loos NV v Nederlandse Belastingadministratie: 26/62 (1963), ECJ . . . 349–58, 362, 363, 366, 368, 370, 372–74, 377, 380, 384, 401, 405, 406, 411, 412, 451
- Al-Khawaja and Tahery v United Kingdom (2009), ECtHR . . . 675, 676
- Allingham v Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries (1948) . . . 455
- Al-Mas'ari case (1996) . . . 630
- Ambrosious v O'Farrell (1905) . . . 584
- Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v Simmenthal SpA: 106/77 (1978), ECJ . . . 375, 376, 382, 384, 401, 402, 679
- Anisimic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission (1969), HL . . . 76–78, 86, 96, 104, 204, 205, 446, 450, 453, 483, 511, 514, 530, 535, 538, 560, 674, 701–703
- Argyll (Duchess of) v Duke of Argyll (1967) . . . 268
- Arrowsmith v Jenkins (1963), DC . . . 562
- Ash v Abdy (1678) . . . 244
- Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co Ltd v Riche (1875) . . . 447
- Ashby v Ebdon (1985) . . . 547
- Ashby v White (1703); on appeal (1704) . . . 199, 232, 233, 236, 242
- Asher v Secretary of State for the Environment (1974), CA . . . 315
- Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corpn (1948), CA . . . 61, 62, 69, 78, 100, 105, 312, 314, 326, 445, 446, 464, 465, 471, 490, 492, 494, 532, 593, 629, 656, 677, 694–99, 717, 734
- Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank (2001) . . . 680, 682, 683, 687
- Bagg's Case (1615) . . . 60, 61, 511
- Barnard v National Dock Labour Board (1953), CA . . . 456, 513, 514, 529, 530, 533, 538
- Barrs v Bethell (1982) . . . 547
- Bate's Case, Case of Impositions (1610) . . . 87–89, 91, 92
- BBC v Johns (Inspector of Taxes) (1964), CA . . . 91, 100
- Beatty v Gillbanks (1882) . . . 561, 562, 566, 715
- Bela-Mühle Josef Bergmann KG v Grows-Farm GmbH & Co KG: 114/76 (1977), ECJ . . . 470
- Belcher v Reading Corpn (1950) . . . 314
- Bellinger v Bellinger (2003), HL . . . 667–71
- Benham v United Kingdom (1996), ECtHR . . . 625, 626
- Beswick v Beswick (1968), HL . . . 244, 246
- Bibby v Chief Constable of Essex (2000) . . . 715
- Birdi v Secretary of State for Home Affairs (1975), CA . . . 597, 598, 600, 617

- Birmingham City Council v Doherty. See Doherty v Birmingham City Council
- Blackburn v A-G (1971), CA . . . 370, 371, 377, 539, 540, 544, 548, 617
- Black-Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG (1975), HL . . . 68
- Blackshaw v Lord (1984), CA . . . 585, 613
- Board of Education v Rice (1911), HL . . . 478–80, 483
- Boddington v British Transport Police (1999), HL . . . 531–33
- Bognor Regis UDC v Champion (1972) . . . 585, 604, 620
- Boisdet, Re (1991) . . . 413
- Bonham's (Dr) Case (1610) . . . 22, 26, 29, 87, 290, 502, 747
- Bork (P) International A/S v Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark: 101/87 (1988), ECJ . . . 398
- Boyce v Paddington Borough Council (1903); revsd (1903), CA; on appeal sub nom Paddington Corpn v A-G (1906), HL . . . 537, 538, 540, 543, 547
- Boyd v United States (1886) . . . 54
- Bradbury v London Borough of Enfield (1967), CA . . . 552
- Bradlaugh v Gossett (1884), DC . . . 234–36, 249, 675
- Brasserie du Pêcheur SA v Germany: C-46/93 (1996), ECJ . . . 402, 412, 624
- Breen v Amalgamated Engineering Union (1971), CA . . . 485, 486
- Bribery Comr v Ranasinghe (1965), PC . . . 39–43
- Briggs v Garrett (1886) . . . 584
- Brind v Secretary of State for the Home Department. See R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Brind
- Bristol District Council v Clark (1975), CA . . . 314
- British Coal Corpn v R (1935), PC . . . 38, 288
- British Oxygen Co Ltd v Minister of Technology (1971), HL . . . 459, 460
- British Railways Board v Pickin (1974), HL . . . 30, 135, 231, 746
- British Steel Corpn v Granada Television Ltd (1981); on appeal (1981), CA; affd (1981), HL . . . 612, 613
- Brogan v United Kingdom (1989), ECtHR . . . 724, 735, 736, 738
- Bromley London Borough Council v Greater London Council (1983), CA; affd (1983), HL . . . 320–22, 331, 448, 449, 472
- Brownsea Haven Properties Ltd v Poole Corpn (1958); affd (1958), CA . . . 538
- Brunner v European Union Treaty (1994) . . . 415
- Brutus v Cozens (1972), HL . . . 564, 597
- Buchanan (James) & Co Ltd v Babco Forwarding and Shipping (UK) Ltd (1977), CA; affd (1978), HL . . . 378
- Bugg v DPP (1993) . . . 529–32
- Bulmer (HP) Ltd v J Bollinger SA (1974), CA . . . 378
- Burmah Oil Co (Burma Trading) Ltd v Lord Advocate (1965) . . . 78, 79, 91, 93, 108, 169, 269
- Burstyn (Joseph) Inc v Wilson (1952) . . . 578, 579
- Calvin v Carr (1980), PC . . . 484
- Campbell v MGN (2004) . . . 691, 692
- Cannock Chase District Council v Kelly (1978), CA . . . 314
- Carltona Ltd v Works Comrs (1943), CA . . . 457, 458, 464
- Case of Monopolies (1602) . . . 87
- Case of Prohibitions; Prohibitions del Roy (1607) . . . 87, 110
- Cassell & Co Ltd v Broome (1972), HL . . . 596
- Castells v Spain (1992), ECtHR . . . 604–606, 614, 648
- Castorina v Chief Constable of Surrey (1996) . . . 717–719
- Caswell v Dairy Produce Quota Tribunal for England and Wales (1990), HL . . . 519
- Chandler v DPP (1964), HL . . . 111, 375, 572, 575
- Cheney v Conn (Inspector of Taxes) (1968) . . . 33
- Chester v Bateson (1920) . . . 137
- Chester v Secretary of State for Justice (2010), CA . . . 705
- Chief Constable of the North Wales Police v Evans (1982), HL . . . 491
- China Navigation Co Ltd v A-G (1932), CA . . . 101, 102
- Chorlton v Lings (1868) . . . 47, 48, 63, 76, 429, 430
- Choudhury v United Kingdom (1991) . . . 609
- Christie v Leachinsky (1947) . . . 716, 720, 721
- Cinnamond v British Airports Authority (1980), CA . . . 489
- City of Chicago v Tribune Co (1923) . . . 583, 620
- City of London v Wood (1701) . . . 29
- Clark v University of Lincolnshire and Humberside (2000), CA . . . 529
- Cocks v Thanet District Council (1983), HL . . . 521
- Coco v A N Clark (Engineers) Ltd (1968) . . . 691
- Cohens v Virginia (1821) . . . 349
- Coleman v McClennan (1908) . . . 584
- Collins and Brinkels v Minister of the Interior (1957) . . . 56
- Commission v Luxembourg and Belgium (Dairy Products): 90, 91/63, (1964), ECJ . . . 351, 364
- Commonwealth of Australia v John Fairfax & Sons Ltd (1980) . . . 578
- Comptoir National Technique Agricole SA (CNTA) v EC Commission: 74/74 (1975), ECJ . . . 496

- Congreve v Home Office (1976), CA . . . 451–53, 467, 472
- Cooper v Wandsworth Board of Works (1863) . . . 477–79, 483, 485
- Corbett v Corbett (otherwise Ashley) (No 1) (1970) . . . 667
- Cossey v United Kingdom (1993) . . . 667
- Costa v ENEL: 6/64 (1964), ECJ . . . 352–57, 362–66, 368, 370, 376, 377, 378, 380, 382, 384, 401, 405, 406, 410
- Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service (GCHQ case) (1983), HL . . . 105–107, 109–12, 269, 351, 357, 370, 385, 446, 464, 469, 472, 473, 486, 494, 521, 524, 554, 575, 606, 618, 694, 697, 747
- Covent Garden Community Association Ltd v Greater London Council (1981) . . . 550
- CR v United Kingdom (1995), ECtHR . . . 592
- Cumberland County (Inhabitants) v R. See R v Cumberland County (Inhabitants)
- Cumming v Chief Constable of Northumbria (2003), CA . . . 718, 734, 735
- Czarnikow v Roth, Schmidt & Co (1922), CA . . . 525
- D v East Berkshire Community NHS Trust (2003), CA, affd (2005), HL . . . 678
- Dallison v Caffery (1965) . . . 713, 716
- Danesh v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council (2006), CA . . . 65
- Darnel's Case (1627) . . . 89, 90, 92
- Davis v Johnson (1979), HL . . . 245
- Davy v Spelthorne Borough Council (1983), CA; affd (1984), HL . . . 521
- Dawkins v Antrobus (1881) . . . 648
- Day v Savadge (1614) . . . 22
- De Falco v Crawley Borough Council (1980), CA . . . 516–518
- Defrenne v Sabena: 43/75 (1976), ECJ . . . 375, 381, 569
- Denton Road (56), Twickenham, Re (1953) . . . 464
- Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers Ltd (1992), CA; revsd (1993), HL . . . 603–605, 612, 620
- Dillon v Balfour (1887) . . . 240
- Dimes v Grand Junction Canal (Proprietary) (1852), HL . . . 503, 506
- Doherty v Birmingham City Council (2008), HL . . . 676, 697–99
- Douglas v Hello! Ltd (2001), CA . . . 689, 690
- DPP v Head (1959), HL . . . 530
- DPP v Hutchinson (1990), HL . . . 530
- DPP v Luft (1977); revsd (1977), HL . . . 212
- DPP v Redmond-Bate (1999) . . . 689, 714, 715
- DPP v Shaw (1962), HL . . . 79–81, 84
- Dudgeon v United Kingdom (1981), ECtHR . . . 653
- Duke v GEC Reliance Ltd (formerly Reliance Systems Ltd) (1988), HL . . . 396, 398, 399
- Dunbell v Roberts (1944) . . . 717
- Duncan v Jones (1936), DC . . . 562
- Duport Steel v Sirs (1982), HL . . . 63, 64
- Dyson v A-G (1911), CA . . . 535
- Eastleigh Borough Council v Betts (1983), HL . . . 460
- EC Commission v EC Council: 81/72 (1973), ECJ . . . 496
- EC Commission v EC Council: 45/86 (Generalised Tariff Preferences) (1987), ECJ . . . 394
- EC Commission v EC Council: C-300/89 (1991), ECJ . . . 395
- EC Commission v Italy: 22/87 (1989), ECJ . . . 410
- EC Commission v United Kingdom: 61/81 (1982), ECJ . . . 397
- EC Commission v United Kingdom: C-246/89R (1989), ECJ . . . 401, 402
- Edinburgh and Dalkeith Rly Co v Wauchope (1842), HL . . . 30, 135, 746
- Edwards v A-G for Canada (1928), Can SC; revsd (1930), PC . . . 429, 430, 432
- Edwards v DPP (1993) . . . 719, 721, 722
- Ellen Street Estates Ltd v Minister of Health (1934), CA . . . 31, 32, 48
- Ellis v Dubowski (1921) . . . 455
- Enderby Town Football Club Ltd v Football Association Ltd (1971), CA . . . 499
- Engel v The Netherlands (1976), ECtHR . . . 710
- Entick v Carrington (1765) . . . 52–55, 72, 108, 199, 233, 510, 567, 568, 627, 712, 713
- Equal Opportunities Commission v Secretary of State for Employment. See R v Secretary of State for Employment, ex p Equal Opportunities Commission
- European Parliament v EC Council (Chernobyl): C-70/88 (1991), ECJ . . . 395
- Fairbairn v Scottish National Party (1975) . . . 216
- Falmouth Boat Construction Co Ltd v Howell (1950), CA; affd sub nom Howell v Falmouth Boat Construction Ltd (1951), HL . . . 463
- Felixstowe Dock and Rly Co and European Ferries Ltd v British Docks Board (1976), CA . . . 377
- Ferrer's Case (1543) . . . 236
- Ferris v Wallace (1936) . . . 206
- Findlay, Re (1985), HL . . . 493–95
- Finnegan v Clowney Youth Training Programme Ltd (1990), HL . . . 399
- Firma Alfons Lütticke GmbH v Hauptzollamt Sarrelouis: 57/65 (1966), ECJ . . . 363
- Fitzpatrick v Sterling Housing Association Ltd (2001), HL . . . 659, 670
- Fletcher v Peck (1810) . . . 349
- Forbes v Cochrane (1824) . . . 29
- Fothergill v Monarch Airlines Ltd (1981), HL . . . 245

- Foulkes v Chief Constable of Merseyside (1998), CA ... 713–15, 726
- Fox v Stirk (1970), CA ... 206
- Fox, Campbell and Hartley v United Kingdom (1990), ECtHR ... 721, 722, 733, 734
- France, Italy and United Kingdom v EC Commission: 188–190/80 (1982), ECJ ... 394
- Francovich and Bonifaci v Italy: C-6, 9/90 (1991), ECJ ... 402, 410–12, 624
- Franklin v Minister of Town and Country Planning (1948), HL ... 508
- Fraser v Mudge (1975), CA ... 490, 499
- Frontini v Minister delle Finanze ... 364, 375, 386
- Garland v British Rail Engineering Ltd (1981), HL; refd sub nom Garland v British Rail Engineering Ltd: 12/81 (1983), ECJ; apld (1983), HL ... 379, 400, 418
- George v Secretary of State for the Environment (1979), CA ... 519
- Germany v EC Commission: 281/85, 283–285/85, 287/85 (1987), ECJ ... 394
- Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza (2004) ... 669, 671, 688
- Gibson v Lord Advocate (1975) ... 46
- Gitlow v New York (1925) ... 578
- Godden v Hales (1686) ... 90, 91
- Golden Chemical Products Ltd, Re (1976) ... 458
- Golder v United Kingdom (1975), ECtHR ... 621
- Goodwin v Fortescue (1604) ... 234
- Goodwin v United Kingdom (1996), ECtHR ... 614, 649
- Goodwin (Christine) v United Kingdom (2002), ECtHR ... 667, 668
- Gouriet v Union of Post Office Workers (1978), HL ... 103, 104, 537, 540, 541, 547
- Grad v Finanzamt Traunstein: 9/70 (1970), ECJ ... 358, 363, 366
- Granital v Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato ... 376, 386
- Great Charte Parish and Kennington Parish. See R v Great Chart Inhabitants
- Greens and MT v United Kingdom (2011), ECtHR ... 705, 706
- Gregory v Camden London Borough Council (1966) ... 538, 539
- Guzzardi v Italy (1980), ECtHR ... 710, 711
- Hall & Co Ltd v Shoreham-by-Sea UDC (1963); revsd (1964), CA ... 466, 467, 472
- Handyside v United Kingdom (1976), ECtHR ... 593, 605
- Hanratty v Lord Butler of Saffron Walden (1971), CA ... 103, 486
- Harper v Secretary of State for the Home Department (1955), CA ... 204
- Harris v Dönges (1952) ... 37, 40, 41, 43, 55, 190, 288, 744, 746, 747, 750
- Harrow London Borough Council v Qazi (2003), HL ... 676
- Harz v Deutsche Tradax GmbH: 79/83 (1984), ECJ ... 382
- Hauer v Land Rheinland-Pfalz: 44/79 (1979), ECJ ... 385
- Hector v A-G of Antigua and Barbuda (1990), PC ... 620
- Heydon's Case (1584) ... 67
- Heywood v Hull Prison Board of Visitors (1980) ... 516, 517, 547
- Hipperson v Newbury District Electoral Registration Officer (1985), CA ... 206
- Hirst v United Kingdom (No 2) (2005), ECtHR ... 704–707
- HK (infant), Re (1967) ... 484
- Hodge v R (1883), PC ... 429
- Hogben, Re (1985), HL ... 493
- Holgate-Mohammed v Duke (1984) ... 712, 717
- Holland (Patrick) v Ireland (1998) ... 705
- Holy Monasteries v Greece (1994), ECtHR ... 683
- Honeyman, Re (1985), HL ... 494
- Horsfield v Brown (1932) ... 716
- Hough v The Chief Constable of the Staffordshire Constabulary (2001), CA ... 718, 735
- Howell v Falmouth Boat Construction Ltd. See Falmouth Boat Construction Co Ltd v Howell
- HRH Prince of Wales v Associated Newspapers Ltd (2006), affd (2006), CA ... 692
- Hughes v Department of Health and Social Security (1985), HL ... 494
- Humphries v Connor (1864) ... 562
- Hussain v United Kingdom (1996), ECtHR ... 626
- Hussein v Chong Fook Kam (1970) ... 717, 734
- International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Department. See R (International Transport Roth GmbH) v Secretary of State for the Home Department
- Internationale Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Einfuhr und Vorratsstelle für Getreide und Futtermittel: 11/70 (1970), ECJ, (1974), FCC ('Solange I') ... 359–61, 366, 368, 370, 377, 382, 383, 384, 385
- IRC v Hinchy (1960), HL ... 63
- IRC v National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses (1982), HL ... 536, 545–50, 554
- IRC v Rossminster Ltd. See R v IRC, ex p Rossminster Ltd
- Ireland v United Kingdom (1978) ... 732, 735
- Johnson v United Kingdom (1997), ECtHR ... 636
- Johnston v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary: 222/84 (1986), ECJ ... 383, 384
- Jordan v Burgoyne (1963) ... 564, 597

- Karner v Austria (2003), ECtHR . . . 670
- Kenlin and another v Gardner (1967) . . . 724, 725, 731
- Kent v Metropolitan Police Comr (1981), CA . . . 565
- Khawaja v Secretary of State for the Home Department (1984), HL . . . 519
- Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976), ECtHR . . . 696
- Klass v Germany (1978), ECtHR . . . 599, 600, 653
- Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln City Council (1998) . . . 84, 647
- Korematsu v United States (1944) . . . 710
- Kruse v Johnson (1898) . . . 311, 312, 430, 465, 466, 471
- Laker Airways Ltd v Department of Trade (1977), CA . . . 98, 99, 103, 109, 112, 294
- Lambert v Ealing London Borough Council (1982), CA . . . 517, 518
- Laskey, Jaggard and Brown v United Kingdom (1997), ECtHR . . . 601
- Lavender (H) & Son Ltd v Minister of Housing and Local Government (1970) . . . 456, 462
- Law v National Greyhound Racing Club Ltd (1983), CA . . . 523
- Lawless v Ireland (1961), ECtHR . . . 729, 730, 732
- Lee v Bude and Torrington Junction Rly Co (1871) . . . 30
- Lee v Showman's Guild of Great Britain (1952) . . . 648
- Leech v Deputy Governor of Parkhurst Prison (1988), HL . . . 490
- Lees v Anderson (1940) . . . 70
- Leigh v Kent (1789) . . . 29
- Leigh, Guardian Newspapers Ltd and Observer Ltd v United Kingdom (1984) . . . 653
- Lemon v United Kingdom (1982) . . . 607–609
- Lever Finance Ltd v Westminster (City) London Borough Council (1971), CA . . . 463, 464, 489, 498
- Lewisham Metropolitan Borough and Town Clerk v Roberts (1949), CA . . . 457
- Lings v Austria (1986), ECtHR . . . 603, 604, 606, 609, 612, 614, 648
- Litster v Forth Dry Dock and Engineering Co Ltd (1990), HL . . . 397–99, 418, 643, 644, 662, 667, 671
- Liversidge v Anderson (1942), HL . . . 69, 70, 71, 73, 74, 76, 77, 86, 89, 94, 136, 199, 237, 448, 476, 480, 482, 510, 560, 575, 576, 627, 674, 709, 710, 721, 739
- Lloyd v McMahon (1987), CA; affd (1987), HL . . . 502
- Locabail (UK) Ltd v Bayfield Properties Ltd (2000), CA . . . 506, 507
- Local Government Board v Arlidge (1915), HL . . . 456, 478–80, 483
- London Borough of Lambeth v Kay (2006), HL; sub nom Kay v United Kingdom (2011), ECtHR . . . 676, 677, 679
- London Tramways Co v LCC (1898), HL . . . 74, 75, 81
- Luby v Newcastle-under-Lyme Corpn (1965), CA . . . 314
- Luxembourg v European Parliament: 230/81 (1983), ECJ . . . 391
- M v Home Office (1993) . . . 280, 627–39
- McCann v United Kingdom (1995), ECtHR . . . 626
- McCann v United Kingdom (2008), ECtHR . . . 676
- Macarthy's Ltd v Smith: 129/79 (1979), CA; refd (1980), ECJ; apld (1980), CA . . . 378–80, 400, 418, 598
- McCawley v The King (1920) . . . 748
- McClaren v Home Office (1990), CA . . . 524
- McCormick v Lord Advocate (1953) . . . 45, 46, 421, 424, 744
- McInnes v Onslow Fane (1978) . . . 490, 491, 648
- McKee v Chief Constable for Northern Ireland (1984) . . . 733
- Maclaine Watson & Co Ltd v Department of Trade and Industry (1990), HL . . . 618
- Madzimbamuto v Lardner-Burke and George (1969), PC . . . 48, 49, 60
- Magor and St Mellons RDC v Newport Corpn (1950), CA; affd (1951), HL . . . 68, 69, 80, 97, 246, 350, 398, 463, 540, 565, 641
- Malloch v Aberdeen Corpn (1971), HL . . . 485, 486
- Malone v Metropolitan Police Comr (1979) 567–69, 599–601, 622, 669, 689, 691
- Malone v United Kingdom (1984), ECtHR . . . 600, 650
- Manchester City Council v Pinnock (2009), CA; (2010), UKSC . . . 677, 679, 697, 699
- Mancini v Italy (2001), ECtHR . . . 711
- Manitoba (A-G) v Canada (A-G) (1981) . . . 290, 644
- Marbury v Madison (1803) . . . 349
- Marckx v Belgium (1979), ECtHR . . . 650
- Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentación SA: C-106/89 (1990), ECJ . . . 393–96, 399, 412, 641, 644, 662, 667, 671
- Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority (Teaching): 152/84 (1986), ECJ . . . 380–84, 390, 396, 412, 683
- Martin v Hunters Lessee (1816) . . . 349
- Mathieu-Mohin v Belgium (1998), ECtHR . . . 705
- Matthews, Re (1985), HL . . . 494
- Maze, The. See R v Board of Visitors of HM Prison, The Maze, ex p Hone

- Medicaments and Related Classes of Goods, Re (No 2) (2001) . . . 507
- Melluish (Inspector of Taxes) v BMI (No 3) Ltd (1995), HL . . . 247
- Mercury Communications Ltd v Director General of Telecommunications (1996), HL . . . 533
- Mew and Thorne, Re (1862) . . . 244
- Millar v Taylor (1769) . . . 244
- Minister for Economic Affairs v Fromagerie Franco-Suisse Le Ski SA (1972) . . . 362
- Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries v Hulkin (1948), CA . . . 461–63, 498
- Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries v Matthews (1950) . . . 461
- Minister of the Interior v Cohn-Bendit (1980) . . . 376, 377, 383, 384, 413
- Minister of the Interior v Harris (1952) . . . 55, 56, 87, 750
- Miss Behavin v Belfast City Council (2004); (2005) NICA; revsd (2007), HL . . . 695
- Molyneaux, ex p (1986) . . . 109
- Mortensen v Peters (1906) . . . 32, 33, 51, 597
- Moss v McLachlan (1985) . . . 727
- Mulder v EC Council and EC Commission: C-104/89, C-37/90 (1992), ECJ . . . 496
- Nadarajah v Secretary of State for the Home Department (2005), CA . . . 498
- Nairn v St Andrews University (1909), HL . . . 47, 48, 76, 429, 430
- Nakkuda Ali v MF De S Jayaratne (1951), PC . . . 481–84
- National Assistance Board v Wilkinson (1952) . . . 634
- Ndlwana v Hofmeyr (1937) . . . 39
- Nebraska Press Association v Stuart (1976) . . . 582
- New York Times v Sullivan (1964) . . . 572, 584, 620
- New York Times v United States (1971) . . . 576–78
- Nicolo, Re (1990) . . . 413
- Nireaha Tamaki v Baker (1901) . . . 512
- Nold (J) KG v EC Commission: 4/73 (1974), ECJ . . . 385
- Norris v Ireland (1988), ECtHR . . . 653
- Norwich City Council v Secretary of State for the Environment (1982) . . . 325
- Nottinghamshire County Council v Secretary of State for the Environment (1986), HL . . . 318
- Observer and Guardian v United Kingdom (1991), ECtHR . . . 602, 608, 610, 612
- O'Hara v Chief Constable of the RUC (1997), HL . . . 734, 735
- O'Kelly v Harvey (1883) . . . 562
- Oladehinde v Secretary of State for the Home Department. See R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Oladehinde
- O'Reilly v Mackman (1982); revsd (1982), CA; affd (1983), HL . . . 517–24, 528–30, 532, 533, 535, 547, 554
- Otto-Preminger Institute v Austria (1994), ECtHR . . . 609, 610
- P v S: C-13/94 (1996), ECJ . . . 625
- Paddington Corp'n v A-G. See Boyce v Paddington Borough Council
- Padfield v Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1968), HL . . . 450, 451, 483, 514
- Palko v Connecticut (1937) . . . 571
- Papworth v Coventry (1967), DC . . . 562
- Parliamentary Privilege Act 1770, Re (1958), PC . . . 238, 241, 244
- Parr v Wyre Borough Council (1982), CA . . . 517
- Paul (R & W) Ltd v Wheat Commission (1937), HL . . . 453, 634
- Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart (1993), HL . . . 131, 244, 245, 247, 248, 257, 284, 397, 412, 431, 467, 600, 618, 651, 675, 747
- Petition of Right, Re (1915), CA; on appeal sub nom Re X's Petition of Right (1916), HL . . . 93, 95
- Pett v Greyhound Racing Association Ltd (1969), CA . . . 499, 523
- Pett v Greyhound Racing Association Ltd (No 2) (1970); on appeal (1970), CA . . . 499, 523
- Pickstone v Freemans plc (1989), HL . . . 397–99, 412, 418, 643, 671
- Pickwell v Camden London Borough Council (1983) . . . 448
- Piddington v Bates (1961) . . . 727
- Plymouth City Council v Quietlynn. See Quietlynn Ltd v Plymouth City Council
- Politi SAS v Ministero delle Finanze: 43/71 (1971). ECJ . . . 357, 358, 363, 366
- Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue (2001) . . . 665, 680–83
- Porter v Magill (2002) . . . 507
- Practice Statement (Judicial Precedent) (1966), HL . . . 75, 82
- Prescott v Birmingham Corp'n (1955), CA . . . 448, 538, 540, 544, 547
- Proclamations' Case (1611) . . . 87, 88
- Puhlhofer v Hillingdon London Borough Council (1986), HL . . . 521
- Pyx Granite Co Ltd v Ministry of Housing and Local Government (1960), HL . . . 514, 515, 533
- Quebec (Reference Re Secession of) (1998), Can SC . . . 431
- Quietlynn Ltd v Plymouth City Council (1987) . . . 530
- R v A (No 2) (2001) . . . 662, 663, 665, 667
- R v Ali (2001), CA . . . 672

- R v Allen (1862) . . . 101, 102, 104, 106, 115
- R v Aston University Senate, ex p Roffey (1969) . . . 485, 486
- R (Jackson) v Attorney General (2005) . . . 189, 748
- R v BBC, ex p Lavelle (1983) . . . 523
- R v Barnsley Licensing Justices, ex p Barnsley and District Licensed Victuallers' Association (1960), CA . . . 503, 504
- R v Barnsley Metropolitan Borough Council, ex p Hook (1976), CA . . . 472, 473
- R v Berry (1979) . . . 573
- R v Board of Visitors of HM Prison, The Maze, ex p Hone (1988), HL . . . 500
- R v Board of Visitors of Hull Prison, ex p St Germain (1979), CA . . . 490, 519
- R v Boundary Commission for England, ex p Foot (1983), CA . . . 205
- R v Bourne (1939) . . . 66
- R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Pinochet Ugarte (Amnesty International intervening) (2000), HL . . . 505–507
- R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Pinochet Ugarte (No 2) (2000), HL . . . 505–507
- R v Brent London Borough Council, ex p Assegai (1987) . . . 472
- R v Bristol Betting and Gaming Licensing Committee, ex p O'Callaghan (2000), CA . . . 506
- R v Brown (1994), HL . . . 570, 601, 709
- R v Burah (1878), PC . . . 429
- R v Burstow (1998), HL . . . 64–66, 74
- R v C (2004), CA . . . 82–84
- R v Chaytor and others (2010), CA, (2010), SC . . . 256, 258
- R (Laporte) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire (2004) EWHC; (2004); CA; revsd in part (2006), HL . . . 725–27
- R v Chief Immigration Officer, Heathrow Airport, ex p Salamat Bibi (1976), CA . . . 598, 600
- R v Chief Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Choudhury (1991) . . . 609
- R v Chief Rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of Great Britain and the Commonwealth, ex p Wachmann (1993) . . . 527, 528
- R (Green) v City of Westminster Magistrates' Court (2007) . . . 611
- R v Civil Service Appeal Board, ex p Cunningham (1991), CA . . . 500, 501
- R v Coney (1882), CCR . . . 570
- R v Cotham (1898), DC . . . 543
- R v Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, ex p Lain (1967) . . . 102–104, 112, 269, 284
- R v Cumberland County (Inhabitants) (1795); affd sub nom Cumberland County (Inhabitants) v R (1803), HL . . . 29
- R v Disciplinary Committee of the Jockey Club, ex p Aga Khan (1993), CA . . . 525–27
- R v Disciplinary Committee of the Jockey Club, ex p Massingberd-Mundy (1993) . . . 525
- R v Donovan (1934), CCA . . . 570
- R v DPP, ex p Kebilene (1999); revsd (1999), HL . . . 673
- R v East Berkshire Health Authority, ex p Walsh (1983); revsd (1984), CA . . . 523, 524
- R v East Sussex County Council, ex p Reprotech Ltd (2002) . . . 498
- R v Eastbourne (Inhabitants) (1803) . . . 623
- R v Felixstowe Justices, ex p Leigh (1987) . . . 549
- R v Fell (1963), CCA . . . 573
- R v Football Association Ltd, ex p Football League Ltd (1993) . . . 526
- R v Gaming Board for Great Britain, ex p Benaim and Khaida (1970), CA . . . 485, 486, 500
- R v Gough (1993), HL . . . 504–507
- R (SB) v Governors of Denbigh High School (2004); revsd (2005), CA; revsd (2006), HL . . . 695–97, 699
- R v Graham-Campbell, ex p Herbert (1935) . . . 243
- R v Gray (1900) . . . 454
- R v Great Chart Inhabitants (1742) . . . 30
- R v Greater London Council, ex p Blackburn (1976), CA . . . 455, 542, 544
- R v Guardians of the Lewisham Union (1897) . . . 543
- R v HM Inspectorate of Pollution, ex p Greenpeace Ltd (No 2) (1994) . . . 552, 553
- R v HM Treasury, ex p Smedley (1985), CA . . . 548–50
- R v Hailwood and Ackroyd Ltd (1928), CCA . . . 210, 212
- R v Hampden, Ship Money Case (1637) . . . 88–91, 93–95, 102, 104, 107, 112, 575
- R (Beer) v Hampshire Farmers Market Ltd (2004) . . . 683
- R v Hendon RDC, ex p Chorley (1933) . . . 508
- R v Hereford Corpn, ex p Harrower (1970) . . . 543
- R v Hetherington (1841) . . . 579
- R v Higher Education Funding Council, ex p Institute of Dental Surgery (1994) . . . 501
- R v Hillingdon London Borough Council, ex p Royco Homes Ltd (1974) . . . 467
- R v Home Secretary, ex p Budd (1942), CA . . . 70
- R v Horncastle (2009), CA . . . 675–77, 679, 705
- R v Howell (1981) . . . 713–15
- R v Hull Prison Board of Visitors, ex p St Germain (No 2) (1979) . . . 490
- R v Independent Broadcasting Authority, ex p Whitehouse (1984), DC . . . 549
- R v Inhabitants of Cumberland (1795) . . . 29

- R v IRC, ex p Rosminster Ltd (1980); on appeal (1980), CA; revsd sub nom IRC v Rosminster Ltd (1980), HL . . . 69, 71–74, 448, 451, 476, 479, 519, 540, 565, 567
- R v Ireland; R v Burstow (1998), HL . . . 64, 65
- R v Jockey Club, ex p RAM Racecourses Ltd (1993) . . . 526
- R v Jones (Fiona) (1999), CA . . . 210, 211
- R v Jordan (2001), CA . . . 672
- R v Judge of the City of London Court . . . 63
- R v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council, ex p Grillo (1996), CA . . . 501
- R v Lambert (2001), CA; affd sub nom R v Lambert (2001) . . . 672
- R v Lambeth London Borough, ex p Walters (1994) . . . 501
- R v Leman Street Police Station Inspector, ex p Venicoff (1920), DC . . . 480, 482, 488
- R v Lemon (1979), CA; affd (1979), HL . . . 579, 580, 610, 611, 709
- R v Lemsatf (1977), CA . . . 725
- R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation (2002), CA . . . 681, 684, 688
- R v Liverpool City Justices, ex p Topping (1983) . . . 504
- R v Liverpool Corpn, ex p Liverpool Taxi Fleet Operators' Association (1972), CA . . . 488–90, 492–94, 497
- R v London County Council, ex p Corrie (1918) . . . 459
- R (H) v London North and East Region Mental Health Review Tribunal (2001) . . . 664
- R v London Rent Assessment Panel Committee, ex p Metropolitan Properties Co (FGC) Ltd (1969), CA . . . 504
- R v Love (1653) . . . 22, 26
- R v Medical Appeal Tribunal, ex p Gilmore (1957), CA 76, 77, 96, 453, 518, 535, 701
- R v Metropolitan Police Comr, ex p Blackburn (1968), CA . . . 543, 544
- R v Metropolitan Police Comr, ex p Parker (1953), DC . . . 480–82, 488, 490
- R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p Hamble (Offshore) Fisheries Ltd (1995) . . . 494, 496
- R v Ministry of Defence, ex p Smith (1996), CA . . . 467–69, 471, 697
- R v Monopolies and Mergers Commission, ex p Argyll Group plc (1986), CA . . . 549
- R v Newham London Borough Council, ex p Bibi (2001) . . . 497
- R v North and East Devon Health Authority, ex p Coughlan (Secretary of State for Health intervening) (1999), CA . . . 496, 497, 526, 527
- R v North Somerset District Council and Pioneer Aggregates (UK) Ltd, ex p Garnett and Pierssene (1997) . . . 533, 554
- R v O'Brien (1974) . . . 82
- R (Wheeler) v Office of the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (2008) . . . 498
- R v Paddington Valuation Officer, ex p Peachey Property Corpn Ltd (1966), CA . . . 542
- R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, ex p Datafin plc (1987), CA . . . 524–28
- R v Parole Board, ex p Wilson (1992), CA . . . 501
- R v Paty (1705) . . . 232, 233, 236, 242
- R v Ponting (1985) . . . 573, 574, 577
- R v Port of London Authority, ex p Kynoch Ltd (1919), CA . . . 459, 460
- R (Weaver) v Quadrant Housing Trust (2008), affd (2009), CA . . . 686, 687
- R v R (rape: marital exemption) (1991) . . . 79, 81, 82, 84, 85, 592, 647, 709
- R v Rand (1866) . . . 503, 506
- R v Roberts (1985) . . . 82, 83
- R v Roberts, ex p Scurr (1924), CA; revsd sub nom Roberts v Hopwood (1925), HL . . . 312–14, 321, 331, 430, 447–49, 454, 455, 466, 508
- R v Secretary of State for Education and Employment, ex p Begbie (2000) . . . 495, 497, 698
- R v Secretary of State for Employment, ex p Equal Opportunities Commission (1994), HL . . . 402
- R v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, ex p Everett (1989), CA . . . 110, 618
- R v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, ex p Rees-Mogg (1994) . . . 415, 548, 550
- R v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, ex p World Development Movement Ltd (1995) (Pergau Dam Case) . . . 448, 449, 529, 553, 626, 630
- R (Abbasi) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (2002) . . . 113
- R (Bancoult) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (2001) . . . 113, 114
- R (Bancoult) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (No 2) (2006), HC, affd (2007), CA, revsd (2008), HL . . . 114, 115, 131, 498
- R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants (1996), CA . . . 623, 630, 631, 700
- R v Secretary of State for Social Services, ex p Child Poverty Action Group (1989), CA . . . 551
- R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Birmingham City Council (1986) . . . 319
- R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Greenwich London Borough Council (1986) . . . 319
- R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Hackney London Borough Council (1985), CA . . . 318

- R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council (1990); on appeal (1990), CA; affd (1990), HL . . . 328
- R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Rose Theatre Trust Co (1990) . . . 551, 552
- R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Spath Holme Ltd (2001) . . . 247
- R (Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (2001) . . . 673, 694, 695
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Bentley (1993) . . . 110, 111
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Benwell (1985) . . . 524
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Bhajan Singh (1975), CA . . . 598
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Briggs, Green and Hargreaves (1997), CA . . . 495
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Brind (1991), HL . . . 467, 468, 471, 598, 599, 612
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Bugdaycay (1987) . . . 698
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Doody (1994), HL . . . 501
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Fayed (1997), CA . . . 501, 502
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Fire Brigades Union (1994); revsd (1995), CA; affd (1995), HL . . . 99, 100, 294, 626, 627, 630, 632–34, 674
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Gallagher: C-175/94 (1995), ECJ; apld sub nom R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Gallagher (1996), CA . . . 624
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Hosenball (1977), CA . . . 485, 486
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Khan (1984), CA . . . 493, 494, 496
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Leech (No 2) (1994), CA . . . 621, 631, 642, 658
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Moon (1995) . . . 629
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Muboyayi (1992), CA . . . 533
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Northumbria Police Authority (1988), CA . . . 108, 109, 248
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Oladehinde (1990), HL . . . 458, 513
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Ruddock (1987) . . . 493
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Simms (1999), HL . . . 658
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Tarrant (1985) . . . 490, 499, 500
- R (Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Department (2002), HL . . . 667, 671
- R (Bulger) v Secretary of State for the Home Department (2001) . . . 554
- R (Daly) v Secretary of State for the Home Department (2001) . . . 694, 695, 697, 699
- R (International Transport Roth GmbH) v Secretary of State for the Home Department (2001); revsd sub nom International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Department (2002) . . . 665
- R (Q) v Secretary of State for the Home Department (2003) . . . 700
- R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd (1989), HL; refd sub nom R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd (No 2): C-213/89 (1990), ECJ; apld sub nom R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd (No 2) (1990), HL . . . 400–406, 409, 410, 417, 431, 512, 535, 598, 619, 628, 638, 747
- R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd: C-48/93 (1996), ECJ . . . 624, 625, 628
- R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Richmond-upon-Thames London Borough Council (1994) . . . 494
- R v Servite Houses and Wandsworth LBC, ex parte Goldsmith and Chatting (1997) . . . 526, 527, 681, 684, 687
- R v Skinner (1968), CA . . . 457
- R v Somerset County Council and ARC Southern Ltd, ex p Dixon (1997) . . . 553, 554
- R v Steele (1976) . . . 82
- R v Stratford-on-Avon, ex p Jackson (1985) . . . 519
- R v Surrey Justices (1870) . . . 542
- R v Sussex Justices, ex p McCarthy (1924) . . . 503, 504, 506
- R v Taunton St Mary Inhabitants (1815) . . . 541
- R v Thames Magistrates' Court, ex p Greenbaum (1957), CCA . . . 541
- R v Tronoh Mines Ltd (1952), CCA . . . 211, 212
- R v Wicks (1998), HL . . . 531, 532
- Raimondo v Italy (1994), ECtHR . . . 711
- Rantzen v Mirror Group Newspapers (1986) Ltd (1994), CA . . . 642
- Raymond v Honey (1983), HL . . . 453, 621, 634
- Rees v United Kingdom (1986) . . . 667
- Resolutions in Anderson (1593) . . . 89, 90, 230, 243
- Reynolds v Times Newspapers Ltd (1999), HL . . . 659, 689
- Ridge v Baldwin (1963); affd (1963), CA; revsd (1964), HL . . . 482–88, 491, 514, 538
- Riel v R (1885), PC . . . 429
- Roberts v Hogg (1971) . . . 209
- Roberts v Hopwood. See R v Roberts, ex p Scurr
- Robertson v Minister of Pensions (1948) . . . 462, 463, 489

- Rootkin v Kent County Council (1981),
 CA ... 464
 Rost v Edwards (1990) ... 244, 246
 Roy v Kensington and Chelsea and Westminster Family Practitioner Committee (1992),
 HL ... 528, 529, 532, 533
 Royal College of Nursing of the United Kingdom v DHSS (1981) ... 66, 67, 74
 Russell v Duke of Norfolk (1948); affd (1949),
 CA ... 480, 481
 Rustomjee v R (1876), CA ... 617, 618
- S, Re (Care Order: Implementation of Care Plan
 (2001), CA, (2002), HL ... 666, 667, 671
 SACE SpA v Italian Ministry of Finance: 33/70
 (1970), ECJ ... 358, 363, 366, 372, 373, 376
 Salgueiro v Portugal (2001) ... 670
 Salinger v Cowles (1922) ... 584
 Salomon v Customs and Excise Comrs (1966),
 CA ... 597
 Saltman Engineering Co Ltd v Campbell
 Engineering Co Ltd (1963), CA ... 268
 Sanders v Chichester (1995) ... 208, 209
 Schmidt v Secretary of State for Home Affairs
 (1969), CA ... 487, 488
 Secretary of State for Defence v Guardian
 Newspapers Ltd (1984), CA; affd (1985),
 HL ... 573, 574, 613
 Secretary of State for the Home Department v E
 (2007), HL ... 741
 Secretary of State for the Home Department v JJ and others (2007), HL ... 741, 742
 Secretary of State for the Home Department v
 MB (2007), HL ... 741
 Shelley v Kramer (1948), US SC ... 651
 Shelley v London County Council (1948),
 HL ... 314
 Sheriff of Middlesex, Case of the (1840) ... 242, 243
 Sherman and Apps, Re (1981) ... 723
 Smith v Scott (2007) ... 705
 Smith and Grady v United Kingdom (1999),
 ECtHR ... 697
 Sofrimport SARL v EC Commission: C-152/88
 (1990), ECJ ... 496
 Solosky v R (1979) ... 622
 Southend-on-Sea Corpn v Hodgson (Wickford)
 Ltd (1962) ... 463
 Spectrum Plus Ltd, Re (2005), HL ... 84
 Spicer v Holt (1977) ... 712
 Stauder v City of Ulm: 29/69 (1969), ECJ ... 360
 Steel and others v United Kingdom (1999),
 ECtHR ... 714
 Steeples v Derbyshire County Council
 (1984) ... 567
 Stockdale v Hansard (1839) ... 242–44, 256, 294
 Stoke-on-Trent City Council v B & Q (Retail)
 Ltd (1984), HL ... 547, 548
 Stölting v Hauptzollamt Hamburg-Jonas: 138/78
 (1979), ECJ ... 394
- Stourton v Stourton (1963) ... 238, 239, 244
 Stretch v United Kingdom (2003) ... 498
 Strode's Case (1512) ... 229
 Students' Rights, Re: European Parliament
 (EC Commission intervening) v EC Council (United Kingdom and Netherlands intervening): C-295/90 (1992), ECJ ... 395
 Summerfield v Hampstead Borough Council
 (1957) ... 314
 Sunday Times v United Kingdom (1979),
 ECtHR ... 592, 600, 605, 606, 607
 SW v United Kingdom (1995), ECtHR ... 592
 Syndicat Generale des Fabricants de Semoules
 (1968) ... 363
- Taylor v Chief Constable of Thames Valley
 Police (2004), CA ... 722
 Taylor v Lawrence (2003) ... 507, 508
 Thoburn v Sunderland City Council
 (2002) ... 418, 419, 747, 748
 Thornby d Hamilton (Duchess) v Fleetwood
 (1712) ... 30
 Thorne v BBC (1967), CA ... 539
 Thornton v Kirklees MBC (1979) ... 516, 518
 Timmins v Gormley (2000), CA ... 506, 507
- United Kingdom v EU Council: C-84/94 (1996),
 ECJ ... 625
 United States v Associated Press (1943) ... 572
 University of Ceylon v Fernando (1960),
 PC ... 482
- Vachev v Bulgaria (2004), ECtHR ... 711
 Van Duyn v Home Office: 41/74 (1974),
 ECJ ... 372, 373, 376, 377, 384
 Vauxhall Estates Ltd v Liverpool Corpn
 (1932) ... 31, 32, 48
 Venables v News Group Newspapers Ltd
 (2001) ... 690
 Von Colson and Kamann v Land Nordrhein-
 Westfalen: 14/83 (1984), ECJ ... 382–84, 390, 393–96, 398, 399, 412
- Waddington v Miah (1974), HL ... 597
 Wainwright v Home Office (2003) ... 690
 Walrave and Koch v Union Cycliste
 Internationale: 36/74 (1974), ECJ ... 373–75, 381
 Wandsworth London Borough Council v Winder
 (1985), CA; affd (1985), HL ... 522, 528
 Ware v Regent's Canal Co (1858) ... 537, 538
 Warner v Metropolitan Police Comr
 (1969) ... 245
 Wason v Walter (1868) ... 240, 585
 Watkins v Woolas (2010) ... 217
 Watson v Jones (1872) ... 578
 Watson and Belmann, Re: 118/75 (1976),
 ECJ ... 470
 Webb v EMO Air Cargo (UK) Ltd (1992), HL; refd sub nom Webb v EMO Air Cargo (UK)

- Ltd: C-32/93 (1994), ECJ; revsd sub nom
 Webb v EMO Air Cargo (UK) Ltd (No 2)
 (1995), HL ... 399
- West Virginia State Board of Education v
 Barnette (1943) ... 559
- Western Fish Products Ltd v Penwith District Council (1981), CA ... 464, 498
- Whitehouse v Gay News Ltd (1979), HL ... 579
- Whitney v California (1927) ... 571
- Williams v Inspector of Taxes (2000),
 CA ... 506
- Williamson v West Midlands Chief Constable
 (2003), CA ... 713
- Wilson v First County Trust Ltd (No 2) (2001), revsd (2003), HL ... 663–65, 674, 687, 688
- Wingrove v United Kingdom (1996),
 ECtHR ... 609, 610, 612
- Wright v Court (1825) ... 723
- Wünsche Handelsgesellschaft Application, Re (1987) ... 385
- X v Austria (1979) ... 711
- X v Denmark (1976) ... 696
- X v Netherlands (1966) ... 724
- X and Y v Netherlands (1985), ECtHR ... 650
- X and Y v Sweden (1976) ... 711
- X Ltd v Morgan-Grampian (Publishers) Ltd
 (1990), CA; on appeal (1991), HL ... 612–14, 650
- X (Minors) v Bedfordshire County Council
 (1995), HL ... 678, 679
- Yemshaw v Hounslow (2011), SC ... 65
- YL v Birmingham and Others (2007) ...
 684–87
- Young, James and Webster v United Kingdom
 (1981), ECtHR ... 651
- Z v United Kingdom (2001), ECtHR ... 678
- Zamora, The (1916), PC ... 94, 95, 107,
 112, 575

Decisions of the European Court of Justice are listed below numerically. These decisions are also included in the preceding alphabetical list.

- 26/62: Algemene Transport-en Expeditie
 Onderneming van Gend en Loos NV v
 Nederlandse Belastingadministratie (1963),
 ECJ ... 349–58, 362, 363, 366, 368, 370, 372,
 373, 374, 377, 380, 384, 401, 405, 406, 411, 412, 451
- 6/64: Costa v ENEL (1964), ECJ 352–57, 362–66, 368, 370, 376–78, 380, 382, 384, 401, 405, 406, 410
- 57/65: Firma Alfons Lütticke GmbH v
 Hauptzollamt Sarrelouis (1966), ECJ ... 363
- 29/69: Stauder v City of Ulm (1969),
 ECJ ... 360
- 90, 91/63: Commission v Luxembourg and Belgium (Dairy Products) (1964), ECJ ... 351, 364
- 9/70: Grad v Finanzamt Traunstein (1970),
 ECJ ... 358, 363, 366
- 11/70: Internationale Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Einfuhr und Vorratsstelle für Getreide und Futtermittel (1970), ECJ; (1974), FCC
 ('Solange I') ... 359–61, 366, 368, 370, 377, 382–85
- 33/70: SACE SpA v Italian Ministry of Finance
 (1970), ECJ ... 358, 363, 366, 372, 373, 376
- 43/71: Politi SAS v Ministero delle Finanze
 (1971), ECJ ... 357, 358, 363, 366
- 81/72: EC Commission v EC Council (1973),
 ECJ ... 496
- 4/73: J Nold KG v EC Commission (1974),
 ECJ ... 385
- 36/74: Walrave and Koch v Union Cycliste
 Internationale (1974), ECJ ... 373–75, 381
- 41/74: Van Duyn v Home Office (1974),
 ECJ ... 372, 373, 376, 377, 384
- 74/74: Comptoir National Technique Agricole SA
 (CNTA) v EC Commission (1975), ECJ ... 496
- 43/75: Defrenne v Sabena (1976), ECJ ... 375, 381, 569
- 118/75: Re Watson and Belmann (1976),
 ECJ ... 470
- 114/76: Bela-Mühle Josef Bergmann KG v Grows-
 Farm GmbH & Co KG (1977), ECJ ... 470
- 106/77: Amministrazione delle Finanze dello
 Stato v Simmenthal SpA (1978), ECJ ... 375,
 376, 382, 384, 401, 402, 679
- 138/78: Stölting v Hauptzollamt Hamburg-Jonas
 (1979), ECJ ... 394
- 44/79: Hauer v Land Rheinland-Pfalz (1979),
 ECJ ... 385
- 129/79: Macarthy Ltd v Smith (1979), CA; refd (1980), ECJ; apld (1980), CA ... 378, 379, 400, 418
- 188–190/80: France, Italy and United Kingdom
 v EC Commission (1982), ECJ ... 394
- 12/81: Garland v British Rail Engineering Ltd
 (1983), ECJ; apld (1983), HL ... 379, 400, 418
- 61/81: Commission v United Kingdom (1982),
 ECJ ... 397
- 230/81: Luxembourg v European Parliament
 (1983), ECJ ... 391
- 14/83: Von Colson and Kamann v Land
 Nordrhein-Westfalen (1984), ECJ ... 382–84,
 390, 393–96, 398, 399, 412
- 79/83: Harz v Deutsche Tradax GmbH (1984),
 ECJ ... 382
- 152/84: Marshall v Southampton and South
 West Hampshire Area Health Authority
 (Teaching) (1986), ECJ ... 380–84, 390, 396, 412, 683

- 222/84: Johnston v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary (1986), ECJ... 383, 384
- 281/85, 283–285/85, 287/85: Germany v EC Commission (1987), ECJ... 394
- 45/86: EC Commission v EC Council (Generalised Tariff Preferences) (1987), ECJ... 394
- 22/87: EC Commission v Italy (1989), ECJ... 410
- 101/87: P Bork International A/S v Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark (1988), ECJ... 398
- C-70/88: European Parliament v EC Council (Chernobyl) (1991), ECJ... 395
- C-152/88: Sofrimport SARL v EC Commission (1990), ECJ... 496
- C-104/89, C-37/90: Mulder v EC Council and EC Commission (1992), ECJ... 496
- C-106/89: Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentación SA (1990), ECJ... 393–96, 399, 412, 641, 644, 662, 667, 671
- C-213/89: R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd (No 2) (1990), ECJ... 400–406, 409, 410, 417, 431, 512, 535, 598, 619, 628, 638, 747
- C-246/89R: EC Commission v United Kingdom (1989), ECJ... 401, 402
- C-300/89: EC Commission v EC Council (1991), ECJ... 395
- C-6, 9/90: Francovich and Bonifaci v Italy (1991), ECJ... 402, 410, 411, 412, 624
- C-295/90: Re Students' Rights: European Parliament (EC Commission intervening) v EC Council (United Kingdom and Netherlands intervening) (1992), ECJ... 395
- C-46/93: Brasserie du Pêcheur SA v Germany (1996), ECJ... 402, 412, 624
- C-48/93: R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd (1996), ECJ... 624, 625
- C-13/94: P v S (1996), ECJ... 625
- C-84/94: United Kingdom v EU Council (1996), ECJ... 625
- C-175/94: R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Gallagher (1995), ECJ... 624

Part One

Theoretical Principles

Chapter 1 Defining the Constitution?

Chapter 2 Parliamentary Sovereignty

Chapter 3 The Rule of Law and the Separation of Powers

Chapter 4 The Royal Prerogative

This page intentionally left blank

Chapter 1

Defining the Constitution?

We hold these truths to be self-evident. That all men are created equal. That they are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights. That among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of those ends, it shall be the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundations upon such principles, and organising its powers in such form, as shall seem to them most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Thomas Jefferson, Philadelphia, 4 July 1776.

It may seem odd to begin a textbook analysing the law and politics of the British constitution by quoting from the United States' Declaration of Independence, a document drafted by Thomas Jefferson in 1776. The Declaration was written because the American colonists rejected the British constitutional system under which they had previously been governed. Jefferson's words were intended firstly to provide a justification of the American colonists' decision to rebel against British rule, and secondly to outline the broad moral principles that the revolutionaries would try to preserve in their new country.

This book begins with Jefferson's words in part because there is much common ground between American and British perceptions as to the moral principles which should underpin a country's constitutional arrangements.¹ However, they have been chosen primarily because they continue to provide a succinct, eloquent statement of the issues with which constitutional lawyers in any modern democratic country should be concerned.

We might contrast the sentiments of the Declaration with the various definitions of the British constitution offered by authors of several recent textbooks. Colin Turpin suggests that the constitution is: 'a body of rules, conventions and practices which regulate or qualify the organisation and operation of government in the United Kingdom'; deSmith's classic introductory text regards the constitution as 'a central, but not the sole feature, of the rules regulating the system of government'.² A longer version is offered by Vernon Bogdanor, for whom the constitution is: 'a code of rules which aspire to regulate

¹ See Harlow C (1995) 'A special relationship? American influences on judicial review in England'; and Allan T (1995) 'Equality and moral independence: public law and private morality', both in Loveland I (ed) A special relationship?

² Respectively in (2nd edn, 1990) British government and the constitution p 3; Street H and Brazier R (5th edn, 1985) deSmith's Constitutional and administrative law p 15.

the allocation of functions, powers and duties among the various agencies and officers of government, and defines the relationship between these and the public'.³

These authors are trying to tell us what the constitution is—to describe the form that it takes. The Declaration, in contrast, is telling us what a constitution is for—to analyse the functions it performs. This book presents a functionalist view of the British constitution, concerned more with the 'Why?' than with the 'What?' of contemporary arrangements. It assumes that the purpose of a constitution is to articulate and preserve a society's fundamental moral principles. This is not to suggest that knowledge of the form that the constitution takes is unimportant, nor that issues of form and function are unrelated; it is simply to stress that one cannot understand the law of the constitution without looking beyond its surface image.

The book does not offer a one sentence 'definition' of the constitution. Rather, the entire book may be seen as a 'definition'. But this book amounts to only one definition, no more conclusive than any other formula that a student may encounter. British constitutional law is a subject as much concerned with history and politics as with legal rules. Definitive answers to particular problems are often elusive, and it is almost always possible to advance plausible alternatives to the solutions that have apparently been adopted.

This introductory chapter identifies certain evaluative criteria which readers might keep in mind when considering the description and analysis of Britain's current constitutional arrangements presented in the rest of the book. The following pages explore several abstract questions concerning the functions that a constitution might perform to illustrate the complex nature of the subject we are studying. We also devote some attention to the solutions which the American revolutionaries adopted to resolve the constitutional difficulties which they faced when the United States became an independent country. This is not a comparative book, nor is it suggested that the American solution is necessarily 'better' in any particular sense than the British model. The British and American systems are however very different in the form that they take. This is highly significant for our purposes, because the Americans claimed that their revolution was fought not against the moral principles of the British constitution, but against the corruption of those principles by the British Parliament, the British government, the British judiciary, and the British people.⁴

We return to these historical matters shortly. Before doing so however, we may usefully spend some time considering the meaning of what we might (from an early twenty-first century vantage point) intuitively regard as the most important function a constitution should perform—to ensure that a country is governed according to 'democratic principles'.

I. The meaning(s) of 'democracy'?

That modern Britain is a democratic country is perhaps a contemporary 'self-evident truth': the point is so obvious that few observers would ever question it. But if we dig beneath the surface of that assumption, we may find that we hold different views about the essential features of a democratic state,⁵ and would reach different conclusions about how democratic a country Britain actually is. That, however, is a judgement best reserved to later chapters. At this point, we might more sensibly ask what yardsticks we might use in answering these questions.

³ Bogdanor V (1988) 'Introduction' p 4 in Bogdanor V (ed) Constitutions in democratic politics.

⁴ See generally the marvelous study by Bernard Bailyn (1967) The ideological origins of the American revolution.

⁵ Cf Bealey F (1988) Democracy in the contemporary state esp chs 1 and 2; Holden B (1988) Understanding liberal democracy esp ch 1.

What is democratic governance? Some hypothetical examples

The following hypothetical example assumes that the constitution of the countries concerned (countries A and B) provide that laws be made by referendums, in which all adult citizens are granted one vote. A law is passed if 50%+1 of those citizens who vote support the proposal. Let us assume that a majority of citizens in both countries A and B decide that they are not prepared to tolerate the poverty caused by an economic depression which has left 20% of the adult population unemployed.

Economic policy as a constitutional issue?

In country A, a new law provides a generous scheme of unemployment benefits. The benefit scheme is financed by imposing heavy income taxes on the wealthiest 30% of the population. In doing this, the law frees the poorest members of society from the threat of starvation and homelessness. But it deprives the richest citizens of a substantial slice of their income, which they had planned to spend pursuing their own favoured forms of happiness.

In country B, the law requires that men and women aged over sixty retire from work. A small retirement pension will be paid to the people forced to retire. In doing this, the law reduces the problem of unemployment at a modest financial cost to the majority of the population, but imposes substantial hardship on people over sixty years old who do not want to retire.

How would we decide if these laws were 'democratic'? Should we ask only if the law has majority support, and if the answer is yes, go no further? If so, both laws (and presumably the constitutional arrangements under which they were passed) would be democratic. Or should we demand that there be an inter-relationship between the level of support a law attracts and the severity of its consequences for particular minorities—the more severe the law, the greater the degree of support it must attract to be democratic? If we accepted that principle, could we then agree that forcing people to retire from work is more 'severe' than imposing heavy taxes on the rich? If so, could we further agree that forced retirement would be 'democratic' if it enjoyed 55% (or 66% or 75% or 100%) support, while 50%+1 would be sufficient to 'democratise' large tax increases? Or thirdly, should we conclude that there are some laws whose consequences would be so severe that they may never be enacted by a democratic society, even if supported by 100% of the population? If so, would either forcing people to retire from work at sixty or imposing large tax increases on the wealthiest sections of the population fall into that category?

Waging war as a constitutional issue?

Alternatively, let us suppose that country C declares war on countries E, and F. The majority of voters in country E decide that they attach more importance to taking steps to win the war than to safeguarding personal liberty, and so enact a law (we might call it the War Emergency Powers Detention Law) which allows the government to imprison (without trial, and for an indefinite period, but in humane conditions) anybody suspected by specified government employees of having connections with the enemy country, for fear that such people might be spies or saboteurs. Country C's attacks are eventually repelled. Several thousand people are imprisoned under the law for the three years that the war lasts. No investigation is ever carried out to establish if the government's suspicions about those people detained are well-founded.

In country F, the majority of the population decides that it must accord moral priority to liberty of the person over winning the war, and rejects the proposed War Emergency Powers Detention Law. Subsequently, enemy agents succeed in sabotaging military facilities and undermining the citizenry's morale to such an extent that country F is defeated, and subjugated by country C.

Which country has acted in a democratic fashion here? Does a desire to preserve the country's independence justify interference with people's physical liberty? Does the answer to this question depend on the severity of the interference—or on the severity of the threat from the aggressor? Or on the outcome of the war? Would we need to know the size of the majority supporting each measure before deciding if it was democratic?

Combating terrorism as a constitutional issue?

Let us suppose, as a third example, that country X has recently been subjected to several terrorist attacks by an extremist political group. The attacks have involved the planting of bombs in crowded shopping areas, and have killed and injured many people. The following Prevention of Terrorism Law is proposed. It has five sections. The proposed law is approved by 51% of voters on a 90% turnout. The sections provide that:

- 1 Any police officer may arrest and question any person she/he suspects of being a terrorist or of being a supporter of terrorist activity. The person may be detained for up to seventy-two hours without being charged with a crime.
- 2 Any police officer of the rank of Inspector or above may authorize the continued detention for a period of up to twenty-eight days of any person detained under section 1.
- 3 Any police officer may inflict mild beatings on any person detained under section 1 or section 2 if any police officer believes this would uncover information which would prevent a future terrorist attack.
- 4 Any police officer police may torture and/or severely beat any person detained under section 1 or section 2 if any police officer believes this would uncover information which would prevent an imminent terrorist attack.
- 5 No action claimed by any police officer to be taken under any section of this law may be the subject of any legal proceedings in any court.

We might accept that the people who proposed and voted for the law are motivated by a sincerely held belief that its enactment will save many people from being killed or injured by terrorist attacks. Many of the law's supporters also believe that the police would never actually detain anyone who was not involved in some way with a terrorist group. Other supporters take the view that the law is bound to be applied to wholly innocent people, some of whom will be severely injured by torture; but that is a price worth paying to reduce the number of terrorist attacks. Should we pay any attention in evaluating the law to the motivations of the voters who support it? And if so, is the first or second group acting in the more 'democratic' fashion?

It is also evident that the various sections of the law interfere to different degrees with the physical liberty and well-being of individuals detained under it. Should our evaluation of the 'democratic' nature of each provision turn on the level of support each received? If so could we accept, if only in the context of country X being subject to terrorist attack, that a three day detention is such a trivial matter that the barest of majorities is sufficient to lend section 1 a democratic character? And if we accept the principle that more severe interferences demand higher levels of support, what criteria should we use to assess severity? Is a twenty-eight day detention in humane conditions more 'severe', for example, than a mild beating and release after three days? Would our views on the acceptability of the law change significantly if section 5 were removed?

Complicating the question

Such questions—and such laws—can provoke endless argument as to the proper meaning of 'democratic' governance. It might be suggested that the central function performed by a society's constitutional law is how it reconciles its people's divergent beliefs about issues of great moral significance.

Moreover, we can rapidly make the questions raised by such 'laws' and the constitutional orders in which they are made more elaborate by bringing the hypothetical law-making process under closer scrutiny. Would our conclusions about 'democracy' alter if it transpired that the law enacted in country A was supported by the 70% of the population who would not have to pay extra taxes to finance it, but opposed by the 30% who would suffer reduced income if the new system was introduced? Or alternatively, that it was supported by all of the richest 30% but opposed by many of the unemployed, who regarded it as a patronising erosion of their dignity and self-respect? Similarly, would our views as to the democratic nature of the new law made in country B change if we learned that it had been enthusiastically supported by almost all people over the age of sixty? Would either law become more or less democratic in our eyes if we discover that neither country permits unemployed people to cast votes in the law-making process?

How relevant to our evaluation of the democratic credentials of country X's Prevention of Terrorism Law would it be to know that many of the people who supported the law had no clear understanding of what was meant by the term 'torture' used in section 3; or had not appreciated that a person who was released after having been detained for the maximum twenty-eight days permitted by section 2 could be detained again the day after being released?

A constitution as a social and political contract?

We might readily agree that the issue of 'consent' permeates the many plausible answers that could be offered to those hypothetical questions. As a statement of general principle, it is difficult to find fault with Jefferson's suggestion that 'government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed'. Problems arise when we go further and ask what exactly the concept of 'consent' actually means.

The notion of a constitution as some form of 'contract', negotiated either among the citizenry themselves, or between the citizenry and its rulers, was not a novel idea, if only in philosophical terms, in 1776. The French philosopher Jean-Jacques Rousseau had explored the concept of 'direct democracy' through an idealised small city state, in which all citizens participated personally in fashioning the laws under which they lived.⁶ In such a society, the legitimacy of all laws would rest on the citizenry's constant, express consent to the process of government. Rousseau rejected the idea of a divine, or natural, or God-given system of government; his men and women were not sculpted by their creator and endowed with those 'inalienable rights' that the American revolutionaries were so keen to defend. Rousseau's social order resulted from agreements between every individual citizen and the citizenry as a whole, from which government was formed. All government action therefore had a 'contractual' base; the citizens' rights and obligations under their constitution derived from covenants that they willingly made.

⁶ Rousseau J (1987) The social contract (edited and translated by Betts C).

John Locke's celebrated Second Treatise on Government, first published in 1690, pursued the concept of constitutions as contracts in a slightly different form. Unlike Rousseau, Locke maintained that society was subject to a form of natural or divine law which imposed limits on individual behaviour. Government existed to provide mechanisms for enforcing the substance of such natural laws, the terms of which would serve as the constitution within which the government operated:

it is unreasonable for Men to be Judges in their own Cases... Self-love will make Men partial to themselves and their friends... Ill Nature, Passion and Revenge will carry them too far in punishing others. And hence nothing but Confusion or Disorder will follow, and therefore God hath certainly appointed government to restrain the partiality and violence of Men.⁷

Locke and Rousseau were engaging in an exercise in abstract, academic philosophising: they were sketching ideal solutions to hypothetical problems, rather than offering a detailed programme capable of immediate implementation in their respective countries.⁸ Indeed, in the early 1700s it was difficult to identify any historical examples of such idealised sentiments being put into practice. David Hume's famous 1748 essay on the formation of constitutions and governments, 'Of the Original Contract', recorded that:

Almost all governments which exist at present, or of which there remains any record in story, have been founded originally either on usurpation or conquest, or both, without any presence of a fair consent or voluntary subjection of the people.⁹

Nonetheless, Locke's and Rousseau's writings provided an important reference for the American and French revolutionaries whose armed struggles were waged so that their countries might try to construct a new, 'ideal' form of constitutional order. But even at a hypothetical, abstract level, the idea of constitutions as political contracts or covenants raises major difficulties. The foremost among these is, as Rousseau recognised, 'to determine what those covenants are'.

Locke presented the emergence of government as a prerequisite for protecting individual citizens' 'property', a concept construed broadly as encompassing their lives, their physical and spiritual liberty, and their land and possessions.¹⁰ These matters could thus be construed as entitlements which citizens derived from 'natural law', and are an obvious source of inspiration for Jefferson's notion of 'inalienable rights'. The terms are too vague to permit any exhaustive definition. Yet by focusing on the specific objectives of the American revolutionaries we can gain some indication of the issues they might encompass.

The Declaration's complaints against the British government concerned both the way that laws were made and their content. The overall thrust of the argument was that Britain was seeking to establish 'an absolute Tyranny over these States', but the general accusation comprised many specific complaints. Jefferson accused the British of, for example, 'imposing taxes on us without our consent' and '[keeping] among us, in times of peace, standing armies without the consent of our legislatures'. Jefferson is not arguing here

⁷ Laslett P (ed) Locke—Two treatises of government, II para 13.

⁸ There is debate among Lockean scholars as to whether the second treatise was written as an ex post facto justification for the 1688 English revolution, of which more will be said in ch 2; see Laslett P (1988) 'Two Treatises of Government and the revolution of 1688', in Laslett (ed) op cit.

⁹ Reproduced in Hume D (1994) Political writings p 168 (edited by Warner D and Livingston D).

¹⁰ See Laslett P (1988) 'The social and political theory of Two Treatises of Government', in Laslett (ed) op cit.

that the levying of taxation or the maintenance of an army in peace-time are per se unacceptable features of government power, but that they are acceptable only if 'the people' affected by the measures have agreed to them.

Jefferson also identified British actions which apparently were unacceptable per se. The British had, for instance:

dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly...[and] refused for a long time, after dissolutions, to cause others to be elected...[and] refused to pass laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of Representation in the Legislature, a right inestimable in them and formidable to tyrants only.¹¹

This grievance, so keenly felt, suggests that Jefferson considered that no part of the government process can be acceptable if 'the people' cannot choose their preferred law-makers at regular intervals. Without this power of choice, the people could not 'consent' to the laws, and therefore those laws could not be 'just'.

A third category of complaints suggests that there were some laws to which 'the people' could not consent even if they wished to. The Americans were outraged, for example, that Britain subjected them to laws which 'depriv[ed] us in many cases of the benefits of Trial by Jury' and 'transport[ed] us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offences'. The presumption that one's guilt in criminal matters be established by a jury of one's peers, and that the scope of the criminal law be clear and stable, were seemingly regarded as fundamental principles of social organisation by the colonists. One might attach similar importance to Jefferson's claim that the British King had:

obstructed the Administration of Justice, by refusing his Assent to Laws for establishing Judiciary powers. He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

But it is perhaps easier to identify precisely those aspects of government behaviour which the revolution was fought against, than those it was fought for. The rhetoric of 'All men being created equal' and sharing 'inalienable rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness' is beguiling, almost perhaps bewitching. We might (again intuitively) regard such sentiments as integral ingredients of a democratic constitutional order. But what do they mean? Their concern, broadly stated, appears to be with the nature both of the legal powers that a government possesses and of the processes through which that power is exercised. The bulk of this book explores those concerns in the British context, but we might first consider the answers which Jefferson and his contemporaries offered to these questions.

II. The first 'modern' constitution?

The following pages offer a simplistically drawn picture of the constitutional settlement at which the American revolutionaries finally arrived in 1791.¹² It is intended to operate not as a yardstick against which to measure the adequacy of the details of the British constitution, but as a comparator which indicates alternative ways in which modern societies might organise their constitutional structures.

¹¹ For the Lockean roots of this complaint see the Second treatise on government paras 215–216.

¹² For a more detailed introduction see McKay D (1989) American politics and society chs 3 and 4.

The problem—majoritarianism

The central principle informing the deliberations of the framers of the American constitution could be described as a pervasive distrust of human nature. This sentiment was best expressed by one of Jefferson's contemporaries, James Madison, in The Federalist Papers No 10:

As long as the reason of man continues fallible, and he is at liberty to exercise it, different opinions will be formed. . . . A zeal for different opinions concerning religion, concerning government and [above all] the unequal distribution of property . . . have, in turn, divided mankind into parties, inflamed them with mutual animosity, and rendered them much more disposed to vex and oppress each other than to co-operate for their common good.¹³

Madison saw no merit in trying to suppress diversity of opinion per se. That men would take different views on all manner of questions was an inevitable and indispensable component of both individual and collective liberty. He was however greatly concerned to draw lessons from history concerning the dangers that a country faced from within its own borders by the combination of citizens sharing the same 'vexatious' or 'oppressive' sentiments into distinct political 'factions', a faction being:

a number of citizens, whether amounting to a majority or minority of the whole, who are united and actuated by some common impulse of passion, or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens, or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community.¹⁴

A form of government in which laws expressed the wishes of the electoral majority would ensure that irrational or oppressive schemes favoured by minority factions would not be given legal effect. But, Madison suggested, this 'majoritarian' system of law-making offered no protection to society when oppressive or irrational ideas were favoured by a majority. That an idea enjoyed majority support did not necessarily make it conducive to the 'public good': majorities might be misinformed about important issues, or be temporarily persuaded to abandon their better judgement by the seductive rhetoric of charismatic leaders, or simply be prepared to sacrifice their country's long term welfare to gain a short term, sectional advantage. Consequently, Madison argued that the most important characteristic of the Constitution he was urging his fellow Americans to adopt was its attempt to ensure that 'the majority . . . be rendered unable to concert and carry into effect schemes of oppression'.

The solutions—representative government, federalism, a separation of powers, and supra-legislative 'fundamental' rights

Madison suggested that the dangers of faction could be reduced by adopting a form of 'representative government', in which laws would be made not directly by the people themselves, but by representatives who the people had chosen to exercise law-making power on their behalf in a legislative assembly. Madison hoped:

to refine and enlarge the public views by passing them through the medium of a chosen body of citizens, whose wisdom may best discern the true interest of their country and ¹³ The Federalist Papers were essays written by James Madison, Alexander Hamilton and John Jay in the mid-1780s. The US Constitution which exists today was the second Constitution which the revolutionaries adopted after the War of Independence. The Federalist Papers were part of an intense argument between advocates of the new Constitution and defenders of the first Constitution, the so-called Articles of Confederation. The papers can be accessed at <<http://www.foundingfathers.info/federalistpapers/>>.

¹⁴ The Federalist Papers No 10.

whose patriotism and love of justice will be least likely to sacrifice it to temporary or partial considerations.¹⁵

We might take something of a diversion at this point, and wonder how Madison's notions of 'wise' legislators fits with contemporary understandings of 'democratic' government. Let us return to countries A and B, and assume that laws are made not by the people directly, but by 100 legislators who are selected by the people to act on their behalf; a law is enacted if a simple majority of legislators support it. We may further assume that for the purposes of selecting its legislators, both countries are divided into electoral districts with equal populations, each of which returns one member to the legislature; all adult citizens have one vote in choosing their representatives, and the legislative seat is won by whichever candidate receives the most votes.

Would we consider the law enacted in country A as democratic if we learned firstly, that ten of the fifty-five legislators who voted for it represented areas where the majority of electors opposed any tax increase, and secondly that the ten legislators concerned had promised their electors they would vote against any such measure? Would it make any difference to our answer if the reason for the ten legislators' change of heart was the force of arguments presented in favour of the law during a debate in the legislature? The answer to this question presumably depends on how we answer the logically precedent question of whether the role of a legislator is simply to transmit the wishes of her electors into law, or is rather to exercise her judgement as to the 'best' response to particular issues, even if her electors would wish her to reach a different conclusion?

A constitution in which law-making power is delegated or entrusted to a small number of citizens makes the task of judging the democratic nature of laws more complex, for we immediately become concerned not just with the merits of the particular law per se, but also with the merits of those laws which determine the way that legislators are selected and the ways that they behave during the law-making process. Might we question the 'democratic' basis of every law country A enacted, for example, if some electoral districts contained twice as many electors as others, but still returned only one member? Or, to revisit a familiar question, if unemployed people were not permitted to vote? Might we also feel uneasy about the law-making process if we learned that many seats in the legislature had been contested by four or five candidates, all of whom attracted approximately equal electoral support, so that the winner was voted for by barely 30% of the people qualified to vote?

A less contentious matter, at least from the American revolutionaries' perspective, was the presumption that the people's representatives, once elected, should enjoy unimpeded freedom to discuss any subject they chose, and to cast their law-making votes in any manner they wished. The colonists' aforementioned complaints over British interference with the operation of their colonial legislatures have clear philosophical roots in Locke's suggestion that 'consent' to government demanded that the people's legislature should not be hindered by any legal rules:

from assembling in its due time, or from acting freely, pursuant to those ends for which it was constituted, the Legislative is altered. For tis not a certain number of men, no nor their meeting, unless they have also Freedom of Debating, and Leisure of perfecting, what is for the good of the Society wherein the Legislature exists.... For it is not Names that Constitute governments, but the use and exercise of those powers that were intended to accompany them.¹⁶

¹⁵ Ibid.

¹⁶ Locke J (1690) Second treatise on government para 215 (reproduced in Laslett op cit).

The issue of representative government invites us to consider further dimensions of the concept of liberty adverted to in the Declaration. Jefferson's condemnation of imprisonment for 'pretended offences' addresses liberty in a physical and individual sense. Yet the Declaration also suggests that liberty bears more abstract and collective meanings, particularly in respect of matters concerning freedom of speech and conscience.

This leads us once again to consider the notion of 'consent' to government. Jefferson and his contemporaries assumed that 'man' was a rational, autonomous being; the preservation of his liberty demanded that 'he' make decisions on the basis of full and accurate knowledge. Consent had to be informed consent. The American revolutionaries thus placed a considerable premium on safeguarding individual citizens' freedom of conscience and expression in relation to political matters. Consequently, the restrictions which Britain had placed on the activities of representative colonial legislatures were perceived by the colonists as an intolerable infringement of their collective liberty.

This particular strand of 'liberty' can be compromised in many ways, and it is intimately tied to our contemporary understandings of 'democratic government'. Would we conclude, for example, that no law made by the legislative assembly of our hypothetical country A could be democratic if it was a criminal offence for any person to reveal details of legislators' speeches or votes on the proposals before them? In such circumstances, electors would not know which legislators had supported or opposed tax increases, and so could not make informed choices as to their preferred candidate at the next election. Would we draw the same conclusion about country B if we learned it was a crime in that society for anyone to voice criticisms of the laws enacted by the legislature, with a view to convincing electors to choose different representatives at the next election? These issues are obviously of major significance to any attempt to gauge the adequacy of the mechanism through which legislatures are elected.

Madison's particular vision of 'representative government' clearly demands that one accept the desirability of fostering a certain degree of elitism in one's governors, and as such demands that law-makers ignore the irrational or oppressive sentiments of the citizens they represent. But this elitism may substantially dilute the 'representativeness' of the laws enacted. The preamble to the US Constitution begins with the words: 'We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union . . .'. Yet 'the people' who chose the legislators who framed the Constitution comprised barely 10% of the populace of the colonies.¹⁷ Voters were all male, almost all were white, and the great majority were atypically well educated and affluent. The consent of the poor, the uneducated, and women was not presumed necessary to the establishment of the United States' newly created form of government, seemingly because the framers of the Constitution doubted that such groups, which comprised the mass of the populace, could be relied upon to support 'rational' (from the framers' perspectives) constitutional provisions.

Such discriminatory principles might lead us to conclude that the 'consent' which the revolutionaries sought was somewhat illusory. This question is one to which we will frequently return in the context of British constitutional history and practice. Yet we may also consider it prudent to be concerned with the powers that legislators might wield once they have assumed (in accordance with whatever notion of popular consent determines their selection) their law-making powers. Madison recognised that it was by no means a complete answer to the spectre of tyranny simply to hope that a system of representative government, in which legislators were selected by an elitist electorate, would invariably produce rulers who would have the wisdom and capacity always to forswear sectional objectives favoured by factions of the population. One could not always rely on 'patriotism and love of justice' rather than 'temporary and partial considerations' being the dominant forces in the minds of one's chosen law-making representatives, no matter how carefully they were selected. Madison considered that it was: 'In vain to say that enlightened statesmen will be able to adjust...clashing interests and render them all subservient to the public good. Enlightened statesmen will not always be at the helm'.¹⁸

¹⁷ See, for contrasting views, Beard C (1990) 'An economic interpretation of the Constitution', in Ollman B and Birmbaum J (eds) The United States Constitution; and Brown R (1987) 'The Beard thesis attacked: a political approach', in Levy L (ed) The making of the Constitution.

In those circumstances, the problem of majoritarianism was simply displaced from the arena of 'the people' themselves to the much smaller number of citizens who served as legislators. For the designers of the US Constitution, this indicated that preserving 'the public good' might demand that the helmsmen steering the ship of state either be precluded from embarking on voyages to undesirable destinations, or at the very least, be subject to constraints that made such journeys very difficult.

Federalism and the separation of powers

The American colonists' sense of themselves as citizens of a single nation was not well developed. Each colony had been created, in the legal sense, by 'Charters' granted by the British monarchy.¹⁹ These had been granted at different times, and on rather different terms. By 1776, the (then) thirteen colonies (from a British perspective) or States (in the revolutionaries' eyes) had developed distinctive political and social cultures, which were expressed in their respective laws.²⁰ Yet the colonists also shared many common practical and philosophical concerns. The most pressing was obviously justifying and then succeeding in their revolutionary war: this was a task that could be achieved only if the colonies acted in a co-ordinated manner; aspects of their individual identities would have to be surrendered to a 'national' military and political project. But having won their independence through such unified action, the revolutionaries then faced the dilemma of how best to structure the inter-relationships between the nation, the States and the people. Their eventual solution was to fashion a 'federal' constitution.

In the modern era, 'federalism' is a concept bearing many meanings. As perceived by the American revolutionaries, their federal constitution would have the positive virtue of creating a multiplicity of powerful political societies within a single nation state, each wielding significant political powers within precisely defined geographical boundaries. However, the Constitution placed limits on the political autonomy of each State by granting sole responsibility for certain types of governmental power to the newly created national government. Those matters left within the sole competence of the States, while important in themselves, were not regarded as crucial to the well-being of the entire nation. It would not therefore be dangerous to allow the people of each State to devise their own 'internal' constitutional arrangements to determine their respective preferences on these issues: if they chose to indulge factional sentiment within their own borders, so be it; but their choices would have no legal force in the other States. Each State could quite lawfully enact different laws to deal with matters within their geographical and functional jurisdiction.

The principle underlying the creation of a federal nation again derives from a particular view of the meaning of 'consent'. It assumes that a 'people' within which divergent factions held differing views on major (if not fundamental) political matters would be more likely to agree to live under a constitutional order which offered many opportunities for those views to be given legal effect at the same time, albeit within limited geographical areas, than under a system which allowed a majority of the entire population, acting through a national legislature, to impose its preferences on all issues on the entire country.

¹⁸ Federalist Papers No 10.

¹⁹ The grant of Charters was a part of what were known as the Monarch's 'prerogative' powers. We examine these powers more closely in ch 4.

²⁰ See Bailyn B (1967) The ideological origins of the American revolution pp 191–193. A contemporaneous perspective is offered by Madison in The Federalist Papers No 39.

Even if one accepts this principle as desirable, however, there remains the problem of deciding which powers should be allocated to which sphere of government. The American revolutionaries initially adopted a constitution known as the Articles of Confederation, which gave virtually no powers to the national government. The Articles were rejected within ten years, in favour of a new constitutional settlement which granted the national government considerably more authority.²¹ The national government would be empowered to conduct foreign policy, to grant national citizenship, to maintain military forces and wage war, to issue the national currency, to impose customs duties on imported and exported goods, to levy sales taxes (but not income taxes) on a uniform basis throughout the country, to run the nation's postal service and to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations. The States were not permitted to enact laws concerning these matters.

Thus, if our hypothetical countries A and E were organised on the same federal lines as the United States' Constitution, country A's central legislature would apparently have been unable to introduce its proposed anti-unemployment law, irrespective of how many legislators supported it, since the constitution seemingly did not give it the power to levy income taxes. Alternatively, if we accepted that the law introduced by country E was an element of the central legislature's war powers, it could be enacted even if the majority of people in several States heartily disapproved of it.

Madison's concern with the dangers of faction and majoritarianism was initially directed at placing limits on the power of national government, acting at the behest of either a majority of the people or a majority of the States,²² to produce irrational or oppressive laws. This safeguard was to be achieved in part by a further development on the theme of representative government. The Constitution eventually devised a representative form of national government which produced a balance between the people as a whole and the people as citizens of their respective States. The framers of the Constitution created an elaborate separation (or fragmentation) of powers within the institutions of the national government. The national legislature, the Congress, would have two component parts. Seats in the House of Representatives were to be apportioned among the States in proportion to their respective populations. In contrast, each State, irrespective of its population size, would have two members in the Senate. The approval of a majority in both chambers would be required to enact laws.²³ Thus, in simple terms, neither a majority of the legislative representatives of the States nor a majority of the population could impose its wishes on the other. The dual nature of the national legislature did not however exhaust the fragmentation of power to which the Constitution subjected the national government.

The task of implementing Congressional legislation was granted not to the Congress itself, but to a separate, 'executive' branch of government headed by an elected President. In addition to possessing a limited array of personal powers, the President was also afforded a significant role in the legislative process. Measures attracting majority support in both chambers of Congress would become laws only when signed by the President. Should he refuse his assent, a measure would be enacted only if it returned to Congress and was then approved by a two-thirds majority in the Senate and the House. The President was thus empowered to block the law-making preferences of a small Congressional majority, but not the wishes of an overwhelming majority in both houses.

²¹ See Jensen M (1990) 'The Articles of Confederation', in Birnbaum and Ollman op cit; Levy L (1987) 'Introduction—the making of the Constitution 1776–1789', in Levy op cit.

²² Since the States were not of equal (population) size, the two concepts are not coterminous.

²³ Jefferson's aforementioned reiteration of Locke's analysis of the prerequisites of effective legislatures was met by the Constitution's requirements that Congress meet at least once every year, and that its proceedings, including the voting behaviour of its members, be published.

The framers' initial distrust of populist sentiment was further emphasised by the electoral arrangements made for choosing the President and the legislators who staffed the two chambers of Congress. While members of the House were to be elected directly by electors in each State, Senators would be selected by each State's own legislative assembly, and the President would be chosen by an 'electoral college' of representatives from each State.

Thus two branches of the national government were to be placed in office by what was in effect an 'electorate within an electorate', whose members might be thought likely to (in Madison's words) 'refine and enlarge the public views'. Madison assumed that this elitist process would much reduce the possibility that the occupants of the most important national government offices would be motivated by 'temporary or partial considerations' when they performed the task of enacting and implementing laws made within the boundaries of their respective constitutional competence. But the Constitution took one further step in its efforts to guarantee that the federal and institutional separation of powers which the revolutionaries considered fundamental to the nation's long-term security and prosperity would be preserved against the threat of internal factions, even if that faction should be large enough to control the national law-making process.

Fundamental rights and a supra-legislative constitution

It perhaps sounds fatuous to record that the Americans assumed that their Constitution would function as a 'constituent' document, but the point is of considerable significance. The framers regarded the rules they had created as 'the highest form of law' within American society. The Constitution was the source of all governmental powers; its terms identified the fundamental moral and political principles according to which society should be managed.

Federalism was clearly a fundamental political value to the framers of the Constitution. This was evident not only in the proposed allocation of powers between the national and State governments, but also in the procedures through which the Constitution itself was to gain legal force. As Madison explained in The Federalist Papers No 39:

assent and ratification is to be given by the people, not as individuals composing one entire nation, but as composing the distinct and independent States to which they respectively belong.... The act, therefore, establishing the Constitution will not be a national but a federal act.²⁴

Constitutional values as fundamental law

Madison and the other architects of the Constitution rejected the Lockean notion of 'divine' law in the sense of considering human beings subservient to a rigid set of rules emanating from a deity. Similarly, they were not persuaded that the moral values which they wished to control the government of their new nation should be subject to an eternally fixed code of 'natural' law, which could never be altered. They nevertheless concluded that once they had succeeded in identifying the mutually acceptable principles according to which the foundations of government should be laid, those 'fundamental laws' should enjoy considerable fixity. The moral principles expressed in the Constitution had not lightly been arrived at: they were not lightly to be discarded; they were not to be left at the mercy of the ordinary institutions of government.

²⁴ Original emphasis.

But the framers were not so arrogant as to assume that the views they held in 1789–1791 amounted to eternal truths, which would control the government of American society forever. The federal Congress, the federal President, and the various State governments would all be bodies of limited legal competence: they possessed only those powers which 'the people' had granted to them in the Constitution, and had no capacity to create new powers for themselves. The ultimate, or sovereign legal authority, was 'the people'. If the Congress, or the President, or one or more of the States wished to acquire new powers, they would have to persuade 'the people' to amend the Constitution. The framers of the Constitution decided that 'the people' would express themselves for this purpose through a special law-making process, involving both the Congress and the States, which demanded extremely large majorities. Article 5 of the Constitution permits amendments only if proposed changes attract the support of a two-thirds majority of both houses of Congress and three quarters of the States.²⁵ Madison and his colleagues had concluded that the fundamental moral values identified in the Constitution had to be deeply entrenched within society's governmental structure.

'The people' was therefore not a law-making body that would be in constant, or even regular session. It would act only on those rare occasions when the overwhelming majority of members of Congress, and an even larger majority of the States, considered that the time had come for aspects of the country's fundamental laws to be altered. 'The people' was not an ordinary, but a quite extraordinary law-making body.

The Bill of Rights

The Constitution was in fact substantially altered almost as soon as it was introduced. The Constitution was adopted on the assumption that Congress' first task would be to formulate amendment proposals to send to the States for their approval.

Ten amendments, colloquially referred to as the 'Bill of Rights', were introduced in 1791. The first eight amendments listed various individual liberties (much influenced by the litany of complaints in the Declaration) with which the institutions of national government could not interfere. These need not be listed in their entirety here, but we might note some of their most important provisions. The First Amendment precluded Congress from enacting laws which abridged freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and freedom of religious belief. The Fourth Amendment forbade national government officials from conducting arbitrary searches of citizens' houses and seizing of their possessions. The Fifth Amendment prevented the national government from appropriating citizens' property, or interfering with their lives or liberty, without 'due process of law'. The Sixth Amendment guaranteed the right to trial by jury in criminal cases while the Eighth Amendment prohibited the infliction of 'cruel and unusual punishments'.

Madison and his supporters had initially argued that the 'Bill of Rights' was superfluous. Congress and the Presidency possessed only those powers which the Constitution had granted them. Since no powers had been given to infringe the 'liberties' listed in the Bill of Rights, the Constitution implicitly forbade the national government acting in such a manner. The Madisonian 'faction' was later convinced that giving such liberties explicit protection was a beneficial course to follow. In part this shift of position was for the tactical reason of assuaging opposition to the new Constitution and thereby facilitating its adoption. However Madison also accepted that the Bill of Rights would have an intrinsic, declaratory value, further emphasising the basic moral principles the revolution had been fought to defend. These provisions themselves could only be altered through the Article 5 amendment process.

²⁵ This somewhat oversimplifies the position, but the description is adequate for our limited purposes.

The importance which the framers accorded to maximising the political autonomy of the States within the Constitution's federal structure is illustrated by their decision to apply the provisions of the Bill of Rights only against the national government, not against the States. If the people of the States wished to impose similar restraints on their respective State governments, they were free to do so. Madison himself, once he accepted the desirability in principle of the Bill of Rights, had favoured its extension to State as well as Federal governments. He found little support for this argument either in Congress or among the States; nothing in the text of the first eight amendments indicated that they were to control the States as well as Congress and the Presidency.

The constitutional role of the Supreme Court

The Constitution could be no more than a framework document. It outlined the broad principles within which the government process should be conducted. It did not promulgate detailed rules which would provide answers to every foreseeable (or unforeseeable) problem that might arise. The framers anticipated that there would frequently be ambiguity concerning the national/State separation of powers. Alternatively, within the context of the Bill of Rights, doubt might arise as to whether a Congressional law or Presidential action 'abridged the freedom of the press', or imposed a 'cruel and unusual punishment'. The framers entrusted the task of answering such questions to the United States Supreme Court.

The intended role of the Supreme Court was outlined by Alexander Hamilton in The Federalist Papers No 78. Hamilton envisaged that the Court would serve as the ultimate arbiter of the meaning of the Constitution. 'The people' had intended that the Constitution would impose agreed limitations on the powers of government bodies, and in Hamilton's view:

Limitations of this kind can be preserved in practice no other way than through the medium of courts of justice, whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the Constitution void.

The Court would therefore stand:

between the people and the legislature, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority... A constitution is, in fact, and must be regarded by the judges as fundamental law... the Constitution ought to be preferred to the [legislature's] statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents.

This did not mean that the Supreme Court was to be in any sense 'superior' to the Congress:

It only supposes that the power of the people is superior to both, and that where the will of the legislature [or the Presidency]... stands in opposition to that of the people, the judges ought to be governed by the latter and not the former.

Unlike the Presidency, the legislature, or the States, the Court had 'neither sword nor purse'; the effectiveness of its judgments would depend not on any coercive power, but on their legitimacy, which we may construe as their capacity to convince the citizenry that they were in conformity with the meaning of the Constitution.

Great care would thus have to be exercised in selecting the judges who sat on the Supreme Court, for they bore a heavy constitutional burden. Hamilton suggested that:

there can be but few men in the society who will have sufficient skill in the laws to qualify them for the stations of judges. And making the proper deductions for the ordinary depravity of human nature, the number must be still smaller of those who unite the requisite integrity with the requisite knowledge.

The Constitution did not specify either the intellectual or moral qualifications that Supreme Court nominees should possess, but involved both the President and the Senate in their selection. The President would nominate candidates for judicial office, but his nominees could assume their seats only after receiving the approval of the Senate. The President could thus not ‘pack’ the Court with appointees who did not enjoy the confidence of the legislature, although a President and Senate majority who adhered to the same faction could do so. Hamilton had placed much emphasis on a pre-revolutionary custom or tradition, developed (as discussed in chapter three) within the British constitution, but corrupted in the colonies, that both politicians and the judiciary themselves should regard the courts’ ‘interpretation’ of the law as a matter above factional politics. Politicians should thus forswear considerations of personal or party advantage in selecting members of the judiciary, while the judges themselves should exclude such considerations from their judgments.

But the framers did not rely solely on Presidential and Congressional self-restraint to safeguard the independence of the Supreme Court. Once the Judges were in office, neither the President nor the Congress would be able to remove them simply because they disapproved of the decisions the Court subsequently reached. Unless convicted of criminal offences, or guilty of grossly immoral behaviour, Supreme Court Justices were to enjoy lifetime tenure, with payment of their salaries expressly guaranteed in the Constitution itself.²⁶

The significance of judicial power

The enormous power and responsibility entrusted to the Supreme Court under the American Constitution can be illustrated by returning to our hypothetical nations. If countries A and E had federal constitutions modeled on the initial American settlement, country A’s tax-raising law if enacted by the country’s Congress would seem to have been illegal as the Congress had no power to levy income tax. In contrast, the detention measures enacted by the Congress of nation E would seem a constitutional exercise of its war powers.

Suppose, however, that the Supreme Court of country A concluded that the law in question was in reality a measure to regulate commerce among the nation’s various States (a matter clearly within the national legislature’s competence) by stimulating economic growth, and the tax thereby raised was merely an incidental side effect. As such, the measure would be constitutional. Similarly let us suppose that the Supreme Court of country E held that the law introducing indefinite imprisonment without trial was cruel and unusual punishment and thereby breached the Eighth Amendment. Would we conclude that such judgments represented a judicial attempt to subvert the fundamental principles of the Constitution, or that they were a surprising but nevertheless defensible interpretation of an ambiguous constitutional text?

²⁶ Provisions which obviously met the Declaration’s aforementioned complaints as to the pre-revolutionary judiciary’s lack of independence.

It would be misleading to suggest that Supreme Court decisions which frustrated the wishes of the elected Congress or President were necessarily 'undemocratic' simply because the Judges themselves were not elected officials. Such accusations would have conclusive force only if one equates 'democracy' with a constitutional order which gives unfettered supremacy to a bare legislative majority. They would be less convincing if one took a view of 'democracy' which entailed the protection of 'higher laws' against the possibly transient and ill-informed views of the greater number of one's legislators. Within that constitutional context, accusations of 'anti-democratic' conduct might as readily be leveled at the elected politicians apparently seeking to subvert the wishes of 'the people' from whom their powers derived.

Conclusion

Over 200 years ago, it took a revolutionary war for the American colonists to rid themselves of what they considered to be an unacceptable constitutional order. The new constitution which the United States subsequently fashioned marked a radical departure from traditional British understandings of the appropriate way for a country to regulate the relationship between its people and its government. The principles adopted in the US Constitution have been widely copied by many nations which have created or redesigned their own constitutional arrangements in the modern era. Lest it be assumed that the Americans created an 'ideal' constitutional order, we might note that the framers preserved the institution of negro slavery by leaving its abolition to the individual States. Thus while slave-owners had 'property' (guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment) in their slaves, slaves themselves enjoyed no inalienable rights, either of a physical or spiritual nature. Jefferson, for whom all men were supposedly created equal, was himself a slave-owner. And those framers who found slavery morally abhorrent were prepared to tolerate its continued existence in the southern States rather than take the risk that some States would reject the new constitutional settlement.²⁷

But, as we shall begin to see in chapter two, the contemporary British constitution retains many important elements of the system which the Americans rejected as tyrannical and oppressive in 1776. In modern Britain, there is no likelihood of a violent revolution to overhaul our constitutional arrangements. The country has largely²⁸ avoided the difficulties posed by armed conflict between factions of its population for over 300 years. For some observers, that basic political reality might be sufficient grounds for concluding that there is no need even to question the adequacy of the constitution, still less to expend energy on proposals advocating fundamental reforms to its substance. Yet as we enter the twenty-first century, the workings of the constitution are the subject of wide-ranging and critical debate. We examine the sources and nature of that debate throughout the remainder of this book. The modest objective of this opening chapter has been to identify some of the general ideas we might use to evaluate Britain's existing constitutional arrangements. Chapter two turns to what many commentators regard as perhaps the most important part of Britain's constitutional heritage—the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty.

²⁷ See particularly Madison's Federalist Papers No 54; Du Bois W (1990) 'Slavery and the Founding Fathers', in Ollman and Birmbaum op cit: Kelly A, Harbison W and Belz H (1983) The American Constitution ch 14.

²⁸ This book does not address the history of Britain's relationship with Ireland. That history does demand that we qualify the notion of internal peace to an appreciable extent.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Bailyn B (1967) The ideological origins of the American revolution ch 2; pp 198–229

Madison J (1787) The federalist papers no. 10

(<<http://www.foundingfathers.info/federalistpapers/>>)

Hamilton A (1787) The federalist papers no.78

(<<http://www.foundingfathers.info/federalistpapers/>>)

Corwin E (1928) ‘The higher law background of American constitutional law (part I)’ Harvard LR 149

Holden B (1988) Understanding liberal democracy ch 1

Maier P (1963) ‘John Wilkes and American disillusionment with Britain’ William and Mary Quarterly 373

Case law and legislation

Marbury v Madison (1803) 1 Cranch 137

Chapter 2

Parliamentary Sovereignty

In analysing how constitutions work, it is helpful to think of ‘laws’ as a formal way in which a ‘democratic’ society expresses its consent to the way it is governed. If we recall chapter one’s references to the American revolution, we might say that the US Constitution is a clear example of a society making fundamental changes to its legal structures because its people no longer consented to their existing form of government.

The USA’s constitution reflect its architects’ commitment to what is regarded in many modern western societies as a basic, if contentious, point of democratic theory. Simply put, that principle asserts that in a democratic nation, the more important that a particular law is to the way that society is governed, the more difficult it should be for that law to be changed. One might suggest the reason for this is that it would be undesirable for fundamental laws to be vulnerable to reform which does not attract the ‘consent’ of the governed. The difficult questions facing designers of modern constitutions are: firstly, how much importance should one ascribe to particular values; secondly, how much consent should one need to change those values; and thirdly, how should that consent be expressed?

The terms of the United States’ Constitution can only be amended with the consent of two thirds of the members of the federal Congress and the legislatures of three quarters of the fifty states. Because this level of consent is difficult to obtain, the Constitution has been amended fewer than thirty times. This degree of permanence might justifiably lead us to say that the Constitution marks out stable legal boundaries which define the nature of the American people’s consent to the powers of their government. This does not mean that the USA’s Constitution invariably prevents a tyranny of the majority—but it precludes a tyranny of minorities and of small majorities.

Most law-making in the USA takes place within the boundaries of consent outlined by the Constitution. These laws affect issues which are not fundamental to society’s basic values, and so can be changed in less difficult ways. Some can be altered by the Congress, some by individual States. A straightforward majority vote in the particular legislature is often enough to change those laws not regarded as essential to society’s continued welfare.

Pre-1688—natural or divine law

The American system protects fundamental values by making their reform subject to a cumbersome, super-majoritarian law-making process. An analysis of early-seventeenth-century English case law reveals several judgments in which the courts suggested that there were certain values that were so fundamental to the English constitution that they could not be changed at all. These principles are perhaps analogous to the ‘inalienable rights’ of which Thomas Jefferson spoke in the US Declaration of Independence. Some judges seemed ready to suggest that there was a system of ‘natural law’ or ‘divine law’ which limited what the various branches of government might do.

For example in *Dr Bonham’s Case*¹ in 1610, Chief Justice Coke had said:

And it appears in our books, that in many cases, the common law will control Acts of Parliament, and sometime adjudge them to be utterly void: for when an Act of Parliament is against common right or reason, or repugnant, or impossible to be performed, the common law will control it, and adjudge such Act to be void.

Five years later, in Day v Savadge, Chief Justice Hobart concluded that; ‘even an Act of Parliament, made against natural equity, as to make a man judge in his own case, is void in itself, for jura naturae sunt immutabilia, and they are leges legum.’² Similarly in 653 in R v Love, Keble J had pronounced that; ‘Whatsoever is not consonant to the law of God, or to right reason which is maintained by scripture, . . . be it Acts of Parliament, customs, or any judicial acts of the Court, it is not the law of England’.³

The intricacies of the legal arguments expounded in these cases need not detain us here. The point to stress is that there have been periods in English constitutional history when it seems that it was widely believed that there were basic moral or political principles that it was not within the power of any number of the people, through any type of law-making process, to change in any way at all; and that the substance of those principles would be protected by the courts.⁴

The Diceyan (or orthodox) theory

Modern Britain does not have such a complex constitutional structure. We no longer recognise the natural law doctrines of the seventeenth century. And unlike the Americans, we have not accepted that fundamental constitutional values should be safeguarded by a complex and difficult amendment process. The ‘basic principle’ of the British constitution can be summed up in a fairly bald statement. A statute, that is a piece of legislation produced by Parliament, is regarded as the highest form of law within the British constitutional structure. The British Parliament, it is said, is a sovereign law-maker.

¹ (1610) 8 Co Rep 114a at 118a. The case concerned legislation passed in 1561, which gave the College of Physicians in London monopolistic control over the practice of medicine in London.

² (1614) Hob 85; 80 ER 235 at 237. Loosely translated, the maxim means that: ‘natural law is immutable and the highest form of law’. The case concerned, prosaically, trespass to a bag of nutmegs. The legal point in issue was whether a governmental body could act as a judge in a cause to which it was also a party even if it appeared to have been given that competence by statute.

³ (1653) 5 State Tr 825 at 828.

⁴ The cautious language indicates that commentators hold divergent views as to the principles that Coke and his fellow judges were espousing. Several analysts suggest that Bonham is merely advancing an unusual rule of statutory interpretation; see Thorne S (1938) ‘Dr Bonham’s case’ LQR 543; Plucknett T (1928) ‘Doctor Bonham’s Case and judicial review’ Harvard LR 30. In contrast see Dike C (1976) ‘The case against parliamentary sovereignty’ Public Law 283; Maitland F (1908) The constitutional history of England at p 300; ‘It is always difficult to pin Coke to a theory, but he does seem to claim distinctly that the common law is above the statute’.

Goldsworthy’s recent study—(1999) The sovereignty of Parliament—should now perhaps serve as the primary point of reference on seventeenth-century understandings and practice. Goldsworthy’s critique also subscribes to the view that Coke was asserting a power of interpretation rather than invalidation of statutory provisions; see especially ibid ch 5.

In describing this concept of parliamentary sovereignty, we draw mainly on two sources. The first is the political events of the late seventeenth century, when England experienced its last civil war.⁵ The second is a legal theory articulated in the 1880s by an Oxford law professor, A V Dicey, in the first edition of a celebrated textbook, An introduction to the study of the law of the constitution.

Dicey wields an enormous influence on British constitutional law. This is in many senses rather unfortunate. Some of the political views which Dicey held when The law of the constitution was first published would be considered entirely unacceptable from a contemporary moral standpoint. Dicey certainly did not approve of democracy as that concept is now understood. For example, he was very much opposed to allowing women or the working class to vote in parliamentary elections.⁶ Nevertheless, it is important to understand the basic features of his theory. Dicey suggested that the concept of parliamentary sovereignty has two parts—a positive limb and a negative limb.

The positive and negative limbs of Dicey's theory

The principle articulated in the positive limb of the Diceyan theory of parliamentary sovereignty is that Parliament can make or unmake any law whatsoever. If a majority of members of the House of Commons approve a particular Bill, and this is then approved by both a majority of members in the House of Lords and by the Monarch, that Bill becomes an Act,⁷ irrespective of its contents. In legal terms there are no limits to the substance of statute law; Parliament can make any law that it wishes. Nor does it matter how big the majority is in support of a particular measure; an Act passed by a majority of one in both the Commons and Lords is as authoritative as legislation which receives unanimous support. Relatedly, no distinction is drawn between 'ordinary' and 'constitutional' (or 'fundamental') law. Parliament legislates in the same way for trivial matters as it does in respect of vitally important issues.

The proposition advanced in the negative limb is that the legality of an Act of Parliament cannot be challenged in a court. There is no mechanism within the British constitution for declaring an Act of Parliament legally invalid. Dicey's theory rejects the idea that the courts could invoke natural law or divine law to conclude that a statute was 'unconstitutional': the substantive moral content of legislation is in legal terms irrelevant. In the Diceyan theory of the constitution, there is no higher form of law than the will of Parliament as expressed in the text of an Act.⁸

The negative and positive limbs of Dicey's theory offer us a simple principle upon which to base an analysis of the constitution. As we examine the subject further, it will become evident that the picture is not quite as clear as Dicey's modern day disciples would suggest. But before examining criticisms of this orthodox theory, it is useful to consider the sources which contemporary adherents to Dicey's thesis invoke to support his arguments. Why have we accepted that statute is the highest form of law?

⁵ For a helpful introduction to the period from the perspective of its constitutional significance see Wicks E (2006) The evolution of a constitution ch 1.

⁶ See McEldowney J (1985) 'Dicey in historical perspective', in McAuslan P and McEldowney J (eds) Law, legitimacy and the constitution: Loughlin M (1992) Public law and political theory ch 7.

⁷ The terms 'Act', 'statute' and 'legislation' are used interchangeably.

⁸ Cf Dicey op cit at p 39: "These then are the three traits of Parliamentary sovereignty as it exists in England: first, the power of the legislature to alter any law, fundamental or otherwise, as freely and in the same manner as other laws; secondly, the absence of any legal distinction between constitutional and other laws; thirdly, the non-existence of any judicial or other authority having the right to nullify an Act of Parliament, or to treat it as void or unconstitutional".

The political source of parliamentary sovereignty—the ‘glorious revolution’

When analysing contemporary constitutional practice, it is often helpful to consider the events of 1688. The central theme of seventeenth century British political history is a struggle for power between the House of Commons and House of Lords and the Monarchy. In its most acute form, the conflict produced the civil war, the execution of Charles I, the brief rule of Oliver Cromwell, the restoration of Charles II to the throne, the subsequent overthrow of his brother, James II, in 1688, and the installation of William of Orange and his wife Mary as joint monarchs.⁹ But less dramatically, seventeenth-century England was continually beset by squabbles between the King, Commons and Lords over the extent of their respective powers. This argument was waged as frequently in the courts as on the battlefield: both the King and the respective houses of Parliament hoped that the courts would supply rulings which favoured their own preferences. As chapter four suggests, the courts switched their allegiance in these disputes as expediency and principle demanded. But on some occasions they struck an independent line; in the natural or divine law cases mentioned earlier, the judges were effectively saying that neither Acts of Parliament nor the actions of the Monarch were supreme. Both were subject to the laws of God and nature, and of course only the judges could identify the content of these immutable principles. In functionalist terms, this principle would have made the judiciary the ‘highest source of law’ within the English constitution.

Such reasoning did not commend itself to the Stuart monarchs, who believed in the doctrine of the divine right of kings.¹⁰ The doctrine placed complete legal authority in the King himself. James I explained the rationale behind this theory in 1610:

Kings are not only God’s lieutenants on earth...but even by God himself they are called Gods....[They] exercise a manner or resemblance of divine power on earth.... they make and unmake their subjects; they have power of raising and casting down; of life and of death; judges over all their subjects, and in all causes, and yet accountable to none but God only.

James I would have rejected any assertion that this claimed power amounted to tyranny, for he considered himself bound by an oath he took upon his coronation to exercise his powers in accordance with the laws of the land. Yet since he also claimed the power to alter such laws at will, the substantive value of the oath was limited. The previous Tudor dynasty, in which the foundations of a recognisably modern government structure were laid,¹¹ made no such sweeping claims. Nor was James’ doctrine uncontested by the Commons and the Lords. Both bodies invoked constitutional principles of considerable antiquity to limit the Stuart kings’ effective legal powers.

Since the signing of the Magna Carta in the thirteenth century it had been accepted that the King could not levy taxation without ‘Parliament’s’ approval.¹² The production of the Magna Carta could be compared to the American revolution in some respects. Both events represented a severe rupture in the fabric of society’s previously dominant political values. They signalled that the present government no longer commanded the consent

⁹ Readers might usefully refer to the following sources for further information: Wicks (2006) op cit ch 1; Russell C (1971) The crisis of Parliaments; Hutton R (1985) The Restoration; Underdown D (1985) Revel, riot, and rebellion; Speck W (1986) Reluctant revolutionaries; Miller J (1983) The glorious revolution.

¹⁰ See Plucknett T (11th edn, 1960) Taswell-Langmead’s English constitutional history pp 329–333.

¹¹ See Elton G (1953) The Tudor revolution in government; Loach J (1990) Parliament under the Tudors.

¹² Article 14 of Magna Carta. ‘Parliament’ did not then exist in a recognisably modern form; Article 14 refers to ‘the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and greater barons, by writ addressed to each severally, and all other tenants in capite by a general writ addressed to the sheriff of each shire’. One can discern here the outline of the subsequent distinction between the Lords and the Commons.

of ‘the people’, and they led to the digging of new political foundations upon which the constitution’s legal structure was based. Magna Carta was not a democratic constitutional settlement as we now understand the term.¹³ It simply transferred some powers from one person, the King, to the few aristocrats who effectively controlled ‘Parliament’.¹⁴ Nevertheless, Magna Carta broadened, albeit very slightly, the basis of consent required to make law in English society. The Monarch’s grip on the reins of constitutional power remained particularly firm because she retained the personal legal power (or ‘prerogative’) to summon and dissolve Parliament when she thought fit.

By 1600, the Commons and Lords had become increasingly reluctant to approve taxes without a guarantee that Monarchs accepted limits on their personal powers. Although (as chapter four notes) the Stuart Monarchs found ways to subvert this principle, Charles II and James II generally sought to govern the country by proclamation or prerogative powers, bypassing Parliament and entrusting the administration of government to their own appointees. This became very difficult whenever the Crown needed money above and beyond its own resources—whenever it wanted to go to war for example.

The Triennial Act of 1641 was a measure passed by Parliament which purportedly required the Monarch to summon Parliament at least once every three years. Yet, following the restoration of the Stuart Monarchy in 1660, Charles II did not regard himself as obliged to obey its terms. The many causes of the 1688 revolution cannot sensibly be addressed in detail here. It is nevertheless clear that James II’s evident contempt for the (admittedly limited) notion of citizen ‘consent’ to the government process, made apparent by his disinclination to allow Parliament to sit on a regular basis,¹⁵ was a major contributor to his eventual downfall.

The complaints of the English revolutionaries were outlined in the 1688 ‘Declaration of Right’, the broad thrust of which was that: ‘the late King James, by the assistance of diverse evil counsellors, judges, and ministers employed by him, did endeavour to subvert and extirpate the Protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of this kingdom’.

Like the American revolutionaries’ Declaration of Independence, the English revolutionaries’ Declaration of Right supported its general accusation with numerous specific charges, and the similarities between the two documents extended to matters of substance as well as methodology. James II had allegedly infringed upon the ‘liberties’ of the English people in, inter alia, the following ways:¹⁶

- By levying money for and to the use of the Crown by pretence of prerogative for other time and in other manner than ... granted by Parliament;
- By assuming and exercising a power of dispensing with and suspending of laws and the execution of laws without consent of Parliament;
- By violating the freedom of elections of members to serve in Parliament;
- By raising and keeping a standing army within this kingdom in time of peace without consent of Parliament and quartering soldiers contrary to law;
- Corrupt and unqualified persons have been returned and served on juries in trials;
- And excessive fines have been imposed and illegal and cruell punishments inflicted.

¹³ Professor John Millar argued for example that Magna Carta was intended ‘to establish the privileges of a few individuals. A great tyrant on one side [King John], and a set of petty tyrants on the other, seem to have divided the kingdom, and the great body of people, disregarded and oppressed on all hands, were beholden for any privileges bestowed on them, to the jealousy of their masters’ (1803) Historical view vol II pp 80–81, quoted in Loughlin (1992) op cit p 7.

¹⁴ On the events leading to the signing of Magna Carta, and the terms of the document itself see Plucknett (1960) op cit ch 4.

¹⁵ See Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 524–526.

¹⁶ The following quotations are actually drawn from the Bill of Rights of 1688, a statute passed by the post-revolutionary Parliament. The phraseology of the Declaration and the Bill of Rights is virtually identical; Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 447–450.

The 1688 revolution, like Magna Carta and the Civil War before it, marked the crossing of a political watershed. A new political ‘contract’¹⁷ was struck between Parliament and the Monarchy, and consequently a new constitutional foundation was laid. Having deposed James II, the victorious revolutionaries offered the throne to James II’s (protestant) daughter Mary and her (protestant) husband, William Prince of Orange.¹⁸ In return for the throne, William and Mary accepted that the Crown’s ability to govern the English nation through its prerogative powers would be severely limited. The Monarch might still be responsible for governing the country, and she/he could appoint the Ministers who would assist her in carry out that task, but the Monarch and her Ministers would govern the country according to laws defined by Parliament. And if Parliament changed the law, the Monarch’s government would have to respond accordingly.

The initial ‘terms’ of the contract were specified in the text of the Bill of Rights produced by the Parliament of 1689. Those terms address directly the complaints made in the Declaration of Right:¹⁹

1. That the pretended power of suspending of laws or the execution of laws by regall authority without consent of Parliament is illegal;
13. And that for redresse of all grievances and for the amending, strengthening and preserving of the laws Parliaments ought to be held frequently;
8. That elections of members of Parliament ought to be free;
9. That the freedome of speech, and debates or proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament;
4. That levying of money for or to the use of the Crown by pretence of prerogative without grant of Parliament... is illegal;
6. That the raising or keeping of a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace unlesse it be with consent of Parliament is against law;
11. That jurors ought to be duly impannelled and returned...
10. That excessive bail ought not to be required nor excessive fines imposed nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted.

Once enacted in the Bill of Rights, these moral principles would possess a superior legal status to any personal legal powers retained by the Monarchy. Furthermore, in addition to placing the Monarch’s prerogative powers beneath statute in the hierarchy of constitutional importance, the 1688 revolution is generally regarded as having settled the question of the relationship between Parliament and the courts.²⁰ The notion aired in Dr Bonham’s Case and R v Love that ‘natural’ or ‘divine’ law provided the courts with a constitutional authority superior to statute was disregarded. And it was also assumed that the common law was subordinate in terms of its legal authority to legislation. We examine the constitutional importance of the royal prerogative and the common law further in chapter four; the basic principle to remember at this point is that both are assumed to be less important than statute.

Despite the evident similarities between the functional underpinnings of the Declaration of Independence and the Declaration of Right, the English revolutionary settlement expressed in the 1688 Bill of Rights is substantially different from the American settlement articulated in the 1789–1791 Constitution.

¹⁷ See Slaughter T (1981) ‘“Abdicate” and “contract” in the Glorious Revolution’ 24 The Historical Journal 323; Miller J (1982) ‘The Glorious Revolution: “contract” and “abdication” reconsidered’ 25 The Historical Journal 541.

¹⁸ Who was also James II’s nephew.

¹⁹ The numbers are those used in the Bill itself; they have been re-ordered thematically here.

²⁰ See Goldsworthy (1999) op cit pp 159–166.

While the American revolutionaries presumed that sovereignty should lie with the American 'people', their English predecessors assumed that sovereignty would rest with 'Parliament'. The terms of the Bill of Rights could not be regarded as a constituent framework for the country's subsequent governance in the legal sense provided for by the Constitution in the United States.

This is not to say that the English revolutionaries were less sincere in the moral principles they expressed than were the Americans were. Rather it means that there was nothing 'special' in the legal sense about the terms of the English settlement. Parliament, as the country's sovereign law-making power, was competent to alter, repeal or add to the supposedly 'fundamental' provisions of the Bill of Rights whenever it chose, through exactly the same process as it might enact laws on the most trivial subject. The British Bill of Rights was not secured against attack by the national legislature in the same way as its American namesake was protected against infringement by Congress. Parliament was England's ordinary as well as extraordinary legislature. It would sit in regular, perhaps almost constant session. And it alone would wield all the law-making powers that were subsequently so carefully and elaborately divided by Madison and his colleagues among the Presidency, the Congress, the States and the people of the United States.

Moreover, England was a unitary rather than federal state. If people in geographically discrete parts of the country wished to be governed in different ways, in order to reflect local traditions or political sentiments, they could be so only with Parliament's permission. Parliament could pass legislation designating the boundaries of any sub-central units of government in England, determining the powers such bodies might possess, and specifying the manner in which the officials running them were to be chosen. And Parliament might change its mind on such matters whenever it chose and enact a new statute containing different provisions. There were no constitutional rights which a citizen or group of citizens could expect the English courts to enforce against Parliament, for the wishes of Parliament were 'the highest form of law' known to the English constitution.

That the American revolutionaries framed their rebellion against Britain's post-revolutionary constitution in much the same terms as the architects of that constitution framed their own complaints against the Stuart Kings ninety years earlier might suggest that the 1688 settlement had not provided effective protection for 'the liberties of the people'. We might therefore wonder if the sovereignty of Parliament, a constitutional device created to safeguard the nation and its empire against the tyranny of its King, had succeeding merely in transferring tyrannical authority into different hands? In what sense, if any, did the English revolution ensure that the laws of England enjoyed the consent of the governed?

What is (was) 'Parliament'?

The 1688 Parliament was not 'representative' of the English population as we would now understand that term. But it would be rash to dismiss the principles underlying the 1688 settlement too quickly. In some ways it was based on ideas that we might consider valid today. It is important to clarify what the revolutionaries of 1688 meant by the institution of 'Parliament' for instance. Parliament was not a single body, but had three parts: the House of Commons, the House of Lords, and the Monarch. At that time, all three parts of Parliament had equal powers within the law-making process. If one part refused to approve a Bill, that Bill could not become law.

From a modern day perspective, we might think that the 1688 Parliament simply represented the views of elite groups and effectively excluded the mass of the population from any means of consenting to the law-making process. However some late seventeenth century political theorists sincerely believed that a Parliament composed of these three bodies was the most effective way to secure that laws accurately expressed the national interest.²¹ We should recall that Jefferson used a very selective definition of ‘the people’ in the Declaration of Independence; for law-making purposes, many poor men, all women and all slaves were not ‘people’ in late eighteenth-century America. Similarly, in seventeenth-century England, it was assumed that only the King, the aristocracy, the Church, and the affluent merchant and landowning class which elected members of the House of Commons, had any legitimate role to play in fashioning the laws within which society was governed. Orthodox political theory argued that the Commons, the Lords, and the Monarch formed the three ‘Estates of the Realm’. These estates, acting in concert, were presumed to be the only legitimate arbiters of the national interest.

So the 1688 settlement could be perceived as democratic in a primitive sense of the term; not because it gave all citizens a role in the law-making process, but because it gave such a role to everyone who was presumed entitled to participate. This might be seen as a more extreme version of Madison’s subsequent advocacy of elitist representative assemblies, staffed only by legislators who could be trusted to act in the national interest. But the 1688 settlement had a further purpose in mind. The objective of the 1688 revolution was to create a ‘balanced’ law-making process within a ‘balanced’ constitution.²² Because Acts of Parliament could only be made if the Commons, Lords, and King agreed with each other, the legislature could not produce statutes which represented the interests of only one or two of the three Estates of the Realm.²³ This supposed solution to the problem of potentially tyrannical law-makers did not spring, Athena like, from the heads of the 1688 revolutionaries. Rather it represented the culmination of a long process of theorisation and practice which had exercised the minds of philosophers and politicians throughout the seventeenth century.²⁴

We should also remember that the Parliament of 1688 was not organised along party political lines. There were some fairly firm party based alliances among groups of members;²⁵ but the seventeenth century Parliament was intended to function as an arena both for local interests to be aired and for discussion of national priorities—the House of Commons was initially conceived as the House of Communities. Many individual members came to the Commons as representatives not of a political party, but of their town or county.

From a contemporary perspective, one might readily ask how the formal structure of our constitution has responded to changing definitions of ‘the people’, and to what we might call the growing ‘nationalisation’ of politics? As chapter seven will explain, it is now ²¹ See particularly Judson M (1936) ‘Henry Parker and the theory of parliamentary sovereignty’, in Wittke C (ed) Essays in history and political theory in honour of Charles Howard McIlwain. For an overview of the debate, on both sides of the Atlantic, see Bailyn op cit pp 198–229; and Goldsworthy op cit pp 109–124.

²² See Vile M (1967) Constitutionalism and the separation of powers ch 3.

²³ Contemporary commentators expressed the principle in more hyperbolic language; ‘Lest... the Crown should lead towards arbitrary government, or the tumultuary licentiousness of the people should incline towards a democracy, the wisdom of our ancestors hath instituted a middle state of nobility... The excellence of this government consists in the due balance of the several constituent parts of it, for if either one of them should be too hard for the other two, there is an actual dissolution of the constitution’; Trenchard J and Moyle W (1697) An argument showing that a standing army is inconsistent with a free government, quoted in Miller (1983) op cit p 114.

²⁴ Perhaps the most helpful survey is offered in Sharp A (1983) Political ideas of the English civil war.

²⁵ Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 436–438. For some estimate of the strength of recognisably modern party loyalties in the revolution Parliament see Horwitz H (1974) ‘Parliament and the glorious revolution’ Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research 36–52; Plumb J (1937) ‘Elections to the Convention Parliament of 1689’ Cambridge Historical Journal 235.

a fundamental tenet of modern British society that virtually every adult is entitled to vote in parliamentary elections. It is also clear that parliamentary elections are contested by nationally organised political parties, and are won and lost primarily on national rather than local issues. It might seem obvious that a constitutional structure designed to adduce the consent of a tiny minority of the small population of an agrarian country would be ill-suited to securing the consent of some forty million people in a modern industrialised society. It is perhaps instructive to observe for instance that no other modern democracy has fully copied the British constitutional model: the American system has proved much the more influential blueprint. But in many respects, the formal constitutional principles which emerged as a result of political revolution in England at the end of the seventeenth century remain largely unchanged today. And it is probably accurate to say that parliamentary sovereignty is the most important of those unchanged principles. It is therefore important that we begin to consider the ways in which the doctrine has been both criticised and vindicated in more recent times.

I. Legal authority for the principle of parliamentary sovereignty

Our constitution no longer offers any role for the courts to invoke natural law or common law as a source of legal authority having a higher constitutional status than Acts of Parliament. One must look very hard to find any suggestion that after 1688 the courts entertained the idea that statutes might be invalidated if they conflicted with natural law. The 1701 case of *City of London v Wood*²⁶ offers some, albeit confused, support for the Bonham principle. At one point, Holt CJ argued that:

What my Lord Coke says in Dr Bonham's Case is far from any extravagancy, for it is a very reasonable and true saying, that if an Act of Parliament should ordain the same person should be party and judge, it would be a void Act of Parliament.²⁷

But having offered this apparent support for Coke's ideas, Holt CJ concluded that; 'an Act of Parliament can do no wrong, though it may do several things that look pretty odd'.²⁸ So contradictory a judgment cannot be considered a powerful authority for natural law ideas. Nor can one find more helpful precedents in the post-revolutionary case law.²⁹ The principle was last seen in Forbes v Cochrane in 1824, when the Court suggested it would not enforce a law permitting slavery, as this would be 'against the law of nature and God'.³⁰

²⁶ (1701) 12 Mod Rep 669. See Plucknett (1928) op cit.

²⁷ (1701) 12 Mod Rep 669 at 687.

²⁸ Ibid, at 688.

²⁹ Readers interested in exploring the esoterica of post-revolutionary natural law jurisprudence might consult R v Inhabitants of Cumberland (1795) 6 Term Rep 194 and Leigh v Kent (1789) 3 Term Rep 362.

³⁰ (1824) 2 B & C 448 at 470; 107 ER 450. Forbes sued Cochrane for the price (£3,800) of thirty-eight slaves (legally owned by Forbes under Spanish law) who had escaped from Spanish territory during an Anglo-Spanish war on to a British ship under Cochrane's command. The issue before the Court was whether English common law should afford a remedy to a slave-owner in such circumstances. The Court concluded that neither common law nor statute gave such a remedy. In a comment which was not strictly necessary to the outcome of the case, Best J observed that:

If indeed, there had been any express law, commanding us to recognise those [ie a slave-owner's] rights, we might then have been called upon to consider the propriety of that which has been said by the great commentator on the laws of this country, 'That if any human law should allow or injoin us to commit an offence against the divine law, we are bound to transgress that human law'.

Yet nor will one find much case law prior to 1800 which lends explicit support to the idea of parliamentary sovereignty. In his celebrated Commentaries, first published in 1765, Blackstone drew the following conclusion about the constitutional status of legislation:

I know it is generally laid down... that acts of parliament contrary to reason are void. But if the parliament will positively enact a thing to be done which is unreasonable, I know of no power that can control it... for that were to set the judicial power above that of the legislature, which would be subversive of all government.³¹

As noted in chapter one, the American colonists were contemporaneously trying to fashion a constitutional order which avoided the problem of subversion by setting the power of the people above both legislature and judiciary. Blackstone was manifestly unimpressed by such theorisation, but one might also note that he could find little direct judicial authority for his proposition as to Parliament's supremacy.³² The dearth of authority may be because everybody took it for granted that this was the way things were; sometimes the most important values are those which go unspoken and unexamined. However, several strands of case law supporting the orthodox understanding of parliamentary sovereignty appear in the nineteenth century. The first deals with 'the enrolled bill rule'.

Substance or procedure? the enrolled Bill rule

The plaintiff in *Edinburgh and Dalkeith Rly Co v Wauchope*³³ was a landowner affected by a private Act of Parliament³⁴ authorising construction of a railway. He claimed that the Court should invalidate the legislation because its promoters had not given notice to affected parties in accordance with the House of Commons' standing orders which regulated its internal procedures in respect of such measures. Lord Campbell thought that judging the constitutional adequacy of proceedings in either the Commons or the Lords was entirely beyond the court's powers:

All that a court... can do is to look to the Parliamentary Roll: if from that it should appear that a Bill has passed both Houses and received the Royal Assent, no court... can inquire into the mode in which it was introduced... or what passed... during its progress in its various stages through Parliament.³⁵

A similar conclusion on similar facts was reached in Lee v Bude and Torrington Junction Rly Co where Wile J commented that; 'if an Act of Parliament has been obtained improperly it is for the legislature to correct it by repealing it; but so long as it exists as law, the Courts are bound to obey it'.³⁶

This principle was also forcefully restated by the House of Lords in 1974 in British Railways Board v Pickin.³⁷ Mr Pickin alleged that British Rail had steered a private Bill through Parliament without giving the necessary notices to affected landowners. Somewhat surprisingly, the Court of Appeal thought this raised a triable issue: Lord Denning indicated that one could draw a valid distinction between public Bills and

The 'great commentator' is Sir William Blackstone; the quotation is from (1765) Blackstone's Commentaries on the laws of England Vol 1, p 42.

³¹ Ibid, at 62.

³² There is an ambiguous endorsement of this position in Thornby d Duchess of Hamilton v Fleetwood (1712) 10 Mod 114. See also Grate Charte Parish and Kennington Parish (1742) 2 Stra 1173.

³³ (1842) 8 Cl & Fin 710, 8 ER 279, HL.

³⁴ On the distinction between private and public Acts of Parliament see 'Private Members Bills', ch 5, pp 135–136 below.

³⁵ Ibid, at 285.

³⁶ (1871) LR 6 CP 576 at 582.

³⁷ [1974] AC 765, HL.

private Bills.³⁸ That view was rapidly overruled by the House of Lords. Lord Reid explicitly denied that the courts had any power to question the legality of a Bill's passage through Parliament: 'the whole trend of authority for over a century is clearly against permitting such an investigation'.³⁹ In Lord Simon's opinion:

a concomitant of the sovereignty of Parliament is that the houses of Parliament enjoy certain privileges.... Among the privileges of the Houses of Parliament is the exclusive right to determine their own proceedings.⁴⁰

The enrolled Bill rule has been widely construed as unambiguously affirming the principle of parliamentary sovereignty. Whether this view is analytically defensible (in either formal or functionalist terms) is a question to which we shall return. For the moment, we consider a second series of cases, setting out what has come to be known as the 'doctrine of implied repeal'.

The doctrine of implied repeal

*Vauxhall Estates Ltd v Liverpool Corpn*⁴¹ and *Ellen Street Estates Ltd v Minister of Health*⁴² both focused on the Acquisition of Land Act 1919, a slum clearance measure which laid down levels of compensation for property owners whose houses were demolished. The Housing Acts of 1925 and 1930 made these provisions less generous. The landowners affected sought to have compensation assessed on the basis used in the 1919 Act.

The landowners seized on s 7 of the 1919 Act. This said that any Act affecting compensation provisions would 'cease to have or shall not have effect' (emphasis added) if inconsistent with the 1919 legislation. That phraseology is arguably looking towards future Acts as well as those already existing. But the plaintiffs did not argue that the 1919 Act was completely protected from amendment by a subsequent Parliament. Instead they drew a distinction between express and implied repeal.

The landowners conceded that if a subsequent Act said expressly that the 1919 Act was overturned, the courts could not challenge the new Act's effect. However, they argued that the courts could safeguard the 1919 Act against accidental or implied repeal; if Parliament did not expressly say it was changing a statute that seemed to have been intended to prevent future amendment, the court should assume that the original Act should be upheld.

This argument reaches out towards constitutional principles founded on consent theory. It suggests that it would be unconstitutional to allow legislation to have unintended effects because 'the people' could not have knowingly consented to the law that had been passed. This seems to offer a variation on the theme of 'functionalist' approaches to parliamentary sovereignty; if that function is to ensure that laws enjoy the consent of the governed, it would be logical to assume that the courts should not permit Parliament to enact legislation premised on false information.

The argument reached the Court of Appeal in Ellen Street—where it was unconditionally dismissed. The courts rejected any notion of a functionalist interpretation of the parliamentary sovereignty doctrine. The judges adopted instead a formalist approach. That formal rule simply demanded that the courts unquestioningly obey the most recent Act of Parliament. And if that Act appeared inconsistent with previous legislation, the ³⁸ This distinction is addressed in ch 5. ³⁹ [1974] AC 765 at 788.

⁴⁰ Ibid, at 788–789. We address the 'privileges of Parliament' in ch 8.

⁴¹ [1932] 1 KB 733.

⁴² [1934] 1 KB 590, CA.

previous legislation must give way.⁴³ Questions about the existence of the people's consent, or Parliament's unspoken intentions, were not something the courts would entertain.

Scrutton LJ dismissed the landowners' argument as:

[A]bsolutely contrary to the constitutional position that Parliament can alter an Act previously passed, and it can do so by repealing in terms the previous Act—[the plaintiff] agrees that it can do so—and it can do it also in another way—namely, by enacting a provision which is clearly inconsistent with the previous Act.⁴⁴

Maugham LJ was similarly unreceptive:

The Legislature cannot, according to our constitution, bind itself as to the form of subsequent legislation, and it is impossible for Parliament to enact that in a subsequent statute dealing with the same subject matter there can be no implied repeal. If in a subsequent statute Parliament makes it plain that the earlier statute is being to some extent repealed, effect must be given to that intention just because it is the will of the Legislature.⁴⁵

Despite the vigour with which the Court of Appeal delivered its opinion, it could not draw on much past case law to support its proposition. The main precedent it relied on was the decision in Vauxhall Estates two years earlier. That seems a flimsy legal base on which to build so important a constitutional principle.⁴⁶ We can however find a further line of supportive decisions in cases dealing with the relationship between British statutes and international law.

Inconsistency with international law

The first case we might consider is Mortensen v Peters.⁴⁷ One of the most important areas of international law relates to defining the extent of a country's jurisdiction over the oceans by which it is surrounded. By 1906, most nations had accepted that their respective jurisdictions should extend for three miles from their coastline and had signed treaties with each other to that effect. In 1889, the British Parliament passed the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act. This Act gave Scotland's Fishery Board the power to make bye-laws to control fishing in the Moray Firth. Much of the Moray Firth is more than three miles from land, so the 1889 Act would seem inconsistent with international law obligations to which Britain was party.

Mortensen was the captain of a Norwegian trawler. He was arrested for breaching the bye-laws that the Fishery Board had made. His defence was that the Act was 'unconstitutional' because it breached accepted international law standards, and therefore had no legal effect. The Court peremptorily dismissed this argument:

In this Court we have nothing to do with... whether an act of the legislature is ultra vires as in contravention of generally acknowledged principles of international law. For us, an Act of Parliament duly passed by Lords and Commons and assented to by the King, is supreme, and we are bound to give effect to its terms.⁴⁸

⁴³ The rule is sometimes expressed in the Latin maxim 'lex posterior derogat priori' (a later law overrules an earlier one). ⁴⁴ [1934] 1 KB 590 at 595–6.

⁴⁵ [1934] 1 KB 590 at 597.

⁴⁶ See Marshall G (1954) 'What is Parliament? The changing concept of Parliamentary Sovereignty' Political Studies 193. ⁴⁷ (1906) 14 SLT 227.

⁴⁸ Ibid, at 230. The term ultra vires literally means 'beyond the legal powers'. If a body is legally sovereign, nothing can be beyond its powers. The ultra vires doctrine thus could not be applied to Parliament, but as we shall see in subsequent chapters, it has an important role in respect of other governmental organisations.

This conclusion is entirely consistent with both traditional Diceyan theory and the political outcome of the 1688 revolution. Under Britain's constitutional arrangements, treaties are negotiated and formally entered into by the Crown (or 'the government') through its prerogative powers, not by Parliament. Orthodox constitutional theory maintains that a treaty signed by the British government can only have legal effect in Britain if it is incorporated into British law by an Act of Parliament. This is a logical consequence of the parliamentary sovereignty doctrine. The 1688 revolution produced an agreement between William of Orange and Parliament which provided that the constitutional role of the King's government was to govern within the laws made by Parliament. The government itself could not create new laws simply by coming to an agreement with foreign countries. If one allowed that to happen, one would essentially be saying that it is the government rather than Parliament that is the sovereign law-maker, as the government could bypass the refusal of the Commons and/or the Lords to consent to its proposed laws.

Quite how much effect a particular Treaty might have within domestic law would be a matter for Parliament to determine. The notion of 'incorporation' is a broad one, and really means no more than that Parliament has chosen to enact a statute which provides some indigenous legal force for some or all of the political principles agreed by the countries which signed the Treaty. In 'incorporating' international law into the domestic legal system, Parliament could make whatever choice it wished on such matters as which parts of the Treaty should be given a statutory base, which courts could apply those provisions, which claimants could invoke them and against who or what they could be invoked, and, perhaps most importantly, how a competent court should resolve any litigation in which it found that the Treaty terms incorporated in the relevant Act conflicted with other rules of domestic law. Strictly speaking, however, whatever effect the Treaty has in domestic law arises simply because a domestic court is applying the terms of the relevant incorporating statute, not of the Treaty itself.⁴⁹

The principle is further illustrated by Cheney v Conn.⁵⁰ Mr Cheney was a taxpayer who appealed against the Inland Revenue's assessment of his income tax liability. The Inland Revenue made its assessment in accordance with the Finance Act 1964. Mr Cheney claimed that some of his tax money was being used to build nuclear weapons, contrary to the principles of the Geneva Convention, a treaty which the British government had signed.

Parts of the Treaty had been incorporated into British law, but these were not helpful to Mr Cheney's argument. His case rested on sections of the Treaty that remained unincorporated. Mr Cheney argued that since these parts of the Treaty forbade the use of nuclear weapons, it must be illegal for Parliament to enact a statute that raised money so that such weapons could be built. The judge, Ungoed-Thomas J, had no doubt that this was a pointless argument:

[W]hat the statute itself enacts cannot be unlawful, because what the statute says is itself the law, and the highest form of law that is known to this country. It is the law which prevails over ⁴⁹ We can illustrate the point by varying the facts of Mortensen v Peters. If Parliament had enacted a statute, let us call it 'The Law of the Sea Act 1902', which simply provided that all Treaties relating to the law of the sea to which the United Kingdom is a party are from January 1 1903 to be applied by domestic courts, then Captain Mortensen would have had an effective defence. The Law of the Sea Act 1902, being a statute enacted after the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act 1899, would impliedly repeal the 1899 Act to the extent of any inconsistency between them. But Mr Mortensen would be relying for his defence on the 1902 Act, not on the Treaty. (Had the Law of the Sea Act been passed in 1897, it would not have provided a defence, since its terms would have been impliedly repealed by the 1899 Act). We revisit this point from a more sophisticated perspective in ch 12.

⁵⁰ [1968] 1 All ER 779, [1968] 1 WLR 242.

every other form of law, and it is not for the court to say that a parliamentary enactment, the highest law in this country, is illegal.⁵¹

Having addressed the basic political and legal foundations of the parliamentary sovereignty doctrine, we now turn to the various challenges to the Diceyan theory that have been aired before the courts and in academic fora. None of these challenges has thus far proved effective—but that does not mean that one will not become so in the future. We consider three arguments. Firstly, we look at the ‘manner and form’ technique of safeguarding certain basic constitutional values against reform by a simple majority vote in Parliament. Secondly, we assess the status of the Treaty of Union of 1707 between England and Scotland. And thirdly, we explore the notion that there might be some moral values which Parliament can only change through express legislative statements.

II. Entrenching legislation—challenges to the orthodox position

The positive limb of Dicey’s theory suggests that Parliament can give legal effect to any moral values it considers desirable. But there appears to be a basic flaw in this formulation of the parliamentary sovereignty doctrine. Simply put, how can Parliament have supreme legislative power if there is one thing it cannot do, namely pass an Act which binds successor Parliaments. If Parliament is truly a sovereign law-maker, then one would have assumed that it must have the power to limit its own law-making capacity?⁵² This conundrum presents us with the distinction between the continuing and self-embracing theories of parliamentary sovereignty.⁵³

The continuing theory maintains that the sovereign Parliament is a perpetual institution. Its unconfined legislative power is created anew every time it meets, irrespective of previous enactments. This is the Diceyan position. Parliament need pay no heed at all to what its predecessors have done.

The self-embracing theory advocates a radical position. It has aroused much academic interest. With one important exception,⁵⁴ it has not had any practical political effect in this country, but it has had considerable influence in former British colonies. The self-embracing theory holds that Parliament’s sovereignty includes the power to bind itself and its successors. Supporters of the self-embracing theory argue that Parliament can enact legislation which is safe from subsequent amendment—that certain measures can be legally entrenched and rendered immune from repeal by a future Parliament.

Entrenchment simply means any constitutional mechanism which makes some laws immune to repeal by the usual legislative formula of a simple majority vote in the ⁵¹ Ibid, at 782.

⁵² This does not mean the same thing however, as asserting that a sovereign Parliament must be an ever-present feature of Britain’s constitutional landscape; cf Dicey op cit at p 24:

A sovereign power can divest itself of authority in two ways... It may simply put an end to its own existence. Parliament could extinguish itself by legally dissolving itself and leaving no means whereby a subsequent Parliament could be legally summoned... A sovereign body may again transfer sovereign authority to another person or body of persons....

Whether the previously sovereign Parliament could then in some fashion be ‘resurrected’ at a future date is a nice question.

⁵³ Winterton G (1976) ‘The British grundnorm: parliamentary sovereignty re-examined’ 92 LQR 591.

⁵⁴ This relates to the United Kingdom’s membership of the European Community. The development is of recent origin, and is discussed in chs 12 and 13.

Commons and the Lords plus the royal assent. In principle, a particular political value might be entrenched in either a substantive or procedural sense.

Substantive entrenchment would entail acceptance of the principle that Parliament cannot legislate at all about specific subjects. It implies that there are basic human values which can never be changed. This argument has not been vigorously pursued in recent times. The obvious drawback to substantive entrenchment would be that a society would be stuck with particular values forever; it is a completely rigid form of safeguard for basic principles.

Modern commentators who oppose Dicey's theory have sought to limit Parliament's power through procedural entrenchment. Procedural entrenchment would not necessarily produce a rigid constitution—it lends a relative rather than absolute degree of permanence to certain laws. In theory, one would have entrenched a particular piece of legislation if a Commons majority of two rather than one was needed to change it. That legislation would not be entrenched very firmly; but as one makes reform procedures more rigorous, so legislation becomes more securely entrenched. Constitutional values which could only be changed with the support of, for example 70% of MPs, would be deeply entrenched; if amendment required near unanimous support within each house, then change might be virtually impossible.⁵⁵

Jennings' critique and the 'rule of recognition'

The starting point for analysis of this theory is to ask ourselves why courts recognise statutes as the highest form of law? There is no supra-legislative constitution which articulates this rule. Similarly, we cannot find the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty laid down in a statute. But the haziness surrounding the legal status of this so-called 'rule of recognition' has assisted constitutional lawyers opposed to the Diceyan view.⁵⁶

The most forceful exponent of the so-called 'manner and form' strategy of procedural entrenchment was Sir Ivor Jennings.⁵⁷ Jennings based his critique of the orthodox theory on a version of the self-embracing understanding of sovereignty. His argument takes three apparently logical steps. Firstly, the rule of recognition is a common law concept. Secondly, statute is legally superior to the common law. Thirdly, Parliament can therefore enact legislation changing the rule of recognition and requiring the courts to accept that some Acts are protected from repeal by a simple majority vote in both houses plus the royal assent. Jennings formulated the argument in the following terms:

Legal sovereignty is merely a name indicating that the legislature has for the time being power to make laws of any kind in the manner required by law. That is, a rule expressed to be made by the Queen, [the House of Commons and the House of Lords] will be recognised by the courts, including a rule which alters this law itself... The power of a legislature derives from the law by which it is established.... In the United Kingdom... it derives from the accepted law, which is the common law.⁵⁸

There seems an obvious logic to this argument. Jennings' analysis also appears to make sound political sense. If the judges are subordinate to Parliament, then surely Parliament can tell them what rules they should follow when assessing whether or not a statute is unconstitutional.

⁵⁵ Thus the terms of the United States' constitution are deeply, but not permanently entrenched.

⁵⁶ The term is Professor H Hart's; see (1961) The concept of law p 161. For an overview of related theories see Winterton (1976) op cit. ⁵⁷ See especially (5th edn, 1958) The law and the constitution pp 140–145.

⁵⁸ Op cit at pp 152–153 and 156; original emphasis.

The manner and form argument draws its theoretical basis largely from Jennings' work. His ideas rely heavily on three cases,⁵⁹ all rooted in the process of former British colonies gaining independence. The first, A-G for New South Wales v Trethowan,⁶⁰ was an Australian case decided by the Australian High Court and the Privy Council in 1932.

A-G for New South Wales v Trethowan* (1931)

The New South Wales Parliament was created by a British statute; 'The Constitution Statute 1855'. In many respects, the New South Wales constitution followed the British model. Legislation required the support of a simple majority in an upper house (the Legislative Council) and lower house (the Legislative Assembly), and the royal assent was provided by the Governor-General qua the Monarch's representative. However, s 5 of a subsequent British statute, the Colonial Laws Validity Act 1865, provided that statutes enacted by certain colonial legislatures (including the New South Wales Parliament) which sought to alter their own 'constitution, powers or procedures' would have legal effect only if passed 'in such manner or form' as the law then in force in the colony demanded. The terms of s 5 were left unchanged when the New South Wales' Constitution Act was passed by the New South Wales Legislature in 1902. The 1902 Act, inter alia, made provisions concerning the composition and respective powers of the two houses.

In 1929, the Liberal Party government, which had majorities in both houses of the NSW Parliament, promoted the Constitution (Legislative Council Amendment) Bill 1929. The Bill was passed by both houses, received the royal assent, and thus became an Act. The Act introduced a new s 7A into the Constitution Act 1902, to the effect that a Bill seeking to abolish the Legislative Council could not be sent for royal assent unless it had been approved by a majority of both houses and by a majority of the electorate in a referendum. Section 7A therefore seemed to change the 'manner and form' of the legislation needed to abolish the upper chamber, by adding an additional step to the usual legislative process. Furthermore, s 7A(6) provided that s 7A itself could not be repealed unless the repealing legislation had also been approved by a majority of electors in a special referendum. It appeared that the government expected to lose the imminent general election, and wished to ensure that the opposition party could not carry out its stated intention to abolish the upper house without first putting that specific question to the electorate.

At the 1930s elections, the previous opposition party secured a majority in both houses. Both houses thereafter approved Bills respectively repealing s 7A and abolishing the Legislative Council. Neither measure was subjected to a referendum before it was submitted for the royal assent. Several members of the Legislative Council immediately began an action before the New South Wales courts requesting an injunction to prevent the Bills being sent for the royal assent; if granted, the injunction would therefore prevent the Bills becoming legislation. Their argument was that s 7A could be repealed only in the 'manner and form' which it had itself specified.

The new government argued that successive New South Wales Parliaments, just like the British Parliament, were not bound by any legislation passed by their predecessors. A Parliament might pass any 'manner and form' provisions it thought fit, but those provisions would have no effect when a future Parliament, acting by the 'simple majority plus royal assent formula', passed legislation to repeal them. That had happened here, and thus s 7A had been lawfully repealed.

⁵⁹ Jennings himself relied on the first two cases discussed here. The third was decided after the 1958 edition of Jennings' book The law and the constitution was written.

⁶⁰ (1931) 44 CLR 394; affd [1932] AC 526, PC.

In the High Court of Australia,⁶¹ two of the five judges accepted that argument. However the majority held that the Court was bound to prevent any Bill dealing with the subject matter of s 7A being sent for the royal assent unless approved in a referendum. The special ‘manner and form’ of s 7A provided an effective form of procedural entrenchment, safeguarding the existence of the Legislative Council. The majority reasoned that, unlike the British Parliament, the New South Wales legislature owed its existence and powers to two British statutes, the Constitution Statute 1855 and the Colonial Laws Validity Act 1865. Those Acts provided the basis of the New South Wales Constitution, and until s 5 of the 1865 Act was itself repealed, the New South Wales legislature was subject to its terms. The majority saw this as a straightforward legal rule, which, Rich J explained (in terms very reminiscent of Madison’s warnings about factionalism) served an obvious political purpose:

There is no reason why a Parliament representing the people should be powerless to determine whether the constitutional salvation of the State is to be reached by cautious and well considered steps rather than by rash and ill considered measures.⁶²

On further appeal to the Privy Council, the majority opinion, and the reasoning underlying it, was upheld.⁶³

Harris v Dönges (Minister of the Interior) (1952)

The second case, Harris v Dönges (Minister of the Interior),⁶⁴ was decided by the Appellate Division of South Africa’s Supreme Court in 1952. Once again, the story begins with the slow process of Britain disengaging itself from its former Empire. In 1909 the British Parliament passed the South Africa Act, which united the four South African colonies under a single legislature. The South African Parliament mirrored that of Britain in most respects. It had a lower house (the house of assembly) and an upper house (the senate) and retained the King’s power of royal assent (given on the King’s behalf by an appointed Governor-General). In respect of almost all laws, South Africa’s legislature had the same legal competence as the British Parliament—a Bill receiving a simple majority in both the house and the senate and thereafter receiving the royal assent was generally the ‘highest form of law’ within South Africa’s constitution. However the 1909 Act contained some exceptions to the ‘simple majority in both houses plus royal assent’ formula.

Firstly, the South African Parliament could not, under any circumstances, pass laws ‘repugnant’ to British statutes intended to have effect within South Africa. The supremacy of British law vis à vis South African law was a substantively entrenched feature of South Africa’s 1909 constitutional settlement. Secondly, ss 33–34 of the 1909 Act prevented the South African Parliament altering the composition of the house or the senate for ten years. Those provisions were thus substantively, but temporarily, entrenched. After ten years, the composition of each chamber could be altered by simple majority legislation. Thirdly, s 35 provided that the a person could not be deprived of his right to vote on the basis solely of his race unless that legislation had been supported by a two thirds majority of the house and senate sitting in joint session. Fourthly, s 137 provided that the status of both Afrikaans and English as the country’s official languages could only be changed by the two thirds majority procedure. Section 152 thereafter provided that s 35 and s 137

⁶¹ (1931) 44 CLR 394.

⁶² Ibid, at 420.

⁶³ [1932] AC 526, PC.

⁶⁴ (1952) 1 TLR 1245. For detailed analysis see Griswold E (1952) ‘The “coloured vote case” in South Africa’ 65 Harvard LR 1361; Note (1952) 68 Law Quarterly Review 285; Cowen D (1952) and (1953) ‘Legislature and judiciary: parts I and II’ Modern Law Review 282 and 273; Loveland I (1999) By due process of law? Racial discrimination and the right to vote in South Africa 1850–1960.

themselves could be amended only by a South African statute also attracting a two thirds majority in a joint session. Section 35 and s 152 imply that the British Parliament in 1909 considered that non-white citizens' 'right' to vote on the same basis as whites was too important a political value to be left at the mercy of a bare legislative majority. It was not an 'inalienable right', but would be more difficult to change than most other aspects of the South African constitution.⁶⁵

In 1931, the British Parliament passed the Statute of Westminster which recognised South Africa (and several other former colonies) as independent sovereign states, possessing what was termed 'Dominion' status within the British Empire. The Statute of Westminster made, inter alia, the following provisions. Section 2 released the newly created Dominions from the controls imposed by the Colonial Laws Validity Act 1865.⁶⁶ Section 4 then provided that:

No Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this Act shall extend, or be deemed to extend, to a Dominion as part of the law of that Dominion unless it is expressly declared in that Act that that Dominion has requested and consented to the enactment thereof.⁶⁷

As a matter of British constitutional law, s 4 might be thought to have little significance. If Parliament passed legislation contravening s 4, the statute concerned would presumably have been applied in the orthodox fashion by domestic courts. The point is perhaps best conveyed by the comment of Lord Sankey in British Coal Corp'n v R:

It is doubtless true that the power of the Imperial Parliament to pass on its own initiative any legislation that it thought fit extending to [a Dominion] remains in theory unimpaired: indeed, the Imperial Parliament could as a matter of abstract law, repeal or disregard s 4 of the Statute. But that is [legal] theory and has no relation to [political] realities.⁶⁸

As Lord Sankey suggested, the Statute of Westminster may more sensibly be seen as an exercise in constitutional politics rather than constitutional law. It affirmed an existing practical reality—namely that the Dominions could now act as independent States in respect both of their internal affairs and their international relations. Some Dominions modified their constitutions at the time that they gained independence. However, no changes were made to the South Africa Act 1909 at this time. The entrenchment provided for in ss 33–34 of the South Africa Act 1909 had by then elapsed. But the 1931 Act did not expressly repeal ss 35, 137 and 152; indeed, both houses of the South African ⁶⁵ For insight into why the British Parliament thought this additional protection appropriate see Loveland (1999) op cit ch 4; Lewin J (1956) 'The struggle for law in South Africa' 27 Political Quarterly 176.

⁶⁶ Section 2 was drafted in the following terms:

2(1)—The Colonial Laws Validity Act 1865 shall not apply to any law made after the commencement of this Act by the Parliament of a Dominion.

(2) No law . . . made after the commencement of this Act by the Parliament of a Dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to . . . the provisions of any existing or future Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom . . . and the powers of a Dominion Parliament shall include the power to repeal or amend any such Act, order, rule or regulation in so far as the same is part of the law of the Dominion.

⁶⁷ In effect, s 4 transformed the United Kingdom's Parliament into an additional part of the Dominion's own legislature.

⁶⁸ [1935] AC 500 at 520, PC. A more radical (or imaginative) view would be that the 1931 Act introduced a weak manner and form entrenchment by insisting that any future Act affecting a Dominion would only be applied by a British court if that Act contained an 'express declaration' to the effect that the Dominion had requested and consented to the Act. We explore this issue further in ch 9.

legislature had resolved that the terms of the 1931 Act should ‘in no way derogate from the entrenched provisions of the South Africa Act’.⁶⁹

From the late 1940s onwards, the white Afrikaaner National Party possessed a majority in both houses. The National Party had committed itself to introducing apartheid, a policy demanding rigid and (to non-whites) oppressive separation of different racial groups.⁷⁰ One element of this policy was to create separate electoral registers and voting systems for white and Cape coloured citizens. The Separate Representation of Voters Act was passed in 1951 by a simple majority, with both houses sitting separately. The Act’s ‘constitutionality’ was then challenged by several coloured voters, on the basis that the procedures used to enact it did not comply with the ‘manner and form’ specified in s 35.

Before the Appellate Division of South Africa’s Supreme Court, the South African government argued that this special procedure was no longer necessary. The government maintained that after the Statute of Westminster was passed in 1931 South Africa had become a sovereign state, and therefore its Parliament was not bound by the country’s initial constitution, which was enacted while South Africa was still a colony.⁷¹ As a matter of South African constitutional law, the government argued, the South African legislature had acquired all the legal attributes of Britain’s Parliament: it could enact any law whatsoever by a simple majority; and no domestic court could question the legality of any such Act.

All five judges then sitting in the Appellate Division rejected this argument, and concluded that the Act was invalid. The Court did accept that South Africa was a sovereign country, and also held that the South African courts would no longer consider British legislation superior to South African statutes. The court also accepted that South Africa had a sovereign Parliament. The Appellate Division nevertheless held that the Separate Representation of Voters Act was an illegal measure.

The judgment hinges on two presumptions. The first is that a sovereign country need not have a sovereign legislature. Pointing to the United States, Centlivres CJ observed it was entirely feasible for a country’s constitutional arrangements to withhold some legal powers from its central legislature. The USA’s constitution reserves control of most of its basic principles to the cumbersome ‘two thirds of Congress plus three quarters of the States’ amendment process.

The second presumption, in respect of which the US model is not a helpful analogy, is that a country can have a sovereign Parliament without according sovereignty to a simple majority procedure. The Court held that South Africa had adopted the terms of ss 35 and 152 of the 1909 Act as part of its constitutional settlement when it gained independence in 1931. Its Parliament therefore existed in two forms. For every purpose but three, Parliament could pass an Act by a simple majority with the houses sitting separately. But for those three purposes of repealing s 35, or s 137 or s 152, Parliament had to act by a two-thirds majority in joint session. Until that high percentage of the legislature’s members wished to repeal those provisions, they remained entrenched within South Africa’s constitution.

Bribery Commissioner v Ranasinghe (1965)

Ceylon, yet another former British colony, became an independent country in 1947. The terms of its Constitution were initially set by British law. On many issues, Ceylon’s ⁶⁹ See Loveland (1999) op cit pp 179–187.

⁷⁰ See Loveland (1999) op cit pp 231–247.

⁷¹ There had already been a decision to this effect: Ndlwana v Hofmeyr 1937 AD 229 (SA). See Loveland (1999) op cit pp 202–209.

Parliament (comprised of the House of Representatives and Senate plus the royal assent given by the Governor-General) could legislate by simple majority.⁷² However the Constitution also contained several principles (dealing primarily with religious discrimination) which were permanently and substantively entrenched. In addition, the Constitution contained various procedurally entrenched provisions. Section 29 of the Constitution provided that the procedurally entrenched provisions could be altered by legislation passed by at least two-thirds of the members of the house. Among the entrenched provisions was s 55, which provided that junior members of the judiciary could be appointed only by a body called the Judicial Services Commission, comprised entirely of senior judges.

In 1958, Ceylon's Parliament passed the Bribery Amendment Act. The Act was not passed in accordance with s 29. The Act established a body known as the Bribery Tribunal, which was in effect a court exercising jurisdiction over alleged bribery offences. Its members were appointed by the Ceylonese government, not by the Judicial Services Commission.

Ranasinghe had been tried before and convicted by the Bribery Tribunal. He then appealed against his conviction on the basis that the Bribery Amendment Act—since it was not passed in the manner and form specified by s 29—was inconsistent with s 55 of the Constitution and should be regarded as void.

At that time, Ceylon's Constitution retained the House of Lords (sitting in its capacity as the Privy Council) as the country's highest court of appeal. Lord Pearce, delivering the Privy Council's sole judgment, concluded that Mr Ranasinghe's argument was well-founded:

[A] legislature has no power to ignore the conditions of law-making that are imposed by the instrument which itself regulates its [ie the legislature's] power to make law.... [T]he proposition which is not acceptable is that a legislature, once established, has some inherent power derived from the mere fact of its establishment to make a valid law by the resolution of a bare majority which its own constituent instrument has said shall not be a valid law unless made by a different type of majority...⁷³

Lord Pearce echoed the point made by Centlivres CJ in Harris that this conclusion did not mean that Ceylon lacked a sovereign Parliament, or that it was not a sovereign state:

No question of sovereignty arises. A Parliament does not cease to be sovereign whenever its component members fail to produce among themselves a requisite majority.... The minority are entitled under the constitution of Ceylon to have no amendment of it which is not imposed by a two-thirds majority. The limitation thus imposed on some lesser majority does not limit the sovereign powers of Parliament itself which can always, whenever it chooses, pass the amendment with the requisite majority.⁷⁴

Are Trethowan, Harris and Ranasinghe relevant to the British situation?

Initially it might seem that Ranasinghe, Harris and Trethowan provide a model to bind Parliament in Britain. Suppose Parliament enacts a statute—the Bill of Rights Act 2013—which replicates the terms of the United States' Bill of Rights, for example, and includes within the statute a section which specifies that Parliament may legislate in a way inconsistent with the Bill of Rights only if at least two-thirds of the members of the House of ⁷² See Jennings I and Tambiah H (1952) The dominion of Ceylon pp 73–75.

⁷³ Bribery Comr v Ranasinghe [1965] AC 172 at 198, PC.

⁷⁴ Ibid, at 200.

Commons and House of Lords vote in favour of the Act concerned.⁷⁵ If a subsequent Parliament wished to enact a statute which did contravene the terms of the new Bill of Rights Act, surely Harris, Ranasinghe and Trethowan are precedents for saying that it could not do so by a simple majority: the ‘manner and form’ of two-thirds support would be required before a British court would enforce any subsequently enacted statute breaching the provisions of the Bill of Rights. This proposition has attracted the support of several eminent commentators, in addition to Jennings himself.⁷⁶

However there would seem little force to such arguments. The more persuasive analysis is that these cases are irrelevant to questions concerning the sovereignty of the British Parliament. This position, forcefully argued by Wade in 1955,⁷⁷ contends that if one transposes these cases to the British context, they are revealed simply as instances of statutory bodies created by Parliament acting beyond the confines of the authority which Parliament has bestowed upon them. In both cases there was a ‘higher law’ to which the Acts in question were subordinate, namely an Act of the British Parliament: the New South Wales’ and South African legislatures were acting ‘ultra vires’ (beyond their legal powers).⁷⁸ If these two subordinate legislatures had acted beyond the legal limits of the powers granted to them by the legislature which created them, it was quite consistent with the theory of parliamentary sovereignty for the courts to intervene. Indeed, the courts in those countries would as a matter of law be obliged to intervene—even if the countries had by then become independent sovereign states—for so long as the sovereign law-making power within each jurisdiction had not removed or amended the terms of the initial British statutes.⁷⁹

Britain, in contrast, has no higher source of law than Parliament. Nor is there any obvious colonial master to which the British Parliament owes its existence.⁸⁰ To borrow Lord Pearce’s formula in Ranasinghe, there is no ‘constituent instrument’ specifying the way in which Parliament should make laws on particular subjects. Consequently it would not seem possible for Parliament ever to exceed its legal authority. Indeed, it is puzzling that Trethowan was invoked to suggest that the British Parliament could enact manner and form limitations on its own sovereignty, given the comments of the Australian judges hearing the case. Rich J stated clearly that: ‘The Legislature of New South Wales is not sovereign, and no analogy can be drawn from the position of the British Parliament’.⁸¹ Similarly, in Starke J’s opinion: ‘the Parliaments of the Dominions or Colonies are not sovereign and omnipotent bodies. They are subordinate bodies; their powers are limited ⁷⁵ We might also assume that the two-thirds majority provision is also protected by another two-thirds majority clause.

⁷⁶ See Friedmann W (1950) ‘Trethowan’s case, parliamentary sovereignty and the limits of legal change’ 24 Australian Law Journal 103; Keir D (6th edn, 1978) Cases in constitutional law p 7; Griswold op cit. Heuston R (1964) Essays in constitutional law ch 1. For a recent overview see Craig P (1991) ‘Sovereignty of the United Kingdom Parliament after Factortame’ Yearbook of European Law 221. The argument has recently been enthusiastically supported by Eric Barendt; see Barendt (1998) An introduction to constitutional law pp 86–93.

⁷⁷ Wade HRW (1955) ‘The basis of legal sovereignty’ Cambridge LJ 172.

⁷⁸ Professor Wade put a different gloss on Harris, suggesting that the South African Supreme Court was in a revolutionary situation, in which its judgment was determined by political rather than legal principles; ibid.

⁷⁹ Jennings acknowledged that neither Trethowan nor Harris were determinative authorities in the British context, but did maintain that they were illustrative of the principle that; ‘the power of a legislature derives from the law by which it was established’; op cit at p 156. And, as noted above, Jennings asserted that ‘the law’ in issue in relation to the United Kingdom’s Parliament was the common law.

⁸⁰ The suggestion that one might identify two ‘masters’ (albeit not colonial in nature) is pursued in the following section.

⁸¹ (1931) 44 CLR 394 at 418.

by the Imperial [British] or other Acts which created them'.⁸² In the same vein, Dixon J observed that:

The incapacity of the British legislature to limit its own power... has been explained as a necessary consequence of a true conception of sovereignty. But in any case it depends on considerations which have no application to the legislature of New South Wales, which is not a sovereign body and has a purely statutory origin.⁸³

Advocates of the Jennings thesis might however draw on the following passage from Dixon J's judgment:

It must not be supposed, however, that all difficulties would vanish if the full doctrine of parliamentary supremacy could be invoked. [If] an Act of the British Parliament... contained a provision that no Bill repealing any part of the Act... should be presented for the Royal Assent unless the Bill were first approved by the electors... [i]n strictness it would be an unlawful proceeding to present such a Bill before it had been approved by the electors... [T]he Courts would be bound to pronounce it unlawful to do so.⁸⁴

Dixon J's statement was merely obiter, and while one should acknowledge his subsequent reputation as one of the foremost of constitutional scholars, his opinion has yet to be embraced in the English courts.

The logic of the manner and form argument rests on the assumption made by Professor Jennings that the 'rule of recognition' is a common law principle. But as Professor Wade suggests, that logic disintegrates if one regards the rule of recognition as a political fact rather than a legal principle. In Wade's view, the rule of recognition is not part of the common law, but something prior to and superior to the common law. It is in essence a basic political reality, not a technical legal rule. It represents the courts' acceptance of the new political consensus brought about by the 1688 revolution. Following that revolution, the political underpinnings of British society were radically changed. Parliament was in a position to establish its superiority over both the King and the courts—and both the King and the courts had no choice but to acquiesce to these new circumstances.

Thus from Wade's 1955 perspective, the theory and practice of parliamentary sovereignty could not be altered by 'legal' means at all. The only thing that could have removed the legislative sovereignty of Parliament was another revolution. This need not be a war or a violent insurrection, but it would have to be some momentous break in legal and political continuity, some fundamental redefinition of the way that the country's citizens bestow law-making power on their legislature.⁸⁵

Subsequently,⁸⁶ Wade adopted a rather different position. He suggested that the only feasible way forward was the very simple device of Parliament introducing legislation to change the judiciary's oath of loyalty. The new oath would require the judges to swear eternal obedience to a statute entrenching certain fundamental rights or liberties that we would never want to have removed, or which could only be removed by a special form of parliamentary procedure above and beyond the bare majority plus royal assent formula. If the courts subsequently found themselves presented with a situation analogous to the one the South African Supreme Court faced in Harris, their loyalty to the new oath would require them to declare the so-called legislation unconstitutional. The obvious drawback of that proposal is that one could envisage a future Parliament introducing legislation to change the oath back again. The idea does indeed look very simple—but perhaps that ⁸² Ibid, at 422.

⁸³ Ibid, at 425–426.

⁸⁴ Ibid, at 426.

⁸⁵ For an insightful analysis of the Wade/Jennings debate see Gordon M (2009) 'The conceptual foundations of parliamentary sovereignty...' Public Law 519.

⁸⁶ (1980) Constitutional fundamentals.

is because it seems most unlikely that it would work unless part of a more wide-ranging revolutionary overhaul of the constitution that Wade talked of in 1955.

The final chapter of this book suggests that no such ‘revolution’ is necessary, and that the Trethowan, Harris and Ranasinghe episodes do now provide the legal tools with which to entrench legislation in Britain, even though one cannot remove Parliament’s omniscient ‘simple majority plus royal assent’ legislative powers. That argument must however be withheld until we have explored other relevant aspects of Britain’s constitutional arrangements.

Is parliamentary sovereignty a British or English concept?

The mid-1950s were an interesting time for opponents of the parliamentary sovereignty doctrine. As well as producing the Harris case, that era also lent a new impetus to a Scots challenge to the legal supremacy of the British Parliament. This chapter has stressed that parliamentary sovereignty initially emerged in England, not in Britain. The Glorious Revolution happened in 1688. England and Scotland then shared a King, and had done so since 1603. But each country had its own Parliament. There was no doubt that Scotland and England were at that time both sovereign states, each with its own particular constitutional structure. Britain was not created until 1707, when the Scots and English Parliaments each passed an Act of Union approving the terms of a Treaty of Union negotiated between the governments of each country. Between 1688 and 1707, parliamentary sovereignty may have been accepted as the foundation of the constitution in England, but it is far from certain that the idea enjoyed that status in Scotland.⁸⁷ Quite what happened in legal and political (and hence constitutional) terms when Britain was created as a country is open to several interpretations.⁸⁸

Orthodox British theory suggests that what happened in 1707 was essentially a takeover or absorption of the Scots Parliament by the English Parliament. That is to say that the constitution of the newly created country of Britain was based on the same principles that underpinned the English constitution between 1688 and 1707. This analysis presumably rests least in part on the brute fact that the British Parliament sat in the same place as the English Parliament, and while Scots MPs were admitted to both the House of Commons and the House of Lords, no English seats in either house were removed.⁸⁹

An alternative perspective would be to argue that what happened in 1707 was not a takeover, but a merger.⁹⁰ This argument would further maintain that the merger terms were set out in the Treaty of Union itself, and that the Treaty does provide a form of higher law which limits the legal powers of the British Parliament.

A third, and perhaps more appropriate characterisation of the events of 1707 is that; ‘The union . . . cannot be described as the merging of two states. It was more accurately two renunciations of title and a new state acquiring title over the same territory immediately thereafter.’⁹¹ As with the second perspective, this view of the union maintains that the ⁸⁷ Smith T (1957) ‘The Union of 1707 as fundamental law’ Public Law 99; Munro C (1987) Studies in constitutional law ch 4; MacCormick N (1978) ‘Does the United Kingdom have a constitution?’ 29 Northern Ireland Law Quarterly 1; Goldsworthy op cit pp 165–173.

⁸⁸ For a fascinating analysis see Upton M (1989) ‘Marriage vows of the elephant: the constitution of 1707’ LQR 79.

⁸⁹ The Treaty of Union Art XXII made provision for 45 Scots MPs to sit in the Commons, and 16 in the Lords.

⁹⁰ See especially MacCormick, op cit.

⁹¹ Wicks E (2001) ‘A new constitution for a new state? The 1707 union of England and Scotland’ LQR 109.

Treaty should be seen as a ‘constituent instrument’, restricting the legislative powers of the British Parliament.

‘Entrenched’ provisions within the Treaty of Union?

The Treaty does not specify how Parliament should make laws: ie there are no enhanced majority or manner and form provisions to suggest that certain political values were to be entrenched in procedural terms. However, if interpreted literally, parts of the Treaty of Union create the impression that various types of substantive entrenchment were intended by the framers of the Treaty.

Art XXV certainly confirms that the Treaty should supercede all existing laws incompatible with its terms—be they statutory or common law in origin—in both England and Scotland:

Article XXV. That all Laws and Statutes in either Kingdom so far as they are contrary to or inconsistent with the Terms of these Articles...shall from and after the Union cease and become void...

This is of course a repealing rather than entrenching provision, but nonetheless a term that speaks to the supremacy of future legislation over existing law.

Various substantive entrenchment provisions are however easily identifiable. Article I provided that:

That the Two Kingdoms of England and Scotland shall upon the First Day of May which shall be in the Year One thousand seven hundred and seven and for ever after be united into One Kingdom by the name of Great Britain...

Article II contained the following rule: ‘... [A]ll Papists and Persons marrying Papists shall be excluded from and forever incapable to inherit possess or enjoy the Imperial Crown of Great Britain...’.

The permanent entrenchment of assorted religious principles was continued in an annex to the Treaty, which reproduced the text of an Act passed by the Scots Parliament in 1706. This included, inter alia, terms to the effect that the form of Protestantism then used in the Church of Scotland; ‘shall remain and continue unalterable’. Relatedly, the Act provided that only adherents to this particular faith could hold positions in the then existing Scots universities.

Article VI was concerned with matters of fiscal rather than religious policy:

That all Parts of the United Kingdom for ever from and after the Union shall...be under the same Prohibitions Restrictions and Regulations of Trade and liable to the Same Customs and Duties on Import and Export...

In addition, the Treaty contained what might best be termed ‘substantively but contingently’ entrenched provisions. For example, Article XVIII indicated that the British Parliament would be able to alter all laws concerning matters of public law and private law in Scotland. But this provision was limited in two ways. Firstly, alterations to matters of private law were permissible only if they were for the ‘evident Utility of the Subjects within Scotland’.⁹² Relatedly, Article XIX stated that Scotland’s Court of Session should; ‘remain in all time coming within Scotland as it is now constituted by the Laws of that Kingdom’. However, this unequivocal pronouncement was then qualified by the proviso ⁹² The Treaty did not explain what was meant by ‘evident utility’ or who was empowered to decide if a new law satisfied that test.

that the British Parliament could modify the Court of Session in any fashion that was for; ‘the better Administration of Justice’.⁹³

Notwithstanding these provisions, obvious criticisms can be leveled against both the second and third perspectives on the legal consequences of the Anglo-Scots union. Two such criticisms are schematic in nature. Firstly, the Treaty does not contain any suggestion as to how the entrenched provisions might be safeguarded against subsequent statutory infringement. Certainly no jurisdiction is given to any Court to invalidate any such legislation. Secondly, if the higher law perspective is correct, Britain was created without the benefit of a sovereign law-maker. Article III of the Treaty expressly abolishes the Scots and English Parliaments in creating the British Parliament. But the Treaty contains no mechanism for resummoning those Parliaments, nor for amending or removing the entrenched provisions. A third criticism is rooted in practical historical fact. Most of the supposedly entrenched provisions of the Treaty of Union are apparently no longer in force.⁹⁴ Successive generations of parliamentarians and of judges seem to have accepted unquestioningly until the 1950s that the legal status of the Treaty of Union was the same as any other statute—its provisions were open to amendment by either express or implied repeal by subsequent legislation.⁹⁵

McCormick v Lord Advocate (1953)

However, the constituent instrument understanding of the Treaty has been tested several times in the Scots courts, and Scots judges have not dismissed it entirely. The 1953 case of *McCormick v Lord Advocate*⁹⁶ concerned a challenge to the constitutionality of the Royal Titles Act 1953. Under this Act, the former Princess Elizabeth succeeded to the British throne with the title of Elizabeth II. McCormick argued that Britain had never had a Queen Elizabeth I—the woman who stepped on Walter Raleigh’s cloak in the sixteenth century was Elizabeth I of England—and so could not have an Elizabeth II.

The Scots Court of Session rejected McCormick’s claim, but offered some unexpected opinions on the wider issue of the constitutional status of the Act of Union. The leading judgment was delivered by Lord Cooper, who observed that:

The principle of the unlimited sovereignty of Parliament is a distinctively English principle which has no counterpart in Scottish constitutional law. . . . Considering that the Union legislation extinguished the Parliaments of Scotland and England and replaced them by a new Parliament, I have difficulty in seeing why it should have been supposed that the new Parliament of Great Britain must inherit all the peculiar characteristics of the English Parliament but none of the Scottish Parliament, as if all that happened in 1707 was that Scottish representatives were admitted to the Parliament of England. That is not what was done.⁹⁷

⁹³ As with the ‘evident utility’ clause, the Treaty did not explain by who or against what criteria the notion of ‘better administration of justice’ would be gauged.

⁹⁴ Wicks notes some disagreement between Scots constitutional scholars on the extent of the repeal; (2001) op cit p 18.

⁹⁵ Cf Dicey’s comment in The Law of the Constitution concerning the ‘entrenched’ provisions of the Treaty; ‘The history of legislation in respect of these very Acts affords the strongest proof of the futility inherent in every attempt of one sovereign body to restrain the action of another equally sovereign body’. One need not be a rigorous critic of Dicey’s position to see that in this passage he assumes rather than proves that the British Parliament possesses sovereign powers.

⁹⁶ 1953 SC 396.

⁹⁷ Ibid, at 411.

Lord Cooper then alluded to the various ‘entrenched’ provisions of the Treaty:

I have never been able to understand how it is possible to reconcile with elementary canons of construction⁹⁸ the adoption by the English constitutional theorists of the same attitude towards those markedly different types of provisions.

While many of the terms of the Act of Union have been repealed, some of its most important provisions remain in place. Scotland retains its own legal system for example, and its own established Church. It is interesting to speculate how the courts in England and Scotland would respond if Parliament passed legislation changing either of these two features of Scottish society.⁹⁹

Gibson v Lord Advocate (1975)

Some indication of the likely answer to this question was offered in 1975 by the judgment in *Gibson v Lord Advocate*¹⁰⁰ Mr Gibson was a Scots fisherman who objected to recently enacted legislation which—in his contention—adversely affected his livelihood by opening access to Scots coastal waters to fishing boats and companies from other European Community countries. Mr Gibson based his legal challenge to the validity of the Act on Article VXIII of the Treaty of Union,¹⁰¹ which if literally construed appeared to prevent the British Parliament from altering matters of ‘private law’ in Scotland unless such alterations were for ‘the evident utility of the subjects within Scotland’. Mr Gibson argued firstly that the question of fishing rights was a matter of ‘private’ rather than ‘public’ law. As such, he further argued, the legality of a statute altering such rights rested on an evaluation of whether or not the Act was indeed for the ‘evident utility’ of Scots subjects; this being a question for the court to resolve.

Mr Gibson’s suit fell at the first hurdle on the court’s conclusion that fishing rights were a matter of ‘public’ rather than ‘private’ law. For present purposes however, the significance of the judgment delivered by Lord Keith¹⁰² perhaps lies in the fact that he did not simply dismiss the action on the basis of a Diceyan proposition that any attempt to challenge the legality of a statute was futile. Lord Keith did not rule out the possibility that such an action could plausibly be argued. He doubted that any court could assess whether a law affecting ‘private’ rights in Scotland met the evident utility requirement. But, echoing Lord Cooper in McCormick, Lord Keith also observed: ‘I prefer to reserve my opinion on what the position would be if the United Kingdom Parliament passed an Act purporting to abolish the Court of Session or the Church of Scotland or to substitute English law for the whole body of Scots private law’.¹⁰³

It would seem unlikely that Parliament would ever enact legislation with that intended effect. But both McCormick and Gibson offer at least the theoretical possibility that an argument before a court questioning the validity of a statute might succeed.

Women’s enfranchisement

The common law also provides one often overlooked example of the courts disapplying orthodox notions of parliamentary sovereignty in defence of the traditional moral values.

⁹⁸ By which is meant the principles that ‘British’ courts have traditionally invoked to ascertain the meaning of statutory provisions. This point is addressed in ch 3.

⁹⁹ Cf the comment by Lord Cooper in McCormick; ‘it is of little avail to ask whether the Parliament of Great Britain “can” do this or that, without going on to inquire who can stop them if they do’; 1953 SC 396 at 412. ¹⁰⁰ (1975) SC 136.

¹⁰¹ See ‘“Entrenched” provisions in the Treaty of Unions?’, p 44 above.

¹⁰² Notwithstanding the judge’s title, the judgment was a first instance opinion of the Outer House of Scotland’s Court of Session. ¹⁰³ (1975) SC 136 at 145.

As we shall see in chapter seven, the 1832 Great Reform Act extended the parliamentary franchise to affluent middle class men. Further nineteenth-century reforms gave the right to vote to an increasing percentage of the male population. Parliament declined explicitly to enfranchise women: but in the 1860s, women's suffrage campaigners formulated an argument that Parliament had done so impliedly.

Section 4 of Lord Brougham's Act of 1850, provided that 'in all Acts words importing the masculine gender shall be deemed and taken to include females... unless the contrary as to gender is expressly provided'. The 1867 Reform Act did not expressly exclude women. John Stuart Mill, then an MP and supporter of women's suffrage, suggested during the Bill's passage that such phraseology impliedly extended the vote to women. The government did not introduce a clause expressly disapplying Lord Brougham's Act to the franchise issue, suggesting that establishing the effect of the statute on this point was to be left to the courts.¹⁰⁴

Chorlton v Lings (1868)

In Chorlton v Lings,¹⁰⁵ a woman who satisfied all the criteria entitling a man to vote argued that women had indeed been impliedly enfranchised by the 1867 Act. However, the Court of Common Pleas held that Parliament could not possibly have intended to enfranchise women. To do so would overturn centuries of constitutional tradition and practice. Willes J explained the essentially moral reasoning behind this practice, in language no doubt considered diplomatic at the time:

[T]he absence of such a right is referable to the fact that... chiefly out of respect to women, and a sense of decorum, and not from their want of intellect, or their being for any other reason unfit to take part in the government of the country, they have been excused from taking any share in this department of public affairs.¹⁰⁶

The court's unanimous rejection of the argument that Parliament could impliedly amend basic constitutional values was most clearly expressed by Keating J; the legislature, 'if desirous of making an alteration so important and extensive, would have said so plainly and distinctly'.¹⁰⁷

Nairn v University of St Andrews (1909)

The Chorlton v Lings scenario was replayed some forty years later in Nairn v University of St. Andrews.¹⁰⁸ The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act 1868 extended the franchise in university constituencies to all of the university's graduates. The Universities (Scotland) Act 1889 empowered Scots universities to award degrees to women. Nairn was one of several woman graduates who contended that the 1889 legislation necessarily implied that she was now entitled to vote. The House of Lords saw little merit in such an argument. Lord Loreburn LC was particularly adamant that female suffrage could be introduced only by the most explicit of statutory provisions: 'It would require a convincing demonstration to satisfy me that Parliament intended to effect a constitutional change so momentous and far-reaching by so furtive a process'.¹⁰⁹

Keating J's holding in Chorlton that Parliament may introduce 'important and extensive' changes to the nature of a citizen's relationship to the state only through 'plain and distinct' statutory language is a principle of potentially wide application. One could draw the same conclusion about Lord Loreburn's observation that the common law does not ¹⁰⁴ Kent S (1989) Sex and suffrage in Britain 1860–1914 ch 8.

¹⁰⁵ (1868) LR 4 CP 374.

¹⁰⁶ Ibid, at 392.

¹⁰⁷ Ibid, at 395.

¹⁰⁸ [1909] AC 147, HL. See Leneman L (1991) 'When women were not "persons" ...?' Juridical Review 109.

¹⁰⁹ [1909] AC 147 at 161, HL.

permit Parliament to achieve policy objectives relating to matters of fundamental political and/or moral significance through ‘furtive’ legislative devices.

What the courts seem to be saying in these two cases does not seem easy to reconcile with the legal principles advanced in orthodox interpretations of the decisions in Vauxhall Estates and Ellen Street Estates, which are assumed to have established the doctrine of implied repeal. However, one can see convincing ‘democratic’ reasons for preferring the Chorlton/Nairn rationale. If we assume that Parliament derives its political authority from the consent of the people, it would seem sensible that Parliament is candid about the objectives it is seeking. Without such honesty in the legislative process, it would not be possible for citizens to decide whether or not they wished to continue to consent to what Parliament was doing. That is however essentially a political argument rather than a legal one, and as yet it is one that the British courts have not been prepared to accept.

Conclusion

We might draw some initial conclusions about the status of parliamentary sovereignty within our constitution. Perhaps the most important point to remember is that the principle was not designed for a modern, democratic society which has large political parties which contest general elections on a nationwide basis. It is a 300-year-old idea.

To do justice to Dicey’s theorisation of the principle in the 1880s, we ought to note that his concern was to illustrate the relationship between Acts of Parliament and the courts—to stress that as a matter of legal principle the courts were invariably subordinate to the will of Parliament. Dicey took pains to stress that political sovereignty was a very different thing. When it came to the practicalities of government, it was nonsense to say that Parliament could enact legislation on any subject it chose. Because one part of Parliament, the House of Commons, was an elected body, and its members could periodically be changed by its citizens, MPs would always have to be conscious of what measures the electorate would accept, and temper the legislation they produce accordingly. Thus, to evaluate the political acceptability of Dicey’s legal doctrine we must examine long-term changes in other areas of Britain’s law-making and government processes. In particular, we must assess the voting system through which members of the Commons are elected, the relationship between the House of Commons and the government, and the changing balance of power within Parliament between the Commons, Lords, and Monarch.

These inquiries will repeatedly lead us to a point of considerable importance which frequently resurfaces in any study of the British constitution; namely a distinction between legal formality and political reality. These two concepts do not always coincide, and one of the great difficulties facing constitutional lawyers is deciding in what circumstances law gives way to politics, and vice-versa. .

But for the present, we might leave our discussion of parliamentary sovereignty with a quotation from the 1969 case of Madzimbamuto v Lardner-Burke.¹¹⁰ Lord Reid observed that:

it is often said that it would be unconstitutional for ... Parliament to do certain things, meaning that the moral, political and other reasons against doing them are so strong that most people would regard it as highly improper if Parliament did these things. But that does not mean it is beyond the power of Parliament to do such things. If Parliament chose to do any of them, the courts could not hold the Act of Parliament invalid.¹¹¹

¹¹⁰ [1969] 1 AC 645, PC.

As later chapters suggest, the United Kingdom's accession to the European Economic Community in 1973 has cast considerable doubt on certain aspects of the orthodox theory of parliamentary sovereignty. But it would be an adventurous lawyer who suggested that we can currently find purely domestic limitations to the principle that Parliament's legal powers are unconfined. Yet as we shall begin to see in the following chapter, it would be rash to assume that the continued dominance of the orthodox theory of parliamentary sovereignty necessarily and invariably places obvious limits on the constitutional authority of the courts.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

- Wade HRW (1955) 'The basis of legal sovereignty' Cambridge L J 172
- Gordon M (2009) 'The conceptual foundations of parliamentary sovereignty: reconsidering Jennings and Wade' Public Law 519
- Goldsworthy J (1999) The sovereignty of Parliament chs 5 and 8
- Wicks E (2006) The evolution of a constitution ch 1
- Craig P (1991) 'Sovereignty of the United Kingdom Parliament after Factortame' Yearbook of European Law 221
- Winterton G (1976) 'The British grundnorm; parliamentary sovereignty re-examined' LQR 591
- Wicks E (2001) 'A new constitution for a new state? The 1707 union of England and Scotland' LQR 109
- McCormick N (1978) 'Does the United Kingdom have a constitution?' 29 NILQ 1
- Slaughter T (1981) 'Abdicate and contract in the Glorious Revolution' 24 Historical Journal 323

Case law and legislation

- Harris v (Donges) Minister of the Interior* (1952) 1 TLR 1245
- Trethowan v Attorney-General for New South Wales* (1931) 44 CLR 394
- Mortensen v Peters* (1906) 14 SLT 227
- McCormick v Lord Advocate* (1953) SC 396
- British Railways Board v Pickin* [1974] AC 765

¹¹¹ [1969] 1 AC 645 at 723, PC.

Chapter 3

The Rule of Law and the Separation of Powers

The ‘rule of law’ is another taken-for-granted element of the British constitution, invoked—like democracy—to convey the essential adequacy of Britain’s constitutional arrangements. But ‘the rule of law’, like ‘democracy’, has no single meaning: it is not a legal rule, but a moral principle, which means different things to different people according to their particular moral positions. Later chapters assess whether one can identify characteristics of ‘the rule of law’ which traverse party political, national, and chronological boundaries and question whether Britain’s model is found wanting when measured against such a yardstick. Here we consider the various meanings the principle has been accorded in Britain’s post-revolutionary constitution.

We might view the rule of law as a vehicle for expressing ‘the people’s’ preferences about two essentially political issues. Firstly, it relates to the substance of the relationship between citizens and government. Secondly, it deals with the processes through which that relationship is conducted. More simply, the rule of law is concerned with what government can do—and how government can do it.

Many theorists have presented variations on these two themes.¹ In addition to analysing several seminal cases, in which one can discern the varying ways in which principles are put into practice, this chapter addresses three theoretical analyses, those of A V Dicey, Friedrich Hayek, and Harry Jones, which span the spectrum of mainstream debate about the nature of the rule of law in Britain’s modern constitution.

1. The Diceyan perspective: the rule of law in the pre-welfare state

Dicey’s account of the rule of law might be viewed guardedly. Dicey was the product of an undemocratic society in the modern sense: as noted in chapter seven, few adults were entitled to vote in parliamentary elections when Dicey completed his famous Study of the law of the constitution in the 1880s. Dicey opposed the nineteenth-century trend towards increased government intervention in social and economic affairs.² Nevertheless, in respect of parliamentary sovereignty, the British constitution rests on foundations which pre-dated modern concepts of democracy. Consequently, Dicey's theories provide us with a good starting point to examine the meaning of the rule of law.

¹ Cf Harlow C and Rawlings R (1984) Law and administration chs 1–2; Munro op cit ch 9; Thompson E (1975) Whigs and hunters pp 258–266; Raz J (1977) ‘The rule of law and its virtue’ LQR 191.

² McEldowney (1985) op cit.

The essence of Dicey's approach appears in several short passages in the Law of the constitution:

We mean, in the first place, that no man is punishable or can be lawfully made to suffer in body or goods except for a distinct breach of the law established in the ordinary legal manner before the ordinary courts of the land....[And] we mean in the second place... that every official, from the Prime Minister down to a constable or collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification as any other citizen.³

This definition has three parts. Firstly, 'no man can lawfully be made to suffer in body or goods'. That indicates that Dicey's primary concern is with protecting individual rights and liberties (ie a more modern restatement of Lockean principles). Dicey stressed that this protection had to be effective against both other citizens and against the government. A government official, like every other citizen, had to find some legal justification for behaving in an apparently unlawful way. Secondly, 'except for a distinct breach of the law'. This reinforces the conclusion that government has to operate within a framework of laws superior to the mere actions of government officials: behaviour does not become lawful simply because a government official claims so. The third factor is that any breach of the law 'must be established in the ordinary legal manner before the ordinary courts of the land'. The courts, rather than the government, must determine whether or not the law has been broken. These three elements of Dicey's rule of law lead towards another taken-for-granted constitutional principle: the separation of powers.

Philosophical works such as Locke's Second Treatise of Civil Government (1690) and Montesquieu's Spirit of the Laws (1748) had a profound influence on theoretical analyses of the British constitution, and, in a different way, on the constitutional principles adopted by the American revolutionaries.⁴ For introductory purposes, the basic point to distill from the separation of powers doctrine in the British context is that the government function has three discrete elements.

The first is legislation. One part of government makes the laws under which people live. Returning to the idea of the British constitution as a social contract, the legislative function is to produce the terms of the contract under which government is conducted. In Britain, the legislative function rests with Parliament. But if a society drafts a contract, the people must also design some way of carrying that contract out.

This second element, carrying out or 'executing' of the laws, is undertaken by the executive branch of government. Diceyians regards the second function of government with suspicion. Their assumption is that the executive will always try to do things that the legislature has not authorised. According to orthodox British understandings of the rule of law, the executive branch of government has no autonomous power to make law through legislation.⁵ That power rests exclusively with Parliament. Consequently, a third element of government must offer citizens a remedy if the executive acts incompatibly with the laws the legislature has enacted.

³ Dicey A (1915, 8th edn) Introduction to the study of the law of the constitution pp 110 and 114.

⁴ On the differential impact of these theories on Britain, France and the United States see Vile op cit. An illuminating assessment of Locke's influence in England is provided in Goldsworthy op cit pp 151–153.

⁵ As we saw in ch 2, the Monarch (whom for present purposes we may treat as the head of the executive branch of government) has the power to make international law through the signing of Treaties. But as the decision in Mortensen v Peters makes clear, international law has no direct force in domestic law until the relevant Treaty has been 'incorporated' by an Act of Parliament; see 'Inconsistency with International law', ch 2, pp 32–34 above.

This third element is the courts. The citizen can seek a remedy ‘in the ordinary courts of the land’ if she believes herself the victim of unlawful government action. In addition to determining if executive action falls within the limits approved by parliament, courts possess a limited law-making power through developing the common law. Executive action with no legislative foundation may be lawful if justified at common law. .

This threefold division within Dicey’s version of the rule of law is helpfully illustrated by a celebrated eighteenth-century case—Entick v Carrington.⁶

Entick v Carrington* (1765)

The mid-eighteenth century was a turbulent time in British constitutional history. In addition to facing rebellion in America, the government was under continuous pressure from an indigenous radical movement which accused it of corruption and incompetence. Technological advances in the printing industry enabled radicals to spread their ideas far and wide. London in the 1760s was awash with numerous pamphlets criticising or satirising the government.

The focus of much opposition was John Wilkes, a radical politician elected to the House of Commons several times. On each occasion the Commons had refused to permit him to take his seat.⁷ This made him a hero to many American colonists, who felt he shared their struggle against an increasingly tyrannical government and Parliament.⁸ The British government adopted various draconian tactics to stem the flow of Wilkes’ critical literatures. One technique that the Home Secretary deployed was to issue a ‘general warrant’ empowering his civil servants to raid the premises of radicals suspected of producing seditious literature. The warrant purportedly authorised government officials to enter private premises without the owner’s permission and to seize everything they found there. In 1764, the Home Secretary authorised such a raid by government officials on Mr Entick, a printer, and Wilkes sympathiser.

The government’s action ostensibly contravened some basic principles of consensual constitutional government discussed in chapters one and two. There was little point in electors choosing Wilkes as their MP if the ‘government’⁹ prevented him from taking his seat. And it would be difficult for electors to make an informed choice about their law-makers if the government suppressed radical publications. Eighteenth-century Britain was not a democratic country in the modern sense. But was it a society subject to the rule of law as Dicey later defined it?

Entick had obviously ‘suffered in goods’ — his property had been broken into and taken away. But had he committed ‘a distinct breach of the law established in the ordinary manner before the ordinary courts of the land’? Evidently not. He had not been accused nor convicted of a crime, nor brought before any court. In contrast, the government’s officials appeared to have contravened the common law by trespassing on Mr Entick’s land and seizing his property.

Consequently, Mr Entick sued the officials for trespass to his land and goods. Their defence was that the Home Secretary’s warrant provided a lawful excuse for their actions. However, the defence proved difficult to sustain. There was no legislation in force which

⁶ (1765) 19 State Tr 1029.

⁷ This is explored further in ch 8.

⁸ See Maier P (1963) ‘John Wilkes and American disillusionment with Britain’ William and Mary Quarterly 373.

⁹ The word is used guardedly; see ‘John Wilkes’, ch 8, pp 233–234 below.

authorised the Home Secretary to grant such a warrant. Nor was there any common law precedent making this government activity lawful.

Lacking clear statutory or common law authority to justify their actions, the government officials invoked two further defences. The first was an argument of 'state necessity'. The Home Secretary essentially claimed that he thought Entick's papers presented a serious threat to public order; it was necessary to seize the papers to prevent political unrest. The second argument might be described as one of 'custom and tradition'. The power had been used many times, and had never been challenged by anyone. So, surely the practice could not be unlawful? Chief Justice Camden was not interested in what the government thought was necessary, or in what it had done before. His interest was in finding the law. One element of 'the law' was entirely clear:

By the laws of England, every invasion of private property, be it ever so minute is a trespass. No man can set his foot upon my ground without my licence.... If he admits the fact, he is bound to show by way of justification, that some positive law has empowered or excused him....¹⁰

Furthermore, so 'exorbitant' a power as that deployed against Mr Entick could be justified only by clear statutory or common law authority. Camden CJ put the point simply: 'If it is law, it will be found in our books. If it is not to be found there, it is not law'.¹¹ The lawyers arguing the Mr Carrington's case¹² could not find any such authority. In consequence, the entry to Mr Entick's property and seizure of his papers were a trespass. Mr Entick was entitled to recover damages for his loss. The jury awarded the then substantial sum of £300.

Decisions such as Entick v Carrington led one legal philosopher to characterise the courts as the 'lions under the throne' of the British constitution.¹³ The aphorism lends itself to several interpretations, but for our purposes might be seen as suggesting that the judges would spring out and fiercely defend the rights and liberties of individual citizens from unlawful government interference. Entick provides a classic example of the courts upholding the Diceyan version of the rule of law. The theory does not entail that government always acts lawfully, but that citizens have a legal remedy when the government acts unlawfully.

Lord Camden's reasoning reveals the depths to which Lockean notions of 'property' and 'liberty' were embedded within the eighteenth century common law tradition: 'The great end, for which men entered into society, was to secure their property. That right is preserved sacred and incommunicable in all instances, where it has not been taken away or abridged by some public law for the good of the whole'.¹⁴ But even if we accept that defence of 'property' and 'liberty' against arbitrary government is the courts' primary constitutional responsibility—and that is itself a controversial moral proposition—we again encounter the problem of just what 'liberty' and 'property' might mean?

Dicey's rule of law—process or substance?

The concept of the separation of powers, its application in Entick, might lead us to think that Diceyan theories of the rule of law concern only the processes through which laws

¹⁰ (1765) 19 State Tr 1029 at 1066.

¹¹ (1765) 19 State Tr 1029.

¹² Although Mr Carrington was formally the defendant, since he actually committed the trespass, in the broader constitutional sense the Minister's action was in issue.

¹³ Heuston R (1970) 'Liversidge v Anderson in retrospect' LQR 33–68.

¹⁴ (1765) 19 State Tr 1029 at 1066.

are administered, and not their substance.¹⁵ However Dicey's overt focus on process co-existed with a political view about the 'correct' substance of the laws which Parliament makes. Dicey was much concerned that laws had a high degree of predictability or foreseeability. People needed to know where they stood if they were to run a business, get involved in politics, or start certain types of social relationships. Dicey thought the rule of law demanded that Parliament did not give government any arbitrary or wide discretionary powers. A statute which said, for instance, that the Home Secretary can imprison anyone she likes, whenever she likes, for as long as she likes, would not meet the tests of predictability and foreseeability, and would seemingly contradict Dicey's version of rule of law.

But we automatically encounter a major problem here. Dicey seems to be saying that there are limits to the type of governmental powers which Parliament can create if society is to remain subject to the rule of law. Yet the theory of parliamentary sovereignty tells us that there are no legal limitations on the statutes Parliament can enact. One cannot go to court and ask for a statute which (for example) bestows very wide discretionary powers on the Home Secretary to search people's homes and seize their papers to be declared unconstitutional in a legal sense because it contravenes the Diceyan rule of law. Had Parliament in 1760 passed a statute authorising the Home Secretary to seize people's papers whenever he thought such action desirable, Carrington's 'trespass' would have been lawful, and Entick's suit would have failed. While notions of the inviolability of 'property' and 'liberty' were by then 'embedded' in the common law, they were not 'entrenched' in the constitution, since Parliament might impinge upon property rights and personal liberties whenever and however it thought fit. After Entick, Parliament could if it had wished have passed legislation affording 'general warrants' an entirely lawful status.¹⁶

The logical conclusion might therefore be that the rule of law is a less important constitutional principle than the sovereignty of Parliament. But both the Diceyan rule of law and Dicey's theory of parliamentary sovereignty are at root moral concepts. Perhaps they are both, per Professor Wade, 'ultimate political facts'. The difficult question which then arises is how can one have two 'ultimate' facts?¹⁷ Later in this chapter, and in subsequent chapters, we will consider the ways in which this apparent tension has been addressed.

The 'independence of the judiciary'

A second tension between the rule of law and parliamentary sovereignty appears when we consider the 'independence of the judiciary'. Before 1688, and in the years immediately thereafter, English judges held office 'at the King's pleasure'. This meant simply that not only did the King appoint the judges, but also that judges who subsequently displeased the King or his government could be dismissed. This fate befell Coke in the early seventeenth century whose judgments led him into great disfavour with the Crown.¹⁸

The continuance of this situation after the 1688 revolution would have undermined parliamentary sovereignty, since the King could have used his dismissal powers to 'persuade' judges to interpret laws in a manner inconsistent with Parliament's intentions. The solution to this problem, the Act of Settlement 1700, provided that while the Crown ¹⁵ See generally see Craig P (1997) 'Formal and substantive conceptions of the rule of law' Public Law 467.

¹⁶ As it had done in the American colonies; see the US Supreme Court judgment in Boyd v United States 116 US 616 (1886).

¹⁷ See Allan T (1985) 'Legislative supremacy and the rule of law: democracy and constitutionalism' Cambridge LJ 111.

¹⁸ See Plucknett (1928) op cit; Corwin E (1928) 'The higher law background of American constitutional law (parts I and II)' Harvard LR 149–182 and 365–409.

had the power to appoint judges,¹⁹ judges would hold office ‘during good behaviour’. This means a judge could only be removed by a joint address of the House of Lords and House of Commons, after the judge has committed a crime or engaged in some gross form of moral misbehaviour. She cannot simply be sacked by the Crown for producing judgments that the government does not like.

A chief complaint of the American revolutionaries was that the Act of Settlement did not extend to the colonies. Their judges were appointed for limited terms by Colonial Governors, acting on behalf of the Crown, and could be dismissed if they made decisions the Governor disliked. In contrast, Lord Camden could produce a judgment of which the government disapproved in Entick v Carrington because, unlike colonial judges, he was not dismissible at the government’s whim.

However that the Act of Settlement only secured the independence of the judiciary against the Crown, not against Parliament. Parliamentary sovereignty meant both that an individual judge could be dismissed by a majority in the Commons and Lords, and that the rules in the Act of Settlement could be changed by new legislation. This theoretical possibility has yet to emerge in reality: only one High Court judge has ever been dismissed (in 1830);²⁰ and while the Act of Settlement has been subjected to minor modifications, its basic provisions remain intact. We might therefore plausibly conclude that in practice the British constitution affords the judiciary independence (from both government and Parliament) in the tenure of their office. The force of this tradition in the ‘British’ context is perhaps best illustrated by returning to the Harris controversy in South Africa.

Harris v Minister of the Interior*—the aftermath

The only entrenched clauses in South Africa’s constitution in 1952 were s 35, s 137 and s 152. Everything else could seemingly be changed by a simple majority house plus senate vote (and the royal assent). The government decided to use its parliamentary majorities to bypass the Supreme Court’s defence of the constitution. Its first initiative was to promote the High Court of Parliament Act 1952, which purported to turn Parliament itself into a new Court, empowered to hear appeals from the Appellate Division. The ‘Act’ was passed by simple majority. The plaintiffs in Harris immediately challenged this legislation, arguing that any such measure could only be enacted through the s 152 procedures. In Harris (No 2),²¹ the Appellate Division Court invalidated the 1952 Act, using a more inventive strategy than the one deployed in Harris (No 1).

The Court found that s 152 impliedly required that any legislation dealing with matters protected by s 35 or s 137 be subject to scrutiny by a ‘court’. This implied term was a necessary inheritance of the British constitutional tradition on which South Africa’s own constitution was based. Furthermore, a ‘court’ in this sense had to be institutionally independent from the legislature and the government, and had to be staffed by legally qualified ‘judges’. The supposed ‘High Court of Parliament’ met neither criteria. To entrust such a body with the legal protection of s 35 and s 137 would render that protection illusory. A ‘High Court of Parliament’ with jurisdiction to hear cases involving the entrenched clauses could only be created via the s 152 procedures.²²

The government’s second strategy was more straightforward. The Constitution did not prevent the legislature increasing the size of the Appellate Division. Consequently, the

¹⁹ This appointment method survived until the early 21st century. The new position is discussed in ‘Conclusion’, ch 6, p 192 below

²⁰ The judge concerned, Sir Jonah Barrington, sat in Ireland and was dismissed for in effect stealing money that a party had paid into court.

²¹ 1952 (4) SA 769 (A).

²² See Loveland (1999) op cit ch 9.

government invited the legislature to enact the Appellate Division Quorum Act 1955. This legislation—passed by simple majority—added six further judges, appointed by the government, to the existing five. All six ostensibly met the requirement identified in Harris (No 2) that they be legally qualified: they were all either judges in lower courts or law professors. All six were also, however, known supporters of government policy. Parliament then enacted, again by simple majority, the Senate Act 1955. This enlarged the senate from 48 to 89 members, chosen by a method which ensured that they were almost all government supporters. The government thereby gained a two-thirds parliamentary majority. Then, in 1956, Parliament re-enacted the Separate Representation of Voters Act in the manner and form required by s 35. The new eleven judge Supreme Court promptly held that the new Act was constitutional in Collins v Minister of the Interior.²³

All these steps were ‘legal’ in the formal sense, although we would from a contemporary British perspective question their moral acceptability.²⁴ The message conveyed by the Appellate Division Quorum Act 1955 and the judgment in Collins is that there is more to the concept of an ‘independent’ judiciary than job security. Legislatures may create compliant courts by packing them with new judges. ‘Independence’ may be as much a question of a judge’s state of mind as of the fixity of her legal hold on office.²⁵

II. The rule of law in the welfare state

Dicey’s constitutional theories were shaped by the experience of living in a society which permitted few citizens to vote in parliamentary elections, and in which government performed few functions. By the 1950s, virtually all adults were enfranchised,²⁶ and government had assumed a significant role in managing economic and social affairs. At virtually the same time that Dicey was writing his Law of the constitution, Parliament began to enact legislation which gave government bodies loosely defined discretionary powers and duties. This trend accelerated markedly after 1900. It is beyond this book’s scope to consider questions of political theory and history in depth, but it is important that we grasp the rudiments of the two dominant theories which have informed modern British political history.²⁷

The first theory, representing right wing political views, we might call ‘market liberalism’, to which Dicey was an early adherent. Its most celebrated modern defence was authored by Friedrich Hayek in a 1944 book, The Road to Serfdom. The second theory, social democracy, emerged from the centre-left of the political spectrum, and from a lawyer’s viewpoint, is best explained by the American jurist Harry Jones in a 1958 article in the Columbia Law Review.²⁸

²³ 1957 (1) SA 552 (A).

²⁴ See Lewin op cit: Le May G (1957) ‘Parliament, the Constitution and the doctrine of the mandate’ 74 South African Law Journal 33; Loveland (1999) op cit ch 10.

²⁵ This episode suggests there are no simple solutions to the entrenchment conundrum in the British context. Even if we fashioned a legal device which safeguarded basic moral values by demanding that they could be infringed only by super-majorities within Parliament, the protection would be illusory if we did not also ensure that the power to appoint judges and select members of Parliament was regulated in a similar way.

²⁶ The historical development of this element of the constitution is traced in ch 7.

²⁷ See George V and Wilding P (1976) Ideology and state welfare.

²⁸ Jones H (1958) ‘The rule of law and the welfare state’ 58 Columbia LR 143. For a contextualised explanation, see Crosland C (1952) ‘The transition from capitalism’; and Jenkins R (1952) ‘Equality’, both in Crossman R (ed) New Fabian Essays.

Hayek—the road to serfdom

Hayek is a latter day exponent of the orthodox Diceyan viewpoint. For Hayek, the function of the rule of law is to ensure that: ‘government in all its actions is bound by rules fixed and announced beforehand’.²⁹ This concern encompasses both process and substance.

In respect of process, Hayek follows Dicey in demanding that all citizens must have access to an independent judiciary before which they can challenge the legality of government action; is it the case that what government has done accords with a pre-existing common law or statutory rule? The courts’ only duty when deciding a case of this sort is to protect the citizen against the government; judges must not ignore or bend legal rules in order to facilitate the government process. Hayek’s reference to ‘rules’ is fundamental to his analysis. He sees minimal scope for laws which give government discretionary powers, as such powers make it impossible for citizens to predict the exact extent of government authority. This preference for a rule bound government process co-exists with a desire for a government which is minimalist in substance. Hayekians believe that society’s interests are best served by reducing the power and size of government to a minimum, thereby giving individual citizens as much freedom as possible to organise their social and economic affairs. Government must provide an army to defend the country; a police force to uphold the criminal law; and a court system to settle disputes over crimes, contracts, and property. In its most extreme form, market liberalism would maintain that government should have no role at all in the provision of health services, education, housing, or social security. If such things were beneficial to society, they would be provided by private entrepreneurs.

Hayekian theorists accept that there will be great inequalities of wealth in such a society. This is regarded as a natural consequence of people’s varying attitudes and abilities. Hayek considers such inequality to be a lesser evil than the intrusion upon individual freedom which would result if the government took positive steps to address this ‘natural’ state of affairs. The bottom line of the Hayekian analysis is that society cannot have both the rule of law and a welfare state. Since Parliament is sovereign, it may choose one value or the other, but it would be quite wrong for legislators to claim that they could simultaneously pursue both ideals. The rule of law is an absolute value, which can exist only in constitutions which prevent legislators intervening in social and economic affairs. From this viewpoint, the rule of law: ‘has little to do with the question whether all actions of government are legal in the juridical sense’; rather ‘it implies limits to the scope of legislation’.³⁰ In Hayek’s view: ‘any policy aiming directly at a substantive ideal of redistributive justice must lead to the destruction of the rule of law’.³¹

Jones—the rule of law in the welfare state

While Hayek’s theory was influential in Britain in the 1980s, it enjoyed little support among either the Conservative or Labour Parties between 1945 and 1975. The political consensus in that era fell within the broad confines of a social democratic approach to government. The period is often referred to as ‘Butskellism’. This is a combination of the names of R A Butler and Hugh Gaitskell, leading figures in the Conservative and Labour Parties respectively, and stresses the similarity of the political objectives which the two parties pursued.³² This perspective assumes firstly that government should play an extensive role ²⁹ (1944) op cit p 54.

³⁰ (1944) op cit at pp 61–62.

³¹ (1944) op cit, p 59.

³² See George and Wilding op cit chs 2–4.

in economic affairs, and secondly that individuals must accept significant limits on their autonomy if the legislature deems such restraints in the public interest.

Early examples of this theory of government were introduced by the Gladstone and Disraeli administrations in the late-nineteenth century, in legislation which limited the use of child labour for example, or which prevented factories from emptying their effluent into rivers. The justification for such government intervention comes from two sources. Firstly, it is considered 'just' and 'fair' in so far as it protects individuals from exploitation. Secondly, it is thought to be rational for society as a whole; for example the cost of ill health and death resulting from not having controls on pollution outweighs the expense involved in regulating waste disposal.

By the 1950s, this twin rationale underpinned an immense network of government activities; a national health service, millions of publicly owned houses; government control of the coal, steel, water, gas, and electricity industries; old age pensions; unemployment benefits; and free schooling for all children. This clearly represented, in Hayek's words, a 'substantive ideal of redistributive justice'. The welfare state also required Parliament to give government officials many discretionary powers; it was not feasible to run a complex welfare state in accordance with legislative 'rules'. Government was now doing so much, and dealing with so many different issues, that it would be impossible for legislators to produce a rule for every foreseeable situation. This meant that there was some reduction in the precision with which citizens could predict the limits of government's powers. However, some constitutional lawyers denied that this meant that society could not be governed in accordance with the rule of law.

Unlike Hayek, Jones suggests that the rule of law is a relative rather than absolute political value; that one can dilute Dicey's model without removing its basic features. Like Hayek, Jones accepts that 'the rule of law's great purpose is protection of the individual against state power holders'.³³ But he also suggested that the rule of law would continue to exist as long as legislators, government officials, and the judiciary accepted an 'adjudicative ideal'.

While legislation in Hayekian society would take the form of rigid rules, the statutory basis of a welfare state would also contain flexible standards, permitting government to make various responses to given situations. However the adjudicative ideal demands that although the legislature bestows wide discretion on government bodies, it may not grant them arbitrary powers. Jones' version of the rule of law does not dismiss the importance of predictability; rather it accepts that in some areas of government activity it is only necessary that citizens can foresee the general boundaries rather than the precise location of government authority.

Nor does Jones' theory reject the need for a separation of powers. Citizens must be able to challenge the legality of government action through a 'meaningful day in court'. Jones differs from Hayek in assuming that this need not entail resort to the 'ordinary courts'; specialist tribunals could serve this purpose in respect of some government functions, since they might be more informal, more expert and less expensive than the normal judicial process.

The task which faces the courts and tribunals in social democratic society is not to protect the individual at all costs. Since Parliament has given the government discretionary powers, the courts must accept that the legislature intends that individuals might suffer some restraint on their autonomy in order to further the public interest. This may present courts with a difficult problem—how much discretion did Parliament intend the government to have? Jones recognised that this set 'a harder and wider task for the rule of law', but he suggested that Hayek was being unduly pessimistic in suggesting that the concept had to be abandoned altogether.

³³ Op cit at p 145.

Although a welfare state may be difficult to reconcile with a Diceyan or Hayekian view of the rule of law, it would seem consistent with some of the notions of democracy in the sense of government by consent discussed in chapter one. If ‘the people’ have decided that they are willing to dilute the Diceyan ideal to achieve certain social objectives, there would seem to be no obvious barrier to them doing so. Whether that conclusion is, from a political perspective, a sound one, is a question to which we shall return. It would of course be quite possible for a society to adhere to Hayek/Dicey’s version of the rule of law without being a democracy. A dictator who preserved market autonomy and stuck rigidly to pre-announced limits on his powers would pass Hayek’s test. Whether one can have a democratic constitution without respect for at least a diluted version of the rule of law is a more difficult question, which we shall pursue at a later stage.

‘Red light’ and ‘green light’ theories

Jones’ and Hayek/Dicey’s competing viewpoints about the ‘what and the how’ of modern government are neatly encapsulated in what Harlow and Rawlings term the ‘red light’ and ‘green light’ theories of legal control of executive behaviour.³⁴ Red light theorists such as Hayek, echoing Dicey’s suspicion of the executive, maintain that the rule of law’s primary concern should be to stop government interfering with individual autonomy. Green light theorists such as Jones, in contrast, believe that the Diceyan pre-occupation with individual rights is misplaced. They assume that Parliament and the courts should loosen the legal constraints on government discretion, enabling government to curb individual autonomy in order to promote society’s collective well-being.

As we shall see below, the reality of court regulation of government action in the modern British constitutional context does not fit neatly into one or other of these theoretical perspectives. Harlow and Rawlings suggest that we can identify a third theoretical position—‘amber light’ theory—lying between the two extremes. This does not mean that, in practice, legal controls lie at the precise mid-point of the theoretical continuum, but that individual cases are located at various positions on the spectrum.

Within this theoretical framework, legal controls are designed to provide government with some flexibility, but not too much flexibility. That naturally raises the question of ‘How much is too much?’. The issue is perhaps best explored by gradual accumulation of many examples; a task to which, after a brief diversion, we shall return.

III. Judicial regulation of government behaviour: the constitutional rationale

The origins, structure, and powers of the present judicial system is a subject best explored in detail in textbooks dealing with the English legal system. However some broad points must be made here about the nature of both the court system and the ‘judicial law-making process’. All courts in Britain are now in technical terms statutory creations. Prior to the revolution, the legal landscape was littered with many different courts, each exercising nominally independent but frequently overlapping jurisdictions. Numerous piecemeal reforms affecting the court system (such as the Act of Settlement 1700) were introduced during the next 200 years, but for our purposes the most significant legislative initiative was the passage of the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875. These Acts merged the many so-called 'superior' courts into the newly created High Court and Court of Appeal, and defined both the new courts' respective jurisdictions and the qualifications required of the judges who would sit in them. Subsequent statutes confirmed the House of Lords' position (in its judicial capacity) at the apex of the British judicial system, where it functioned as the final court of appeal until superseded by the Supreme Court in 2010.³⁵

³⁴ Op cit chs 1 and 2.

However, while Parliament has periodically altered the structure and jurisdiction of the courts, and while the 'common law'³⁶ is undoubtedly inferior to statute in circumstances where a statutory and common law rule seemingly demand different solutions to particular problems, Parliament has never enacted legislation which has sought systematically to control the method or outcome of the judiciary's law-making process. The 1688 revolution established that statute could alter or abolish any common law principles whenever Parliament wished, but virtually all of those principles initially remained in place. In the absence of statutory controls, the content of the common law remains a matter for the courts to control. And within the modern court system, it has been the House of Lords (and now the Supreme Court) which has determined the substance of common law principles.

Such judicial power is not inconsistent with the notion of parliamentary sovereignty, because it is assumed that Parliament always intends that government will exercise its statutory powers in accordance with common law requirements. One might say that common law principles are the implied terms of the government process, and that Parliament is considered to 'contract in' to these limits on executive autonomy. If Parliament does not want a particular government action to be subject to judicial control, it must say so in the statute which grants the power. Because Parliament is sovereign, it would seem that in theory Parliament can 'contract out' of the common law principles which allow the court to regulate government activities. Such legislation might seem (to adapt Lord Reid's terminology in Madzimbamuto v Lardner-Burke) 'politically or morally improper', in that it derogates from orthodox understandings of the rule of law, but there is no legal impediment to Parliament enacting it.

This book uses the term 'administrative law' to encompass the various common law controls that the courts place on the government process. The concept of judicial review is the main component of administrative law. We explore that concept in detail in later chapters; but, it is necessary at this point to consider the fundamental ingredients of, and justification for the doctrine.

Broadly stated, the modern form of judicial review is designed to uphold a certain interpretation of the rule of law—its function is to ensure that executive bodies remain within the limits of the powers that the legislature has granted, or which are recognised by the courts as existing at common law.

An early judicial statement of the principle is provided by Coke CJ in Baggs Case,³⁷ which concerned the attempts of the Mayor and Burgesses of Plymouth to expel one of their number from the city's council. In holding that the expulsion was unlawful, Coke CJ made a more general statement of the scope of the court's powers:

[T]his court hath not only jurisdiction to correct errors in judicial proceedings, but other misdemeanours extrajudicial tending to the breach of the peace or the oppression of the subject...or any other manner of misgovernment; so that no wrong or injury, either publick or private, can be done but this shall be reformed or punished.³⁸

³⁵ The reform is discussed further in 'Conclusion', ch 6, p 192.

³⁶ The term is used here loosely, to denote laws made by courts rather than by Parliament. The distinctions between common law, equity and other forms of judicial law-making are an unnecessary complication for this study.

³⁷ (1615) 11 Co Rep 93b.

The intricacies and complexities of the emergence and consolidation of the judicial review jurisdiction merit closer examination than they can be given here.³⁹ For our limited purposes, a preliminary understanding is perhaps best gleaned from the 1948 Court of Appeal decision in *Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corpn*⁴⁰ which is often invoked as the clearest restatement both of the constitutional basis for judicial review of government action and of the principles which a court will deploy to establish if a government body's action is lawful.

The case itself concerned a substantive issue of minor importance. Local councils in England and Wales were empowered by s 1 of the Sunday Entertainments Act 1932 to place 'such conditions as the authority think fit to impose' on cinemas in the council's area which wished to open on Sundays. The Wednesbury Corporation imposed a condition which forbade children under the age of fifteen from attending cinemas on Sundays. The cinema company, facing an obvious threat to its profits, argued that the condition was unlawful.

The judgment in Wednesbury identifies three grounds on which a court may find that executive action is 'ultra vires', that is to say 'beyond the limits' of parliamentary (or sometimes common law) authority.

The first ground could be described as 'illegality'. If Parliament passes a statute for instance which allows the government to provide schools, the government could not invoke that statute as a justification to build houses. Similarly, a government body empowered by a statute to employ teachers could not invoke the legislation to justify employing nurses or train drivers. Clearly, the Corporation's condition in the Wednesbury case did not fall into this category.

A government body also exceeds its statutory powers if it uses them to produce 'unreasonable' or 'irrational' results. This ground of review is particularly important in respect of discretionary powers. The concept of 'unreasonableness' or 'irrationality' bears a special meaning in administrative law.⁴¹ A government decision is only unreasonable/irrational if its content is so bizarre that no reasonable person could have assumed Parliament would have intended it to happen. As an example, assume that a statute gives government the power to employ teachers in primary schools 'on such terms as it thinks fit'. The exercise of that power would only be unreasonable if it produced an outcome that bore no relation at all to rational objectives; if the government body decided not to employ anyone with red hair for instance. In contrast, reasonable people might reach different conclusions about precisely how much teachers should be paid, or what level of qualifications teachers should have. Such diversity is perfectly lawful: administrative law accepts that when a statute uses a discretionary term, Parliament assumes there will be variation in the substance of decisions reached. The notion of irrationality functions to ensure that those variations remain within the boundaries of political consensus that Parliament envisaged. The condition attached by the council in the Wednesbury case could not plausibly be classified as 'irrational' in this sense, even if it was more restrictive than conditions imposed by other nearby local authorities.

The third ground of review is sometimes referred to as 'natural justice'. This ground of review is not concerned with the substance of a given decision, but rather with the way ³⁸ (1615) 11 Co Rep 93b at 98a.

³⁹ See de Smith S (1951) 'The prerogative writs' Cambridge LJ 40; Jaffe L and Henderson G (1956) 'Judicial review and the rule of law: historical origins' LQR 345.

⁴⁰ [1948] 1 KB 223, CA.

⁴¹ 'Irrationality' is the more modern term. See further 'Irrationality', ch 14 at pp 464–470 below.

in which the decision has been reached. Administrative law requires that government bodies exercise their statutory or common law powers through fair procedures. Broadly stated, this means firstly that decision-makers should not have a personal interest in the decision being made; and secondly that people affected by the decision should have an opportunity to state their case before a conclusion is reached.

Judicial review is a supervisory rather than appellate jurisdiction. A court which holds a government action unlawful will not substitute its own decision for the one made by the government body concerned, but will return the question to the original decision-maker so that the decision can be made again, this time in accordance with legal requirements. In contrast, in an action for (for example) trespass or breach of contract, the court will impose its solution on the dispute before it.

The theoretical rationale for judicial control of government behaviour derives from the constitution's 'ultimate political fact' of parliamentary sovereignty. This requires that the government may only perform those tasks that Parliament (or the common law) permits. The courts' constitutional role is therefore to police the boundaries of legislative intent,⁴² and ensure that government cannot overstep those boundaries without incurring legal liability.

Yet one should beware of concluding from this that the courts' role is one of mere mechanical obeisance to legislative texts. We return to this point in more detail below. But here we might note that since the Wednesbury grounds of review are common law concepts, the courts may amend, abolish or add to those grounds as they think fit. We will shortly, when examining the concept of stare decisis, encounter the moral principles which have led the courts to be cautious in developing new grounds of review or redefining existing ones. But until Parliament enacts legislation on the issue, there is no legal barrier to radical judicial reform of any existing common law principle.

This necessarily leads us to ask to whom, or to what, does a judge's constitutional loyalty ultimately lie? This is less a question of a judge's personal predisposition, than of the principles which judges deploy when interpreting the meaning of statutes and deciding the content of the common law. Both issues are more appropriately discussed in detail in textbooks on jurisprudence or the English legal system, but they are integral elements of the contemporary constitutional order, and merit at least brief consideration.⁴³

IV. Principles of statutory interpretation

While the words of a statute have traditionally been regarded as the 'highest form of law' known to the British constitution, the task of attaching a specific legal meaning to those words has generally fallen to the courts. The inherent imprecision of language necessarily entails that even legislation which is expressed in the form of rigid rules may sometimes raise questions concerning its applicability to particular situations. Such uncertainty is much increased when Parliament employs statutory formulae bestowing discretionary powers on government bodies. Since the resolution of such uncertainty is a judicial function, the process of statutory interpretation is thus a crucial element both of the rule of law and the sovereignty of Parliament.

Parliament has on occasion enacted legislation instructing the courts as to the meaning to be accorded to particular words or phrases which constantly reappear in various ⁴² This point applies also to legal justifications for government behaviour rooted in common law, for one assumes that particular common law rules exist only because Parliament has not abolished or amended them.

⁴³ See Michael Zander's (4th edn, 1994) The law-making process chs 3–4.

statutes. We saw one example of a so-called ‘interpretation act’ in chapter two when we looked at the role played by Lord Brougham’s Act of 1850 in Chorlton v Lings. However, such legislation pertains to technicalities rather than to sweeping instructions as to broad interpretative techniques. That latter component of the constitution is one historically left by Parliament to be controlled by the courts as an element of the common law. Three techniques of interpretation, respectively referred to as the ‘literal rule’, the ‘golden rule’, and the ‘mischief rule’ have traditionally been recognised as legitimate.

The literal rule

While judges often suggest that in interpreting statutes they are seeking to find Parliament’s ‘intentions’, the reference to intentions is generally taken to mean not that a court is considering what was in the minds of the legislators who voted for a particular measure, but what is the ordinary and natural meaning of the words which the legislators used in the text of the Act. What has been termed the ‘literal rule’ of statutory interpretation has been by far the dominant approach taken by the courts. The literal rule suggests that the court’s duty is to attach the orthodox, grammatical meaning to the statute’s phraseology, even if that leads to ostensibly unjust or bizarre results.

The literal rule was most clearly expressed by Lord Esher in 1892 in R v Judge of the City of London Court: ‘If the words of the Act are clear, you must follow them, even though they lead to a manifest absurdity. The court has nothing to do with the question of whether the legislature has committed an absurdity’.⁴⁴

The literal rule betokens a dogmatic judicial acceptance of the common law’s constitutional inferiority to statute. Since Parliament may if it wishes enact ‘absurdities’, the court would be questioning Parliament’s sovereignty if it tried to attach a ‘sensible’ interpretation to statutory formulae whose literal meaning pointed in a different direction. If the ‘absurdity’ was a mistake rather than an intended consequence, the solution would be for Parliament to enact a new statute amending the former Act. The point was made in grand theoretical terms by Lord Diplock in Duport Steel v Sirs:

[I]t cannot be too strongly emphasised that the British constitution, though largely unwritten, is firmly based upon the separation of powers; Parliament makes the laws, the judiciary interpret them. When Parliament legislates to remedy what the majority of its members at the time perceive to be a defect or a lacuna in the existing law (whether it be the written law enacted by existing statutes or the unwritten common law as it has been expounded by the judges in decided cases), the role of the judiciary is confined to ascertaining from the words that Parliament has approved as expressing its intention what that intention was, and to giving effect to it. Where the meaning of the statutory words is plain and unambiguous it is not for the judges to invent fancied ambiguities as an excuse for failing to give effect to its plain meaning because they themselves consider that the consequences of doing so would be inexpedient, or even unjust or immoral.... Under our constitution it is Parliament’s opinion on these matters that is paramount.

⁴⁴ [1892] 1 QB 273 at 290, CA. See also Lord Reid in Inland Revenue Commissioners v Hinchy [1960] AC 748 at 767:

What we must look for is the intention of Parliament, and I also find it difficult to believe that Parliament ever really intended the consequences which flow from the [commissioners’] contention. But we can only take the intention of Parliament from the words which they have used in the Act, and therefore the question is whether these words are capable of a more limited construction.

If not, then we must apply them as they stand, however unreasonable or unjust the consequences, and however strongly we may suspect that this was not the real intention of Parliament...

A statute passed to remedy what is perceived by Parliament to be a defect in the existing law may in actual operation turn out to have injurious consequences that Parliament did not anticipate at the time the statute was passed. . . . But if this be the case it is for Parliament, not for the judiciary, to decide whether any changes should be made to the law as stated in the Acts.⁴⁵

We should not however assume that such a clear statement of principle will necessarily produce similar clarity in practice. Judges may take quite different views as to the ‘literal’ meaning of particular words or phrases and thence as to the legal effect of particular statutory provisions.⁴⁶

Complicating the literal rule: (most) statutory provisions are ‘always speaking’

The scope for uncertainty as to the ‘literal’ meaning of words or phrases in Acts increases when we ask if the literal meaning the court is seeking is the one which would have prevailed when the provision was enacted or when the provision is being construed by the court. It is of course quite possible that the ordinary or natural meaning of words will alter over long—or even short—periods of time. Parliament might, in recognition of the dynamic nature of language, alter legislation accordingly. If it has not done so, the question which arises is whether it is appropriate for the courts to ‘update’ the provision by giving its words their ‘new’ rather than ‘original’ meaning.

One might readily think that Diceyan notions of the sovereignty of Parliament and the separation of powers—particularly when restated in the forceful fashion deployed by Lord Diplock in Duport Steel—would lead the courts to accept that the common law would require that when interpreting a statutory term the judge should lend that term the meaning it bore when enacted. However, the constitutional orthodoxy which has developed is that statutes should (generally) be presumed to be ‘always speaking’.⁴⁷ The position is put in this way in Bennion’s influential text, Statutory interpretation:

[T]he interpreter is to presume that Parliament intended the original Act to be applied at any future time in such a way as to give effect to the original intention. Accordingly the interpreter is to make allowances for any relevant changes that have occurred, since the Act’s passing, in law, social conditions, technology, the meaning of words and other matters.⁴⁸

The application of the ‘always speaking’ doctrine is helpfully illustrated in R v Ireland; R v Burstow.⁴⁹ The principal issue before the court in Burstow was the meaning of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s 20 and s 47, which provide:

20. Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously . . . inflict any grievous bodily harm upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted therefore shall be liable [to imprisonment . . . for not more than five years].

47. Whosoever shall be convicted upon an indictment of any assault occasioning actual bodily harm shall be liable . . . [to imprisonment for not more than five years].

Both defendants had engaged in conduct, primarily by making silent and/or threatening telephone calls, which had caused their respective victims serious psychiatric harm.

⁴⁵ [1982] 1 WLR 142 at 157. The case involved statutory protection given to trade unions and their members against actions in tort for losses caused by the unions’ actions in furtherance of trade disputes. Lord Diplock’s judgment made it entirely clear that he disapproved of the effect of the Act, which literally construed, afforded trade unions very extensive protection. Such disapproval was however irrelevant to the question of the meaning of the Act.

⁴⁶ See the cases discussed in Ingman T (2011) The English legal process pp 140–143.

⁴⁷ Bennion F (1997) Statutory interpretation p 686.

⁴⁸ Ibid, at 687.

⁴⁹ [1998] AC 147.

The point of interpretation which arose was whether ‘bodily harm’ included psychiatric injury, or was limited to non-psychiatric bodily injury. If the latter view was correct, neither defendant would have committed an offence.

The primary argument advanced by the defendants was that the phrase ‘bodily harm’ should be construed as it would have been understood in 1861 when the statute was enacted. At that time, it was contended, the state of medical knowledge and opinion would not have recognized psychiatric injury as bodily harm.

The House of Lords rejected that argument in principle. Lord Steyn’s leading judgment suggested that the method underling the defendant’s case would in most cases be misconceived, since: ‘statutes will generally be found to be of the “always speaking” variety’.⁵⁰ It was thus to the medical understandings of 1980, not of 1861, that the Court would look to ascertain the meaning of ‘bodily harm’. In the Court’s view, the then prevalent view was that severe psychiatric distress could amount to bodily harm, and so the defendants’ convictions were upheld.

The ‘always speaking’ technique was deployed in Burstow to answer a newly-emergent question. However the approach can also be used to alter previously authoritative rulings as to what particular statutory provisions mean. In 2010, in Yemshaw v Hounslow LBC,⁵¹ the Supreme Court considered the meaning of the term ‘violence’ in the Housing Act 1996. Five years earlier, in Danesh v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council,⁵² the Court of Appeal had rejected submissions that ‘violence’, literally construed, could include actions which did not involve physical contact between the perpetrator and the victim. Actions which caused the victim severe fear or distress, or even (psychiatric) bodily harm in the Burstow, Ireland sense, would not be violent in the absence of physical contact. That conclusion was overruled in Yemshaw. The Supreme Court suggested that Danesh was wrongly decided at the time, but even if it was correct in 2006, it could not be so regarded in 2011. The Court referred to a substantial range of sources (including government policy statements, Law Commission reports and United Nations resolutions) to justify lending the notion of ‘violence’ a much broader meaning which could include psychological and emotional abuse.

Neither Lord Steyn’s opinion in Burstow nor Baroness Hale’s judgment in Yemshaw indicated how we know if a statute is of the ‘always speaking variety’.⁵³ That is an unfortunate omission. But the more significant point is that if we accept most statutes to be ‘always speaking’, then as a statute ages, and as the social, cultural and economic contexts in which its terms are applied change, so we might defensibly suggest that in a practical sense the moral beliefs to which ‘the law’ gives effect are those of the courts rather than the legislature.

This proposition might be reconciled with orthodox notions of parliamentary sovereignty if we assume an initial (and continuing) tacit acceptance by legislators that the statutes they enact (and leave formally unamended) are indeed ‘always speaking’.⁵⁴ It is less easy to reconcile the proposition as a principle, and its practical effect in Burstow, with Diceyan notions of the rule of law which demand a high degree of predictability in the content of the law.

⁵⁰ Ibid, at 158. ⁵¹ [2011] UKSC 3; [2011] 1 WLR 433.

⁵² [2006] EWCA Civ 1404; [2007] 1 WLR 69.

⁵³ Like Lord Steyn in Burstow/Ireland, Baroness Hale in Yemshaw indicated that most statutes were of the ‘always speaking’ kind.

⁵⁴ Although we might also observe that it would be a matter of no difficulty for an enacting Parliament expressly to state that in the relevant Act.

The golden rule

The so-called 'golden rule' credits the legislature with a greater degree of rationality than does the literal rule. It suggests that when a literal reading of a particular statutory provision would lead to an absurdity, the court should examine the statute in its entirety to see if another, more sensible meaning might be attached to the relevant words in the light of the legislative context in which they appear.

An interesting modern example of the application of the golden rule is provided by Royal College of Nursing of the United Kingdom v DHSS.⁵⁵ The Offences Against the Person Act 1861 s 58 criminalised the practice of abortion.⁵⁶ The statute did not contain any explicit defence on the basis that an abortion might be necessary to safeguard the life or health of the pregnant woman. However in R v Bourne,⁵⁷ the High Court concluded that the word 'unlawfully' in s 58 embraced a defence, in so far as a qualified medical practitioner who performed an abortion for the purpose of preserving the life or health of the pregnant woman was not acting unlawfully.⁵⁸

Parliament did not alter the law on abortion until 1967. The Abortion Act of that year significantly relaxed the previous law, providing in effect that abortion would be available whenever two doctors confirmed that continuing the pregnancy would adversely affect the health of the woman. The Act also imposed controls on where and by whom abortions could be carried out. For present purposes, the key provision is s 1(1), which provided that a criminal offence would be committed if the pregnancy was 'terminated by' a person other than a doctor.

In 1967, abortion was exclusively a surgical procedure. However by the late 1970s a new procedure had developed which induced abortion by the use of intravenously administered drugs. The new procedure had many discrete stages, and could last for as long as thirty hours. The then prevailing medical opinion was that the new procedure could be conducted quite safely by nurses as long as a doctor oversaw the process and could be called upon to attend the patient in person in the event of complications. The Department of Health favoured the new procedure as it made fewer demands on doctors' time (and thence on the National Health Service's budget). Several thousand such procedures were being conducted each year. Many nurses were however concerned that since they were not doctors, they would be committing a criminal offence under s 1(1) if they actually administered the drugs which induced the abortion.

The narrow question before the House of Lords in the Royal College of Nursing case was the meaning of the phrase 'when a pregnancy is terminated by a registered medical practitioner' in s 1(1).⁵⁹ The meaning contended for by the government was apparently two steps removed from a narrowly literalist reading of the text. The first step was to argue that the word 'terminated' actually meant: 'course of treatment resulting in termination'. The second was that 'by a registered medical practitioner' meant: 'overseen by a registered medical practitioner in accordance with accepted standards of good medical practice'.

⁵⁵ [1981] AC 800. Curiously, the case is invoked by Lord Steyn in Burston as an 'always speaking' case. There is no obvious support for that assertion in the majority opinions.

⁵⁶ 'Whosoever, with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she be or be not with child, shall unlawfully administer to her or cause to be taken by her any poison or other noxious thing, or shall unlawfully use any instrument or other means whatsoever with the like intent, shall be guilty of felony.'

⁵⁷ [1939] 1 KB 687.

⁵⁸ Bourne was in effect a test case, brought at the initiative of a consultant obstetrician, Aleck Bourne, who performed an abortion on a 15-year-old girl pregnant because of rape and invited the police to prosecute him. The history of the case has been rather neglected by lawyers. See de Costa C (2009) 'The King versus Aleck Bourne' Medical Journal of Australia 230.

⁵⁹ It was accepted by all parties that 'registered medical practitioner' meant a doctor licenced to practice in the United Kingdom.

Neither Lord Wilberforce nor Lord Edmund-Davies accepted this line of argument. As Lord Wilberforce put it: 'But with all respect, this is not construction, it is rewriting'.⁶⁰ Lord Edmund-Davies took a similar view: 'My Lords, this is redrafting with a vengeance'.⁶¹

[The dissenting judges considered that the government was seeking to extend the law, and that such a result could only properly be achieved by new legislation.⁶² Given the morally controversial nature of any such 'relaxation' of the abortion laws, it is likely that the government (then the first Thatcher administration) had no wish to follow this course even if it were confident that a parliamentary majority would support such a change.

The government was however spared that political difficulty by the decision of the majority of the Court. Lord Diplock identified an absurdity (although he did not use that term expressly) which would flow from a literal construction of s 1(1); namely that a doctor would commit an offence in any case where the procedure did not result in an abortion.⁶³ Lords Keith and Roskill were more concerned by the fact that a literal reading would mean that thousands of nurses who had carried out the procedure already had committed a criminal offence. These consequences were apparently sufficiently undesirable to justify a more extensive search for the meaning of s 1(1) than merely looking at its words.

The majority opinions focused on the fact that various other provisions in the statute use the term 'treatment' rather than 'termination'. There was no obvious rationale for the different terminology, and so it was proper to assume that the terms were interchangeable.⁶⁴ The majority then reasoned that 'treatment' was something which would be conducted as a 'team effort' involving many different types of hospital staff each performing such roles as were consistent with her qualifications and experience. Such treatment would be undertaken 'by' a doctor for the purposes of s 1(1) as long as it was: 'prescribed by [her] and carried out in accordance with his directions'.⁶⁵

That the House of Lords was divided 3/2 not just on the outcome of the litigation but also on the appropriate interpretive technique to be used forcefully illustrates the simplistic nature of the constitutional homily that Parliament legislates and the courts interpret. The reality—if by reality we mean which constitutional actors effectively determine the moral content of the law—is a good deal more complicated than that.

The mischief rule

The third strategy, the 'mischief rule' rule requires that the court ask itself which 'mischief' or defect in the common law or a previous statute the statutory provision in issue was intended to remove, and thereafter to construe the Act in a manner that minimises the possibility of the mischief recurring.

The mischief rule has pre-revolutionary roots. Its origin is frequently identified as the 1584 judgment in Heydon's Case,⁶⁶ which concerned the construction of legislation passed by Parliament to assist Henry VIII's ambitions to gain control of lands owned by monasteries. The rule formulated in Heydon's Case required a court to conduct a four stage inquiry:

- 1st. What was the common law before the making of the Act.
- 2nd. What was the mischief and defect for which the common law did not provide.
- 3rd. What remedy the Parliament hath resolved and appointed to cure the disease of the commonwealth.

⁶⁰ Ibid, at 823.

⁶¹ Ibid, at 831.

⁶² See especially Lord Wilberforce at 822.

⁶³ This was dismissed as 'fanciful' by Lord Wilberforce and 'in reality non-existent' by Lord Edmund-Davies: ibid, at 823 and 833.

⁶⁴ See Lord Diplock at 827–828; Lord Roskill at 837–838.

⁶⁵ See Lord Diplock at 828; Lord Keith at 835; Lord Roskill at 838.

⁶⁶ [1584] EWHC Exch J36; 76 ER 637.

And, 4th. The true reason of the remedy; and then the office of all the Judges is always to make such construction as shall suppress the mischief, and advance the remedy, and to suppress subtle inventions and evasions for continuance of the mischief...

In its initial form, the judges' interpretation of the mischief rule did not empower them to look beyond the statute and the relevant common law rules to ascertain the 'mischief' Parliament was supposedly trying to remove. Thus, if a logical parliamentary intent could not be deduced from the words of the Act itself, the rule could not be applied.⁶⁷ By the mid-1970s, the courts had begun to refer to government policy documents explaining the policies underlying particular legislative reforms as an aid to interpretation.⁶⁸ That initiative certainly enhanced the potency of the mischief rule. But its utility continued to be greatly limited by the courts' presumption that their search for Parliament's intentions did not permit them to clarify the meaning of statutory texts by referring to speeches made about the legislation during its passage through the Commons and the Lords. We consider the basis and implications of that principle, and the House of Lords' more recent departure from it, at a later stage, for neither can be fully understood until we have examined the nature of the legislative process in rather greater detail.⁶⁹

Purposive (or 'teleological') interpretation

All three traditional strategies draw a clear distinction between the legislative and judicial role, and emphasise the subordinacy of the latter to the former. They did not, however, find favour with all members of the judiciary, some of whom thought a more radical approach was sometimes desirable. Lord Denning, in the 1950 case of Magor and St Mellons RDC v Newport Corpn, advanced (in a dissenting judgment) a rather different understanding of the court's 'interpretative' duty:

We do not sit here to pull the language of Parliament and of Ministers to pieces and make nonsense of it.... We sit here to find out the intention of Parliament and of Ministers and carry it out, and we do this better by filling in the gaps and making sense of the enactment than by opening it up to destructive analysis.⁷⁰

Lord Denning's initiative may be seen as an example of a fourth interpretative technique, now known as the 'purposive' or 'teleological' approach. This strategy rejects the presumption that a judge should restrict her search for the meaning of law to the statute itself, but rather tries to imagine what the framers of the legislation would have done if faced with the problem now before the court. The teleological strategy was by then already a common feature of many continental European legal systems, and was widely used in the United States. But Lord Denning's efforts to 'import' it so transparently into the English constitutional tradition found little favour with the House of Lords. On further appeal, the House of Lords firmly rebutted Lord Denning's presumptions as to the judiciary's appropriate constitutional role. According to Lord Simonds:

[T]he general proposition that it is the duty of the court to find out the intention of Parliament—and not only of Parliament but of Ministers also—cannot by any means be supported. The duty of the court is to interpret the words that the legislature has used.⁷¹

⁶⁷ For a forceful criticism of this approach see Smith H (1926) 'The residue of power in Canada' Canadian Bar Review 432.

⁶⁸ Black-Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG [1975] AC 591, HL.

⁶⁹ In ch 8 below. ⁷⁰ [1949] 2 KB 481 at 498–499; [1950] 2 All ER 1226 at 1236, CA.

⁷¹ [1952] AC 189 at 191; [1951] 2 All ER 839 at 841, HL.

As to Lord Denning's suggestion that the court might 'fill in the gaps' left by the statute's text, Lord Simonds identified fundamental constitutional objections. For a court to adopt such techniques would be; 'a naked usurpation of the legislative function under the thin guise of interpretation... If a gap is disclosed, the remedy lies in an amending Act'.⁷²

Lord Simonds somewhat overstated the 'naked usurpation' criticism. In the absence of legislation specifically forbidding 'purposive' interpretative techniques, the House of Lords (as the ultimate arbiter of common law principles) was in theory quite competent to jettison the three traditional rules and adopt Lord Denning's preferred option. That the majority in Magor chose not to do so was an indication that they considered such an innovation 'unconstitutional' in the sense of its political illegitimacy, not of its legal impossibility.

The case does however emphasise the point that the dividing line between 'interpretation' and 'legislation' may be difficult to draw. We can confidently state that, as a matter of constitutional theory, Parliament legislates and the courts interpret. It is more difficult to ascertain whether, as a matter of constitutional practice, that theory is always respected. That difficulty is compounded by the fact that the common law recognizes a range of different interpretive techniques as being acceptable, and by the frequent lack of clarity in judicial opinions as to which technique is actually being used. This problem is perhaps best illustrated by examining the judgments delivered in two leading cases: Liversidge v Anderson from 1942 and R v IRC, ex p Rossminster from 1980.

Liversidge v Anderson* (1942)

*Liversidge v Anderson*⁷³ arose out of the Defence Regulations 1939, a measure enacted at the start of World War II to strengthen the government's powers to protect the country from sabotage or treason by enemy agents. Regulation 18b provided that:

If the Home Secretary has reasonable cause to believe any person to be of hostile origins or association..., he may make an order against that person directing that he be detained.

Between May and August 1940, the Home Secretary, Sir John Anderson, used reg 18b to detain 1,500 people.⁷⁴ One person detained was Robert Liversidge. Liversidge sued Anderson for false imprisonment. Liversidge had obviously been made (to borrow from Dicey's formulation of the rule of law) to 'suffer in body'—he had been confined in prison. The question before the court was whether the executive action which had led to Liversidge's detention was lawful. Was there a statutory or common law power which entitled the government to lock Mr Liversidge up? Liversidge's contention was that although the Defence Regulations empowered the Home Secretary to detain people in some circumstances, those circumstances did not exist in this particular case. The detention was therefore 'illegal' in the Wednesbury sense.

To understand the basis of Mr Liversidge's argument, we must examine the precise wording of reg 18b. It says that the Home Secretary can detain an individual if: 'he has reasonable cause to believe' that person is of hostile origin or association. The insertion of the 'reasonable cause to believe' clause seems to fit with the Diceyan idea of the rule of law which disapproves of any statute in which Parliament grants the government wide discretionary powers. The clause seems to limit the possibility of the Home Secretary using the power arbitrarily. Detention would not be lawful unless a court was satisfied that the Home Secretary's beliefs were underpinned by 'reasonable cause'. Regulation 18b would therefore implicitly seem to require the Home Secretary to show the court the evidence on which his suspicions were based, and to convince the judges that the evidence did indeed amount to a 'reasonable cause'. The obvious meaning of reg 18b would seem to be that if there was insufficient evidence to support the conclusion that a detainee had hostile origins, the power could not lawfully be used.

⁷² Ibid. ⁷³ [1942] AC 206, HL.

⁷⁴ See the fascinating study by Simpson A (1991) In the highest degree odious.

The government itself had acknowledged that this was the correct interpretation of the regulations in the first case challenging their use, Lees v Anderson.⁷⁵ In a subsequent case, R v Home Secretary, ex p Budd,⁷⁶ the government changed its argument, and contended that no such evidence need be presented. In short, the government's contention was that as long as the Home Secretary believed that a person was of 'hostile origins or association', that belief was necessarily 'reasonable'. That argument did not initially succeed; the court had ordered Mr Budd to be released because the Home Secretary produced no evidence of his 'hostility'. Mr Budd then suffered the misfortune of being detained again. On this occasion, the court accepted the government's arguments as to the effect of reg 18b and saw no need to make any examination at all of the sufficiency of the evidence which led the Home Secretary to exercise his powers.

When Liversidge v Anderson reached the House of Lords, the meaning of reg 18b was therefore uncertain. Four⁷⁷ of the five members of the House of Lords accepted the government's interpretation of reg 18b. They concluded that the Home Secretary could use reg 18b to imprison anyone he thought was of hostile origins. He did not need to offer the court any evidence to show that his belief was reasonable. He could imprison anyone at all. He did not have to say why. And anyone who was detained was wasting her time coming to the courts to challenge the adequacy of the Home Secretary's belief. Lord Wright encapsulated the majority sentiment by concluding that:

All the word 'reasonable', then, means is that the minister must not lightly or arbitrarily invade the liberty of the subject, He must be reasonably satisfied before he acts, but it is still his decision, and not the decision of anyone else.... No outsider's decision is invoked, nor is the issue within the competence of any court.⁷⁸

One Law Lord took a different view. Lord Atkin thought that reg 18b could bear only one possible meaning. If Parliament said 'reasonable cause to believe', it must have intended that there be some plausible evidence on which that view was based. If legislators had intended to give the Home Secretary an arbitrary power, they would simply have said 'if the Home Secretary believes'. Regulation 18(b)'s parliamentary history seems to support Lord Atkin's view. The original version of the regulation had not included the 'reasonable cause' requirement. It had been inserted as an amendment because MPs had feared that leaving it out would give the Home Secretary too arbitrary a power. This suggests that the majority judgment effectively permitted the government both to disregard the principle of parliamentary sovereignty and to contravene Dicey's version of the rule of law. It seems that only Lord Atkin had upheld the orthodox tradition that the courts should interpret the words used in legislation in accordance with their literal meaning.⁷⁹

But despite the apparently 'unconstitutional' nature of the majority judgment, it was Lord Atkin who received considerable criticism from the government, from fellow judges, ⁷⁵ (1940) Times, 13 and 21 August; discussed in Simpson op cit pp 62–63 and ch 14.

⁷⁶ [1942] 1 All ER 373. See Simpson op cit pp 318–321.

⁷⁷ Viscount Maugham, Lord Macmillan, Lord Wright, and Lord Romer.

⁷⁸ [1942] AC 206 at 268–270, HL.

⁷⁹ The division of opinion on the court was reflected in contemporaneous academic critique. In support of the majority see Holdsworth W (1942) 'Note' LQR 1 and Goodhart A (1942) 'Note' LQR 3. For an analysis supportive of Lord Atkin see Allen C. (1942) 'Regulation 18B and reasonable cause...' LQR 232.

and from the public. In part, this criticism was directed at the substance of his opinion. The country was after all at war. People were greatly concerned about saboteurs, traitors and spies. Lord Atkin was accused of wanting to tie the government's hands in its efforts to root out these potential enemies. Hayekian theory, for example, would accept that the rule of law could legitimately be 'suspended' during war, on the grounds that the most important political value (another 'ultimate political fact?') was the preservation of the country's very existence as an independent state.⁸⁰

However, Lord Atkin also antagonised many people (including fellow judges) by the language that he used.⁸¹ He accused his four colleagues in the Lords of being 'more executive minded than the executive'.⁸² Lord Atkin had found only one possible 'authority' to justify the majority's interpretation of reg 18b. There is a scene in Alice through the looking glass where Alice and Humpty Dumpty discuss the use of language:

When I use a word,' Humpty Dumpty said in rather a scornful tone, 'it means just what I choose it to mean, neither more nor less.' 'The question is,' said Alice, 'whether you can make words mean different things.' 'The question is,' said Humpty Dumpty, 'which is to be master—that's all.'⁸³

The important inference to draw from Lord Atkin's dissent is that there is little point in regarding the relationship between citizens and the government as a 'political contract' in which Parliament creates a legal framework to which the people consent, nor to assume that the constitution rests on the twin bedrocks of parliamentary sovereignty and the Diceyan rule of law, if the words that the legislature uses in statutes to express its wishes can be interpreted by the courts to mean things that legislators did not intend. Such an outcome might be seen as a judicial subversion of the power of Parliament.

One might meet this point by suggesting that the majority decision in Liversidge must have been 'correct', because Parliament did not reverse it. As we shall later see, that argument rather oversimplifies the nature of the relationship between Parliament and the courts. It also fails to meet the objection that the House of Commons, the House of Lords or the Monarch might seek to mislead each other (or combine to mislead the people) by deliberately passing Bills in the expectation that the courts will lend the resultant statute an interpretation that defies accepted understandings as to the meaning of language.

Following Liversidge, one of Lord Atkin's fellow judges (Stable J) wrote to him to say the majority decision brought the judiciary into disrepute. The judges were no longer 'lions under the throne, but mice squeaking under a chair in the Home Office'.⁸⁴ The case once again suggests that effective functioning of the rule of law, at least as Dicey understood it, requires judges who possess an independence of mind, as well as an independence of office.⁸⁵

R v IRC, ex p Rosminster Ltd (1980)

The Taxes Management Act 1970, s 20C seemed to bestow sweeping search and seizure powers on Inland Revenue employees. Section 20C—which was added to the original Act in 1976—empowered the Inland Revenue to seek a search warrant from a circuit judge. If the judge was satisfied that there were reasonable grounds to assume that evidence of ⁸⁰ The principle is sometimes expressed in the latin maxim salus populi est suprema lex.

⁸¹ See Heuston op cit. ⁸² [1942] AC 206 at 244, HL. ⁸³ [1942] AC 206 at 245, HL.

⁸⁴ Quoted in Heuston op cit at p 51.

⁸⁵ For a fascinating account of the WWI equivalent of reg 18b see Foxton D (2003) 'R v Halliday ex parte Zedig in retrospect' LQR 455.

a tax fraud might be found on particular premises, she could issue a warrant authorising a named officer to: ‘Seize and remove any things whatsoever found there which he has reasonable cause to believe may be required as evidence...’. The Act did not explicitly require that the warrant specify the precise offence being investigated, nor identify the suspected perpetrator(s).

Acting under such a warrant, Inland Revenue officials raided Rossminster’s premises and, without offering details of the matter under investigation, seized many documents. The legal background to the Rossminster seizure is distinguishable from the background to the Entick case, since the seizure was purportedly rooted in a statutory power. Rossminster nevertheless claimed that Lord Camden’s reasoning was relevant to interpretation of s 20C. Rossminster argued that the court should presume that Parliament intended s 20C to be construed consistently with the common law principles informing Entick—namely that the power would only be used in a precisely targeted way, and would not be invoked by Revenue officials to enable them to embark upon a speculative trawl through all of a company’s or an individual’s private papers.

The Court of Appeal accepted this argument.⁸⁶ Lord Denning’s leading judgment was particularly forceful, portraying the Inland Revenue’s behaviour as incompatible both with contemporary moral standards and long established legal principle:

[T]here has been no search like it—and no seizure like it—in England, since that Saturday, April 30 1763, when the Secretary of State issued a general warrant by which he authorised the King’s messengers to arrest John Wilkes and seize all his books and papers....⁸⁷

Denning’s judgment rested on the presumption that the bare words of the Act had to be read against a background (or contextual) legal principle; namely that Parliament would always be sensitive to the need to protect individual liberty when enacting legislation. As Lord Denning put it: ‘it is, as I see it, the duty of the courts so to construe the statute as to see that it encroaches as little as possible upon the liberties of the people of England’.⁸⁸

This was in effect a teleological or purposive approach to the interpretation of s 20C. The ‘purpose’ being served was ensuring that government behaviour did not interfere unduly with citizens’ common law entitlements. This interpretative strategy then led Lord Denning to the following conclusion:

...as a matter of construction of the statute and therefore of the warrant—in pursuance of our traditional role to protect the liberty of the individual—it is our duty to say that the warrant must particularise the specific offence which is charged as being fraud on the revenue.⁸⁹

Since the warrant did not do so, it was invalid.

The Court of Appeal’s judgment was subsequently reversed in the House of Lords, which adopted a straightforwardly literalist approach to s 20C. Lord Wilberforce, delivering the leading opinion, saw no point in referring to old cases such as Entick to support Rossminster’s contention. He concluded that the ‘plain words’ of s 20C authorised the Inland Revenue to engage in behaviour which could not be justified at common law. Nor could he see any basis for finding an implied term in the statute which required much greater specificity in the terms of the warrant: Parliament’s intention had been to override common law principles. Lord Wilberforce’s invocation of the literal rule was entirely orthodox, and quite consistent with traditional understandings of the separation of powers:

while the courts may look critically at legislation which impairs the rights of citizens and should resolve any doubt of interpretation in their favour, it is no part of their duty, or power, ⁸⁶ [1980] AC 952.

⁸⁷ Ibid., at 970.

⁸⁸ Ibid., at 972.

⁸⁹ Ibid., at 974.

to restrict or impede the working of legislation, even of unpopular legislation; to do so would be to weaken rather than advance the democratic process.⁹⁰

Lord Wilberforce nevertheless cast some doubt on the political acceptability of the legal rule which the statute had enacted, by observing that: ‘I cannot believe that this does not call for a fresh look by Parliament’.⁹¹ Lord Dilhorne expressed similar sentiments: ‘It may be that there are many persons who think that in 1976 too wide a power was given to the revenue. If it was, and I express no opinion on that, it must be left to Parliament to narrow the power it gave’.⁹²

The House of Lords evidently considered that the judges in the Court of Appeal had allowed their moral distaste for s 20C to push them into adopting illegitimate interpretative strategies, and thus to overstep the boundaries of their proper constitutional role. This is most clearly illustrated by Lord Wilberforce’s comment that courts should not ‘restrict or impede the working of legislation’. That is however a simplistic view. Lord Denning would no doubt have agreed with the sentiment that courts should not impede the working of legislation. Where he differed from Lord Wilberforce was in his understanding of how the legislation was supposed to work. In Denning’s opinion it would work as Parliament intended if it did not trample over established common law principles. In Wilberforce’s view it was designed to have just that intensely intrusive effect. Neither perspective can be regarded as legally ‘correct’ in any definitive sense. Rather the case further underlines the point that there is much unpredictability in the way that courts may approach their constitutional responsibility of giving meaning to the provisions of statutes.

Conclusion

It is also helpful to compare Liversidge and Rossminster to illustrate the point that a court’s adoption of a particular interpretative strategy does not determine the substantive character of the result that the court produces in a given case. If one looked solely at Rossminster, one might be tempted to assume that teleological interpretation would restrain governmental power to a greater degree than literal interpretation. Yet in Liversidge, Lord Atkin’s robust defence of individual liberty against government interference is founded on a literalist interpretative technique. In that case, it was the majority who engaged in teleological strategies. The ‘purpose’ the majority sought to promote was the successful prosecution of the war, which led them to construe the literal words of reg 18b against a background or context which demanded that government powers be very generously interpreted. In Lord Macmillan’s view: ‘The purpose of the regulation is to ensure public safety, and it is right so to interpret emergency legislation as to promote, rather than to defeat, its efficacy for the defence of the realm’.⁹³

Lord Atkin—in contrast—(and much like Lord Wilberforce in Rossminster) seemed to consider resort to those background principles illegitimate, and invoked an alternative context against which to construe reg 18b:

In this country, amid the clash of arms, the laws are not silent. They may be changed, but they speak the same language in war as in peace. It has always been one of the pillars of freedom, one of the principles of liberty for which on recent authority we are now fighting, that the judges are no respecters of persons and stand between the subject and any attempted encroachment on his liberty by the executive.⁹⁴

⁹⁰ [1980] AC 952 at 988, HL.

⁹¹ Ibid, at 999.

⁹² Ibid, at 1006.

⁹³ [1980] AC 952 at 251.

⁹⁴ [1980] AC 952 at 244.

To put the matter in rather more abstract terms, cases such as Burstow, Royal College of Nursing, Rossminster and Liversidge tell us that while Parliament may do anything it wishes, the constitutional responsibility to tell us what Parliament actually has done rests with the courts. If one bears that point in mind, it might be thought at best simplistic and at worst entirely misleading to characterize the normative relationship between Parliament and the courts as a simple hierarchy in which the judiciary occupies the inferior position.

V. Stare decisis

The principle of legal certainty—that citizens be able to predict the limits the law places on individual and governmental behaviour—is an essential ingredient (albeit respected with varying stringency) in all theoretical analyses of the rule of law. The principle has only a precarious legal basis in the British constitution, since Parliament may at any time change any law in any way whatsoever. For much of the modern era, the common law has, in contrast, possessed—at least in formal terms—an almost absolute degree of legal certainty.

The London Tramways judgment (1898)

The common law's attachment to an inflexible doctrine of stare decisis ('let the previous decision stand') was confirmed in the 1898 case of London Tramway Co v LCC.⁹⁵ For a unanimous House of Lords, Lord Halsbury claimed that the judgments of that court bound not only all inferior courts, but also the House of Lords itself. He acknowledged that such rigidity might on occasion produce substantively unjust solutions to given problems because the common law could not be adapted to meet changing social conditions:

but what is that... as compared with the inconvenience—the disastrous inconvenience—of having each question subject to being reargued and the dealings of mankind rendered doubtful by reason of different decisions, so that in truth and in fact there would be no final court of appeal.⁹⁶

Lord Halsbury's reasoning obviously has strong roots in Diceyan perceptions of the need to avoid unpredictability and arbitrariness in the content of the legal framework within which citizens live. It may thus be seen as a legal expression of the political principles underpinning red light variants of the rule of law. It should however be emphasised that the courts' adherence to a rigid stare decisis principle (like its preference for a literal rule of statutory interpretation) was a common law rule, fashioned by the House of Lords itself, not a requirement imposed upon the courts by Parliament. Clearly, in cases involving intolerable injustice in which the House of Lords felt itself bound by a previous decision, Parliament could pass legislation altering the substantive law. Similarly, Parliament could at any time enact a statute ordering the courts to depart from the London Tramways rule in any way on any occasions they thought fit, or to abandon the principle altogether. But furthermore, in the absence of any legislation on the point, the House of Lords itself retained the power to amend or reject the rule: common law rules are as much at the mercy of the final court of appeal as of the legislature.

Lord Halsbury's suggestion that the House of Lords could bind itself is therefore a nonsense, as a matter both of abstract logic and constitutional principle. Binding legal rules depend for their force on the existence of a higher source of law than the rules themselves. The members of the House of Lords qua final court of appeal in 1898 could no more 'bind' their successors than the Parliament of that year could 'bind' future Parliaments. Lord Halsbury might expect his successors to respect his rule because of its intrinsic merits; he could in no legal sense compel them to do so.⁹⁷

⁹⁵ [1898] AC 375, HL.

⁹⁶ Ibid, at 380, HL.

The 1966 Practice Statement

The House of Lords did not avail itself of its undoubted constitutional power to overrule London Tramways until 1966. In a Practice Statement issued on 26 July,⁹⁸ the Lord Chancellor announced that the House of Lords would modify its approach to stare decisis, and depart from its previous decisions to avoid injustice in particular cases and to facilitate the development of common law principles in a way that reflected changing social and economic conditions.:

Their Lordships regard the use of precedent as an indispensable foundation upon which to decide what is the law and its application to individual cases. It provides at least some degree of certainty upon which individuals can rely in the conduct of their affairs, as well as a basis for orderly development of legal rules.

Their Lordships nevertheless recognise that too rigid adherence to precedent may lead to injustice in a particular case and also unduly restrict the proper development of the law. They propose, therefore, to modify their present practice and, while treating former decisions of this House as normally binding, to depart from a previous decision when it appears right to do so.

In this connection they will bear in mind the danger of disturbing retrospectively the basis on which contracts, settlements of property and fiscal arrangements have been entered into and also the especial need for certainty as to the criminal law.

The House of Lords has however rarely availed itself of this new power, and has developed rigorous criteria which must be met before a previous decision is overruled.⁹⁹ The initiative may thus be seen as a classic example of the green light approach to the rule of law, in which red light principles are not abandoned entirely, but are nevertheless appreciably diluted. While important in itself, the significance of the 1966 Practice Statement should not be exaggerated. The House of Lords/Supreme Court will only infrequently find itself faced by legal problems which cannot in some way be distinguished from previous decisions on similar points. And for constitutional lawyers, the more pressing question is not what the House of Lords/Supreme Court does when faced with a common law rule it considers unpalatable,¹⁰⁰ but what it does when its distaste is triggered by a statutory provision.

VI. Parliamentary sovereignty v the rule of law

Dicey's notions of parliamentary sovereignty and the rule of law only function in the sense that he intended if the courts accept that their allegiance lies to the legislature rather than to the executive or the citizenry. We must stress again that in orthodox constitutional theory, the courts' allegiance is not to the people, nor to a supra-legislative constitution, ⁹⁷ Of course, Parliament might enact legislation which gave the House of Lords such a power.

⁹⁸ Practice Statement (Judicial Precedent) [1966] 1 WLR 1234.

⁹⁹ See Zander (1994) op cit pp 190–199.

¹⁰⁰ An issue we consider at pp? below.

but simply to the will of Parliament as expressed in the words of a statute. But as our knowledge of the law of the constitution increases, so we come to see that orthodox theory may present a misleading picture. Liversidge seemingly provides an example of the courts in effect giving allegiance to the executive rather than to Parliament. In so far as the constitution places the task of interpreting legislation in the hands of the courts, Liversidge respects parliamentary sovereignty because it is only the court which can tell us what Parliament intended. But that is a very formalistic view of 'law'; if we look behind this legal facade to the political principles underpinning traditional views of the rule of law and the separation of powers, Liversidge can plausibly be portrayed as a manifestly 'unconstitutional' decision.

But one can also find episodes in constitutional history when the judiciary apparently considered that its ultimate allegiance lay not to the executive, nor even to Parliament, but rather to a version of the rule of law which possessed a higher constitutional status than the clear words of legislation. Such appears to be the lesson offered by the judgment of the House of Lords in the 1969 case of *Anisminic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission*¹⁰¹ and the Court of Appeal's decision a decade earlier in R v Medical Appeal Tribunal, ex p Gilmore.¹⁰²

Ouster clauses—Gilmore (1957) and Anisminic (1969)

In the 1950s and 1960s, Parliament made increasing use of statutes seeming to oust the courts' common law power of review. These so-called 'ouster clauses' were a logical ingredient of the drift towards 'green light' theories of administrative law. Often Parliament sought to exclude the courts because the legislation concerned established alternative fora for review, appeal, or inquiry. Relatedly, it was widely felt that much government activity did not lend itself to resolution by judicial methods.¹⁰³ Such statutes would contradict the Diceyan version of the rule of law, but since Parliament can make any law whatsoever, there is theoretically no impediment to it passing legislation which excludes the common law power of review.

R v Medical Appeal Tribunal, ex p Gilmore* (1957)

One might take as an example the system of welfare payments established under the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1948. Decisions as to a claimant's entitlement were initially made by a government employee. The Act allowed applicants dissatisfied with the original decisions to appeal to a specialised medical tribunal. Section 36(3) provided that the tribunal's decision 'shall be final', a formula which seemed to remove the individual's right to seek review of the tribunal's decision in the courts. However in R v Medical Appeal Tribunal, ex p Gilmore Lord Denning, faced with an apparent error of law on the tribunal's part, concluded that, notwithstanding s 36(3)'s apparently unambiguous instruction, judicial review: 'is never to be taken away by any statute except by the most clear and explicit words. The word "final" is not enough. That only means "without appeal". It does not mean without recourse to [review]'.¹⁰⁴

This apparently presents us with a modification to the doctrine of implied repeal, which we discussed in chapter two. Section 36(3) implies that Parliament had decided to 'contract out' of judicial review with respect to industrial injury compensation. Lord Denning's judgment appears to echo the decisions in Chorlton v Lings and Nairn v University of

¹⁰¹ [1969] 2 AC 147, HL.

¹⁰² [1957] 1 QB 574, CA.

¹⁰³ See particularly Titmuss R (1971) 'Welfare rights, law and discretion' Political Quarterly 113.

¹⁰⁴ [1957] 1 QB 574, CA.

St Andrews, where the courts held that the enfranchisement of women would represent such a fundamental reform to society's political order that Parliament could not effect it through implied or 'furtive' legislative terms. In Gilmore, Denning seems to attribute the same high political status to a Diceyan principle of the rule of law—namely that individual citizens should always be able to challenge the decisions of government bodies before 'the ordinary courts'. Denning suggests that Parliament may 'suspend' this principle if it wishes, but only by adopting absolutely unambiguous statutory formulae.

Anisminic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission (1969)

One might have assumed that Parliament had adopted 'the most clear and explicit words' in the ouster clause in s 4(4) of the Foreign Compensation Act 1950. The Act established a Commission to distribute limited funds among British nationals whose overseas property had been seized by foreign governments. Section 4(4) stated that the Commission's 'determinations... shall not be called in question in any court of law'. 'Calling into question' would appear to reach both appeal and review. Nevertheless, in Anisminic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission,¹⁰⁵ the House of Lords assumed jurisdiction to review the Commission's activities. It did so on the grounds that the Commission had made an error of law in its decision-making process. Consequently, the decision that the Commission had produced was not a determination, but 'a purported determination'. Since the ouster clause made no reference to 'purported determinations', the court was not challenging parliamentary sovereignty by declaring the Commission's action unlawful.

Like the majority judgment in Liversidge, such reasoning commends itself only to the most formalistic of constitutional analyses. Gilmore and Anisminic can more plausibly be presented as examples of the judges steeling themselves to resist orthodox understandings of the hierarchy of legal authority in order to safeguard a political principle—that government action always be subject to judicial review, irrespective of Parliament's intentions. In each case, the judges adopted a rather narrow view of legislative sovereignty. Parliament could indeed exclude judicial review; but it could do so only by initiating the protracted and highly visible process of passing legislation explicitly overturning the courts' decisions. One might say that the House of Lords was rejecting a formal, legalistic interpretation of parliamentary sovereignty in favour of a functionalist, political interpretation—namely to ensure that the exclusion of judicial review really did attract the consent of the people.

The House of Lords' judgment might lead us to note the oft-quoted words of Bishop Hoadly, delivered in a sermon to the King in 1717:

Whoever hath an absolute authority to interpret any written or spoken laws, it is he who is truly the lawgiver, to all intents and purposes, and not the person who first spoke or wrote them.

Anisminic clearly presented a judicial challenge to Parliament's sovereignty, but that challenge lay in the sphere of the legitimacy rather than legality of parliamentary intentions. Parliament could reverse Anisminic, but only at the risk of being seen to abrogate orthodox understandings of the rule of law. The government initially seemed prepared to take that risk, and prepared a Bill containing a more extensive ouster clause. This provided that not only the 'determinations' of the Commission, but also any 'purported determinations' should not be called in question in any court of law'. Whether the courts would have been prepared to 'defy' that legislation by a further exercise in creative statutory 'interpretation' is a matter for speculation. Lord Reid might, for example, have concluded that what was before the court was not a ‘determination’, nor even a ‘purported determination’, but only ‘purportedly a purported determination’, which on a literal reading of the amended statute would not be protected from judicial review. The proposal was abandoned in the face of opposition within Parliament, and replaced by a measure granting the Court of Appeal appellate jurisdiction over the Commission’s determinations.¹⁰⁶

¹⁰⁵ [1969] 2 AC 147, HL.

Leading constitutional theorists took different views of Anisminic’s implications. Professor John Griffiths felt that the courts were intruding ‘unconstitutionally’ on the sovereignty of Parliament.¹⁰⁷ In contrast, Professor Wade suggested that the threat to the constitution came not from the judges’ apparent challenge to parliamentary sovereignty, but from Parliament’s increasing predisposition to deploy ouster clauses to limit or remove the courts’ powers of judicial review. In Wade’s view, such legislation showed an unhealthy disrespect for orthodox principles of the rule of law.¹⁰⁸ Both viewpoints are obviously defensible, a fact which further strengthens the presumption that constitutional analysis must operate as much in the realm of practical politics as of legal theory. However if the Anisminic saga was seen by some constitutional physicians as a symptom that their patient was a little under the weather, the legislative response to the Burmah Oil judgment might have suggested that she required a prolonged course of intensive care.

VII. ‘Retrospective’ law-making

The objection that Diceyans would make to Parliament’s growing preference for granting the executive discretionary powers in statutes is that citizens may find it difficult to predict what government bodies are legally entitled to do. That objection is met only in part by the Wednesbury principles of administrative law; those principles enable the citizen to predict the outer limits of lawful government action, but not the precise point at which a given decision may be located. But unpredictability would be taken to an extreme degree if Parliament enacted legislation which had retrospective effect; for example by enacting a statute in 2012 which provided that everybody who had bought a foreign car since 2002 had to pay a ‘patriotism levy’ of £50; or by introducing legislation in 2013 which made it a criminal offence to have written anything critical of government policy at any time in the past. Since Parliament is sovereign, there is no legal impediment to it introducing such legislation. In doing so however, Parliament would surely be undermining all versions of the rule of law discussed in this chapter. For students who might suppose Parliament could never do such a thing, the events which followed the 1964 case of *Burmah Oil Co (Burmah Trading) v Lord Advocate*¹⁰⁹ may come as a surprise.

Retrospectivity in legislation—the War Damage Act 1965

In 1942, the British government, acting under what it presumed to be a common law power,¹¹⁰ ordered its army in Burma to destroy one of Burmah Oil’s refineries to prevent it falling into the hands of the advancing Japanese forces. After the war, the government offered Burmah Oil ex gratia compensation of £4.6 million. The oil company began legal ¹⁰⁶ Foreign Compensation Act 1969, s 3. See Wade HRW and Forsyth C (1994) Administrative law pp 734–739.

¹⁰⁷ (1977) The politics of the judiciary pp 123–124.

¹⁰⁸ (1969) ‘Constitutional and administrative aspects of the Anisminic case’ LQR 198; (1980) Constitutional fundamentals pp 65–66.

¹⁰⁹ [1965] AC 75, HL.

¹¹⁰ These ‘royal prerogative powers’ are considered in ch 4.

proceedings, claiming some £31 million compensation, and arguing that the common law power used required that owners be fully reimbursed by the government for any loss suffered. There was no clear authority for the House of Lords to follow. The judges thus faced the task of deciding the extent of the government's common law power to destroy property in war-time. The details of the judgment need not concern us;¹¹¹ suffice to say that the majority upheld Burmah Oil's claim.

The government was alarmed by this decision, since it might mean that not only Burmah Oil, but also many other individuals or companies whose property had been destroyed in similar circumstances, would be entitled to large sums of compensation. Such claims could have major implications for public expenditure. The government therefore introduced the War Damage Bill into Parliament to reverse the judgment. There could be no objection in terms of constitutional principle to Parliament changing the common law by statute in the sense of providing that in future the payment of compensation in such circumstances will be determined by statutory rule x rather than common law rule y. Such action is permitted by the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty, and is consistent with all versions of the rule of law. However, the War Damage Bill was intended to overrule the common law not just for future instances of property loss, but also for those which had already happened—the statute was to have retrospective as well as prospective effect.

Diceyan theory tells us that such legislation is entirely consistent with the legal doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty, but utterly inconsistent with the political principle of the rule of law. The Bill generated appreciable controversy as it progressed through Parliament.¹¹² That it emerged as the War Damage Act 1965 provides further compelling evidence that the rule of law, in so far as it can be construed as a moral code embedding certain political values in Britain's democratic structure, may on occasions be regarded by our sovereign legislature as an expendable rather than indispensable ingredient of Britain's constitutional recipe. But one might also identify controversies of relatively recent origin where the same accusation might plausibly be levelled at the courts.

'Retrospectivity at common law'? Rape within marriage and conspiracy to corrupt public morals

The House of Lords 1966 practice direction on precedent attached particular importance to the need for certainty in the criminal law. This was not a new concern, but one we might credibly assert to have long been axiomatic to British understandings of the rule of law. But it is not difficult to identify common law principles which are hard to reconcile in both an abstract and practical sense with a strong respect for legal certainty. The use of the 'always speaking' principle as a rule of statutory construction raises obvious difficulties in this regard. But similar problems may arise in cases dealing with issues of common law. The majority and dissenting opinions in the House of Lords in the 1962 judgment in *DPP v Shaw*¹¹³ and the court's unanimous decision in *R v R (rape-marital exemption)*¹¹⁴ in 1991 provide powerful illustrations of this point.

A new or old offence at common law? Conspiracy to corrupt public morals

Mr Shaw displayed some entrepreneurial spirit in the early 1960s by publishing what he called a 'Ladies' Directory'. This was a magazine detailing the names, photos, addresses and practices of prostitutes in particular neighbourhoods. He was subsequently charged with and convicted of various statutory offences but he was also charged with the supposed common law offence of ‘conspiracy to corrupt public morals’. Mr Shaw’s defence to this charge was the blunt claim that the alleged crime simply did not exist as there was no previous authority upholding it. Alternatively he argued that even if such a crime had once been recognised, it should no longer be applied as it was an umbrella concept of such width that it would be impossible to predict what kind of behaviour might fall within it. In abstract terms, these are very much substantive rule of law/legal certainty arguments. Mr Shaw was convicted at trial. On appeal, the majority in the House of Lords did not find either argument an impediment to upholding the conviction.

¹¹¹ A useful summary is provided by Jackson P (1964) 'The royal prerogative' Modern Law Review 709.

¹¹² See Jackson P (1965) 'War Damage Act 1965' Modern Law Review 574. ¹¹³ [1962] AC 220.

¹¹⁴ [1992] 1 AC 599.

Viscount Simonds—so alert to the dangers of the judiciary usurping the legislative function in Magor—concluded that it was entirely proper for the courts to fashion new offences at common law to deal with what the judges regarded as newly emergent social problems:

I entertain no doubt that there remains in the courts of law a residual power to enforce the supreme and fundamental purpose of the law, to conserve not only the safety and order but also the moral welfare of the State, and that it is their duty to guard it against attacks which may be the more insidious because they are novel and unprepared for.¹¹⁵

The suggestion that the offence was objectionable because of its potential width and thence uncertainty was firmly dispatched by Lord Morris:

It is said that there is a measure of vagueness in a charge of conspiracy to corrupt public morals, and also that there might be peril of the launching of prosecutions in order to suppress unpopular or unorthodox views. My Lords, I entertain no anxiety on these lines. Even if accepted public standards may to some extent vary from generation to generation, current standards are in the keeping of juries, who can be trusted to maintain the corporate good sense of the community and to discern attacks upon values that must be preserved.¹¹⁶

Lord Reid issued a powerful dissent premised on an evident attachment to orthodox understandings of the rule of law and the separation of powers. In respect of the separation of powers issue, Lord Reid concluded that the nature of the supposed offence was one which was better suited to criminalisation by Parliament than by the courts:

Even if there is still a vestigial power of this kind it ought not, in my view, to be used unless there appears to be general agreement that the offence to which it is applied ought to be criminal if committed by an individual. Notoriously, there are wide differences of opinion today as to how far the law ought to punish immoral acts which are not done in the face of the public. Some think that the law already goes too far, some that it does not go far enough. Parliament is the proper place, and I am firmly of opinion the only proper place, to settle that. When there is sufficient support from public opinion, Parliament does not hesitate to intervene. Where Parliament fears to tread it is not for the courts to rush in....¹¹⁷

He was equally concerned that the majority’s conclusion was offensive to a proper understanding of legal certainty and thus of the rule of law:

Finally I must advert to the consequences of holding that this very general offence exists. It has always been thought to be of primary importance that our law, and particularly our criminal law, should be certain: that a man should be able to know what conduct is and what is not criminal, particularly when heavy penalties are involved.¹¹⁸

One might criticize the majority judgment in Shaw for resolving an uncertainty in the content of the common law in a fashion which imposed a criminal penalty on an ¹¹⁵ [1962] AC 220 at 267–268.

¹¹⁶ Ibid., at 292.

¹¹⁷ Ibid., at 287.

¹¹⁸ Ibid., at 291.

individual. This criticism in terms of constitutional principle is perhaps easy to make because on the particular facts of the case we could readily assume that many people (even in 1960) would not have regarded Mr Shaw's action as morally reprehensible. The debate over the legitimacy of common law innovation becomes more complicated however if the behaviour in question would be almost universally regarded as unacceptable and/or if the innovation concerned does not resolve an uncertainty but rather reverses a long established rule.

Rape within marriage: R v R (rape: marital exemption) (1991)

To modern day observers, one of the more obviously objectionable moral principles informing social and legal affairs in the mid-eighteenth century was the proposition advanced by Sir Matthew Hale in his History of the Pleas of the Crown:

[a] husband cannot be guilty of a rape committed by himself upon his lawful wife, for by their mutual matrimonial consent and contract the wife hath given herself up in this kind unto her husband which she cannot retract.¹¹⁹

The notion that a woman was legally obliged to accommodate her husband's desire to have sex with her whenever he wished rested on the moral assumption that a wife was the 'subservient chattel'¹²⁰ of her husband. The questions before the House of Lords in *R v R (rape: marital exemption)*¹²¹ in 1991 were whether that assumption remained valid, and—if it was not—whether the common law should alter to reflect new cultural or moral assumptions.¹²²

If the Court had considered itself still bound by the London Tramways view of stare decisis then the answer to the second question—irrespective of the answer to the first—would have had to have been 'No'. In R v R, however, the House of Lords accepted the view that the common law could legitimately be regarded as a dynamic and flexible source of legal rules. As Lord Keith put it:

The common law is, however, capable of evolving in the light of changing, social, economic and cultural developments. Hale's proposition reflected the state of affairs in these respects at the time it was enunciated.... Since then, the status of women, and particularly of married women, has changed out of all recognition.... In modern times any reasonable person must regard [Hale's proposition] as quite unacceptable.¹²³

The Court then concluded that the overturning of the previous common law rule was a task that could appropriately be undertaken by the courts. There was no need to wait for Parliament to enact legislation changing the law.

R v R is a significant judgment in many respects.¹²⁴ For our present purposes, the key question it raises is that of when it became a crime for a husband to rape his wife? The House of Lords settled the legal question in October 1991. The (attempted) 'rape' in issue was committed some two years earlier. The change in the law could thus be seen as retrospective, in the sense that any person who consulted law reports or legal textbooks in 1989 would understandably have concluded that—notwithstanding the morally abhorrent nature of such an action—a husband could not, save in very limited circumstances, be ¹¹⁹ Quoted in R v R (rape: marital exemption) [1992] 1 AC 599 at 6015 per Lord Keith.

¹²⁰ [1992] 1 AC 599 at 616. ¹²¹ [1992] 1 AC 599.

¹²² The rule had been narrowed somewhat by subsequent case law of fairly modern vintage. A husband could be convicted of raping his wife if they were legally separated prior to the finalisation of divorce proceedings. See R at [1992] 1 AC 599, 616–619. ¹²³ Ibid, at 616.

¹²⁴ For further analysis see Laird V (1992) 'Reflections on R. v R' Modern LR 386.

convicted of raping his wife. To put it in Diceyan terms, such an action would seemingly not have involved any breach—and certainly not a distinct one—of the law.

We would presumably have expected—if the House of Lords had felt it appropriate for the law to be changed by Parliament rather than the courts—that any legislation attaching criminal liability to a husband's rape of his wife would have only prospective effect. Had such a statute been given retrospective effect, sufficient to bring R (and presumably any other husband who had raped his wife since October 1989) within its terms, it would no doubt have attracted criticism on the grounds that it infringed the rule of law.

But innovative judicial law-making—which either alters rules of common law or attaches new meanings to existing statutory provisions—is generally retrospective in nature. One might in formalistic terms rebut that contention by pointing out that when R attempted to rape his wife the law had already changed. We (and he) just did not find out about that change until two years later when the House of Lords finally delivered judgment on the issue. And quite when the law changed is a mystery.¹²⁵

It is perhaps curious that the British constitutional tradition has so normalised the retrospective impact of common law innovation that it is evidently not seen as 'really' retrospective at all. It might be suggested that most sensible observers in the 1980s would have anticipated that the marital rape exemption might well soon be substantially amended or even abolished by the courts, given that the rule rested on such obsolete and objectionable moral foundations and had already been narrowed by modern judicial decisions. But if one's understanding of the rule of law incorporates a concern with establishing with certainty the substantive content of laws—or at least those laws whose breach imposes heavy costs on a defendant—R v R can readily be regarded as a problematic decision in both specific and general terms.

R v C* (2004)

That difficulty becomes more pronounced when one considers the Court of Appeal's subsequent judgment in R v C.¹²⁶ The defendant in C had been convicted in 2002 of—inter alia—raping his wife. The rape in issue had occurred in 1970; over twenty years prior to the House of Lords' decision in R v R. On appeal, C's counsel argued that the prosecution of the offence of rape should be regarded as an abuse of process and therefore be quashed by the Court of Appeal. C's argument conceded the propriety of the House of Lords' conclusion in R v R that by 1989 it was entirely foreseeable that courts would be prepared to reject Hale's assumption as to the legal impossibility of a man raping his wife. The argument asserted however that no such conclusion could sensibly have been drawn in 1970. This contention might be thought to be reinforced by the observation that three significant judgments which weakened the general applicability of Hale's doctrine by disavowing its relevance in respect of spouses who were undergoing divorce or separation proceedings had been issued in 1974, 1976, and 1986 respectively.¹²⁷ In more prosaic terms, C's submission was that while the law had indeed changed prior to R v R, it had not changed by the time he 'raped' his wife in 1970.

The Court of Appeal saw no need to engage with the question left open by the House of Lords in R v R; namely when precisely did it become a crime for a man to rape his wife. The Court nonetheless had little difficulty concluding that the law had certainly changed by ¹²⁵ Cf the comment in the Practice Statement (Judicial Precedent) 1966 that the House of Lords would bear in mind; 'the especial need for certainty in the criminal law'; [1966] 1 WLR 1234.

¹²⁶ [2004] 1 WLR 2098; [2004] 3 All ER 1.

¹²⁷ R v O'Brien [1974] 3 All ER 663; R v Steele (1976) 65 Cr App R 22; R v Roberts [1985] Crim LR 188.

1970. The judgment posed the question of what a solicitor might then have been expected to say to a client who inquired if he might be guilty of rape if he forced his wife to have non-consensual sexual intercourse. In the Court's view:

The solicitor would have started by pointing out to his client that to rape his wife would be barbaric, and that he would not condone it. He would then have told his client that the courts had developed and could be expected to continue to develop exceptions to the supposed rule of irrevocable consent, and that if ever the issue were considered in this court, the supposed immunity of a husband from a successful prosecution for rape of his wife might be recognised for what it was, a legal fiction.¹²⁸

The judgment did not offer any evidence to support this perhaps rather extravagant conclusion. It is certainly difficult to reconcile it with the observation of the Court of Appeal in 1986 in R v Roberts to the effect that the general presumption that a husband could not rape his wife remained valid, albeit subject to a growing number of exceptions:

In our judgment the law is now quite plain on this topic. The status of marriage involves that the woman has given her consent to her husband having intercourse with her during the subsistence of the marriage. She cannot unilaterally withdraw it. The cases show that in a number of circumstances that consent can be terminated. If it has been terminated and the husband has intercourse with his wife without her consent he is guilty of rape.¹²⁹

The Court of Appeal did not invoke any other authority supporting its assertion as to common understandings of the law on this point in 1970, an omission which rather undermines the persuasiveness of its conclusion. We still do not know of course when the law on this point changed. We know simply that it had changed by 1970. Perhaps it had changed by 1960? Or 1950? This presumably means that there are many men now in principle liable to prosecution and conviction for having committed an act which was not identified as a crime by either statute or common law at the relevant time, but which carries a sentence of life imprisonment.

It may readily be conceded that C's behaviour was utterly barbaric. But that point should not be allowed to obscure the broader question of constitutional principle which the case raises; namely the aforementioned 'retrospective' impact of change in the substantive content of the common law.¹³⁰ The principle might be thought difficult to reconcile with Diceyan notions of the rule of law, which demand inter alia that governmental interferences with the 'body or goods' of citizens are justifiable only if authorised by 'distinct' laws.¹³¹

'Retrospective' or 'prospective' overruling?

The common law's attachment to what is often termed 'retrospective overruling' was premised in large part on the theoretical proposition that the courts simply 'declare' what the law is.¹³² According to this declaratory theory of the common law, courts never actually make law when promulgating new rules or principles; rather they draw our attention to a state of legal affairs which has existed unnoticed for some (perhaps considerable) time.

¹²⁸ [2004] 1 WLR 2098 at 2013.

¹²⁹ [1985] Crim LR 188.

¹³⁰ See Lawrence I (2006) 'Punishment without law: how ends justify the means in marital rape' Denning LJ 37.

¹³¹ See 'Dicey's rule of law—process or substance?', ch 3, p 53 above.

¹³² My thanks to Terence Ingman's (9th edn, 2002) The English legal process, ch 9 for prompting me to allude to this issue.

The modern status of this declaratory theory may be best illustrated by Lord Browne-Wilkinson's judgment in Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln City Council:

According to this theory, when an earlier decision is overruled the law is not changed; its true nature is disclosed, having existed in that form all along. This theoretical position is, as Lord Reid said, a fairy tale in which no-one any longer believes. In truth, judges make and change the law.¹³³

The 'fairy tale' reference relates to Lord Reid's comments in a lecture delivered in 1972, in which he observed:

There was a time when it was thought almost indecent to suggest that judges make law – they only declare it. Those with a taste for fairy tales seem to have thought that in some Aladdin's cave there is hidden the common law in all its splendour and that on a judge's appointment there descends on him knowledge of the magic words Open Sesame. Bad decisions are given when the judge has muddled the password and the wrong door opens. But we do not believe in fairy tales any more.

So we must accept the fact that for better or worse judges do make law, and tackle the question how do they approach their task....¹³⁴

Lord Reid's comments are obviously wholly consistent with the views he expressed in Shaw. But even if we have left the era of fairy tales behind us, the constitutional presumption that it is legitimate for innovation at common law to make new law which has in practical terms a retrospective effect remains problematic from a rule of law perspective. The difficulties which attend the practice of retrospective overruling in cases such as R v R or R v C might be avoided if the House of Lords/Supreme Court were to accept (or Parliament were to require through statute) that overruling of previous decisions or the fashioning of entirely new common law principles would have only 'prospective effect'. That is to say that the law would become effective only in respect of factual situations which occurred after the judgment was issued. This approach to the temporal effect of judicially created change to the law is by no means uncommon in modern western legal systems.¹³⁵ Given its sovereign law-making power, Parliament could at any time impose such a requirement on the courts, either in general or selective terms. Similarly, since our constitution's attachment to retrospective judicial innovation is a common law phenomenon, the House of Lords/Supreme Court qua final court of appeal could alter the rule. From the late 1990s onwards, the question received continued judicial scrutiny. In *Re Spectrum Plus Ltd*¹³⁶ the House of Lords acknowledged that there was no insurmountable obstacle preventing a change of traditional practice. Affording a change in the previously accepted meaning of the law only prospective effect could be appropriate in 'exceptional' or 'extreme' circumstances. But neither the courts nor Parliament have as yet shown any obvious enthusiasm for making prospective overruling a principle of even extensive let alone general application.

¹³³ [1992] AC 349 at 358; [1998] 4 All ER 513 at 518.

¹³⁴ 'The judge as lawmaker' (1972–1973) Journal of the Society of Public Teachers of Law 22 at 22.

¹³⁵ See the discussion in Ingman (2002) op cit pp 387–388; Rodger A (2005) 'A time for everything under the law: some reflections on retrospectivity' LQR 57; and Atrill S (2005) 'Nulla poena sine lege in comparative perspective...' Public Law 107.

¹³⁶ [2005] UKHL 41; [2005] 2 AC 680; [2005] 4 All ER 209.

Conclusion

We will revisit the legitimacy of the R v R judgment in chapter nineteen. At this stage, our conclusions might sensibly be limited to observing that we should exercise caution when presented with the general proposition that Britain's constitutional tradition rests securely on the three supporting pillars of parliamentary sovereignty, the rule of law and the separation of powers, which are themselves securely rooted in the foundation stone of democracy. Chapters one and two indicated that our constitution's foundation is itself shifting and unstable; in addition, the theoretical analyses and historical events discussed in this chapter have suggested that those pillars may at times lean in contradictory rather than complementary directions. Whether this is a desirable situation is a question to which we shall return; it may be that one can argue it is preferable for a constitution to bend to the wind of changing times, rather than to stand rigid and so risk destruction in the face of a political or social hurricane. To sustain or refute that argument however, we need to gather more knowledge of the constitution's historical and contemporary make-up. In chapter four, we begin that task by examining the royal prerogative.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Harlow C and Rawlings R (1984) Law and administration chs 1 and 2

Jones H (1958) 'The rule of law and the welfare state' 58 Columbia LR 143

Holdsworth W (1942) 'Note' [on Liversidge] LQR 1

Goodhart A (1942) 'Note' [on Liversidge] LQR 3

Allen C (1942) 'Regulation 18B and reasonable cause...' LQR 232

Heuston R (1974) 'Liversidge v Anderson in retrospect' LQR 33

Hayek F (1944) The road to serfdom ch. 6

Jaffe L and Henderson G (1956) 'Judicial review and the rule of law: historical origins' LQR 345

Case law and legislation

Liversidge v Anderson [1942] AC 206

Entick v Carrington (1765) 19 St Tr 1029

R v R (marital rape exemption) [1992] 1 AC 599

DPP v Shaw [1962] AC 220

Harris v Doneses (Minister of the Interior No. 2) (1952) (4) SA 769 (A).

Chapter 4

The Royal Prerogative

The courts' acceptance of Diceyan notions of parliamentary sovereignty meant that there was no scope for the judiciary overtly to challenge the substance of legislation. Decisions such as Anisminic suggests there are some instances in our constitutional history when judges in effect dispute Parliament's supremacy. But, the court took care in Anisminic to root its arguments in a theoretically legitimate constitutional framework.

The gap between theoretical and practical legitimacy in judicial behaviour is less evident in respect of review of government action taken under statute. That government bodies be subject to judicial review is clearly necessary to maintain Parliament's sovereignty. If the courts permitted government to cross the legal boundaries which Parliament has enacted, they would be recognising government action, not legislation, as the constitutional hierarchy's most important value.

As Anisminic and Liversidge suggest, one sometimes finds cases where, in practice, the court's interpretation of a statute seems impossible to reconcile with the Act's text. In such circumstances, we might plausibly argue that the theory of parliamentary sovereignty—in so far as it rests upon judicial obedience to the literal meaning of the words of an Act—is being subverted. A more subtle, but more prevalent analytical complication arises when we note the variety of interpretive techniques which courts might deploy to determine the meaning of statutory provisions. It is a trite point, but one of immense significance, that we cannot conclude that an executive body has overstepped the limits of its statutory powers until the courts qua interpreters of statutes tell us what those limits are. However, statute is not the only source of the British government's legal authority. The government also possesses various common law powers. Constitutional lawyers gather these powers together under the label of the royal prerogative.

The source of prerogative powers

In its, pre-1688 form, the 'royal prerogative' comprised the personal powers of the Monarch. Despite the apparent wishes of some¹ Stuart kings, the English monarchy was never absolutist—medieval kings had neither the financial nor the military resources to rule without the active support of the nobility. That support depended upon the Monarch accepting some constraints on her/his power to govern. Those constraints were articulated in both statute and the common law—neither of which the Monarch could change without the support of Parliament or the courts.

¹ See Tomkins A (2005) Our republican constitution pp 91–93 for a suggestion that Charles I favoured a more broadly based consensual approach to governance.

The origins of current constitutional doctrines are often found in seventeenth-century political history. The law relating to the prerogative is no exception to that rule. This period of constitutional history was marked by recurrent disputes between the King and Parliament over the distribution of governmental power. There was an ongoing struggle between the King's effort to rule by prerogative powers or 'proclamations', and Parliament's power to restrain the King's autonomy through statute. And until that struggle degenerated into civil war, the courts were usually the site of the battle.

Prerogative cases before the 1688 revolution

Seventeenth-century, pre-revolutionary case law on how and for what purpose prerogative powers could be used was riven with ambiguity. The fundamental legal issue was whether, in principle and in practice, the Monarch's prerogative powers had a superior constitutional status to legislation. Judges tended to produce opinions which adopted inconsistent positions, which, given the era's political instability, is readily understandable.

The Case of Prohibitions (1607; the Case of Impositions (1610); and the Case of Proclamations (1611)

Prior to 1688, the courts had sometimes robustly resisted the King's preferences. In the 1607 Case of Prohibitions,² James I had claimed a right to sit as a judge and develop the common law as he thought appropriate; 'The King said that he thought the law was founded upon reason, and that he and others had reason, as well as the judges'. The common law judges, led by Chief Justice Coke, rejected this claim. While the judges confirmed that the King was not subject to any man, he was subject to the law, and until he had gained sufficient expertise in the law's many rules he had no entitlement to sit as a judge. This expertise was not a matter of 'natural reason' or 'common sense', but demanded mastery of 'an artificial reason... which requires long study and experience, before that a man can attain to the cognizance of it'.³

As well as placing restraints on the Monarch, this ruling enhanced the powers of the courts. 'Common reason' was the formula invoked in Dr Bonham's Case to overrule statute; if 'common reason' was something that only judges could discern, one would be saying in effect that the courts were the ultimate source of law in the pre-revolutionary constitution.

Similarly, in the 1611 Case of Proclamations,⁴ Chief Justice Coke seemingly placed stringent limits on the King's ability to rule by prerogative powers. He held that the King only had those prerogative powers which the common law already recognised; he could not grant himself new ones.⁵ The issue before the court was whether the King could use his prerogative powers to impose controls on the building of new houses in London and on the use of wheat, and to attach criminal penalties to any breach of those controls.

² (1607) 12 Co Rep 63.

³ One sees here an early statement of a trend in British constitutional theory, subsequently embraced by other countries, which tied the 'independence' of the judiciary to its competence; cf Alexander Hamilton in The Federalist Papers No 78 ('The constitutional role of the Supreme Court', ch 1, pp 17–19 above) and Centlivres CJ in Harris (No 2) ('Harris v Minister of the Interior—the aftermath', ch 3, pp 55–56 above).

⁴ (1611) 12 Co Rep 74.

⁵ Such activities were not the exclusive preserve of the Stuart kings. The Case of Monopolies (1602) 11 Co Rep 84b limited Elizabeth I's use of prerogative powers, holding that her attempt to create a monopoly in the manufacture and import of playing cards was against the 'public interest'.

Despite the antiquity of Coke's language, the constitutional principles underlying the judgment are clear:

...[T]he King cannot change any part of the common law, nor create any offence by his proclamation, which was not an offence before, without Parliament....

Note, the King by his proclamation or other ways cannot change any part of the common law, or statute law, or the customs of the realm,.... also the King cannot create any offence by his prohibition or proclamation, which was not an offence before, for that was to change the law, and to make an offence which was not... [T]he King hath no prerogative, but that which the law of the land allows him.

Not all judges were as committed to keeping the King's personal powers within legal boundaries as Coke. There are several seventeenth-century examples of judges interpreting prerogative powers in a way that completely undermined the principles laid down in the Case of Proclamations.

The Case of Impositions,⁶ or Bate's Case, in 1606, centred on the King's prerogative power to regulate foreign trade, and Parliament's statutory power to levy taxation. Bate had refused to pay an import duty that the King had placed on currants, his argument being the tax was illegal. The King's response was that this was not a tax, but a measure to regulate trade. As such it was quite lawful—the money raised was just an incidental side effect of the regulatory power. The integrity of that argument is obviously questionable. However, the court accepted it, and so provided a back door route for prerogative powers to override statutory provisions. That was not necessarily unconstitutional at the time; the supremacy of statute had not been established by then. Condemnation of this type of monarchical behaviour was subsequently to prove a major component of the 1688 Declaration of Right; and it was expressly prohibited by Art 4 of the Bill of Rights.⁷

Ship Money (1637)

A similar scenario arose in the *Case of Ship Money (R v Hampden)*⁸ in 1637. It was generally accepted at that time that the Monarch possessed a power to compel coastal areas of the country to furnish him with ships in times of military emergency so that he could better defend his realm. In the 1630s, Charles I sought to establish that this power extended to all parts of the country and permitted him to charge money (in effect a tax) rather than simply insist on provision of a ship. When Charles I levied such a charge in 1637, John Hampden—a member of the Commons and an opponent of much of the King's policy—refused to pay. Hampden accepted that the prerogative power existed, and accepted that it could be levied throughout the country in the form of a tax. However he argued that it could only be invoked when a military emergency was imminent.

The case was heard by a court of twelve judges.⁹ Ten found in the King's favour. The majority opinion rested essentially on the presumption that only the King could assess if an imminent emergency existed. The court would not address concerns relating either to the good faith or the accuracy of the King's conclusion. In effect, the judgment provided the King with a legal mechanism to bypass the generally accepted principle that the levying of taxation required statutory authorisation.

That narrow conclusion was unacceptable to many members of Parliament. But Ship-money raised broader concerns. Several judges made very sweeping statements as to the ⁶ (1610) 2 State Tr 371.

⁷ See 'The political source of parliamentary sovereignty—the "glorious revolution"', ch 2, pp 24–27 above.

⁸ (1637) 3 State Tr 826.

⁹ See Keir D (1936) 'The case of ship-money' LQR 546.

locus of sovereign legal power. Judge Vernon went so far as to say: '[T]he king may charge pro bono publico notwithstanding any Act of Parliament... [A] statute derogating from the prerogative doth not bind the King, and the King may dispense with any laws in the case of necessity.'¹⁰ Chief Justice Finch put the point in this way: 'They are void Acts of Parliament [which seek] to bind the King not to command the subjects, their persons and goods, and I say their money too; for no Acts of Parliament make any difference.'¹¹

The Ship-money saga is a graphic example of the ongoing struggle in seventeenth-century English history to establish where sovereign power lay. Within a few years of the judgment, Charles I responded to parliamentary discontent on the narrow implication of the judgment by assenting to a Bill which not only purported to abolish the ship-money power, but also asserted that no such power had ever existed. Several judges who had found in his favour in the case were removed from office and imprisoned. If, however, the King did indeed possess a power to dispense with Acts of Parliament whenever he thought it necessary—and if necessity was a matter which only the King could assess—the efficacy of any such statute might prove rather limited.

Habeas corpus, the Resolutions in Anderson (1592) and Darnel's Case (1627)

Protection against unlawful taxation was an important element of the citizens' property rights in pre-revolutionary England. It was however perhaps less important than 'property' in one's physical liberty, in the sense of being able to call upon the courts for protection against unlawful imprisonment. The writ of habeas corpus has common law origins which predate even Magna Carta. Its purpose, crudely put, was to empower the common law courts to order any person detaining a citizen to bring that person before the court and show lawful authority for the detention. If no such authority could be shown in the gaoler's 'return', the prisoner would be released.

Habeas corpus was, in practice, hedged about with limitations. Its utility was particularly compromised during Elizabeth I's reign. Elizabeth and her Privy Councillors¹² claimed an arbitrary power to imprison anyone who displeased them, without charge or trial, for as long as they wished. The constitutionality of such commitment was widely questioned, and caused sufficient disquiet for the judges to deliver an opinion to the Crown assessing its legality. The so-called *Resolutions in Anderson*¹³ began with what seems a spirited defence of individual liberty: 'her highnesses subjects may not be detained in prison, by commandment of any nobleman or councillor, against the laws of the realm'. This suggests that the judges were claiming authority to examine the justification for any such detention and pronounce upon its legality. However, the Resolutions concluded by accepting that the courts could not question the factual basis of the Crown's claim that the person detained had committed treason.¹⁴ Thus, as long as Privy Councillors complied with this formality, their actions would be within 'the laws of the realm'.¹⁵

Anderson offers an obvious precedent for the Bate's Case and Ship Money principle that only the Monarch could judge if the factual prerequisites of a prerogative power existed. Unsurprisingly, Charles I invoked the opinion to justify imprisoning those of his subjects who declined to pay the 'unlawful' taxes levied. Sir Thomas Darnel was one of five knights ¹⁰ (1637) St Tr iii 1125; cited in Keir op cit pp 568–569.

¹¹ (1637) St Tr iii 1215–16; cited in Keir op cit p 569.

¹² On the status of the Privy Council see 'The fusion of powers, the rise of the party system and cabinet dominance of the Commons', ch 5, pp 121–122 below.

¹³ See Crawford C (1915) 'The suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act and the Revolution of 1689' The English Historical Review 613.

¹⁴ Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 308–311.

¹⁵ Which one might suggest was precisely the conclusion reached by the House of Lords in Liversidge as to the powers granted to the Home Secretary by reg 18b.

who refused to pay a compulsory loan to the King. Charles I immediately ordered their arrest and imprisonment. In Darnel's Case,¹⁶ the knights' application for writs of habeas corpus were met by a return stating simply that they were held 'by special command of the King'. Darnel's counsel argued that this was insufficient justification for committal, since it disclosed no breach of any known law. The court however concluded that the King's power fell within that considered acceptable in the Resolutions in Anderson: the judges would not investigate either the factual or legal basis of the King's opinion. In effect, the King retained an arbitrary power.

Godden v Hales (1686)

Following the Civil War, the Commons and Lords persuaded Charles II and James II to assent to several Habeas Corpus Acts which appeared to extend the remedy and curb the Crown's capacity to evade it. But the then uncertain status of statute vis-à-vis the prerogative cast considerable doubt on the efficacy of any such legislation.

James II was eager to take advantage of the courts' flexibility to rule by prerogative powers rather than with parliamentary consent in the 1680s. *Godden v Hales*¹⁷ in 1686 is the most obvious example of this trend. James was a King with strong Catholic sympathies trying to rule a country whose houses of Parliament were dominated by Protestants. Parliament had passed several Acts disqualifying Catholics from government office. James attempted to override these acts on behalf of a Catholic citizen, Sir Edward Hales, by announcing that Hales need not swear loyalty to Protestantism before assuming office. Although this obviously breached an Act of Parliament, the Court (by a majority of 11–1) held that it was part of the Monarch's prerogative to dispense with laws in particular cases if it was necessary to do so. And as in Ship Money, the King was the sole judge of necessity. The Court concluded its judgment with a succinct summary of the constitutional position:

[T]he judges go upon these grounds:

- 1 that the kings of England are sovereign princes;
- 2 that the laws of England are the king's laws;
- 3 that therefore it is an inseparable prerogative in the kings of England to dispense with penal laws in particular cases and upon particular necessary reasons;
- 4 that of those reasons and those necessities, the king himself is sole judge; and then, which is consequent upon all;
- 5 that this is not a trust invested in, or granted to, the king by the people, but the ancient remains of the sovereign power and prerogative of the kings of England; which never yet was taken from them, nor can be.

The obvious implication of Godden v Hales—an implication intolerable to many members of the Commons and Lords—was that sovereign legal power rested with the King. Under this analysis, the enactment of legislation in which the Commons, Lords and Monarch had reached and expressed a consensual position on particular political issues would be a legally futile endeavour, since the King could at any point 'dispense' with the measure that Parliament had produced.

Post 1688—the revolutionary settlement

It was arguably James II's persistent disregard of parliamentary authority that triggered the 1688 revolution. The Bill of Rights 1689, which we could plausibly regard as the ¹⁶ (1627) 3 State Tr 1.

¹⁷ (1686) 11 State Tr 1166.

‘contract of government’ between William and Mary and the revolutionary Commons and Lords, placed clear statutory limits on the extent of prerogative powers.

Reversing Godden v Hales—and denying the correctness of the judgment when it was made—were important elements of the revolutionary settlement. Godden v Hales is clearly the target of Art 1 of the Bill of Rights of 1689: ‘That the pretended power of suspending the laws or the execution of laws by regal authority without consent of Parliament is illegal.’ The correctness of the judgments in cases such as Ship Money and the Case of Impositions was also forcefully repudiated by the Bill of Rights; Art 4 provided that: ‘levying money for or to the use of the Crown by pretence of prerogative, without grant of Parliament, for longer time, or in other manner than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal.’ Two further points of great significance emerged from the political deal that was struck.

Firstly, the scope of prerogative powers was fixed—it was not open to the King to claim new ones. What William and Mary received in 1688 was the residue of the previous King’s powers. That residue has been shrinking ever since. As Diplock LJ observed in the 1965 case of BBC v Johns:

[it was] 350 years and a civil war too late for the Queen’s courts to broaden the prerogative. The limits within which the executive government may impose obligations or restraints on citizens of the UK without any statutory authority are now well settled and incapable of extension.¹⁸

One must however note that while it is generally accepted that the 1688 settlement had imbued the prerogative with a residual character, the exact extent of that residue was far from clear. As we saw in Burmah Oil,¹⁹ the courts have on occasion been called upon to decide the precise limits of prerogative powers, which, even 330 years after the revolution, remain poorly defined. Burmah Oil provides another example of the loose fit between the form and the reality of constitutional principles; while the Crown cannot *de jure*²⁰ create new prerogative powers or duties, the courts could achieve that result by holding that the Crown had rediscovered a ‘forgotten’ part of the 1688 residue.

The second point, and the reason why the residue has been getting smaller, is that the 1688 settlement acknowledged that it was within the power of Parliament to amend or abolish prerogative powers through legislation. The prerogative was recognised as being a common law power, subordinate to statute. Thus, as in the Burmah Oil saga, Parliament may always respond to inconvenient judicial decisions concerning the scope of an existing prerogative power by introducing legislation to alter or reverse the courts’ decisions.

Similarly, Parliament may at any time create a statutory framework which limits how prerogative powers may be used. This principle is perhaps best illustrated in the immediate post revolutionary era by legislative regulation of the Monarch’s power to summon and dissolve Parliament. We may recall that Art 13 of the Bill of Rights had provided that ‘Parliaments ought to be held frequently’. Parliament defined that timescale more precisely in the Triennial Act 1694. This statute required the King to summon a new Parliament within three years of the dissolution of the previous Parliament, and also obliged him not to permit Parliament to sit for more than three years before the next dissolution. Within these statutory time limits, the Monarch enjoyed unfettered legal power to summon or dismiss the Commons and the Lords; but he/she had no legal power to exceed those periods. Parliament could alter the time scale if it wished, and in the Septennial Act of 1715 it chose to increase its maximum duration to seven years.

¹⁸ [1965] Ch 32 at 79; [1964] 1 All ER 923, CA.

¹⁹ See ‘Retrospectivity in legislation—the War Damage Act 1965’, ch 3, pp 78–79 above.

²⁰ ‘De jure’ meaning ‘as a matter of law’, in contrast to ‘de facto’ meaning as a matter of practicality.

While the Bill of Rights clearly addressed the issue of the prerogative's status vis-à-vis Acts of Parliament, it was less explicit about the question of how the Monarch's common law powers should be approached by the courts. Both Bate's Case, and Darnel's Case can be read as judgments in which the courts held that the judiciary was not competent to question the way a power that the King was accepted to possess could be used. A common law principle which effectively excused some of the Monarch's personal powers from judicial regulation presented an obvious threat to the sovereignty of Parliament. Moreover, the principle would not seem compatible with the various theories of the rule of law which subsequently emerged within the British constitutional tradition.

Since 1688, the Monarch's personal political powers have declined significantly in practical terms. The Queen is now largely just a figurehead, performing ceremonial and symbolic functions within the contemporary constitution. But this does not mean that the prerogative powers have disappeared. For most practical purposes, prerogative powers are exercised on the Monarch's behalf by the government. But before considering a brief list of the residue of prerogative powers which the government retains, we ought to make some reference to a definitional problem. What was originally meant by the notion of the personal powers of the sovereign?

What is the prerogative? A definitional controversy

There are two schools of thought on this point.²¹ The first, 'narrow' interpretation was advanced by Blackstone. For Blackstone, prerogative powers were only those 'singular and eccentric' to the King himself—things which only the King could do. So for example the power to enter into contracts, to lend money, to employ people, should not be considered as part of the prerogative because any other citizen could do those things. Only powers such as declaring war, or granting peerages were exclusive to the King, and so correctly labelled as prerogative powers.

In Dicey's wider view everything that government can lawfully do that does not have its roots in a statute, but which could be enforced in the courts was a prerogative power. Dicey's usage is generally accepted today—although there are still some influential commentators who favour the Blackstone version.²² But assuming we take the wider view as the more authoritative version, which prerogative powers does the government still possess?

The most important one is probably the conduct of foreign affairs and the signing of treaties. In the domestic sphere such actions as the summoning and dissolution of Parliament, the appointment of Ministers, the granting of peerages, appointing judges, giving pardons to convicted criminals or stopping criminal proceedings, and the terms and conditions of civil servants' employment were all components of this residual source of legal authority. This is not an exhaustive list, but it is sufficient to convey the point that the prerogative remains a substantively important source of governmental authority.

Most of these powers can be exercised in two ways, either directly or indirectly. Direct exercise of the prerogative need not take any documentary form. Foreign policy for example is usually carried on in this way. The prerogative is exercised indirectly through a device known as the Order in Council, which is in some respects analogous to a statute, in that it often grants Ministers the legal authority to exercise a range of discretionary powers.²³

²¹ See generally Markesenis B (1973) 'The royal prerogative revisited' Cambridge LJ 287.

²² See particularly Wade HRW (1985) 'The civil service and the prerogative' LQR 190.

²³ This is sometimes referred to, rather unhappily, as 'prerogative legislation'. Given that legislation is the province of Parliament, and that its legitimacy as law derives in part from Parliament's representative capacity, 'decree' might be a better label for an Order in Council.

Irrespective of the way they are used, the continued existence of prerogative powers raises two substantial constitutional issues—one legal, the other political. The legal issue is essentially the question of the relationship between the government and the judiciary; which prerogative powers will the courts subject to judicial review, and in what circumstances and according to which criteria will the courts intervene to regulate government activity? The political issue centres on the relationship between the government and the houses of Parliament. Is it desirable that important political decisions such as going to war, signing treaties, or granting pardons should be taken without the explicit prior approval of a majority of MPs? We will return to the political issue at a later stage of the book. This chapter considers the fate of the prerogative in the courts during the twentieth century.

I. The relationship between statute, the prerogative and the rule of law

In the early-twentieth century, the House of Lords produced two forceful opinions curbing the way that prerogative powers could be exercised. One of the most sweeping prerogative powers exercised by Monarchs was to seize property for military reasons in times of war, if the seizure was necessary to safeguard national security.²⁴ The power was invoked frequently during World War I. The government evidently believed its actions to be legal, but the lawfulness of seizures was challenged in the courts. The most controversial point was whether such requisition of private property obliged the government to pay compensation to the owners.²⁵

Re Petition of Right (1915)

*Re Petition of Right*²⁶ concerned the army's seizure of a commercial airfield for military purposes. The owners contended that the prerogative power to requisition the property without compensation arose only in emergency situations such as an actual invasion, and not for the more long-term purpose of establishing an airbase. The High Court and Court of Appeal accepted that the power existed only in 'invasion' situations. The owners' claim nonetheless failed, as all of the judges considered that the notion of 'invasion' was to be interpreted in the light of modern military technology. A German plane or airship flying into British airspace was as much an invasion in 1915 as the disembarkation of belligerent troops at Dover would have been in 1637. This interpretive principle is important, for it means that the practical reach of the supposedly residual prerogative could legitimately be extended as a result of changing social, political or technological development. In essence, the judgment tells us that prerogative powers can be properly viewed as 'always speaking' in the same way as statutory provisions.

The Petition of Right judgment was also significant in another respect. In Ship Money, the question of deciding what was 'necessary' to protect national security was held to be the sole preserve of the Monarch. In Petition of Right, the courts seemed to require that the government demonstrate that an 'invasion' situation actually existed and that the requisition of the property concerned was necessary to counter the threat. However this did not appear to be a taxing obligation; the judges expressed no willingness to allow any challenge to a senior military officer's assertion that the seizure of the airport was necessary.

²⁴ R v Hampden (1637) 3 State Tr 826. This was the power at issue in Burmah Oil; see 'Retrospective' law making' p 78 above.

²⁵ The government's practice was to offer compensation ex gratia, ie not as a matter of right.

²⁶ [1915] 3 KB 649, CA.

The Zamora (1915)

This approach was modified by the Privy Council in The Zamora.²⁷ The Zamora was a ship from a neutral country carrying a cargo of copper. The government seized the ship and its cargo when it docked at a British port. The Court accepted that judges were neither sufficiently expert, nor constitutionally entitled to argue the case with the government as to the adequacy of the national security justification for using this prerogative power. National security was still regarded as matters in respect of which the court could not evaluate the legal adequacy of the government's decision. However, in this case the government had not produced any evidence that the copper was needed for national security reasons. The House of Lords therefore held that the government had not shown that the factual prerequisite for using the power had arisen. And unless those facts were shown to exist, the power could not be invoked.²⁸

The Zamora displays a shift from the position which the courts adopted in Ship Money. The decision seems to make essentially the same point as Lord Atkin's subsequent dissent in Liversidge; namely in the absence of a clear legislative provision to the contrary, the executive must convince the court that the facts which trigger the use of a legal power do indeed exist. What is less clear is how much evidence would be required to confirm that national security issues were involved. That is a point to which we will devote further attention below.

The superiority of statute over prerogative: A-G v De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd (1920)

The judgments offered by the House of Lords in *A-G v De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd*²⁹ make this among the most instructive of all constitutional law cases. In addition to dealing authoritatively with the nature of the relationship between statute and prerogative powers, the court's use of principles of statutory interpretation tells us a great deal about the interaction between the doctrines of parliamentary sovereignty and the rule of law.

The 'property' at stake in De Keyser was a hotel, which the government wished to use to accommodate the administrative headquarters of the Royal Flying Corps. The owners of the hotel did not dispute that the government had the legal power to requisition it. Two substantial questions were however in issue. Firstly, did that power derive from statute or the prerogative? And secondly—whatever its source—was the power one which required the government to pay compensation to the owners of affected property?³⁰ The House of Lords dealt with these questions in an holistic way, but for our purposes the decision may be divided into three parts; dealing respectively with the existence (or non-existence) of specific prerogative powers, the precise meaning of relevant statutory provisions, and the general issue of the relationship between statute and the prerogative.

²⁷ [1916] 2 AC 77, PC.

²⁸ See Holdsworth W (1919) 'The power of the Crown to requisition British ships in a national emergency' LQR 12–42.

²⁹ [1920] AC 508, [1920] All ER Rep 80, HL. The Attorney-General is the senior of the government's two 'law officers'; (the Solicitor-General is the junior officer). He/she is generally an MP sitting in the Commons, and will on occasion argue cases for the government in the courts. He/she is not usually a member of the cabinet.

³⁰ These grand constitutional questions arose from an argument about money. The government had initially claimed to take the hotel under statutory powers, and had offered £17,000. De Keyser insisted on £19,500. The government broke off negotiations and subsequently claimed it could take the hotel under prerogative powers and not pay any compensation.

On the first issue, two subsidiary questions arose: did the prerogative power identified in Re Petition of Right extend to these particular circumstances; and if it did not, did the Crown possess an alternative prerogative power to take property without compensation in war-time which did arise on these facts?

The Court did not accept that this case fell within the Re Petition of Right principle. The property was not being commandeered to form an immediate defence against invasion (even in the modern sense). Lord Sumner also made it quite clear—in an obvious departure from the Ship Money principle—that the court would inquire if the factual circumstances amounting to an emergency actually existed; it would not simply defer to the government's view on that question.³¹

Nor was any member of the court convinced that the Crown ever possessed a prerogative power to take property without paying compensation in non-emergency war-time situations. The power to take property in such circumstances was undoubtedly part of the residue of prerogative powers left to the Crown after the revolution; what was not so readily evident was whether the power could be exercised without granting compensation. The Court explored this issue through historical rather than legal analysis, as it could find no case law which offered clear guidance. The Court's inquiries into the practical conduct of such requisitions indicated that they had all been accompanied by the payment of compensation. As Lord Atkinson put it:

The conclusion, as I understand it, is that it does not appear that the Crown has ever taken for these purposes the land of the subject, without paying for it, and that there is no trace of the Crown having, even in the time of the Stuarts, exercised or asserted the power or right to do so.³²

In effect, the Attorney-General was arguing that the Court should grant the government a new prerogative power. This was a request to which the Court was not constitutionally competent to accede. This conclusion necessarily meant that if the government was empowered to requisition the hotel without paying compensation, that power had to derive from statute.

The Court also engaged in a history lesson in deciding just what statutory powers the government possessed. Its conclusion on this point is not directly pertinent to the question of prerogative powers. Nonetheless, it merits attention here because it enables us to add a further veneer of sophistication to our understanding of the way in which the courts' use of techniques of statutory interpretation can reconcile ostensible tensions between the principles of parliamentary sovereignty and the rule of law.

Their Lordships' judgments suggested that Parliament began to legislate on this matter in the eighteenth century primarily because the limited prerogative powers of emergency requisition were inadequate to deal with the growing complexities of modern warfare. At the outbreak of World War I, the main legislation in this field had been the Defence Act 1842. The Act gave the government very substantial powers of requisition. At the same time, it attached quite rigorous procedural conditions to the exercise of those powers, and also provided that the owners of requisitioned property should be compensated, the amount to be decided by a jury in the relevant area.

³¹ '[This] seems to me to be an...obvious proposition—namely that when the court can see from the character and circumstances of the requisition itself that the case cannot be one of imminent danger, it is free to inquire whether the conditions, resting on necessity, which were held to exist in [Re Petition of Right] are applicable to the case in hand' [1920] AC 508 at 565. In The Zamora however, no indication was given as to how rigorous the court would be in conducting such inquiries. The principle would be of no practical significance if the inquiry was satisfied by the mere statement of a government official that 'imminent danger' existed.

³² [1920] AC 508 at 539.

The court's presumption was that the legislation was enacted to achieve three objectives which—to borrow Harlow and Rawlings' terminology—reveal a mix of green and red light concerns. The extended powers of requisition were intended to enhance the country's capacity to conduct war successfully; the procedural conditions to reduce the likelihood that the power could be used arbitrarily; and the compensation provisions to place the cost of conducting a war on the whole population rather than on the few people whose property was taken.

The 1842 Act was not repealed in 1914. Its effect was however extended by the powers contained in the Defence of the Realm (Consolidation) Act 1914. Section 1 of that Act provided that: 'His Majesty in Council has power to issue regulations for securing the public safety and the defence of the realm...'. Section 1(2) detailed a more specific example of that general power: 'Any such regulations may provide for the suspension of any restrictions on the acquisition or user of land...or any other power under the Defence Acts 1842–1875...'. A regulation was subsequently passed in November 1914 which empowered an authorised military officer to take possession of any land or building when it was necessary to do so 'for the purpose of securing the public safety or the defence of the realm'.

The government's contention in De Keyser was that the duty to pay compensation laid down in the 1842 Act was a 'restriction' on the government's ability to acquire land for defence purposes, and as such could be suspended by regulation. The regulation passed in November was claimed to have this effect. De Keyser's response to this argument was that the notion of 'restrictions' reached only to the procedural conditions contained in the 1842 Act, and not to the separate issue of compensation.

The way in which the judges addressed this issue illustrates forcefully how blurred the edges might be between the literal and teleological approaches to statutory interpretation.³³ It is not fanciful to argue that having to pay for something is likely to operate as a 'restriction' on one's readiness to take it; the cost may act as a disincentive to acquisition. However the House of Lords rejected that interpretation of the term. Lord Moulton's reasoning on the point was cursory, implying that the literal meaning of 'restriction' simply could not bear that construction:

The duty of paying compensation cannot be regarded as a restriction. It is a consequence of the taking, but in no way restricts it, and therefore... [De Keyser] are entitled to the compensation provided by that [1842] Act.³⁴

This is an assertion rather than explanation. The explanation for the conclusion is best provided in Lord Atkinson's judgment. One way of characterising his reasoning would be that the literal meaning of 'restriction' was conditioned by a contextual (or background) principle derived from a rigorous understanding of the rule of law intended to protect the property of private citizens:

The recognised rule for the construction of statute is that, unless the words of the statute clearly so demand, the statute is not to be construed so as to take away the property of a subject without compensation.³⁵

³³ The literal rule was the dominant technique at that time. Teleological interpretation was not (formally) recognised as a legitimate judicial strategy. See 'Purposive (or 'teleological') interpretation', ch 3, pp 68–69 above.

³⁴ [1920] AC 508 at 551.
³⁵ Ibid., at 542. The court's methodology resembles that subsequently deployed by the Court of Appeal in Gilmore and the House of Lords in Anisimic (see 'Ouster clauses—Gilmore (1957) and Anisimic (1969)', ch 3, pp 76–78 above), where the contextual principle concerned the jurisdictional question of access to the courts rather than the substantive issue of receiving compensation for property.

One might alternatively characterise his reasoning (and here one slips into the then heresy of teleological interpretation) as ‘making sense’³⁶ of the 1914 Act and subsequent regulation by regarding them as devices to sweep away procedural impediments to the effective conduct of the war without compromising the substantive principle that its cost should be borne by the entire country.

The judgment also addressed several issues of broader significance. Lord Atkinson firmly rejected the Attorney-General’s contention that a prerogative power and a statutory power dealing with the same issue could co-exist—that they were as the Attorney-General put it ‘merged’—and that the government could choose to deploy whichever power best suited its purpose. Lord Atkinson considered the notion of ‘merger’ to be inapposite. Rather enactment of a statute:

abridges the royal prerogative while it is in force to this extent—that the Crown can only do the particular thing under and in accordance with the statutory provisions, and that its prerogative power to do that thing is in abeyance.³⁷

The notion that the passage of a statute sends the affected prerogative power into some form of constitutional suspended animation was not shared by all members of the court. Lord Dunedin implied that he thought the prerogative power remained in place, but the place it now occupied was distinctly inferior to that inhabited by the new statutory provisions. This distinction is of little functional significance. The essential point common to both views concerns the hierarchical relationship between statute and the prerogative. On this question, Lord Dunedin and Lord Atkinson were at one. While Lord Dunedin indicated that the prerogative retained some degree of constitutional sentence: ‘it is equally certain that if the whole ground of something which could be done by the prerogative is covered by the statute, it is the statute that rules’.³⁸

Both standpoints would accept that Parliament is competent expressly to provide that prerogative powers covering a matter now affected by statutory rules continue to exist side-by-side with the Act concerned.³⁹ There is nothing in the judgments to suggest that Parliament can only override the prerogative by express suspension of the relevant prerogative powers. Any such rule would contradict the implied repeal facet of the parliamentary sovereignty doctrine. If statute is a superior form of law to the prerogative, and if existing statutes must give way if inconsistent with later legislation, it would be a nonsense if an existing prerogative power was considered more authoritative than an inconsistent statute. Yet there is some illogicality about the ‘abeyance’ argument. It would not be maintained that a 1920 Act which amended a statute passed in 1910 ‘suspended’ the earlier legislation, in the sense that the 1910 provisions would regain their legal effect if the 1920 Act were itself repealed. Nor would it be argued that the 1910 Act retained a legal status, albeit one inferior to the 1920 Act. Rather, the presumption would be that the 1910 Act no longer existed at all. It would seem peculiar that the prerogative, a common law power, should enjoy greater legal longevity than a statutory provision covering the same point. The illogicality can perhaps be reasoned away by suggesting that the courts could legitimately conclude that it would always be Parliament’s (unspoken) intention that a ‘suspended’ prerogative power would be reactivated whenever an Act repealed an earlier Act which had itself put a prerogative power into abeyance. Such reasoning is however difficult to reconcile with orthodox understandings of the courts’ interpretive role.

³⁶ The term is borrowed from Denning LJ’s opinion in Magor; ‘Purposive (or ‘teleological’) interpretation’, ch 3, pp 68–69 above.

³⁷ [1920] AC 508 at 540, per Lord Atkinson.

³⁸ Ibid., at 526.

³⁹ For a more modern example of this principle in practice see the Immigration Act 1971.

Extending De Keyser: Laker Airways Ltd v Department of Trade (1977)

The Court of Appeal's judgment in *Laker Airways*⁴⁰ further emphasised the prerogative's inferior constitutional status relative to statutes by extending the De Keyser principle. Following the passage of the Civil Aviation Act 1971, airlines which wished to operate a service between Britain and the USA required two forms of authorisation. Firstly, the airline needed a licence from the Civil Aviation Authority (CAA). The CAA exercised powers under the 1971 Act, and awarded licences according to criteria laid down in s 3(1), which required the CAA to promote low fares, high safety standards, and competition on major routes. Under s 3(2) the Department of Trade (DoT) could give the CAA 'guidance' concerning the way it exercised its licensing function. Under s 4(3), the DoT could give the CAA 'directions' concerning matters which affected national security or diplomatic relations. Secondly, the airline had to be granted landing rights in the USA. These derived from a Treaty called the Bermuda Agreement which the government, using its prerogative powers, had negotiated with the USA.

In 1972 Laker Airways applied for a licence to operate a cheap London-to-New York service. The only British companies then flying on these routes were British Airways and British Caledonian. The CAA granted Laker a licence under s 3(1), and the DoT used its prerogative power to arrange for Laker to be given landing rights in New York. After the 1974 general election, the new Labour government decided that it wanted to protect British Airways and British Caledonian from Laker's competition, and sought to withdraw Laker's permission to fly. The government could not use s 4(3) to give 'directions' to the CAA to revoke Laker's licence, since no questions of national security or diplomatic relations arose. Consequently, the DoT attempted to use its prerogative powers to cancel Laker's landing rights under the Bermuda Agreement, and issued the CAA with 'guidance' under s 3(2) instructing it to withdraw Laker's licence. Laker claimed both actions were ultra vires.

The Court of Appeal supported Laker's contention; neither statute nor prerogative provided a lawful basis for the government's action. Lord Denning first considered the meaning of 'guidance' in s 3(2). He felt that Parliament's intention in using this term had been to empower the government to 'explain', 'amplify' or 'supplement' the policy of the Act, not to 'reverse' or 'contradict' it. However, Lord Denning concluded that the government's new policy would reduce competition and so raise prices on the London-New York route. This was entirely inconsistent with the s 3(1) objectives, namely to encourage competition and reduce prices. The policy could not therefore be 'guidance', and so lacked a statutory foundation.

Lord Denning also rejected the argument that the government's prerogative power provided a lawful justification for withdrawing Laker's landing rights. He reasoned that the government was trying to use its prerogative powers to contradict a statutory objective. Unlike De Keyser, Laker presented a situation in which statutory and prerogative powers were not overlapping, but interlocking. The statute was not intended to replace the prerogative, but to be used in conjunction with it. Nevertheless, in such circumstances, statute's superior constitutional status demanded that the prerogative be exercised only in ways that furthered, rather than obstructed Parliament's intentions. If the government wished to pursue a policy which contradicted the objectives of the 1971 Act, it would have to persuade Parliament to enact new legislation which amended the DoT's powers.⁴¹

⁴⁰ [1977] QB 643; [1977] 2 All ER 182, CA.

⁴¹ See Wade HRW (1977) 'Judicial control of the prerogative' LQR 325.

The judgment protected the ‘sovereignty’ of Parliament in a political as well as legal sense. The government then had only a tiny majority in the Commons and was in a minority in the Lords. It was clear that some Labour party MPs would not support any Bill designed to stop Laker Airways flying, and that any such Bill would attract little public support. Unsurprisingly, no such measure was introduced.

Extending Laker: R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Fire Brigades Union (1995)

This principle was further extended in 1995, in a judgment concerning the administration of the Criminal Injuries Compensation scheme. The Criminal Injuries Compensation Board (CICB) was established in 1964 to provide compensation to the victims of violent crime or to their dependents. It was not set up under statute, but under the prerogative. The then Labour government also publicised criteria which the Board would use to assess compensation; criteria broadly based on the compensation that a person would receive if she had suffered a similar injury as a result of tortious action. Some twenty years later, Parliament enacted the Criminal Justice Act 1988. Sections 108–117 gave a statutory basis to the existing common law scheme. However, the sections were not brought into force immediately. Rather, under s 171(1) of the Act, the Home Secretary was empowered to place the original entitlement criteria on a statutory basis ‘on such day as he may appoint’. The government chose not to exercise this power immediately. In 1993, the government concluded that the existing scheme was proving too expensive. Consequently, rather than exercise his s 171 power, the then (Conservative) Home Secretary Michael Howard concluded that he would use his prerogative powers to amend the original scheme and introduce a cheaper system. The government announced in a policy paper that: ‘[T]he provisions in the Act of 1988 will not now be implemented. They will accordingly be repealed when a suitable legislative opportunity occurs’.⁴² The government felt that it could amend the existing scheme without infringing the 1988 Act, as ss 108–117 had no legal force until the Home Secretary exercised his s 171 power to implement them.

The Fire Brigades Union challenged the decision on various grounds, one being that the Home Secretary was attempting to disregard a statutory limit on his prerogative powers. Their argument was rejected in the High Court,⁴³ but accepted in the Court of Appeal,⁴⁴ which reasoned that while s 171 did not require the Home Secretary to place the scheme on a statutory basis by any particular date, it did restrict the Home Secretary’s prerogative powers in respect of the scheme, so that they could no longer be used in a way that contradicted Parliament’s intentions. By enacting s 171, Parliament had given a statutory seal of approval to the prerogative scheme introduced in 1964. For the Home Secretary to alter the scheme would therefore conflict with Parliament’s wishes. If the government wished to introduce different entitlement criteria, it would have to ask Parliament to repeal ss 108–117.

The Court of Appeal’s decision was subsequently upheld in the House of Lords, albeit only by a three to two majority.⁴⁵ Lords Mustill and Keith suggested that ss 108–117 had as yet no legal force, and thus could not curb the Home Secretary’s prerogative powers. The majority⁴⁶ disagreed. The rationale underpinning the majority’s conclusion is best put by ⁴² Home Office (1993) Compensation for victims of violent crime: changes to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme. Mr Howard had evidently forgotten that it was for the legislature not the executive to enact statutes.

⁴⁴ [1995] 2 AC 513.

⁴⁵ [1995] 2 AC 513 at 544.

⁴⁶ Lords Browne-Wilkinson, Lloyd and Nicholls.

⁴³ [1994] PIQR P320.

Lord Lloyd, who considered it mistaken to assume that ss 108–117 had no legal existence at all until the s 171 power was deployed:

True, they do not have statutory force. But that does not mean that they are writ in water. They contain a statement of Parliamentary intention, even though they create no enforceable rights.... The Home Secretary has power to delay the coming into force of the statutory provisions, but he has no power to reject them or set them aside, as if they had never been passed.⁴⁷

Shortly thereafter, the government announced that it would introduce a Bill to modify the existing scheme. The Bill was promptly enacted. The episode thus provides us with an example of the practical operation of the constitution coinciding perfectly with its theoretical base.

II. The traditional perspective on judicial review of prerogative powers: and its erosion Orthodox constitutional theory assumes that Parliament ‘contracts in’ to administrative law when creating government powers through statute. If Parliament does not wish the implied terms of administrative law to apply to particular statutory activities, it must make that intention clear in the legislation. Absent such express ‘contracting out’, a government body’s exercise of statutory power will (according to the Wednesbury principles) be ultra vires if no such power has been granted, if the power has been exercised ‘unreasonably’, or if decisions have been made through ‘unfair procedures’. Such government decisions were subject to what we might term ‘full review’ by the courts.

‘Limited’ rather than ‘full’ review of prerogative powers

However, in relation to judicial review of government action taken under the prerogative, the courts traditionally applied only the first of the Wednesbury principles. The judges were, as in De Keyser or BBC v John, willing to say whether or not a claimed prerogative power actually existed. This is clearly consistent with the notion that the prerogative was a collection of residual powers—the courts would not permit the government to claim new ones. Relatedly, as Lord Atkinson stressed in De Keyser, a court would accept jurisdiction to examine if the requisite factual triggers for an exercise of the power were present.

But prior to the 1980s, the concepts of ‘unreasonableness’ or ‘procedural fairness’ to which the use of statutory powers was subjected were seemingly not applied to government’s use of the prerogative. Thus while the courts were concerned with the existence and extent of a claimed prerogative power, they were not concerned with the way in which that power was exercised.

This differential treatment of prerogative and statutory powers would seem difficult to reconcile with orthodox understandings of the function performed by the principle of the rule of law within democratic constitutions—namely to minimise the possibility of government being able lawfully to exercise power in arbitrary, irrational, or procedurally unfair ways. From a functionalist perspective, such a dichotomy would be defensible only if prerogative powers were qualitatively distinct from powers exercised under statute. In the absence of such a distinction, the common law’s varying treatment of these two types ⁴⁷ Ibid, at 570–571. For further comment see Barendt E (1995) ‘Constitutional law and the criminal injuries compensation scheme’ Public Law 357.

Table 4.1 The differential scope of judicial review of prerogative and statutory powers

| Ground of review | Statutory power | Prerogative power |
|-----------------------|-----------------|-------------------|
| Illegality | Yes | Yes |
| Irrationality | Yes | No |
| Procedural unfairness | Yes | No |

of government powers could be justified only on purely formalist grounds—that prerogative powers were not fully reviewable simply because they were prerogative powers.

One can thus discern a ‘rule of law’ as well as a ‘parliamentary sovereignty’ basis for the De Keyser principle which forbade the co-existence of prerogative and statutory powers. To permit co-existence would allow the government to evade the judicial review principles to which it was assumed Parliament had subjected it by passing legislation in an area where executive powers previously derived solely from the prerogative.

The principle that prerogative powers be subject to only limited review is given ringing endorsement in Blackstone’s Commentaries:

In the exertion therefore of those prerogatives, which the law has given him, the King is irresistible and absolute, according to the forms of the constitution. And yet if the consequence of that exertion be manifestly to the grievance or dishonour of the kingdom, the Parliament will call his advisers to a just and severe account.⁴⁸

Blackstone’s observation indicated that he regarded the imposition of accountability on Ministers for the way in which prerogative powers were exercised as a matter for political pressure in the Commons or Lords rather than legal argument before the courts. This would however seem to have been an orthodoxy which rested on somewhat shaky foundations: judicial authority for the rule is rather less forthright. This is perhaps unsurprising, given that the rule seems to provide the government with a sweeping exemption from having to comply with an expansive understanding of the rule of law. In an influential article,⁴⁹ Markesenis pointed to two oft-cited authorities for the proposition: *R v Allen*⁵⁰ and China Navigation Co Ltd v A-G.⁵¹ Both cases sustain the conclusion that the particular prerogative powers in issue should be subject only to limited review. Yet neither supports the rule that all prerogative powers should be subjected to this diluted conception of the rule of law.

R v Allen* (1862)

R v Allen concerned the nolle prosequi power retained by the Attorney-General, a device which enables her to bring an end to any ongoing criminal trial. Allan had been charged with perjury. His trial was however halted when the Attorney-General issued a nolle prosequi. This intervention was challenged by the prosecuting authorities, on the ground that the nolle prosequi had been issued in a procedurally incorrect way, in so far as the Attorney-General had breached his usual practice of allowing the prosecution to give its views on the desirability of continuing the case before reaching his decision. The prosecuting

⁴⁸ Volume 1 p 251. See also Chitty’s 1820 volume on Prerogatives of the Crown p 6: ‘in the exercise of his lawful prerogatives, an unbounded discretion is, generally speaking, left to the King’.

⁴⁹ (1973) op cit.

⁵⁰ (1862) 12 ER 929, 26 JP 341, 5 LT 636.

⁵¹ [1932] 2 KB 197, CA.

authorities thus contended that the nolle prosequi should be quashed. The court clearly viewed the Attorney-General's failure to consult the prosecution lawyers with disfavour,⁵² but nonetheless saw no grounds for reviewing his decision:

Suppose it is possible that there could be an abuse of his power by the Attorney-General or injustice in the exercise of it, the remedy is by holding him responsible for his acts before the great tribunal of this country, the High Court of Parliament.⁵³

Echoing Blackstone, Cockburn CJ suggested that control over the exercise of this prerogative powers was a matter for the political rather than legal process. But it is not possible to extract from the (extremely short) judgments any clear reason as to why the nolle prosequi should be treated in this way. Cockburn CJ alluded to the 'great inconvenience' that would result if the power were to be subject to full review, but did not explain how this 'inconvenience' would arise. It is however clear that the various opinions in the case were all limited to the specific power of nolle prosequi: none of the judges made any reference to the prerogative in general.

China Navigation (1932)

The Court of Appeal's 1932 judgment in China Navigation was similarly specific. The prerogative power in issue was the government's control of the armed forces. The Court of Appeal noted that in some specific respects, this prerogative power had been restricted by statute. Those powers that remained, however, were: 'left to the uncontrolled discretion which [the King] exercises through his Ministers. The Courts cannot question it...'.⁵⁴ As in R v Allen, there is no indication that the Court regarded this conclusion as applicable to all prerogative powers.

Developments in the 1960s and 1970s

From the late 1960s, the courts' attachment to the orthodox proposition that prerogative powers were subjected only to limited review began to change. Four cases merit close attention. The first is the 1967 High Court decision in R v Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, ex p Lain.⁵⁵

Lain (1967)—a break with orthodoxy?

Mrs Lain was the widow of a policeman. She claimed that the amount of compensation she had been offered in respect of her husband's injuries and subsequent death had not been properly assessed in accordance with the published criteria. In other words, she was questioning the way in which the Board had exercised its powers. The Board contended that the court had no power to review the exercise of the prerogative.

However, the court held that this particular prerogative power should be reviewed as if derived from a statute. The main reason for this was that the Board was performing an essentially 'judicial' task. It had the straightforward duty of awarding compensation on the basis of the published rules. Unlike the complex national security question raised in cases like Ship Money, this was an issue which the courts were well equipped to decide.

⁵² '[The Attorney-General] would act wisely in calling the prosecutor before him.... I think that is a wholesome practice' (1862) 12 ER 929 at 931; per Cockburn CJ.

⁵³ Ibid.

⁵⁴ [1932] 2 KB 197 at 217, CA, per Scrutton LJ. See also Lawrence LJ at 229: 'The manner in which the Crown exercises its powers is not a matter which can be inquired into by a Court of law'.

⁵⁵ [1967] 2 QB 864.

Lain apparently made a distinct break with traditional theory, although it received little attention in the academic press. The judgment lent itself to one of three interpretations. Firstly, that it was an aberrant decision, which if not overruled would be confined solely to the CICB and not extended to other prerogative actions. Secondly, that it laid the ground for future judgments to conclude that all prerogative powers should be fully reviewable. Or thirdly, that it intimated that full review should apply only to prerogative powers raising issues that the court regarded as intrinsically well-suited to be subject to judicial scrutiny.

Hanratty (1971)—reasserting orthodoxy?

The Hanratty case suggested that the third interpretation might be finding favour with the Court of Appeal. *Hanratty v Lord Butler of Saffron-Walden*⁵⁶ was a negligence action brought against a former Home Secretary by the relatives of a man executed in 1962 after having been convicted of murder. The plaintiffs claimed that Butler had negligently failed to take proper account of new evidence when advising the Queen whether or not to grant mercy to Hanratty and commute his sentence to life imprisonment.

The plaintiff's claim had been rejected in the High Court, a judgment which was upheld on appeal. Lord Denning MR (supported by Salmon and Stamp LJ) rejected the assertion that the courts could assess the way in which this particular prerogative power had been exercised:

The high prerogative of mercy was exercised by the Monarch on the advice of one of her principal secretaries of state who took full responsibility and advised her with the greatest conscience and care. The law would not inquire into the manner in which that prerogative was exercised.⁵⁷

One might wonder how Lord Denning MR was able to conclude that Butler had acted 'with the greatest conscience and care' if the court 'would not inquire into the manner in which that prerogative was exercised'. However, for present purposes, the significance of the judgment lies in the way Denning confined the principle of limited review to this particular power. He gave no indication that this was a principle of general applicability.

Laker Airways (1977)—a rejection of orthodoxy?

Several years later, in Laker Airways, Denning lent further weight to the argument that prerogative powers per se should not be subject only to limited review. In that case, Denning again restricted his judgment to a particular prerogative power—designation of an airline under the Bermuda Agreement—but this time concluded that the power should be subject to full review:

Seeing that the prerogative is a discretionary power to be exercised for the public good, it follows that its exercise can be examined by the courts just as any other discretionary power which is vested in the executive [ie by statute].⁵⁸

Gouriet (1978)—a division of judicial opinion

*Gouriet v Union of Post Office Workers*⁵⁹ suggests that the higher courts had adopted different interpretations of the Lain decision. One prerogative power exercised on behalf of the government by the Attorney-General is the relator proceeding. This enables the Attorney-General to initiate civil proceedings in defence of the public interest in situations where an individual is either unable or unwilling to take action.

⁵⁶ (1971) 115 Sol Jo 386, CA.

⁵⁷ Ibid.

⁵⁸ [1977] QB 643 at 705.

⁵⁹ [1978] AC 435, HL.

The Post Office Union had decided to boycott mail to and from South Africa for twenty-four hours, as a gesture of disapproval of the South African government's apartheid regime. This constituted a criminal offence under the Post Office Acts. However, for political reasons, the government decided that the union would not be prosecuted. Mr Gouriet was a member of a group called the Freedom Association, which disapproved of the union's activities and of the government's failure to prosecute. Consequently, Mr Gouriet approached the Attorney-General, asking him to initiate a relator action for an injunction to stop the mail embargo going ahead. When the Attorney-General refused, Mr Gouriet asked the courts to review his decision.

Before Gouriet there was no case law supporting the argument that the relator power could be reviewed in the courts. There was however precedent for the converse proposition; namely whether or not to launch relator proceedings was a prerogative power solely within the control of the Attorney-General. Gouriet produced a divergence of opinion between Lord Denning in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords. Denning thought that the time had come to question traditional perceptions of the relator action as being completely beyond the supervision of the courts. He was cautious in doing this however. Denning drew a distinction between a situation where the Attorney-General launched relator proceedings, and circumstances where he refused to do so. In the former case, use of the prerogative power was not open to question in the courts. However a refusal to begin proceedings could be challenged; Denning suggested that if the courts did not intervene in situations like this it would allow the criminal law to be infringed with impunity. In such circumstances, Denning asked himself; 'Are the courts to stand idly by?'. In his opinion, the answer was: 'No'.

There was nothing unconstitutional, in the legal sense, about Denning's analysis. Since the prerogative is a common law concept, and since the common law is dynamic and open to constant amendment by the courts, Denning's innovative judgment could be thought legally defensible. He was not overriding a statute—but simply saying that an old common law rule should be replaced by a new one. From an orthodox theoretical perspective, Denning's decision was certainly less contentious than Anisminic for example.

However, as far as the House of Lords was concerned, the courts should indeed stand idly by when this particular prerogative power was being employed—and when it was not being employed. In the House of Lords' opinion, whether or not to launch a relator action was a public interest question which only the government was competent to decide. It was another example (like the test of 'necessity' in Ship Money perhaps) of a legal power which could not be subjected to review on the basis of either irrationality or procedural unfairness. The judgment suggested that it would be unconstitutional, in the political if not legal sense, to overturn government policy over this issue.⁶⁰

Denning's perception of constitutionality accorded the highest priority to seeing that the criminal law was not ignored. In contrast, the House of Lords' version was most concerned with not overruling the policy preferences of an elected government. Despite the House of Lords' strong stance, there was a suggestion that the judges' reluctance to intervene owed more to the highly contentious nature of the power concerned rather than simply its source in the prerogative. Unlike Lain, Gouriet raised an issue which had immense party political implications. For the court to have told the government that it could not act in the way it wished would have exposed the judges to accusations of subverting the democratic process.

⁶⁰ This was perhaps the 'great inconvenience' to which Cockburn CJ cryptically alluded in Allen.

Conclusion—the ‘constitutionality’ of reform

But would the courts infringe parliamentary sovereignty by changing the common law in order to place review of the prerogative on the same basis as review of action taken under statute? Clearly, any such alteration in the common law would be unconstitutional if it contradicted the clear terms of a statute. But even in the absence of an expressly contradictory statute, the constitutionality of such a reform to the law could perhaps be questioned. One might argue that if Parliament was dissatisfied with the courts’ traditional reluctance to subject prerogative powers to full review, it could do one of two things. Either it could pass a statute saying that all prerogative powers would henceforth be reviewable in the same way as statutory powers. Or, less radically, it could place specific prerogative powers on a statutory basis, and so make them amenable to full Wednesbury review. If the legislature took neither of these steps, it would seem plausible to assume that Parliament approved of the present situation of limited review. Consequently, if the courts changed the common law, they might in effect, if not in theory, be ‘usurping the legislative function’.

Nevertheless, the suggestion was being floated in the early 1980s that the time was ripe for the courts to reject the traditional idea that all exercises of the prerogative were beyond judicial supervision. If the courts could say that executive action taken under statute was unlawful in some circumstances, surely the same argument could be applied to the less party-politicised aspects of prerogative power. This is another illustration of a constitutional argument rooted in a functionalist rather than formalist conceptual framework. If the function of the rule of law is to protect citizens from arbitrary or unpredictable government activity, why should the source of that government power be of any relevance? Use of the prerogative could impact just as seriously on individuals as action taken under statute. There was no logical, functional reason why the two sources of governmental authority should be distinguished. The scene was set therefore for the courts to question the orthodox constitutional theory. The opportunity to do so was provided by Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service.

III. Full reviewability—the GCHQ case (1983)

*Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service*⁶¹ is now the pivotal case in the development of judicial review of the prerogative. The litigation is generally known as the GCHQ case, since it concerned employees at the Government Communication Headquarters in Cheltenham. GCHQ monitored radio and satellite transmissions in overseas countries; it was linked in some ill-defined way with the security services. Many of its employees belonged to one or other of the civil service trade unions. At that time, civil servants did not have contracts of employment. Their terms and conditions of work were generally regulated by Orders in Council, the indirect exercise of the prerogative.⁶² One term under which civil servants at GCHQ worked was that their conditions of service should not be altered until the Minister for the Civil Service had consulted with the trade unions about the proposed change.

In the early 1980s, the trade unions engaged in industrial action which disrupted GCHQ’s intelligence gathering activities. The then Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher, was also Minister for the Civil Service. She responded to the disruption by forbidding ⁶¹ [1985] AC 374, [1984] 3 All ER 935, HL. See Lee S (1985) ‘Prerogative and public law principles’ Public Law 186.

⁶² For subsequent developments see Morris G and Fredman S (1991) ‘Judicial review and civil servants: contracts of employment declared to exist’ Public Law 485.

GCHQ employees from belonging to a trade union. Employees who refused to resign from their union would be redeployed to less sensitive posts. The Prime Minister did not consult the trade unions before introducing this change.

The trade unions challenged the action on the grounds that the Prime Minister had acted in a procedurally unfair way by failing to consult them (their argument was essentially that employed by the prosecuting authorities in Allen). In effect, the unions were asking the courts to apply standards of statutory review to prerogative powers. The government advanced two defences. The first was simply that this was a prerogative power, and thus not subject to review on grounds of procedural unfairness. The second defence was that even if principles of procedural fairness did apply to this prerogative power, the court should not intervene here because the issue concerned ‘national security’.

The ‘nature’ not the ‘source’ of power as the determinant of reviewability

In a marked break with traditional doctrine, the House of Lords rejected the government’s first defence. Lord Fraser perhaps put the point most clearly:

There is no doubt that if the Order in Council of 1982 had been made under the authority of a statute, the power delegated to the Minister would have been ... subject to a duty to act fairly. I am unable to see why the words conferring the same powers should be construed differently merely because their source was an Order in Council made under the prerogative.⁶³

This point was made with similar force by Lord Roskill, who could not see:

any logical reason why the fact that the source of the power is the prerogative and not statute should today deprive the citizen of that right of challenge to the manner of its exercise which he would possess were the source of power statutory. In either case the act in question is the act of the executive. To talk of that act as the act of the sovereign savours of the archaism of past centuries.⁶⁴

Such comments confirmed that the availability of judicial review in the modern era would depend upon the nature of government powers, not their source. But victory on this point of general constitutional principle did not mean that the trade unions were ultimately successful. The House of Lords’ concern with the nature of government powers takes us to the second important part of the GCHQ decision. Lord Diplock suggested that government powers would not be what he termed ‘justiciable’, and so would not be subject to review on the basis of irrationality or of procedural impropriety, if the dispute was of a sort which does not lend itself to resolution by judicial type methods. The non-justiciable issue is not simply a case of A versus B. Rather it presents a great many

Table 4.2 The differential scope of judicial review of justiciable and non-justiciable powers

| Ground of review | Justiciable | Non-justiciable |
|-----------------------|-------------|-----------------|
| Illegality | Yes | Yes |
| Irrationality | Yes | No |
| Procedural unfairness | Yes | No |

⁶³ [1985] AC 374 at 399, HL.

⁶⁴ Ibid, at 417.

competing points of view, all of which have to be weighed and balanced in the search for an overall political solution. Elected politicians, rather than non-elected judges, are the appropriate people to make these kinds of decisions. Lord Diplock described this type of decision as ‘a balancing exercise which judges by their upbringing and experience are ill-qualified to perform’.⁶⁵ He considered that national security was ‘par excellence a non-justiciable question. The judicial process is totally inept to deal with the sort of problems which it involves’.⁶⁶

In effect, the House of Lords refused to investigate either the honesty or the reasonableness of the Prime Minister’s claim that she had revoked trade union membership without consultation because of national security reasons. If we are looking for old parallels to elements of the GCHQ decision, it might be more appropriate to focus on the court’s approach to this question of national security. In the pre-revolutionary Ship Money case, the court held that the King need not offer any evidence to support his assertion that the security of the realm was in jeopardy. In the 1916 Zamora case, in contrast, the court had required at least some evidence that the government had bona fide grounds for believing national security to be threatened. The GCHQ decision seems to follow the Zamora principle. The court required the government to produce an affidavit confirming that the Minister had genuinely considered the issue. But this does not seem to be a very difficult hurdle for the government to clear, and it implies that we have to trust the government never to invoke national security reasons for dishonest or bizarre reasons.

The final important point advanced in GCHQ was the court’s conclusion that it was not just national security issues which were non-justiciable. Lord Roskill produced a list of what we might call ‘excluded’ categories—aspects of the prerogative where review would relate only to the existence of the claimed power, not to its exercise. The powers that Lord Roskill had in mind were: ‘the making of treaties, the defence of the realm, the prerogative of mercy, the grant of honours, the dissolution of Parliament and the appointment of Ministers’.⁶⁷

This list perhaps suggests that the court’s definition of non-reviewable prerogative powers closely resembles Blackstone’s old notion of the prerogative as consisting solely of those powers which are ‘singular and eccentric to the Crown’, which indicates that one may always find a historical precedent for supposedly radical developments in constitutional law.

IV. Post-GCHQ developments

Cases decided since 1985 seem to build on rather than contradict the rather more functionalist analysis the House of Lords’ adopted in GCHQ. The central question the case raised, but perhaps could not answer, was whether ‘justiciability’ was a concept with a fixed meaning, or whether if, like other common law principles, it would be an unstable concept, prone to sudden and substantial change. Before the courts offered answers to that question however, the Court of Appeal took an unexpected approach to the issues both of the existence of claimed prerogative powers and the capacity of such powers to co-exist with statutory provisions addressing the same matters.

⁶⁵ Ibid., at 411.

⁶⁶ Ibid., at 412.

⁶⁷ Ibid., at 418.

R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Northumbria Police Authority (1988)

The legal structure of the police forces in this country is quite complex; but to put the matter simply, some powers rest with central government, some with local police authorities, and some with the Chief Constable of each force.⁶⁸ The Northumbria case⁶⁹ arose when the central government decided to set up a central supply store for plastic bullets and CS gas, on which Chief Constables could draw when they thought it necessary. Northumbria Police Authority did not want its Chief Constable to use these weapons without its approval, and so it initiated judicial review proceedings in an effort to establish that central government had no legal power to pursue this policy. The government claimed such power emanated from one or both of two sources. Either it came from the Police Act 1964, or it came from the old prerogative power 'to keep the peace'.

The Court of Appeal eventually decided that the 1964 Act did include the power to set up a central weapons depot. That was a controversial conclusion, but we need not dwell on it here. What we do need to consider is the court's answer to the questions of whether there was a prerogative power to keep the peace, and if so, what types of action came within the confines of that power in the mid-1980s?

The Police Authority's case rested on two main contentions. The first argument was that there was no mention in nineteenth-century textbooks or case law of a prerogative power to keep the peace. This would seem a strong argument in the Police Authority's favour. If we recall Lord Camden's judgment in Entick v Carrington, we will remember that he was quite clear about how to determine if the Crown had a legal power to seize Mr Entick's papers; 'If it is law, it will be found in our books. If it is not to be found there, it is not law'. In effect, the Police Authority was contending that the residue of prerogative powers left to the Crown after 1688 never extended to equipping a police force.

The Court of Appeal dismissed this contention. Its somewhat innovative attitude is perhaps best expressed by Nourse LJ:

[The] scarcity of reference in the books to the prerogative of keeping the peace within the realm does not disprove that it exists. Rather it may point to an unspoken assumption that it does.⁷⁰

It is not difficult to agree with the first of those sentences; we should be cautious about assuming that eighteenth century textbooks and law reports offered a comprehensive map of that era's legal landscape.⁷¹ But the meaning of the second sentence seems odd. Nourse LJ appears to argue that we should assume a legal power exists becomes no judge or textbook writer has ever recognised it. It seems hard to reconcile that reasoning with definitions of the rule of law which demand predictability and certainty in the scope of government's legal powers. Nevertheless, as we have already stressed, the Burmah Oil case serves as a salutary reminder that while there is no doubt that the prerogative is residual, there yet remains considerable uncertainty that all parts of that residue have thus far been identified. Nourse LJ's analysis in Northumbria might therefore be defended ⁶⁸ An excellent analysis is offered in Lustgarten L (1989) The governance of police. See also Marshall G and Loveday B (1994) 'The police: independence and accountability', in Jowell and Oliver op cit.

⁶⁹ [1988] 1 All ER 556, CA. See also Bradley A (1988) 'Police powers and the prerogative' Public Law 298.

⁷⁰ [1988] 1 All ER 556 at 575, CA.

⁷¹ Cf Nourse LJ at 574: 'It has not at any stage in our history been practicable to identify all the prerogative powers of the Crown. It is only by a process of piecemeal decision over a period of centuries that particular powers are seen to exist or not exist'. Burmah Oil is a pertinent example of what might best be described as a 300-year time lag in the judiciary's discovery of a hitherto hidden legal rule.

(unconvincingly) on the basis that he was perspicacious enough to find a 'lost' power which no other judge had previously managed to spot.

The Police Authority's second argument drew on De Keyser and Laker. The first police force was created by statute in the early-nineteenth century. So Northumbria contended that whatever prerogative powers to keep the peace may have existed between 1688 and 1800 would have been superseded by any overlapping statutory provisions. Section 4 of the Police Act 1964 granted the power to provide clothing and equipment to the police to police authorities. Northumbria argued that if one applied the De Keyser principle to s 4, one could only conclude that whatever prerogative power to supply equipment the Home Secretary might have had before 1964 had now been removed.

But the Court of Appeal also rejected this argument. It held that s 4 did not 'expressly grant a monopoly' in respect of equipment provision to the Police Authority, but rather created a situation in which the Police Authority's statutory power co-existed with the Home Secretary's prerogative power. But unlike the situation in Laker, the co-existence appeared to be contradictory rather than interlocking. This is a rather surprising argument, for it seems to be saying that the doctrine of implied repeal does not apply to prerogative powers. The court is apparently suggesting that Parliament can only abolish or curtail the prerogative through express statutory provisions.⁷²

This initially appears to take us into a seemingly illogical train of thought. Firstly, we accept that statute has a superior legal status to the prerogative. Secondly, we accept that statutes can be impliedly repealed by subsequent, impliedly inconsistent legislation. Thirdly, we accept that prerogative powers cannot be impliedly repealed by subsequent, impliedly inconsistent legislation. The third contention obviously contradicts points one and two. It is difficult to reconcile the Court of Appeal's decision about the status of the prerogative with orthodox constitutional theory, which might perhaps lead us to conclude that if we look hard enough we will usually find that our constitution harbours exceptions to even the most evidently straightforward of rules.

On further reflection however, Northumbria's acceptance of the co-existence of statutory and prerogative powers is, post-GCHQ, arguably unproblematic. Since the nature of the Crown's prerogative power to keep the peace and the powers afforded to the Home Secretary by the Police Act 1964 is the same, whichever method the government chose to apply its preferred policies would receive the same degree of judicial scrutiny. There is thus no longer any functionalist justification, from a rule of law perspective, for assuming the grant of statutory powers impliedly suspends analogous prerogative authority.

Foreign affairs?

The courts have also given further guidance as to the reach of the justiciability principle. Three cases merit attention; the first two nominally fall under the excluded category of 'foreign policy' to which Lord Roskill referred in GCHQ; the third concerns the grant of pardons for the commissions of crimes which—per GCHQ—would also seem to be a non-justiciable power.

*Exp Molyneux*⁷³ arose from the Anglo-Irish Agreement signed by the British and Irish governments in 1985. The Agreement established an Inter-Governmental Conference which would meet to try to develop initiatives to resolve the problems afflicting Northern Ireland. Molyneux was one of several Protestant Northern Irish politicians who opposed the Agreement. He sought judicial review of the Agreement on the grounds that it implemented policies which could only be achieved through legislation. This was a very speculative argument, and the Court dismissed it out of hand. The Agreement was a treaty with a foreign state; it was quite clear that the government had a prerogative power to negotiate treaties; and it was equally clear that the exercise of that power was not justiciable.

⁷² This sets an improbable test; it is unlikely that the 1964 Parliament would have expressly abolished a prerogative power not then known to exist.

⁷³ [1986] 1 WLR 331.

The Court reached a different conclusion in R v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, ex p Everett.⁷⁴ Mr Everett was an alleged criminal who had taken up residence in Spain, a country with which Britain did not then have an extradition agreement which covered Mr Everett's alleged offence. When Mr Everett's passport expired, the Foreign Office declined to renew it. The government maintained a policy of not renewing passports when the applicant was the subject of an arrest warrant. The issuance of passports has not been put on a statutory basis, and so was clearly a prerogative power. The Foreign Office's refusal meant that Mr Everett could not leave Spain. The Foreign Office did offer him a one-way trip back to Britain, but since he would have been arrested on his return, this was an offer which Mr Everett decided to refuse.

Mr Everett subsequently sought a review of the Foreign Office's decision. The government's primary defence was that the issue of passports was a question of foreign policy, and so within Lord Roskill's 'excluded categories'. The Court of Appeal rejected this argument. O'Connor L J held that:

the issue of a passport fell into an entirely different category. [I]t would seem obvious to me that the exercise of the prerogative... is an area where common sense tells one that, if for some reason a passport is wrongly refused for a bad reason, the court should be able to inquire into it.⁷⁵

'Common sense' is not a precise legal tool. Taylor L J's reasoning is more helpful. He suggested that non-justiciability in foreign relations issues only extended to questions of 'high policy'. He did not define this precisely, but he seems to mean matters which had national security implications or which directly affected Britain's relationship with a foreign state. Issuing a passport was not a matter of high policy, but merely an administrative decision. As such, it should be subject to full review.

Excluded categories: a shrinking list?

The prerogative of mercy figured prominently in Lord Roskill's list of non-justiciable prerogative powers in GCHQ. But barely ten years later, in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Bentley,⁷⁶ the court extended its power of review to this aspect of the prerogative. Derek Bentley, a nineteen-year-old youth of very limited intellectual capacity, had been convicted of murder in 1952 and was hanged in 1953. Bentley had been an accomplice to the actual murderer, a sixteen year old, who was too young to be executed. Despite a recommendation from the jury that Bentley not be executed, the trial judge imposed the death sentence. The then Home Secretary declined to grant mercy to Bentley.

The Bentley case was a final step in a forty-year campaign fought by Iris Bentley, the accused's sister, to establish either that her brother was innocent, or, at the very least, that he should not have received a capital sentence. By the early 1990s, Iris Bentley had convinced many people that her brother had been unjustly treated, and in 1992 she asked the Home Secretary to grant her brother a posthumous pardon. The Home Secretary (then Kenneth Clarke) refused to do so. Mr Clarke suggested that he personally believed that Bentley should not have been hanged, but that he could not grant a pardon because he had not been presented with any evidence indicating that Bentley was innocent of the murder.

⁷⁴ [1989] QB 811, [1989] 1 All ER 655, CA.

⁷⁵ [1989] 2 WLR 224 at 228. That common sense was the appropriate tool to decide the extent of legal powers was the argument advanced by James I in the 1611 Case of Prohibitions. As noted above, Coke thought common sense an inapposite device to control legal interpretation.

⁷⁶ [1994] QB 349; [1993] 4 All ER 442.

Before the High Court, Iris Bentley argued that the Home Secretary had misdirected himself in law, by failing to appreciate that 'a pardon' could take several forms, not all of which required a presumption of innocence. The Court rejected the Home Secretary's assertion that this particular prerogative power was per se unreviewable, concluding that Lord Roskill's apparent assertion to that effect in GCHQ was simply obiter. The Court based its analysis on a seemingly logical extension of the GCHQ principle that: 'the powers of the court cannot be ousted merely by invoking the word "prerogative"'.⁷⁷ The issue before the Court in Bentley was not the essentially non-justiciable question of how the Home Secretary should have balanced the various moral and political factors involved in determining whether a pardon should be granted in this case, but the eminently 'legal' question of whether the Home Secretary should be required to re-make his decision when his original response was based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the scope of his power. In such circumstances, the Court saw no constitutional barrier to full review.

But having assumed the power to declare that Mr Clarke's decision was unlawful, the Court then declined to use it. Rather, Watkins LJ 'invited' the Home Secretary to look at the question again and 'devise some formula which would amount to a clear acknowledgment that an injustice was done'.⁷⁸ In such circumstances, the distinction between an 'invitation' and an 'order' is perhaps merely semantic: the practical effect of the Court's decision was to pull a hitherto legally unregulated aspect of the government process within a recognisably Diceyan notion of the rule of law.

V. 'Justiciability' revisited—are all statutory powers subject to full review?

The notion of justiciability is a two-edged sword. If, post-GCHQ, the courts' concern is now with the nature of a government power rather than its source, it would seem plausible to assume that there are (and always have been) some statutory powers whose nature makes them unsuitable for review. Once more therefore, we are drawn towards a functionalist rather than formalist interpretation of constitutional principle. *Chandler v DPP*⁷⁹ offers an example of this principle being put into practice.

Section 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 made it an offence for anybody to enter any prohibited place 'for any purpose prejudicial to the safety... of the state'. This is obviously a national security issue, but one dealt with by statute rather than the prerogative. As part of a political campaign against nuclear weapons, Chandler entered such a prohibited place, a military airfield, and tried to immobilise planes by sitting on the runway. He was subsequently prosecuted under s 1.

His defence was that his efforts to publicise the cause of disarmament were in fact beneficial to the safety of the state. However the House of Lords declined to be drawn into this argument. The court held that the question of evaluating threats to national security was not justiciable. The gravity of any claimed threat to national security was an issue that could only be evaluated by the government of the day.

⁷⁷ Ibid., at 452.

⁷⁸ [1994] QB 349 at 366; [1993] 4 All ER 442 at 455.

⁷⁹ [1964] AC 763, HL.

This was not quite a judicial retreat back to the Ship Money situation. At least technically, the Court seemed to follow the precedent set in the Zamora case by requiring some evidence that the protestors' activities had jeopardised national security. That requirement did not seem to be very demanding however—the Court was satisfied by an affidavit from an Air Commodore simply saying that the air strip was an important defence installation, and that any intrusion into it was 'prejudicial to the safety of the state'.

This result is obviously similar to that reached twenty years later in GCHQ. In theory, the government is subjected to a burden of proof to demonstrate that it was indeed motivated by national security considerations. But in practice, that requirement is a formality, discharged by the most flimsy evidence. So one must beware of falling into the trap of assuming that simply putting prerogative powers on a statutory basis will make them subject to the full rigour of judicial review. National security, whether invoked under a statute or under the prerogative, seems likely always to be a non-justiciable issue.

There may perhaps come a point where there seems to be no justification for claiming that national security issues arise. One might speculate for example how the Court of Appeal would have responded in Laker Airways to a DoT claim that it was indeed entitled to issue 'directions' under s 4(3)—a power which arose only in respect of national security or diplomatic concerns—because in the Minister's considered opinion Laker's service did indeed have adverse national security implications. However this theory has not as yet been put to the test.

The post-GCHQ focus on the nature rather than source of governmental power also means that one should not attach great significance to the suggestions made by the (Gordon Brown led) Labour government in 2007 that some prerogative powers, notably to sign treaties and to deploy military forces might be placed on a statutory basis or subjected to statutory restrictions which would require the government to gain the express approval of the House of Commons before such powers could be used.⁸⁰ A draft 'Constitutional Renewal' document which included those proposals was published early in 2008.⁸¹

Conclusion

It is obvious that the courts supervise the government's use of prerogative powers more closely now than in the pre-revolutionary era. It is also quite clear that there has been some increase in the theoretical reach of the courts' power of review since the 1967 decision in Lain. We can also conclude that administrative law now seems to treat prerogative and statutory powers in the same way.

The more difficult issue is to decide if the concept of non-justiciability is too widely defined? Are the courts allowing too much government action to take place free from the control of judicial review? The courts' control of the common law concept of judicial review gives the judges considerable power. By extending the scope of justiciability, the courts can place tighter controls on government's ability to behave in ways that seem inconsistent with traditional understandings of the rule of law. That looks very much like a 'red light' interpretation of the judicial function, and is a desirable result if one is suspicious of government, and fears that government powers might be used for unmeritorious ends. Alternatively, if one favours a 'green light' judicial role, believing that it is important for government to have great freedom to pursue policies which it thinks advance the national interest, one might prefer that the courts decide that more types of government action are non-justiciable. At present, the common law's power to extend review to currently non-justiciable issues obviously exists, but it is not clear under what circumstances, if any, it will be used.

⁸⁰ Ministry of Justice (2007) The governance of Britain. For an overview of the proposals see Le Sueur A (2008) 'Gordon Brown's new constitutional settlement' Public Law 21.

⁸¹ Some of these suggestions were enacted in the Constitutional, Reform and Governance Act 2010. See further 'VII. Turning convention into law; the Ponsonby rule and the Constitutional Reform and Governance Act 2010', ch 9, pp 293–294.

The limits of the courts' willingness to expand the notion of justiciability were indicated by the Court of Appeal's 2002 judgment in R (Abbasi) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.⁸² Abbasi was a British national, alleged by the US government to be a Taliban fighter, and imprisoned without trial in the Guantanamo Bay prison camp. His mother began judicial review proceedings on his behalf, seeking to establish that the Foreign Secretary was obliged to use his foreign policy prerogative to urge the US government to treat Mr Abbasi more favourably. The Court of Appeal saw little scope for intervention:

Whether to make any representations in a particular case and if so, in what form, was left entirely to the Secretary of State's discretion. The Secretary of State had to be free to give full weight to foreign policy considerations, which were not justiciable.⁸³

The scope both of judicial power to control the prerogative and of judicial unwillingness to use that power were graphically revealed by the litigation involving the Chagos Islands between 2000 and 2009. The Chagos Islands are a small archipelago in the Indian Ocean, which until the mid-1960s were formally part of the then British colony of Mauritius. The islands had some 1500 inhabitants, many of whose families had lived there for several generations, who made a very modest living in agricultural activities. In the mid-1960s, the American government decided it would like to build a large military base on Diego Garcia, the largest of the islands. To accommodate this, the British government issued an Order in Council⁸⁴ which established the islands as a separate colony, the British Indian Ocean Territory. The Order created a 'Commissioner' to govern the islands, and granted her powers (in s 1) to make laws for the 'peace order and good government' of the islands. The Commissioner—in effect the Foreign Secretary—then issued an immigration order purportedly under the s 11 power which provided for the forcible deportation of all of the inhabitants and their relocation in Mauritius. The Americans were subsequently granted a lease to build their base on Diego Garcia.

After years of effort, the displaced islanders succeeded in extracting a modest amount of compensation for their removal. Some of them however wished to establish a right to return to their homeland. The claimant in *R (Bancoult) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs*⁸⁵ advanced several challenges to the lawfulness of the government's actions.⁸⁶ The High Court's judgment revealed a history of duplicity and casual racism in the government's⁸⁷ treatment of the islanders in the 1960s. More significantly, ⁸² [2002] EWCA Civ 1598; [2002] 47 LS Gaz R 29; (2002) The Times 8 November.

⁸³ Ibid, per Lord Phillips MR.

⁸⁴ The British Indian Ocean Territory Order 1965.

⁸⁵ [2001] QB 1067.

⁸⁶ It will often be the case in respect of litigation heard many years after the actions complained of, that the 'government' which is the formal defendant in legal proceedings may have little in common (either ideologically or in terms of personnel) with the 'government' which actually took the decisions in issue.

⁸⁷ The government at the relevant time was a Labour administration headed by Harold Wilson. Para 13 of the judgment of Laws LJ is perhaps the most revealing.

the Court held that the immigration order was per se unlawful, on the simple basis that it could not be within the power to make law for the ‘peace order and good government’ of a territory to produce a law which emptied the land concerned of people who might be governed.⁸⁸

The government in 2000 (the first Labour government headed by Tony Blair) responded to the judgment by accepting that its predecessors had behaved unconscionably towards the islanders and by (apparently) committing itself to allow the islanders to return. The commitment was not however honoured. The ostensible basis for this was that it would not be economically feasible for the population to return, although the relatively clear reason for the government’s evident change of heart was political pressure from the then American government which did not wish there to be any indigenous population near its military base.

The government sought to give effect to this policy by issuing an Order in Council in 2004 which purported to create a new ‘constitution’ for the islands. Section 9 of the Order provided that no-one would have the right of abode in the colony other than in accordance with rules prescribed by the government. A subsequently promulgated Immigration Ordinance made it evident that the islanders themselves would not be permitted to return.

Mr Bancoult’s subsequent efforts to establish that s 9 of the Order in Council was unlawful succeeded in both the High Court and the Court of Appeal,⁸⁹ essentially on the basis that the Crown did not possess a common law power wholly to depopulate a particular colony. Such a drastic political objective could only be achieved by Parliament qua sovereign law-maker.

That rationale was also supported by Lord Bingham⁹⁰ and Lord Mance⁹¹ in the House of Lords. Unhappily for Mr Bancoult however, the majority took a different view. Lord Rodger expressed the point most clearly:

109 Assuming, then, that Her Majesty’s constituent power can properly be described as a power to make “laws for the peace, order and good government of the territory”, such a power is equal in scope to the legislative power of Parliament... [I]t is not open to the courts to hold that legislation enacted under a power described in those terms does not, in fact, conduce to the peace, order and good government of the territory. Equally, it cannot be open to the courts to substitute their judgment for that of the Secretary of State advising Her Majesty

⁸⁸ See especially paras 53–60.

⁸⁹ R (Bancoult) v Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (No 2); [2006] EWHC 1038 in the High Court; in the Court of Appeal [2007] EWCA Civ 498; [2008] QB 365; and in the House of Lords [2008] UKHL 61; [2009] 1 AC 453. For an insightful analysis see Cohn M (2009) ‘Judicial review of non-statutory executive powers after Bancoult: a unified anxious model’ Public Law 260.

⁹⁰ [2009] 1 AC 453 at para 70: ‘This is not a surprising conclusion, since the relationship between the citizen and the Crown is based on reciprocal duties of allegiance and protection and the duty of protection cannot ordinarily be discharged by removing and excluding the citizen from his homeland. It is not, I think, suggested that those whose homes are in former colonial territories may be treated in a way which would not be permissible in the case of citizens in this country... It is unnecessary to consider whether some power such as that claimed might be exercisable in the event of natural catastrophe or acute military emergency, since none such existed. Nor is it to the point that the Queen in Parliament could have legislated to the effect of section 9: it could, but not without public debate in Parliament and democratic decision.’

⁹¹ Ibid at para 157: ‘A colony... consists, first and foremost, of people living in a territory, with links to a parent state. The Crown’s “constituent” power to introduce a constitution for a ceded territory is a power intended to enable the proper governance of the territory, at least among other things for the benefit of the people inhabiting it. A constitution which exiles a territory’s inhabitants is a contradiction in terms. The absence of any precedent for the exercise of the royal prerogative to exclude the inhabitants of a colony from the colony is significant, although to my mind entirely unsurprising. Until the present case, no-one can have conceived of its exercise for such a purpose’.

as to what can properly be said to conduce to the peace, order and good government of BIOT. This is simply because such questions are not justiciable. The law cannot resolve them: they are for the determination of the responsible ministers rather than judges. In this respect, the legislation made for the colonies is in the same position as legislation made by Parliament for this country... In both cases, the sanction for inappropriate use of the legislative power is political, not judicial....

This might be thought a very problematic conclusion. In jurisprudential terms, its effect is essentially to place the government on an equal footing with Parliament; to suggest, in effect, that there are two sovereign law-makers. More prosaically, the majority's reasoning means that it is for the citizen to persuade Parliament to prevent the government from depriving her of even so basic an entitlement as the right to live in her homeland, rather than for the government to persuade Parliament to allow it to do so. It is, we might suggest, an example of the courts subjecting the government to the rule of politics rather than the rule of law.

Lord Rodger's position does however alert us to the fact that resort to the courts is not the only means to regulate the government's use of prerogative or statutory powers. In addition to having analysed the legal mechanism of judicial review, we must also assess political methods of control; methods alluded to in Blackstone's Commentaries and Cockburn CJ's judgment in Allen. As subsequent chapters suggest, political controls of governmental behaviour can take various forms, both in shaping the way that such power is used and in providing mechanisms of accountability in respect of powers that have been 'improperly' (if not unlawfully) exercised. In chapters five and six, we consider two of those forms—the House of Commons and the House of Lords.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Tomkins A (2005) Our republican constitution ch 3

Markesinis B (1973) 'The royal prerogative re-visited' Cambridge LJ 287

Keir D (1936) 'The case of Shipmoney' LQR 546

Wade HRW (1985) 'The civil service and the prerogative' LQR 190

Wade HRW (1977) 'Judicial control of the prerogative' LQR 325

Case law and legislation

Attorney-General v De Keyser Royal Hotel [1920] AC 508

R v Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, ex parte Lain [1967] 2 QB 864

Laker Airways v Dept of Trade [1977] 2 All ER 182

Council for Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service (GCHQ) [1985] AC 374

R v Secretary of State for Home Affairs, ex parte the Fire Brigades Union [1995] 2 AC 513

This page intentionally left blank

Part Two

The Institutions and Operation of National Government

Chapter 5 The House of Commons

Chapter 6 The House of Lords

Chapter 7 The Electoral System

Chapter 8 Parliamentary Privilege

Chapter 9 Constitutional Conventions

This page intentionally left blank

Chapter 5

The House of Commons

This chapter does not offer a comprehensive picture of the historical development and modern role of the House of Commons.¹ Rather, it sketches aspects of the relationship between the government and the legislature, in order to develop arguments concerning the doctrines of parliamentary sovereignty and the separation of powers within the contemporary constitution.

Crown and commons—the original intent and the subsequent rise of ‘party’ politics

The fragmentary historical records of mediaeval England make it impossible to state with certainty when a body which might be regarded as the predecessor of the Commons first emerged.² By 1270, several national assemblies, whose members included ‘commoners’ as well as aristocrats had met under the King’s authority to assist in devising solutions to political difficulties.³ The consolidation of the Commons, Lords and Monarch as the three ‘Estates of the Realm’ occurred by 1300. Members of the Lords were individually summoned by the Monarch; the members of the Commons comprised representatives of each county and borough.⁴ The Commons’ early history need not be dwelt on here. For analytical purposes however, if we accept 1688 as the birth date of the modern constitution, it is helpful to focus briefly on then prevailing perceptions of the Commons’ correct constitutional functions, and, relatedly, the moral source of its authority within the law-making and governmental processes.

The Commons initially performed two distinct legislative roles. The first, inherent in its status as one Estate of the Realm, was to safeguard the interests of non-aristocratic elite groups in society against the possible incursions of the Lords and/or the Crown.⁵ As such, it provided a weak representative base to the governmental process. As is explained in chapter seven, ‘the people’ from which the Commons was drawn prior to 1832 was ¹ See Silk P (1992) How Parliament works: Adonis A (1991) Parliament today: Walkland S and Ryle M (eds) (1977) The Commons in the seventies: Ryle M and Richards (1988) The Commons under scrutiny: Norton P (1985) The Commons in perspective chs 1–2; (2nd edn, 1991) The British polity chs 8 and 11; (2005) Parliament in British politics chs 2 and 5.

² For a brief overview see Norton (2005) op cit ch 2.

³ Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 130–140.

⁴ The electoral system through which members of the Commons are chosen is discussed in ch 7. The Commons is often referred to as the ‘lower house’ or ‘lower chamber’ of Parliament; the Lords as the ‘upper house’ or ‘upper chamber’. The book uses these three labels for each house inter-changeably.

⁵ As ch 7 suggests, this rather oversimplifies the political reality.

a narrowly-defined concept. But the notion that legitimate government demanded the consent of 'the people' rather than merely their submission was then an accepted (if flexible) principle of constitutional morality. The Commons' second legislative role was to represent local interests within the national legislature. Members were 'elected' on a geographical basis, as representatives of particular areas known as 'constituencies' and were expected to act as advocates for those areas: the Commons was as much an aggregation of localities as a 'national' forum.

The MP—representative or delegate?

By 1688, the 'national' dimension of the Commons' role was becoming dominant.⁶ This is illustrated by subsequently accepted perceptions of the nature of the relationship between an MP and his electors, a perception famously articulated by Edmund Burke in his 1774 Address to the electors of Bristol:

it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasures, his satisfaction to theirs;... and in all cases to prefer their interest to his own. But his unbiased opinion, his mature judgement, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice... to any set of men living... Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgement: and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

Burke's thesis is echoed in Madison's notion of representative government.⁷ Legislators were not the mere delegates of their electors. Madison's words would fit unproblematically into Burke's rationale; as representatives, MPs' legislative task would be to 'refine and enlarge the public view', to 'discern the true interest of their country' and to resist pressure from their electors to sacrifice that interest to 'temporary or partial considerations'. Electors who concluded that their MP had succumbed to such pressures, or, alternatively, who favoured 'temporary and partial considerations' which their representative did not support, might subsequently choose a different MP. But what Parliament had thus far never done was pass legislation which empowered disgruntled electors to dismiss an MP who failed to follow their instructions.

Burke offers an idealised picture of the Commons; a legislative chamber in which independently minded MPs address every question before them in an, enlightened and impartial manner, free from the fetters both of parochialism and factional allegiances. In such circumstances, one might plausibly assume that the decisions the house reached would indeed represent the 'national interest'. Whether such a governmental idyll ever did (or could) exist within the British constitution (or any other) is a moot point; more certain is that the practicalities of political life in the Parliaments which sat from 1750 onwards contained the seeds of a countervailing trend, which by 1900 had hardened into a rigid orthodoxy. In formal, legal terms the Burkean position still exists today. MPs are not legally obliged to structure their voting behaviour or work in the Commons in accordance with anybody else's wishes. Yet, in practice, the contemporary MP can defensibly be portrayed as a delegate; not of her constituents, but of her party.

⁶ Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 618–619.

⁷ See 'The solutions—representative government, federalism, a separation of powers, and supra-legislative "fundamental" rights"', ch 1, pp 10–17 above.

The fusion of powers, the rise of the party system and cabinet dominance of the Commons

The concept of the ‘independent’ MP fits comfortably with idealised versions of the separation of powers, in which the legislature and the executive were entirely discrete bodies. Yet a pure separation of powers has always been a myth within the English (and later British) constitution. The 1688 constitutional settlement did not effect an extreme separation of powers. The Monarch, then the formal and functional core of the executive branch of government, was also part of the legislature. Similarly, many of his/her advisers and Ministers were members of the Lords: holding Ministerial office did not preclude (nor require) fully active membership of either house. The Monarch’s advisers were collectively known as the Privy Council,⁸ a body with as many as 50 members, many of whom were members of the Lords or Commons. Two of the three branches of government were from the outset of the post-revolutionary era ‘fused’ rather than separated.

Yet it would be simplistic to assume that an overlap of personnel necessarily precluded an effective divergence, if not quite separation, of powers between the Commons and the executive in the immediate post-revolutionary period. Given the turbulence of seventeenth-century political history, it is readily apparent that many members of the Commons would regard the Monarch with suspicion, even though his/her legal powers were now inferior to those of Parliament.

The emergence of the parliamentary sovereignty doctrine produced a substantial redefinition of contemporary constitutional understandings. Yet as noted in discussing the royal prerogative, certain pre-revolutionary principles continued to structure judicial perceptions of the relationships between the other two branches of government. Such continuities had a political as well as a legal dimension.⁹

Charles II introduced the first recognisably modern ‘Cabinet’ within the executive when, in 1671, he effectively marginalised the Privy Council and chose to formulate government policy with a so-called ‘Cabal’ of just five Ministers. Charles’ initiative attracted considerable criticism; the Cabal was seen as a factional vehicle, rather than, like the larger Privy Council, a source of diverse and (ideally) disinterested counsel. Yet despite the revolution’s apparent distrust of factional government, the more centralised ‘Cabinet’ rather than the Privy Council formed the core of the executive in the immediate post-revolutionary era. Furthermore, the nature of the relationship between the Monarch and his/her Ministers within the core also began to shift. Neither George I nor George II took much interest in government affairs. By 1740, practical control of the Cabinet rested with the occupant of the newly emergent office of ‘Prime Minister’. Sir Robert Walpole is generally regarded as the first holder of the post, but his position had no legal basis, and it was not until 1800 that the label came into common usage.¹⁰ George III took close control of the government process, but since he suffered periodic bouts of insanity, his ability to reverse the drift towards Prime Ministerial pre-eminence within the government was limited.

The eighteenth-century Monarchs’ disinclination and/or inability to lead ‘their’ Cabinets coincided with the emergence of a sophisticated system of party political organisation. Outside the Commons, the rise of the national political party was facilitated by advances in technology. Improved transport facilities and cheaper printing meant that, for the first time, like-minded citizens throughout the country could constantly plan and act in concert on political issues.

⁸ The term was in common usage by 1540; Plucknett (1960) op cit p 255. The Privy Council still exists, but has little practical relevance except on those occasions when (staffed by Law Lords) it sits as a final Court of Appeal for some Commonwealth countries.

⁹ See Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 610–647.

¹⁰ See Wicks (2006) op cit ch 3.

The perception of the two houses containing 'a government' and 'an opposition' is again associated with Walpole, who from 1717 led a group of MPs which for the first time saw its raison d'être as being to 'oppose' the government, although it is not until the 1820s that the label 'The Opposition' (meaning the second largest grouping of MPs in the house) became commonplace.¹¹ By then, the Cabinet, comprised almost exclusively of members of the Commons and/or Lords, was generally formed from the leading members of the party commanding majority support in the lower house.

As chapters six and seven suggest, the Commons had in practice become the dominant chamber within Parliament by the 1830s. By this time, the Commons was beginning to be controlled by a majority party pursuing a coherent set of policy objectives, over which the Cabinet and the Prime Minister exercised an appreciable degree of control. For modern observers, the perception that the Commons is little more than an arena within which the Labour and Conservative Parties alternately form the government and the opposition is a strong one. It is given considerable force simply by the physical layout of the Commons' main chamber. The 'floor of the house' places government and opposition members directly opposite each other on several rows of benches. Government Ministers and their opposition 'shadows' occupy the front benches on each side, with the rest of their party members sitting behind them.¹² That the lower house is now a body in which party factions are clearly demarcated and constantly jostle for advantage cannot seriously be disputed. Equally clearly, that contemporary reality bears little relation to the Commons' initial role in the post-revolutionary constitution.

Party discipline in the Commons: the whips and the appointment of Ministers MPs have never been legally obliged to support their party within the house. Parties are in effect voluntary organisations, within which maintaining co-operation between members is an entirely internal matter. Within the Commons, the larger parties have developed a relatively sophisticated control mechanism known as the 'whipping system'.¹³ Several MPs in each party serve as whips. They function as the party's personnel managers, ensuring that their party's MPs are deployed to maximise achievement of party objectives.

'The whip' is also used to refer to the weekly timetable of Commons business produced by each party. This alerts MPs to the significance which their party's leadership attaches to particular issues. Specific items of business will be marked with 'one line', 'two line' and 'three line' whips; the higher the number, the more important it is presumed to be that MPs participate and vote in the business in hand.¹⁴ Not all house business is whipped in this way. On issues in respect of which a party's leadership has no particular view, it may permit a 'free vote' in which its MPs follow whichever course they consider appropriate.

Party whips are often portrayed as a purely coercive force, whose role is to persuade or threaten MPs to support party policy. That is a role they frequently perform; but they also serve as a channel for exchanging information between the front and backbenches, and will sometimes be concerned more with convincing the Cabinet that its plans will ¹¹ Norton P (1988) 'Opposition to government' p 100, in Ryle and Richards op cit.

¹² Hence ministers and shadow ministers are often referred to as 'frontbenchers'. Members not holding governmental office or shadow positions are 'backbenchers'.

¹³ Norton P (1979) 'The organisation of parliamentary parties', in Walkland S (ed) The House of Commons in the twentieth century.

¹⁴ Votes in the house are often referred to as 'divisions', as members register their vote by dividing into two lines and physically walking into different parts of an area of the house known as 'the division lobby'.

not attract sufficient backbench support than with compelling backbenchers to support party preferences. Party whips also oversee their MPs' 'pairing' arrangements, whereby two MPs of opposing parties who expect to vote in different ways agree with each other not to vote on particular occasions, thereby freeing themselves to undertake activities elsewhere. Like most aspects of Commons procedures, 'pairing' is not a legally enforceable concept, and pairs have on occasion been broken in close votes.

MPs who consistently flout party policy may have the whip withdrawn.¹⁵ This can have severe long-term consequences. Since an MP is legally the representative of her constituency rather than her party, losing the party whip has no impact on her presence in the Commons. However, as we shall see in chapter seven, election to the Commons is now determined primarily by a candidate's party allegiance. A member who is not adopted as her party's candidate at the next general election is unlikely to retain her seat.

If the whipping system is in some senses the stick with which parties discipline their MPs, granting governmental or shadow office may be seen as the carrot. The power to appoint people to ministerial office nominally rests with the Monarch through her prerogative powers. The government is technically 'Her Majesty's Government'. In effect, the appointment, promotion, transfer, demotion and dismissal of Ministers are matters for the Prime Minister. An MP's progress up (or down) what is disparagingly referred to as 'the greasy pole' is contingent on many factors, relating both to the qualities of the individual concerned and the wider political situation. But MPs who regularly diverge from party policies are unlikely to enter ministerial or shadow ministerial ranks, still less to rise within them. Not all MPs seek to hold ministerial office; some will have returned to the backbenches after having previously served in government. For such members, the influence of the lure of office on their loyalty to their party is limited. For the careerist MP, however, the prospect of promotion is a powerful incentive for tailoring her own political cloth to the pattern drawn up by the party leadership.

There are no formal degrees of seniority within the Cabinet, but there is an informal hierarchy. Cabinet members are generally 'Secretaries of State' of particular government departments. The three most important (often referred to as the 'great offices of state') are Home Secretary, Foreign Secretary, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is no fixed limit to the number of Ministers who may serve in the Cabinet (although at present no more than twenty-one Cabinet members may hold paid posts as Secretaries of State).¹⁶ The number has risen over the past 150 years, from barely a dozen in the 1870s to as many as two dozen now. Nor is there any legal requirement that Cabinet Ministers be members of either house, although it is now unheard of for a Minister not to be a member of Parliament.

'Ministers of State', several of whom are appointed for each department, occupy a lower rung of the ministerial ladder, and are rarely Cabinet members. They may nevertheless wield very substantial executive responsibilities, and if their particular Secretary of State is a member of the Lords, they will bear primary responsibility for representing their department in the Commons. At a lower level, junior ministers known as 'Parliamentary Under Secretaries'. At the bottom of the ministerial hierarchy are 'Parliamentary Private Secretaries' (PPSs), often pejoratively referred to as ministerial 'bag carriers'.

The House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975 currently precludes the government from having more than 95 ministers drawn from the Commons. The number was periodically increased throughout the twentieth century. This may be attributed in part to the post-war era's growing acceptance of green light theories of the state; since twentieth century governments have assumed greater responsibilities than their predecessors, it is unsurprising that they need more Ministers. However, the increase may also be explained by successive governments' wishes to exercise more control over party members.¹⁷ This argument has the force of numbers behind it; since a party needs only 340 MPs to enjoy a comfortable Commons majority, the presence of nearly 100 members in the government points to a significant merging of the executive and legislative branches. Sections two and three below consider whether this merging might defensibly be presented as an executive takeover of the lower house by assessing the Commons' roles as a contributor to the legislative process, and as a mechanism to scrutinise government behaviour.

¹⁵ See Cross J (1967) 'Withdrawal of the Conservative Party whip' Parliamentary Affairs 169.

¹⁶ Ministerial and other Salaries Act 1975, s 1.

I. Setting the context

This section focuses on three elements of the Commons' constitutional identity. The first concerns the roots of its procedural rules; the second addresses the role of 'the Speaker'; while the third considers the resources MPs have to carry out their duties.

The sources of the Commons' procedural rules

Parliament has passed little legislation controlling the Commons' proceedings. Nor has there been any significant judicial intervention through the common law in this area.¹⁸ Such questions have been left primarily to the house itself. Its rules currently derive from three main sources: traditional customs or 'ancient usage'; various 'Standing Orders' passed by the house; and Speakers' rulings.

In the absence of legislation controlling the matter in issue, the house may amend any of its procedures by a simple majority vote.¹⁹ Significant changes are rarely introduced so peremptorily. The notion that the house's procedures should rest on the basis of consensual reciprocity has generally been a strongly held moral principle among MPs. Major reforms are generally instigated at the recommendation of the Commons Procedure Committee.²⁰

The leading source of guidance on Commons' procedure is Erskine May's Treatise on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings and Usage of Parliament.²¹ But it would be misleading to consider such guidance, or indeed the procedures themselves, as 'laws'. The most important element of the house's working practices is the phenomenon known as 'the usual channels'—the various informal agreements made between the government and opposition parties as to how the Commons' time should be allocated. Managing the usual channels is a task allocated primarily to the Leader of the House (a senior member of the Cabinet) and the government chief whip, together with their opposition counterparts.

The house's procedural rules can be regarded as presumptions to which members voluntarily acquiesce: in part because they consider the rules intrinsically correct; in part because they feel the wishes of a majority of members should be respected; and in part because they would hope that should they form part of the Commons majority in future, ¹⁷ deSmith op cit pp 264–265.

¹⁸ See 'Substance or procedure? the enrolled Bill rule', ch 2, pp 30–31 above. The issue is examined further in ch 8.

¹⁹ Although as ch 8 suggests, there are instances when the house has apparently successfully defied legislative regulation of its behaviour.

²⁰ Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 174–175.

²¹ References here to Erskine May are to the 21st edition, edited by Boulton C (1989).

the then minority would be similarly co-operative. The presumptions are not, however, irrebuttable.

The dominant presumption is that government business takes priority in each parliamentary session. This presumption is currently given force in a standing order—but that merely reflects rather than creates the government's ability to control the house's proceedings. The crucial informants of the way the Commons conducts its business are the willingness of its members to respect traditional practices, and, should that respect break down, the government's capacity to marshal majority support for its preferences.

The Commons generally sits for between 150 and 200 days per session; sessions usually begin in the autumn and run for eleven months. Each begins with 'The Queen's Speech', in which the Monarch outlines the government's planned legislative programme. There is no rigid rule as to how precisely time will be divided between the Commons' various functions. In recent years, 30%–35% of time spent on the floor of the house has been devoted to government Bills; 15%–17% has been used for motions (general debates) and ministerial statements on subjects of the government's choosing; 7%–8% has been granted to Opposition motions; 8%–10% has been for backbenchers' Bills and motions, and similar amounts have been devoted to questions to Ministers, and passing delegated legislation.

There is great scope for inter-party disagreement as to the propriety of government efforts to manage the house's workflow. Since the Commons' procedural rules are not legal phenomena, and so not subject to judicial oversight, some other arbiter is required to resolve disputes. That function is one of several performed by the Speaker.

The Speaker

The Speaker, an office which dates from 1376, is of considerable significance. It is her task to interpret and apply the various customs and standing orders structuring the house's proceedings. To some extent, her role is that of judge whenever disputes arise as to how parliamentary business should be managed; when, for example, the usual channels cannot produce agreement, or backbenchers feel that the government and opposition front benches are paying insufficient attention to backbench concerns. Her jurisdiction is both extensive and multi-faceted. It embraces such diverse issues as deciding which amendments are to be debated (and for how long) at the report and third reading stages of a Bill's passage; choosing which members may speak; and disciplining members whose behaviour breaches accepted standards.²²

Before 1688, the Speaker often functioned largely as an emissary of the Crown. It was not until 1750 (when the fusion rather than separation of the executive and legislature was becoming apparent), that the Speaker had clearly become a defender of the Commons' interests against the wishes of the government.²³

The Speaker is elected by members of the house. It is now accepted that the office is a non-party political post. The Speaker resigns from her political party on election. She nevertheless remains an MP, and acts on behalf of her constituents. She must also seek re-election to the Commons at subsequent elections, in which she stands as 'the Speaker'. She does not vote in the house except when there is a tie; in such circumstances, tradition requires her to vote for the status quo. In the modern era, Speakers have generally been members of the majority party. However, one recent incumbent, Betty Boothroyd, was a Labour MP prior to assuming office in 1992, even though the Commons then contained

²² See Borthwick R (1988) 'The floor of the house', in Ryle and Richards op cit; Adonis (1990) op cit ch 4; Silk op cit pp 71–76; Laundry P (1979) 'The Speaker and his office in the twentieth century', in Walkland op cit.

²³ We examine this issue further in ch 8.

a Conservative majority. Ms Boothroyd could not have won the election without the approval of many Conservative members; a forceful indicator of the extent to which the Speaker is now perceived, in functional as well as formal terms, to be above party politics.²⁴ However, the Labour Party majority which controlled the Commons after the 1997 general election rejected the leading Conservative candidate, a former Cabinet Minister named Sir George Young, in favour of a rather obscure Labour backbencher, Michael Martin. The sense of bipartisanship was restored in June 2009, when the Conservative MP John Bercow was elected as Speaker by a house which had a substantial Labour majority.²⁵

It would be inaccurate to characterise the Speaker as exercising coercive powers. In so far as a Speaker effectively controls the house, she does so because members voluntarily submit to her authority, even when it might appear that their immediate party political interests would be better served by defiance. As such, the Speaker performs the important (if largely symbolic) task of stressing that the Commons should function as more than a vehicle for dogmatic pursuit of short term factional advantage.

Resources

MPs are poorly resourced in comparison to their legislative contemporaries in other modern democracies.²⁶ In the USA, members of Congress enjoy substantial research and administrative staffs. The rationale underpinning such expansive provision is rooted in the notion of informed consent to government. Legislators are unlikely effectively to contribute to the legislative process, nor searchingly evaluate the merits of government behaviour, if they lack access to expert analysis of relevant information.²⁷

Yet in the mid-1980s, the Commons offered only 350 offices to its 650 members. Many MPs were consequently forced to share office space. Many offices were extremely small—few could accommodate secretarial and research staff as well as the MP herself. MPs are not richly endowed with supporting staff. Members presently receive an allowance of some £100,000 per year for these purposes, a sum insufficient to employ an extensive administrative and research staff.

The Commons has what might initially seem a substantial library. The library employs some 150 staff, many of whom devote all their time to researching MPs' queries. The Commons library is however a modest affair compared to the US Library of Congress. In the 1990s, the Commons employed fewer than 700 staff to service its 650 MPs; the slightly smaller number of legislators in the US Congress had some 20,000 employees.²⁸

It is difficult to accept that successive governments' unwillingness to afford MPs more substantial logistical support is motivated by financial considerations: facilities comparable to those in the USA would add only a tiny amount to public expenditure. Adequate resourcing would impose a 'cost' upon a government, but the cost would be political

²⁴ The Speaker is not always in the chair when the Commons is in session. Her presence is generally reserved only for the most important parts of the Commons' timetable. On other occasions, her role in the Chamber is taken by one of three deputy speakers, first among whom is the 'Chairman of Ways and Means'.²⁵ <<http://www.timesonline.co.uk/tol/news/politics/article6556617.ece>>

²⁶ See generally Bennet P and Pullinger S (1991) Making the Commons work.

²⁷ For a more expansive account see Lock G (1988) 'Information for Parliament' in Ryle and Richards op cit: Griffith J (1974) Parliamentary scrutiny of government bills ch 8.

²⁸ Adonis (1990) op cit p 62.

rather than financial. A comment from The Economist offers a cynical explanation of the current situation:

the government of the day has little to gain by giving Parliaments their own source of knowledge and advice. Why spend money providing information for backbenchers, when ignorance keeps them so much more malleable?²⁹

Any substantial increase in expenditure would require the support of a majority of MPs, which is unlikely to be forthcoming without government approval. By the mid-1990s, repeated expressions of backbench dissatisfaction with Commons' working conditions had apparently borne some fruit; the government accepted that sufficient resources should be provided to ensure that every MP at least had her own office within or adjacent to the Palace of Westminster.

Nor are MPs' salaries particularly high. They are currently about £60,000 per year, which obviously would not permit the member to finance the research and secretarial assistance she might consider appropriate.³⁰ MPs have traditionally also been entitled to claim various expenses, relating to travel and, for those representing constituencies outside London, up to £22,000 towards the cost of maintaining a second home in the London area. Notwithstanding this supplement to the basic salary, an MP's remuneration may compare poorly with the remuneration paid to senior members of the professions. MPs were not paid at all until the early twentieth century. The present rather low level of salaries perhaps provides members with a financial incentive for seeking ministerial office, for which a substantial additional salary is payable. However, being a backbench MP need not be a 'full-time job': many backbench MPs derive income from other forms of employment, such as journalism, legal practice, directorships of companies, or 'consultancies' for commercial organisations.

The case for more expansive (and expensive) provision of financial support for MPs was substantially undermined by a minor scandal in 2008. The house's rules for the payment of administrative and personal expenses have always been remarkably lax. It emerged in 2008 that a Conservative MP, Derek Conway, had claimed substantial expenses for the employment of a research assistant who was his son and who during the supposed period of employment was a student at a northern university. Amidst suggestions that no work had been done, Conway announced he would stand down as an MP at the next election. The episode triggered substantial press and public interest in MPs' expenses, with incredulity being provoked by revelations that MPs need not even provide receipts for claimed expenditure. The house did little to enhance its reputation when the then Speaker, Michael Martin, initiated legal proceedings to prevent publication of details as to how MPs had actually spent their allowances.³¹ In the face of substantial press criticism that action was subsequently withdrawn.

The episode led to intense press scrutiny of the uses to which MPs put the public funding which financed their expense accounts.³² Many MPs appeared to have—albeit honestly ²⁹ Cited in Lock op cit at p 52.

³⁰ MPs with substantial personal wealth who spend some of it on assistance in carrying out their political duties, have a distinct advantage over their less affluent counterparts. For details of the various types and amounts of allowances see <<http://www.parliament.uk/mps-lords-and-offices/members-allowances/>>.

³¹ The Times 26 March 2008.

³² See generally Rayner G and Winnett R (2009) No expenses spared; Kenny M (2009) 'Taking the temperature of the British political elite 3: when grubby is the order of the day' Parliamentary Affairs 503. On public attitudes see Allen N and Birch S (2011) 'Political Conduct and Misconduct: Probing Public Opinion' Parliamentary Affairs 61.

and openly—to have made claims for quite inappropriate items.³³ Among the more notable of these were sums charged by Conservative MP Douglas Hogg to maintain the moat at his country house, by the Conservative MP Peter Viggers for an ornamental duck house at his constituency home, and by the then Labour Home Secretary Jacqui Smith for a television package which included pornographic films. Over a dozen MPs caught up in the controversy subsequently formed the view that their prospects of re-election had been so severely damaged that they did not stand at the 2010 general election.³⁴

More seriously perhaps, some MPs went beyond the realms of poor judgment and made fraudulent claims. Labour MP Eric Illsley was jailed for four months for fraudulently claiming £14,000, his party colleague David Chaytor received an eighteen month sentence for a £20,000 fraud,³⁵ and in April 2011 the former Labour Minister Elliot Morley pleaded guilty to fraudulently obtaining some £30,000 of expenses towards a mortgage that he had already paid off and received twenty months imprisonment.

The episode led to a thorough overhaul of the expenses system, involving both a restriction of the items and amounts for which claims could be made and greatly increased transparency in respect of claims submitted. The Blair government promoted a Bill enacted as the Parliamentary Standards Act 2009. The Act created an Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority (IPSA) with responsibility for monitoring expenses claims, and—in the longer term—making recommendations about MPs' salaries and other payments.³⁶

The involvement of many MPs in paid extra-parliamentary activities also has some bearing on the Commons' traditionally bizarre working hours. Until recently, activity on the floor of the house generally did not begin until 2.30pm and frequently did not end until the early hours of the morning. Mornings would thus be free for other activities. This is very convenient if an MP is in practice at the Bar or serving as a director or consultant for commercial interests. Modest timetable reforms were introduced in 1994. The reforms introduced a limited number of morning sittings in the chamber, abolished some Friday sittings and proposed an earlier end to business on Thursdays. The change marked at least a modest first step towards a more far-reaching normalisation of MPs' working hours. Further steps in this direction were taken in 2002.

Some MPs do regard membership of the Commons as a full time occupation. When not in the chamber, they will be attending to matters arising in their respective constituencies, or participating in the work of the Commons' various committees. Such backbenchers appear to be a minority however. This may be because some members now see election to the Commons as a means to other professional or financial ends, rather than as an end in itself. But it may also be, as sections three and four below suggest, because realistic backbench MPs doubt that their individual and collective presence in the house will often have a significant impact, either on the content of legislation or the behaviour of the government.

Financial support for the opposition

In addition to the salaries paid to the Leader of the Opposition, the opposition chief whip, and the shadow Leader of the House, some financial support is now provided to ³³ The Daily Telegraph newspaper played a prominent role in investigating the story. For updated coverage see <<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/newstoppers/mps-expenses/>>.

³⁴ <<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/newstoppers/mps-expenses/5406185/MPs-expenses-Elliot-Morley-to-stand-down-over-phantom-mortgage.html>>.

³⁵ Daily Telegraph 18 May 2011: <<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/newstoppers/mps-expenses/8513576/Former-MP-Eric-Illsley-released-from-jail.html>>.

³⁶ See the IPSA website at: <<http://www.parliamentarystandards.org.uk/about%20us/Pages/default.aspx>>; both for an explanation of IPSA's role and regular publication of MPs' expenses claims.

the opposition parties to assist them in carrying out their activities.³⁷ This is referred to as ‘Short money’, after Edward Short, the Leader of the House in the Labour government in power when the scheme was introduced in 1975. For the main opposition party the sum is a useful addition to its resources (the Labour Party and Conservative Party when in opposition in the 1990s received around £1m per year of ‘short’ money), but is insufficient to finance extensive political activities. A Committee of Inquiry chaired by Lord Houghton was established by the Labour government in the mid-1970s to consider whether far more substantial financial assistance, on a statutory footing, should be granted to all major political parties. The Committee made recommendations—ignored by all subsequent governments—to that effect.³⁸

What has been said so far might suggest that the balance of power between the government and the Commons is weighted heavily in the government’s favour. This is unsurprising given the fused nature of the government/Commons relationship: in that context, the notion of a meaningful separation between the house and the executive is a misleading dichotomy. The following sections consider whether the dichotomy currently has any merit at all.

II. The passage of legislation

Commentators now seem to agree that the modern House of Commons is rarely a law-making body in any meaningful sense. Norton suggests, for example:

Although some writers continue to list ‘legislation’ as one of the functions of the House of Commons, it is a function which for all intents and purposes has not been exercised by the house in the twentieth century.³⁹

Gavin Drewry expresses a similar scepticism:

[S]ome would question whether in reality the Westminster Parliament, dominated as it is by a powerful executive, able in most circumstances to mobilise majority support in the division lobbies, can properly be called a ‘legislature’ at all.⁴⁰

John Griffith’s comprehensive study of the Commons in the 1967–1971 sessions, concluded that:

[T]he direct impact of the House on Government proposals for legislation was unimpressive.... On no occasion was the government either defeated or forced to make a tactical retreat... [T]he visible result of a great deal of Opposition and Government backbench activity was very small indeed.⁴¹

Such critiques contend that the content of legislation is effectively determined in Cabinet. Governments formulate policies which they expect to command the support of their party’s members in the Commons, and it is rare that their preferences will be significantly amended during a Bill’s passage. Thus one might suggest that in examining the significance of the Commons’ legislative role, one should direct attention to considering its efficacy in influencing or pressurising the government to modify or withdraw its proposals.

The various stages a Bill undergoes in its Commons passage now possess a sacrosanct constitutional status.⁴² The process begins with the ‘first reading’, a purely formal step, in ³⁷ Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 117–118. The scheme does not have an explicit statutory basis.

³⁸ (1976) Report of the Committee on financial aid to political parties (Cmnd 6601).

³⁹ Norton (1985) op cit p 81.

⁴⁰ Drewry (1988) op cit p 122.

⁴¹ (1974) op cit p 206.

⁴² A helpful introduction is provided by Norton (2005) op cit ch 5.

which the measure is introduced to the house. Consideration of the Bill's main principles occurs during 'second reading', a major set piece debate on the floor of the house. If the Bill is approved,⁴³ its details are addressed in a 'standing committee', which is empowered to amend the original text. On leaving the standing committee, the Bill returns to the floor for its 'report stage', when any committee amendments (or new ones proposed by the government) are considered. On completing its report stage, the Bill (as amended) enters its third reading. If approved by the house, it is then sent to the Lords.⁴⁴ This process has no legal basis. It is a matter purely of custom and tradition.

There are no rigid rules concerning the time taken for a Bill to pass through the legislative process, although until 2003 a government or private member's Bill had to complete all its stages in a single parliamentary session. In emergency situations, a Bill may be passed in days or even hours. Such measures are unlikely to have received mature consideration. Conversely, controversial Bills on major issues may spend six months or more in the Commons.⁴⁵

But even Bills in the latter category are not debated or scrutinised until all members are satisfied that the house has been apprised of all relevant viewpoints. In the 1870s and 1880s, Irish MPs dissatisfied with government policy towards 'Home Rule' for Ireland engaged in a protracted campaign of 'filibustering'—continuing debate until the Commons ran out of time—with the result that Bills were simply talked out. To prevent a minority of MPs sabotaging the government's legislative programme in this way, the house introduced (and subsequently refined) several time management initiatives. The standing committee system, which dates from the 1870s and was firmly established as an integral part of the legislative process by 1910,⁴⁶ is one such device which has become entirely uncontroversial. Two other techniques, 'the guillotine' and 'the closure' are more problematic.

The guillotine and closure

A government with majority support may at any stage of a Bill's passage subject it to an 'allocation of time order', colloquially called the 'guillotine'.⁴⁷ The guillotine specifies in advance precisely how long shall be allocated to discussion of a Bill's provisions. Once that time expires, debate ends, irrespective of how much of a Bill remains undiscussed.

Allocation of time orders raise sensitive issues. They may from one perspective be viewed as elevating governmental expediency above the principle that proposed legislation should receive rigorous Commons discussion. Alternatively, they can be seen as a legitimate means for the government to overcome bloody-minded obstructionism by minority parties. Before 1980 governments were most reluctant to deploy the guillotine, evidently for fear of the adverse publicity such a move might generate.⁴⁸ However, recent Conservative governments had fewer qualms about the constitutional propriety of doing so.⁴⁹ Feelings in the house over this issue were sufficiently inflamed in 1994 for the Labour party to withdraw from the usual channels and commit itself to being as obstructive as possible to the conduct of government business.

A less draconian, but more frequently invoked (especially at the report stage), time-management device is the closure. Standing orders provide that any member may ⁴³ At all stages, a bare majority of members voting in favour amounts to approval.

⁴⁴ A Bill may originate in the Lords, in which case it would be sent for the Royal Assent after the Commons' third reading. For an informative study of the passage of a controversial measure see Rose H (1973) 'The Immigration Act 1971: a case study in the work of Parliament' Parliamentary Affairs 69.

⁴⁵ See Adonis (1990) op cit ch 5: Silk op cit pp 138–139.

⁴⁶ Norton (1985) op cit pp 89–90: Adonis op cit p 102.

⁴⁷ See Erskine May op cit pp 409–416: Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 225–228.

⁴⁸ For the 1974–1988 period see the helpful table in Griffith and Ryle op cit p 303.

⁴⁹ Adonis op cit p 70.

propose, at any time, that ‘the question now be put’. If a majority of MPs present (of whom there must be at least 100) support the motion, debate on the question is ended, and the house moves to its next business. The Speaker may reject the proposal if she considers it to be ‘an abuse of the rules of the House’. There are no legal rules controlling the exercise of this discretion. Griffith and Ryle suggest that the Speaker would take into account such matters as how many (and which) members have already spoken and its substantive importance; it seems unlikely that closure would be permitted on a significant question before two or three hours of debate had been conducted.⁵⁰

Second reading

Second reading debates on government Bills are opened and closed by speeches from the Bill’s sponsoring Ministers, each of whom is followed by her opposition counterpart. During the central period of the debate, the Speaker controls the order in which MPs are called to speak, although tradition demands that she alternately chooses members of the government and opposition parties. In major debates, demand to speak is intense. This demand has been met to some extent since 1988, when a standing order was introduced which permitted the Speaker to limit individual speeches to a maximum of ten minutes.⁵¹ This helps to ensure that the house is exposed to a wide range of views on the merits of the government’s proposed policy.

It is unlikely that a contribution by an individual MP, or even a series of like-minded speeches, will persuade members to vote other than on party lines. To some degree, labelling the second reading stage as a ‘debate’ is misleading. Proceedings are rarely characterised by the cut and thrust of attack and immediate defence. Many members merely recite prepared speeches which outline a particular element of party policy. This is not to say second reading debates are worthless—but that they have little immediate impact on the content of a Bill.⁵²

The rapidity of a member’s entry to (and subsequent rise up) the ranks of ministerial or shadow ministerial office is significantly affected by her oral performance on the floor of the house. Impressive performances will mark out a backbencher as a ministerial prospect. Conversely, Ministers who cannot command respect during debate will find their governmental careers grinding to a halt or slipping into decline.

Second readings are also valuable simply because of their visibility to the wider public. Debates on major Bills are widely reported in the press, and excerpts broadcast on radio and television. Such coverage does not alert voters to the details of government and opposition arguments, but the glare of publicity may prompt both government and opposition to ensure that their policies do not markedly diverge from the wishes of the general public.⁵³

Standing committees

The Commons’ capacity to pass Bills would be much reduced if their details, as well as their principles, had to be debated on the floor of the house. Thus, while measures of major constitutional significance⁵⁴ may undergo their committee stage on the floor, most ⁵⁰ Op cit pp 222–227. See also Griffith (1974) op cit pp 20–24; Erskine May op cit pp 405–408.

⁵¹ Silk op cit p 92.

⁵² Ministerial speeches have latterly assumed greater legal status; see the discussion of Pepper v Hart in ch 8.

⁵³ Cf Lord Bingham’s dissenting judgment in Bancoult No 2; see ‘Conclusion’, ch4, pp 112–115 above.

⁵⁴ This is not a legally defined categorisation.

Bills are sent ‘upstairs’ to be examined by a standing committee of between sixteen and fifty MPs.

Membership of standing committees reflects the party balance in the whole house. Thus a government with a comfortable majority is assured of a proportionate advantage at the committee stage. Standing committees on government Bills always include the sponsoring Minister and her shadow. Other members are formally chosen by the house’s own Committee of Selection, which is required to take into account a member’s fields of expertise when making its choice. But selection is in practice controlled by the party whips, and it is unlikely that the whips would support inclusion of an MP whose expertise might lead her to reject party policy.

That said, Ministers face more rigorous questioning in committee than on the floor. This is due in part to the nature of the committee’s task: effective scrutiny of detail demands expertise and intellectual precision, rather than the rhetorical skills that may suffice on the floor. In addition, committee proceedings generally attract less media attention than second reading debates. In so far as MPs are playing to an audience when in committee, it is to an audience of colleagues, most likely to be impressed by an incisive and knowledgeable dissection of the Bill’s provisions.⁵⁵

At the committee stage (unless a guillotine has been imposed), the allocation of time to particular clauses is determined by the Chairman. The Chairman also decides which amendments may be moved. Amendments may not contradict the Bill’s main principles as approved at second reading, but should be directed at questions of detail.⁵⁶ In practice, it appears that most committee amendments are introduced by the government itself, either to correct unnoticed errors, or to respond to what the government regards as acceptable concerns expressed by MPs or other interest groups.⁵⁷

There must however be doubt as to the efficacy even of the standing committee’s more searching and informed deliberations when dealing with a government dogmatically attached to the details as well as principles of its legislative programme. This point is forcefully made by Adonis’ discussion of the passage of the Thatcher government’s Bills to privatise the water and electricity services.⁵⁸ The electricity Bill consumed over 100 hours of committee time. It was amended 114 times. 113 amendments were moved by the government. The other was one (of twenty-two) moved by a Conservative backbencher. None of the 227 opposition amendments were carried.

Report and third reading

Since the mid-1960s, the report stage of government Bills has consumed some 10% of time spent on the floor of the house.⁵⁹ This gives some indication of its potential importance within the legislative process. The report stage enables the house to consider a Bill in its entirety as amended in committee. It also offers the opportunity for further amendments to be moved. Controversial Bills may require several days of the house’s time.

For most Bills which complete the report stage, the third reading is a mere formality. A debate may be held if six members request one. It is possible for a government Bill to be rejected at the third reading debate, but it is difficult to conceive of circumstances (other ⁵⁵ See, for example, the account of the impression made in 1992 by the then junior backbench Labour MPs Gordon Brown and Tony Blair on the Conservative Minister Alan Clark; Clark A (1993) Diaries pp 53–54.

⁵⁶ Although so-called ‘wrecking amendments’ are occasionally introduced at other stages of the legislative process.

⁵⁷ See especially Griffith (1974) op cit ch 3; Norton (1985) op cit ch 5.

⁵⁸ (1990) op cit pp 103–104.

⁵⁹ Griffith and Ryle op cit p 237; Silk op cit p 135.

than those where a government has only a minority of MPs in the house) when this might occur.

Conclusion

It has become a cliché to suggest that the Commons's role in respect of government Bills is now 'legitimation rather than legislation'. The inference seems to be that because the Commons is an elected body, the wishes of the majority of its members necessarily ensure that its decisions have a 'democratic' basis. As chapter seven will suggest, that assumption is itself problematic: as was noted in chapter one, legitimacy and democracy may demand rather more than simple majoritarianism.

Yet, seemingly paradoxically, there now also appears to be an academic consensus that backbench MPs have become more assertive since 1970 in resisting government policies of which they disapprove.⁶⁰ An MP's capacity to do this effectively depends in part on the size of the government's majority, and in part on the number of like-minded colleagues who support her cause. The first Wilson government (1964–1966), which had a majority of only three, found its plans to bring the steel industry into public ownership were blocked by the refusal of two Labour MPs to vote with the government.⁶¹ One may also identify several instances in the mid-1980s when the Thatcher government, with substantial Commons majorities, misread the mood of its backbenchers and found itself obliged to abandon Bills. The most spectacular example was provided by the Shops Bill 1986, a measure designed to liberalise Sunday trading laws. The government had correctly anticipated that Labour MPs would oppose the measure because of its impact on shopworkers. The government had not expected that many backbench Conservatives would support a campaign orchestrated by religious groups to 'Keep Sunday Special'. Squeezed by this unlikely alliance, the Bill was defeated on second reading.⁶²

We will examine several more examples of such behaviour over significant policy issues (by Labour, Liberal and Conservative MPs) in subsequent chapters. Such episodes may defensibly be regarded as exceptions to a more general rule; namely that the passage of government Bills through the Commons is dependent not so much on the intrinsic merit of their contents, nor on the skill which Ministers display in defending them on the floor or in committee, but on the size and cohesiveness of the governing party's majority. But government measures are not the only Bills which the Commons considers. In respect of 'private members' Bills, different considerations may apply.

Private members' Bills

A few Bills are introduced every session by backbench members. Twelve Friday sittings per session are currently allocated for dealing with such measures. There is in theory no limit to the number of Bills that an MP can introduce. Many Bills are presented to the house simply because the sponsoring MP may wish to draw attention to herself or to a particular issue. But if the Bill is to have any realistic prospect of being enacted, it must be initiated through one of two mechanisms.

⁶⁰ For statistical information see Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 118–130. More generally see Johnson N (1988) 'Departmental select committees', in Ryle and Richards op cit: Norton P (1980) Dissension in the House of Commons 1974–1979.

⁶¹ See Pimlott B (1992) Harold Wilson pp 357–359.

⁶² Three other Bills were withdrawn during that Parliament. None could be regarded as of great importance. See Drewry (1988) op cit pp 134–136.

The most significant is the annual ballot under SO 13. Any backbencher may enter the ballot. Twenty 'winners' are drawn. The first six are allocated top place in the order of business on a given Friday for a second reading. These six then assume priority on subsequent Fridays for their report and third reading over the second readings of the other fourteen Bills. If a Bill is to pass, it must complete its second reading on the first day. If a Bill is opposed, its sponsor must be able to force a closure to ensure it is not talked out. This may not be easy—it is often difficult to ensure that the 100 sympathetic members needed are in the house late on Friday afternoon, when many will wish to return to their constituencies.

The popularity of the procedure is due in part to the high profile that a full second reading debate can give to its sponsor. But the attractiveness is not solely a matter of publicity. Almost 200 Bills introduced through this method were enacted between 1974 and 1989.⁶³ It thus offers some MPs a good opportunity to make a legislative mark.

Such Bills have sometimes introduced important legislative reforms in areas which generate considerable moral controversy, but in respect of which opinion does not divide along traditional party lines. The most obvious (and oft-quoted) example of such legislation is the Abortion Act 1967 (sponsored by David Steel MP).⁶⁴ The process is also frequently deployed to rationalise archaic legislation, or to introduce a regulatory framework around newly emergent social or legal problems.⁶⁵

There is little immediate point in backbenchers launching initiatives to which the government is opposed. The carrot and stick modes of intra-party discipline wielded by the Prime Minister and the whips do not suddenly disappear just because a Bill emanates from a backbencher. The government has no obligation to allow free votes on such Bills, although there is perhaps some moral pressure to do so. However, allowing a free vote may sometimes suit a government's purposes very well. An obvious benefit of so doing is to foster the impression that the government respects the independence of MPs as individuals, and of the Commons as a collectivity. On issues about which the government has no strong policy preferences, such action is a substantively painless way of rebutting suggestions that the executive wields an unhealthy degree of control over the legislative process. Equally, a government may conclude that facilitating the passage of a private member's Bill in respect of a policy which it supports, but which might be unpopular among its MPs or the electorate, is a useful way of achieving preferred outcomes without having to take responsibility for having done so.

The backbencher's need for government support also has a more mundane dimension. Pressures on the Commons' legislative timetable make it unlikely that Bills other than the first three or four in the ballot could be passed if the government does not allocate some of its own time for their passage. For a government with time to spare, making a little available to backbench initiatives is a painless way to curry favour with the house. The Labour governments of 1964–1970 offered time to over twenty backbench Bills.⁶⁶ In contrast, during the 1980s, successive Conservative governments did not appear concerned to facilitate such expression of backbench opinion: the Thatcher administrations were notably reluctant to devote government time to private members' Bills.⁶⁷

Conversely, the private member's Bill can also offer governments with over-full legislative programmes a means to grab an even-greater share of the Commons' time. A ⁶³ Silk op cit p 117.

⁶⁴ For an illuminating discussion see Richards P (1970) Parliament and conscience ch 5. The effect of the Act was discussed at 'The golden rule', ch 3, pp 66–67 above.

⁶⁵ See Silk op cit pp 117–118; Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 386–390.

⁶⁶ Norton (1985) op cit p 102. ⁶⁷ Griffith and Ryle op cit p 398.

backbencher promoting a Bill with which the government sympathises may find herself invited to modify her measure in accordance with ministerial preferences in return for assistance in finding the necessary Commons time to push it through.⁶⁸

Backbenchers may also try to initiate legislation though the ‘ten-minute rule Bill’ process provided by SO 19. One such Bill may be introduced each Tuesday and Wednesday. Its sponsoring member makes a brief (hence ‘ten minute’ rule) statement to the house outlining its objectives; an equal time is given to a member wishing to oppose the measure.

The procedure offers MPs a public platform when the house is often packed. But ten minute rule Bills are not a serious component of the legislative process. While most are formally allowed to proceed by the house, there is minimal chance that they will be enacted as there is so little time available for them. It is not unusual for periods of several years to pass without a single ten minute rule reaching the statute book. Their function might more sensibly be seen as affording an MP a high profile public forum from which to raise an issue of current concern, in the hope that either a government department or another MP who tops the private member’s ballot will introduce a like measure. There are, as always, exceptions to the general rule. The Sexual Offences Act 1967, which repealed legislation criminalising homosexual acts between consenting adults, emerged from the ten minute rule. It is however clear that its passage was largely dependent on the government’s willingness to find time for it to be enacted.⁶⁹

Private members Bills are quantitatively insignificant compared to government Bills. Equally, many of them address minor issues. Nevertheless they do occasionally effect major changes on matters of considerable substance. What they do not do is provide a vehicle through which the ‘independence’ of the Commons is promoted over and above party loyalties on a substantial and systematic scale.

Private Bills

‘Private’ Bills are a different form of legislative creature than private members Bills, which are technically, like government Bills, ‘public’ measures. Private Bills confer certain benefits or obligations on a narrowly-defined class of persons or companies, or authorise specific works or activities in a particular area.⁷⁰

Bills are introduced to the Commons not by a government department or an MP, but by the interested parties themselves. The parties are represented in the house by lawyers styled as ‘parliamentary agents’. As chapter two suggested when discussing the Wauchope litigation, the house’s standing orders require the promoters to notify any affected third parties of the Bill’s intentions. After second reading, a private Bill is sent to a special committee of four members which examines it in detail. It is at this stage that the significance of the need to notify affected parties becomes apparent. Clearly, if affected persons have not been notified of the Bill’s passage, they cannot present their point of view to the Committee, which will thus proceed on the basis of incomplete information.

The very different process used to enact private statutes, and the generally sectional interests which they serve, perhaps lend force to Lord Denning’s suggestion in Pickin that the courts should reconsider their traditional refusal to assess the procedural propriety of the legislative process. The mechanism was subject to an intensive investigation by a joint ⁶⁸ For example the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 and Sexual Offences Act 1967; see Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 392–393 and Silk op cit pp 116–117. See also my discussion of the passage of the 1977 Housing (Homeless Persons) Act; Housing homeless persons: administrative law and practice ch 3.

⁶⁹ Richards (1970) op cit ch 4.

⁷⁰ As noted in ch 2, the device was often used in respect of the construction of railways.

Lords/Commons select committee in the late-1980s, but as yet no significant reforms have been introduced.

Hybrid Bills

A hybrid Bill⁷¹ is a government measure which affects a particular individual or organisation in a different manner to other individuals or companies in the same class; it thus bears some resemblance to a private Bill. There are no definitive rules for determining if a Bill is hybrid; the decision is entrusted, via the Speaker, to a House of Commons official designated as the ‘Examiners of petitions for Private Bills’.⁷² A government may thus unexpectedly find itself promoting a private measure, with potentially severe consequences for its legislative timetable.

Hybrid Bills broadly follow the public Bill procedure. However they must go through a further stage before a select committee in both the Commons and the Lords before undergoing their standing committee stage. These select committees⁷³ hear petitions from opponents of the Bill, and thus can obstruct the passage of legislation. Nevertheless, a government may dispense with this additional procedure if it can muster a Commons majority to do so.

Delegated legislation

It would be inaccurate to suggest that most laws under which the British people now live have received searching Commons scrutiny. This is due only in part to the logistical and party political constraints operating on the house’s analysis of Bills. Its major cause is the government’s increasing tendency to promote Bills which delegate secondary law-making power to Ministers through the mechanism of ‘regulations’ or ‘statutory instruments’ (SIs).⁷⁴ Under this form of law-making, the ‘parent’ Act sketches the broad confines of the power conferred upon the government, leaving the Minister to fill in the details in SIs. The mechanism represents something of a half-way house in procedural terms between purely legislative and purely executive law-making.

SIs spare Ministers the time-consuming and potentially problematic task of putting their policy preferences into a Bill and trying to pilot it through the Commons. SIs have been favoured by governments of both parties in the modern era, largely because the growing scope of government intervention in social and economic life means that the house would not have time to deal with all matters through primary legislation. Since 1980, the government’s resort to SIs has continued apace: over 1,000 per year have been passed on average. Some are exceedingly trivial—a favourite example being the Baking and Sausage Making (Christmas and New Year) Regulations 1985.⁷⁵ Others have profound constitutional implications; the law under which Mr Liversidge was imprisoned was an SI. Delegated legislation can afford Ministers sweeping powers in important areas of governmental activity.

A political party’s protests (when in opposition) against SIs should consequently be regarded sceptically—it seems likely that any ‘principles’ which underlie them would be ⁷¹ See generally Erskine May pp 519–524.

⁷² On the origins of the post see Erskine May pp 811–812.

⁷³ Again the terminology is unfortunately confusing, since, as we shall see below most of the Commons’ ‘select committees’ do not have any legislative role.

⁷⁴ This somewhat oversimplifies the terminology; see Griffith and Ryle op cit p 245: Erskine May pp 539–541.

⁷⁵ See Silk op cit pp 148–149.

quietly forgotten when that party next formed a government. For constitutional lawyers, however, the issues of principle have more force, since they bear directly on the questions of the sovereignty of 'Parliament' and the separation of powers, and indirectly on the question of what type of 'democracy' the constitution currently upholds. Are statutory instruments a sub-stratum of the legislative process, or would it be more realistic to regard them as 'law-making by the executive'?

Contemporary principles and practice

Use of delegated legislation assumed considerable prominence in the late 1920s, following publication of a book called The new despotism by Lord Chief Justice Hewart.⁷⁶ Hewart, in a Diceyan vein, deplored Parliament's practice of affording Ministers what he regarded as arbitrary bureaucratic powers. The critique was hyperbolic, but focuses attention on the distinction between substantive and procedural conceptions of the rule of law. In theoretical terms, a parent Act does not (and indeed cannot) bestow an unfettered power upon a Minister: she does not thereby become in any sense a 'sovereign legislature'; her powers are confined by the terms of the 'parent' legislation. Consequently, the terms of statutory instruments are subject to judicial review to ensure that they do not exceed the competence Parliament has granted.⁷⁷ But neither does the process require that the Commons consider every detail of each SI 'enacted'.

Hewart might be seen as concerned entirely with matters of process; it is not what government does that is the problem, but how government does it. Its intervention would be acceptable if only it had exposed its plans to the rigorous scrutiny attaching to the passage of primary legislation. An obvious response to such an argument would be to highlight the Commons' limited role even in respect of most statutes.

That dichotomy is somewhat misleading. Issues of process and substance are necessarily linked. It is not possible to govern a highly interventionist unitary state solely through primary legislation.⁷⁸ To reject altogether the process of delegated legislation therefore is to reject the substance of social democratic government. Hewart's attack led the government to establish the Donoughmore Committee,⁷⁹ which responded to Hewart much as Harry Jones later critiqued Hayek's minimalist notion of the rule of law.⁸⁰ Delegated legislation was a necessity in modern society. The issue therefore became how best to ensure that this unavoidable fact of political life departed as little as possible from orthodox constitutional understandings of the legislative/executive relationship.

Donoughmore recommended that Standing Committees on delegated legislation be created in both the Lords and Commons. Such Committees would examine the technicalities and vires of proposed SIs. Their purpose would not be to question the merits of government policy per se, but to 'supply the private member with knowledge which he lacks at present and thus enable him to exercise an informed discretion whether to object or criticise himself'.⁸¹

⁷⁶ See Harlow and Rawlings (1984) op cit pp 119–130.

⁷⁷ See Chester v Bateson [1920] 1 KB 829.

⁷⁸ The problem of 'legislative overload' is less acute in a federal state; its scale varying in inverse proportion to the scope of the powers afforded to the central legislature.

⁷⁹ Donoughmore, Lord (1932) Report of the Committee on Ministers' Powers (Cmnd 4060).

⁸⁰ See pp 57–58 above.

⁸¹ Donoughmore op cit at pp 63–64; quoted in Himsworth C (1995) 'The delegated powers scrutiny committee' Public Law 34 at p 37.

The Statutory Instruments Act 1946

Neither Parliament as a whole, nor the Commons itself made an immediate, far-reaching response to the Donoughmore report. A Commons Committee on Statutory Instruments was established in 1944, and the procedures through which SIs were to pass were rationalised by the Statutory Instruments Act 1946. The Act sketches out principles as to the processes to be followed; subsequent parent Acts may opt out of the 1946 Act if the enacting Parliament so wishes, and (ironically) ss 8–9 allow the legislation's scope to be altered by subsequent delegated legislation. A further step supposedly intended to enhance MPs' awareness of and control over the contents of SIs was made in 1972, when a Joint Commons/Lords Committee on Statutory Instruments (the 'scrutiny committee') was established.

Some SIs receive no consideration in the house at all. Most are however dealt with by either the 'affirmative' or 'negative' resolution procedure specified in the 1946 Act. The affirmative procedure prevents the passage of an SI into law unless it is approved by majority vote in the house. The initiative thus rests with the government (within forty days) both to defend the measure in debate, and to ensure its supporters are present in sufficient numbers to vote it through. Debates on affirmative resolutions on the floor are infrequent and short in duration. Most examination is undertaken 'upstairs' in the Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, although the support of twenty members is sufficient to compel the Minister to schedule debate for the floor of the house. Committee debates rarely exceed ninety minutes per SI. The Committee's role is merely that of consideration. It cannot amend the SI: nor does it exercise delegated power to pass the measure; the subsequent vote is still taken by the whole house.

It is accepted that the more important SIs should be subject to the affirmative procedure, although this is not a legally enforceable provision, and there is obvious scope for disagreement between government and opposition on how to gauge an SI's importance. During the 1980s, some 20% of SIs were subject to affirmative resolutions.⁸²

The 'negative resolution' procedure passes the initiative to the opposition parties, who may invite the house to vote against the instrument's passage into law, again within a forty-day period. Debate may be taken either on the floor of the house (generally late at night) or in standing committee. Once again, access to both fora is controlled by the government. Little time is allocated for debate before the whole house: Silk notes for example that the 9,500 SIs subject to the negative resolution procedure between 1974 and 1985 attracted barely 200 hours of debate.⁸³ One might therefore be forgiven for thinking that the process serves little useful purpose beyond enabling a determined opposition to inconvenience a government with a small majority by disrupting its parliamentary timetable.⁸⁴

The Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments plays, in quantitative terms, a more significant role. It is generally chaired by an opposition MP, which lends it an aura of independence. Its members are supposed to eschew party political issues, and to refrain from questioning the merits of a given SI's policy, and to focus instead on the narrower, legal question of the SI's compatibility with its parent Act. In the event of apparent inconsistency, the Committee will draw the SI to the house's attention, which may then proceed as it wishes. Neither the government nor the house is obliged to accept the Committee's opinions. Nor would a court be precluded from holding an SI ultra vires because the Committee had concluded its contents lay within the Minister's powers.

⁸² Silk op cit p 151.

⁸³ Op cit p 152. See also Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 345–350.

⁸⁴ See Punnett R (1968) British government and politics p 333. See also Drewry (1988) op cit.

The vast quantity of SIs approved by the house each year, and the obvious limitations which attach to MPs' scrutiny of such measures, forcefully illustrate the extent to which the government effectively controls the legislative process. They are not however the most draconian example of the constitution's seeming capacity to reconcile the de jure sovereignty of 'Parliament' with the de facto supremacy of the executive.

'Henry VIII clauses'

The Donoughmore Committee expressed grave reservations about the growing (but still quantitatively insignificant) parliamentary practice of enacting 'Henry VIII' clauses in primary legislation. Such provisions empower a government Minister to use SIs to amend or even repeal existing Acts of Parliament. The label stems from the Statute of Proclamations 1539. Henry VIII, presumably having doubts about the constitutional status of his prerogative powers vis-à-vis legislation and other common law rules, prevailed upon an unwilling Commons and Lords to pass a Bill confirming that the Monarch's proclamations were equal in force to Acts. Once enacted, this legislation would, by virtue of the lex posterior rule, enable the King to repeal or alter existing statutes without further recourse to Parliament;⁸⁵ to—as Plucknett put it—'play the despot by the co-operation of Parliament'.⁸⁶

Applying the Henry VIII nomenclature to contemporary manifestations of this practice has the unfortunate tendency of belittling their constitutional significance. The relative superiority of statute to the prerogative was not established in the sixteenth century; the King might plausibly have achieved the same result through direct exercise of his proclamatory power. Furthermore, the Statute of Proclamations itself was hedged about with restrictions which substantially compromised its utility.⁸⁷ And, most importantly, neither Henry VIII, nor Tudor Parliaments, had any need to justify their behaviour in terms of 'democratic' principle.

There is no legal impediment to Parliament granting what is formally a 'circumscribed portion of legislative competence to a subordinate Minister'.⁸⁸ The power may at any time be withdrawn, and subsequent Parliaments may undo whatever 'legislative' work the designated Minister has done. Different issues arise if one asks if the practice is politically legitimate in modern society?

Until recently, the dubious moral basis of Henry VIII clauses seems to have led Parliament to enact them sparingly. The authors of the 1985 edition of deSmith's Constitutional and Administrative Law concluded that:

this formulation is not widely used, and it is normally innocuous if the grant of power is confined to a limited period for the purpose of enabling draftsmen to make consequential adaptations to miscellaneous enactments that may have been overlooked when the principal Act was passed.⁸⁹

⁸⁵ '... Be it therefore enacted . . . that always the king for the time being, with the advice of his honourable council, whose names hereafter followeth, or with the advice of the more part of them, may set forth at all times by authority of this act his proclamations, under such penalties and pains and of such sort as to his highness and his said honourable council or the more part of them shall see[m] necessary and requisite; and that those same shall be obeyed, observed, and kept as though they were made by act of parliament . . .'

⁸⁶ Plucknett (1960) op cit p 233.

⁸⁷ Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 233–234; Elton G (1960) 'Henry VIII's Act of Proclamations' English Historical Review 208; Bush M (1983) 'The Act of Proclamations: a reinterpretation' American Journal of Legal History 33.

⁸⁸ Turpin C (2nd edn, 1990) British government and the constitution p 369.

⁸⁹ Op cit p 352.

This view of Henry VIII clauses sees them essentially as time-saving devices for remedying unintended errors in primary legislation. As such they would be only mildly objectionable, in so far as they spare the government the consequences of its own incompetence. More recently however, governments have seemingly regarded Henry VIII clauses as an acceptable means to implement sweeping policy programmes. This trend scaled new heights of executive law-making in the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 introduced by the Major government.⁹⁰ The Act empowered the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make regulations to suspend any existing legislation which he/she considered imposes a burden on any economic activity, and to transfer many government functions allocated by statute to a Minister to any private sector organisation.

The Act suggested that the Major government regarded the legislative process as an unwelcome obstacle which it was entitled to circumvent whenever convenient. Whether that is construed as a welcome development depends presumably on the observer's party affiliation; and that is in itself perhaps a telling indictment of the extent to which the Commons is prone, even on significant issues, to operate simply as a vehicle for promoting the wishes of whichever faction currently forms a majority of its members.

Conclusion

From a legislative perspective, therefore, a House of Commons 'independent' of the executive is likely to occur only when the government cannot command a reliable majority. Yet it would seem likely that such circumstances will promote paralysis rather than consensus in the house. The implications that the Commons' essentially factional, antagonistic approach to the legislative process has for the democratic basis of the constitution cannot fully be appreciated until we explore in later chapters the relationship between the Commons and the Lords, and between the Commons and the people. In the remainder of this chapter, we address another dimension of the relationship between the Commons and the government.

III. Controlling the executive

Although a government's legislative programme is often viewed as its raison d'être, much government activity does not require legislative initiative. Ministers retain substantial legal powers under the prerogative, through which important policy decisions may be taken. Similarly, Ministers may also deploy existing statutory powers, which, if cast in sufficiently loose terms, may permit the government lawfully to pursue quite different objectives from those favoured by its predecessors. In neither case is the government legally dependent on maintaining majority Commons support to exercise its authority. Nevertheless, the house may play an important constitutional role by monitoring the government's implementation of its preferred policies.⁹¹

Motions on the floor of the house

Approximately twenty days per session are devoted to general debates on topics chosen by the opposition parties.⁹² These occasions are directed towards a critical attack on ⁹⁰ See Freedland M (1995) 'Privatising Carltona: Part II of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994' Public Law 21.

⁹¹ See Norton (2005) op cit ch 6.

⁹² See generally Norton (1985) op cit ch 6; Irwin H (1988) 'Opportunities for backbenchers', in Richards and Ryle op cit.

particular aspects of government policy. Governments with a reliable majority have no difficulty in defeating such motions, but the outcome of the vote is insignificant. The main purpose of 'Opposition days' is to provide a visible forum in which to display the adversarial character of the British political system. Leading speeches are made by Ministers and by senior opposition frontbenchers. Backbenchers depend on 'catching the Speaker's eye' if they wish to contribute.

One might doubt if 'debate' is the correct label to apply to such proceedings. Observers are more frequently presented with the recitation of a collection of opposing views rather than an intimately interactive argument. Nevertheless, the process serves certain tangential purposes. Impressive (or poor) speeches can further (or undermine) an MP's prospects of government or shadow frontbench office. Additionally, the high profile such debates attract offers the wider public some opportunity to form opinions about the merits of government and opposition policies.

Emergency debates and adjournment debates

Any member may at the start of business on Monday to Thursday request that an 'emergency adjournment debate' be granted on a topic of current importance. The Speaker has wide discretion in deciding whether to permit such a debate. If the request is opposed by any other MP, its proposer requires the support of forty colleagues. Few emergency debates are permitted, primarily because they would have an extremely disruptive effect on the Commons' timetable.⁹³

If granted, the debate is held at 3pm on the next working day, or (exceptionally) at 7pm on the day the request is made. Emergency debates are obviously concerned with matters of intense public controversy, so speakers enjoy considerable publicity. As such, they offer a useful tool for the Opposition to embarrass the government.

'Adjournment debates' in contrast, occur regularly, for thirty minutes at the close of business on each working day. The Monday to Thursday slots are allocated by ballot; the Speaker chooses a member to speak on Fridays. Adjournment debates generally entail a fifteen minute speech by a backbench member, and a similar reply by a (junior) Minister. They usually concern aspects of government policy which impact with particular intensity on a member's constituency. Adjournment debates rarely attract a sizeable audience in the house, nor much press coverage. They nevertheless offer an opportunity for the government to dwell on the details of its policies, and for a member to demonstrate her assiduity in defence of local interests to her constituency party.

Questions to ministers

The adversarial character of party politics in modern Britain is well illustrated by oral questions to Ministers put by backbenchers and shadow ministers. The procedure was an established feature of the Commons' working practices by the mid-nineteenth century, and by 1900 the government fielded some 5,000 questions each year on the floor of the house.⁹⁴ Questions were taken as the first item of business, and 'question time' continued until all had been answered. This meant that other business was frequently not reached until the early evening. While this practice emphasised (literally as well as metaphorically) the principle that the government should be answerable to the Commons, it offered great opportunities for opposition MPs to upset the government's timetable.

⁹³ There have on average been two per year since 1974; Griffith and Ryle op cit p 350.

⁹⁴ Chester N (1977) 'Questions in the house', in Walkland and Ryle op cit.

Proposals for reform were introduced by Arthur Balfour, Leader of the House in the 1901 Conservative government.⁹⁵ Balfour's plans generated considerable controversy in the house, which eventually accepted that question time would in future be held before the commencement of public business, but for a limited time of between forty-five and fifty-five minutes. Questions not reached on the floor would receive a prompt written answer. Individual MPs were limited to a maximum of eight questions per day.⁹⁶

Questions are now taken at the beginning of business on Mondays to Thursdays, for around forty-five minutes. Ministers answer in rotation, so that the conduct of each government department is examined at three to four-week intervals. At present, up to 150 questions may be tabled for answer every day. It is unlikely that many more than two dozen will be dealt with in the short time available. Those questions not reached on the floor are answered in writing. Oral proceedings attract considerable attention, both from MPs and the media. Members are thus extremely keen to ensure that their particular question is delivered and answered on the floor. To have any chance of securing this objective, members must submit questions ten days in advance to the 'Table Office', which numbers them at random. Ministers thus have the opportunity to arrange for their officials to provide them with detailed answers to the specific questions raised, and to anticipate follow-up questions ('supplementaries') which might be put immediately after the Minister gives her reply.

Both the content and the style of questions to Ministers are subject to convoluted rules, overseen by the Speaker.⁹⁷ The Speaker exercises virtually unconfined discretion over the number of supplementary questions which may be put, both by the mover of the question and other MPs. The Speaker also chooses which members will speak. Successive Speakers have adhered to rather different policies on this issue, with some favouring more expansive exploration of a small number of questions, and others preferring to maximise the number of members called upon to speak.⁹⁸

Erskine May tells us that: 'the purpose of a question is to obtain information or press for action'.⁹⁹ However one might doubt whether such sentiments underlie many of the questions currently tabled. Griffith and Ryle suggest that in the past forty years questions have become considerably less specific. Rather than request that a Minister comment upon a particular detailed issue, often affecting the member's constituency, contemporary questions and the associated supplementaries are increasingly likely to be couched at a general level.¹⁰⁰ One might now be forgiven for thinking that the primary purpose of questions moved by opposition MPs is to use a supplementary to expose a Minister's inability to think on her feet, while government backbenchers offer Ministers the opportunity to engage in self-congratulation.

Despite the evidently increasing frequency of sycophantic questions from government backbenchers,¹⁰¹ it would be an oversimplification to suggest that party loyalties create an absolute rule, rather than merely a strong presumption, of deference between a government's backbench MPs and its Ministers during questions. Small handfuls of MPs, generally acting in collective defence of their individual constituency interests can deploy the high public profile that question time provides to severely undermine a Minister's ⁹⁵ See Chester N and Bowring M (1962) Questions in parliament p 58.

⁹⁶ The daily maximum is now two per member per day, and no more than eight may be tabled in any ten sitting days.

⁹⁷ Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 254–258. The most important rule is that the question's subject matter must fall within the particular Minister's sphere of departmental responsibility.

⁹⁸ Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 369–70: Laundry op cit.

⁹⁹ Op cit at p 337.

¹⁰⁰ Op cit pp 254–258.

¹⁰¹ See for example Hattersley R (1992) 'The beggaring of PM's question time' The Guardian 28 January.

standing in the house and in Cabinet. A forceful recent example is provided by the furore which met the announcement in April 1995 by the then Health Secretary (Virginia Bottomley) that several London hospitals were to be closed to curb rising public expenditure. The policy was substantively unpalatable to Conservative MPs whose constituencies contained such hospitals. MPs were however further aggrieved by the procedures used for the announcement—a written answer in Hansard rather than orally in the house. Peter Brooke MP (a former Cabinet colleague of Bottomley) accused her in the house of ‘lacking moral courage’ by not making a personal statement. The insult ensured that the episode gained considerable publicity, to the extent that rumours circulated suggesting Bottomley would be sacked by the Prime Minister. No such consequences immediately ensued, but it was widely assumed that Bottomley’s chances of assuming higher office had been fundamentally damaged by her humiliation in the house.

Vigorous defence of isolated constituency interests has always been a hallmark of backbench behaviour, and serves as a constant reminder that the localist origins of the Commons’ representative system has not been entirely subsumed beneath the demands of party politics. Government whips may take a benevolent view of individual members who defy party policy in order to be seen to support their constituents’ concerns, especially when such a ‘rebellion’ raises no prospect of defeat for the government. It would take an unusual combination of circumstances for this aspect of the MP’s role to present a serious threat even to an individual Minister, still less to the government as a whole. The Bottomley incident was noteworthy because the government then had a Commons majority of barely a dozen, and had announced hospital closures in the constituencies of several of its backbench MPs.

Private notice questions

This mechanism allows members to raise a question for oral answer by the relevant Minister on matters of urgency and importance. The Speaker decides whether the question merits oral answer. In the 1980s, an average of thirty to forty PNQs were permitted. Exchanges lasted for an average of twenty minutes; appreciably longer than the Commons devotes to individual questions raised at question time.¹⁰² Since 1980, 30–40% of PNQs accepted by the Speaker have been tabled by the opposition front bench, with most of the remainder coming from opposition rather than government backbenchers.¹⁰³

Prime Ministerial accountability on the floor of the house

Between 1960 and 1999, the Prime Minister took questions on the floor for fifteen minute periods on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons. This practice began following a recommendation of the Select Committee on Procedure. Prior to that date, questions to the Prime Minister enjoyed no special priority over and above questions to other Ministers, which meant that on many days the Prime Minister was never called upon to give oral answers.¹⁰⁴

Proceedings are now generally dominated by a ritualised clash between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. The Leader of the Opposition is generally permitted to put as many as three questions consecutively to the Prime Minister. The opportunity this offers for immediate argument is perhaps as close as the house ever gets to witnessing a debate in the cut-and-thrust sense of the word. The exchanges are perhaps ¹⁰² See Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 374–376.

¹⁰³ Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 357 and 375 respectively.

¹⁰⁴ See Jones G (1973) ‘The Prime Minister and parliamentary questions’ Parliamentary Affairs 260.

most significant for the impact they have on MPs' perceptions of their respective leader's abilities. In the factionalised arena the house offers, a Prime Minister who continually bests the Leader of the Opposition is unlikely to find her ascendancy in her party under threat, while opposition MPs may be tempted to conclude that their prospects of future electoral success are much hampered by their Leader's evident inadequacies on the floor. All recent Prime Ministers have devoted much time and effort to preparing themselves for this brief exposure to the house.

For opposition MPs, the opportunity to speak is little more than a chance to attract a good deal of publicity by indulging in splenetic rhetoric designed to demonstrate their ideological purity either to their party leaders or their local constituency activists. Government backbenchers, in contrast, are likely to produce questions which enable the Prime Minister to lavish praise on particular aspects of government policy.

Immediately after the 1997 general election, Prime Minister Blair appeared to favour a more thoughtful approach to Prime Minister's question time by proposing that the previous two fifteen-minute slots be replaced with a single half-hour session, evidently to enable issues to be examined in more depth. In practice, that worthy ambition seems to have been disregarded. The first years of the Blair government saw question time used increasingly by Labour MPs to indulge the government's apparent fondness for being showered with meaningless compliments couched in inane language, many of which were evidently extracted by the backbenchers concerned from lists of prepared questions produced by the government.¹⁰⁵ Some of the more egregiously sycophantic questions put by Labour backbenchers included the following gems of intellectual rigour and probing inquiry. In December 1997, Barry Sheerman MP came up with this inquiry to the Prime Minister:

Does my right honourable friend agree that 18 years of the Conservatives' misguided policies have done great damage to our town and city centres?

That the Prime Minister was able to answer 'Yes' is hardly a surprise, a state of affairs replicated by his similar replies to the following question from Don Touhig MP on 21 October 1998:

May I tell my right hon Friend that the people who sent me to this House warmly welcome the extra £40 Billion promised for health and education. They see it as an investment in their future. Will he make clear that cutting spending on schools and hospitals is the Tory way? It is not our way; and to the question placed by Alan Johnson MP a week later:

Will [the PM] assure me that the Government will continue to promote fairness in the workplace, thus ensuring that the Conservative Party, which opposes the minimum wage and minimum standards, will remain a very minimum party?

That MPs and ministers feel it appropriate to waste the Commons' supposedly valuable time on such nonsense is in itself regrettable. That such questions are also manifestly an insult to the intelligence of voters provides further justification for the contention that the Commons is a quite an inadequate vehicle for the sensible representation of political opinion in a modern democratic society.

The copious media attention which Prime Minister's Question Time attracts both in the house and in the media may create a rather misleading impression. A revealing study published in 1990 noted that since 1945 Prime Ministers have contributed far less frequently to life on the floor of the house than their predecessors.¹⁰⁶ James Callaghan, Labour Prime Minister from 1976–1979, and Margaret Thatcher were particularly reluctant to participate in general debates. The study suggests that both Prime Ministers (but especially Thatcher) saw their role predominantly as that of running the executive rather than making themselves answerable to the Commons. Tony Blair's premiership seemingly continued this trend. If this view is correct, it identifies a thus far overlooked but nevertheless highly significant aspect of the executive's contemporary dominance of the Commons.

¹⁰⁵ See the Diary column in The Guardian 24 February 1999.

Early day motions

'Early day motions' provide what is in effect a noticeboard on which MPs can register their concern about particular issues. The mechanism enables a member to table a motion to which supportive MPs may append their signature. There are no limits either on the number of such motions that an individual MP may propose, nor on their contents. The number of motions tabled has risen precipitately since 1945, from fewer than 100 per year to over 1,500 by the late 1980s.¹⁰⁷

EDMs are very rarely debated in the house. Their primary purpose tends to be as an initial step in a campaign to generate publicity within the house, often in the hope that the issue concerned will subsequently be picked up by the government, the opposition, or a private member who has won a slot for an adjournment debate or private member's Bill, and thereby receive relatively extensive discussion. The device is a particularly helpful way for government backbenchers to demonstrate their strength of feeling on particular matters, and thereby occasionally 'persuade' Ministers to reverse significant policy decisions.¹⁰⁸

Questions for written answer

For MPs whose main concern is with eliciting information from the government rather than simply confronting a Minister, the 'question for written answer' may prove a more effective tool than seeking an oral answer.¹⁰⁹ There is no limit on the number of such questions that MPs may table. As many as 40,000 have been raised in a single session. Questions for written answer are often less partisan than proceedings on the floor. They are often more precisely targeted and more fully answered than their oral counterparts. As such, they represent a valuable resource for backbenchers, since in effect they force the government to undertake research which neither the member herself nor the Commons' library may have the capacity to carry out.¹¹⁰

Informal processes

It may be that the most important vehicle for backbench influence on government behaviour is one that defies any straightforward calibration—namely the informal (and often ¹⁰⁶ Dunleavy P, Jones G, and O'Leary B (1990) 'Prime Ministers and the Commons: patterns of behaviour 1868–1987' Public Administration 123.

¹⁰⁷ Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 380–381.

¹⁰⁸ For a pertinent example see Drewry G (1983) 'The National Audit Act—half a loaf' Public Law 531. See also Norton (1985) op cit ch 6.

¹⁰⁹ For a useful guide to the emergence, growth and current utility of written questions see Borthwick R (1979) 'Questions and debates', in Walkland op cit.

¹¹⁰ Although the government does sometimes decline to answer questions on the grounds that the cost of doing so would be prohibitive; see Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 373–374.

invisible) processes of consultation and lobbying of Ministers by individual members on matters of constituency or general concern. Quite often, such influence will be pre-emptive—potential conflicts between frontbench policy and backbench opinion are filtered out by modification to government policies before they make even an initial appearance. Party whips play an important part in this process, by acting as a conduit of backbench sentiment to the Cabinet and individual Ministers.

One can only speculate on the extent to which such pressure is effectively applied through channels hidden from public view.¹¹¹ Equally, there is no reliable way of knowing whether governments engage in self-censorship of some of their preferred policy objectives simply because they doubt their proposals would find favour in the house.

Thus far, this section has been concerned with the role MPs play in an individual capacity, or as members of ad hoc alliances over specific policy issues. But the Commons' efforts to oversee and influence executive behaviour are also expressed in a more formal, collective manner through the mechanisms of 'select committees'.

The departmental select committee system

'Select committees' have a potted parliamentary history. Their modern origins derive from an ad hoc Committee established in 1855 to examine the government's conduct of the Crimean War, when the Army frequently found itself lacking basic supplies. The initiative came from John Roebuck, a radical MP, and was staunchly resisted by the government which considered it incompatible with orthodox understandings of the separation of powers. Gladstone, in seeking to persuade the house not to establish the Committee, condemned it as an unprecedented and unconstitutional intrusion into the sphere of executive responsibility. On being overwhelmingly defeated in the subsequent vote, the government resigned, expecting that the Committee's inquiry would reveal grave errors in its policies.¹¹²

The Crimea Committee was a single issue body of limited duration. The Public Accounts Committee (PAC), created in 1861, has in contrast been a permanent feature of the Commons' organisational landscape. The PAC scrutinises the implementation of the government's expenditure plans. It is chaired by an opposition MP, frequently one who was formerly a Treasury Minister. It has extensive investigatory powers and substantial resources to carry out its tasks. Its reports invariably attract a prompt and considered Treasury reply, and many of its recommendations have influenced subsequent government practice. In consequence, the PAC has gradually acquired a formidable reputation, and is widely regarded as an effective tool for the Commons to raise concerns about government expenditure.¹¹³ But as we shall see below, it might justly be regarded as something of an exception to the general trend.

The Crossman reforms

It would be inaccurate to suggest that there was a select committee system until the 1960s. Before then, most such committees were established for short periods to deal with specific problems. In 1965, the Labour Prime Minister Harold Wilson supported proposals ¹¹¹ See Norton P (1982) "Dear Minister"...The importance of MP to minister correspondence' Parliamentary Affairs 59.

¹¹² See Magnus P (1963) Gladstone pp 118–119.

¹¹³ See Bates St J (1988) 'Scrutiny of administration'; and Robinson R (1988) 'The House of Commons and public money', both in Ryle and Richards op cit; McEldowney J (1988) 'The contingencies fund and the Parliamentary scrutiny of public finance' Public Law 232.

formulated by one of his Ministers, Richard Crossman, that the house should create two permanent select committees, which would scrutinise government policy in the areas of Science and Agriculture. Crossman presented his initiative as in part a means of enhancing government performance. He envisaged committees of a dozen or so backbench members, who would gain some expertise in a particular policy field. The committees would have a functional rather than departmental remit, and could conceivably find themselves examining the behaviour of several Ministries. Their membership would reflect party balance in the house, but it was intended that their members would put aside party loyalties and advance the collective interest of the Commons overall. Thus constituted, the Committees 'could provide an astringent stimulus to... our Departments by ventilating issues and exploring corners which had been covered up in the past'.¹¹⁴

Crossman was concerned to redress what he saw as an undesirable imbalance of power between the Commons and the Cabinet:

Ministers aren't bothered by Parliament, indeed they're hardly ever there... The amount of time a Minister spends on the front bench is very small. The Executive reigns supreme in Britain and has minimum trouble from the legislature.¹¹⁵

The policy had been strongly opposed by some Ministers. The Treasury feared that Committees would act as lobbyists for additional departmental expenditure, while others resented in principle the notion that their Departments' workings should be exposed to constant Commons scrutiny.¹¹⁶

It is not clear if Crossman and Wilson were sincere about enhancing the Commons' role vis-à-vis the Cabinet. Wilson's biographer records that they saw the Committees as: 'a means for keeping bored backbenchers out of mischief, rather than as a rod for their own backs'.¹¹⁷ Four further Committees were established.¹¹⁸ But the government quickly displayed little tolerance for Committee activities which effectively questioned government policy. The chief casualty of Wilson's disenchantment was the Agriculture Committee, which was disbanded after displaying considerable investigative independence on the issue of the impact that British accession to the EEC would have on the domestic farming industry.

This episode also demonstrates how our constitutional culture has normalised the presumption that the government should control the Commons. Technically, of course, the government could neither create nor disband a Commons committee. That is a matter for the house itself. It seems however quite clear that when the house did indeed vote to abolish the Agriculture Committee, the Labour majority in favour of doing so was responding more to pressure from government whips rather than to a considered review of the merits of the case.

¹¹⁴ Crossman R (1979) Diaries pp 200–201.

¹¹⁵ Crossman R (1979) Diaries p 275.

¹¹⁶ Crossman records the First Secretary to the Treasury, Michael Stewart, as arguing in Cabinet that: 'a backbench MP has a perfectly satisfactory job to do and there is no reason to create work for him to keep him happy. Indeed, our backbenchers should be thankful that... we want to keep the Executive strong, not to strengthen Parliamentary control. Michael's remarks had been applauded by many people around the table'; Crossman R (1979) Diaries p 275.

¹¹⁷ Pimlott op cit p 518. Note also the extract from Crossman's Diaries with which Griffith and Ryle preface their book on Parliament: 'The government has had its summer recess—a delicious time for any government. Now we have got to settle down to the dreary nagging strain of Parliament'.

¹¹⁸ Dealing respectively with Education and Science, Race Relations and Immigration, Scottish Affairs and Overseas Aid.

The 1979 reforms

It is perhaps no coincidence that the Crossman reforms were promoted by a government with (initially) a very small Commons majority. The 1974–1979 Labour government which accepted far more systematic proposals from the Commons' Procedure Committee had similarly precarious support. This might suggest that governments are more likely to accommodate the supposed independence of the Commons when they cannot invariably rely on a working majority.¹¹⁹ However, the proposals were adopted by the subsequent Conservative government (which did enjoy a sizeable majority),¹²⁰ and were implemented (in part) under the tutelage of the then Leader of the House, Norman St John Stevas.

The reform's supposed objective (according to both St John Stevas and his Labour predecessor Michael Foot) was to reverse a perception that the Commons was becoming increasingly impotent in the face of government majorities in the house: the Procedure Committee had argued in 1978 that: 'the day-to-day working of the Constitution is now weighted in favour of the government to a degree which arouses widespread anxiety'.¹²¹

The method adopted to address this supposed problem was to create a dozen select committees, each having eleven to thirteen members, which would closely scrutinise the work of particular departments.¹²² Membership was to be fixed for the life of a Parliament, so that MPs could develop specialised knowledge of particular issues. Members were to be chosen by a special Committee of Selection rather than by party whips. A principle nevertheless emerged to the effect that a government with a majority in the house would retain a majority on each committee. It also appears that both government and opposition whips have in practice succeeded in gaining de facto control of the appointment process.¹²³ Ministers could not serve on committees, and there was a hope, if not an expectation, that members would approach their task in an independent and fair-minded spirit. Their activities were to be overseen and co-ordinated by a Liaison Committee comprising the chairpersons of the individual committees.

The new select committees have been in operation long enough for us to form an impression about their impact on the government/Commons relationship by noting several issues of general applicability and by focusing on some of the more significant episodes in their thus far brief history.¹²⁴

The committees have been prolific in terms of the number and diversity of reports which they have produced. On a few occasions, these reports seem to have led directly to shifts in government policy. Others are intended either to filter in the longer term into the general process of governmental policy-making, or merely to draw attention to issues whose complexities have thus far remained unappreciated.¹²⁵ This gradual accumulation of expert knowledge on a wide variety of issues is perhaps the most successful area of committee activity thus far. In other respects, their impact has been far more limited.

¹¹⁹ Although the then Labour chief whip, Michael Cocks, had little empathy with the proposals: 'I didn't want any bloody select committee examining what we were up to!' quoted by White M and Norton-Taylor R (1995) 'Commons watchdogs lack full set of teeth' The Guardian 22 March.

¹²⁰ For the figures see table 7.5.

¹²¹ Quoted in Drewry (1985a) op cit p 136. See Baines P (1985) 'The history and rationale of the 1979 reforms', in Drewry G (ed) The new select committees (Oxford: Clarendon Press): Johnson op cit.

¹²² The Committees being Agriculture, Defence, Education, Employment, Energy, Environment, Foreign Affairs, Home Affairs, Scottish Affairs, Social Services, Trade and Industry, Transport, Treasury and Civil Service, and Welsh Affairs. ¹²³ See Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 417–420.

¹²⁴ For examples see Nixon J and Nixon N (1983) 'The social services committee' Journal of Social Policy 331: Hawes D (1992) 'Parliamentary select committees: some case studies in contingent influence' Policy and Politics 227. More generally see Drewry (1985) (ed) op cit.

¹²⁵ See generally Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 423–428.

Unlike the PAC, the departmental select committees are not well-resourced. The committees do not control any resources of their own; their expenditure is determined by the House of Commons Commission. In this respect, they fare very poorly in comparison with the legislative committee system of the US Congress, which enjoys considerable power and prestige within the US government process. The two systems are not of course directly comparable, since the US constitution adheres to a more rigid separation of powers than Britain's, and often finds itself accommodating a national executive and legislature controlled by different political parties. Nevertheless, the select committees' paucity of resources undermines their capacity to be fully informed on relevant aspects of government policy.

A further significant constraint on the committees' efficacy derives from their (practically) limited powers to extract information from unwilling government departments. St John Stevas announced to the house in 1979 that:

I give the House the pledge on the part of the government that every Minister from the most senior Cabinet Minister to the most junior Under-Secretary will do all in his or her power to co-operate with the new system of Committees and make it a success.¹²⁶

One cannot know if such a promise was made in good faith. Nor can one know if committee members exercise their power 'to send for persons, papers and records' in fearless disregard of Ministerial sensibilities. But it is evident that a Minister may simply refuse to attend a committee inquiry. Or she may decline to answer questions on particular subjects. It may be politically embarrassing for a Minister to behave in this way, and may expose her to both parliamentary and public criticism. But one must surely assume that she is unco-operative because a candid discussion would reveal information of an even more embarrassing or damaging nature.

Ministers are frequently reluctant to permit senior civil servants to contribute to committee inquiries. The Employment Committee's inquiry into the GCHQ affair was severely hindered by the government's refusal to allow the Director of GCHQ to give evidence. Similarly, the controversy engendered by the so-called Westland Affair,¹²⁷ prompted inquiries by both the Defence Committee and the Treasury and Civil Service Committee; both were hampered by the government's decision not to allow particular civil servants to appear.¹²⁸

A further indication of the government's somewhat restrictive interpretation of 'full co-operation' was provided by a 1980 Memorandum of Guidance which indicated that certain types of documentary evidence would not be available. The text of the Memorandum lent itself to extremely broad interpretation. The forbidden territory included, for example: 'Questions in the field of political controversy'; 'advice given to Ministers by their departments'; the discussions of Cabinet committees; and 'inter-departmental exchanges on policy issues'.

The list suggests that the Thatcher government was no more willing than previous administrations to open its activities up to searching Commons' scrutiny. It is technically within the power of the house to insist that persons attend committee hearings, or that documents be produced. Defying an order would amount to contempt, which, as we shall see in chapter eight, may still lead to imprisonment. It is however difficult to envisage any circumstances in which a government would find itself unable to persuade its MPs to vote against any such action. Thus while the power may be significant in respect of private individuals, it is largely illusory in the context of government/Commons relations.

¹²⁶ HCD, 25 June 1979 c 45; quoted in Turpin op cit p 384.

¹²⁷ We revisit Westland in ch 9.

¹²⁸ Hennessy P (1986) 'Helicopter crashes into Cabinet: Prime Minister and constitution hurt' Journal of Law and Society 423.

Most commentators seem to suggest that while the committees have become accepted as a legitimate part of the parliamentary landscape, it is only the PAC which exercises a continuously significant influence over government behaviour: the reform clearly does not merit the label of a 'revolution' in the workings of government with which St John Stevas initially cloaked it.¹²⁹ The suggestion that governments would tolerate select committees only for so long as they did not prove a constant thorn in the executive's side was reinforced after the 1992 general election. Prior to the election, the Health Committee was chaired by Nicholas Winterton MP, an independently-minded Conservative who frequently criticised government health policy. The government seemingly wished to remove him from this post, but did not wish to do so candidly. Conservative whips thus formulated a rule that Conservative MPs could not serve for more than twelve years on the same Committee. Not, one assumes, by coincidence, it transpired that Winterton fell into this category. His initial reaction was one of blustering indignation, couched in the rhetoric of constitutional impropriety:

What we have now is government by whips' dictat. They are now saying free speech and an independent mind can have no role in Parliament.... They [the Cabinet] are being seen as dictators who will not brook any dissent.¹³⁰

Yet Mr Winterton did not feel compelled to demonstrate his commitment to 'free speech and independence' by resigning from the Conservative Party. Nor was his outrage shared by a sufficient number of his colleagues for the Conservative whips to doubt that a Commons majority would support their new policy. The episode may indeed have been, as one anonymous Conservative MP complained, 'a gross interference with the work of Parliament'.¹³¹ Yet in formal terms, the government has no power to determine the rules controlling Committee membership; that is a matter for the house itself. That the whips' gambit was successful reveals the true significance of the Winterton 'sacking'—namely that so very few Conservative members regarded maintaining the independence of their house as a higher loyalty than pandering to the convenience of their party.

Perhaps curiously, given the size of the New Labour government's Commons majority, the significance of select committees within the house seemed to grow after the 1997 election. This resulted in part from a decision to experiment with the idea of using select committees to explore the merits of proposed legislation prior to its introduction to the house: an experiment which, in respect of the government's proposed freedom of information legislation, proved something of an embarrassment to Ministers. But some committees also seemed to pursue their traditional role with increased vigour. The Treasury Committee became notably more assertive in its attempts to monitor the mechanics of the government's economic policy. More significantly, the Foreign Affairs Committee subjected the Foreign Secretary and his officials to aggressive questioning over the government's involvement in the supply of arms—in breach of a United Nations embargo—to the government of Sierra Leone.¹³² The next year, the Deputy Prime Minister, John Prescott, was sufficiently rattled by the Transport Select Committee's strong criticism of ¹²⁹ See Johnson op cit; Drewry (1985a) op cit; Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 430–434. Some of the most enthusiastic endorsers of the new system are backbenchers who were formerly members of a Thatcher cabinet; cf Michael Jopling MP in 1995: 'The most important development in Parliamentary procedure in my 30 years in the House. Select Committees are giving backbenchers teeth with which to challenge the executive'; quoted in White and Norton-Taylor op cit.

¹³¹ The Guardian 14 July 1992.

¹³² The Guardian 26 June 1998; The Guardian 1 July 1998.

¹³⁰ The Guardian 14 July 1992.

government transport policy to launch an intemperate attack on the Committee's members.¹³³ Simultaneously, the Trade and Industry Committee accused the government of a systematic failure to respect human rights concerns by promoting the sale of arms to repressive foreign regimes.¹³⁴

In other respects, however, the effectiveness of the committee system was open to doubt. The first Blair government appeared to connive in several episodes in which backbench Labour MPs sought wilfully to undermine the independence of the committees on which they sat. Ernie Ross MP, a Labour member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, deliberately sought to sabotage the Committee's investigation of the 'Arms to Sierra Leone' controversy by leaking information to the Foreign Office. Ross was required to resign from the Committee when his duplicity was uncovered.¹³⁵ His example was subsequently followed by another Labour MP, Kali Mountford, who leaked a report on welfare benefits from the Social Security Select Committee to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's parliamentary private secretary, Don Touhig. Mountford then dishonestly denied any involvement with the leak during a subsequent committee investigation.¹³⁶ Episodes such as this might suggest that ministers' unwillingness to accept that the great power they wield is in itself sufficient reason to subject their behaviour to rigorous, inconvenient examination by an informed and relatively autonomous Commons is not the exclusive preserve of the modern Conservative Party.

Conclusion

The Labour Party's sweeping victory at the 1997 general election (in which it gained a Commons majority of some 180 seats) did not herald any radical changes in the Commons' de facto subordination to the government. The Blair government did establish a cross party committee to investigate ways in which the Commons might modernise its internal procedures. Its proposals were mild. Foremost among them were the scheduling of more Commons business for the mornings and—in a nod to MPs' family commitments—short closures of the Commons during school half term holidays. MPs whose constituencies were far from London would be assisted by a decision to make minimal use of Friday sittings, thereby offering MPs the chance to depart for their constituencies on Thursday evenings. The committee also suggested that more MPs should be enabled to speak in debates by empowering the Speaker to place stricter time limits on the duration of each speech. Whether that proposal would actually enhance the quality of debate, rather than just permit a greater number of anodyne contributions by inexpert speakers, remains to be seen. Some indication of how absurdly archaic the Commons' procedures are is given by press coverage of the cross-party committee's recommendations; the proposal that attracted most attention was the abolition of the requirement that an MP could only make a point of order during a division if she was wearing a top hat.¹³⁷

A government with a Commons majority of 180 is unlikely to find its legislative timetable substantially inconvenienced by the lower house. The first Blair government suffered few episodes of major backbench rebellion. All came from the left of the party, in response ¹³³ The Guardian 28 September 1999; The Guardian 11 August 1999.

¹³⁴ The Guardian 5 August 1999.

¹³⁵ The Guardian 24 February 1999; The Guardian 5 March 1999.

¹³⁶ She subsequently attributed her dishonesty (which she characterised as 'rather silly') to ill health and naivety. See The Guardian 28 July 1999.

¹³⁷ Independent on Sunday 8 March 1998; Independent on Sunday 28 June 1998.

to what rebels regarded as unacceptably harsh social policy initiatives. The most serious arose late in 1997, in respect of a Bill designed to cut welfare payments to single parent families. Some 120 Labour MPs publicly opposed the changes. Only forty-seven eventually voted against the second reading, another fourteen abstained. One junior Minister, Malcolm Chisholm, preferred to resign his office rather than support the government.¹³⁸ The government did not make any significant concession to the rebels; but the episode was sufficiently embarrassing for the Prime Minister to feel obliged to sack the then Secretary of State for Social Security, Harriet Harman, shortly afterwards.

No such draconian consequences ensued in June 1998, when forty Labour MPs voted against the government's plans to abolish student grants.¹³⁹ Once again, backbench pressure was insufficient to persuade the government to alter its policy. In contrast, the Home Secretary was persuaded by the prospect of fifty or so Labour MPs voting against the government to modify the contents of his decidedly illiberal Bill to discourage refugees from seeking asylum in Britain.¹⁴⁰ Planned cuts in welfare benefits—this time to the disabled—caused further difficulties to the Blair administration late in 1999. The government offered minor concessions to the rebels, but refused to countenance major modifications. Fifty-four Labour MPs eventually opposed the Bill at third reading, reducing the government's majority to sixty. A further substantial revolt was triggered in May 2000 by the government's plan to privatise the air traffic control system, a policy which it had condemned as wholly undesirable when in opposition.

Notwithstanding such episodes, which attracted much press coverage, the first Blair government ended its term without having been defeated even once on a whipped vote. No other post-war government had achieved such a feat.¹⁴¹

The first Blair government also appeared unwilling to enhance the power of Commons' select committees. In 2000, the Liaison Committee (comprised of the chairs of other select committees) produced a report which urged, inter alia, that party whips should no longer play any part in choosing committee members and that committee membership should be structured in a fashion that offered an alternative career structure to the ministerial greasy pole. The government dismissed the proposals. Labour backbenchers were sufficiently quiescent to allow the government to resist demands that the report should be subject to a vote in the house.

The Commons appeared to have become more assertive in defence of its committees in the immediate aftermath of the 2001 general election. In a manner reminiscent of the Major government's treatment of Nicholas Winterton, the government attempted to remove two of its most effective backbench critics, Donald Anderson and Gwyneth Dunwoody, from their respective Chairs of the Foreign Affairs and Transport Select Committees. The risible justification for the proposal was that Anderson and Dunwoody had sat on the committees for too long. Ms Dunwoody had recently expressed the view that the government was so irritated by her Committee's behaviour that Ministers were co-ordinating a smear campaign among MPs and in the press to undermine her credibility.¹⁴² The government then suffered the ignominy of a substantial defeat on the floor of the house when both MPs were voted back into their chairs. It should perhaps be stressed however that the election of committee chairs is, at least in principle, a matter for a free ¹³⁸ The Times 11 December 1997; The Guardian 11 December 1997.

¹³⁹ The Times 6 June 1998.

¹⁴⁰ The Guardian 6 June 1999.

¹⁴¹ Cowley and Stuart (2001) op cit.

¹⁴² The Guardian 10 June 2002.

vote. Whether Labour MPs would have proved such staunch proponents of the Commons' autonomy in the face of a whip is a matter for speculation.¹⁴³

Hopes were raised that more extensive reforms might attract government support when the former Foreign Secretary, Robin Cook, was appointed as Leader of the House in the second Blair government. In an interview given shortly after his appointment, Cook professed himself much concerned to increase the authority and effectiveness of the house vis-à-vis the government.¹⁴⁴ Shortly thereafter, he announced that the government favoured change along the lines proposed by the Liaison Committee two years earlier. The plans were enthusiastically received in the press. Mr Cook had evidently failed however to convince his Cabinet colleagues and the Prime Minister of the benefits of his plans. In May 2002, government whips succeeded in persuading Labour backbenchers to vote against the reforms.¹⁴⁵ The only reform of any note introduced in the first year of the second Blair government's term was that the Prime Minister agreed to undertake a regular, televised question-and-answer session on all facets of government policy with the Liaison Committee.

A more assertive and independent house?

A forceful argument has however been made by Philip Cowley that backbench Labour MPs demonstrated considerable independence from (or opposition to) the Blair government since 2001.¹⁴⁶ The point is overtly evidenced by the decision of 139 Labour MPs in March 2003 to vote against the government's motion in the House of Commons seeking approval of its planned invasion of Iraq. The motion was ultimately carried only because the government was supported by the Conservative opposition. A perhaps more graphic illustration is provided by the government's first defeat on a whipped vote in the Commons in November 2005, over its wish to have legislation enacted which would authorise the detention of terrorists suspects for up to ninety days without charge or trial. Forty-nine Labour backbenchers joined the opposition parties in voting against the government's proposal.¹⁴⁷

Cowley's study suggests that backbench Labour MPs exerted influence over government policy in more subtle ways. He identifies several major bills promoted by the government during the 2001–2005 Parliament which were substantially amended during their passage as a result of government concerns that backbench Labour support might not be forthcoming. After the 2005 general election, the government's majority in the Commons fell to sixty-one; a scenario which suggested that Prime Minister Blair's third administration (and subsequently Gordon Brown's first government from 2007) might have to be substantially more accommodating to the wishes of its backbenchers than its predecessors had been. A strong illustration of this supposition was provided in the spring of 2008, when a substantial number of Labour backbenchers indicated that they would oppose a budget proposal removing the lowest rate of income tax. The proposal would have significantly raised the tax liability of a substantial number of people on low incomes. The government took the threat of rebellion sufficiently seriously to pre-empt the possibility of defeat in the Commons by putting forward a package of measures to compensate the people affected.

¹⁴³ See Cowley P and Stuart M (2002) 'Parliament: mostly continuity, but more change than you'd think' Parliamentary Affairs 270. ¹⁴⁴ The Guardian 7 January 2002.

¹⁴⁵ One Labour MP who favoured change, Gordon Prentice, subsequently asked on the floor of the house; 'Is it in order for government whips to be standing outside the voting lobbies on a free vote and pointing to the No lobby and saying "parliamentary Labour Party this way"?'; The Guardian 15 May 2002.

¹⁴⁶ Cowley P (2005) The rebels. The book offers a very detailed and engaging portrait of the realities of the law-making process within our modern Parliament. ¹⁴⁷ Ibid, ch 5.

The 2010 general election produced a house in which no party had a single majority, and led to the formation of Conservative/Liberal coalition government. Although the parties produced a ‘Coalition Agreement’ outlining their intended legislative programme,¹⁴⁸ by mid-2011 that there was significant disagreement between both Minister and backbenchers of both parties on the merits of various legislative proposals. These tensions were particularly acute over proposed reforms to the National Health Service, with the result that the government announced there would be a ‘pause’ in the passage of a Bill which had already completed most of its Commons stages so that further consultation could take place on its contents. The episode certainly raised the possibility that the Commons might play a more significant role both as legislator and scrutinsier of the government than it had for much of the modern era.

Notwithstanding this recent trend, it is clear that for most of the modern era the Commons has been a body in which party politics is the dominant determinant both in the legislative process and in respect of executive accountability.¹⁴⁹ The house is manifestly now a factional rather than national assembly for most purposes. But it would as yet be premature to conclude that the constitution therefore permits factional concerns to determine both the content of legislation and the parliamentary accountability of government behaviour. To answer that question, our analysis must consider several further issues. Firstly, the constitutional role played by the House of Lords—the second limb of our tripartite Parliament. Secondly, the nature of the relationship between factional Commons majorities and ‘the people’. And thirdly, the uses to which factional governments put whatever power is at their disposal. This last question is perhaps the most important of all. For even if one accepts that a factional constitution is undesirable in a modern democracy, it does not necessarily follow that such a constitution will lead to the production of factional laws, nor, in the event that it does, that the laws concerned do not attract the consent of the governed.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Cowley P (2005) The rebels

Norton P (2005) Parliament in British politics ch 5

Kenny M (2009) ‘Taking the temperature of the British political elite 3: when grubby is the order of the day’ Parliamentary Affairs 503

Norton P (1979) ‘The organisation of parliamentary parties’, in Walkland S (ed) The House of Commons in the twentieth century

Borthwick R (1988) ‘The floor of the house’, in Ryle M and Richards (eds) The Commons under scrutiny

Laundy P (1979) ‘The Speaker and his office in the twentieth century’, in Walkland S (ed) The House of Commons in the twentieth century

Hansard Society (2000) The challenge for Parliament: making government accountable

¹⁴⁸ <<http://www.cabinetoffice.gov.uk/news/coalition-documents>>. The election result is considered below at ‘Counting the Vote’, ch 7, pp 217–220.

¹⁴⁹ A recent critique to this effect, coupled with a plan for reform, is offered by the Hansard Society (2000) The challenge for Parliament: making government accountable.

Chapter 6

The House of Lords

Chapter five began to explore how accurately Parliament's current role reflects the intentions of the 1688 settlement; those being to secure that elite groups monopolised law-making power, and to ensure that no one or two factions within that elite could seize legislative power to pursue majoritarian or minoritarian ends. Chapter five suggested there has been a significant change in the Commons' role since 1688, from a body providing the voice of one distinct segment of society, counterposed to the Lords and the Monarch, to a forum in which the divergent political philosophies of the entire population are expressed. The rise of nationwide party politics, and the fusion rather than separation of powers between the legislature and the government, create the danger of a majoritarian lower chamber, in which pursuing factional party advantage rather than safeguarding national interests could be legislators' main occupation. Chapter seven considers how development of the parliamentary electoral system has affected this trend. This chapter asks whether the upper chamber plays an effective anti-majoritarian legislative role.

Bicameral legislatures: a functionalist justification

Most modern democracies have two houses in their central legislature. They are referred to as having a bicameral Parliament: countries with only one legislative assembly have unicameral Parliaments. The national legislature in the USA comprises the House of Representatives and the Senate.¹ The Americans' division of their central legislature was a continuation of the theme of the separation of powers. By requiring that federal legislation attracted the consent of more than one body, Madison and Jefferson hoped to reduce still further the likelihood that Congress could enact tyrannical laws. The two houses of Congress fulfil different representative functions. The Senate has two Senators from each State, irrespective of the size of the State's population. Senators represent State interests within the national legislature, thereby stressing the Constitution's federal nature. In contrast, members of the House of Representatives are chosen on a population basis; the number from each State reflects that State's share of the national population. This emphasises that the United States' Federal legislature was responsible to individual citizens as well as to the States. Bicameralism is intended to maximise the chances that Congress, acting within the legislative competence granted by the Constitution, produces laws that strike an acceptable balance between the interests of the States and of individual citizens.

¹ On the reasoning behind other countries' choice of this institutional framework see Shell D (1992) The House of Lords ch 1.

Most countries with bicameral legislatures consider the composition and powers of both houses as part of their fundamental laws. In the USA, the structure of Congress is delineated in the text of the Constitution. Similarly, if we recall Trethowan, we see that the New South Wales constitution used procedural entrenchment to safeguard the Legislative Council's existence. Bicameralism was a 'higher' law within that constitutional settlement.

For practical purposes, the two parts of the United Kingdom's legislature are the Commons and the House of Lords. In theory, Parliament has a third part—the Monarch. As a matter of legal theory, the Monarch retains the power to veto proposed legislation by withholding the Royal Assent. However, as a matter of practical politics, this power is no longer used.²

Appreciating the distinction between theory and practice, or between what is sometimes referred to as law and convention, is essential to understanding the constitutional status and function of the House of Lords. By pursuing this 'gap' between theory and practice here, we raise ideas which later chapters will show to be central to understanding how and why the constitution functions as it does. For present purposes, we might distinguish law and convention in the following simple way. Both are vehicles through which political power is exercised in an effective and legitimate manner. However, while laws may be enforced by an action before the courts, conventions have no actionable legal basis. Rather, they control the exercise of political power because the wielders of that power either believe that conventional restraints are morally correct, or they fear the political consequences of breaching them.

I. The historical background

The House of Lords' origins may be traced to the 'Great Council', a body which assumed a recognisably modern shape in the fifteenth century.³ In the pre-revolutionary era, the Lords was regarded as a 'fundamental' element of the English constitution.⁴ In 1688, the Lords and Commons were, in terms of their legal powers, co-equal partners in the legislative process. The 1688 revolution established the legal supremacy of Parliament, not of the Commons. If the House of Lords disapproved a Commons Bill, that Bill could not go any further.

Co-equality extended to the formation of governments as well as enacting legislation. Until the late-nineteenth century, the Cabinet was as likely to contain a majority of members from the Lords as from the Commons: only one member of Lord Grey's 1830 Cabinet was not either a peer or the son of a peer: Gladstone assembled a Cabinet of twelve members in 1880; one was a duke, one a marquis, and five were earls.⁵ Not until the twentieth ² We assess the nature of the Monarch's power in ch 9.

³ See Adonis (1993) op cit p 193. For a detailed description see Weston C (1965) English constitutional theory and the House of Lords ch 1.

⁴ England had a unicameral legislature between 1649 and 1657, when Cromwell's revolutionary House of Commons purported to abolish the Lords. Charles II, when restored to his throne in 1660, recalled the Lords, accepting that the upper house should again enjoy 'that authority and jurisdiction which hath always belonged to you by your birth, and the fundamental law of the land': see Smith E (1992) The House of Lords in British Politics and Society 1815–1911 p 1.

⁵ Turbeville A (1958) The House of Lords in the Age of Reform p 256; Jenkins R (1968) Mr Balfour's Poodle p 27; Smith op cit p 64.

century had the conventional practice arisen that the Prime Minister should be a member of the Commons.

In 1688, the peers in the Lords were either hereditary peers or bishops. The Lords was a combination of the church and the land-owning aristocracy: it was not a democratic chamber in the modern sense. But neither was the Commons, whose members were then 'elected' (the word is used guardedly) by a tiny minority of the (male) population.⁶ Co-equality was a co-equality of elites, not of the mass of the population. Such elitism was readily understandable from a functionalist perspective. The constitutional morality of that era discerned a vital purpose for an aristocratic veto within the legislative process: to preserve existing patterns of political and economic power.

As discussed in chapter seven, the impact of the industrial revolution on the nature and distribution of wealth was immense, and led to equally significant realignments in the basis of political influence. However even as late as 1800, land ownership was the predominant form of economic power: and members of the House of Lords were the predominant class of landowners. In 1876, almost half of the country's thirty million acres was owned by barely 500 peers,⁷ many of whom also derived substantial incomes from industrial, commercial, and residential development in addition to the more traditional vehicle of agriculture.

Co-equality to complementarity: a conventional change

The situation of equal status between the two houses within both the legislative process and the formation of the government continued in force in legal terms until the twentieth century. But it very quickly began to undergo a political change. From the outset of the post-revolutionary period, both houses appeared to accept that the Lords should not veto legislation dealing with the raising of government revenue. The original sources of this conventional understanding are obscure,⁸ but its scope was clearly delineated in a 1678 Commons resolution:

[A]ll Bills for granting such Aids and Supplies ought to begin with the Commons: And that it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct limit and appoint in such Bills the Ends, Purposes, Considerations, Conditions, Limitations, and Qualifications of such Grants: which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords.⁹

Quite how effective this principle, or indeed any other conventional understandings, have proven in regulating the legislative process is a question perhaps best answered by example.

The Treaty of Utrecht

A major conflict between the post-revolution Lords and Commons arose in the early eighteenth century. The immediate cause was a disagreement between the government, which commanded a majority in the Commons, and the majority of peers in the Lords over the terms of the Treaty of Utrecht. The stalemate was resolved when the government asked Queen Anne to use her prerogative powers to create enough new peers who supported the government to ensure that it had a reliable Lords majority. The Queen accepted that she should follow her ministers' advice, and created twelve new peers.¹⁰

⁶ The electoral process is examined in detail in ch 7. ⁷ Turbeville (1958) op cit p 408.

⁸ Smith op cit p 34. ⁹ We address the legal status of resolutions in ch 8.

¹⁰ Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 540–542; Turbeville A (1927) The House of Lords in the eighteenth century pp 111–118.

The Utrecht episode demonstrated that the Lords' theoretical co-equality could be undermined if the Monarch supported a government which enjoyed majority Commons support. The affair is constitutionally significant, for it reveals a pro-majoritarian legal loophole sewn into the fabric of the 1688 settlement. For a government and Monarch to collude in this way would undermine the anti-majoritarian sentiment informing the original understanding of parliamentary sovereignty, but it would not be illegal.

A more important focus for constitutional change was provided by the Great Reform Act 1832. The passage of this legislation is examined closely in chapter seven. Here we might simply note that the Act was vigorously opposed by many Tory peers, who feared it undermined the traditional 'balance' of the constitution and thereby threatened the distribution of economic power on which they assumed the security of the nation to rest.

The reasons behind the Lords' eventual acquiescence to the Bill are also discussed in chapter seven. That acquiescence meant however that from 1832 onwards one can begin to see a democratic justification for regarding the Lords as constitutionally subordinate to the Commons. The Commons was increasingly a body which could plausibly claim to derive its authority from the consent of the governed. It would be misleading to suggest that the Commons in 1833 was a truly representative body. But after 1832, the legislative trend headed steadily and consistently in that direction.

The doctrine of the mandate

The more 'democratic' basis of the post-Reform Act Commons had significant implications for the power that a non-elected Lords could expect to wield. By the 1880s the two houses were in legal theory still equal partners, but in practice their relationship had changed profoundly. By 1900 a convention had emerged that the Lords would not block Bills passed by the Commons unless it seemed that the Commons was promoting measures that could not command popular support. The legitimate limits to the Lords' intransigence were described by Lord Lyndhurst in 1858:

I never understood, nor could such a principle be acted upon, that we were to make a firm, determined and persevering stand against the opinion of the other House of Parliament when that opinion is backed by the opinion of the people.¹¹

Lord Lyndhurst viewed the Lords' capacity to block legislation as a power, which it might deploy when it thought the Commons was pursuing policies which lacked electoral support.

In contrast, Lord Salisbury, then leader of the Tory peers, suggested in 1872 that the veto was a constitutional duty. The upper house was obliged to defy the Commons on major issues unless 'the judgement of the nation has been challenged at the polls and decidedly expressed'.¹² This so-called 'doctrine of the mandate' or 'referendal theory' emerged in the late 1860s, when the Lords vetoed a government Bill to reform the Irish Church. Lord Salisbury justified the Lords' position on the grounds that the policy was not part of the proposed legislative programme on which the Liberal government had fought the last general election, and that another general election was shortly to be held.¹³

The defensibility of this position rested largely on the hardening of party allegiances in both the Commons and the country which had occurred by then. Party membership was all-pervasive in the Lords in 1880: E A Smith notes that '280 peers described themselves as 'Conservative and 203 as Liberal, against only thirteen of no party'.¹⁴

¹¹ Cited in Jenkins (1968) op cit p 28.

¹² Jenkins (1968) op cit p 31.

¹³ Smith op cit pp 166–168; Jenkins (1968) op cit pp 28–31.

¹⁴ Smith op cit p 157.

Party discipline was less rigidly enforced in the Lords than in the Commons, but was nevertheless generally sufficiently effective to assure the Conservatives of a majority whenever required.¹⁵ Unsurprisingly, Tory governments experienced fewer problems in piloting Bills through the Lords than their Liberal counterparts. The administrations led by Sir Robert Peel in the 1840s and Lord Darby and Disraeli in the 1860s and 1870s generally secured Lords majorities for modest programmes of social, economic and political reform, although even Peel found his policies rejected on occasion.¹⁶

The doctrine of the mandate presents a paradox—a body composed primarily of the landed gentry¹⁷ saw one of its crucial constitutional roles as upholding ‘democratic’ principles against the elected chamber. The Lords portrayed itself as the ‘watchdog of the constitution’, able to ‘overreach’ the House of Commons and seek the views of the people by insisting that a government with radical proposals test its popularity in a general election. Cynical observers might wonder if the upper house’s defence of public opinion would be staunch only when public sentiment coincided with that of the majority of Tory peers. Salisbury was certainly prepared to amend his formula when the original version did not meet his needs. The Lords rejected the Liberal government’s Irish Home Rule Bill on the basis that it had been approved by the Commons only with the support of Irish MPs. Most MPs from England, which was the ‘predominant partner’ in Parliament, opposed the measure, which Salisbury considered sufficient justification to force the Liberals to put the issue to the electorate again.¹⁸ This ‘predominant partner’ principle emphasises the general point that the substance of a convention may be unilaterally altered by the individuals or groups who have considered themselves bound to it.

The Lords and Commons clashed on several issues during the late-Victorian era—especially policy towards Ireland¹⁹—but disputes were always defused before reaching a constitutional crisis. But the Lords’ deference was a matter of political self-regulation. The Lords chose not to frustrate the Commons. This choice may have been influenced by the fear that the government might ask the Monarch to swamp the upper chamber with new peers if the Lords rejected a Commons Bill. But there was no legal impediment to the Lords simply blocking government policy.

There was perhaps an inverse correlation between the Lords’ conventional power and the breadth of the parliamentary franchise; as more people obtained the right to vote for members of the Commons, it became more difficult for the Lords to find a ‘democratic’ justification for obstructing the lower house. By 1900 almost all adult men were entitled to vote in parliamentary elections and, simultaneously, the Lords’ political role was shifting from co-equality to complementarity.

The Lords complemented the Commons by acting as a scrutiniser of Bills, a forum for debate on issues of general importance, and a vehicle to bring important questions to the nation’s attention. As The Times had predicted in 1831, the Lords’ political role was drifting towards one in which it might persuade, but not compel the

¹⁵ Smith op cit ch 5; Large D (1963) ‘The decline of the “Party of the Crown” and the rise of parties in the House of Lords, 1783–1837’ English Historical Review 669; Brock M (1973) The Great Reform Act pp 216–217.

¹⁶ See Turbeville op cit pp 347–351, 397–399, 411–416.

¹⁷ From the mid-nineteenth century onwards newly created peers had a slightly more meritocratic profile—outstanding service in the law, armed forces or government service were seen as legitimate ladders up which commoners could climb to the lower ranks of the aristocracy: Turbeville (1958) op cit pp 369–370.

¹⁸ Smith op cit pp 168–169.

¹⁹ See Smith op cit ch 9.

Commons to forgo factional legislative programmes; to act in effect as a ‘watchdog of the constitution’:

among the uses of an Upper Chamber ought to be accounted that of...subjecting that which may be but a light or transient caprice, to the test of calm, laborious, and reiterated deliberation.²⁰

Between 1909 and 1911 however, the Lords appeared to reject its new conventional role of complementarity in favour of its traditional legal status of co-equality.

Lloyd George and the ‘people’s budget’

A convention cannot be legally enforced. It is effective only while the people supposedly bound by it agree to be bound. By 1909, the Lords no longer accepted conventional constraints on its formal legal power to veto Bills passed in the Commons. The long-term cause of this problem was the consolidation of the party system within national politics, in which substantial blocs of opinion had developed irreconcilable views around several major issues. An acute political fault line appeared over matters of social and economic policy, which, put simplistically, offers an early empirical example of the dichotomy between social democratic and liberal market theories of the state.

In 1906, the House of Commons had 671 members. In the 1906 general election, the Liberals and the smaller parties supporting them won 514 seats. The opposition Conservative and Unionist parties had 157 seats. This gave the government an effective majority of 357. The party balance in the Lords was very different however: the Conservatives had a majority of 391.²¹

Between 1906 and 1909 the Liberal government promoted various radical social policy programmes.²² Although the Conservative majority was in a clear minority in the Commons, the party leader Arthur Balfour was able effectively either to block or substantially amend government Bills by mobilising the Lords’ Conservative majority.²³

Matters came to a head over the Finance Bill of 1909, popularly known as Lloyd George’s ‘People’s Budget’. The Bill would raise taxes substantially to pay for an expanded welfare state and enlargement of the navy. From a modern viewpoint, Lloyd George’s tax

Table 6.1 House of Lords: historical shifts in party allegiance

| | 1880 | 1906 | 1930 | 1955 | 1975 | 1992 | 2001 |
|--------------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|
| Conservative | 280 | 354 | 489 | 507 | 507 | 475 | 222 |
| Labour | – | – | 17 | 55 | 149 | 119 | 197 |
| Liberal | 203 | 98 | 79 | 42 | 30 | 58 | 62 |
| Cross-bench | 13 | 43 | 140 | 251 | 281 | 263 | 216 |

Sources: Compiled from information in Shell (1992) op cit p 67; Adonis (1993) op cit p 205; Butler D and Sloman A (1975) op cit p 175; The Guardian, November 8 2001.

²⁰ 3 October 1831; quoted in Smith op cit p 118. One could find few better British examples of a recipe to counter Madisonian fear of faction.

²¹ Wicks (2006) op cit p 83. The substantial increase in the number of Conservative peers between 1880 and 1906—and the corresponding decline in Liberal representation—was the result of many former Liberal peers switching allegiance to the Conservatives because they opposed Liberal Party policy to grant Home Rule to Ireland.

²² See Hay J (1975) The origins of the Liberal welfare reforms 1906–1914.

²³ Wicks (2006) op cit pp 84–85.

plans seem very modest; income tax would be levied at only nine pence in the pound. Nevertheless, as Roy Jenkins records, the plans provoked furious Tory opposition:

‘It means the beginning of the end of all rights of property’ said Sir Edward Carson. ‘It is a monument of reckless and improvident finance,’ said Lord Lansdowne [leader of the Conservative peers]. ‘It is inquisitorial, tyrannical and socialistic,’ said Lord Roseberry.²⁴

The opposing views of the 1906 budget neatly encapsulate one difficulty inherent in applying Jeffersonian constitutional principles to modern government. Carson might be seen as espousing the wealthy’s ‘inalienable right’ not to have their property taken away by taxation. Lloyd George, in contrast, might plausibly have argued that the Liberals’ substantial Commons majority made it clear that ‘the people’ had now consented to a more egalitarian route in their ‘pursuit of happiness’.

Given the size of the Liberal majority, one might have thought that convention demanded that the Lords should not obstruct the Finance Bill. However, the Lords’ Conservative majority persistently refused to pass the Bill, claiming that since the Bill’s provisions had not been clearly put to the electorate in 1906 the doctrine of the mandate required the government to call a general election to decide if the citizenry supported the policy.

The Liberal government requested the King to create enough Liberal peers for the government to push the Bill through the Lords. Edward VII was reluctant to do this, and he was supported by Arthur Balfour, the Conservative leader in the Commons. Balfour had urged the Lords’ Conservative majority to block the government’s Bill. This led Lloyd George to suggest that the Lords was not the ‘watchdog of the constitution’, but ‘Mr Balfour’s poodle. It fetches and carries for him. It barks for him. It bites anybody that he sets it on to’.²⁵ The Conservative’s upper house majority was almost as substantial as that of the Liberals in the Commons. Three-hundred and fifty-four peers took the Conservative whip, while fewer than 100 were Liberals, and only 43 claimed to have no party allegiance (the so-called ‘cross-benchers’).²⁶

One might here pause to consider which party was acting ‘unconstitutionally’. From a contemporary perspective, we might readily accuse the Conservatives, since the Liberals had won the 1906 general election. But to suggest that the Liberal government and its

Table 6.2 The 1906 and 1910 General Elections

| | 1906 | | 1910 (1) | | 1910(2) | |
|--------------|-----------|-----------|-----------|----------|---------|----------|
| | Seats | (% vote) | Seats | (% vote) | Seats | (% vote) |
| Liberal | 400 | (49.0%) | 275 | (43.2%) | 272 | (43.9%) |
| Labour* | 30 | (5.9%) | 78 | (7.6%) | 56 | (7.1%) |
| Irish Nat* | 83 | (0.6%) | 82 | (1.9%) | 84 | (2.5%) |
| Conservative | 157 | (43.6%) | 273 | (46.9%) | 272 | (46.3%) |
| Turnout | 82.6% | 86.6% | 81.1% | | | |
| Electorate | 7,264,608 | 7,694,741 | 7,709,981 | | | |

* Aligned with the Liberals

Source: Compiled from information in Butler D and Sloman A (1975) op cit pp 182–183.

²⁴ (1968) op cit at p 76.

²⁵ Quoted in Butler D and Sloman A (1975) British political facts p 223.

²⁶ Smith op cit p 157; Jenkins (1968) op cit pp 24–25.

small party allies represented the mass of the people is misleading. We have already referred to the limited franchise which then existed; over half of the adult population were not entitled to vote in 1906. Moreover, as noted in table 6.2, only 55% of voters supported the Liberal bloc; 45% of voters preferred an opposition party. The Liberal position was therefore democratic only in the narrow sense of commanding majority support among a 'people' which was in itself only a minority of the population.

One might argue, (as did Professor Dicey)²⁷ that it was the Conservative peers who remained true to the traditional constitution. The tripartite, sovereign Parliament was created to preclude enactment of factional legislation. The factionalist label could clearly be attached to the People's Budget. In vetoing a Bill of which a substantial minority of 'the people' apparently disapproved, the Lords was presumably upholding the spirit of the 1688 settlement. The Liberal government assumed that majoritarianism in the Commons was the constitution's 'ultimate political fact'. Accusing the Lords of 'a breach of the Constitution' in blocking the Finance Bill, Prime Minister Asquith requested a dissolution of Parliament in December 1909.

The general election of January 1910 was fought primarily on the issue of the People's Budget. The Liberals achieved a substantial (albeit reduced) effective majority, and proposed a Parliament Bill greatly reducing the Lords' veto powers. While the Lords subsequently accepted the Finance Bill, it refused to approve a Bill reducing its own legal powers. King Edward VII also appeared hostile to the latter Bill, and equivocated about whether or not he would create the hundreds of new peers needed to outvote the Conservative majority. His successor (as of 6 May 1910) George V seemed equally reluctant to follow the Treaty of Utrecht precedent.

Asquith called another general election for December 1910, squarely on the issue of constitutional reform to curb the Lords' power. The Liberals 'won' this election as well. In the aftermath of this it seemed that the King had agreed to create enough new peers to force the Bill through both houses.

A moderate grouping of Tory peers had proposed reform of the composition rather than the powers of the upper house.²⁸ Lord Lansdowne, Tory leader in the Lords, introduced a Bill in May 1911. The Bill proposed an upper house of some 350 members; one third elected by MPs, one third appointed by the government in proportion to parties' strength in the Commons, and one third comprised of so-called 'Lords of Parliament'—hereditary peers who had previously held important public office. The Bill did not envisage reduction in the Lords' powers. Lansdowne's initiative was designed to reinforce the Lords' legitimacy as a chamber co-equal to the Commons by reducing the obviously unrepresentative character of its members, and simultaneously increasing their expertise and political impartiality. The Lords would become a meritocratic rather than an aristocratic assembly, designed to restrain the potentially impetuous wishes of a factional Commons majority by embodying a national interest owing more to sagacity and public service than wealth and genealogy.

The reform proposal was rebuffed by the government, which maintained that its plans to reduce the Lords' power would remain unchanged irrespective of the upper house's composition. Asquith recognised that Lansdowne's new house would still contain an in-built Conservative majority. Had the Cabinet supported the Bill, it would have created a chamber no less powerful and potentially obstructive to Liberal policy than the existing house, but better positioned to defend any such obstruction by pointing to its reformed composition. At this point, a substantial number of moderate peers decided that further ²⁷ Jenkins (1968) op cit p 96.

²⁸ Jenkins (1968) op cit pp 139–144, 200–205.

resistance to government policy was futile, and the Parliament Bill 1911 was passed in the upper house, albeit by only seventeen votes.²⁹

The Parliament Act 1911

The Act's preamble announced that the Act was intended as an interim measure, pending more thoroughgoing reform of the composition of the Lords on 'a popular instead of hereditary basis'. The World War I coalition government established the Bryce Commission to explore the question of reform. The Commission's recommendations were not acted upon, but its analysis of the functions a second chamber should perform has attracted widespread support.³⁰ Bryce identified four main tasks for the Lords: examining and revising Commons Bills; initiating Bills on non-party political subjects; offering a forum for debate on major issues; and, perhaps most importantly, delaying Bills for sufficient time to allow public sentiment to be made clear.³¹ We will shortly assess the success with which the Lords has performed these functions. Before doing so we consider an argument thrown up by the 1911 Act concerning the nature of 'Parliament' and its supposedly 'sovereign' law-making powers.

One 'Parliament'? Or three?

The Act introduced several innovations in the way laws might be made. The most significant provision was the grant of law-making powers to the Commons and King in circumstances where the Lords refused to pass a Bill approved in the lower house. Two distinct scenarios were identified in which the Commons and King would acquire this new authority.

Section 1 dealt with 'Money Bills':

If a Money Bill, having been passed by the House of Commons, and sent up to the House of Lords at least one month before the end of the session, is not passed by the House of Lords without amendment within one month after it is so sent up to that House, the Bill shall, unless the House of Commons direct to the contrary, be presented to His Majesty and become an Act of Parliament on the Royal Assent being signified, notwithstanding that the House of Lords have not consented to the Bill.

Section 1(2) contained examples of the type of Bill that would be regarded as a 'Money Bill'. However s 1(3) further provided that the Speaker would certify whether a Bill did indeed fall within the 'Money Bill' definition.

Section 2 then addressed certain measures other than 'Money Bills':

(1) If any Public Bill (other than a Money Bill or a Bill containing any provision to extend the maximum duration of Parliament beyond five years) is passed by the House of Commons in three successive sessions (whether of the same Parliament or not), and, having been sent up to the House of Lords at least one month before the end of the session, is rejected by the House of Lords in each of those sessions, that Bill shall, on its rejection for the third time by the House of Lords, unless the House of Commons direct to the contrary, be presented to His Majesty and become an Act of Parliament on the Royal Assent being signified thereto, notwithstanding that the House of Lords have not consented to the Bill: Provided that this provision shall not take effect unless two years have elapsed between the date of the second reading in the ²⁹ The most informative guide is Jenkins (1968) op cit.

³⁰ (1918) (Cd 9038); see Shell op cit pp 11–13.

³¹ Jenkins (1968) op cit pp 280–282.

first of those sessions of the Bill in the House of Commons and the date on which it passes the House of Commons in the third of those sessions.³²

Section 2(2) required that the Speaker attach a certificate to any Bill sent to the King under this provision, confirming that the necessary events had occurred.

Section 3 further provided that the Speaker's certificate on this matter (as in respect of a s 1(3) certificate) 'shall be conclusive for all purposes, and shall not be questioned in any court of law'. Section 4 then added the requirement that any law produced under the s 1 or s 2 procedures should contain the following statement:

Be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, in accordance with the provisions of the Parliament Act 1911, and by authority of the same, as follows...

Section 7 of the Act reduced the maximum period between general elections to five years from the previous maximum of seven years.

If subjected to interpretation in accordance with either the literal or golden rule of statutory construction, the 1911 Act produces quite peculiar results. Perhaps the Act's most notable textual provision was the characterisation in both s 1 and s 2 of the laws produced by the Commons and King as 'Acts of Parliament'. Read in conjunction with the statement in the preamble to the Act that the Act's objective was, inter alia, 'to restrict the powers of the House of Lords', the 'Act of Parliament' label in ss 1–2 indicates that legislators may have presumed that the 1911 Act created two 'new' or 'alternative' 'Parliaments'; these being the 'Money Bill Parliament' per s 1 (ie Commons and King after a one-month delay) and the 'other public Bill Parliament' per s 2 (ie Commons and King after a three-session/two-year delay). This is, for three reasons, a difficult presumption to accept.

Firstly, the presumption is irreconcilable with the orthodox notion that Parliament qua enacter of statutes is a tripartite institution, and that the assent of each of its three parts is required for a measure to be recognisable as an Act of Parliament. We might readily concede that there can be no objection in legal terms to the proposition that Parliament can create law-making bodies which exercise almost unlimited law-making powers; nor to the suggestion that the laws produced by such a body may be equivalent in terms of hierarchical legal status to Acts of Parliament. Such laws might also be called 'Acts of Parliament'; albeit that so styling them would be confusing, misleading and constitutionally ill-informed. But whatever form that body might take, and whatever its powers might be, that body would be the creation of Parliament and its laws would be the progeny of the 1911 Act. The body would be a subordinate 'legislature' and the laws it produced would be delegated legislation. From this perspective, a 'better' way for Parliament to have expressed its wishes would have been for the 1911 Act to have characterised the laws made by the Commons and King as measures 'equivalent in effect to Acts of Parliament' and to have styled them not as 'Acts of Parliament' but as 'Parliament Act legislation'.

The second reason relates to the intrinsic illogicality of s 1 and s 2. The 'Money Bill Parliament' is manifestly stated—in unambiguously literal terms—to be a law-making body of very limited competence: its powers are restricted to measures dealing with the subject matter identified in s 1 itself. Similarly, s 2(1) places express limitations on the results that can be produced by the 'other public Bill Parliament'; namely that it cannot ³² The original version of the Bill had not included the 'duration of Parliament' provision. During the Bill's passage, Conservative peers in the Lords proposed many additional restrictions on the powers of the Commons and King qua law-maker. None save the duration of Parliament clause were accepted by the Commons.

‘enact’ a Money Bill or a Bill which would extend the duration of a Parliament (ie the period between general elections) beyond five years. The notion expressed in both s 1 and s 2 that a law-maker can be both sovereign and subject to clear restraints on the scope of its powers is inherently oxymoronic.

The third reason—again stemming from the text of the Act itself—is the presence of the s 3 ouster clause. The purpose of an ouster clause is to protect governmental bodies from judicial review.³³ And the purpose of judicial review is to provide a mechanism for establishing that governmental bodies are acting within the limits of their powers. But there is no need to protect ‘Parliament’ from judicial review, since Parliament’s powers are unlimited. In seeking to protect the ‘Money Bill Parliament’ and the ‘other public Act Parliament’ from judicial review, the 1911 Act necessarily acknowledges that it was creating law-makers of limited competence.³⁴

The difficulties outlined above might indicate that any attempt to discern the meaning of the Act would have to attempt to reconcile its text with the purpose that it was intended to serve; or to frame the issue in another way, to identify the ‘mischief’ the Act was intended to cure. Perhaps the clearest indication of the way in which Asquith’s government saw the issue is found in Asquith’s addresses to his constituency voters in the January and December 1910 general elections.

In January, Asquith identified the problem in the following terms:

The claim of the House of Lords to control finance is novel, and a mere usurpation. But the experience of the Parliament which has today been dissolved shows that the possession of an unlimited veto by a partisan people, however clearly expressed, is always liable to be rendered inoperative. . . . [A] Liberal majority in the House of Commons, as has been demonstrated during the last four years, is, under existing conditions, impotent to place on the Statute-book the very measures which it was sent to Westminster to carry in to law.

It is absurd to speak of this system as though it secured to us any of the advantages of a Second Chamber, in the sense in which that term is understood and practically interpreted in every other democratic country.

The limitation of the veto is the first and most urgent step to be taken; for it is the condition precedent to the attainment of the great legislative reforms which our party has at heart. . . .

In December, he argued:

The appeal which is now being made to you and to the country at large may almost be said to be narrowed to a single issue. But upon its determination, in one sense or the other, hangs the whole future of Democratic government.

Are the people, through their freely chosen representatives, to have control, not only over finance and administrative Policy, but over the making of their law? Or are we to continue in the one-sided system under which a Tory majority, however small in size and casual in creation, has a free run of the Statute Book, while from Liberal legislation, however clear may be the message of the polls, the forms of the Constitution persistently withhold a fair and even chance?

³³ See ‘Ouster clauses—Gilmore (1957) and Anisminic (1969)’, ch 3, pp 76–78 above.

³⁴ One might further wonder why such a provision was thought necessary if one recalls that Art 9 of the Bill of Rights provides a general ouster clause in respect of ‘proceedings in Parliament’. The Speaker’s certificate would presumably be a ‘proceeding’ for these purposes. See ‘The political source of parliamentary sovereignty—the “glorious revolution”’, ch 2, pp 24–29 above and ‘What are “proceedings in parliament”?’’, ch 8, pp 241–243 below. It might also be noted that Art 9 is a device intended to protect not Parliament, but the Commons and Lords, from judicial scrutiny. The point is discussed in ch 8.

The ‘mischief’ which Asquith identifies here is a narrow one; namely that the House of Lords has the capacity to prevent legal effect being given to government-promoted Bills (‘Liberal legislation’) addressing policy matters attracting discernible popular approval (‘the message of the polls’).

The legal question raised by the 1911 Act is essentially this: would the courts accept that the Commons and Monarch (using either the s 1 or s 2 procedure) were in legal terms a ‘subordinate legislature’, and thus entertain the possibility that a measure produced by the Commons and Monarch could be ultra vires their law-making power? The consequential question arising if the first proposition was accepted would be: ‘Just what was the extent of the vires granted to the Commons and King by the 1911 Act?’

The s 2 procedure was used twice shortly after the 1911 Act came into force. The Government of Ireland Act 1914, which provided for the creation of an Irish Parliament with substantial law-making powers was ‘enacted’ in 1914 under s 2. The same procedure was used for the Welsh Church Disestablishment Act 1915. Neither measure was subjected to any legal challenge as being used to achieve an objective beyond the powers of the King and Commons.

The Salisbury Doctrine and the Parliament Act 1949

The scope for conflict between the Commons and Lords was reduced virtually to vanishing point for much of the period between 1916 and 1945. For many of these years, the government was a multi-party coalition involving the Conservative, Liberal and Labour parties. In that political context, the government had no need to resort to law-making powers granted to the Commons and King by the 1911 Act. The evident convergence of policy objectives for Conservative, Liberal and (most) Labour MPs necessarily meant that there was no obvious opposition faction for Conservative peers to represent, and little scope for the Lords to claim it represented the national interest against a partisan Commons. In one commentator’s view, the Lords in 1945 was ‘a wasted and powerless assembly. It had long ceased to play any remotely significant role in government.’³⁵ The failure of successive governments since 1911 to promote legislation to give effect to the declaration in the 1911 Act’s preamble that the composition of the Lords would be given a representative basis also lent the upper house an increasingly anachronistic character. From 1930 onwards, the electorate had embraced virtually all adult men and women; the Commons could plausibly be portrayed as the representative of ‘the people’ in a comprehensive sense. The upper house, in contrast remained an almost entirely hereditary body.

The Salisbury doctrine

The 1945 general election produced a large Commons majority for the Labour Party. The Labour Party had fought that election on the basis of a radical policy program which included commitments to introduce a comprehensive welfare state and to nationalise many private sector industries. It was not however clear that the Lords, whose members remained overwhelmingly Conservative,³⁶ would pass the necessary Bills. The prospect arose that the Lords would exercise its powers under the 1911 Act to delay such Bills for two parliamentary sessions.

This stance would have been quite legal. Moreover, the Labour Party’s massive Commons majority had been achieved with only 48% of the popular vote. One could see, as in 1906, some basis for arguing that the Labour government’s radical plans did not enjoy universal support. Nonetheless, in recognition of these changed political circumstances, Conservative peers adopted a new convention concerning their powers under the 1911 Act. The convention, known as the Salisbury doctrine (after the fifth Marquess of Salisbury, then leader of the Conservative peers and a descendant of the Lord Salisbury mentioned above), was that the Lords would not even delay any Bill canvassed in the government's 1945 election manifesto.

³⁵ Adonis (1993) op cit p 230.

³⁶ See table 6.1 above.

The inverse correlation between the degree of 'democracy' shaping the composition of the Commons and the conventional extent of the Lords' powers again seems to explain this change. But the Salisbury doctrine structured the Lords' legislative role only while the majority of peers accepted its principles. For the 1945–1950 Labour government, the doctrine had two flaws. The first was that a Lords' majority for self-restraint could not always be relied upon. The second was a question of time. Because the Lords retained a three-session/two-year suspensory power in respect of public Bills other than Money Bills, the government could only be sure of getting its proposed legislation through both houses if it began more than two sessions before the end of Parliament's five-year term.

The Parliament Act 1949

The Labour government found this possible obstacle to 'enactment' of its planned legislative program unacceptably restrictive, so used the 1911 Act procedure to introduce the Parliament Act 1949. This second Parliament Act reduced the Lords' delaying power to two sessions/one year. The Bill was introduced in 1947, and was rejected three times in the House of Lords. The Lords' refusal to pass the Bill was arguably quite consistent with the new Salisbury doctrine convention, as the Labour Party had not expressly intimated prior to the 1945 election that it wished to see the 1911 Act amended in this way. The Labour Party's 1945 election manifesto had included the statement that: '[W]e give clear notice that we will not tolerate obstruction of the people's will by the House of Lords.' This might readily be thought to fall some way short of being 'clear notice' that the electorate was being asked to approve a governmental programme which might involve further curtailment of the upper house's powers by use of the 1911 Act. Some suggestions were made during the Bill's passage that use of the 1911 Act procedure would be 'unconstitutional', in that the 1911 Act had not been intended to be used to curb the Lords' powers any further. As in 1914 and 1915, however, that assertion was not put to a legal test.

The 1949 Act coincided with a cross-party initiative to produce agreement on reforms to the Lords' composition and powers. The Bryce recommendations as to functions of a second chamber were broadly approved; agreement was reached on the principles that this body should be a reformed House of Lords rather than a new institution, and that its composition 'should be such as to secure as far as practicable that a permanent majority is not secured for any one political party.'³⁷

No significant changes were made, and it appeared that the Lords might simply fade into obsolescence. In the mid-1950s, attendance averaged sixty members. It seemed the upper house would become a quaint historical relic. However things did not turn out like that.

II. The House of Lords in the modern era

This section examines four episodes in the Lords' recent history: the introduction of life peerages; the proposed 1968 reforms; the Lords' role in the 1974–1979 Parliament; and some aspects of the relationship between the upper house and the Thatcher governments.

³⁷ Jenkins op cit pp 281–282.

Life peerages

In the late 1800s, the constitutional theorist Walter Bagehot had observed that:

with a perfect Lower House it is certain that an Upper House would scarcely be of any value. But...beside the actual House [of Commons] a revising and leisured legislature is extremely useful.³⁸

By the mid-1950s, the House of Commons was getting evermore overloaded, both as a legislator and as a scrutiniser of the executive. We saw in chapter five that successive governments have promoted various changes to the Commons' internal workings to try to address this problem; a task which, we might defensibly conclude, was undertaken with varying degrees of sincerity. In the 1950s, rather than radically reform the lower house, the Conservative government looked to the Lords to lighten the Commons' burden.

The 1958 Life Peerages Act introduced a new category of member to the Lords. 'Life peers' were appointed by the monarch on the advice of the Prime Minister. They were entitled to sit, speak and vote in the upper house, but could not pass on their titles when they died. Life Peers have generally been people who made distinguished contributions to public life, such as MPs, trade unionists, military personnel, businessmen and women, and a smaller number from the arts or universities.³⁹ The new class of peer meant that the upper chamber was better equipped to perform its complementary function. The infusion of life peers with broad expertise and experience enabled the Lords to counter criticism that it was just peopled by elderly landowners. The characteristics of life peers do not mirror those of the general population—but neither of course do those of MPs.⁴⁰

The shift by 1911 in the Lords' role from co-equality with the Commons to complementarity had lent some impetus to arguments in favour of diluting the hereditary element in the upper house. As expertise and ability became increasingly important requirements for the second chamber, so the intellectual shortcomings of hereditary peers caused greater dissatisfaction, and the pressure for adding appointed members intensified. The 1958 Act enjoyed some cross-party support, and was designed to strengthen the Lords' complementary relationship to the Commons. Complementarity was not viewed solely as a matter of doing some of the Commons' work. Viscount Samuel, 87 years old and a Minister in Asquith's 1911 government, attributed the need for reform to the entrenchment of party politics in the Commons. While regarding parties as a necessity, he feared that the rigidity of party discipline had produced: 'a considerable crushing of the independent mind' thereby excluding 'men and women who might be of the greatest value to the community, but who have not the time or the temperament... to face the turmoil and the preoccupations of strenuous Parliamentary life'.⁴¹

How effective life peers have been in equipping the Lords to perform its complementary functions is considered below. We might conclude this section by making a simple party political point. Even by 1990 life peers remained very much a minority within the Lords,⁴² and so made little impact on the Conservative majority, given the Conservative predispositions of most hereditary members.

³⁸ Quoted in Griffith and Ryle op cit p 455.

³⁹ Shell notes that of 601 life peers created between 1958 and 1991 204 were formerly MPs, 86 businessmen/women, 26 trade unionists, 65 academics, 35 local councillors, 19 civil servants, 9 military personnel, 30 lawyers, 11 doctors, 15 journalists, and 50 other types of public servant: (1992) op cit p 40.

⁴⁰ See Adonis (1993) op cit ch 3; Silk op cit ch 2.

⁴¹ Quoted in Weare V (1964) 'The House of Lords—prophecy and fulfilment' Parliamentary Affairs 422.

⁴² In July 1992, the house had 1205 members. 26 were clerics, 20 were Law Lords, 382 were life peers. 777 were hereditary peers; Adonis (1993) op cit p 194.

Table 6.3 Party allegiance of life peers created between 1958 and 1991

| Prime Minister | Period | C | L | Lib | CB | Total | Hereditary Peers |
|------------------|---------|----|----|-----|----|-------|------------------|
| Macmillan/Home | 1958–64 | 17 | 29 | 1 | 18 | 65 | 870 |
| Wilson | 1964–70 | 11 | 78 | 6 | 46 | 141 | 850 |
| Heath | 1970–74 | 23 | 5 | 3 | 15 | 46 | 820 |
| Wilson/Callaghan | 1974–79 | 17 | 82 | 6 | 34 | 139 | 805 |
| Thatcher | 1979–90 | 99 | 45 | 10 | 45 | 199 | 780 |
| Major | 1990 | 6 | 5 | 1 | 1 | 13 | 777 |

Key: C = Conservative; L = Labour; Lib = Liberal/SDP; CB = Cross-bench. Figures for hereditary peers are approximate only.

Source: Compiled from information in Shell D (1992) op cit, table 2.2; Griffiths and Ryle op cit p 457; Adonis (1993) op cit p 194.

Labour Prime Ministers made substantial efforts to increase non-Conservative representation (see table 6.3), but among Conservative governments, only the Macmillan and Home administrations followed suit. Barely a quarter of the peers created by the Thatcher governments took the Labour or Liberal whip,⁴³ and since cross-benchers voted predominantly for Conservative policies,⁴⁴ it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the introduction of life peers led the Lords some way towards the situation advocated by Lord Lansdowne, and feared by Asquith, in 1911—namely a Conservative house which could invoke its more expert members as a partial justification for obstructing Labour government policy. Appointing peers remained a non-justiciable issue, although a ‘political honours committee’, comprising three privy councillors, played a limited role in ensuring that the Prime Minister’s nominees were not entirely unsuitable.

The 1968 reforms

In 1964, Labour Prime Minister Harold Wilson warned the upper house that if it delayed government Bills: ‘we shall seek a mandate to amend the Parliament Act so as to end the Lords’ power to block Commons legislation’.⁴⁵ The Salisbury convention made such obstruction unlikely. However the Lords initially blocked the War Damage Bill 1965, which, as noted in chapter four, retrospectively reversed Burmah Oil. A Lords amendment removed the Bill’s retrospective element, but this was promptly reversed by the Commons, whereupon the Marquess of Salisbury, defending the convention bearing his name, persuaded peers to allow the Bill to proceed. The Act provides an interesting example of a dispute between the Lords and Commons which did not have a simple party political basis, since the Bill enjoyed cross-party Commons support. Given the Act’s incompatibility with most perceptions of the rule of law, the Lords’ stance might be thought consistent with the role of ‘watchdog of the constitution’. Equally important however, is the indication the controversy gives of the Lords’ impotence when opposing policies supported by Conservatives in the Commons.

The episode may have strengthened the government’s resolve to maintain a bipartisan approach to reform, for it established an All Party Committee to consider the future of the upper house. The Committee’s main innovation was to recommend dividing the Lords into two categories—voting and non-voting peers. Only life peers would be entitled to vote. The monarch could bestow life peerages on hereditary Lords, but they would have to give up their titles to vote in the new house.

⁴³ Adonis op cit pp 232–233.

⁴⁴ Shell op cit pp 91–92.

⁴⁵ Quoted in Weare op cit p 432.

The bipartisan approach collapsed in June 1967 when the Lords used, for the first time, the power left to them by the 1949 Parliament Act to veto delegated legislation. In November 1968 the Labour government produced a White Paper, House of Lords Reform.⁴⁶ The continuity in this area of constitutional development is well illustrated by the close correspondence between the White Paper's view of the Lords' appropriate legislative role, and that of the Bryce Commission. The second chamber should serve as a forum for public debate; as a reviser of Bills introduced in the Commons; as an initiator of Bills on less party politicised issues; and as a scrutiniser of the executive and of delegated legislation.

The White Paper's proposals closely resembled the ideas of the All Party Committee, and was enthusiastically endorsed by the Lords. However the Bill introducing the proposals encountered substantial Commons opposition. Right wing Conservatives attacked it for going too far, while Labour's left wing thought that it did not go far enough.⁴⁷ The government subsequently withdrew the Bill in 1969. Between 1969 and 1999 there were no governmental attempts to promote legislation to alter the upper house's powers or composition. This does not mean, however, that the Lords did not generate appreciable constitutional controversy in that period.

The 1974–1979 parliament

Between 1974 and 1979, Britain had a Labour government which never had a majority of more than four in the Commons. Consequently, the government found it very difficult even to get Bills through the lower house. It faced even more difficulties in the Lords. As table 6.4 shows, these Labour governments enjoyed only minoritarian support in terms of the share of the vote they won at the two general elections of that year. Furthermore, the government suffered several by-election defeats and defections in the course of the Parliament, which temporarily left it in a Commons minority.

For a brief period after 1977, the Labour and Liberal parties formed a 'pact', in which the Liberals guaranteed their support in return for some policy concessions. This might be argued to have enhanced the government's legitimacy (in a crude majoritarian sense), as the parties combined share of the vote at the last general election exceeded 50%. Despite its weak Parliamentary and electoral position, the 1974–1979 government pursued radical economic policies. This combination of a clearly factional legislative programme by a government with a precarious Commons majority and limited popular support presented the upper house with several difficult questions as to its 'correct' constitutional role.

During the 1959–1964 Parliament, when the Conservatives were in government, there were 299 votes in the Lords. The government was defeated on eleven occasions—3.7% of the time. Between 1974 and 1979, the Lords had 445 divisions. The Labour government was defeated on some 355 occasions—80% of the time.

Such bald statistics obviously support arguments that the Lords continued to be a Conservative chamber. However we ought to qualify those figures a little. In almost all cases between 1974 and 1979 the Lords gave way if the Commons sent the Bill back. The government's policies were not being vetoed (a power which the Lords no longer possessed), nor even being delayed for the full period permitted by the 1949 Act. Nevertheless, they were being obstructed. Passing a Bill can be a protracted process, and the Commons only has limited time for this task. By constantly refusing to approve government measures, ⁴⁶ Cmnd 3799.

⁴⁷ Shell op cit pp 21–23.

Table 6.4 The 1974 General Elections—seats won and share of vote

| | February | October |
|--------------|-------------|-------------|
| Labour | 301 (37.1%) | 319 (39.2%) |
| Liberal | 14 (19.3%) | 13 (18.3%) |
| Conservative | 297 (37.9%) | 277 (35.8%) |
| Others | 23 (5.7%) | 26 (6.7%) |

Source: Butler and Sloman op cit p 186.

Table 6.5 Government defeats in the Lords 1964–1986

| Period | Governing Party | Number of defeats |
|---------|-----------------|-------------------|
| 1964–70 | Labour | 116 |
| 1970–74 | Conservative | 26 |
| 1974–79 | Labour | 355 |
| 1979–86 | Conservative | 100 |

Source: Brazier R (1990) Constitutional texts p 527.

and requiring the Commons to consider issues again, the Lords significantly impeded government policy. Whether it was constitutionally acceptable for the Lords to do so raises a difficult question, which we might try to answer by briefly considering two of the measures on which the houses disagreed.

The Trade Union and Labour Relations (Amendment) Bill and the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Bill

The first Bill was intended to amend the 1974 Trade Union and Labour Relations Act. The Act was concerned with regulating compulsory trade union membership (the ‘closed shop’) in the workplace; the amending Bill was intended to restrict the circumstances in which employees could refuse to join a union without risking dismissal from their jobs.

The substantive issue seized upon by Conservative and cross-bench peers was their wish to provide additional safeguards for newspaper editors whose freedom of expression was thought to be jeopardised if they had to join a trade union. The government proposed a ‘Charter’ safeguarding editorial independence, but declined to give it legal force. A Lords amendment to make the Charter enforceable in the courts was passed, reversed in the Commons, but then insisted upon by the Lords. Amid government threats both of a mass creation of peers and of resort to the Parliament Acts, the government’s position was eventually accepted by a Lords majority of thirty-seven.

The controversy over the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Bill, intended to bring these industries into public ownership, was equally intense. This policy was an acute source of disagreement between the Conservative and Labour Parties. The Bill’s Commons passage, during which the government’s proposals were substantially amended, provoked furious controversy. The government frequently guillotined debate, and on one occasion a government whip was accused of deliberately breaking a pairing agreement in a division which the government won on the Speaker’s casting vote. Conservative peers, joined by cross-benchers and some Labour members, insisted upon several wrecking amendments. The government then initiated the Parliament Act procedures, but following consultation with the opposition, a much amended Bill was passed some months later.

The constitutionality of the Lords' behaviour on these occasions is debatable.⁴⁸ Both measures were included in the Labour Party's 1974 election manifesto, and so were nominally within the Salisbury convention. Yet both were highly contentious Bills, for which there were only the barest Commons majorities. Lord Carrington, then leader of the Conservative peers, saw no shortcomings in the Lords' position. The Lords was invoking its powers: 'for the purpose for which they were given to us—that is as an opportunity for further consultation, for second thoughts'.⁴⁹

Again, however, we are drawn to the impact of convention in undermining the legitimacy of undoubtedly legal behaviour. Shell has suggested that the Lords committed a tactical blunder in the years following World War II by adopting the conventional practice of appearing unwilling to use its delaying powers. Shell argues that this lent an unwarranted degree of constitutional significance to a power envisaged by the framers of the 1911 and 1949 Parliaments as a routine part of the legislative process. It was precisely because this power had become delegitimised through disuse that the events of 1976 and 1977 provoked such a constitutional furore.⁵⁰

The experience of the 1974–1979 Parliament led the Labour Party to pledge to abolish the House of Lords altogether if it won the next general election. It did not succeed at the polls however, and subsequent Conservative governments displayed no inclination formally to amend the status quo. Yet one would be mistaken in assuming that the relationship between the upper house and the Thatcher governments was unproblematic.

The House of Lords and the Thatcher governments

The Thatcher governments of 1979–1990 assumed office, as did Asquith's Liberals in 1906, and Attlee's Labour Party in 1945, committed to implementing a radical policy agenda. Furthermore, just like Asquith's and Attlee's administrations, the Thatcher governments enjoyed substantial Commons majorities gained with less than 50% electoral support.

Shell records that the Thatcher administrations were defeated 155 times in the Lords between 1979 and 1990. Sixty-three defeats were accepted by the government, and on thirty occasions a compromise was reached; the remainder were rejected.⁵¹ As the

Table 6.6 The 1979, 1983 and 1987 elections—seats won and share of vote

| | 1979 | 1983 | 1987 |
|--------------|------------|------------|------------|
| Conservative | 339 (43.1) | 397 (42.4) | 376 (42.3) |
| Labour | 269 (36.9) | 209 (27.6) | 292 (30.8) |
| Liberal* | 11 (13.8) | 23 (25.4) | 22 (22.6) |

* 1983 and 1987 includes the SDP.

Source: Compiled from information in Norton P (1991) The British Polity pp 97–99.

⁴⁸ See Burton I and Drewry G (1978) 'Public legislation: a survey of the sessions of 1975/76 and 1976/77' Parliamentary Affairs 140.

⁴⁹ Quoted in Adonis (1993) op cit p 227.

⁵⁰ Shell (1992) op cit pp 246–253.

⁵¹ Shell (1992) op cit ch 7.

decade progressed, the government became increasingly unwilling to accommodate their Lordships' opinions, with the result that Conservative MPs experienced the inconveniences engendered by the need to be present in the Commons to vote to reverse Lords' amendments.⁵²

The reasons for the frequency of conflict between the Lords and Commons in this era are difficult to quantify precisely. One contributory explanation may be that Conservatives in the Commons had become significantly more right wing in their political beliefs than the Conservative peers; such differences of opinion were clearly evident in respect of criminal justice legislation in the early 1980s. Another factor may have been the profound disarray among the Labour, Liberal and Social Democrat parties in the Commons, which perhaps convinced some peers that they were the only people capable of providing effective parliamentary opposition to Thatcherite policies.

The most acute cause of tension between the Thatcher government and the Lords arose over differences in opinion as to the appropriate constitutional role of local government (an issue considered in detail in chapter ten). The government suffered temporary defeats on several minor issues, such as an attempt to abolish free bus passes for schoolchildren in rural areas, and a clause in the 1985 Housing Bill which sought to force local authorities and housing associations to sell special sheltered accommodation for the elderly. The Lords inflicted more significant reversals on government plans to reform the structure of local government in 1985, and the system of local taxation in 1987 and 1988.⁵³

Backwoodsmen—the voting house and the working house

The government's eventual success on the latter issues required it to draw on the so-called 'backwoodsmen'—hereditary Tory peers who took no real part in the life of the house. They rarely attended or contributed to debates but were occasionally prepared to vote when it seemed likely a Conservative government would be defeated on a major issue. No such resource was ever available to a Labour government, but backwoodsmen were a weapon of last resort even for a Conservative government in serious parliamentary difficulties. Because these peers were so disinterested in the day-to-day responsibilities of legislative activity, they were not very responsive to the government whip. Two or three calls in any parliamentary session was the most that a Conservative government could rely on.

For many observers, even one call was one too many. Since the Lords' continued legitimacy depended upon its members gaining a reputation for independent thought and expert abilities, the rapid influx of peers who never demonstrated any legislative skills, and who were clearly acting under party orders, enhanced neither the dignity nor the authority of the house.

The problem of backwoodsmen led to the suggestion that one could draw a distinction between the 'working house' and the 'voting house'.⁵⁴ In the 1980s, the working house—those peers who attended regularly and contributed to debate—was fairly evenly divided between government and the opposition. This can create the impression that the Lords could be as powerful an obstacle to a Conservative government as to a Labour administration. However the voting house, which included the backwoodsmen, was so heavily ⁵² See particularly Shell D (1985) 'The House of Lords and the Thatcher government' Parliamentary Affairs 16; Adonis A (1988) 'The House of Lords in the 1980s' Parliamentary Affairs 380.

⁵³ See Welfare D (1992) 'The Lords in defence of local government' Parliamentary Affairs 205; and ch 10 below.

⁵⁴ Adonis (1985) op cit (1993) op cit pp 198–199; Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 465–466.

Conservative that government policies were not seriously threatened.⁵⁵ This led to the apparently unsatisfactory circumstance in which Lords debates suggested that majority sentiment opposed the government, only for the non-working Lords to appear and safeguard government policy when the vote was held.

The backwoodsmen problem would have disappeared had the 1968 reforms been enacted. It would no doubt have been a simple matter for a determined government with a reliable Commons majority to enact a third Parliament Act to achieve that objective. A more difficult question is how effectively the 'working house' performed its role.

III. The work of the House of Lords today

Most commentators agree that the Lords became a more important element of the government process from 1960 onwards. Adonis speaks of a 'remarkable revival'; Shell of a 'much better attended and a partly professional House'.⁵⁶ As table 6.7 indicates, the time the Lords devotes to its tasks has increased markedly since 1950. This section centres on four areas in which the Lords might have played an obviously complementary role to the Commons, areas canvassed in the Bryce Report and/or the 1967 White Paper; deliberation on matters of public concern; revision and initiation of legislation; consideration of delegated legislation; and scrutiny of the executive.

Several characteristics of the Lords distinguish it from the Commons. Perhaps most significant was its less structured party discipline. In part this resulted from peers' non-elected status, which freed them from any need to cater to the prejudices of their local constituency associations. The weaker grip exercised by party loyalties over peers' behaviour also accrued from their age and backgrounds; for peers at the end of their careers or with substantial extra-parliamentary interests 'the bait of Ministerial office dangled so effectively in the Commons is missing'.⁵⁷ The major parties maintain formal organisations within the house, for which they receive limited public funds, and also have a whipping system, albeit of an exhortatory rather than directory nature. A peer's behaviour must be egregious before he/she suffers withdrawal of the whip.⁵⁸

The Lords preserved a more negotiatory approach to timetabling its business than the Commons. Government business has no formal priority; that it enjoys that status de facto is the result of the maintenance of conciliatory relations between the parties and cross-benchers through the upper house's variant of the 'usual channels'.

The more loosely disciplined nature of the Lords was further evidenced by the absence of a Speaker with coercive powers over procedure. The Lord Chancellor presided over the House in a formal sense, but regulation of peers' behaviour was a matter for the peers themselves. The chamber was 'guided' on such matters by the Leader of the House. The Lords sporadically considered the desirability of creating an office similar to that of the Speaker of the Commons,⁵⁹ but until 2006 preferred to rely on members' good manners to maintain decorous standards. The Lords did establish the post of 'Lord Speaker' in 2006.⁶⁰ The Lord Speaker now has responsibility for presiding over debates in the house, ⁵⁵ See particularly Adonis' demolition of the claim made by Lord Denham, government chief whip, that: 'However you calculate it, the Conservative Party has no overall majority in your Lordship's House' (1988) op cit pp 381–382.

⁵⁶ (1993) op cit p 226; (1992) op cit p 28.

⁵⁷ Griffith and Ryle op cit p 510.

⁵⁸ For examples see Shell (1992) op cit pp 93–94.

⁵⁹ See Burrows H (1964) 'House of Lords: change or decay?' Parliamentary Affairs 403; Oliver D (2004) 'Constitutionalism and the abolition of the role of the Lord Chancellor' Parliamentary Affairs 754.

⁶⁰ See <http://www.parliament.uk/about/how/principal/lord_speaker.cfm>.

Table 6.7 House of Lords: sitting hours and attendance 1950–1985

| Session | Sitting Days | Sitting Hours | Attendance |
|-----------|--------------|---------------|------------|
| 1950–1951 | 96 | 292 | 86 |
| 1960–1961 | 125 | 599 | 142 |
| 1970–1971 | 153 | 966 | 265 |
| 1980–1981 | 143 | 920 | 296 |
| 1985–1986 | 165 | 1213 | 317 |
| 1995–1996 | 136 | 885 | 372 |

Source: Griffith and Ryle op cit p 472; Baldwin N (1999) ‘The membership and work of the House of Lords’, p 47, in Dickson and Carmichael (eds) The House of Lords: its parliamentary and judicial roles (Oxford: Hart Publishing).

although she lacks the disciplinary powers wielded by the Speaker in the Commons. She also plays a prominent ambassadorial role, representing the house to the outside world and receiving visitors on the house’s behalf. The rules relating to the post provide for the Lord Speaker to be elected by the members of the house, to serve for up to two five-year terms. The Lord Speaker must foreswear any party political allegiance while she occupies the post, and may not vote on any matters.

Deliberation

It is often said that debates on matters of general public concern in the Lords are of a higher quality than in the Commons. This is partly because many members have considerable expertise in particular areas, and partly because party loyalty is not as unswerving as in the Commons. As Griffith and Ryle suggest: ‘such subjective judgements are impossible either to prove or to refute’.⁶¹ One can undoubtedly point to debates on major issues where speakers have brought a formidable body of knowledge and experience to bear on the issue concerned; reform of the legal profession, the administration of justice, and foreign and commonwealth relations are areas where the upper house possesses considerable expertise.⁶² The quality of debate, in the sense of its capacity fully to explore the substance of the issue in question, rather than simply advance a partisan response, is aided by the more muted nature of party politics and the more relaxed procedural regime. However, if one construes the ‘quality’ of debate in terms of its influence on subsequent policy, the Lords’ success is far more difficult to quantify. Adonis concludes that Lords’ debates ‘rarely have an impact on policy which is more than minor and indirect’; while Shell maintains that: ‘Almost everyone involved with the House acknowledges that a great deal of what is said there is worthless’.⁶³

Less cynically, one might suggest that as a deliberative chamber the Lords functions more as a sounding board than as crucial contributor to policy formation over the full range of government activities. Debate in the upper house seems to have significant influence only in areas where the Lords combines expertise with personal interests in matters which are fairly non-contentious in the party political sense, such as legal reform, issues concerning the elderly, and policies affecting agriculture and the countryside. The percentage of the Lords' workload devoted to deliberative activities has declined since 1980; from over 25% in 1979 to barely 14% in 1988.⁶⁴ This could be construed as an indication that the upper house has become less enamoured with its reflective role in recent years, but it may also be due to rather more practical pressures.

⁶¹ Op cit p 497. ⁶² Shell (1992) op cit pp 188–194; Adonis (1993) op cit p 194.

⁶³ Adonis (1993) op cit p 216; Shell (1992) op cit p 198.

Revision of legislation

The reduction in the percentage of Lords' time spent on general debate has been more than matched by an increase in attention devoted to its purely legislative role. By 1989, 60% of the house's sitting hours were consumed by the revision of legislation, the overwhelming majority of which originated in the Commons.⁶⁵ We have already considered the (now limited) circumstances in which the Lords might reject a Bill. In quantitative terms, the Lords' revisionary role is primarily concerned with constructive rather than destructive amendment.

The lower profile of party loyalty and greater procedural flexibility in the Lords supposedly enables the upper house to do a better job of revising proposed legislation than the Commons. Peers are assumed to be less firmly wedded to party ideology, and so more willing to accept that Bills may contain technical flaws. The presence of a substantial number of cross-bench peers reinforces this assumption. Relatedly, the growing breadth of experience and expertise among life peers make it likely that the upper house can muster an informed audience for even the most esoteric of government legislative proposals.

Superficially, a Bill's passage through the Lords mirrors that in the Commons. There are however certain important differences. The house does not have a guillotine procedure: rather it relies on peers themselves to ensure that their spoken contributions are pertinent and concise. Perhaps more importantly, the Lords traditionally did not have a standing committee structure: the committee stage is generally taken on the floor of the house. The committee stage is presided over by the Chairman of Committees, a salaried post, to which a peer is appointed by the house each parliamentary session. During this period, the Chairman must detach her/himself from any party political activities.

The committee stage has latterly accounted for almost half of the time the upper chamber has given to its legislative functions.⁶⁶ The Lords has conducted sporadic experiments with standing committees in the past forty years, but none were regarded as a success.⁶⁷ In 1993/94, the Lords made a further effort in this regard, by considering five relatively uncontroversial Bills under the so-called 'Jellicoe procedure'. Pressure on time is further increased, almost comically, by the physical process of walking through division lobbies whenever a vote on an amendment is taken: forty hours were spent simply on voting in the 1985–1986 session.⁶⁸

Table 6.7 charts the apparently substantial growth in the Lords' activities. One should not read too much into workload statistics, for crude figures often conceal vast variations in the complexity or importance of nominally equivalent subject matter. Many amendments may be introduced at the government's request, to remedy defects which escaped the Commons' attention. While this may be a valuable function for the upper house to fulfill, it raises the danger of the Lords becoming a convenient dumping ground for dealing with legislative minutiae which the Commons is unwilling to address.⁶⁹ A related ⁶⁴ Griffith and Ryle op cit p 473.

⁶⁵ Griffith and Ryle op cit p 473.

⁶⁶ Griffith and Ryle op cit p 483.

⁶⁷ Shell (1992) op cit pp 140–142; Borthwick R (1973) 'Public Bill Committees in the House of Lords' Parliamentary Affairs 440.

⁶⁸ Adonis (1993) op cit p 241.

⁶⁹ Adonis (1993) op cit pp 240–242.

problem is the government's recurring failure to spread the Lords legislative load evenly through the parliamentary session, with the result that the upper house faces impossibly onerous tasks which cannot be discharged in any meaningful way.⁷⁰

Given the then Conservative majority in the Lords, it is safe to conclude that many of the amendments carried against government wishes during the 1980s were not motivated by simple party political bias. Yet as Adonis observes: 'On not a single occasion since 1979 has the Lords insisted on one of its amendments once overturned by the Commons'.⁷¹ A Lords amendment against the government may be significant when the government has only a small Commons majority, for the reasoning behind the Lords' decision might persuade wavering backbench MPs not to follow the party line. But when faced with a cohesive Conservative majority in the lower house, the Lords latterly resembled a constitutional watchdog long deprived of any significant bite, and only rarely willing to bark.

One notable recent exception to this trend was the Lords' refusal to pass the War Crimes Bill. This Bill was intended to impose retrospective criminal liability for war crimes committed in World War II by foreign nationals who had subsequently become British citizens. The Bill received clear cross-party support in the Commons. However a similar cross-party consensus in the Lords rejected it for what would appear to be, pace the War Damage Act, 'rule of law' type reasons—namely opposition in principle to retrospective legislation.⁷² The Lords' behaviour prompted even some Conservative MPs to question the constitutional defensibility of a non-elected chamber frustrating the elected house, but predictions of a constitutional crisis when the government used the Parliament Acts procedure proved unfounded.

The upper house also inflicted several defeats on the Major government's Criminal Justice Bill in 1994, relating to matters of sentencing policy and the conduct of criminal trials. Most defeats were reversed in the Commons, but the government made several concessions to the upper house.⁷³ The Bill had been announced as a major plank of government policy by Home Secretary Michael Howard at the 1993 Conservative Party Conference. The Lords' intransigence might be seen either as an unacceptable barrier to the wishes of an elected government, or as a prudent means to ensure that important legislation was not unduly influenced by improperly partisan objectives.

Control of delegated legislation

The Lords retains co-equal status with the Commons over private Bills, although this is perhaps insufficiently important a topic to merit attention here. A more significant issue

Table 6.8 Lords amendments to government Bills 1970–1990

| Period | Bills | Bills amended | Total amendments |
|-----------|-------|---------------|------------------|
| 1970–1973 | 79 | 31 | 2366 |
| 1974–1977 | 68 | 49 | 1859 |
| 1979–1982 | 82 | 39 | 2231 |
| 1983–1986 | 69 | 43 | 4137 |
| 1987–1990 | 61 | 38 | 5181 |

Source: Shell (1992) op cit, p 144.

⁷⁰ The problem has been posed by governments of both parties; see Shell (1992) op cit pp 139–141; Drewry and Burton op cit. ⁷¹ (1993) op cit p 237.

⁷² See Richardson (1995) op cit.

⁷³ The Guardian 19 July 1994.

is the Lords' continued co-equality in respect of statutory instruments. Given the much greater resort made to such measures by modern governments, and the Commons' obvious shortcomings in monitoring their use, one might have expected this to be an area in which the upper house might function as a meaningful curb on government excesses. The formal parity between the two houses is emphasised by their equality of representation on the joint select committee which examines the technical propriety of such measures.

In respect of the substantive policy merits of delegated legislation, however, we can once again discern a large gap between the Lords' legal and conventional authority. The Lords has only once (in 1967) vetoed an order. By the mid-1980s, it appeared widely accepted that a repeat of such behaviour would breach convention.⁷⁴ The Lords' reticence may spring from a fear that exercising its veto would simply lead to a third Parliament Act removing their legal co-equality, but quite what purpose is served by possessing a legal power one will never use is unclear. This is perhaps another situation in which the Lords' legal powers have been delegitimised through disuse.

The house has fashioned several devices for expressing disapproval of government proposals without rejecting them. Motions signalling disagreement with or regret at an instrument may be moved and voted upon. Such devices may prove an embarrassment to the government, especially if they attract press publicity, but their value would appear to be more a symbolic affirmation of the Lords' independence than a practical constraint on executive action.

Scrutiny of the executive

As Bagehot observed, there would be little need for upper house scrutiny of executive behaviour if the Commons adequately performed that task. But the intensity of party discipline and paucity of investigatory resources in the lower house places stringent restrictions on the effectiveness of MPs' supervisory capacities. Consequently, there is appreciable scope for the Lords to complement the Commons in this respect.

Like the Commons, however, the Lords' scrutinising role is subject to resource constraints. These arise not simply, as in the Commons, from the limited office space and research assistance financed by the government, but also from more structural institutional sources. While it was commonplace for as many Ministers to sit in the Lords as in the Commons in the nineteenth century, almost all Ministers are now members of the lower house. Although modern Conservative governments have included several senior Ministers from the Lords, it is likely for a Labour government that the Lord Chancellor and Leader of the House will be the Lords' only two Cabinet Ministers. This poses obvious problems of accountability, simply because the politician responsible for the activities of most government departments is never present in the chamber. Occasional suggestions have been floated that all senior Ministers should be entitled to speak in either house, but none has been adopted.

The government's limited representation in the house also poses problems of competence. The practice which has consequently evolved is for politicians of sometimes limited experience to assume substantial departmental responsibilities at an early stage of their careers. The Labour Party suffered particular problems in finding sufficient frontbench spokespersons, particularly in opposition. Almost all Labour members were life peers, and as well as being older than many of their hereditary Conservative counterparts, they were ending their political careers—a junior ministerial or shadow post was therefore not an attractive proposition.

⁷⁴ Shell (1992) op cit p 219.

With the exception of a limited number of Ministerial posts, Leader of the Opposition, and Opposition Chief Whip, and the non-party political offices of Chairman and Principal Deputy Chairman of Committees, membership of the Lords is not salaried. While peers may claim reasonably generous expense allowances (over £200 per day) for days on which they attend the house, those lacking independent means cannot afford to be full-time politicians, a factor which necessarily reduces the time and energy peers can devote to examining government activities.

House of Lords' select committees

Lords' select committees are quite different creatures from their Commons' counterparts. Most are concerned purely with the house's own domestic and procedural matters.⁷⁵ The two permanent committees which have an explicitly extra-parliamentary outlook are the European Communities Committee and the Science and Technology Committee. Both are more appropriately seen as part of the Lords' deliberative rather than supervisory functions.

The EC Committee dates from 1974. Its main function is to evaluate proposed EC legislation before it is enacted, thereby equipping the British government with a wider knowledge base upon which to draw when participating in the EC's legislative process. The House has a salaried post, the Principal Deputy Chairman of Committees, primarily concerned with overseeing the EC Committee's activities. The Committee is also (relatively) quite well resourced, having a dozen research and secretarial staff, and being able to appoint paid advisers to offer specific expertise. Twenty-four peers sit on the Committee, which may appoint sub-committees to undertake detailed investigations of particular topics. The Committee produces many reports each year. Most attract a considered government response, but like much of the Lords' work, their practical impact is hard to discern.

The Science and Technology Committee has succeeded in becoming a highly regarded investigative forum. The Committee was established in 1980, and fills a gap left by the coverage of the Commons departmental select committees. Its fifteen members include life peers who are distinguished scientists, and it has sufficient resources to produce a substantial body of detailed reports. Griffith and Ryle neatly capture its character by describing it as 'the non-party political voice of the scientific community'.⁷⁶

IV. The 1999 reforms

Both the Labour and Liberal parties fought the 1992 general election on manifestos which included proposals to replace the Lords with some form of elected assembly. The Conservatives' victory at that election forestalled any possibility of reform, but did nothing to reduce the Lords' obvious weaknesses. The most evident of these derived from the house's composition. The Labour and Liberal parties saw no defensible basis for an hereditary form of membership in our modern society—expert and independent judgement is not a genetically transmitted trait. The essentially corrupt (because it is neither meritocratic nor representative) nature of the hereditary system was powerfully illustrated when the Earl of Hardwicke took his seat in 1995. This young man had been brought up in the West Indies and, according to a profile in The Times,⁷⁷ supplemented his inherited wealth by 'organising raves' and 'working in public relations'. Hardwicke, who seemingly ⁷⁵ The upper house has also made occasional use since 1972 of ad hoc select committees to inquire into matters of current public concern. For a list and evaluation see Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 494–495.

⁷⁶ Op cit p 494.

⁷⁷ See The Times 5 April 1995.

possessed neither any formidable intellectual powers nor any record of public service, did not find taking his seat a daunting experience: 'I had hundreds of cousins in the Lords... My cousin Lord Hesketh, the chief whip, was there when I took the oath and he led me to the Tory benches'.⁷⁸ He also observed that the Lords was: 'a wonderful place to take friends for lunch—although it should have a snooker table—and you always end up sitting next to someone interesting'.⁷⁹

The indefensibility of this situation arose both from the significant, unearned political status which Hardwicke himself acquired, and from the equally unearned addition which his seat made to the voting power of the Conservative Party. The Labour Party's 1997 election manifesto included a pledge that a Labour government would introduce a Bill that would remove hereditary peers from the Lords, although the manifesto did not make it clear if the party's preference was to simply retain the Lords on a life peer only basis, or whether it envisaged that the Lords might be transformed into an elected chamber. The Bill's prominent place in the manifesto should, in principle, have ensured that its passage was not blocked in the upper house. For peers to have rejected the Bill would have been a clear breach of the Salisbury convention. If the convention were to be respected, there would be no need for the government to invoke the Parliament Acts to bypass the Lords' refusal to approve the Bill.

The Conservative majority in the Lords did not however defer to the government's overwhelming Commons' majority. In 1998, the government introduced its sweeping Crime and Disorder Bill in the House of Lords. The Bill's initial passage through the upper house was uncontroversial. However, when the Bill came to the Commons, a Labour MP moved an amendment intended to equalise the age of consent to sexual relations for people of both heterosexual and homosexual orientation. The amendment received a majority of over 200 in the Commons in July 1998. On 23 July, the Bill was rejected by 290 votes to 122 in the Lords. Rather than risk losing the entire Bill, the government withdrew the amendment. The amendment had not been part of Labour's election manifesto, so its rejection by the Lords could not be regarded as a breach of the Salisbury convention. However the sentiments expressed by many peers who had opposed equalising the age of consent were distinctly bigoted and intolerant, which rather undermined the suggestion that the Lords served as a moderating force against a narrowly partisan Commons.

The Blair government subsequently affirmed its support for the equal age amendment by including an identical provision in its Sexual Offences (Amendment) Bill in 1998. This measure was supported by all three major parties in the Commons, but was rejected by the Lords. And once again, the rejection was cast in such intolerant and antediluvian terms that one might wonder if the government had deliberately offered the upper house the opportunity to discredit itself in public opinion; an opportunity which—if taken—would reduce any public disquiet about subsequent Lords reform.

By late 1998 the Conservative majority in the Lords had angered the government substantially by failing to respect the terms of the Salisbury convention. The Labour Party's 1997 election manifesto had promised that a Bill to reform the electoral system used to select British members of the European Parliament would be introduced for elections scheduled in May 1999. In autumn 1998, the Lords consistently refused to pass the Bill, on the disingenuous grounds that since the Labour manifesto had not specified precisely the new system that would be introduced, rejecting the measure did not breach the Salisbury convention. As in 1910 and 1911, the Conservative majority in the Lords was ⁷⁸ The Times 5 April 1995.

⁷⁹ The Times 5 April 1995.

fully supported by the Conservative opposition in the Commons— characterising the Lords majority as ‘Mr Hague’s poodle’⁸⁰ would seem entirely apposite.

Had the Blair government harboured any doubts about proceeding with reform of the Lords, the European elections controversy would have dispelled it. The details of the reform emerged late in 1998, amid an extraordinary breakdown of discipline within the Conservative shadow cabinet. In an attempt to forestall opposition to reform in the upper house, the Blair government had negotiated an agreement with the leader of the Conservative peers, Lord Cranborne, that ninety-two hereditary peers could continue to sit in the house. Cranborne had not informed his shadow cabinet colleagues of these negotiations, and was promptly dismissed from the shadow cabinet when they were revealed. Bizarrely, the Conservative Party then decided to support the arrangement.⁸¹

The last weeks of the unreformed Lords’ life were a farrago of pantomime and farce. The government had decided that the ninety-two hereditary members who would sit in the new house should be ‘elected’ by the hereditary peers.⁸² Candidates were permitted to issue a seventy-five word ‘manifesto’ supporting their cause. The documents which emerged prompted the thought that the Blair government had again taken the chance to allow the hereditary peers to make themselves appear ridiculous. Viscount Monckton’s manifesto announced:

I support the Queen and all the royal family... All cats to be muzzled outside to stop the agonising torture of small birds.... LEVEL UP, not level down. God willing.

Earl Alexander of Tunis invoked more nationalistic sentiments:

By the living God who made me, but I love this country.... I will struggle with all I have to offer: For her democracy, her integrity, her sovereignty, her independence, her self-government, her crown and the rights and ancient freedoms of her people.

Having entered the realms of the absurd in the run-up to the hereditaries’ ‘election’, the house then moved to the surreal in October 1999 at the Bill’s third reading. As the debate began, the Earl of Burford leapt onto the Lord Chancellor’s seat to shout out a tirade of hysterical nonsense. As peers from all sides of the house watched in stunned silence, soon followed by mutters of disapproval, Burford informed his audience the Bill was ‘Treason’, promoted by Prime Minister Blair as a first step in the abolition of Britain: ‘Before us lies the wasteland. No Queen, no culture, no sovereignty, no freedom. Stand up for your Queen and country and vote this down’.⁸³ Had supporters of the reform of the Lords been invited to conjure a scenario in which the upper house’s anachronisms were revealed most starkly to the public, they could hardly have imagined anything quite so effective as Burford’s intervention. His pleas fell—unsurprisingly—on deaf ears. The Cranborne deal was respected by most peers, and the Bill passed its third reading by a majority of 140.

The house saved a final irritation to the government for the next day, when they voted again against some provisions of the government’s contentious welfare reform Bill—a measure already promoting rebellion among Labour MPs in the Commons. Perhaps ironically, the house’s behaviour on this matter offered a perfect example of the role a subordinate second chamber might legitimately play. The arguments against the Bill were calm and measured, the votes against it drawn from all sides of the house. In rejecting the government’s proposals, the Lords provided a voice for one of the most disadvantaged ⁸⁰ William Hague replaced John Major as leader of the Conservative Party in 1997.

⁸¹ See The Guardian 3 December 1998; 4 December 1998.

⁸² The government had indicated that the reform legislation would contain retrospective authorisation for this ‘election’.

⁸³ See The Guardian 27 October 1999; The Times 27 October 1999.

sections of society, a voice submerged in the Commons by the feebleness of those Labour MPs for whom the demands of party loyalty overrode any qualms of conscience.

The 'reformed' House of Lords

Given the significance of its impact on the composition of Parliament, the House of Lords Act 1999 is a remarkably short and slender document. Section 1 provides simply that: 'No-one shall be a member of the House of Lords by virtue of a hereditary peerage'. Section 2 permits up to ninety-two persons to be exempted from s 1, in accordance with Standing Orders made by the house. Hereditary peers not exempted under s 2 were to be allowed to stand for election to the Commons and to vote in Commons elections.

The Act creates a second chamber with obvious similarities to the 1911 Landsdowne proposals, which Asquith rejected for fear that a more legitimately composed house would be more obstructive to the Commons than an hereditary chamber. The Blair government had evidently overlooked this possibility, as it appeared wholly surprised in January 2000 when a multi-party grouping (including prominent Labour peers) in the Lords blocked by a majority of 100 the government's proposals to restrict the right to trial by jury.⁸⁴ The legislation seemed an ideal candidate to be legitimately delayed in the new upper house. It was controversial in substance, impacted heavily on civil liberties, and raised the type of question which many life peers—by virtue of their legal experience—were well-equipped to evaluate. The government did not accept this proposition however. Home Secretary Jack Straw complained that the Lords' threat was 'undemocratic'. This comment was rather ill-conceived. Since the Blair government had presumably promoted the Lords reform Bill in the belief that the house's new composition was (if only temporarily) the most appropriate for a body possessing delaying and scrutinising powers, it could hardly be 'undemocratic' for those powers to be used; unless, of course, the government accepted that the reformed house was per se an 'undemocratic' institution. The episode rather indicated that the Blair government's view of the Lords' democratic credentials rested primarily on a majority in the upper house agreeing with the majority in the Commons; a perspective which suggests there is little point in having a second chamber at all.

The 1999 Act did however immediately much reduce the Conservative Party's strength in the upper chamber. As of November 2001, the Conservatives held 222 Lords seats, the Labour Party 197, the Liberals 62, and the cross-benchers (including bishops and law lords) 216. Given the (C)onservative predispositions of many cross-benchers, the government could certainly not expect to command reliable majority support in the upper house. Frequently aired objections that the Blair government had 'packed' the Lords with its own supporters therefore had little basis in fact; rather the Prime Minister had used 'his' powers of appointment to begin to redress the huge historical imbalance within the house in favour of the Conservative Party.

The recommendations of the Wakeham Commission

The Royal Commission established in 1999 to make recommendations for long-term reform to the House of Lords published its report, A house for the future, in January 2000. The Wakeham Commission had proceeded on the assumption that the powers of the upper chamber would remain largely unchanged. Its task was therefore to consider how to reform the composition of the Lords in ways which would enhance its existing complementary role to the Commons.

⁸⁴ See The Times and The Guardian, 20 January 2000.

Effective complementarity would require independence and expertise within the upper house. If we accept that the Lords should be both subordinate to the Commons and independent of the prevailing patterns of party affiliation in the lower house, there is no need for its members to be elected. Indeed, for those purposes an elected second chamber could be quite dysfunctional. If elected on the same basis as the Commons, the Lords might simply reproduce its party alignment, and so lose any plausible claim to independence. If chosen through a different electoral system, the Lords might be construed as a more legitimate expression of the people's wishes, and so pose a threat to the lower house's 'democratically' justified superiority. And whatever form of election was used, there remains the risk that members would be elected because of their appeal to transient popular prejudice, and so produce a chamber intellectually unsuited for its role of exerting a supra-party political influence on legislative and governmental processes.

The life peerage system therefore appears well suited as a selection process for a complementary house. Reform to the Life Peerage Act to place some justiciable limits on the Prime Minister's powers to nominate peers might seem desirable, but the greatest weakness in the membership of the Lords that selection through life peerages would produce would seem to be not one of political bias or limited ability, but of age: a more vigorous house may demand that we have a younger house.

Given the predominance of the party in modern political life, it would be facile to think one could remove party politics from the Lords. Even if one abolished formal party organisation, it is certain that members' behaviour would continue to be structured by their party loyalties. And, indeed, since one of the functions we wish the Lords to perform is scrutiny of the executive, there must be a sufficient number of competent Ministers in the house for other peers to question. Consequently, rather than wondering how to abolish party influence, a more pertinent inquiry would be to ask how much influence should be accorded to party discipline in respect of each of the house's various functions.

Objections to the Lords' powers to delay or amend government Bills derive not so much from the delay per se, as from its differential party impact. That the Lords indulged in such behaviour prior to 2000 far more frequently when a Labour government controlled the Commons suggests that their Lordship's stance owed less to a principled belief in the integrity of their position than to a knee-jerk mobilisation of their Conservative majority. There is no justification for according party ideology such scope in a complementary chamber. This suggests the Lords' composition as a corporate entity would have to be based on a quota system which ensured that a government Bill could be delayed or amended only if opposition peers won over a substantial body of cross-bench opinion, and perhaps some governing party peers as well. One would thereby increase the likelihood that any legislative difficulties the government encountered derived from flaws in its policies, rather than the simple factional opposition intransigence. Nor should a house of life peers experience any conventional reluctance to use such legal powers—their very purpose would be to cause the government difficulties if it appeared that legislative policy ignored public sentiment. In this context, as with its scrutinising functions, the Lords' role is to expose government policy to the oxygen of publicity by alerting the electorate to criticism of the government's position.

The Wakeham Commission did not propose any increase in the upper chamber's legislative powers. Indeed, to the contrary, the Commission recommended that the Lords' veto power over delegated legislation be replaced with a much lesser power to delay such measures for up to three months. It did recommend a modest extension of the Lords' role in scrutinising executive behaviour, primarily through an expansion of the house's select committee system. The Commission also suggested that—while members should not be salaried—they should receive enhanced attendance allowances, which raised the possibility that some members would be able to sit in the chamber on much more than an occasional basis.

The modesty of these proposals was matched by the Commission's recommendations for altering the house's composition. Wakeham saw no place for the remaining ninety-two 'hereditary' peers in a reformed house. The Commission suggested that the great majority of members of the new house, of whom there would be some 550, should be appointed to office. The Commission saw no valid role for the Prime Minister in the appointment process. Rather appointments should be made by an independent 'Appointments Commission', with ten members selected on a non-partisan basis. Appointees would serve for a fifteen-year fixed term. The Appointments Commission would ensure that the party balance among appointed members bore a close resemblance to each party's share of the vote at the most recent general election. In a further break with tradition, the Commission proposed that the overall composition of the house should better represent women and ethnic minorities than had been the case in the previous house and in the Commons. The Commission also recommended that a small proportion of the new house's members should be elected. The various commissioners could not agree on how many members should be chosen in this way. Three options were suggested, ranging from barely 10% of the house to a maximum of around 35%. These modest figures led Shell to observe; 'One senses throughout the report a fundamental antipathy towards including elected members'.⁸⁵ The proposals attracted little enthusiasm from the opposition parties or constitutional reform pressure groups, most of whom favoured the creation of a wholly elected second house. That perspective has little to commend it. That it was appointed peers who rejected the government's jury trial proposals so decisively (coincidentally on the same day that the Wakeham report was published) provides compelling evidence that an elected house is not necessary to ensure that the second chamber makes an effective contribution to the legislative process. The Commission was perhaps ill-advised in suggesting that any members be elected. In so doing, it implicitly acknowledged that it saw force in this argument yet, by recommending that so few members be chosen in this way, it opened itself to the criticism of being hypocritical or fainthearted. That view was strengthened by repeated rumours that the cabinet had made it known to Lord Wakeham that a wholly or predominantly appointed house would be its preferred option.

Despite its preferences being granted, the government made no immediate attempt to promote legislation further reforming the upper house. It seemed likely that any such proposal would be delayed until after the next general election. It also seemed likely, unless the present house proved to be habitually obstructive to government Bills, that the rather modest nature of the Wakeham Commission recommendations would offer the government a good reason for not pursuing any further reform at all.⁸⁶

The 2001 White Paper

That the second Blair government harboured no great enthusiasm for radical Lords reform was clearly evident from the contents of the white paper published in 2001, Completing the reform.⁸⁷ The government had formed the view that creating an entirely or substantially elected upper house was not a viable option, as this might lead to a situation of legislative ⁸⁵ Shell D (2000) 'Reforming the House of Lords' Public Law 193.

⁸⁶ See especially Bogdanor V (1999) 'Reform of the House of Lords: a sceptical view' Political Quarterly 375.

⁸⁷ Lord Chancellor's Department (2001) Completing the reform.

'gridlock' between the houses.⁸⁸ While there is undoubtedly some force in this position, the government rather undermined the potency of its own favoured reform by proposing a house whose members would be selected in an incoherent mish-mash of ways.

The white paper accepted that hereditary peers should be removed from the house. It then recommended a chamber composed of some 600 peers: 120 would be elected on a regional basis; 120 would be appointed by a statutory, non-partisan Appointments Commission; and 360 would be selected by party leaders in shares approximately equal to the parties' popularity at the previous general election. This represented a significant dilution of the Wakeham proposals, which had envisaged that all non-elected peers be selected by the Appointments Commission.⁸⁹

The white paper attracted little positive comment in the press or within Parliament. More radical proposals were advanced, including—with breathtaking hypocrisy—a suggestion from the Conservative Party that a reformed house be entirely elected. More significantly, in a rare display of independence, substantial numbers of backbench Labour MPs voiced strong opposition to the white paper, with many seemingly favouring a largely or wholly elected upper house.

The sentiments of Labour backbenchers were reflected in a report by the Commons Public Administration Select Committee, published early in 2002.⁹⁰ The report offered a cogent illustration of the capacity of the Commons to pursue a line quite independent of that favoured by the government. The Committee saw little merit in the white paper's proposals, and was not substantially more impressed by the recommendations of the Wakeham Commission. Perhaps rather naively, the Select Committee considered that the legitimacy of the second chamber—and thus its capacity effectively to act as a revising or delaying chamber within the legislative process—would be fatally compromised if it did not contain a substantial elected element. The report suggested that at least 60% of the members of the reformed house should be elected, with the remainder chosen by a non-partisan Appointments Commission of the sort suggested by Wakeham. It was also recommended that the law Lords and bishops should be removed from the reformed house. In the Select Committee's view, a chamber composed in this way would not function as a rival to the Commons, and its limited powers as identified in the Parliament Acts should not be extended.

The government apparently did not see the question of further reform to the House of Lords as a matter of sufficient importance to warrant an open fight with its backbenchers, and in May 2002 the government announced that more far-reaching proposals for reform would be considered by a joint Commons and Lords Committee. Quite how receptive the Blair government would be to the Committee's plans remained to be seen. The Leader of the House, Robin Cook, announced in May 2002 that; 'The matter is now in the hands of parliament and the speed and the radicalism with which we can now move is very much down to how MPs proceed in this matter and how they subsequently vote'.⁹¹ Notwithstanding this statement of intent, press stories in June 2002 suggested that the ⁸⁸ Whether such 'gridlock' would be of a symbolic or practical kind would of course depend on the powers that the reformed Lords would exercise. The government did embrace Wakeham proposals that the Lords' powers over delegated legislation be reduced. No enhancement of powers in respect of primary legislation was supposed. Any gridlock that might ensue if this weakened house were to be composed of elected members would be of a sort that would embarrass a government with a Commons majority rather than block its legislative programme.

⁸⁹ Prompting the unflattering comment that the white paper would; 'allow the party leaders to use the Lords as a patronage bin'; Constitution Unit (2001—December) Monitor p 2.

⁹⁰ Continuing the reform. ⁹¹ The Guardian 14 May 2002.

government had been at some pains to place its own supporters on the joint committee, to be chaired by Jack Cunningham, a Cabinet Minister in the first Blair government.⁹²

The Joint Committee's report, published in the autumn of 2002,⁹³ concluded that there was little point in addressing the issue of whether any changes should be made to the powers of the Lords until the matter of its composition was settled. The Joint Committee also identified various criteria which the reformed house should meet; 'legitimacy'; 'representativeness'; 'no domination by any one party'; 'independence'; and 'expertise'. Those criteria, while undeniably vague, would seem wholly unobjectionable. On the question of altering the composition of the house, however, the Joint Committee was rather more opaque. Its core recommendation was that MPs should be given a free vote on various reform options, ranging from creating a fully elected chamber to retaining a fully appointed body through a number of hybrid elected/appointed options.

The government nominally accepted that the matter should be left to a free vote. However, shortly before the Commons addressed the issue, the Prime Minister made it clear that he was firmly supportive of a fully appointed second chamber. Mr Blair appeared to be concerned that a fully or partly elected upper house would act in effect as a rival rather than revising chamber to the Commons. His intervention was subject to some criticism both in the media and within Parliament, on the grounds that some of the more quiescent Labour MPs would not visibly vote against his wishes irrespective of their own views on the merits of the issue.

The Commons' subsequent vote on reform descended into farce. MPs were eventually presented with seven proposals for reform. Amid allegations that Labour whips were exerting pressure on Labour MPs to follow the Prime Minister's line, none of the proposals mustered majority support.⁹⁴ It was expected that the Joint Committee would make further attempts to fashion a proposal that would carry a majority in the Commons, but no successful reform emerged.

Notwithstanding the press criticism levied at the Blair government for its failure to take a radical lead on this issue, the status quo might be thought to have certain benefits. The partially reformed house has continued to prove a more potent obstacle to government policy than the Commons. As the reform debate raged at the end of 2002, the Lords succeeded in persuading the government to make several important changes to Bills dealing with asylum and animal health issues.⁹⁵ In 2003, the upper house proved similarly obstructive towards the government's flagship Bill to reform the National Health Service⁹⁶; and in both 2004 and 2005 the Lords inflicted defeats on the government in respect of proposed anti-terrorism legislation. It might also be suggested that the current House had by then become reasonably representative of the public at large, at least in respect of the issue of party political affiliation. In the 2001 general election, the proportion of eligible voters who supported the Labour, Conservative and Liberal parties were 24%; 19% and 11% respectively. At that time, Labour peers held 28% of seats in the Lords; the Conservatives 32%; and the Liberals 9%; with the balance held by cross-benchers. As we shall see in chapter seven, the Lords might plausibly claim to be better representative of contemporary voting patterns than is the Commons.

⁹² The Guardian 20 June 2002.

⁹³ Joint Committee on House of Lords Reform (2002) First report.

⁹⁴ See Cowley (2005) op cit pp 34–36; 97–100.

⁹⁵ The Guardian, 1 November 2003; 8 November 2002.

⁹⁶ Cowley op cit pp 152–154.

One parliament or three? Jackson v Attorney-General

While neither Parliament nor the Blair government displayed enthusiasm for further Lords reform, the courts offered, in 2004 and 2005, answers to the legal questions raised by the Parliament Act 1911; namely were the Commons and King a 'subordinate legislature'; and, if so, what were the limits on their legislative power?

In the postwar era, two distinct views had emerged among academic commentators. The first, championed by Professor de Smith was that the Parliament Act had 'redefined Parliament' in way which; 'provided a simpler, optional procedure for legislation on most topics'.⁹⁷ Any measure produced by the Commons and King was indeed therefore as much an 'Act of Parliament' as a statute enacted in the orthodox manner. De Smith's view on this point appeared to be much influenced by the Commonwealth legislature cases discussed in chapter two.⁹⁸ Quite why these cases should be regarded as relevant to the nature of the British Parliament is, for reasons outlined in chapter two,⁹⁹ something of a mystery.

The second view, proposed by William Wade, seems more persuasive. That view, initially advanced in 1955 and reiterated in 1980¹⁰⁰ was that measures passed by the Commons and King under the Parliament Act procedures were delegated legislation. While the Commons and Monarch might indeed be a 'legislature', they could only be a subordinate legislature; their subordinacy being to the Parliament that created their law-making power:

The acid test of primary legislation, surely, is that it is accepted by the courts at its own face value, without needing support from any superior authority. But an Act passed by Queen and Commons only has no face value of its own. As Coke put it in The Prince's Case, 'If an Act be penned, that the King with the assent of the Lords, or with the assent of the Commons, it is no Act of Parliament for three ought to assent to it scil. The King, the Lords and the Commons.' An Act of Queen and Commons alone is accepted by the courts only because it is authorised by the Parliament Act—and indeed it is required to recite that it is passed 'in accordance with the Parliament Acts 1911 and 1949 and by authority of the same'. This is the hall-mark of subordinate legislation.¹⁰¹

The matter was eventually subjected to judicial analysis in 2004 and 2005. The episode was triggered by the passage of a measure styled as the Hunting Act 2004. The law stemmed from an attempt by the Blair government to persuade Parliament in 2002 to regulate the hunting of wild animals by groups of people who chased their prey on horseback accompanied by packs of dogs which tracked and killed the pursued animals. The proposal attracted considerable controversy in both Houses of Parliament and in the press. An amendment moved by a backbench Labour MP to ban such hunting entirely was approved in the Commons but then rejected in the Lords. It soon became clear that the government was unenthusiastic about pursuing the issue at all. There was nonetheless substantial support for the hunting ban among many Labour, and opposition, party MPs in the Commons, and the Bill was re-introduced into the Commons in September 2004. Majority opinion in the Lords opposed the measure however and, when efforts to find a broadly acceptable compromise measure failed, the House of Lords again refused to pass ⁹⁷ De Smith S (5th edn, 1985) Constitutional and administrative law p 100.

⁹⁸ See 'Jennings' critique and the "rule of recognition" ff, ch 2, pp 35–43 above.

⁹⁹ 'Are Trethowan, Harris and Ranasinghe relevant to the British situation?', ch 2, pp 40–43 above.

¹⁰⁰ (1955) op cit; (1980) Constitutional fundamentals.

¹⁰¹ Ibid., pp 27–28. For a perceptive analysis see Mirfield P (1979) 'Can the House of Lords be lawfully abolished' LQR 36; and Winterton G (1979) 'Is the House of Lords immortal?' LQR 386.

the Bill even though the proposal had attracted a very large majority in the Commons. The measure was therefore sent to the Queen for her approval under the Parliament Act 1949.

Having lost the political argument in the Commons, opponents of the Hunting Act 2004 then made a legal argument before the courts. The core of their case was that the Parliament Act 1949 was a legally invalid measure. If this contention was correct, then any subsequent measure purportedly enacted under the Parliament Act 1949 procedure—including the Hunting Act 2004—would also be invalid. The argument endorsed Wade's analysis, to the effect that the law-making body—the Commons by simple majority plus the royal assent—created by the 1911 Act was a 'subordinate' not 'sovereign' legislature. As such, there were limits on its powers. One such limit was laid out expressly in the text of the 1911 Act; namely that the Commons and Queen could not extend the period between general elections beyond five years. It was further contended that the powers of the Monarch and Commons were also subject to implied limits, in particular the limit that they could not increase the scope of their own law-making authority. It was then suggested that because the Parliament Act 1949 sought to increase the powers of the Commons and Monarch by further reducing the Lords' power of delay, it was a measure beyond the powers of the Monarch and Commons to produce.

The High Court and Court of Appeal

The High Court¹⁰² saw little force in these arguments. In its view, the Commons and Queen was as much 'Parliament' as was the Commons, Lords and Queen. The Court's judgment suggested that the correct way to portray the effect of the 1911 Act was that it had 'redefined' Parliament in a fashion which enabled the Parliament qua Commons and Monarch to enact Acts of Parliament, albeit that these new Parliaments had to comply with the terms of the 1911 Act if their 'Acts' were to be valid.

The Court of Appeal issued a single judgment.¹⁰³ Although it reached the same conclusion as the High Court, it did so on the basis of quite different reasoning. The Court of Appeal was clearly much influenced by Wade's analysis of the Commons and Queen as a subordinate legislature. The judgment did not go so far as, in explicit terms, to class measures produced by the Commons and Queen as 'delegated legislation'. However, drawing on both the express limitation placed on the power of the Commons and Queen by the 1911 Act and the context of the Act's passage, the Court accepted that the Commons and Queen could not be regarded as the equivalent of Parliament in the orthodox sense:¹⁰⁴

[42]. The purpose of the 1911 Act was to establish a new constitutional settlement that limited the period during which the Lords could delay the enactment of legislation first introduced to the Commons but which preserved the role of the Lords in the legislative processes. In our view it would be in conflict with the 1911 Act for it to be used as an instrument for abolishing the House of Lords.... The preamble indicates that the 1911 Act was to be a transitional provision pending further reform. It provides no support for an intention that the 1911 Act should be used, directly or indirectly, to enable more fundamental constitutional changes to be achieved than had been achieved already.

[45]. Once it is accepted that the use to which the 1911 Act could be put is limited, the question arises as to the extent of the limitation. It is when we reach this stage that it becomes important to recognise that what could be suggested here is the power to make fundamental constitutional changes. If Parliament was intending to create such a power, surely it is right to expect that the power would be unambiguously stated in the legislation. This is not the case with s. 2 of the 1911 Act.

¹⁰² [2005] All ER D 285; (2005) The Times January 31.

¹⁰³ Lord Woolf CJ, Lord Phillips MR, May LJ [2005] EWCA Civ 126; [2005] QB 579 (CA).

¹⁰⁴ The most important section of the judgment is at paras 30–48.

The abstract logic of this argument seems compelling. To regard the Commons and Queen as ‘Parliament’ would entail accepting the proposition that the United Kingdom has since 1911 had two sovereign law-makers, which is a nonsensical proposition. The obvious practical objection to the Court of Appeal’s reasoning is that the concept of ‘fundamental constitutional change’ is very imprecise. The Court of Appeal considered that the reduction of the Lords’ delaying power in the 1949 ‘Act’ was not fundamental, while a measure such as the abolition of the House of Lords or a measure excluding much government activity from judicial review would have a ‘fundamental’ character.

The Court’s reasoning is avowedly teleological or purposive in nature. This makes it rather curious that neither the judgment—nor indeed the claimant’s submissions—seemed to attach any significance to the ‘purpose’ that had evidently led Asquith to promote the original 1911 Bill; namely to ensure that the Lords could not prevent legal effect being given to policy proposals that a government with a Commons majority had put clearly to the electorate.¹⁰⁵ By 1945, the political parties fought election campaigns on the basis of broad policy manifestoes. The Labour Party manifesto of that year had said a good deal about the party’s radical legislative plans; but those expressly stated plans did not include any explicit proposal to seek amendment of the 1911 Act in order further to limit the powers of the upper house.¹⁰⁶

The House of Lords

The House of Lords regarded the issue raised in Jackson as of sufficient importance to merit consideration by a panel of nine judges rather than the usual five.¹⁰⁷ The House of Lords unanimously upheld the decision reached by the Court of Appeal, but did so on the basis of markedly different—and thoroughly unsatisfactory—reasoning.¹⁰⁸ Eight of the nine judges delivered reasoned judgments.

Lord Bingham delivered the longest judgment, which began with a careful study of the historical context within which the 1911 Act was produced. In Lord Bingham’s view:

[24]...The 1911 Act did, of course, effect an important constitutional change, the change lay not in authorising a new form of sub-primary parliamentary legislation, but in creating a new way of enacting primary legislation....

[25] [T]he overall object of the Act was not to enlarge the powers of the Commons but to restrict those of the Lords.

Lord Bingham was apparently led to this conclusion in part by his reading of the historical background to the Act. But his reasoning seemed to rest primarily on a literal construction of the text of the 1911 Act—and especially of ss 1(1) and 2(1) which provide that any measure passed by the Commons and Monarch would be an ‘Act of Parliament’. In Lord Bingham’s opinion, there are thus no substantive limits on the legislative competence of the Commons and Monarch. Acting in concert, they could enact a statute on any subject matter whatsoever. This would include a measure which overrode the express provision ¹⁰⁵ See ‘The Parliament Act 1911’ ff, ch 6, p 163 above.

¹⁰⁶ See ‘The Parliament Act 1949’, ch 6, p 167 above.

¹⁰⁷ Unsurprisingly, the judgment prompted a voluminous body of academic literature. Among the most enlightening critiques are those provided by Jowell J (2006) ‘Parliamentary sovereignty under the new constitutional hypothesis’ Public Law 562; McHarg A (2006) ‘What is delegated legislation?’ Public Law 539; Ekins R (2007) ‘Acts of Parliament and the Parliament Acts’ LQR 91.

¹⁰⁸ [2005] UKHL 56; [2006] 1 AC 262; [2006] 4 All ER 1253.

in s 2(1) of the 1911 Act that the new procedure did not apply to Bills which extended the duration of a parliament beyond five years. There are obvious and substantial deficiencies in this analysis.

The first difficulty is that Lord Bingham's reasoning necessarily accepts the presumption that the United Kingdom now has two sovereign law-makers. This is a logical absurdity. Lord Bingham is evidently not offering a scenario in which sovereignty is divided between differently identified Parliaments, as was the case in South Africa in the 1950s.¹⁰⁹ Each of Lord Bingham's Parliaments is evidently legally omnipotent.

The second flaw in the argument is evident when one considers the practical consequences of Lord Bingham's unquestioning reliance on the literal wording of s 1(1) and s 2(1). On this reasoning, had the 1911 Act dispensed altogether with any need for the Lords or Monarch to assent to legislation, and had provided simply that any measure approved by a bare majority in the Commons at third reading was 'an Act of Parliament', then the Commons alone would have become a(nother) sovereign legislature. And had the 1911 Act attributed 'Act of Parliament' status to a written government policy proposal supported by a majority of the Cabinet and certified as such by the Prime Minister, then it seems a Cabinet majority would also be 'Parliament' and thus a sovereign law-maker. Moreover, according to Lord Bingham's analysis, either of those additional 'sovereigns' could now be brought into being by the Commons and Queen acting under the 1911 or 1949 Act procedures; and the additional sovereigns would then in turn, since their wishes would be 'Acts of Parliament', have the legal capacity to create yet more sovereign law-makers.

The judgment offered by Lord Nicholls is even more problematic. Like Lord Bingham, Lord Nicholls relies on the use of the 'Act of Parliament' label in s 1(1) and s 2(1) to support his assertion that the Commons and Monarch are not a subordinate legislature: "To describe an Act of Parliament made by this procedure as "delegated" or "subordinate" legislation, with all the connotations attendant on those expressions, would be an absurd and confusing mischaracterisation."¹¹⁰ Rather the 1911 Act created 'a parallel route' for the creation of legislation. However, Lord Nicholls—unlike Lord Bingham—also held that his 'parallel route' could not be used by the Commons and Lords to repeal the substantive restrictions on its use laid out in s 2(1).¹¹¹ This must mean that the Commons and Monarch are a law-maker of limited competence. Yet they are also apparently not 'subordinate' to the Parliament composed of the Commons, Monarch and Lords. This is an intrinsically incoherent position to adopt. Lord Nicholls then offers as; 'the second source of confirmation'¹¹² of his conclusion the peculiar suggestion that any measures produced by the Parliament Act 1911 or 1949 procedures must be 'Acts of Parliament' because laws produced in such fashion have been recognised as such or amended by subsequent statutes enacted by (the three-part) Parliament.

Lord Steyn's judgment began in terms which seemed rather more sophisticated than those deployed by his colleagues. He appeared to take some care to avoid characterising the legal measures produced by the Commons and Queen as 'Acts' which were 'enacted' by Parliament. Instead he referred to: 'the manner and form in which laws may be made. . . . [T]he new method of making law. . . . [T]his new method of expressing the will of Parliament'.¹¹³ However, he eventually adopted the view that the 1911 Act had 'redefined ¹⁰⁹ See 'Harris v Dönges (Minister of the Interior) (1952)', ch 2, pp 37–39 above.

¹¹⁰ At para 64.

¹¹¹ Ie that it did not apply to money Bills or Bills seeking to extend the duration of Parliaments beyond five years.

¹¹² At para 67.

¹¹³ Ibid, at para 75.

Parliament', and rejected the suggestion that the Commons and Queen were a subordinate legislature: 'in manner and form the 1911 Act simply provides for an alternative mode by which Parliament, as reconstituted for specific purposes, may make laws'.¹¹⁴

An unsatisfactory judgment?

The reasoning—and thence the conclusions—of the members of the House of Lords are profoundly unsatisfactory. At root, the problem lies in the Court's evident unwillingness to accept the point so clearly made by William Wade that the sovereignty of Parliament is not a phenomenon that derives from a legal source, and as such neither is it a phenomenon that can be altered by a legal source. The 'ultimate political fact' of the constitution is that Parliament's sovereign power cannot by non-revolutionary means be restricted nor given away. However powerful qua law-maker the Commons and Monarch might be, they are not and cannot be Parliament and so cannot possess sovereign power. From this perspective, the judgment of the Court of Appeal offers a far more—if not thoroughly—convincing analysis of the constitutional consequences of the 1911 Act than do the various opinions offered by the House of Lords.

Conclusion

The number of variations on the theme of reforming the powers and composition of the House of Lords qua legislative body are legion, as are the pros and cons of each scheme proposed.¹¹⁵ But most reform plans present a paradox. The more we ask a second chamber to perform functions complementary to those of the Commons, the more we demand of its members that they be (as individuals and as a body) 'expert', 'experienced' and 'non-partisan', and so the more we reveal the crushing dominance of party politics in the lower house, and the incapacity and/or unwillingness of backbench MPs to exert a restraining influence on government activities. This perhaps suggests that the key division within the legislative process is now not Lords versus Commons, nor Labour versus Conservative, but party versus national interest. If that is indeed the case, it is very difficult to identify effective reforming strategies for the Lords without simultaneously considering the merits and drawbacks of 'Parliament' more broadly, in terms both of its legislative powers and its relationship with the 'people'. Discussion of Lords reform frequently proceeds on the assumption that the upper house's legal and conventional subordination to the Commons is desirable because of what one might intuitively regard as 'democratic' reasons. The Lords may be portrayed as an elitist, unelected body, which has no legitimate power to obstruct the wishes of 'the people', such wishes invariably being accurately expressed by the elected representatives in the lower house. The recommendations of the Wakeham Commission, and the proposals outlined in the 2001 White Paper, do not go very far towards meeting that criticism.

Gordon Brown's Labour government gave no indication that it regarded further reform as a priority. Another white paper was published in the summer of 2008.¹¹⁶ The title of ¹¹⁴ Ibid, at para 94. He also held however that the lifetime of a parliament could not be extended either directly or indirectly by the Commons and Queen.

¹¹⁵ See for example Oliver D (1990) United Kingdom government and constitution ch 3; Brazier R (1992) Constitutional reform ch 4 Bogdanor (1999) op cit; Shell D (1999) 'The future of the second chamber' Political Quarterly 390; Dickson B and Carmichael P (eds) The House of Lords: its parliamentary and judicial roles; Russell M (2000) Reforming the House of Lords. Lessons from overseas.

¹¹⁶ Ministry of Justice (2008) An elected second chamber; available at <<http://www.justice.gov.uk/docs/elected-second-chamber.pdf>>.

the white paper, An elected second chamber, indicated that the Brown government saw little merit in retaining a predominantly appointed second chamber. However the white paper's sponsoring Minister, Jack Straw, suggested that the government's views on further reform were not fixed; the white paper was: 'intended to generate further debate and consideration rather than being a blueprint for final reform'.¹¹⁷ The government's preference appeared to be for a smaller house, of some 400 members, all or almost all of whom would be elected to serve a single twelve to fifteen-year term. No firm recommendations were made as to the electoral system to be used to select the new members. It was suggested however that members should receive a salary; the obvious inference being that membership of the house should be seen as a full-time political commitment. The government saw no prospect of legislative proposals for reform to be put to Parliament before the next general election.

Further reform was identified as an element of the Conservative/Liberal coalition government's reform agenda in 2010: 'We will establish a committee to bring forward proposals for a wholly or mainly elected upper chamber on the basis of proportional representation'.¹¹⁸ A draft Bill proposing an 80% elected chamber was published in May 2011. The Bill proposed a much smaller house, comprising only 300 members. Elected members would serve fifteen-year terms, with a third of the seats to be contested every five years. The Bill appeared initially to receive a hostile reception from backbench MPs of all parties. The government proposed a lengthy consultation period to consider the details of reform, and as of late 2011 there seemed little likelihood of any significant measure being enacted.

Alterations to the judicial role of the House of Lords were however completed in 2010. Part 3 of The Constitutional Reform Act 2005 made provision for the creation of a new 'Supreme Court' which would exercise the jurisdiction of the appellate committee of the House of Lords. The Supreme Court has twelve members; the initial members being those law lords holding office at the time the Supreme Court comes into being. The Act creates an elaborate selection process for subsequent members of the Supreme Court. The initial power of recommendation lies with a non-partisan 'selection commission'. Although the Commission's proposals may be rejected by the Lord Chancellor and Prime Minister, the power of initiative has been removed from the government, which in an institutional sense reinforces the independence of the judiciary. That institutional independence is also underlined—in a symbolic sense—by the provision of a new building outside the Houses of Parliament in which the Supreme Court will sit. That the government saw no particular urgency in giving effect to these changes is illustrated by the remarkably leisurely pace at which preparation of the building proceeded. Works were not completed until late 2010.

Of more significance perhaps were the provisions in Part 4 of the Act for the creation of a new Judicial Appointments Commission (JAC). The JAC was to be a non-partisan body which would assume substantial responsibility for the selection of judges at all levels of the judicial hierarchy. Although there has been no serious suggestion in recent years that Lord Chancellors and Prime Ministers have appointed judges for biased party political reasons, the 2005 reforms effectively remove any possible scope for the appointment power to be abused in that way.

¹¹⁷ Statement of Jack Straw, 14 July 2009; available at <<http://www.justice.gov.uk/news/announcement140708b.htm>>.

¹¹⁸ <http://www.cabinetoffice.gov.uk/sites/default/files/resources/coalition_programme_for_government.pdf> at p 27.

Reform of the House of Lords in its legislative capacity evidently presents a considerably more intractable problem. But before we conclude that it is only the House of Lords (in both its unreformed and reformed states) that lacks a ‘democratic’ underpinning within Parliament, we ought to revisit the House of Commons, and consider not its powers, but the methods through which its members are chosen. The question which is raised in chapter seven is a stark one: to what extent can we credibly assert that the composition of the House of Commons accurately represents the wishes of ‘the people’?

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Mirfield P (1979) ‘Can the House of Lords be lawfully abolished’ LQR 36

Shell D (1992) The House of Lords

Jenkins R (1968) Mr Balfour’s Poodle

Shell D (1985) ‘The House of Lords and the Thatcher government’ Parliamentary Affairs 16

Jowell J (2006) ‘Parliamentary sovereignty under the new constitutional hypothesis’ Public Law 562

Shell D (2000) ‘Reforming the House of Lords’ Public Law 193

Ministry of Justice (2008) An elected second chamber; <<http://www.justice.gov.uk/docs/elected-second-chamber.pdf>>

Bogdanor V (1999) ‘Reform of the House of Lords: a sceptical view’ Political Quarterly 375

Joint Committee on House of Lords Reform (2002) First report

Ekins R (2007) ‘Acts of Parliament and the Parliament Acts’ LQR 91

Case law and legislation

Parliament Act 1911

Jackson v Attorney General [2006] 1 AC 262

Chapter 7

The Electoral System

This book began by suggesting various ways to assess if a society's constitution was 'democratic', in the substantive sense of the content of its laws, and the procedural sense of the way laws are made. The first six chapters sketched some characteristics of the British version of democracy. Parliament has traditionally been regarded as sovereign, capable of amending all laws by the simple majority in both houses plus royal assent formula. The Life Peerages Act 1958 and the House of Lords Act 1999 show that Parliament can alter the membership of its component parts. There is no obvious reason¹ why the parliamentary sovereignty doctrine should not also apply to the Commons' electoral system. The questions we might therefore ask are why Parliament has exercised its powers in this area in the way that it has; and how far this choice satisfies democratic requirements?

To begin, we might return to Jefferson's claim that governments 'derive their just powers from the consent of the governed'. The claim is one most people would consider fundamental to any democratic society. But how do citizens choose their law-makers? How effective is that choice in controlling the legislature's composition? And how do we decide if our choice ensures that the law's substance attracts our consent?

A recent survey of electoral laws in modern societies identified six fundamental characteristics of democratic systems.² Firstly, that virtually all adults may vote; secondly, that elections are held regularly; thirdly, that no large group of citizens is prohibited from fielding candidates; fourthly, that all legislative seats are contested; fifthly, that election campaigns are conducted fairly; and sixthly, that votes are secretly cast and accurately counted.

This chapter asks how well Britain's electoral system satisfies these tests. Section two reviews the contemporary picture. Section one traces the route Britain has followed in reaching its present position, picking up the threads of issues previously encountered but left untied, and weaving a more tightly knit picture of the constitution.

I. The evolution of a 'democratic' electoral system?

This section focuses on two issues: the Great Reform Act 1832 and the reforms of 1867–1884.

¹ Ch 8 suggests there may be obscure ones.

² Butler D, Penniman H and Ranney A (1981) Democracy at the polls ch 1.

The Great Reform Act 1832

The Commons' progress towards becoming a fully representative institution dates from the 1832 Great Reform Act. The Act retained many features of earlier electoral law.³ Nevertheless, its passage provoked a constitutional crisis. This arose in part from the House of Lords' decision to wreck a Bill that had majority Commons support, from the Monarch's (William IV) unwillingness to exercise his prerogative powers to create new pro-government peers, and in the apparent readiness of middle and working class⁴ communities to use violence to secure the Bill's enactment. This complex web of forces makes the Act a useful vehicle for exploring the meaning of 'democracy' in British constitutional history.

By 1830, the nature of elite groups in British society was undergoing rapid change. Wealth had moved away from the landed and merchant classes towards manufacturing industry.⁵ The technological advance which triggered this trend also facilitated the 'nationalisation of politics'; improved communications and transport systems permitted people in different regions to identify common interests transcending 'local concerns'. One can identify 'public opinion' as a distinct political force from 1800.⁶ The Commons may still have been a 'House of Communities'; but the nation's political demography was one in which the division of the population by economic class into several large segments, rather than division by physical geography into the inhabitants of innumerable cities, towns, and villages, was becoming evermore important.

Dissatisfaction with the electoral system had four principal foci. The first related to the geographical distribution of seats; the second concerned the qualifications needed to vote; the third centred on candidate selection; the fourth on the conduct of election campaigns.

The constituency system

The Commons now has around 650 members, each representing a given geographical area, or 'constituency'. This geographical division was a firmly embedded principle by 1688. Constitutional theory then accepted that the Commons existed as much to protect local interests as to define national issues. In 1830, 658 MPs sat in the Commons. The country's population was approximately sixteen million. Representation was divided between counties and boroughs, with most English counties (39) and boroughs (around 200) each returning two members, and each Scots and Welsh county and borough returning one member. Ireland had two-member counties (32) and (mostly) one-member boroughs (31). Oxford and Cambridge Universities returned two members each; one MP represented Trinity College Dublin. This framework was established in 1675, and had remained broadly unchanged ever since.⁷ Seat allocation bore no relation to population patterns; Parliament had not established any mechanism for altering representation to reflect demographic trends. In 1830, large industrial towns such as Birmingham and Manchester had no representatives at all.

In contrast, over 100 so-called 'rotten boroughs' had fewer than 100 voters. Boroughs were created by the Monarch's exercise of prerogative powers; the way in which the Monarch exercised the power was not subject to judicial control.

³ Gash N (1953) Politics in the age of Peel p x; Mandler P (1990) Aristocratic government in the age of reform ch 4.

⁴ 'Class' was then a nascent concept, and is used loosely here. See Hobsbawm E (1969) Industry and empire ch 4; Ward J (1973) Chartism pp 46–48.

⁵ Hobsbawm op cit chs 2–3.

⁶ Brock op cit p 17.

⁷ Cannon J (1973) Parliamentary reform 1640–1832 p 29.

Table 7.1 The size of the electorate

| | Adult Population | Electorate | % Enfranchised |
|------|------------------|------------|----------------|
| 1830 | 13,900,000 | 435,000 | 3.2% |
| 1840 | 15,900,000 | 700,000 | 4.4% |
| 1870 | 22,700,000 | 1,900,000 | 8.7% |
| 1900 | 24,930,000 | 6,730,935 | 27.0% |
| 1919 | 27,900,000 | 21,755,583 | 78.0% |
| 1949 | 34,970,000 | 34,269,770 | 98.2% |

Source: Compiled from data in Seymour C (1970) Electoral reform in England and Wales Appendix 1: Coleman D and Salt J (1992) The British population p 41; Butler and Sloman op cit p 200. Figures prior to 1900 are approximate only and are for England and Wales only. Later dates are for the UK.

Table 7.2 Voting population of two member English boroughs 1830

| Number of electors | Number of boroughs |
|--------------------|--------------------|
| 0–50 | 56 |
| 51–100 | 21 |
| 101–300 | 36 |
| 301–600 | 24 |
| 601–1000 | 22 |
| 1001–5000 | 36 |
| 5000 + | 7 |

Source: adapted from Brock op cit p 20.

Qualification for the franchise

Entitlement to vote arose in many ways, most deriving from land ownership. The value of land required was generally set high enough to exclude most local residents. Residence was generally not required, which meant that many so-called ‘out-voters’ lived beyond borough boundaries and possessed votes in several places. The English county qualification was more straightforward—freehold ownership of land worth £2 per year; (the sum was fixed in 1430). Residence was not needed.⁸

Defenders of the status quo invoked the theory of ‘virtual representation’ to justify the non-enfranchisement of most citizens. This saw no need for most citizens to have a vote, since there would be some MPs whose dominant constituency interest would coincide with those of the disfranchised group (generally defined in occupational terms), thus ensuring that representations would be made on that group’s behalf within the Commons.⁹ The British government had made this argument to the American colonists in the 1770s when dismissing their demand for seats in Parliament; the colonists considered the theory specious.¹⁰ By 1830, its efficacy in countering domestic discontent had also substantially weakened.

⁸ See Brock op cit ch 1.

⁹ See Rawlings H (1988) Law and the electoral process ch 1.

¹⁰ Bailyn op cit pp 161–170.

The conduct of election campaigns

Three 'traditional' activities attracted considerable criticism by 1830: bribery, 'treating', and intimidation.¹¹ Bribery is a self-explanatory term. The explicit purchase of votes for cash had technically been illegal since 1696, but the law was so rarely enforced that the practice had almost acquired conventional status. Offers of employment, public office, or advantageous transfers of land in return for votes were also widespread.

'Treating' was indirect bribery, in which voters were 'persuaded' to support a candidate by lavish provision of food, drink and entertainments. Although treating had technically been a crime since 1696, it was so routine a part of elections that candidates who could not afford to 'entertain' voters were effectively debarred from entering contested elections. Treating was further encouraged by the fact that many constituencies had only one polling booth. However, voters had many days to register their choice. This was a necessity for out-voters, who needed time to journey to their various electoral homes. Out-voters could also expect to have their travel, accommodation and refreshment bills met by their preferred candidate.¹²

The cost of candidacy was further increased by the rule that candidates themselves paid all the administrative costs of the election, such as hiring the polling station. This particular provision survived until well into the twentieth century.

Intimidation took various forms. Mob violence was common, as was assault of voters by supporters of particular candidates. Somewhat more subtle was economic intimidation, entailing dismissal from employment or eviction from property if the employer/landlord's voting instructions were not followed.

The impact of these practices was exacerbated by the lack of a secret ballot. Public voting was justified on the basis that the right to vote was akin to a trust, and so necessarily open to scrutiny.¹³ Reformers regarded this as a guarantor of corruption and intimidation: candidates who bought votes could check they gained value for money and penalise voters of independent inclinations.

The incentive for candidates to engage in corruption was magnified by the political, rather than legal, nature of the way corruption was policed. Until 1604, defeated candidates alleging malpractice pursued their case before the courts. From 1604 to 1770, disputed election petitions were heard by the Commons sitting as a whole house. Since so many MPs owed their seats to corrupt practices, only the most egregious misbehaviour led to disqualification. In 1770, a private members' Bill was enacted which granted jurisdiction to a thirteen-member Commons committee, in the hope that the task could be approached in a less partisan manner.¹⁴

A corrupt contest was a lesser ground for concern than having no contest at all. Elections with just one candidate per seat were the norm rather than the exception of pre-1832 practice, and frequently resulted from an agreement by groups of candidates of opposing parties to allow each other a clear run in neighbouring constituencies.

Selecting candidates

Since 1710, MPs representing county constituencies had to own landed property worth at least £600; for borough members the sum was £300. These criteria clearly excluded most of the population, including many of the emergent middle classes, from the electoral contest, and indicates the formal influence of landed wealth on the Commons' composition. More noteworthy was the informal influence exercised by members of the Lords. The lack of contestation in many seats, the exorbitant cost of contested campaigns, the small size ¹¹ O'Leary C (1962) The elimination of corrupt practices in British general elections 1868–1911 ch 1.

¹² Cannon op cit p 209.

¹³ O'Leary op cit p 26.

¹⁴ Ibid, at 9–12.

of many electorates and the open voting process, combined to enhance local aristocrats' control of voters' behaviour.

There would have been little point in peers controlling voter behaviour if they could not subsequently control the MP's behaviour. For many local magnates, 'their' MP was as much a part of their property as their land or their livestock. In 'nomination' or 'pocket' boroughs, voters were economically dependent on the local aristocrat, and the candidates were often his sons. Such familial feeling frequently ensured a coincidence of political opinion between the members of the lower and upper house. Similarly, candidates were frequently proteges of peers. They were selected to do their patron's bidding, and although they were, in legal terms, answerable to no-one for their opinions or voting record until the next election, they could not win that election without their patron's continued support. In 1830, 270 MPs represented such constituencies. Some senior peers reputedly controlled as many as twelve MPs.¹⁵ And for patrons whose interest in politics might wane, a pocket borough was a saleable commodity, fetching as much as £180,000 (at 1830 prices).¹⁶ One would err in assuming that nomination boroughs ensured that the Commons automatically followed the Lords' wishes. But their existence on such a scale undermined the Commons' supposed role as a balancing force arraigned against the aristocracy and the Monarch.

Perhaps the most extraordinary illustration of the pre-1832 system is an election at Bute where, according to Brock: 'the candidate had proposed and seconded his own nomination, and then voted for himself, he being the only person present...'.¹⁷ Such tales may be apocryphal. That they could be given any currency at all indicates the electoral system's profound inadequacy for a rapidly industrialising and urbanising society.

The original Bill

The Bill presented by Lord Grey's Whig (Liberal) government¹⁸ sought to shift the formal balance of power in the Commons away from the landowning aristocracy towards the newly emergent manufacturing and professional classes. Grey was not, however, advocating a 'democratic' society. As Brock suggests, the government wished 'to make aristocratic government acceptable by purging away its most corrupt and expensive features'.¹⁹ Grey himself was candid as to his intentions:

A great change has taken place... in the distribution of property, and unless a corresponding change can be made in the legal mode by which that property can act upon government, revolutions must necessarily follow. This change requires a greater influence to be yielded to the middle classes, who have made wonderful advances both in property and intelligence.²⁰

Grey established a four-member Committee to produce a reform plan sufficiently radical to defuse popular discontent, yet sufficiently conservative to ensure the continued dominance of aristocratic ideas within the lower house. The Committee recommended that large counties should gain two extra MPs; boroughs with fewer than 2,000 inhabitants would lose both members; boroughs with fewer than 4,000 would lose one; unrepresented towns with over 10,000 residents would gain one MP. The Committee retained the property qualification, but recommended a uniform £10 freehold threshold. Out-voting was to be abolished by introducing a residence requirement, and voting would be by secret ballot. These plans would produce a substantially increased electorate, voting in constituencies which acknowledged contemporary population patterns, under conditions encouraging independent voting behaviour.

¹⁵ Turbeville (1958) op cit pp 244–247. ¹⁶ Brock op cit ch 1. ¹⁷ Brock op cit p 32.

¹⁸ See Cannon op cit pp 206–210. ¹⁹ Brock op cit p 44. ²⁰ Brock op cit p 152.

While agreeing to most of these proposals, the Cabinet rejected the secret ballot. Grey personally opposed secrecy, as did William IV, considering it: 'inconsistent with the manly spirit and free avowal of opinion which distinguish the people of England'.²¹

The Bill's parliamentary passage

In the Commons, the Bill passed second reading by 302 votes to 301. In Committee, however, the Tories carried a wrecking amendment. Grey subsequently resigned, and was granted a dissolution by William IV. At the ensuing election, fought entirely on the basis of reform, the government gained a majority of 130 seats. The legislative battle ground subsequently shifted to the Lords.

As chapter six suggested, Conservative peers who regarded Liberal policies as revolutionary were not persuaded even in 1911 to defer to a newly elected Commons majority. In 1831, the convention that the Lords should do so had yet to be established. The Commons was asking the Lords to approve a measure which would have greatly reduced the aristocracy's direct control over the lower house's composition. Tory peers lacked Grey's faith that a middle class electorate would vote for aristocratic principles of government, and remained intransigent.

One way to view the constitutional function of the Lords' (then) legislative co-equality was as a guarantor of traditional distributions of 'property'. The common law had accepted that an entitled voter could maintain a tortious action against a government official who unlawfully prevented him from exercising the right.²² Casting one's vote could therefore be seen as 'property' in the same sense as security in one's home (Entick) or one's physical liberty (Liversidge).

But for many Tories, the vote was regarded as 'property' in a rather different sense, belonging not to the individual voter, but to the aristocrat on whom the voter was economically dependent, as tenant or employee. In 1829, the Duke of Newcastle responded to criticism of his decision to evict tenants who voted against his preferred candidate by saying: 'Is it presumed then that I am not to do what I will with my own'.²³ The point was clearly put by Lord Eldon when criticising the Bill's plan to abolish pocket boroughs: 'Parliament had no more right, Eldon told the Lords in 1832, "to take away the elective franchise from the present holders of it, than... to take away from them the property in houses or land which conferred it"'.²⁴ The idea that voting for one's legislators was a 'right' that all possessed simply by being a citizen was adhered to only by the radical fringes of early nineteenth century society.

The first weeks after the election were taken up with delicate negotiations between Grey and William IV concerning a mass creation of peers to ensure the Bill would be passed. William was unwilling to create the fifty peers needed to ensure a government majority, and the Lords rejected the Bill by forty-one votes at second reading. The veto triggered widespread public protest. Riots in Bristol led to over 400 deaths, and several Tory peers found themselves and their property under attack.²⁵ Many observers feared violent revolution was at hand.

Rather than resign again, the government produced a modified Bill, designed to mollify its Tory opponents. As in 1909 and 1911, the Tory Party split into two factions—the 'waverers' and the 'die-hards'. The former, fearing either that a further government defeat would lead either to its resignation and possibly civil war, or to a mass creation of peers, ²¹ Quoted in Cannon op cit p 211.

²² Ashby v White (1703) 2 Ld Raym 938. See ch 8 below.

²³ Brock op cit p 63.

²⁴ Ibid, at 36.

²⁵ Cannon op cit pp 226–228; Brock op cit pp 247–259.

advocated amendment rather than veto. The latter favoured resistance, irrespective of the consequences. Initially, the die-hards kept the upper hand.

The amended Bill received a Commons majority of 162, but was subject to a wrecking amendment in the Lords. William continued to refuse a mass creation, whereupon Grey once more resigned. Given the party balance in the Commons, there was no prospect of a Tory government being formed, although this was William's preferred solution. The King asked the Tory leader, the Duke of Wellington, to form a government, but he could not muster sufficient Commons support. 'Public opinion' voiced many protests against a possible Wellington administration. Grey subsequently agreed to continue in office if the King agreed to create as many peers as necessary to push the Bill through. Eventually, sufficient Tory peers capitulated for the Bill to pass.

For Wellington, the Act was 'a revolution by due process of law'.²⁶ What Professor Wade later termed the 'ultimate political fact' of parliamentary sovereignty remained unchanged—but Parliament now reflected a changed concept of 'the people' upon whose consent the stability of constitutional government would depend.²⁷

The 1867–1884 reforms: towards a universal 'right' to vote and a 'fair' electoral contest

Minor reforms were enacted in the thirty-five years following 1832. The requirement that MPs be substantial landowners was modified in 1838—personal as well as real property would now suffice. The requirement was abolished altogether, without opposition from the Lords, in 1858. Nevertheless, the system remained manifestly 'undemocratic' as we now understand that term. In the 1847 election, over 60% of seats had only one candidate.²⁸ Parliament undertook some ad hoc initiatives to remove the most blatant instances of electoral corruption. Legislation passed in 1844 and 1847 disenfranchised the boroughs of Sudbury and St Albans respectively; their seats were reallocated to the larger counties.²⁹ More systematic revision occurred in 1867.

Disraeli's 1867 Reform Bill attracted no substantial opposition in the Lords.³⁰ Its Commons passage, in contrast, was extraordinarily tortuous. Disraeli led a minority Tory Party in the Commons in an administration headed by Lord Darby. It assumed office following the resignation of Lord John Russell's Liberal government when a backbench Liberal rebellion defeated Russell's own reform plans; the rebels (known as 'the Cave') thought Russell's proposals too extensive. The 1867 Act introduced a modest redistribution to reflect demographic trends. Its main focus, however, was on qualification for the franchise. Over a million voters joined the electoral roll, doubling its size. This was more than twice as many as envisaged by Russell's measure. Yet those very MPs who had voted against Russell subsequently supported Disraeli. Perhaps the most striking feature of the 1867 controversy is that a matter of such great constitutional significance was resolved not according to its substantive merits per se, but according to what Disraeli calculated would best serve his party's short term survival in government.³¹

Disraeli's great achievement was to produce a Bill supported not only by moderate Conservatives, but also by radical Liberals and reactionary Tories. The centre ranks of ²⁶ Ibid, at 204.

²⁷ Previous editions of this book addressed the nineteenth Chartist movement for electoral reform. Readers interested in that issue should refer to the 5th edition, ch 7, p 207 at <<http://www.oxfordtextbooks.co.uk/orc/loveland6e>>.

²⁸ Brock op cit pp 326–333.

²⁹ O'Leary op cit p 22.

³⁰ Turbeville (1958) op cit pp 422–425.

³¹ Fascinating studies are provided by Cowling M (1967) 1867: Disraeli, Gladstone, and revolution and Turbeville (1958) op cit pp 396–428.

the Tories and Liberals (the Liberals led in effect by Gladstone) had become so mutually antagonistic that it was inconceivable either would support the other on any reform measure. It was also generally believed (as a legacy of 1832) that the Liberals favoured more far-reaching reform than the Tories.

The Bill detached the radicals from the Liberal Party by proposing to reduce the county franchise qualification from £50 to £15, and to extend the borough franchise to any adult male paying poor rates. However it simultaneously placated reactionary Tories by creating 'fancy franchises' to give additional votes to individuals with certain property or educational qualifications. Furthermore, borough ratepayers could vote only if they paid their rates personally: those who paid their rates to their landlord within their rent (predominantly poorer tenants) would not be enfranchised. Initially one might think Disraeli's concessions would have alienated radical support. But Disraeli had tacitly agreed with radical MPs to acquiesce if they removed those restrictions in Committee, where the government was in a minority. The Committee stage modified the Bill in both progressive and reactionary directions. The personal payment and fancy franchise provisions were removed, and the county franchise reduced to £12, but the radicals could not muster majority support for the secret ballot, for government subsidy of election expenses, and for the explicit enfranchisement of women.³²

Neither Disraeli nor Gladstone were then 'democrats'. Gladstone's Liberalism did not extend to enfranchising 'the poorest, the least instructed and the most dependent members of the community'.³³ Nevertheless, Gladstone was regarded in some quarters, both reactionary and radical, as coming closer to an embrace of 'democracy' than any other leading politician. And barely twenty years later, Gladstone led Parliament a considerable way along such a path.

The dawning of the democratic age?

Shortly after the passage of the 1867 Act, Disraeli steered the Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections Act through Parliament. The Act returned jurisdiction over disputed elections to the courts. The measure had both practical and symbolic effects; the former in ensuring that a coherent body of precedent defining unacceptable behaviour would emerge; the latter in suggesting that the electoral process was henceforth subject to orthodox rule of law principles.

The secret ballot was introduced in 1872. The 1868 general election had been attended by substantial corruption and intimidation.³⁴ A Select Committee established in 1869 identified the secret ballot as the most effective anti-corruption device. Gladstone's Liberal administration introduced a Bill in 1871, opposed by the Tories in the Commons, and vetoed by the Lords. Gladstone submitted a similar Bill in 1872, and threatened a dissolution if it was rejected. The Bill was grudgingly approved. Equally significant was the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act 1883. This limited the amount of money that individual candidates could spend on their local campaign, the amount based on a (small) per capita sum for each voter.

Both measures indicated a further cultural shift towards a meritocratic rather than aristocratic constitutional morality. The political process itself was increasingly structured by middle class values of fair competition, in which political power was won on the basis of rational argument, rather than the unthinking deference previously accorded to landowning interests. By the mid-1880s, that rationality had led Parliament to include a substantial proportion of working class men within the electorate.

³² Cowling op cit pp 223–226.

³³ Cowling op cit p 40.

³⁴ See Rover C (1967) Women's suffrage and party politics in Britain 1866–1914 pp 40–41.

The key element of Gladstone's 1884 reform was a uniform borough/county voting qualification, set at the lower borough level, which would enfranchise two million additional voters.³⁵ The Tories initially opposed the Bill. Although the Liberals had a reliable Commons majority, they were a minority in the Lords. Lord Salisbury, leader of the Tory peers, was ready to apply his 'referendal theory' of the veto power,³⁶ and force a dissolution. Many Liberal MPs relished the prospect of a veto, seeing an opportunity to curb the upper chamber's powers. Gladstone himself described any such veto as 'A precedent against Liberty'.³⁷ As in 1832, the Lords' intransigence provoked widespread public agitation in support of reform. In the Commons Tory MPs failed to follow Salisbury's advice to give the Bill 'a good parting kick at third reading'.³⁸ The Lords was thus unable to point to a clear split in electoral opinion on the issue. Crisis was avoided by negotiation between a handful of each party's leaders, with little debate in either house, which prompted the leading Liberal newspaper (The Manchester Guardian) to describe the outcome as 'a usurpation of the office and powers of Parliament'.³⁹ This contrasted markedly with the passage of the 1867 Bill, where the Commons committee stage was of paramount importance to the Act's final shape. The statutory label one may attach to both measures conceals substantial differences in the realities of the legislative process.⁴⁰

The reforms introduced in the RPA 1918 had a more bipartisan air. For the first time, women were granted the right to vote. In the same year, Parliament also accepted that women could sit as members of the Commons.⁴¹ Adult male suffrage was granted solely on the basis of six months' residence in a constituency (women under thirty had to wait until further reform was enacted in 1928). Some citizens still had two votes, since the university franchise and a business premises franchise were retained, but multiple out-voting was eliminated. The Act also acknowledged the desirability of maintaining constituencies with electorates of equal size, although it did not demand exact mathematical equality. Additionally, the RPA 1918 made several significant financial innovations. Parliament finally accepted that the government, not the candidates, should bear the administrative costs of the election. To discourage frivolous candidates, a deposit of £150 (then a substantial sum) was required. This was returned if a candidate attracted more than 12.5% of the vote. To impose further economic equality on candidates, the spending limits introduced by the 1883 Act were almost halved in real terms. It was nevertheless not until 1955 that all seats were contested.

Table 7.3 Uncontested seats in general elections

| 1906 | 1910* | 1918 | 1924 | 1929 | 1931 | 1935 | 1945 | 1951 |
|------|-------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|
| 114 | 163 | 107 | 32 | 7 | 67 | 40 | 3 | 4 |

* Second election.

Source: Adapted from Butler and Sloman op cit pp 180–182.

³⁵ See generally Jones A (1972) The Politics of reform 1884.

³⁶ See 'The doctrine of the mandate', ch 6, pp 158–160 above.

³⁷ Jones op cit p 149. ³⁸ Jones op cit at p 148. ³⁹ Jones op cit at p 221.

⁴⁰ Previous editions of this book addressed the movements for women's enfranchisement. Readers interested in that issue should refer to the 5th edition, ch 7, p 211 at <<http://www.oxfordtextbooks.co.uk/orc/loveland6e>>.

⁴¹ Parliament (Qualification of Women Act) 1918.

II. The contemporary electoral process

Despite the evidently ‘democratic’ credentials of Britain’s electoral system, the contemporary political environment has contained many voices in recent years advocating electoral reform. Critics have three foci of discontent. The first relates to constituency apportionment. The second concerns the conduct of election campaigns, especially the cost and content of party political advertising. The third, and most significant, is the counting system through which citizens’ choices are transmitted.

Apportionment—drawing constituency boundaries

The Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986 is a consolidating statute which defines the powers and responsibilities of a body called the Boundary Commission. The Commission determines the size and shape of constituencies in Scotland, Northern Ireland, Wales and England. This is obviously a task which must be sensitive to accusations of political bias. Boundaries could intentionally be drawn in ways that bestow a political advantage on one party. To minimise this problem, each country’s Commission (nominally chaired by the Speaker) is headed by a high court judge. She is assisted by two other members. Members are appointed by the government, but, as a matter of convention, are also approved by the opposition parties. A Commission taking this form was first established in 1944. Earlier legislation had created bodies with less clearly structured apportionment responsibilities, staffed by party politicians, which consequently had great difficulty rebutting accusations that they could not be objective.⁴² At fifteen-year intervals, the Commission holds local inquiries concerning reapportionment proposals. The Commission then presents a report to the Home Secretary making recommendations. The Home Secretary must then lay the report, with an implementing Order In Council (which may amend the proposals), before the Commons and Lords for approval.

Apportionment criteria—a non-justiciable issue?

The Commission’s discretion is structured by ‘rules’ contained in the Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986 Sch 2. The ‘rule’ label is a misnomer, since the legal status of Sch 2 provisions is frequently merely guidance to which the Commission must have regard. Rule 1 specifies (with some precision) the total number of constituencies. Rule 7 requires the Commission to calculate an electoral quota—a figure arrived at by dividing the total number of registered voters by the number of constituencies. At present, the quota is approximately 66,000.

Thereafter, the Commission must apply rather more discretionary criteria, seemingly ranked in the following order of importance. Rule 4 provides that, ‘as far as practicable’, constituencies should not cross county or London borough boundaries. Rule 5 then directs the Commission, subject to rule 4, to make all constituencies as near to the electoral quota as possible: it may only depart from rule 4 if respecting county or London borough boundaries would produce ‘excessive disparity’ between a constituency’s size and the electoral quota. Rule 6 then permits the Commission to override rules 4 and 5 if ‘special considerations, including in particular the size, shape and accessibility of a constituency, appear to render a departure desirable’.

The legislation therefore does not require mathematical equivalence in constituency sizes. The original 1944 Act did make numerical equality the most important apportionment consideration, but this was amended in 1947 in favour of affording top priority to producing constituencies based on traditional local 'communities'.⁴³ Parliament clearly still viewed the Commons as the 'House of Communities'.

⁴² See for example Cowling op cit pp 231–232.

In practice, the Act produces substantial discrepancies in constituency size. Prior to the 1983 reapportionment, Buckingham constituency had 116,000 voters, while Newcastle Central had only 24,000.⁴⁴ Despite the 1983 reforms, by 1987 over 100 seats deviated from the quota by more than 20%. At the various extremes were the Orkney and Shetland constituency with 31,000 voters, and the Isle of Wight with over 98,000.⁴⁵

Such variations provoke criticisms of anti-democratic practice, on the grounds that the system ignores the principle of 'one vote one value'.⁴⁶ This complaint has a collective and individuated dimension. Collectively, the votes of Orkney residents were 'worth' more than three times as much as those of Isle of Wight residents, since both constituencies returned only one MP. More generally, the 'value' of a given constituency's voting power increases/decreases according to the extent by which its electorate is smaller/larger than the electoral quota. All communities are not created equal for electoral purposes.

The effective 'value' of an individual vote is more difficult to gauge. If, for example, residents in Newcastle Central and Buckingham voted in 1983 in identical proportions for the Conservative, Labour and Liberal Parties, the relative sizes of the constituencies would not affect the parties' overall performance. However, if a party had only 12,001 supporters in the two areas combined (ie 9% of the total electorate), it could nonetheless win one (50%) of the two seats if they all lived and voted in Newcastle Central. This is an extreme illustration of the more general point that a party benefits greatly if its supporters are disproportionately concentrated in small constituencies.

The apportionment criteria undoubtedly contain appreciable scope for unintended political bias,⁴⁷ and, thus, one might have thought, wide scope for legal challenges to the Commission's recommendations. However Parliament sought to curtail litigation by providing in s 4(7) that any Order in Council purportedly made under the Act 'shall not be questioned in any legal proceedings'. The use of 'purports' presumably safeguards the Act against the judicial 'threat' posed by Anisminic. This suggests that legislators see apportionment as a non-justiciable issue, to which Diceyan notions of the rule of law cannot apply. Thus far the courts appear to agree with that analysis.⁴⁸

The 1969 controversy

The court's limited supervisory role has contributed to an explicitly partisan mode of dispute settlement within Parliament, as evidenced by events in 1969. The Commission's 1969 recommendations, reflecting population movement away from the cities, seemed likely to cost the Labour Party a dozen seats in the next election. James Callaghan, the Home Secretary, decided not to introduce an implementing Order. Instead, the government introduced a Bill effecting only some of the Commission's proposals, and also removing the Home Secretary's statutory obligation to lay the Order. The government (feebly) defended its strategy on the basis that constituency reapportionment should be carried out alongside the redrawing of local government boundaries expected within the next few years.

⁴³ See Craig J (1959) 'Parliament and Boundary Commissions' Public Law 23.

⁴⁴ Alder J (1994) Constitutional and administrative law p 161.

⁴⁵ Norton (1991) op cit p 94.

⁴⁶ See especially Wade (1980) op cit ch 2.

⁴⁷ Some commentators convincingly argue substantial bias is invariably unavoidable; see Taylor P and Gudgin G (1976) 'The myth of non-partisan cartography' Urban Studies 13.

⁴⁸ See Harper v Home Secretary [1955] Ch 238, [1955] 1 All ER 331, CA. See Craig J op cit; De Smith S (1955) 'Boundaries between Parliament and the courts' Modern Law Review 281.

The Conservative opposition considered the government was acting for partisan purposes. Consequently, the Lords' Conservative majority passed several wrecking amendments to the Bill, which was then withdrawn. Rather than reintroduce the Bill and invoke the Parliament Act procedures, the government instructed Labour MPs to vote against the Orders when Callaghan laid them before the Commons. The boundary changes could therefore not be introduced before the next election. This was perfectly legal; the Act did not require either House to approve the Orders, it merely commanded the Home Secretary to present them. The cynicism underlying the Cabinet's strategy is neatly revealed in Crossman's Diaries:

We agreed to have all the Orders put to the Commons and the trick would be to put them but not approve them, so that... we would negate the lot. [Wilson has won]. We have not been discredited because the ordinary public are convinced that both the Government and the Tories are concerned for our own self-interest....⁴⁹

The 1983 controversy

While Orders cannot be challenged in court, there is no ouster clause preventing litigation trying to stop the Commission presenting its report to the Home Secretary. Whether such litigation enjoyed any prospects of success was, until 1983, an open question—to which the courts then offered a curt answer.

The Labour Party feared that the Commission's recommendations for the 1983 election would significantly benefit the Conservative Party. In R v Boundary Commission for England, ex p Foot,⁵⁰ the party's leader, Michael Foot, sought a judicial review of the Commission's findings. Mr Foot contended that the Commission had misconstrued its responsibilities by regarding the statutory 'rule' requiring approximate parity in constituency sizes as subordinate to the 'rule' that constituencies should not straddle county or London borough boundaries. Mr Foot argued that the substantial divergences in constituency size envisaged by the proposals: 'offend[ed] against the principle of equal representation for all electors which is required by our modern system of Parliamentary representation'.⁵¹ The applicants sought a court order to prevent the Commission from submitting its recommendations to the Home Secretary.

Given the wording of the 1949 Act, the applicants were advancing an optimistic argument. Whether the constitution recognises a principle of 'equal representation' in electoral districting which demands mathematical equality is a moot (and political) point, but not one expressed unambiguously in the Act. In effect, Mr Foot was asking the Court to attach the same constitutional significance to the moral principle of 'one vote one value' as it had attached to the moral principle of the 'rule of law' in Anisminic. The Court declined to do so. Sir John Donaldson MR categorised the Commission's task as presumptively non-justiciable in the absence of all but the most egregious malfeasance.

The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000

In 1999, the Labour government introduced the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Bill which would transfer the Boundary Commissions' function to a new statutory body, the Electoral Commission.⁵² The Commission would consist of between five and nine members, nominally appointed by the Queen (in effect by the Prime Minister) following approval by the Commons. The Bill also proposed creation of a body called the Speaker's Committee to oversee the activities of the Commission. Rather bizarrely, ⁴⁹ Op cit p 660.

⁵⁰ [1983] QB 600, CA.

⁵¹ [1983] QB 600 at 617, CA.

⁵² See Oliver D (1999) 'An Electoral Commission: an ingenious idea' Public Law 585.

the Speaker would not sit on the Committee, which would comprise the Home Secretary, the Minister responsible for local government, the Chair of the Home Affairs Select Committee and six backbench MPs. The Bill requires the Committee to approve candidates selected to sit on the Commission. The proposal seems to be an attempt not so much to depoliticise the apportionment question as to ensure that it functions on the basis of multi-party agreement. The Bill was enacted in 2000 as the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act (hereafter the PPERA 2000). The timetable for the Electoral Commission to take on the functions of the Boundary Commission was relaxed. The Commission took over responsibility for delineating local government boundaries in April 2002; its powers in respect of parliamentary constituencies have yet to be assumed.

To that point, the notion of 'one vote one value' was an idea whose time had not yet come within the British constitution. We consider a more recent initiative to address this issue at the end of this chapter. However, the potential shortcomings of the apportionment process should not be seen in isolation from other aspects of electoral law, especially the vote-counting method discussed below. But before broaching that question, we briefly explore the conduct of election campaigns.

The contents and conduct of election campaigns

This section discusses four subjects: the voters, the candidates, and the financing and content of electoral advertising. Jurisdiction over disputed elections is still vested in the High Court, which is empowered to invalidate results and disqualify malfeasors from subsequent elections. Few petitions are now presented, a state of affairs primarily attributable to an apparently pervasive acceptance of the moral propriety of electoral law.

The voters

Voter registration was introduced in 1832 to minimise fraudulent voting. The RPA 1918 introduced a more rigorous process, giving local authorities responsibility for ensuring the register's accuracy. In the modern era, there have been few suggestions that the registration process is significantly abused.

Constitutional morality now accepts that voting is not a privilege earned through property or educational qualifications, but a right extending to virtually all adult citizens, forfeited only in very limited circumstances. The principle now underlying the grant of the franchise is that of residence. Since the passage of the RPA 1948, all other citizens over 21 years old (reduced to 18 in 1968) may vote if their names are entered on the electoral register of the constituency(ies) where they have a place of residence.⁵³ Until 2000, the register was compiled annually in October by local government officials. This had the unfortunate consequence that prospective voters who just missed the October deadline could not register in their new constituencies until the next October, and so would be unable to vote there if an election was held in the interim. The RPA 2000 removed this difficulty by permitting the register to be updated on a continual basis. While there is no legal obligation compelling registered citizens to vote, failure to respond to registration forms is an offence. The university and business franchises were abolished in 1948, since when no-one has been entitled to more than one vote in any general election.

In recent years, several minor initiatives have been undertaken to increase the size of the electorate still further. The RPA 1985 made it possible for previously registered voters living overseas to maintain a vote in their old constituencies. The RPA 2000 promoted by the first Blair government further eroded the linkage between voting rights and residence by making it possible for homeless people to register a notional residence for electoral purposes. A homeless person may give as his/her address; 'a place in the UK where he commonly spends a substantial part of his time (whether during the day or night)'.⁵⁴ The 2000 Act also entitles prisoners held in gaol on remand to use the prison as their residential address.

⁵³ 'Residence' is a justiciable concept. See Ferris v Wallace 1936 SC 561; Fox v Stirk [1970] 2 QB 463, [1970] 3 All ER 7, CA; Hipperson v Newbury District Electoral Registration Officer [1985] QB 1060, [1985] 2 All ER 456, CA.

The only citizens⁵⁵ presumptively excluded from the franchise because of their status are the Monarch, life peers and the remaining hereditary members of the Lords. Other disqualifications are premised on failings of behaviour or competence. Individuals may not vote if they are serving prison sentences, or have recently been convicted of electoral malpractice. Some parliamentary consideration was given during the passage of the RPA 2000 to enfranchising convicted prisoners, but the Blair government held the view that disenfranchisement was a logical additional penalty to be suffered by persons gaoled for having committed crimes.⁵⁶ The issue was again under consideration, this time by the Conservative/Liberal coalition government, in 2010 and 2011. The RPA 2000 also removed the previous disqualification of people detained in hospital under the Mental Health Act 1983.

The candidates

There are few collective prohibitions on candidacy.⁵⁷ Parties advocating extremist political philosophies such as the British National Party and Socialist Workers Party regularly field candidates, albeit never victorious ones. Nor is there any prohibition on parties such as Plaid Cymru, the Scottish Nationalists, or Sinn Fein, whose primary policy objective has often been to secure their respective country's independence. The entitlement to contest elections does not however extend to certain 'proscribed organisations', designated under the Prevention of Terrorism Acts. The justification for this is presumably that the groups concerned have chosen to pursue their political objectives outside the democratic process.

The requirement that MPs be wealthy was abolished in 1872. Current electoral law retains a modest financial barrier to candidacy itself. All candidates must produce a deposit of £500, which is forfeit if they fail to gain 5% of the vote. The rationale for the election deposit is not that impecunious candidates are per se unsuitable legislators, but that it prevents frivolous candidates from belittling the election process and/or making it harder to administer.

Candidates need not reside in their chosen constituency, but must be nominated by ten registered voters. Various statutes⁵⁸ also disqualify a miscellaneous collection of citizens from candidacy, including those under 18 years old, holders of judicial office and members of various government bodies. Church of England and Roman Catholic clergymen were banned from candidacy until 2001.⁵⁹ Prohibitions are also placed on bankrupt debtors, and some categories of criminals and the mentally ill. These are overall residual and ⁵⁴ RPA 2000, s 6, amending RPA 1983, s 7.

⁵⁵ 'Citizens' in this context is broadly defined to include not just UK citizens, but also citizens of Ireland and Commonwealth countries.

⁵⁶ See Lardy H (2001) 'Representation of the People Act 2000' Modern Law Review 63.

⁵⁷ See the helpful guidance published by the Electoral Commission at: <http://www.electoralcommission.org.uk/__data/assets/electoral_commission_pdf_file/0015/14154/UK-Parliamentary-by-election-guidance-2011.pdf>.

⁵⁸ Primarily the House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975 and Electoral Administration Act 2005.

⁵⁹ House of Commons (Removal of Clergy Disqualification) Act 2001.

quantitatively insignificant restrictions, although as chapter eight suggests, individual exclusions can provoke great controversy.

The legal framework regulating candidacy is directed towards the candidate as an individual. Unlike most other 'democratic countries', Britain has no legislation dealing explicitly with such issues as the selection of parliamentary candidates, the formation of party policy, and the election of party leaders. Nor is there as yet anything to indicate that the courts consider such matters justiciable. An opportunity to test that assumption arose in 1990, when the Conservative Party ignored its rules for electing its leader when John Major succeeded Margaret Thatcher.⁶⁰ No challenge was issued however. Nor do constitutional lawyers appear to consider the question important: intra-party democracy is an issue few legal commentators have examined.⁶¹

In 1994 it was suggested that legislation prohibiting gender and race discrimination might apply to political parties' internal membership and candidate selection practices, but this has yet to be confirmed by the courts. This raises a further dimension of the 'electoral equality' principle: women and citizens of minority ethnicity are severely under-represented both as MPs and candidates, and, as candidates, are disproportionately concentrated in unwinnable seats.⁶²

Sanders v Chichester

A further lacuna in electoral law was revealed by a curious episode in 1994. The plaintiff in *Sanders v Chichester*⁶³ was a Liberal Democrat candidate in the 1994 election for members of the European Parliament,⁶⁴ although the issue the case raised was of equal relevance in elections to the Commons. Mr Sanders was seeking to have the result of his constituency's election set aside.

The defendant was the successful candidate for the seat, although it was not his behaviour that was in question. A Mr Huggett had stood in the election as a 'Liberal Democrat'. In Mr Sanders' view, Mr Huggett was seeking to mislead careless Liberal Democrat supporters into voting for him rather than Mr Sanders to enhance the Conservative candidate's chances of winning. If that was Huggett's intention, he succeeded admirably. He attracted some 10,000 votes. The seat was won by Mr Chichester, the Conservative candidate, by fewer than 800 votes.⁶⁵

The judgment turned on the meaning of rules 6(2) and (3) of Sch 1 of the RPA 1983. These rules required candidates to list their full name and address on the ballot paper. Candidates did not need to list any further information, but could if they wished add a description of up to six words. The description was generally used to confirm a candidate's party political affiliation.⁶⁶

The court concluded that it could invalidate an election result only if a candidate misstated her full name and address, since Parliament had made this aspect of candidate identification mandatory. However, the court held that Parliament had not intended that ⁶⁰ See Alderman R and Smith M (1990) 'Can British Prime Ministers be given the push by their parties' Parliamentary Affairs 260; Alderman R and Carter N (1991) 'A very Tory coup: the ousting of Mrs Thatcher' Parliamentary Affairs 125.

⁶¹ The notable exception being Dawn Oliver; see her chapter in successive editions of Jowell and Oliver op cit.

⁶² Norton op cit pp 101–103.

⁶³ [1995] 03 LS Gaz R 37.

⁶⁴ An institution of the European Community, a topic broached below in chs 11 and 12.

⁶⁵ Mr Huggett denied this was his intention. There was no suggestion that he was encouraged to stand by the Conservative Party.

⁶⁶ Permission to add the description was only introduced in 1968. Until then, candidates had not been allowed to identify their party on the ballot paper.

the permissive, description element of the information that candidates might enter on the ballot form could provide grounds for overturning an election result. The Act did not provide a legal mechanism to protect voters and candidates against potentially misleading entries on the ballot form: 'the rules did not prohibit candidates, whether out of spite or a wicked sense of fun, from describing themselves in a confusing way or indulging in spoiling tactics'.⁶⁷

This was an unfortunately sterile interpretation of the statute. Parliament's failure to grant explicit protection against spoiling candidates to parties (and, more importantly, their supporters) was reprehensible in the context of a modern party-based electoral contest, but this was not necessarily a barrier to the court producing that result. Teleologically construed, the candidate's power to add a description to his/her name and address could readily be seen as a device intended to aid electors to make an informed decision when casting their votes. Descriptions which manifestly hampered that outcome would thus be unlawful.

The scope for abuse left open by Sanders was reduced by the Registration of Political Parties Act 1998. The Act permitted parties to register particular emblems with the Registrar of Companies, and empowered them to prevent other parties using the emblem. More importantly, the Act prohibited candidates from describing themselves on the ballot paper in terms likely to mislead voters into assuming the candidate represents a registered party. The PPERA 2000 introduced a more extensive system of party registration, overseen by the Electoral Commission, which effectively precludes candidates standing for non-existent or 'spoiling' parties. This would seem a welcome—if belated—reform to electoral law, which clearly recognises the primacy of party affiliation in guiding voter behaviour.

Financing elections

A similar conclusion might now be drawn in respect of laws regulating electoral finance.⁶⁸ British campaigns are no longer marked by the violence and intimidation which so concerned the 1832 reformers. Nor do bribery or treating affect the contemporary process.⁶⁹ Such threats would technically be caught by the crime of 'undue influence' (now RPA 1983, s 115), but s 115 prosecutions are more likely in respect of activities such as defacing a candidate's posters or pulling leaflets from voters' letterboxes.⁷⁰

But there is more to fairness than an absence of physical force and financial corruption. This becomes apparent when one observes that until enactment of the PPERA 2000 the discrepancy between the historically local form of the electoral system and the nationalisation of political choice evident in the apportionment process was also apparent in the laws governing the amounts of money that parties and candidates can spend on election campaigns.

The reasoning behind the limits on expenditure first introduced by the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act 1883 makes obvious democratic sense. The restrictions ensure that the merits of a candidate's arguments, rather than the size of her advertising budget, determine her electoral popularity. The letter of the 1883 law has been retained, with regularly updated financial thresholds. At present, each candidate is allowed by RPA 1983, s 76 to spend around £7,000, plus a few pence for every registered voter in the constituency. Rich candidates thus cannot derive an advantage from their wealth by, for ⁶⁷ [1995] 03 LS Gaz R 37 at 39.

⁶⁸ On the pre-2000 position see particularly Rawlings op cit ch 5; Ewing K (1987) The funding of political parties in Britain.

⁶⁹ See Rawlings op cit pp 146–149.

⁷⁰ Roberts v Hogg [1971] SLT 78.

example, employing dozens of full time helpers, or sending out glossy leaflets for weeks on end. Doubts exist as to when the expenditure clock starts ticking. The announcement of the dissolution of Parliament would appear the most likely point. This means of course that a wealthy candidate could spend unlimited amounts of money on publicity prior to the dissolution. The rules on this issue were altered with effect from 2010. Provision is now made for candidates' spending to be split between what are termed 'the long campaign' and the 'short campaign'. The 'long campaign' runs for some three months prior to the dissolution of Parliament. During this period, candidates could spend £25,000 plus 5p/7p per registered voter in urban/rural constituencies. The short campaign runs for some three weeks immediately prior to the election. Candidates were permitted to spend some £7150 plus 5p/7p per registered voter in urban/rural constituencies in this period.⁷¹

Early efforts to enforce expenditure limits were handicapped by the law's limited focus. Only the candidate himself or his agent were covered by the rule: expenditure by 'independent' individuals or companies was not subject to any ceiling. This provoked ingenious efforts by candidates and their supporters to establish 'independent' financial relationships, and much litigation ensued as defeated opponents sought to disprove the supporter's allegedly autonomous status.⁷² This loophole was plugged by RPA 1918, s 34(1) (now RPA 1983, s 75), which prohibited any expenditure intended to promote a candidate unless written authorisation was received from the candidate's agent. Any such expenditure counts towards the candidate's overall limit.⁷³ The candidate's agent must compile an election return detailing all expenses. This is a public document, open to inspection by other candidates. Failure to produce the return is also an offence. However there is no mechanism for independent official scrutiny of returns. Any challenge to the legality of a candidate's expenditure is dependent upon the initiative of other candidates or voters.

The Fiona Jones case

Before 2000, the law on this question was markedly ambiguous. This was illustrated by an episode involving Fiona Jones, the successful Labour candidate for Newark in 1997. The defeated Liberal candidate accused Ms Jones of falsifying her expenses. Jones was convicted under s 82 of the RPA 1983 for dishonestly making a false declaration of her election expense. Jones protested her innocence, and announced she would appeal. The Act seemed to require that any person convicted of such a crime vacate her Commons seat. The Speaker subsequently declared the seat vacant. Shortly thereafter, before any by-election was held, the Court of Appeal quashed the conviction.⁷⁴

The Court's judgment dwelt primarily on the law's extraordinarily imprecise nature. Section 76(1) of the 1983 Act provides that:

(1) No sum shall be paid and no expense shall be incurred by a candidate at an election or his election agent, whether before, during or after an election, on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of the election, in excess of the maximum amount specified in this section.

Section 118 then defined 'election expenses' as: 'expenses incurred, whether before, during or after the election, on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of the election'.

⁷¹ Electoral Commission (2011) UK general election 2010 campaign spending report p 3.

⁷² O'Leary op cit pp 54–55.

⁷³ For the background to the 1918 reform see R v Hailwood and Ackroyd Ltd [1928] 2 KB 277, CCA.

⁷⁴ [1999] 2 Cr App Rep 253, CA.

Lord Bingham CJ suggested that the meaning of ss 76 and 118 was obscure:

There is no simple and decisive test to determine whether an expense is or is not an election expense.... Some expenses obviously are, some obviously not. But there may be some expenses about which reasonable people, applying themselves to the question in all good faith, could reach different conclusions.... In this intermediate area, questions of judgment may arise.⁷⁵

The Court accepted that it was possible that certain expenditures that Ms Jones had incurred were indeed 'election expenses' such as the cost of renting an office, shared with candidates in local elections, prior to the general election being called, and the use on polling day of a pre-existing database recording names and addresses of likely Labour voters. But there was room for doubt on that point. And given that doubt, there was no evidence to suggest that Jones had acted dishonestly by knowingly making a false declaration.⁷⁶

The issue then before the High Court in *A-G v Jones*⁷⁷ was whether Ms Jones' vacation of the seat should be regarded as invalidating the Newark election or whether it was merely a temporary incapacity, which if removed by a successful appeal against conviction under s 82, did not prevent Ms Jones resuming her seat.

It seems unfortunate, on a matter so significant to the MP concerned, her opponents and their electors, that the RPA 1983 did not offer a clear answer to this question. In a short, very technical judgment, the court held that the Act imposed different consequences on candidates who filed false returns dependent on the forum before which the impugned behaviour was challenged. The court held that the RPA provided for invalidation of the election only if proceedings were undertaken before an election court. A criminal conviction did not invalidate the election result, and an MP in Ms Jones' position could resume her seat as long as a by-election had not been held in the interim. The result makes obvious sense, but required some ingenuity on the Court's part, which suggested that a more streamlined statutory scheme might be desirable.

The PPERA 2000 proposed some amendments to this area of the law. But these did not obviously cure the uncertainties highlighted by the Jones case, particularly in the way that account is taken of what might be termed 'spending in kind'; that is to say a candidate's use of office space or campaign personnel donated by supporters.⁷⁸

A local not national limit on party spending

Until 2000, spending limits only applied to local campaigns. As Alder observes: 'The kind of campaign envisaged by the law is centred upon knocking on doors and holding meetings in public halls'.⁷⁹ As with apportionment, the law did not recognise the concept of a 'general election' for financial purposes; rather it saw 660 individual elections.

This is illustrated by the Tronoh Mines case.⁸⁰ Shortly before the 1951 General Election, the Tronoh Mines company placed an advertisement in The Times, part of which read:

The coming general election will give us all the opportunity of saving the country from being reduced, through the policies of the Socialist government, to a bankrupt 'Welfare State'...

⁷⁵ [1999] 2 Cr App Rep 253 at 260, CA.

⁷⁶ 'It is not a crime to declare an honest belief in a declaration of election expenses in which some expenses which should have been included have been omitted... unless the person making the declaration knows that it is false in one or other respect or both. Honest belief in the truth of the declaration, and thus in the completeness and accuracy of the figures disclosed, is a complete defence': [1999] 2 Cr App Rep 253, CA, per Lord Bingham CJ.

⁷⁷ [2000] QB 66, [1999] 3 All ER 436.

⁷⁸ See Ewing K (2000) 'Transparency, accountability and equality: the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000' Public Law 542.

⁷⁹ Alder op cit p 163.

⁸⁰ R v Tronoh Mines Ltd [1952] 1 All ER 697, CA.

The advert clearly disparaged the Labour Party, and thus indirectly boosted the Conservatives' prospects. The company and The Times were prosecuted (under what is now RPA 1983, s 75) for making unauthorised expenditure designed to promote the candidacy of the Conservative in the constituency where the paper was printed. McNair J held that there was no case to answer. He considered that the advert's purpose was 'to advance the prospects of the anti-Socialist cause generally' by influencing public opinion as a whole.⁸¹ The Act however, addressed only efforts to promote 'a candidate at a particular election, and not candidates at elections generally'.⁸² Since the advert played to a national, not constituency audience, it was not prohibited.

The inference of the judgment was that there was no legal limit to the funds a party could spend on its national campaigns. Parties could put as many adverts as they could afford in national newspapers; or buy as many poster sites they as could afford all over the country. Rawlings observed that Tronoh Mines 'is an excellent illustration of the blindness of our electoral law to the realities of national election campaigning'.⁸³ That is an unduly harsh criticism of McNair J, whose interpretation of the Act was entirely logical. If the law was unsatisfactory, blame was more appropriately laid at Parliament's feet.

The courts have however concluded that the rules apply to locally targeted expenditure intended to secure the defeat of a particular candidate. This point was first made in *R v Hailwood and Ackroyd Ltd.*⁸⁴ The defendant, a disaffected Conservative, distributed leaflets in his constituency which urged voters not to support the Conservative candidate, but which did not expressly advise them to support any other candidate. The Court of Appeal upheld the conviction, on the grounds that such activities indirectly improved the chances of all other candidates in the constituency and should be construed as a financial contribution to their campaigns. The principle was confirmed fifty years later by the House of Lords in DPP v Luft.⁸⁵ Luft had circulated leaflets in several constituencies urging voters not to support the National Front candidate, but did not specify a favoured candidate. A unanimous court approved Lord Diplock's conclusion that: 'to persuade candidates not to vote for one candidate in order to prevent his being elected must have the effect of improving the collective prospects of success of the other candidates'.⁸⁶ Had Hailwood and Luft expressed their distaste via an advert in The Times, their expenditure would have been permissible.

In the Britain of 1883, a concept of financial equality limited to local campaigns was perhaps defensible. The party system was clearly well-established by then, but one still had 'independent' candidates, and the relative technological backwardness of the news media and transport infrastructure made local campaigns an important contributor to voter choice. Party loyalties influenced voter behaviour, but they were not obviously the dominant factor.

In modern Britain, political realities are very different. General elections are fought and won and lost in the national arena. Voter choice is motivated primarily by party affiliation. Similarly, the information on which that choice is based is more likely to have been gleaned from the national news media than from localised techniques such as listening to a candidate's local speeches or reading her election literature. One might plausibly conclude therefore that the more money a party spends on its national campaign, the more likely it is to persuade people all over the country that they should vote for that party's ⁸¹ [1952] 1 All ER 697 at 698.

⁸² [1952] 1 All ER 697 at 699.

⁸³ Op cit p 135.

⁸⁴ [1928] 2 KB 277, CCA.

⁸⁵ [1977] AC 962. See Munro C (1976) 'Elections and expenditure' Public Law 300.

⁸⁶ [1977] AC 962 at 983.

local candidate. There is no guarantee that spending lots of money will win a party lots more support. But as table 7.4 indicates, campaign expenditure has been rising in recent years.

Whether one can establish a correlation between the Conservative Party's higher spending and its electoral success in the 1983, 1987 and 1992 elections is a question offering no easy answer. Deciding whether the constitution should tolerate the possibility of electoral choice being swayed by party wealth would seem more straightforward. The spirit of the 1883 Act was to sever the direct link between financial and political power; the retention merely of its letter in a quite different political context ensured that that objective was no longer being effectively achieved.

An equally significant omission was the absence of any legal requirement that parties reveal the sources of their income. This raised the possibility that powerful economic interests could 'buy' legislative influence. Neither were there any limits on the size of contributions that individuals or corporations might make to a political party. In the 1980s and 1990s, stories occasionally appeared in the national press alleging that life peerages have in effect been 'bought' by leading industrialists whose companies have made large donations to Conservative Party funds. Such allegations were unproven, but if substantiated would clearly further undermine the Lords' legitimacy. A greater concern was that substantial numbers of MPs might favour policies benefiting a substantial donor, irrespective of the policies' intrinsic merits. In the mid-1990s, particular concern was engendered by reports that the Conservative Party consistently accepted huge sums of money from overseas business interests, which created the suspicion that the donors were attempting to buy legislative influence. Such suspicions were intensified during the first term of the Blair government. Particular controversy arose over the gift of £1m given to the Labour Party by Bernie Ecclestone, the motor racing tycoon. The gift 'coincided' with an apparent abandonment by the government of a plan to ban tobacco advertising. Since Ecclestone derived vast amounts of his fortune from tobacco advertising, the inference that he had bought the change in government policy appeared well-founded. That the Labour Party subsequently returned the donation did little to allay suspicion that its financial integrity was compromised.

The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000

Such gaps in the law emphasised that the formal structure of this part of the constitution had not kept pace with changing political circumstances. The PPERA made a wide-ranging attempt to bring the rules of electoral finance law into line with contemporary political

Table 7.4 Party campaign spending in recent general elections

| | 1983 | 1987 | 1992 | 1997 | 2001 | 2005 | 2010 |
|--------------|-------|-------|--------|--------|--------|---------|--------|
| Conservative | £3.6m | £9.0m | £11.2m | £20.0m | £12.8m | £17.85m | £16.6m |
| Labour | £2.2m | £4.2m | £10.2m | £13.0m | £11.1m | £17.93m | £8.0m |
| Liberal/SDP | £1.9m | £2.0m | £1.8m | £0.7m | £1.4m | £4.3m | £4.7m |

Source: Compiled from data in Butler D and Kavanagh D (1988) The British general election of 1987 pp 235–236; (1993) The British general election of 1992 p 260; (1998) The British general election of 1997 p 242; The Guardian 17 December 2001; Electoral Commission (2005) 'Spending by political parties and campaign groups at the 5 May UK parliamentary election'; (2011) UK general election 2010 campaign spending report p 11.

realities. Several important initiatives were introduced. Most significantly, Part V and Sch 8 of the Act place limits on a party's national campaign expenditure.⁸⁷ The sum was fixed at £30,000 per constituency contested. Parties contesting only a few seats may spend a maximum of £810,000 in England, £120,000 in Scotland and £60,000 in Wales. The Act requires that each party would have to appoint a Treasurer and Deputy Treasurers who are the only persons permitted to authorise campaign expenditure. Following the campaign, the party Treasurer must submit detailed accounts to the Electoral Commission which are available for public inspection. Exceeding the limits is now a criminal offence.

The Act also provides that only individuals registered to vote in the UK and corporate bodies established in the UK can make donations to political parties. Any donations from non-permitted donors must be returned, and a knowing breach of the rules by a party Treasurer or a donor would be a criminal offence. All donations of over £200 must be recorded in the party's accounts, which must be submitted to the Electoral Commission and made available for public inspection at the end of each financial year.

These are valuable initiatives.⁸⁸ The rationale underlying the Bill was that political parties should be entirely candid about the sources of their income, thereby enabling voters to make a more informed choice about who to support. Importantly, the Bill enjoyed multi-party support in the Commons and the Lords and was enacted in largely unchanged form. In so far as the original Bill had an obvious weakness, it was in limiting penalties for breach of its provisions to individuals (in particular the party Treasurer). A penalty which involved invalidation of general election results in their entirety would not be practical. But the deterrent effect of the provisions might have been enhanced if their breach led to large fines being imposed on a party.

Both the Labour and Conservative Parties fell short of spending the maximum permissible amount in the 2005 and 2010 general elections.⁸⁹ This rather suggests that the concern evinced by the Act that the larger parties might augment their vote through unrestrained spending on campaigning was exaggerated. However the Act has brought more intense public and press focus to bear on the ways political parties raise their money. The Electoral Commission maintains an online database which contains detailed listings of all registrable donations to the political parties. This innovation substantially enhances the transparency of party funding by making the relevant information widely available and thereby enabling other political parties, the press or interested individuals to raise questions about the legality of donations made.⁹⁰

In 2002, continuing scandals over the main parties' (but especially the Labour Party's) evident predilections to take large sums of money in dubious circumstances from commercial sources led to renewed calls in the press, and within Parliament, for state financing of political parties, accompanied by calls for low limits on the amounts that individuals or companies could donate. The suggestion is a sound one. On the surface it appears profligate to allocate several million pounds of public money each year to political parties. But such expenditure would be substantially less damaging to the public purse than the status quo, in which it seems that parties in government are willing to channel large amounts of public expenditure in the form of subsidies, or sell-offs of public property, or contracts for services which represent poor value for money but whose beneficiaries made a proportionately miniscule donation to party funds.

⁸⁷ These sums would be additional to sums spent by individual candidates in constituency campaigns.

⁸⁸ For a helpful analysis see Ewing (2001) op cit. ⁸⁹ See table 7.4 above.

⁹⁰ Accusations were made in late 2005 that the Liberal Democrats had accepted several large donations—one of them totalling some £2.4m—from individuals and companies which were not 'British' in the sense required by the Act.

The Electoral Commission reviewed the matter in 2002. Its subsequent report⁹¹ did not advocate any radical changes to the existing system, offering instead the modest suggestion that individuals should be encouraged to make small donations to political parties either by the provision of matching public funds to supplement such gifts or by making donations eligible for tax relief.

However, pressure for further legislative reform arose early in 2006. A series of stories ran in the press claiming that Prime Minister Blair had either solicited or accepted on the Labour Party's behalf very substantial loans from wealthy businessmen. These loans were not declared to the public, nor even it seems to the Labour Party's Treasurer and some senior members of the Cabinet. Strictly speaking, there was no legal requirement that the loans be declared, as the PPERA is concerned only with donations. It is of course conceivable that the terms of the 'loans' were so beneficial to the Labour Party that they might credibly be regarded as being at least partial donations. But the main criticism levelled at the Prime Minister was that it appeared that the makers of some of the loans were subsequently nominated by the Prime Minister for life peerages. The obvious—and to many observers essentially corrupt—inference to be drawn from this was that Prime Minister Blair was selling seats in Parliament to wealthy Labour party supporters. Accusations were also raised that the other main political parties had engaged in a similarly distasteful attempt to evade the spirit of the PPERA regime. To contain the criticism made of the Prime Minister, the government announced in March 2006 that it would promote an amendment to the PPERA rules that would make loans declarable in future.

Television and radio broadcasting

The British approach to the regulation of television and radio broadcasting by political parties has been a markedly non-legal affair. There has long been widespread acceptance that candidates' and parties' wealth should have no bearing on their access to the public. Broadcasting time is not for sale to politicians. Parliament has consistently legislated to this effect in the modern era.⁹² Air time was initially allocated by a body called the Committee on Party Political Broadcasting, composed of representatives from television and radio organisations, and members of the main political parties. The Committee allocated small amounts of air time to each party, the share being roughly in accordance with the party's portion of the vote at the last general election.

While both the BBC and the IBA are legally obliged to maintain political impartiality in their programming decisions, the Committee itself has no explicit legal basis. Nor could the Committee be described as a 'conventional' institution in the formal sense. The process in fact broke down in 1987, when decisions were made solely by the broadcasting organisations themselves. In the run up to the 1987 general election, the three main parties had five television broadcasts and the Greens one. It may seem anomalous that so important a part of the electoral process is not regulated by statute. Yet paradoxically this is one of the few aspects of the system attuned to the realities of contemporary campaigns. There are no technical obstacles preventing Parliament intervening in this area; as yet ⁹¹ The Electoral Commission (2004) The funding of political parties. For comment see Rowbottom J (2005) 'The electoral Commission's proposals on the funding of political parties' Public Law 468. For a sophisticated analysis of the issue see Marriot J (2005) 'Alarmist or relaxed? Election expenditure limits and free speech' Public Law 764.

⁹² The Communications Act 2003 s 319 is the current version. See especially Lewis T and Cumper P (2009) 'Balancing freedom of political expression against equality of opportunity: the courts and the UK broadcasting ban on political advertising' Public Law 89.

no government has invited it to do so.⁹³ It may be there is little practical need for such regulation, as the broadcasts themselves seem to have little (and declining) influence on voter behaviour: those in the 2005 election were described by one commentator as: '[A] shrunken shadow of their former selves.'⁹⁴

There is no indication that the broadcasts made in the 2010 election period reversed this trend.⁹⁵ The potentially significant innovation in that campaign was that the leaders of the main parties held a televised debate along the lines of the presidential debates long held in the USA. The initiative attracted much press interest, and an impressive performance by the Liberal Democrat leader Nick Clegg appeared to boost his party's standing in the opinion polls. That boost did not however translate into a commensurate increase in seats won at the ensuing vote.⁹⁶

'Decent, honest and truthful'? The content of political advertising

Parliament has yet to try to regulate the content of party advertising. Hyperbolic claims and vitriolic abuse now seem a staple ingredient of election campaigns, as are lurid tales of opposing parties' hidden political agendas. Clearly one would not wish voters' choices to be influenced by lies. But 'truth' is an elusive concept, and has little bearing on matters of political opinion such as 'A Labour government would ruin the economy' or 'A Conservative government will produce increased unemployment'.

In 1895, a private member's Bill was enacted which forbade the making of a 'false statement of fact' intended to hamper a candidate's prospects of success. Matters such as a circular letter falsely announcing a candidate's withdrawal from the contest, and press accusations of salmon poaching, were offered by MPs as evidence of such unworthy practices. The courts subsequently held that the Act extended only to statements concerning a candidate's personal characteristics, not his political views. A private members' Bill to reverse this decision failed through lack of government support in 1911.⁹⁷ The present law, RPA 1983 s 106,⁹⁸ maintains the personal/political distinction: falsely calling a candidate a 'communist' or 'fascist' does not contravene the Act.

The provision has rarely been invoked. This may be due less to the intrinsic integrity of candidates' campaign literature and speeches than to a rather fatalistic acceptance by both politicians and the public that honesty and accuracy are invariably qualities that are in short supply in elections. The Scots Conservative MP Nicholas Fairbairn brought a silly suit against the Scottish National Party in 1979, in which he accused it of falsely claiming that he neglected to collect his mail from the Commons regularly.⁹⁹ The Court held that such a claim, even if were known to be false, related to a political rather than personal matter.

⁹³ See generally Boyle A (1986) 'Political broadcasting, fairness and administrative law' Public Law 562. The PPERA proposed that broadcasters should have to take into account the Electoral Commission's views on broadcasts when allocating air time.

⁹⁴ Butler and Kavanagh (2005) op cit p 111.

⁹⁵ See Kavanagh D and Cowley P (2010) The British general election of 2010 ch 13.

⁹⁶ Ibid. See also Chadwick A (2001) 'Britain's first live televised leaders' debate: from the news cycle to the political information cycle' Parliamentary Affairs 24.

⁹⁷ O'Leary op cit pp 179–181, 216–226.

⁹⁸ RPA 1983 s.106.— False statements as to candidates.

(1) A person who, or any director of any body or association corporate which—

(a) before or during an election,

(b) for the purpose of affecting the return of any candidate at the election, makes or publishes any false statement of fact in relation to the candidate's personal character or conduct shall be guilty of an illegal practice, unless he can show that he had reasonable grounds for believing, and did believe, the statement to be true.

⁹⁹ Fairbairn v Scottish National Party 1979 SC 393.

However, s 106 came to prominence in the aftermath of the 2010 election. A former Labour Minister, Phil Woolas, won the marginal seat of Oldham East by 103 votes from his Liberal Democrat opponent Robert Watkins. Watkins claimed that Woolas had knowingly made untrue claims about him, including assertions that he was seeking support from violent Muslim extremists, and that he had accepted unlawful donations from a Saudi Arabian sheikh. The litigation¹⁰⁰ turned essentially on whether such comments should be regarded as referring to Mr Watkins' 'personal character' or be viewed instead as relating to his political beliefs or conduct. The conclusion reached by the court was while the assertions concerned political issues, they did so in a way which called Mr Watkins' personal honour into question and so fell within s 106.

While some Labour MPs fulminated against the outcome,¹⁰¹ it is difficult to feel sympathy for Mr Woolas. He clearly engaged in a process of systematically attempting to mislead local voters. The penalty for breaching s 106 is that the election concerned is held to be void and the defendant is barred from election to the Commons for three years.¹⁰² Mr Woolas' political career has likely been ended by the episode. But perhaps ironically, the new Labour candidate won the subsequent by-election with a much increased majority. The episode may however encourage candidates to be more careful about how they attack their opponents in future elections.

Section 106 is a measure designed to protect individual candidates. False statements directed at parties are not covered. Publicity deployed in the notorious 'khaki election' of 1900, in which the Conservatives accused the Liberals of supporting the Boers against whom Britain was then conducting a war, was consequently not illegal. The problem is perhaps intensified by the fact that party manifestos have no legal status in respect of subsequent central government policy. One therefore depends on the electorate being sufficiently sophisticated to recognise when parties make unfounded claims.

Counting the vote

There is no evidence to suggest that the integrity of modern elections is significantly compromised by irregularities in the physical process of adding up individual votes. Ballot slips are not altered after the voter fills them in; forged papers are not added to the ballot box; and ballot boxes do not go astray. The count is an open process, which all candidates may scrutinise. But the concept of 'counting' votes can also bear a rather wider meaning. The most frequently voiced complaint concerning the present system is the limited correlation between the votes that a party receives and the number of seats it wins. Chapter one adverted to the problems posed in a democratic state by the tyranny of the majority. Table 7.5 reveals that modern Britain did not suffer from the problem of majoritarian government between 1945 and 2009, since (except for the dubious exception of the 1977 Lib/Lab pact) it did not have a government enjoying majority electoral support. No single party government elected since 1945 has secured over 50% of the vote. The best Conservative performance was 49.7% in 1955. Labour's highest ever share was 48.8% in 1951. However, Labour lost the 1951 election. The Conservatives, with fewer votes, gained seven more Commons seats. Moreover, by no means does everybody choose to vote. While over 80% of eligible voters took part in the 1950 and 1951 elections, that percentage has declined dramatically in recent elections. The Thatcher governments elected in 1979, 1983 and 1987

¹⁰⁰ Watkins v Woolas [2010] EWHC 2702 (QB).

¹⁰¹ Although he was offered no support by the Shadow Cabinet; see the coverage in The Guardian and The Times on 10 November 2010.

¹⁰² RPA 1983 ss 159–160.

had the positive support of one third of the population. The Blair governments elected in 1997 and 2001 enjoyed even lower levels of active support. In 2001, the Labour Party won a Commons majority of over 160 on just 40% of the vote. Since turnout slumped to less than 60%, the Labour Party was actually voted for by less than 25% of the registered electorate.

The figures for the 2005 general election appear similarly startling. Turnout was again very low. Only 61.2% of eligible electors voted. The Labour Party won 356 seats—and a majority in the Commons of over 60 seats—with a 35.2% share of the votes cast. The Conservatives' 32.4% share yielded 198 seats. The Liberal Democrats attracted 22% of the popular vote, yet secured only 62 seats. The third Blair administration thus enjoyed the dubious distinction of having won the lowest share of the vote of any twentieth-century government.¹⁰³

In the 2010 election, in which some 65% of eligible voters participated, the Conservative party's 32% share of the vote yielded 307 (47%) of the seats in the Commons. The Liberal Democrats once again fared poorly on the vote cast/seats won index. Despite winning 23% of votes cast, the party ended up with only 53 (8%) of the seats.

These ostensibly extraordinary results arise because the British electoral system permits minority rule, not simply majoritarianism. If one's concern as a constitutional lawyer is to ensure that government derives its powers from the consent of the governed, this

Table 7.5 Votes gained and seats won at general elections since 1945

| Year | Conservative | | Labour | | Liberal * | | Turnout |
|----------|--------------|-------|--------|-------|-----------|-------|---------|
| | Vote % | Seats | Vote % | Seats | Vote % | Seats | |
| 1945 | 39.8 | 213 | 47.8 | 393 | 9.0 | 12 | 72.7% |
| 1950 | 43.5 | 298 | 46.1 | 315 | 9.1 | 9 | 84.0% |
| 1951 | 48.0 | 321 | 48.8 | 295 | 2.5 | 6 | 82.5% |
| 1955 | 49.7 | 344 | 46.4 | 277 | 2.7 | 6 | 76.7% |
| 1959 | 49.4 | 365 | 43.8 | 258 | 5.9 | 6 | 78.8% |
| 1964 | 43.4 | 304 | 44.1 | 317 | 11.2 | 9 | 77.1% |
| 1966 | 41.9 | 253 | 47.9 | 363 | 8.5 | 12 | 75.8% |
| 1970 | 46.4 | 330 | 43.0 | 287 | 7.5 | 6 | 72.0% |
| 1974 [1] | 37.9 | 297 | 37.1 | 301 | 19.3 | 14 | 78.7% |
| 1974 [2] | 35.8 | 277 | 39.2 | 319 | 18.3 | 13 | 72.8% |
| 1979 | 43.9 | 339 | 36.9 | 269 | 13.8 | 11 | 76.0% |
| 1983 | 42.4 | 397 | 27.6 | 209 | 25.4 | 23 | 72.7% |
| 1987 | 42.3 | 376 | 30.8 | 292 | 22.6 | 22 | 75.3% |
| 1992 | 41.9 | 336 | 34.4 | 271 | 17.8 | 20 | 77.7% |
| 1997 | 30.7 | 165 | 43.2 | 418 | 16.8 | 46 | 71.2% |
| 2001 | 31.7 | 166 | 40.7 | 412 | 18.3 | 52 | 59.8% |
| 2005 | 32.4 | 198 | 35.2 | 356 | 22.0 | 62 | 61.2% |
| 2010 | 36.1 | 307 | 29.0 | 258 | 23.0 | 57 | 65.1% |

* 1983 and 1987 votes include the Social Democratic Party (SDP).

Source: Compiled from data in Norton (1991) op cit pp 97–99; Butler and Kavanagh (1993) op cit p 246; (1998) op cit p 255; (2002) op cit p 261; 2006 op cit; Kavanagh and Cowley (2010) op cit pp 350–351.

¹⁰³ Butler D and Kavanagh D (2005) The British general election of 2005, App 1.

may seem unsatisfactory, especially since that government frequently has de facto control of Parliament's supposedly unlimited legal competence. Majorities or minorities are not necessarily tyrannical or undemocratic—both tyranny and democracy can be construed as concepts concerned with what government does with power, as well as how government acquires it. Equally, one might wonder if merely avoiding tyranny is an adequate ambition for a democratic constitution? These are points to which we shall return. For the present, we might consider how the seat/vote discrepancy arises.

This situation is an almost inevitable consequence of a country where most electoral support is closely divided between two political parties choosing the 'plurality' counting system in single-member constituencies. The 'plurality' or 'first past the post' rule means that one wins a constituency simply by polling more votes than any other candidate. In a two-party contest, the winner must gain 50%+1 of the votes cast, an outcome which raises the prospect of barely majoritarian government. However, should four candidates compete, the seat could be won with as few as 25%+1 votes. The more candidates, and the more evenly balanced their support, the fewer votes needed to win.

Supporters of defeated parties in our hypothetical four-candidate constituency have exercised only indirect, negative power over the selection of their MP, in so far as if they did not vote for losing candidates A, B, or C, winning candidate D would need fewer votes to succeed. But these 75%–1 voters have not exercised any direct, positive control over the choice of their legislative representative. This is often referred to as the 'wasted vote' problem. In legal terms, one votes not for a party on a national basis, but for an individual representative of a party in an individual constituency. The 'general election' label is a misnomer; rather one has 650 simultaneous local elections. Supporters of defeated parties cannot pick up their wasted votes and use them to support another of their party's candidates somewhere else.

Within an individual constituency, there will always be a mismatch between votes cast and seats won in contested elections unless every voter supports one candidate, since there is only one seat to win. But the potential shortcomings of the single member plurality system are magnified when one aggregates the results of all constituencies to determine whose representatives gain de facto control of Parliament's unlimited legal sovereignty. If modern Britain had only two political parties, enjoying approximately equal popular support, a party could theoretically take every seat by winning each constituency with 50%+1 votes: the party which won 50%–1 votes in every constituency would have no MPs at all. In a country with an electorate of over 40 million, a party would need only 650 or so votes more than its only rival to control every Commons seat.

Such theoretical extremes do not occur in practice. But candidates regularly win constituencies with only 40% of the votes, because the majority of electors have split their vote among several other parties: (see table 7.6). A constituency is rarely won by a candidate who gains more than 65% support. Consequently at least a substantial minority of votes are always 'wasted'. In the 2005 general election, 419 of the 646 constituencies were won by candidates who attracted fewer than 50% of the votes cast. The problem was particularly acute in Scottish constituencies in the 2005 general election. Of the fifty-nine seats contested in Scotland, forty-two were won by candidates (26 of whom were Labour candidates) with under 50% of the vote. And of those forty-two newly returned MPs, thirteen (eight of them Labour candidates) failed to reach the 40% level.¹⁰⁴

In a two-party system, where each party enjoys approximately equal support, the parties' wasted votes may cancel each other out. If one examines just the Conservative and Labour performances in table 7.5, one sees that the party with more votes generally (but ¹⁰⁴ Butler and Kavanagh (2005) op cit App 1.

Table 7.6 Minoritarianism in parliamentary constituency elections

| Constituency | Year | Con | Lab | Lib* | Nat |
|--------------------------------|------|-------|-------|-------|-------|
| Carlisle | 1983 | 37.3% | 37.5% | 25.1% | – |
| Stockton North | 1983 | 33.3% | 37.1% | 29.6% | – |
| Brecon and Radnor | 1987 | 34.7% | 29.2% | 34.8% | 1.3% |
| South Stockton | 1987 | 35.0% | 31.3% | 33.7% | – |
| Nairn and Lochaber | 1992 | 22.6% | 25.1% | 26.0% | 24.7% |
| Renfrew West | 1992 | 32.9% | 36.6% | 10.0% | 20.2% |
| Falmouth and Cambourne | 1997 | 28.8% | 33.8% | 25.2% | – |
| Colchester | 1997 | 31.4% | 30.6% | 34.4% | – |
| Hastings and Rye | 1997 | 29.2% | 34.4% | 28.0% | – |
| Ochil and South Perthshire | 2005 | 21.5% | 31.4% | 13.3% | 29.9% |
| Perthshire North | 2005 | 30.4% | 18.7% | 16.1% | 33.7% |
| Camden, Hampstead, and Kilburn | 2010 | 32.7% | 32.8% | 31.2% | – |
| Sutton and Devonport | 2010 | 34.3% | 31.7% | 24.7% | – |
| Argyll and Bute | 2010 | 24.0% | 22.7% | 31.6% | 18.9% |

* Includes the SDP.

Source: Compiled from data in Butler and Kavanagh (1983); (1988); (1993); (1998); (2005) op cit.

not always) wins more seats, and that the Commons majority increases as the voting share expands. But table 7.5 also shows that the percentage of the total vote shared between the Labour and Conservative Parties has declined since 1945.¹⁰⁵ Other parties have attracted growing electoral support. They have not as a consequence gained growing parliamentary representation. The Liberal Party has suffered acutely from the vote/seat discrepancy. In 1983 the SDP/Liberal Alliance won 25.4% of the vote but only twenty-three seats. In 1987, their 22.6% of the vote produced only twenty-two MPs. Liberal support is spread relatively evenly throughout Britain. Consequently, Liberals often come second in both Labour and Conservative constituencies. But in a single MP constituency system, there are no direct rewards for coming second. Unusually in 2010 however, there were some indirect ones.

The 2010 election: a hung Parliament and a coalition government

The opinion polls in the run-up to the 2010 election had consistently predicted that no party would manage to win an overall Commons majority.¹⁰⁶ The predictions proved well-founded. Of the 650 seats, 307 were won by the Conservatives, 258 by Labour, 57 by the Liberals, 27 by Scots/Welsh/Northern Irish parties and 1 by the Greens.

This result threw up several possibilities for the formation of the next government. One outcome might be a minority Conservative government. A second alternative would be a formal or informal (majority) coalition government between the Conservatives and the Liberals. A third outcome could be a minority Conservative-led coalition with the Democratic Unionist Party from Northern Ireland. A fourth option might be a Labour/

¹⁰⁵ On the reasons for this decline, which appear broadly to reflect a breakdown of traditional working class/middle class divisions, see Norton op cit pp 105–115.

¹⁰⁶ Kavanagh and Cowley op cit ch 12.

Liberal minority coalition, perhaps bolstered by the support of some of the smaller parties.

None of the parties had campaigned on the basis of with which other parties and on what terms they might enter a coalition agreement. It might therefore be suggested that any outcome other than alternative one would produce a government for which indeed no-one had actually voted. Immediately after the results were finalised, the Liberal Democrats indicated that they would explore the possibility of coalition with either the Conservative or Labour Parties. Negotiations continued for five days between the parties, during which time the Brown government remained in office. The negotiations eventually led to the creation of a formal coalition between the Conservative and Liberal parties, which at least in simple arithmetical terms commanded a clear majority in the Commons.¹⁰⁷

The new government promptly produced a coalition agreement which gave an indication of its proposed legislative program and the way in which it would allocate Ministerial offices. That the Liberals secured five cabinet positions might suggest that in this particular election they acquired a voice in government which was substantially greater than their share of the vote. Whether the Liberals would also acquire a significant influence over the content of the Bills which the government promoted and the policies it pursued remained to be seen.

Alternative voting systems

The plurality model is generally contrasted with a voting mechanism described as 'proportional representation' (PR). PR is an umbrella term, embracing many electoral systems. In so far as these systems share a common theme, it is to produce a closer relationship between the votes cast for and seats won by parties attracting substantial national or regional voter support.

PR is not a novel idea in British constitutional theory.¹⁰⁸ John Stuart Mill coupled his advocacy of women's enfranchisement with support for the 'Hare' scheme of PR (named after its inventor).¹⁰⁹ This system was adopted in Tasmania shortly thereafter,¹¹⁰ and a variant of it is described below.

PR generated a particular flurry of parliamentary and extra-parliamentary activity during the passage of the 1884 Reform Act. Many proponents were motivated by a purely sectarian desire to safeguard the representation of the minority protestant community in Ireland. Others, including E C Clark, then Regius Professor of Civil Law at Cambridge, saw PR as a Madisonian guard against factional legislation, which would remove any incentive for parties to offer sensationalist policies appealing to the bigotry or ignorance of an 'impulsive' electorate.¹¹¹ The Speaker's Conference established during World War I had indeed recommended that the plurality method be replaced by a PR scheme. This was put to a free vote in both houses, where it attracted substantial, if not sufficient support.¹¹²

It is not entirely sensible to consider electoral reform in isolation from other constitutional issues; the method one adopts to choose one's legislature may well be affected by one's choice as to its powers. It is nonetheless helpful to outline the basic features of alternatives to the plurality/single member model.

¹⁰⁷ See Kavanagh and Cowley op cit ch 10.

¹⁰⁸ See Hart J (1992) Proportional representation: critics of the British electoral system 1820–1945.

¹⁰⁹ Hart (1992) op cit ch 2.

¹¹⁰ Brown W (1899) 'The Hare system in Tasmania' LQR 51.

¹¹¹ Jones op cit pp 99–100.

¹¹² See Butler (1953) op cit ch 1.

The party list system

A national list system maximises the correlation between seats cast and votes won; a party gaining $x\%$ of the votes wins $x\%$ of the seats. There is in effect only one constituency—namely the entire country—under a national list system. Voters choose a party, not an individual candidate. The parties themselves draw up lists of candidates. Parties which gained sufficient votes for ten, twenty or fifty seats respectively would send the first ten, twenty and fifty members on their list to the legislature. Israel operates the purest list system. In its 120-member Knesset, a party will gain a legislative seat with only 1% of the popular vote.

A national list system eliminates both the wasted vote problem and the difficulties of apportionment. Whether it is however more ‘democratic’ is a complex question. The Israeli system affords legislative representation to extremist political parties, thereby lending an unwarranted legitimacy to their policies. In the British system, in contrast, given the existence of three mainstream parties, an extremist candidate will need at least 25%+1 support in a given constituency to win its seat. This danger may be countered by having a representation threshold—a party receives no seats at all unless it passes a 5% or 10% or 15% of the vote barrier. The higher the threshold, the more difficult it becomes for extremist parties to gain representation.

The list method also offers opportunities for small parties to enter government by forming coalitions with larger parties. If such coalitions result from post-election negotiation, one may end up with a government for which no-one has actually voted. That objection could be overcome if parties were to announce their prospective coalition partners prior to the poll.

Critics also point out that the list places complete control of candidate selection in the hands of party officials, although this criticism may be met by a legal framework which opens up parties’ selection processes to all of their members. Similarly, accusations that the list precludes any identification between a given legislator and particular parts of the country can be reduced (if not eliminated) by compiling lists on a regional rather than national basis.

The single transferable vote

The single transferable vote (STV) method, (a development of the Hare system), offers the advantage of being tried, tested and evidently approved in Ireland, Malta and Australia. STV employs multi-member constituencies. Parties field as many candidates as they wish, while voters mark candidates in order of preference. A candidate is successful if she attains first preference votes equivalent to one more than the number of electors divided by the number of candidates +1. In a four member constituency this figure would be 20%+1; in a three member constituency 25%+1, and so on. That candidate’s second preference votes are then allocated as new first preference votes to the remaining candidates. Any candidates thereby reaching the quota are also elected, and their second preferences are in turn divided among remaining candidates until all seats are filled. If all seats cannot be filled by working from the top down, one begins to redistribute from the bottom up. The candidate with the fewest first preference votes is eliminated, and her second preference allocated to the others. If need be, the process is repeated until all seats are filled.

STV is time-consuming and complex, and also requires large and potentially unwieldy constituencies. Nevertheless, particularly in constituencies returning four or more members, it minimises the wasted vote problem. It also enables voters not wishing to support a straight party line to express a preference between individual candidates as well as between parties.

Absolute majority systems

Absolute majority systems are not strictly concerned with proportionality, but with ensuring that the winning candidate in a single-member constituency attracts majority electoral support, thereby reducing but not eliminating the wasted vote problem. This may be achieved through the 'alternative vote' method. Voters list candidates in order of preference. If a candidate secures 50%+1 first preference votes she is elected. If no candidate does so, the least popular is eliminated and her second preference votes are re-allocated to the remaining candidates. This process is repeated until one candidate passes the 50% barrier.

Another route to a similar end is offered by the 'second ballot' method. Should more than two candidates run, the first ballot operates solely to eliminate all but the two most popular. These two candidates then contest a run-off election shortly after the initial contest. This both ensures majority support, and also offers voters the chance to reflect on their final choice.

The German system

Elections to Germany's Bundestag employ a mixed method of plurality voting in one member constituencies coupled with a regional list.¹¹³ Half of the Bundestag seats are allocated to candidates gaining a plurality in their constituencies, half to candidates on the lists. However, voters also have a second vote in which they express a party preference. After the constituency candidates take their seats, each party's representation in the Bundestag is increased to that number which equates in percentage terms to its share of the party votes.

The process can usefully be illustrated by returning to the absurd example canvassed above in which Party A gains 50%+1 votes in every constituency, while Party B gains 50%-1. In Britain, Party A wins every seat. In Germany, (assuming voters follow a straight party line), Party A wins every constituency seat, but only one party seat, the rest of which go to Party B. Party A thus gains the slimmest of Bundestag majorities to reflect its tiny lead in the popular vote.

The German method offers the benefits of almost perfect proportionality along with constituency representation. It also addresses the criticisms made of national list systems that MP selection is utterly dominated by parties, and that legislators have no ties to particular areas.

The prospects of reform

One can identify shortcomings as well as benefits in all voting systems. This section has thus far dwelt solely on the drawbacks of our single-member plurality system; one ought also to focus on its claimed merits. One would assume these are considerable, given that since 1945 both Labour and Conservative controlled Houses of Commons have chosen to retain an electoral system in which unlimited legal power is bestowed upon the representatives of a minority of the citizenry.¹¹⁴

The first is the so-called 'strong government' thesis. This stresses the importance of ensuring that the country always has a stable government, able to implement a clearly defined set of legislative priorities, unencumbered by the need to compromise its beliefs to maintain the support of minority parties. Relatedly, the electorate knows where to attribute responsibility for failure or success, and can react accordingly at the next election. A second argument points to the simplicity and transparency of the present system. It is easy both for voters to understand and for government to administer. A third dwells on the importance of small constituency representation, which ensures both that MPs are not too distanced from the concerns of ordinary voters, and that all candidates are directly exposed to popular, rather than simply party scrutiny.

¹¹³ See Bogdanor V (1983) What is proportional representation? ch 4; Pulzer P (1983) 'Germany' in Butler D and Bogdanor V (eds) Democracy and elections.

¹¹⁴ For the defence see Maude A and Szemerey J (1981) Why electoral reform? The case for electoral reform examined. For a demolition of the defence see Oliver D (1982) 'Why electoral reform? The case for electoral reform examined' Public Law 236.

Those points may be promptly rebutted. The strong government thesis is unconvincing if one views the project of government as a long- rather than short-term process. Firstly, it may not be beneficial for a country to march strongly in one direction during the lifetime of one or two Parliaments, and then equally strongly in an altogether different direction for the next five or ten years. Secondly, if alternative systems are deemed too complex for the electorate to understand, the appropriate solution may be more extensive voter education. Thirdly, the necessity or desirability of having members of the national legislature play a substantial role as constituency representatives is contingent on the powers and structure of sub-central elected government, an issue addressed in chapter ten.

The Labour Party's 1997 election manifesto had included a commitment to hold a referendum in which voters would be presented with a choice between the existing system and some form of proportional alternative. The government promptly established a commission headed by Lord Jenkins of Hillhead, a former Labour Cabinet Minister and subsequently a Liberal life peer, to recommend the most appropriate alternative system. The Jenkins report¹¹⁵ canvassed a wide variety of alternative mechanisms, before eventually settling on a device of its own creation. The proposal retained the constituency-based system of electing the majority (around 80%) of MPs. Constituency MPs would be elected by the absolute majority method; ie the winner would have to gain at least 50%+1 of the vote. However constituencies were to be clustered in groups of five or six. Each cluster would be given an additional so-called 'county' MP, (in total some 20% of the Commons' members) whose seat would be allocated in a way that ameliorated (slightly) any disproportionality between aggregate votes cast and seats won in the cluster constituencies. Neither the Blair or Brown governments showed any enthusiasm for reform, and no referendum was held.

Voting reform has long been a central element of the Liberal Democrat's political ideology, the party having traditionally favoured a form of STV. The Party's entry into the coalition government offered some opportunity to put the issue to the electorate. The Conservative Party was willing however only to countenance the holding of a referendum on the question of whether the 'first past the post' system should be replaced with the Alternative Vote. A commitment to this effect was made in the coalition agreement, and subsequently enacted as the Parliamentary Voting Systems and Constituencies Act 2010. A referendum was held in the spring of 2011. To the chagrin of the Liberal Party, the proposal was defeated by some 68%– 32%, albeit on a very low turnout of just 42%.¹¹⁶ In the medium term at least, it appears that the 'first past the post' constituency system will continue in robust political health.¹¹⁷

The coalition government also proposed that legislation be enacted to place the electoral cycle on a five year fixed term basis, subject to an override by a 2/3 majority vote in ¹¹⁵ Jenkins R (1998) Report of the independent commission on the voting system. For an intriguing analysis see McLean I (1999) 'The Jenkins Commission and the implications of electoral reform for the UK' Government and Opposition 145.

¹¹⁶ <<http://www.electoralcommission.org.uk/elections/referendums/referendum>>.

¹¹⁷ As noted in ch 11 below, rather different systems have latterly been introduced for elections to the newly created Scots Parliament and Welsh Assembly.

the Commons or the passing (presumably by simple majority) of a vote of no confidence in the government. The Bill was enacted in September 2011 as the Fixed Term Parliaments Act 2011. Section 1 of the Act identified the presumptive date for the next general election as 7 May 2015.

In legal terms, the Act replaces the Monarch's (de facto the Prime Minister's) non-justiciable prerogative power to dissolve parliament whenever she thinks fit with a strictly defined statutory rule. The Act's political effect is to preclude a government from manipulating the electoral cycle in whatever way it thinks best serves its party political interests. As such, it amounts to a welcome—albeit modest—enhancement to the representative basis of the electoral system.

Perhaps rather more significant however was the coalition government's proposal, enacted as the Parliamentary Voting Systems and Constituencies Act 2010 ss 10–14, that the size of the House of Commons be reduced for the 2015 election from 650 seats to 600. The initiative arose partly—the logic is not obvious—in response to the expenses scandal. The government's rationale was evidently that the general public might become more favourably disposed towards the Commons if the house had fewer members and was therefore (slightly) less expensive to run. A more principled objective was that the previously tolerated wide disparities in voter numbers between constituencies should be removed.¹¹⁸ Save for a handful of geographically atypical constituencies, the Act provided that the size of each constituency's electorate should not be more than 5% above or below the electoral quota;¹¹⁹ an acceptance at last of the 'one vote, one value' principle.¹²⁰

The Boundary Commission for England published its initial plans in September 2011.¹²¹ The intended changes were unsurprisingly not well received by many MPs, especially those whose seats were being substantially withdrawn or abolished altogether. The Commission's consultation process continued until late 2011.

Enhancing turnout

One of the various powers created by the RPA 2000 enables local councils to explore ways of enhancing voter turnout in local elections. That allocation of responsibility seems particularly timely given the lamentably low figure of voter participation in recent general elections. Various experiments were tried out in local government elections in 2000 and 2001, such as allowing universal postal voting, opening polling booths in supermarkets, and spreading voting over several days. No startling increases in turnout were reported. The PPERA 2000 gave the Electoral Commission the responsibility of approving further innovations and keeping the issue under review. The Commission produced a wide-ranging report on the issue in 2002 which surveyed and analysed a series of innovations which were tried on an experimental basis in various local government elections.¹²² Whether low turnout is a problem that can be dealt with by tinkering with the details of the electoral system remains to be seen. More extensive use was made of postal voting in the 2005 general election. This seemed to lead to modest increases in voter turnout in some constituencies. However this beneficial reform was counterbalanced by substantial ¹¹⁸ Cf the point made above ('Apportionment criteria—a non-justiciable issue?', p 204) that: 'a party benefits greatly if its supporters are disproportionately concentrated in small constituencies'. In the previous two elections it appeared that the Labour party had benefitted from that rather anti-egalitarian reality.

¹¹⁹ Which would be some 76,000 electors.

¹²⁰ For a helpful review of the proposal see White I and Gay O (2010) Reducing the size of the House of Commons.

¹²¹ The proposals can be found at: <<http://consultation.boundarycommissionforengland.independent.gov.uk/news/initial-proposals-for-new-parliamentary-constituency-boundaries-published/>>.

¹²² Electoral Commission (2002) Modernising elections.

concerns that the postal vote system was being abused by ‘over-zealous’ political party workers in some parts of the country.¹²³

This concern was lent a much tighter focus by events which occurred during local government elections in Birmingham in 2004. The results of several elections were overturned by an election court, which found that several Labour party candidates had engaged in a wholly fraudulent scheme to manipulate the postal voting system.¹²⁴ The abuse was made possible by the rather lax security measures which surrounded the grant and use of postal votes, most notably by the absence of any requirement that the person seeking and casting the vote is properly identified.

Shortly afterwards, the Electoral Commission published a report which suggested that much greater rigour was needed in the implementation of postal voting if the integrity of the electoral process was to be maintained.¹²⁵ Although further minor changes were made to the voter registration system by the Electoral Administration Act 2006, the government did not propose that the Act should deal in any careful way with the Electoral Commission’s concerns. The scope for abuse of the present system was further underlined by an investigation conducted by the Joseph Rowntree Reform Trust, published in 2008.¹²⁶ However there appeared to be no significant instances of recorded abuse in the 2010 campaign.

Whether a tightened system for postal voting could have the supposedly desired effect of boosting the low levels of voter turnout might be thought doubtful. A more radical and likely more effective solution to the problem of low turnout would be to make voting in general elections compulsory, as is the case in—inter alia—Australia, Italy and Belgium. As yet there is little indication that such a proposal commands significant support within Parliament or the country at large.¹²⁷

Conclusion

It would be facile to assume that there is an ‘ideal’ electoral system waiting to be discovered. In leaving this topic, we might again try to assess the extent to which electoral law ensures that the political party controlling the legislature enjoys the consent of the governed. In chapters five to seven, it has been suggested that the sovereignty of Parliament is in effect the sovereignty of the Commons, which is in turn the sovereignty of the majority party in the lower house, which is in turn the sovereignty of the minority of voters supporting that party. The constitution is, in legal terms, a vehicle facilitating factional government on all issues.

Yet factionalism in the law-making process need not lead to factionalism in the law’s content. We must also consider what objectives factional parties pursue when they control Parliament’s sovereign legal authority. If major parties share similar views on those elements of the constitution regarded as ‘higher law’ in other democracies, majoritarian or minoritarian control of the Commons is less problematic—factional differences will only be given legal expression in respect of non-fundamental issues. Supporters of the losing party may find such policies unpalatable, but not intolerable, and accept defeat ¹²³ Butler and Kavanagh (2005) op cit pp 78–79, 174–175.

¹²⁴ For a detailed description see Stewart J (2006) ‘A banana republic? The investigation into electoral fraud by the Birmingham election court’ Parliamentary Affairs 654.

¹²⁵ Electoral Commission (2005) Securing the vote.

¹²⁶ Wilks-Heeg S (2005) Purity of Elections in the UK: causes for concern.

¹²⁷ For a contemporaneous analysis of the issue with a particular focus on the 2001 and 2005 elections see Curtice J (2005) ‘Turnout: electors stay home again’ Parliamentary Affairs 776.

because they anticipate that their opponents would do likewise if they lost the next election. Chapter nine will explore the extent of such similarities between the major parties in the modern era, and ask whether even if one can identify short term consensus, one should rely on its continued long-term existence. The thorny question of how one identifies a 'fundamental' law is returned to repeatedly in subsequent chapters. But before broaching either of these extra-parliamentary issues, we turn in chapter eight to a question of narrower scope—that of the 'privileges of Parliament'.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

- Bogdanor V (1983) What is proportional representation? ch 4
- Pulzer P (1983) 'Germany', in Butler D and Bogdanor V (eds) Democracy and elections
- Ewing K (2000) 'Transparency, accountability and equality: the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000' Public Law 542
- The Electoral Commission (2004) The funding of political parties
- Pugh M (1985) 'Labour and women's suffrage' in Brown K (ed) The first Labour party
- Oliver D (1999) 'An Electoral Commission: an ingenious idea' Public Law 585
- Wade HRW (1980) Constitutional fundamentals ch 2
- Lardy H (2001) 'Representation of the People Act 2000' MLR 63
- Stewart J (2006) 'A banana republic? The investigation into electoral fraud by the Birmingham election court' Parliamentary Affairs 654

Case law and legislation

- Watkins v Woolas* [2010] EWHC 2702 (QB)
- R v Boundary Commission for England, ex p Foot* [1983] QB 600
- R v Tronoh Mines Ltd* [1952] 1 All ER 697
- R v Jones* [1999] 2 Cr App Rep 253

Chapter 8

Parliamentary Privilege

'Parliamentary privilege' began to assume a coherent form on the constitutional landscape by 1450, from when the Speaker of Commons began each session of Parliament with an address to the Monarch claiming 'the ancient rights and privileges of the Commons'. The scope of parliamentary privilege is both multi-faceted and uncertain. In broad terms, it embraces such issues as the two houses' power to control their own procedures, to admit and expel MPs and regulate their behaviour, and to punish non-members for obstructing the houses' business.

Early analysis of privilege assumed the Commons and Lords were superior 'courts', possessing exclusive, inherent power over matters within their claimed jurisdiction. As Coke CJ put it:

Every court of justice hath rules and customs for its directions... It is lex et consuetudo parliamenti that all weighty matters in any Parliament moved concerning the peers of the realm, or commons in parliament assembled, ought to be determined, adjudged, and discussed by the course of the parliament, not by the civil law nor yet by the common laws of this realm used in more inferior courts.¹

Coke's treatise was written in the pre-revolutionary era, and offers no clear guidance on the legal status of the lex et consuetudo parliamenti (law and custom of Parliament) vis-à-vis statute and the common law. This is partly the consequence of a misleading use of terminology. Coke's attention focused not on 'Parliament', but on two of its component parts—the Commons and Lords—qua independent constitutional actors. The two English houses had initially been judicial as well as legislative bodies.

The revolutionary settlement left unanswered several theoretical questions (with significant practical consequences) in relation to parliamentary privilege. How far did the privileges of each house extend? Were they residual powers, or could each house create new ones? Were such powers constitutionally superior to Acts of Parliament and/or the common law whenever a clash occurred? And would responsibility for answering the third question rest with the courts or with the house?²

¹ 1 Inst 15; cited in Keir and Lawson op cit p 251.

² The Commons generally assigns questions concerning its privileges to its Committee of Privileges (recently renamed as the Committee on Standards and Privileges). The report of the Committee is then considered by the whole house. See Griffith and Ryle op cit ch 3: Marshall G (1979) 'The House of Commons and its privileges', in Walkland op cit.

There is no scope here to analyse in detail the pre-revolutionary history of the houses' respective privileges. However, three significant episodes merit discussion, with a view to identifying issues which assumed considerable significance after 1688.

Strode's case (1512)

Strode was an MP who had promoted Bills to regulate the tinning industry. His activities antagonised members of the Stannary Courts of Cornwall and Devon. The Stannary Courts were created by Edward I, and had a geographically limited jurisdiction. The Courts convicted Strode of 'vexing and troubling' local tin miners, and imprisoned him.³

The imprisonment triggered a swift response, not simply from the Commons, but from Parliament. Legislation (generally referred to as Strode's Act) was rapidly passed, both condemning the action taken by the Stannary Court and warning other such bodies against pursuing such a course in future:

sutes, accusments...punyshmentes etc, put or had, or hereafter put or had unto...the said Richard, and to every other...person of this present Parliament, or that of any Parliament hereafter, for any bill spekyng, reasonyng, or declaring of any mater or maters concerning the Parliament, to be communed and treated as utterly void and of no effecte.

The contemporaneous legal status of 'Strode's Act' is necessarily unclear, given the then prevailing uncertainty as to the relative importance of statute vis-à-vis other sources of legal authority. It is also unclear whether Parliament assumed it was creating new law, or, as seems more likely, merely restating what the Commons believed to be one of its existing privileges.

Peter Wentworth's defence of freedom of discussion in the Commons

That the 1688 revolution was fought against a Stuart Monarch tends to divert attention from significant tensions between the Crown and the Commons in earlier periods. Elizabeth I often fell into profound disagreement with both houses over her failure to marry or nominate an heir, and her unwillingness to countenance legislation promoting religious reform.⁴ Elizabeth made frequent efforts, both directly and via her supporters in the lower house, to prevent the Commons even discussing such matters.

The tension became acute in 1587, when Anthony Cope MP introduced a Bill to the Commons advocating radical religious reform. Elizabeth had expressed a wish that the Bill should not be debated. She had an ally in the Speaker, who both attempted to stop the reading of the Bill, and thereafter furnished the Queen with a copy of its text.⁵ This prompted considerable controversy within the house. A question was placed by Peter Wentworth MP, asking:

Whether this house be not a place for any member freely and without controlment of any person, or danger of laws, by bill or speech, to alter any of the griefs of the Commonwealth whatsoever touching the service of God, the safety of the Prince and this noble realm?

Wentworth had by then been imprisoned several times under the Anderson principle, and was once more confined to the Tower of London, this time by a lower house fearing the Queen's likely response to his temerity in drawing attention to an entitlement which the Commons itself had so staunchly defended in respect of Strode.

³ Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 248–249.

⁴ The following paragraphs are drawn from Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 312–328 and Wittke op cit pp 26–28.

⁵ This being an era when the perception of the Speaker's role as the Commons' champion against the Crown was not accepted; see 'The Speaker', ch 5, p 125 above.

Strode's Act was clearly not then regarded as an adequate legal defence against the Monarch's prerogative powers of imprisonment. Wentworth's misfortune also demonstrated that Commons' privileges did not fasten themselves inviolably on all its members, but could be diluted or waived by the house acting collectively. In its early years, the meaning of parliamentary privilege was less a question of legal niceties than of stark political realities. A second episode illustrates that point even more forcefully.

The Case of the Five Members (1641)

Notwithstanding Elizabeth's evident enthusiasm for invoking the Resolutions in Anderson, and her similarly pronounced distaste for liberty of discussion in the Commons, neither she nor her Tudor predecessors sought to rule as entirely absolutist Monarchs. Under that form of constitutional arrangement, there would be no legal protection for legislation, for the common law, or for the privileges of each house against the prerogative.

Charles I had ruled between 1629 and 1640 without summoning Parliament. By 1640, his political weakness made that course unsustainable. The newly summoned houses rapidly addressed what they perceived as the worst abuses wrought by the King. MPs agreed to levy taxation only after securing (reluctant) royal support for the Triennial Act, an Act abolishing ship money (which also gaoled the judges who had found for the King), and legislation subjecting the Monarch's detention power under Anderson to (limited) judicial scrutiny.

For many MPs however, such measures inadequately expressed what they perceived as the growing significance of Parliament within the constitution (and of the Commons within Parliament). A motion was subsequently moved in the house to present to the King (and for publication) the 'Grand Remonstrance' of 1641 which detailed many political and religious grievances. The motion offers the first recorded instance of the house 'dividing' on a vote, rather than presenting a united front behind which its internal divisions were hidden. A narrow majority of members voted in favour of publishing the Remonstrance. An enraged Charles I demanded of the Commons that the five leaders of this 'opposition' to his government be tried for treason. The Commons did not comply with this request, regarding it as a gross interference with its deliberative autonomy.

The house prepared to equip itself with an armed guard, fearing that the King would abduct the five members by force. Charles subsequently entered the house, backed by 400 armed men, and commanded that the MPs identify the impugned members. No MP would do so. In an act of some personal courage, the Speaker William Lenthell (in words frequently invoked to demonstrate the Speaker's role as the Commons' defender against executive interference) defied the King's direct command to reveal the five members' whereabouts: 'May it please your majesty, I have neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak in this place but as this House is pleased to direct, whose servant I am here.'

Charles' 'invasion' of the Commons was perhaps the precipitate cause of the civil war. His Stuart successors nevertheless remained reluctant to accept that the constitution forbade such direct Monarchical interference with the house's internal proceedings. The Declaration of Right stressed the constitutional importance of the Commons' 'independence' from interference either from the Crown directly or (since judges were then appointed by the King and dismissable at his pleasure) indirectly via the courts. The crucial provision was subsequently expressed in Art 9 of the Bill of Rights.

Article 9 of the Bill of Rights 1689

That the freedom of speech, and debates or proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament.

Quite what status Art 9 possessed in England's revised constitutional order was (and remains) uncertain. One interpretation would suggest that, by enacting Art 9, Parliament abolished all pre-existing privileges and replaced them with a new statutory formula. The meaning to be attached to 'freedom of speech', 'debates', 'proceedings', 'Parliament', 'impeached' and 'questioned' would then become purely a question of statutory interpretation for the courts, in respect of which the previous lex et consuetudo parliamenti might serve as a persuasive authority.

Much academic, judicial and political opinion has until very recently rejected such an interpretation. The preferred view appears to have been that Art 9 was merely 'declaratory' of the legitimacy of the pre-revolutionary situation.⁶ That opinion is conceptually very problematic. The Bill of Rights, like any other post-revolutionary legislation, enjoys a different constitutional status to any pre-revolutionary statute. In respect of Acts passed before 1688 'declaring' the extent of privilege, there is no difficulty in assuming that Parliament was merely bestowing added legitimacy on a political concept which arguably enjoyed equal but separate status to legislation. But one might readily assume that legislation passed by the newly sovereign Parliament could no longer be merely declaratory, but necessarily transformed the constitutional status of the issues it addressed.

Any claim by the Commons or Lords that the interpretation of Art 9 was a matter for them alone has no textual basis in the Bill of Rights. Such a claim would also contradict orthodox understandings of parliamentary sovereignty and the rule of law, which entrust the task of interpreting statutes to the ordinary courts. But one can discern a contextual basis for the Commons' wish to exclude judicial interpretation of Art 9. This would derive in part from a suspicion that the Crown could interfere indirectly with the Commons' operations through its power to appoint and dismiss the judges. However, that contextual justification would largely have disappeared following the Act of Settlement 1700, which empowered the Commons to veto the dismissal of members of the judiciary.

The Act of Settlement displaced rather than extinguished the Commons' understandable fears about losing control of its claimed interpretive power. Despite the then eclectic structure of the English court system, the House of Lords unarguably enjoyed a dual 'judicial' status, exercising jurisdiction over its own lex parliamenti but also over the interpretation of statutes and most facets of the common law. For the scope of the Commons' privileges to be determinable by the common law would mean in effect that they were controlled by the Lords. It was not until the passage of the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 that one could plausibly argue that the House of Lords qua 'ordinary court' was both formally and functionally independent of the Lords qua legislative assembly; although as suggested below, this initiative was not sufficient to induce the Commons to disclaim its purported interpretive authority.

We revisit the conceptual problems flowing from the uncertain status and meaning of Art 9 below. But other issues also merit attention. The following pages sweep broadly over three hundred years of the history of parliamentary privilege in five general areas. Firstly, the houses' power to regulate their own composition through the admission, retention and expulsion of their members; secondly, the publication of details of house business; thirdly, the admissibility before the courts of such published material; fourthly, the concept of ‘contempt of the house’; and fifthly, the regulation of MPs’ ethical standards.

⁶ Thus in Pickin v British Railways Board (See 'Substance or procedure? the enrolled bill rule', ch 2, pp 30–31 above) Lord Simon denied that Art 9 'created' the enrolled bill rule. Rather, Art 9 'reflected' an existing functional imperative—namely preserving uninhibited discussion in a democratic Parliament. This analysis is inept. The pre-1689 Parliament was in functional terms nothing like its present day successor; the 1688 revolutionaries had no inclination to produce a 'democratic' legislature as we would now understand that term; (and see 'What is (was) Parliament?', ch 2, pp 27–29 above). Art 9 could not 'reflect' democratic sentiment, because no such sentiment existed. The judgment does however raise important methodological issues, in that it suggests the scope of privilege falls to be determined by judicial (rather than house) perceptions of what is 'necessary' for the conduct of parliamentary business.

I. The admission, retention and expulsion of members

The tortuous development of the Commons’ electoral system was traced in chapter seven. However the Acts which gradually extended the franchise do not fully identify the constitutional principles which have determined the lower house’s composition. The relationship between the ‘people’ and the Commons has also been affected by questions of privilege.

Ashby v White

The courts had accepted shortly after the revolution that enfranchised citizens enjoyed common law ‘rights of property’ in their entitlement to vote. Thus the plaintiff in Ashby v White could maintain an action in tort against the returning officer in Aylesbury who had prevented him from voting.⁷ The judges hearing the litigation had however held sharply divergent views on the issue. As noted in chapter seven, the Commons enjoyed statutory authority to determine the outcome of disputed elections between 1604 and 1868.⁸ The result in the Aylesbury election was not in doubt, and thus the Commons had no statutory jurisdiction over Ashby’s suit. The point of contention which Ashby raised was whether a freeholder’s right to vote derived from common law, or from the Commons’ power to control its own composition. The question had profound consequences; if the latter claim were accepted, it would effectively empower the Commons alone to determine the allocation of the franchise.

The majority of the judges hearing Ashby’s case at first instance accepted that latter viewpoint. His claim bore directly on an established Commons privilege, with which the court could not interfere. For White and Gould JJ, the matter was a question of hierarchy—in these matters, the lex parliamenti overrode common law. Holt CJ dissented. Ashby’s claimed right to vote was firmly based in common law. The judges’ duty was to uphold that law. The court should thus hear his claim, and if the case was well-founded, decide in his favour. To do otherwise would breach the court’s constitutional duty: ‘We must not be frightened when a matter of property comes before us, by saying it belongs to the parliament; we must exert the Queen’s jurisdiction.’⁹ For Holt, the extent of privilege was for the courts, not the house to decide.

Paty’s case

The House of Lords (qua final court of appeal) supported Holt’s dissent, and reversed the judgment. It is tempting to see this as a victory for the ‘rule of law’ over the arbitrary inclinations of the Commons. For the lower house, it perhaps appeared as an illegitimate intrusion by the upper house (qua judicial body) into its sphere of responsibility. The Commons immediately passed a resolution rejecting the Lords’ decision in Ashby:

[N]either the qualifications of any elector, or the right of any person elected, is cognisable or determinable elsewhere, than before the commons of England.... whoever shall presume to ⁷ (1703) 1 Bro Parl Cas 62.

⁸ See ‘The contents and conduct of election campaigns’, ch 7, p 206 above.

⁹ (1703) 92 ER 126 at 138.

commence any action [before] any other jurisdiction...except in cases especially provided for by act of parliament...are guilty of a high breach of privilege of this house.¹⁰

Shortly thereafter, five other Aylesbury voters initiated legal actions. The Commons immediately held them to have breached its privileges and gaoled them. The equivocal role adopted by the courts was then illustrated by a majority judgment which declined jurisdiction over writs of habeas corpus issued on the voters' behalf.¹¹

Holt again dissented, stressing the subordinacy of privilege to both common law and statute:

bringing such actions was declared by the house of Commons to be a breach of their privilege; but that declaration will not make that a privilege that was not so before.... The privileges of the house of Commons...are nothing but the law.... This privilege of theirs concerns the liberty of the people in a high degree, by subjecting them to imprisonment, which is what the people cannot be subjected to without an act of Parliament.¹²

Substantively, Ashby and Paty's Case have little contemporary relevance. Conceptually, however, they retain significance because of Holt's assertion of parliamentary sovereignty and the rule of law as constitutional principles superior to privilege. That argument has yet to be entirely settled, but, as the following pages suggest, Holt's analysis has gradually gained greater conceptual legitimacy and practical endorsement.

John Wilkes

The grievances of the American colonists were not all engendered by British action undertaken in the colonies. The Americans' disenchantment was added to by the treatment meted out by the Commons and successive British governments to British politicians sympathetic to the Americans' cause. John Wilkes' role as a critic of government policy has already been alluded to;¹³ his career now merits further consideration.

Wilkes' early attachment to 'democratic' principles seemed tenuous; in 1757 he bought his way into the Commons by bribing and treating the electors of (ironically) Aylesbury. Wilkes nevertheless moved in radical political circles, and in the 1760s edited a journal, The North Briton, which disseminated vehement criticism of the government. Issue No 45 castigated the measures contained in the King's Speech opening the 1763 parliamentary session:

Every friend of this country must lament that a prince of so many great and admirable qualities...can be brought to give the sanction of his sacred name to the most odious measures and the most unjustifiable public declarations...

Wilkes then published a potentially blasphemous and seditious tract called An Essay on Women. The combined effect of the two publications provoked the government to prosecute him for libel and the Commons to expel him. Wilkes meanwhile fled the country. On returning to England in June 1768, he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

To modern eyes, the events of the next year have a farcical hue, but they were of considerable significance to shaping emergent understandings of the relationship between the Commons, statute, and the electorate. If a member is expelled, the seat becomes ¹⁰ Quoted in Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 582–583.

¹¹ R v Paty (1705) 2 Salk 503, 91 ER 431.

¹² (1705) 2 Salk 503, 91 ER 431 at 433. Holt's method provides an obvious precedent for the reasoning subsequently deployed by Lord Camden in Entick; see 'Entick v Carrington', ch 3, pp 52–53 above.

¹³ See 'Entick v Carrington', ch 3, pp 52–53 above. See generally Rude G (1962) Wilkes and Liberty: Maier op cit.

vacant and a by-election is held. Wilkes did not contest his Aylesbury seat after his first expulsion. But Wilkes' status as a convicted prisoner was not then a legal impediment to standing for election or taking a seat.¹⁴ Thus in 1769, Wilkes stood as a candidate for Middlesex, where many electors endorsed his views. Wilkes was elected to the house on 16 February—and expelled by the Commons on 17 February. Wilkes was returned again on 16 March—and was expelled the next day. In April, he was again elected. This time, rather than expel Wilkes and trigger another election, the Commons declared Wilkes' defeated opponent the 'winner', and admitted him to the house. One of Wilkes' supporters tabled a motion inviting the Commons to resolve that; 'no person eligible by law can be incapacitated from election by a vote of the House, but by Act of Parliament alone'. The motion was defeated by 226 to 186. The house carried (by 224 to 180) a government motion that Wilkes' expulsion was 'agreeable to the law of the land'.¹⁵ That conclusion was not put to a legal test. Wilkes did not challenge his exclusion in the courts, and thereby missed the opportunity to set up a potentially momentous dispute between the 'rights' of the electorate and the 'privileges' of the Commons.

One might initially attribute the house's conduct towards Wilkes to the era's political context. The Commons then made no claim to be 'democratic'; sixty years had still to pass before the Great Reform Act would set Britain on the long, slow path towards a universal franchise. In formal terms, Wilkes' repeated expulsion was a defensible expression of the Commons' traditional autonomy. From a functional perspective, the house's action could be construed as a collective expression of Burke's portrayal of the MP as representative rather than delegate: MPs were sparing an ill-advised, intemperate electorate from the consequences of its folly. If so, one might then assume that as the franchise became more extensive and the electorate more 'mature', and the legitimacy of the Commons' legislative role rested increasingly on the assumption that it represented 'the people', the house could no longer defensibly invoke its privileges to exclude an elected member. But as the experience of Charles Bradlaugh suggests, any such assumption would be ill-founded.

Charles Bradlaugh

Bradlaugh, a radical political campaigner, had achieved considerable notoriety by 1870 both for founding the atheistic National Secular Society, and for being prosecuted for publishing a book on birth control.¹⁶ Such notoriety apparently appealed to the voters of Northampton; in 1880 they returned Bradlaugh as their MP.

Bradlaugh's difficulties began when he tried to take his seat. MPs had been placed under a statutory obligation during Elizabeth I's reign to take an oath of allegiance to the Monarch and the Protestant faith before assuming their seats.¹⁷ The oath (administered by the Speaker on the floor of the house) was intended to exclude Roman Catholics from the Commons, but also caught Protestant non-conformists and Jews. The oath was modified to admit Catholics in 1829; legislation in 1866 introduced an oath acceptable to members of the Jewish faith, and the Promissory Oaths Act 1868 permitted members of dissentient religious sects to 'affirm' their loyalty rather than swear it. The legislation did not actually exclude members from the house if they had not taken the oath or affirmed, ¹⁴ See the discussion of Goodwin and Fortescue's Case (1604) in Plucknett op cit pp 372–374; Keir D (8th ed 1966) The constitutional history of modern Britain pp 175–177.

¹⁵ Rude op cit pp 119, 133. See also Wittke op cit pp 115–123. One might ask whether this was decision of 'the Commons' or an early example of effective government control of the lower house.

¹⁶ Arnstein W (1983) The Bradlaugh Case ch 1. See also Wittke op cit pp 160–169; Anson W (5th edn 1922) The law and custom of the constitution pp 93–98, 195–196.

¹⁷ See Anson op cit pp 93–95.

but fined them £500 (in 1880 an enormous sum) for each occasion when they sat and voted without having done so.

On entering the house, Bradlaugh (having previously announced himself an atheist) wished to affirm rather than swear his loyalty. The house, however, resolved that he could not do so. Bradlaugh's subsequent attempt to take the oath instead was also blocked by a resolution. On declining to leave the house, Bradlaugh was forcibly ejected. The majority in the Commons then expelled him in April 1881. He was returned at a by-election a week later, when the Speaker had evidently concluded that: 'the house would do well and wisely, according to the constitution, to admit him without question'.¹⁸ The majority nevertheless expelled him again. Bradlaugh was subsequently physically ejected by Commons' officials. Undeterred, he re-entered the house and adopted the extraordinary course of administering the oath to himself and then assuming his place on the backbenches. He was again expelled; and again returned at the ensuing by-election.

The Commons' continued refusal to admit Bradlaugh seemingly negated the impact of the Great Reform Act and Disraeli's 1867 franchise legislation in respect of the electors of Northampton. For those voters, the extended franchise was worthless, since their chosen candidate was unable to represent them. For Bradlaugh the legal and moral position was clear. He and his electors were the victims of:

the arbitrary and illegal action of the House of Commons. It is a melancholy exhibition of the tyranny of orthodoxy when we see one branch of the legislature taking upon itself to nullify laws which the whole legislature itself has sanctioned.¹⁹

He then challenged this 'arbitrary and illegal action' before the courts. The suit in *Bradlaugh v Gossett*²⁰ was directed against the Commons' Serjeant-at-Arms, who, obeying a Commons resolution, had intimated that he would use physical violence to prevent Bradlaugh entering in future. Bradlaugh's suit asked the court to issue an injunction preventing the Serjeant-at-Arms from so doing. As Stephen J indicated, the case raised a straightforward clash between the authority of statute and of privilege:

Suppose that the House of Commons forbids one of its members to do that which an Act of Parliament requires him to do... is such an order one which we can declare to be void and restrain the executive officer of the House from carrying out.²¹

The judgment held that no statute could impliedly alter the Commons' power to control its internal proceedings. Neither was the house's jurisdiction in such matters overridden by common law. In reaching this conclusion, Stephen J was influenced by a sense of judicial deference to the Commons:

The House of Commons is not a Court of Justice, but the effect of its privilege to regulate its own internal concerns practically invests it with a judicial character when it has to apply to particular cases the provisions of Acts of Parliament... If its determination is not in accordance with the law, this resembles the case of an error by a judge whose decision is not subject to appeal... [I]f we were to attempt to erect ourselves into a Court of Appeal from the House of Commons, we should consult neither the public interest, nor the interests of Parliament and the constitution, nor our own dignity.²²

Since swearing or affirming were procedures conducted entirely within the house, their regulation was a matter solely for the house. In contrast, the house would have no authority to interfere with those aspects of the processes affecting its composition which ¹⁸ Arnstein op cit p 104.

¹⁹ Arnstein op cit p 147.

²⁰ (1884) 12 QBD 271.

²¹ Ibid, at 278.

²² Ibid, at 286.

occurred outside its boundaries; for example, a citizen's common law or statutory entitlement to vote in a parliamentary election. This would be consistent with Holt's opinions in Ashby and Paty's Case, and reiterates the point that the courts claimed the power to identify the extent of privilege, but not to interfere with its exercise within those identified boundaries. But Stephen J seemed uncertain as to the courts' response if the house chose to exceed its jurisdiction in this way:

I should in any case feel a reluctance almost invincible to declaring a resolution of the House of Commons to be beyond the powers of the house... Such a declaration would in every case be unnecessary and disrespectful.²³

In effect, the court was abdicating its role as the guardian of the rule of law and allowing the Commons to determine the meaning of legislation. Given the vituperative clashes between the Commons, Lords and Monarch over the terms of nineteenth-century enfranchisement legislation, which had led to considerable modification of the initial Bills,²⁴ it is implausible to assume that Parliament impliedly granted such jurisdiction to the Commons. The judgment thus entirely subverts orthodox understandings of parliamentary sovereignty.

The Bradlaugh saga was eventually ended after the 1885 general election, when Bradlaugh was for the seventh time returned as Northampton's MP. The solution was, from a legal perspective, unsatisfactory. After the election, the house had chosen a new Speaker, the former Liberal MP Sir Arthur Peel. When the house assembled, Peel maintained that the house's previous resolutions preventing Bradlaugh from taking the oath had lapsed. The Speaker also refused to accept any new motion on the same issue:

I have no right, original or delegated to interfere between an honourable member and his taking of the oath.... It is not for me, I respectfully say, it is not for the House, to enter into any inquisition as to what may be the opinions of a Member when he comes to the table to take the oath.²⁵

That Peel ended the controversy so simply forcefully illustrates the disciplinary authority a determined Speaker may exercise over the house, even when his/her views are not supported by most members. Yet the solution, as much as the controversy itself, also indicates the extent to which both the Commons and the courts considered themselves competent to deny the electors of Northampton the services of their chosen representative.

The Bradlaugh episode neatly illustrates the so-called 'dualism' which attaches to the constitutional status of the houses' privileges:

Thus there may be at any given moment two doctrines of privilege, the one held by the courts, the other by either House, the one to be found in the law reports, the other in Hansard, and no way of resolving the real point at issue should conflict arise.²⁶

The practical problems raised by dualism are not limited solely to the question of the admission of members to their respective house.

Freedom from imprisonment, arrest and molestation

The first recorded instance of the Commons asserting its privilege to force the release of an imprisoned member seems to be Ferrer's Case in 1543.²⁷ The privilege has an obvious ²³ Ibid, at 282. ²⁴ See 'The original Bill' ff, ch 7, pp 198–202 above.

²⁵ Quoted in Arnstein op cit p 310. ²⁶ Keir and Lawson op cit p 255.

²⁷ Plucknett op cit pp 249–250. See also Wittke op cit pp 33–35.

functional basis in the pre-revolutionary era, namely to ensure that the members summoned by the King were not impeded from travelling to London and thereafter going about their parliamentary business, whether by unlawful interference or by legal proceedings initiated in any of the courts of inferior jurisdiction. A 1604 statute 'recognised' the privilege as encompassing both a power to set free a member duly imprisoned by a court of law, and the power to punish any person arresting a member.²⁸ Neither house was obliged to protect its members from detention: the privilege was a power the house might waive when it saw fit.

The privilege was not invoked in respect of criminal charges, even if the impugned conduct occurred within the Commons or Lords itself. Until the recent expenses scandal,²⁹ there had been relatively few occasions in the modern era on which MPs have faced criminal charges. Several Irish MPs were imprisoned during the 1880s and again in 1918 for criminal activities arising from the Irish struggle for independence. On none of these occasions did the house make any suggestion that it would interfere with the court proceedings.

A more conceptually difficult case concerned Captain A Ramsay MP, a member with alleged fascist sympathies, detained in 1940 under regulation 18B. Ramsay's detention was referred to the Committee of Privileges as a potential breach of the arrest privilege. The Committee (and subsequently the house) was divided on the question, although the majority concluded no breach had occurred. That many MPs doubted the legitimacy of the government's action presumably stemmed from the fact that Ramsay's detention was not the result of a criminal conviction; the only 'crime' he had committed (like Liversidge) was to have aroused the Home Secretary's suspicions as to his loyalty to Britain's war effort. Ramsay remained in detention until 1944.³⁰

The Parliamentary Privilege Act 1770

The arrest privilege nevertheless had considerable practical significance for civil suits, especially while it remained possible to be imprisoned for debt. Immediately after the revolution, the houses' growing sense of self-importance led them to claim a greater scope for the arrest privilege, encompassing not just the persons of members, but also their land, their moveable property and their servants. The extended privilege was frequently invoked as an expedient way for MPs and their retainers to evade numerous legal obligations—a practice which provoked considerable public criticism.³¹

Public pressure eventually led Parliament to reduce the privilege's scope. In 1700, legislation was enacted entitled 'An Act for preventing any inconveniences that may happen by privilege of Parliament'. Its main provision, as restated in the Parliamentary Privilege Act 1770, s 1, was that:

Any person may at any time commence and prosecute any action or suit against any Lord of Parliament or any...[member] of the House of Commons...or any other person intitled to the privilege of Parliament...and no such action shall at any time be impeached, stayed or delayed by or under colour or pretence of any privilege of Parliament.

If interpreted literally (ie any privilege), s 1 seems to abolish all aspects of privilege which restricted access to the courts, including Art 9. The Commons and the judiciary appeared to have reached a shared (and less expansive) understanding of the Act's impact in 1958, ²⁸ Plucknett (1960) op cit pp 333–334.

²⁹ See 'Resources', ch 5, pp 126–128 above. The significance of privilege in relation to this episode is considered at 'Parliamentary privilege and the expenses scandal', ch 8, pp 256–257 below.

³⁰ Simpson op cit pp 113–114, 393–395, 404.

³¹ See Wittke op cit pp 39–43.

when the Commons (without surrendering its claimed jurisdiction to judge the extent of privilege) invited the Privy Council (in its judicial capacity) to interpret the 1770 Act.³²

The Court applied the mischief rule rather than the literal rule to s 1. It considered that the ‘mischief’ in issue was solely MPs’ increasing predilection to invoke privilege as a blanket immunity against all civil actions, and not MPs’ entitlement to freedom of speech in the house. The Privy Council considered this freedom to have been so central a value in the 1688 settlement that it was inconceivable that Parliament would have curtailed its scope just twelve years later. The Court thus concluded that the Act reached only those legal actions whose origins did not lie in a ‘proceeding in Parliament’.

But this opinion left a crucial question unanswered: namely who decided if the action concerned had been precipitated by a ‘proceeding in Parliament’—the Commons or the courts? It is generally assumed that the constitution confers the responsibility of statutory interpretation on the courts. Determining the meaning of ‘proceedings’ would thus be a judicial function. This presumption could however be rebutted in two ways. Firstly, one might argue that this privilege (or indeed privilege in general) enjoyed a special constitutional status, which (unlike the prerogative or other common law rules) rendered it immune to implied repeal. The Court seemed to accept this viewpoint, by observing that the free speech privilege was ‘solemnly reasserted in the Bill of Rights’.³³ The notion of ‘reassertion’ suggests that the legal status of privilege was such that it co-existed with Art 9—that the statutory provision was declaratory and not transformative of the substantive entitlements the house had hitherto enjoyed. A second argument, which the Court did not entertain, was that the Bill of Rights itself (or indeed any other statute touching upon privilege) impliedly ousted the courts’ jurisdiction and bestowed it on the house.

Lord Denning dissented from the Court’s opinion.³⁴ He concluded that the clear meaning of the 1770 Act was that the Commons would be acting illegally if it made any attempt to interfere with a legal action initiated against one of its members. The Act was a command from Parliament to one of its component parts not to undertake such action. But this did not mean such a suit could be argued, still less succeed. For Lord Denning also held that the courts remained obliged by Art 9 to refuse to entertain action which ‘questioned’ a ‘proceeding in Parliament’.

Denning nonetheless made the important point that whatever jurisdiction the Commons might have possessed to determine the extent and meaning of its free speech privilege before 1689 had been overridden by Parliament when Art 9 was enacted. Art 9 therefore did not ‘reassert’ the house’s privilege. Rather it extinguished the privilege and created a new statutory protection. Nor did Art 9 contain any implied grant of interpretive authority to the Commons. Privilege thus enjoyed no higher status vis-à-vis statute than did the common law:

This means of course that it is for the courts to say what is a ‘proceeding in Parliament’ within the Bill of Rights—which is just what the House of Commons do not wish to concede.³⁵

Support for Denning’s analysis was offered by Scarman J in Stourton v Stourton, a 1963 case concerning the applicability of the freedom of arrest privilege to peers:

I do not think however, that I, sitting in the High Court... must necessarily take the law that I have to apply from what would be the practice of the House. I think I have to look to the ³² Re Parliamentary Privilege Act 1770 [1958] AC 331, [1958] 2 All ER 329, PC.

³³ [1958] AC 331 at 350, PC (emphasis added).

³⁴ The Privy Council did not then permit dissents. Denning’s opinion was neither recorded nor published in the report itself. See Lord Denning ‘Re Parliamentary Privilege Act 1770’ (1985) Public Law 80.

³⁵ Ibid., at 85.

common law as deduced in judicial decisions in order to determine in the particular case whether the privilege arises, and if so its scope and effect.³⁶

We revisit this issue below. Before doing so however, we might usefully turn to a second facet of the role played by the Commons' privileges in regulating the relationship between the house and the people.

II. The principle of informed consent?

The American revolutionaries attached much importance to the principle that the proceedings of Congress, should be matters of public record. The presumption that the people should be furnished with the information needed to make informed choices about their preferred representatives was afforded explicit legal protection within the Constitution's text.

At that time, neither the Commons nor the Lords were under any statutory or common law obligation to do likewise. Such publicity as was given to the houses' affairs was a matter for the houses themselves to decide; and their preference then seemed to be for limited disclosure. Both the pre- and post-revolutionary Commons had passed resolutions contending that unauthorised publication of any reports of its proceedings was a breach of privilege.³⁷ In 1762, the house had declared:

That it is an high Indignity to, and a notorious breach of the Privilege of this House...for any printer or Publisher of any printed Newspaper...to give therein any Account of the Debates or other Proceedings of this House...and this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offenders.³⁸

The resolution is quite inconsistent with any notion that the electoral process rested upon voters' informed consent. As the century wore on, so the legitimacy and the legality of the Commons' stance were increasingly questioned by emergent radical factions; by 1770 several newspapers published regular reports of Commons' debates and votes. An acute controversy flared during Wilkes' exclusion from the Commons. Press coverage of the affair made copious and scathing use of MPs' speeches; several editors took what might now be regarded as the eminently 'democratic' view that electors should know which MPs spoke in favour of Wilkes' admission, which members opposed it, and which labelled signatories of petitions supporting Wilkes as 'scum'.

The government's Commons majority resolved that several editors had breached the house's privileges by publishing such reports. When the editors defied the house, the Commons authorised its officers to arrest them. This brought the house into conflict with the Lord Mayor of London, who in his capacity as a magistrate held a judicial jurisdiction over criminal acts. On attempting to seize one of the editors, the Commons' officer found himself arrested for assault and summoned to appear before the Lord Mayor. This in turn led the Commons to resolve that the Lord Mayor had breached the house's privilege by interfering with its officer's execution of its resolution, and thereafter to imprison him in the Tower. When presented with a writ for habeas corpus on the Lord Mayor's behalf, the courts declined to examine the Speaker's warrant maintaining that the Lord Mayor had been committed for a breach of privileges.

³⁶ [1963] 1 All ER 606 at 608. See also Leopold P (1989) 'The freedom of peers from arrest' Public Law 398.

³⁷ Wittke op cit p 51.

³⁸ Cited in Marshall (1979) op cit.

While the house had successfully asserted its formal authority, unauthorised publication of its proceedings continued apace. The house eventually revoked the motion in 1971, but there is still no legal requirement that either house publish records of its business.³⁹ Such information as is released is a matter entirely for each house itself.

III. The justiciability of ‘proceedings in Parliament’

The question of what use the courts might subsequently make of such records as are published has been (and remains) an issue of appreciable importance and controversy.

Actions in defamation

Speeches made by MPs in either house which defame other citizens clearly raise a potential conflict with the courts. The fear of losing a defamation action could act as a considerable impediment to MPs’ freedom of speech, yet the common law has always provided extensive remedies enabling people to protect their ‘right’ to a good reputation.⁴⁰ In such circumstances, the conceptual problem of ‘dualism’ is particularly acute. In practice however, the courts and the houses appeared to have reached a shared understanding of the scope of law and privilege on this question.

The plaintiff in *Dillon v Balfour*⁴¹ was a midwife in Ireland. Balfour⁴² was then a Minister in Ireland. During the passage of the Criminal Procedure (Ireland) Bill in 1887, Balfour made remarks about Dillon which she felt undermined her professional reputation, in respect of which she sought substantial damages. Balfour applied for the action to be struck out, contending that speeches made in the house could not be the subject of a defamation suit.

The judgment offers a paradigmatic example of the conceptual obfuscation which attends many analyses of the legal status of such speeches. Palles CB began his judgment by turning to Art 9. However he construed Art 9 not as creating a statutory protection, but as declaratory of pre-revolutionary privilege. To complicate matters further, he then observed that the privilege was an ‘ancient right and liberty of the realm’,⁴³ suggesting it had a common law source.

The basis of his judgment, which struck out the plaintiff’s action, was equally unclear. Palles CB held that the courts had jurisdiction in a defamation action only to ask if the words in issue were spoken/written as a ‘proceeding in Parliament’. Whatever its source, the court’s jurisdiction was ‘ousted’ (though by what he did not explain) if it determined that the words were a ‘proceeding in Parliament’. Any such statement enjoyed complete immunity from actions in defamation.⁴⁴

It is unfortunate that the court was not more conceptually precise in identifying the source of this rule. It may also be thought that the substantive protection afforded by the case affords MPs an unnecessarily expansive legal immunity. There is no doubt force in the argument that MPs should be able to use the privilege to raise matters of public concern which subsequent investigation proves to be well-founded. However, MPs may also ³⁹ Griffith and Ryle op cit p 95.

⁴⁰ See Brazier M (9th edn, 1993) Street on Torts ch 23. ⁴¹ (1887) 20 LR Ir 600.

⁴² See ‘Lloyd George and the “people’s budget”’, ch 6, pp 160–163 above.

⁴³ (1887) 20 LR Ir 600 at 612.

⁴⁴ In 1868, the courts concluded that similar protection extended to newspapers which produced accurate reports of such ‘defamatory’ proceedings, if the report was circulated to inform the citizenry of what was happening in Parliament rather than as a malicious attempt to discredit the person criticised: see Wason v Walter (1868) LR 4 QB 73.

shelter behind privilege to raise unfounded allegations. The Conservative MP, Geoffrey Dickens, caused considerable controversy in 1986 when he availed himself of privilege to accuse a clergyman of having sexually abused young children. The person concerned had already been subject to a police investigation, and the police had concluded there was no basis for a prosecution.⁴⁵ More recently, two Northern Irish Unionist MPs named individuals as terrorist murderers, an accusation which as well as being defamatory presumably exposed the persons named to considerable personal danger. In such circumstances, an MP's behaviour is no doubt more reprehensible if she knows the allegation to be false, or has taken no care to establish its accuracy, than if she is acting in good faith. The damage to the reputation of the individual or company concerned has nevertheless been done irrespective of the MP's motive.

Dickens made his allegation in a speech on the floor. There is seemingly no doubt this was a 'proceeding in Parliament'. But much of the Commons' work takes place outside the chamber, and much involves written rather than oral communication. The question then arises of just what is meant by 'proceedings in Parliament'.

What are 'proceedings in parliament'?

The Privy Council had stressed in Re the Parliamentary Privilege Act 1770 that it offered no view on the meaning of 'proceedings in Parliament'. Nor did it address the more contentious question of whether the power to determine that meaning lay within the jurisdiction of the courts or the respective houses. The Commons' reference to the Privy Council had been triggered by an episode involving Labour MP George Strauss. Strauss had sent a letter to a Minister criticising the London Electricity Board (LEB). The Minister forwarded the letter to the Chairman of the LEB. The Chairman considered Strauss' comments defamatory, and threatened a libel action. Strauss thereupon referred the matter to the house, claiming the threat was a breach of privilege.

The issue turned on whether the letter was a 'proceeding in Parliament'. There are strong arguments for assuming that it was. Such communications about matters within a Minister's competence would be a frequently occurring and important part of the MP's role, both as a party politician and as a constituency representative. The Committee of Privileges concluded that the letter was a 'proceeding', and that a breach had occurred. However the house rejected the Committee's conclusion. In contrast, the house had accepted in 1938–1939 that communications between members and Ministers initiated with a view to placing a question would be 'proceedings'. A fortiori, oral or written questions themselves would also be privileged. Even if we accept that the houses are constitutionally competent to give an authoritative definition of the concept, they clearly have not done so. Griffith and Ryle's suggestion that there are many 'grey areas' is a polite understatement.⁴⁶

The Commons Committee of Privileges recommended in 1977 that the concept be given a clearer, legislative meaning. However the house chose not to act upon the proposal, presumably because the passage of such legislation would imply that Parliament had removed the houses' claimed competence to interpret the term. 'Proceedings in parliament' thus remains a legally obscure area of the constitution. That obscurity has in the past triggered acute controversy.

⁴⁵ Leopold P (1986) 'Leaks and squeaks in the Palace of Westminster' Public Law 368.

⁴⁶ Op cit p 88.

Stockdale v Hansard (1839)

The constitutional clash between the courts and the Commons was avoided over Wilkes' admission in the 1760s eventually occurred in the late 1830s. The trigger for the dispute was mundane. A report by the Inspector of Prisons, published on the house's instructions, had made libellous comments about a medical textbook circulating in a gaol. Stockdale, the book's author, commenced defamation proceedings against Mr Hansard, the Commons' printer.⁴⁷

The house instructed Mr Hansard not to contest the case on its merits, but to inform the court that the house had resolved that the report was a proceeding in Parliament, and as such not subject to judicial jurisdiction.⁴⁸ The Court, for which Lord Denman CJ gave the leading judgment, rejected the Commons' assertion of privilege, categorising it as:

a claim for an arbitrary power to authorise the commission of any act whatever, on behalf of a body which in the same argument is admitted not to be the supreme power in the state.⁴⁹

Lord Denman concluded that the claim was irreconcilable with orthodox understandings of parliamentary sovereignty and the rule of law. The Commons' (or Lords') constitutional competence in matters of privilege stretched only to the application of existing privilege. With that jurisdiction, the courts would not interfere. But neither house could grant itself new privileges. Furthermore, the power to determine the boundaries of existing privileges lay not with either house through resolutions, but with the courts through the common law. Parliament might grant either house a jurisdiction which exceeded the existing boundaries, and give the house the power that it claimed in this case, but the Commons could not achieve that result itself:

The House of Commons is not Parliament, but only a co-ordinate and component part of the Parliament. That sovereign power can make and unmake the laws; but the concurrence of the three legislative estates is necessary; the resolution of any one of them cannot alter the law...⁵⁰

Lord Denman's reasoning follows that of Holt CJ in Ashby v White and Paty's Case. Just as Holt saw the right to vote as a common law entitlement that could only be overridden by Parliament, so Lord Denman viewed the common law right to protect one's reputation against libellous criticism as immune to anything other than statutory regulation. Lord Denman considered that 'proceedings in Parliament' could not form the subject of a defamation action. However he would not accept that reports subsequently circulated outside the house enjoyed such protection. Lord Denman adopted what to modern eyes would be a teleological interpretive strategy by suggesting that the protections the houses possessed under Art 9 extended only to matters 'necessary' for them to perform their duties. He also held, crucially, that assessing the issue of necessity was a matter for the courts, not for the Commons. Since Lord Denman saw no 'necessity' for the publishers of this particular report to be immune from a libel action, Stockdale could proceed with his action.

The Case of the Sheriff of Middlesex (1840)

Stockdale won his action. However, the Commons did not accept the Court's conclusion. Acting on the house's instructions, Mr Hansard refused to comply with the judgment.

⁴⁷ Stockdale v Hansard (1839) 9 Ad & El 1.

⁴⁸ The house was evidently not offering an interpretation of Art 9 qua statute, but construing it as declaratory of a continuing privilege with pre-revolutionary origins.

⁴⁹ (1839) 9 Ad & El 1 at 107–108.

⁵⁰ (1839) 9 Ad & El 1 at 108.

The Sheriff of Middlesex, an officer of the court, then sought to enforce the judgment. The Commons ordered that the Sheriff be committed to the Tower for having breached the house's privileges. The Commons' stance on this question is obviously hypocritical, given its long history of opposition in the pre-revolutionary era to the Crown's repeated efforts to invoke a similarly arbitrary power to detain anyone who displeased it. The Sheriff had been detained because he was complying with the court's instructions. In crude terms, he had been punished by the Commons for upholding the rule of law. One might therefore have expected that his subsequent habeas corpus action would lead the courts to order his immediate release.⁵¹

The Serjeant at Arms' return to the writ stated simply that the Sheriff had been committed for 'a breach of privilege and contempt'. The Court, Lord Denman giving the leading judgment, declined to question the return. Lord Denman held that so long as the Commons complied with the mere formality of stating that the committal was for 'contempt', no court was competent to order the prisoner's release. It would be, he suggested, 'unseemly' for a court to doubt the Commons' bona fides in such circumstances.

The decision is closely comparable to the opinion offered in the Resolutions in Anderson some 300 years earlier; the only difference being that the court was now permitting the Commons rather than the Crown to make a mockery of habeas corpus. The decision also completely undermined Stockdale. Lord Denman began his opinion in Middlesex by observing that Stockdale was 'in all respects correct'. Yet there is little point in a judgment being 'correct' if the same court subsequently permits it to be evaded.

Neither the Commons nor the judiciary emerge with credit from the Stockdale controversy. The specific legal problem that the case raised was subsequently resolved by Parliament in the Parliamentary Papers Act 1840. The Act empowered the Speaker to issue a certificate staying any legal proceedings in respect of documents published by order of either house.

A more modern—and on its facts much more trivial—manifestation of the problem arose in R v Graham-Campbell ex p Herbert in 1935.⁵² The question before the Court was whether the catering manager of the House of Commons could be prosecuted for selling alcohol without having the licence required by the Licencing Act 1910. The manager was of course acting on the instructions of the house, and pleaded that privilege therefore precluded any prosecution.

The judgment of the High Court, which concluded no prosecution could be made, is poorly reasoned,⁵³ but raises several notable points. The first is that the 'privilege' asserted was not rooted in Art 9, but was rather said to lie in privilege as an autonomous source of 'legal' protection for the Commons. The second was the Court's suggestion that its conclusion was primarily underpinned by its concerns about the relationship between the Commons and the Lords:

To take the opposite course might conceivably be, in proceedings of a somewhat different character from these, after the various stages of those proceedings had been passed, to make the House of Lords the arbiter of the privileges of the House of Commons.⁵⁴

Neither Stockdale nor Herbert resolved the problem of 'dualism' in the more general sense. It may however be that a recent decision of the House of Lords has done so.

⁵¹ (1840) 11 Ad & El 273. For a fuller discussion see Wittke op cit pp 152–156: Stockdale E (1989) 'The unnecessary crisis: the background to the Parliamentary Papers Act 1840' Public Law 30.

⁵² [1935] 1 KB 594.

⁵³ The primary reason appears to be the easy assumption that the sale of alcohol without a licence was an essential part of the house's functions in the Stockdale sense.

⁵⁴ Ibid., at 601 per Lord Hewart CJ.

'Redefining parliament'—Pepper v Hart (1993)

One rule to which students of British law were traditionally exposed was that judges would not refer to the records of debates in Hansard to clarify the meaning of legislative terminology.⁵⁵ The legal roots of the 'exclusionary rule' are obscure.⁵⁶ It might be simply a common law rule concerning the admissibility of evidence. An alternative perspective is that the courts were deferring to a statutory command in Art 9 of the Bill of Rights, wherein the notion of 'questioned' extended to considering the content of debate to aid statutory interpretation. A third argument contends that the courts' refusal to consult Hansard was an element of privilege, existing alongside the common law but immune to judicial jurisdiction.

The rule's source is significant when considering whether and how it might be revised. If it was a common law concept, there would be no constitutional barrier to prevent the House of Lords changing it. In contrast, if the rule derived from Art 9, the courts could not simply overrule it. That would be inconsistent with parliamentary sovereignty. However, as a law-maker in the interpretative sense, the House of Lords could alter its previous definition of Art 9. The concept of 'questioned' could, for example, be narrowed, perhaps so that it embraced only a defence to defamation proceedings.⁵⁷ If the rule was part of privilege, judicial amendment would be constitutionally problematic rather than impossible. If we accept (per Stockdale, Denning's dissent in Re the Parliamentary Privilege Act 1770, and Stourton) that the common law sets the boundaries to privilege, the courts might legitimately conclude that they had previously misinterpreted those boundaries and that the correct scope of privilege did not preclude reference to Hansard. This could however provoke a conflict between the houses and the courts, since it is unlikely that either house would wish to cede its claimed jurisdiction over such questions.

The rule's purposes are more readily discernible. Four reasons have been advanced. Lord Wilberforce in *Beswick v Beswick*⁵⁸ fastened on a question of 'constitutional principle'. The task of interpreting legislation rested solely on the courts; for the judiciary to allow their view of the meaning of a statute to be determined by the speech of a Minister would in effect delegate their interpretative role to that Minister. This would turn parliamentary sovereignty into government sovereignty. This reason is perhaps overstated, and loses force if one suggests that Hansard should merely be of persuasive not determinative authority.

In the same case, Lord Reid identified 'purely practical reasons' for the rule. Access to Hansard would increase the time and expense of litigation, since lawyers would read debates in their entirety in pursuit of statements supporting their clients' cases. This, too, seems a weak justification. The same reasoning might plausibly be applied to law reports; counsel might avidly scrutinise every judgment ever delivered on the point in issue, hoping to uncover some forgotten judicial subtlety buttressing their client's position. Moreover, it seems unlikely that lawyers would not prioritise their use of information cost-effectively.

⁵⁵ See 'The mischief rule', ch 3, pp 67–68 above.

⁵⁶ The exclusionary rule was of late Victorian rather than venerable vintage. One can find both pre- and post-revolutionary cases in which the courts made explicit reference to parliamentary debate as an aid to statutory interpretation; see Ash v Abdy (1678) 3 Swan 664; Millar v Taylor (1769) 4 Burr 2303; Re Mew and Thorne (1862) 31 LJ Bcy 87. From a separation of powers perspective, the decision in Ash v Abdy is notable, since the judge deciding the case had introduced the relevant legislation to Parliament.

⁵⁷ This interpretation appealed to Popplewell J in Rost v Edwards [1990] 2 QB 460. However, he considered himself bound to accept the broad meaning. Re-interpretation would have to await a decision by the House of Lords.

⁵⁸ [1968] AC 58, [1967] 2 All ER 1197, HL.

Lord Scarman offered a third justification in Davis v Johnson.⁵⁹ He suggested that Hansard was an unreliable guide to a statute's meaning. The content of debate, suffused with the need to score party political points, would be unlikely to convey governmental intent precisely. This objection ostensibly seems convincing, but on reflection is overly simplistic. While many Commons or Lords exchanges may lack the rationality with which one might hope to find laws expressed, Hansard also contains calm, deliberate speeches in which ministers precisely describe the objectives they expect a bill to achieve. Lord Scarman's point might be met by selective resort to debate; total abstinence seems unnecessary.

A fourth reason, noted by Lord Diplock in Fothergill v Monarch Airlines Ltd,⁶⁰ was that 'elementary justice' demanded that all the materials on which the citizen might depend in litigation should be readily accessible. Lord Diplock felt Hansard did not meet this criterion. This is also a weak argument. One would doubt that citizens would find Hansard any more esoteric or inaccessible than the All England Law Reports. In so far as Lord Diplock's point raised a valid informed consent issue, it amounted to an argument not for excluding Hansard from the courts but for ensuring that its contents were more widely known and more easily available.

Sporadic challenges to the traditional position were made in the 1960s and 1970s. Dissenting in Warnerv Metropolitan Police Comr, Lord Reid reaffirmed the rule but added: 'there is room for an exception where examining the proceedings in Parliament would almost certainly settle the matter immediately one way or the other'.⁶¹ Lord Denning also appeared reluctant to accept the rule, sometimes disregarding it or circumventing it by referring not to Hansard itself, but to extracts from debates reproduced in legal textbooks or periodicals, or by taking illicit peeks at Hansard when not in court.⁶²

Perhaps more significantly (from a practical if not 'legal' perspective), the Commons resolved in 1980 that the courts need no longer petition the house for permission to make 'reference' to Hansard. The Commons appeared to root the rule solely in Art 9 of the Bill of Rights, though it was not clear if the house was waiving what it perceived to be a statutory protection or an aspect of its privilege.⁶³ It subsequently became clear that the Commons' interpretation of 'reference' was restricted: the house would regard use of Hansard to clarify the meaning of an ambiguous statute as exceeding the concept of 'reference'.⁶⁴ The stage nevertheless seemed set for revision of the rule.

Opening Pandora's box?

*Pepper v Hart*⁶⁵ was triggered by a textual ambiguity in legislation concerning the taxation of a particular benefit. The taxpayers maintained that a Minister had made a clear statement during debate which favoured their interpretation. This argument could not be sustained without recourse to Hansard. The taxpayers were therefore asking the court to overturn the exclusionary rule.

⁵⁹ [1979] AC 264, HL. ⁶⁰ [1981] AC 251, [1980] 2 All ER 696, HL.

⁶¹ [1969] 2 AC 256 at 279, HL.

⁶² See Davis v Johnson [1979] AC 264 at 276–277. Such peeking perhaps explains his observation in Magor some twenty years earlier that the judicial function was to make sense of Ministers' words as well as Parliament's.

⁶³ This again returns us to the question of whether Art 9 is declaratory or transformative of pre-revolutionary privilege. See Leopold P (1981) 'References in court to Hansard' Public Law 316; Miers D (1983) 'Citing Hansard as an aid to interpretation' Statute LR 98.

⁶⁴ See the letter from the Clerk of the House to the Attorney-General quoted from in Pepper v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42 at 55.

⁶⁵ [1993] AC 593, [1993] 1 All ER 42, HL.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson's leading judgment departed substantially if cautiously, from previous orthodoxy. His central conclusion was that:

reference to parliamentary material should be permitted as an aid to the construction of legislation which is ambiguous or obscure or the literal meaning of which leads to an absurdity... where such material clearly discloses... the legislative intention lying behind the ambiguous or obscure words.⁶⁶

The rationale underpinning Lord Browne-Wilkinson's judgment lay in what he referred to as an issue of constitutional principle. His principle, however, appeared at odds with the principle advanced by Lord Wilberforce in Beswick. He observed that legislators might sometimes be genuinely mistaken as to the legal meaning of the statutory formula they enacted. In such circumstances, the courts would frustrate rather than fulfill their constitutional subordination to 'Parliament' by not referring to Hansard. This analysis requires one to define parliamentary sovereignty not in the formalistic, Diceyan sense of blind obedience to statutory words, but in a more functionalist vein of giving effect to legislative intent, in which the courts assume responsibility for protecting citizens from legislators' readily ascertainable mistakes.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson attempted to meet Lord Scarman's aforementioned concerns about the cut and thrust of debate by limiting the type of speech to which judges may refer to statements by the Minister or member promoting the Bill. He was, however, less accommodating to other previous judicial justifications for the rule. He observed that New Zealand and Canada had both recently allowed their courts to refer to legislative proceedings; neither jurisdiction had found that the cost or duration of litigation had increased unacceptably as a result. Nor did Lord Browne-Wilkinson attach any weight to the argument that Hansard was insufficiently accessible to litigants, for such a weakness was equally attributable to legislation.

His Lordship was less than precise about the rule's source, suggesting it could derive from all three sources outlined above. He consequently dealt with each in turn. If the rule was judge-made self-regulation, there was no barrier to the House of Lords remaking it in a more contemporarily relevant form. Should the rule have a statutory base, Lord Browne-Wilkinson concluded that Art 9 should be reinterpreted in the narrow sense canvassed in Rost v Edwards:

In my judgment, the plain meaning of art 9, viewed against the historical background in which it was enacted, was to ensure that members of Parliament were not subjected to any penalty, civil or criminal for what they said [in either House].⁶⁷

Finally his Lordship addressed the question of parliamentary privilege. Referring to the 1980 Commons' resolution, he suggested that the house viewed its privileges as co-extensive with the scope of Art 9. Consequently, given his redefinition of Art 9, recourse to Hansard could not impinge upon privilege. One might doubt that the house would accept this reasoning, for it 'confirms' the subordinacy of privilege to the common law. Whether this last point has now joined the constitution's array of 'ultimate political facts' is at present an unanswerable question, determinable only when the Commons and the courts again adopt contradictory positions over a question of the magnitude of those posed by Wilkes, Stockdale and Bradlaugh.

Lord Browne-Wilkinson framed his judgment in cautious terms.⁶⁸ However the tests that he laid out were quite rapidly relaxed both by the House of Lords itself and by lower courts.⁶⁹ Lord Browne-Wilkinson seemed to take the view that this relaxation had gone too far. In Melluish (Inspector of Taxes) v BMI (No 3) Ltd,⁷⁰ he confirmed that Pepper v Hart should not be read as a justification for making reference to Hansard a routine element of the process of statutory interpretation.

⁶⁶ [1993] AC 593 at 634.

⁶⁷ Ibid, at 638.

⁶⁸ Zander op cit pp 153–157.

This evident unease with the way in which the case was being used was forcefully reiterated by the House of Lords in R v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions ex p Spath Holme Ltd.⁷¹ The Court was unanimous in stressing that the principle in Pepper v Hart should be used sparingly and cautiously. The point was perhaps put most clearly by Lord Bingham:

I think it important that the conditions laid down by the House in Pepper v Hart should be strictly insisted upon. Otherwise, the cost and inconvenience feared by Lord Mackay, whose objections to relaxation of the exclusionary rule were based on considerations of practice not principle, will be realised. The worst of all worlds would be achieved if parties routinely combed through Hansard, and the courts dredged through conflicting statements of parliamentary intention (see [1993] 1 All ER 42 at 61, [1993] AC 593 at 631), only to conclude that the statutory provision called for no further elucidation or that no clear and unequivocal statement by a responsible minister could be derived from Hansard.⁷²

The court's circumspection in Spath Holme about using Hansard was enthusiastically endorsed in a forceful analysis of the Pepper v Hart principle by Aileen Kavanagh.⁷³ Kavanagh suggests that the case may be read as elevating ministerial statements to the status of a source of law. This is seen to be problematic in two respects. Firstly, it undermines the role of Parliament as a collective assembly in which MPs engage in a careful and informed process of debate and evaluation which eventually leads to the production of a legislative text which accurately expresses the wishes of members who voted for it. Secondly, it undermines the role of the courts as the body with responsibility for determining the meaning of the laws that Parliament has enacted.

This argument has much to commend it in terms of abstract constitutional theory. In a more practical sense, it ought perhaps to be qualified somewhat. Two points might be made.

Firstly, the notion that MPs uniformly and consistently make informed choices as to the measures for which they vote is poorly based empirically. Cowley's previously discussed study of the voting behaviour of backbench Labour MPs since 1997 casts an illuminating and rather unsettling light on the realities of this part of the law-making process.⁷⁴ Some of Cowley's findings are almost comic. He cites for example occasions when MPs mistakenly walk through the wrong door when casting their votes. A more frequently occurring scenario is illustrated by a discussion of the extraordinarily esoteric contents of an obscure provision in the Finance Bill 2005. The provision was so complicated, and an understanding of its impact so thoroughly contingent on an understanding of the existing complicated law, that it is simply absurd to assume that many MPs appreciated the effect the measure would have when enacted. The matter is put in rather more prosaic and systemic terms by one of Cowley's MP respondents: 'I go through the lobby a great number of times not knowing a fuck about what I am voting for'.⁷⁵ The reality in such cases is that MPs simply do whatever party whips ask them to do.⁷⁶

⁶⁹ See generally Marshall G (1998) 'Hansard and the interpretation of statutes', in Oliver and Drewry op cit; Mullan K (1999) 'The impact of Pepper v Hart', in Carmichael and Dickson op cit.

⁷⁰ [1996] AC 454, [1995] 4 All ER 453, HL.

⁷¹ [2001] 2 AC 349, [2001] 1 All ER 195.

⁷² Ibid, at para 40.

⁷³ Kavanagh A (2005) 'Pepper v Hart and matters of constitutional principle' 121 LQR 98–122.

⁷⁴ (2005) op cit.

⁷⁵ Ibid, at 34.

⁷⁶ Ibid, at 28–34.

The second point is that one might as readily argue that Pepper v Hart enhances rather than reduces the power of the courts vis-à-vis the 'executive'. If one means by 'the executive' the government which is currently in power, invocation of Hansard as an interpretive aid may well reduce executive power. It is entirely possible that the legislative text in issue was promoted by a previous government with quite different political views from the administration currently in power, and with a quite different understanding from the present government as to the meaning of the relevant 'ambiguous or obscure' statutory provision.⁷⁷ More broadly, the conditions which Pepper v Hart attaches to use of Hansard are all discretion-laden and thus open to judicial manipulation. Is a statutory term ambiguous if literally construed? Would such construction lead to an absurd result? Did a Minister make a clear statement as to the government's intended meaning of the provision? Such questions will often be answerable quite defensibly as either 'yes' or 'no'. This means that the courts have a choice as to whether Hansard is to be used, and if so, as to what significance is attached to the information it contains.

Pepper v Hart has significant constitutional implications. This relates in part to its recognition of the political reality of government dominance of the legislative process and thus of shifts in the nature of the separation of powers within the contemporary constitution. But in respect of the rather narrower issue of parliamentary privilege, the judgment's greater importance lies in the court's implicit claim that it, rather than the two houses, is the only body possessing the constitutional competence to determine the meaning of privilege. This means that the courts are in effect denying that the Commons has any authority to claim immunity from orthodox understandings of parliamentary sovereignty and the rule of law. There may well be many aspects of privilege with which the courts feel unable to interfere. But that decision would be based on the functionalist criterion of the non-justiciable nature of the privilege in question, not formalist consideration of its source.

But Lord Browne-Wilkinson's judgment has more profound implications. Paradoxically, by asserting the supremacy of Parliament over its component parts, Pepper v Hart adds considerable force to arguments which attack the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty itself. We return to this argument in the final chapter. But as the following two sections suggest, it might readily be assumed that many MPs would be reluctant to tolerate further judicial intrusion into the houses' regulation of privilege.

IV. 'Contempt' of the house

The privileges of each house are now supposedly a closed category. Just as the Crown may not create prerogative powers which did exist in 1688, neither can the Commons or the Lords create 'new' privileges. But as chapter four suggested in discussing the Northumbria case, the prerogative's formally 'residual' nature has little meaning if the courts permit the government to discover 'lost' powers. That point would have equal force in respect of privilege even if it were accepted (which it manifestly, at least by the Commons is not) that the courts possessed sole jurisdiction to define its limits. If the Commons is the legitimate guardian of those boundaries, claims as to the 'residual' character of privilege would be quite misleading.

⁷⁷ A judgment which attached determinative significance to a ministerial statement in such circumstances would also enhance—at least in theoretical terms—the role of the House of Commons and House of Lords qua legislative assemblies, since in order to change the law in issue the present government would have to promote new legislation.

Furthermore, the Commons has traditionally claimed the power to punish 'contempts'—a power which the house seems to regard as so expansive that it is in effect claiming an unlimited jurisdiction. Erskine May defines contempt as:

any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any Member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results.⁷⁸

Were this a statutory concept, one might assume that Parliament had granted the two houses an arbitrary, illegitimate power. That assumption is reinforced when one realises that the houses also claim that they may punish contempts with fines or imprisonment. Neither sanction has been imposed in the modern era, but the Commons made frequent use of its imprisonment power in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.⁷⁹

Contempts may be committed either by MPs themselves or by non-members. Allegations of contempt may be raised by an individual MP with the Speaker, who decides if the matter should be referred for investigation to the Committee of Privileges. The Speaker effectively enjoys an unconfined discretion on referral, while the Committee itself enjoys similar discretion in determining how it investigates any matter.

Many instances in which a contempt complaint has been upheld have related to matters which could have amounted to criminal offences. One might point for example to citizens who engaged in a riot outside the house in the hope of intimidating MPs, or assaults upon individual members.⁸⁰ Others, while not intrinsically criminal, relate to behaviour which directly hinders the houses' work. Obvious examples are failure to attend a committee hearing; refusing to answer questions at such a hearing; offering obstructive or misleading responses to questions posed; or disrupting the proceedings of the house.⁸¹

The Commons also has a long tradition of upholding contempt complaints against journalists who have criticised the house itself or individual members. In 1702, the Commons resolved that publishing any material reflecting upon its proceedings or members was 'a high violation of its right and privileges'.⁸² The rationale for this power is evidently that criticism (apparently even if well founded) detracts from the house's dignity and undermines the public respect which the house seemingly assumes it deserves. This category of contempt is not however a mere historical anachronism. In the twentieth century it has been applied to MPs who claimed to have seen other MPs drunk in the house, and to journalists who suggested that MPs were getting extra petrol rations in the 1950s.⁸³

Perhaps of more interest are efforts made by individual MPs to have the most trivial issues investigated. The petrol rationing episode in the 1950s triggered press comment that the house was invoking privilege to stifle freedom of speech. This in turn led some MPs to seek to charge the newspaper editors concerned with contempt. Similarly several Labour MPs sought to initiate contempt proceedings against The Spectator magazine when it suggested that they were sympathetic to the North Vietnamese communist regime.⁸⁴ The Strauss episode is perhaps the most graphic example of the house's apparent capacity to endow its members with an inflated sense of self-importance. Strauss had suggested the mere threat of defamation proceedings against him could constitute a contempt. The suggestion that a citizen should be punished simply for seeking to establish if ⁷⁸ Op cit p 143.

⁷⁹ It was invoked in both the Wilkes and Bradlaugh sagas. For further examples see Erskine May ch 9.

⁸⁰ Erskine May pp 119–120. For a more subtle, recent example see Leopold P (1984) 'Parliamentary privilege and an MP's threats' Public Law 547.

⁸¹ See Marshall (1979) op cit pp 217–220.

⁸² Quoted in Erskine May p 121 n 9.

⁸³ Marshall (1979) op cit pp 229–231.

⁸⁴ See Seymour-Ure C (1964) 'The misuse of the question of privilege in the 1964–5 session of Parliament' Parliamentary Affairs 3808.

her common law rights have been infringed is a bizarre contention, utterly irreconcilable with any mainstream understanding of the rule of law.

The 1967 report of the Privileges Committee

Commenting on such cases, Marshall suggested that they had done much ‘to bring the House’s privilege jurisdiction into disrepute’.⁸⁵ The house itself appeared to recognise this in the late 1960s. A Privileges Committee report in 1967 concluded that MPs were ‘too sensitive to criticism’.⁸⁶ The house appears to have accepted this advice—the contempt jurisdiction has rarely been invoked since 1967.⁸⁷

Yet one might wonder if there is any need for the Commons or the Lords to possess such sweeping powers. Contempts which amount to criminal offences (such as assaulting MPs) can be addressed in the courts. Nor is there any strong justification for either house to have the power to punish criticism of its members or of the institution itself (even if the punishment consists only of the ritual of being called to the house to be scolded and offer an apology). It is unfortunate that newspaper editors called in recent times to retract their newspapers’ criticisms of the Commons have not simply denied the house’s jurisdiction and challenged the legality of its contempt proceedings before the courts.⁸⁸ For in the twenty-first century, there would seem to be several good reasons for regarding the Commons as an intrinsically inadequate institution. Its minimal capacity to control the Cabinet is an illustration of this point, as is the way in which its electoral system distorts the wishes of voters. Both those weaknesses are collective in nature, pointing to defects in the house’s institutional basis. Of more significance to the question of the legitimacy of maintaining the privileges of the Commons is the way in which the house responded in the recent past to widespread public disquiet about the ethical shortcomings of some of its members.

V. The regulation of MPs’ ethical standards

The summer of 1995 presented the British public with the extraordinary spectacle of a backbench Conservative MP, Sir Jerry Wiggin, tabling amendments during the committee stage of a Bill’s passage in the name of another Conservative, Sebastian Coe, without Coe’s permission. Wiggin had a financial interest in the issue; he was a consultant for an organisation which would benefit from the amendment. He had used Coe’s name for fear that the amendment’s prospects of success would be compromised if the house knew its mover had been paid by a commercial organisation to promote it. Press coverage of the episode was hugely critical of Wiggin, and he found few supporters even on the Conservative benches. One might have thought that his action was prima facie a gross contempt. However the Speaker declined to refer the matter to the Committee of ⁸⁵ (1979) op cit pp 229.

⁸⁶ Sills P (1968) ‘Report of the Select Committee on Parliamentary Privilege’ 31 MLR 435; Seymour-Ure C (1970) ‘Proposed reforms of parliamentary privilege: an assessment in the light of recent cases’ Parliamentary Affairs 221.

⁸⁷ For a list of examples see Griffith and Ryle op cit pp 98–102.
⁸⁸ That they have not done so is presumably due primarily to the fact that the house also claims sole jurisdiction to determine which newspapers are granted facilities within the house to report its proceedings. MPs may thus ‘punish’ a newspaper’s supposed contempt by reducing the number of ‘lobby passes’ offered to the paper’s reporters, or banning its reporters from the precincts of the house.

Privileges; in her opinion Wiggin's misbehaviour merited no greater punishment than that he apologise to the house.⁸⁹

Until 1975, MPs were under no obligation to declare either the sources or amounts of any income they received over and above their MP's salary. Parliament had not enacted legislation on the subject. Nor had the house concluded that it should itself require such disclosure. This lacuna had significant implications for the concepts of informed consent, both within the Commons itself and in terms of the relationship between an MP and her electors. One could not be sure, for example, that individual MPs were not supporting particular pieces of legislation, making speeches, or putting questions to Ministers because they had been paid to do so by commercial interests rather than because they honestly believed in the intrinsic rectitude of the course they were following. It is quite plausible to conclude that many electors might decline to support a particular candidate if they knew that she was receiving financial benefits from sources of which they disapproved.

The register of members' interests

A considerable scandal broke in the early 1970s, when a prominent Labour politician, T Dan Smith,⁹⁰ was convicted of various offences of corruption. The scandal was exacerbated by the revelation that Edward Short, then Labour Leader of the house, had accepted a 'gift' of £250 from Mr Smith in 1963 'provided it can be kept a confidential matter between the two of us'.⁹¹

The episode generated extensive press coverage dwelling on the many opportunities for corrupt practice which became available to MPs as a result of their membership of the house. There was never any suggestion that such behaviour was endemic or even widespread within the Commons. However given the effective dominance of the legislative process which the Commons by then possessed, even one MP who was prepared to engage in improper financial relationships would be one too many. Without an effective mechanism to regulate such matters, the house could not realistically claim to be above suspicion.

Among the more far-reaching proposals aired in the aftermath of the Smith affair was the suggestion that legislation should be introduced requiring MPs to make their income tax returns available for public inspection. The house apparently regarded this as an intolerable intrusion into MPs' private affairs, and opted for a far more modest system of self-regulation. In May 1974 the Commons resolved that:

in any debate or proceeding of the house...or communications which a Member may have with other Members or Ministers or servants of the Crown, he shall disclose any relevant pecuniary interest or benefit of whatever nature, whether direct or indirect, that he may have or may be expecting to have.⁹²

The house also resolved to create a Register of Members' Interest, on which MPs would record certain sources of income. An ad hoc select committee was established to produce detailed proposals. It is perhaps worth recalling that the Labour government then had only a bare Commons majority; there was thus no prospect of the government simply pushing through its own preferences. That the house endorsed such anodyne reforms is perhaps a powerful indication of its members' (irrespective of party) arrogance and self-righteousness.

⁸⁹ The Speaker's decision astonished seasoned observers, within and outside the house; see The Guardian 23 May 1995.

⁹⁰ Smith was not an MP, but the leader of Newcastle city council.

⁹¹ See The Economist 4 May 1974.

⁹² Erskine May p 384.

The house adopted the select committee's recommendations in 1975. The Register would serve:

to provide information of any pecuniary interest or other material benefit which a Member of Parliament may receive which might be thought to affect his [sic] conduct as a member of Parliament or influence his [sic] actions, speeches or votes in Parliament.⁹³

The Register covers a wide range of financial interests, including such matters as directorships of companies, income from practice in the professions, paid employment (which includes 'public relations' and 'consultancy' activities), and overseas visits not financed from public funds.⁹⁴ The names of any employers or clients should also be disclosed whenever the income the member derives from the relationship pertains 'in any manner' to her/his membership of the house. However, there was no requirement that members disclose how much income they received from each source. The information that the Register disclosed was thus of limited value. The house also created a 'Select Committee on Members' Interests' to consider amendment to the Register and hear complaints about alleged breaches of its terms. But it was not clear what sanctions, if any, would be imposed on MPs whose entries in the Register were found to be inaccurate.

Edward Short, introducing the report to the house, observed that it amounted to no more than 'broad guidelines within which Members should proceed with good sense and responsibility'.⁹⁵ Nevertheless, its measures still proved too much for some MPs. Thus the Conservative MP John Stokes, seemingly oblivious to press coverage and public opinion, argued that: 'there is no demand for all this cumbersome machinery to register Members' interests'.⁹⁶

Quite how effective the Register proved is an open question. One MP, Enoch Powell, simply refused to disclose any interests. No action was taken against him. Nor does it appear that the Register became more effective with age. Appreciable controversy arose in 1994, when press stories suggested that Conservative MP Neil Hamilton had failed to disclose that he had enjoyed an expensive six-day stay at the Ritz hotel in Paris paid for by a foreign businessman, Mohammed Al-Fayed, who was then under investigation by the Department of Trade and Industry. The Privilege Committee's 'investigation' of the Hamilton episode thoroughly undermined any contention that the house eschewed party political considerations in such matters. Conservative MPs acquiesced in the government's wish to have a whip on the committee. His presence could serve no purpose but to ensure that other Conservative members did nothing to jeopardise party interests. Opposition MPs eventually walked out of the Committee, which then reached the extraordinary conclusion that while Hamilton had failed to make a relevant disclosure, this amounted to no more than 'imprudence' and did not merit any punishment.⁹⁷ This particular case was however merely symptomatic of an apparently wider malaise.

'Cash for questions' and the report of the Nolan Commission

In 1974, the Labour MP Joe Ashton was found to have committed a serious contempt by alleging that members were prepared to raise issues in the house at the behest of commercial organisations in return for payment.⁹⁸ Whether Ashton's claim was then ill-founded is a matter for speculation. It is however clear that some twenty years later the house

⁹³ Erskine May p 386.

⁹⁴ For a full list see Erskine May pp 386–387.

⁹⁵ HCD, 12 June 1975 c 737.

⁹⁶ 12 June 1975 c 737 at c 749.

⁹⁷ See The Guardian 8 June 1995.

⁹⁸ Marshall (1979) op cit p 228.

contained at least two Conservative MPs who, for a sizeable fee, were prepared to do just what Ashton alleged.

Acting on rumours about some MPs' rather lax ethical standards, two Sunday Times journalists posed as representatives of a foreign company wishing to raise a question in the house and willing to pay £1,000 to the MP who placed it. The journalists approached ten Labour MPs and ten Conservative MPs. The Labour members refused to take money for such purposes, as did seven Conservatives. The eighth Conservative, Bill Walker, agreed to table a question for a fee given to charity. Two Conservatives, Graham Riddick and David Tredinnick (both parliamentary private secretaries), agreed to table a question and accept the fee.

In the ensuing furore, the Speaker granted an emergency debate to discuss the issue, and referred the case to the Privileges Committee. After a lengthy investigation, the Privileges Committee, dominated by a Conservative majority, imposed a punishment of ten and twenty days' suspension on the offending MPs. The 'punishment' was laughably lenient. And it is perhaps an indication of the extraordinary values adhered to by many MPs that suggestions were aired that The Sunday Times should be charged with contempt of the house for exposing their colleagues' moral frailties.

The 'cash for questions' scandal generated such hostile press coverage that the government established a committee of inquiry, chaired by Nolan LJ, with a wide-ranging remit to inquire into 'Standards in Public Life'.⁹⁹ Rumours rapidly began to circulate that the Committee would recommend extensive reforms, whereupon Conservative MPs equally rapidly began to cast aspersions on its impartiality and competence. Yet the recommendations contained in the Committee's first report were feeble. Its most significant proposal was that MPs should in future disclose not just the source but also the amount of income they received for the performance of services arising from their membership of the house. Nolan also urged the creation of a body 'independent' of the Commons to investigate MPs' behaviour. The model he favoured was that of a 'Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards', who would report to the Privileges Committee. The obvious weakness of the recommendation was that the Nolan Committee had apparently accepted that MPs' ethical standards should remain a matter for the house. Neither proposal was to have a statutory basis; rather they were to be matters for the Commons itself to introduce.

Although the Conservative government initially welcomed the report, many of its backbenchers (those, one assumes, who received substantial 'consultancy' payments) signalled that they would not support its implementation. Rather than carry the proposals into force by relying on opposition votes, the government decided to refer the Nolan Report to a special select committee for further consideration.

The Committee had a Conservative majority. It divided on party lines on the main question before it. The Conservative members rejected—while all the Opposition members accepted—the Nolan proposal that the house's rules should require MPs to divulge the amount as well as the source of their 'consultancy' payments. The Committee's recommendation was subsequently endorsed by the Cabinet. However, when the Committee's report was put before the house, some twenty-three Conservative MPs voted with the Opposition in support of requiring disclosure of the amount of income MPs received for these activities.¹⁰⁰ The Commons did accept that the post of Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards (PCS) should be created. It also subsumed the former role of the Privileges Committee and the Committee on Members Interests into a new Committee on Standards and Privileges (CSP).

⁹⁹ See Rush M (1998) 'The law relating to members' conduct', in Oliver and Drewry op cit.

¹⁰⁰ The Guardian 2 November 1995; 8 November 1995.

Whether this new regime would prove more effective than its predecessor was open to question. The disclosure requirement was not a 'law' enforceable in the independent arena of the courts; it was merely an internal rule of the house. Its adequacy would be entirely dependent on MPs attaching greater importance to financial candour than to party loyalties. The new rule would presumably be most effective if the house were to expel or suspend those members who fail to make accurate disclosures. But one might doubt that MPs in a governing party with a small Commons majority would take such drastic steps should some of their number be found wanting on a question of financial integrity. The outcome of the 'cash for questions' scandal was thus something of a damp squib.

The Blair government took no steps to place the Nolan Commission's recommendations on a statutory basis, nor to strengthen the controls on MPs' disclosure of financial rewards. The Nolan Committee has however metamorphosed into a long-term feature on the political landscape, subsequently chaired by Lord Neill and charged with a general remit to investigate ethical standards in a wide range of governmental bodies. But the need for financial candour has evidently yet to impress itself fully on MPs; the press continued to field a steady stream of stories reporting members' failures to declare relevant sources of income.¹⁰¹

Many of these stories related to extremely trivial issues, and indicated that the rather serious questions of MPs' financial ethics had been subsumed beneath the cloak of party political bickering. But in a more serious vein, some Labour Ministers proved little less susceptible to the temptation to engage in financial practices of dubious ethicality than their Conservative predecessors. Elizabeth Filkin succeeded Sir Gordon Downey as the PCS. She rapidly made it clear that she would take a vigorous and rigorous approach to her duties. This included conducting investigations into the affairs of Keith Vaz, a Minister of State at the Foreign Office, and John Reid, then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. Ms Filkin considered that both men had deliberately obstructed her inquiries. In her view, Reid had gone so far as to threaten a witness whom Ms Filkin wished to interview. She received little support from the Commons however, or from the government. The CSP rejected her highly critical report on John Reid, and she left her post in 2002 amid press stories of a concerted effort by the government and many backbenchers to sabotage her work.¹⁰²

In 1975, Enoch Powell MP had opposed the creation of the Register of Interests on the grounds that: 'we degrade ourselves by implying that our honour and traditions are not adequate to maintain proper standards in this house'.¹⁰³ Similar sentiments were voiced in 1995 by Conservative MPs who opposed the Nolan recommendations.¹⁰⁴ Yet MPs' 'honour and tradition' are clearly entirely inadequate guarantors of 'proper standards'. The circumstances surrounding Ms Filkin's departure from her post would suggest that—most unfortunately—the majority of MPs continued to refuse to accept this.

It should nonetheless be noted that in 2009 Parliament did enact the Parliamentary Standards Act.¹⁰⁵ Section 3 of the Act created a body (presumptively) independent of the House of Commons called the Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority ('IPSA'), which would be responsible for revising the content of the expenses system and thereafter administering it. Section 3 also established a 'Commissioner for Parliamentary ¹⁰¹ See Rush (1998) op cit pp 115–116.

¹⁰² See generally Doig A (2002) 'Sleaze fatigue in 'The House of ill-repute' Parliamentary Affairs 389. Ms Filkin detailed her complaints in a letter to the Speaker and a series of press interviews; see The Guardian 26 November 2001; The Times 5 December 2001.

¹⁰⁴ See The Times 19 May 1995; The Guardian 19 May 1995.

¹⁰⁵ For an overview of the Act see Parpworth N (2010) 'The Parliamentary Standards Act 2009: a constitutional dangerous dogs measure' Modern LR 262.

¹⁰³ HCD 12 June 1975 c 743.

Investigations' who would police the administration of the scheme to ensure that inappropriate or fraudulent claims were not made. A new criminal offence was introduced by s 10 of the Act, dealing with MPs making claims on the basis of what they know to be false or misleading information. Rather surprisingly, the new offence would carry a maximum sentence of only one year, rather than the seven years available under s 17 of the Theft Act.

The new system, introduced in 2010, was notably more restrictive than its predecessor,¹⁰⁶ especially in relation to the payment of allowances for second homes. The new scheme prompted howls of outrage from many MPs, and was criticised as 'anti-family' by the Prime Minister (David Cameron) in December 2010. The notion that IPSA was an independent body was rather undermined by the Prime Minister's blunt assertion that if IPSA did not change the rules then IPSA itself would be changed.¹⁰⁷ That impression was reinforced when modifications were subsequently made in 2011, particularly in respect of the number of MPs who would be entitled to claim expenses for running a second home.

The 2009 Act certainly marks an advance in the transparency of the expenses scheme and its administrations. The Act nonetheless has obvious weaknesses. It does not apply at all to the House of Lords, and leaves the Commons' Privileges and Standards Committee with a significant role to play in overseeing the Commissioner's investigatory processes. More importantly, as Mr Cameron's 2010 intervention made clear, IPSA operates under the cloud of a government threat of reform if it pursues its task too rigorously.

The report of the Nicholls Committee

Shortly after the 1997 general election, the two houses established a Joint Committee, chaired by a law lord, Lord Nicholls, to review the whole area of privilege. The Committee produced an extensive report, which contained significant proposals for change.¹⁰⁸ Most importantly, the Committee advocated that many issues relating to privilege—and in particular the various elements of Art 9 (ie 'proceedings in Parliament'; 'questioned'; 'place out of Parliament')—now be given a much more tightly defined statutory base. Responsibility for interpreting those provisions would presumably therefore rest with the courts, not with either house. In an attempt to allay public concern about corruption, the Committee also proposed a new statutory offence of bribery of MPs be created. This would, again, be a matter for the courts to control. The Report also addressed some of the evident weaknesses in the houses' internal disciplinary procedures by proposing that the CSP's hearings should in future adopt a more 'judicial' approach in its investigations. These were all worthy recommendations. But they would be of little value if they were not put on a statutory basis. There was little indication that Parliament would take any such steps quickly. That any significant reform was enacted appears to be attributable to the substantial press and public criticism of MPs' ethical standard in the expenses scandal in 2007–2010.

¹⁰⁶ Details of the scheme, and of the claims made under it, are available on the IPSA website at: <<http://www.parliamentstandards.org.uk/IPSAmps/Schemeold>>.

¹⁰⁷ See The Guardian 15 December 2010 at: <<http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/2010/dec/15/cameron-mps-expenses-ipsa>>.

¹⁰⁸ See generally Leopold P (1999) 'Report of the Joint Committee on parliamentary privilege' Public Law 604; Lock G (1999) 'Report of the Joint Committee on parliamentary privilege' Study of Parliament Group Newsletter, Summer, 13.

Parliamentary privilege and the expenses scandal

The Parliamentary Standards Act 2009 expressly states in s 1 that; ‘Nothing in this Act shall be construed by any court in the United Kingdom as affecting Article IX of the Bill of Rights 1689’. Section 1 was inserted during the Bill’s passage following concern being expressed (primarily by Commons officials) over the original version of the Bill which expressly disappplied Art 9 to IPSA’s activities and those of the Commissioner. The concern was evidently that this would deter MPs from co-operating with IPSA and the Commissioner for fear that any information provided might subsequently be used against them in criminal proceedings.¹⁰⁹ What was perhaps not appreciated at the time was that several of the MPs who were accused of false accounting in respect of their expenses under the pre-IPSA scheme would argue that their prosecution was prohibited by Art 9 on the basis that the administration of the expenses scheme and their claims under it were proceedings in Parliament.¹¹⁰ That contention was rejected at trial, in the Court of Appeal,¹¹¹ and by the Supreme Court.¹¹²

The litigation is of limited value as a guide to the nature and extent of privilege in circumstances where privilege is being invoked by the House of Commons collectively to resist what would appear prima facie to be clear statutory or common law rules. The Commons offered no support to any of the defendants, being content to assume that the Theft Act charges were properly brought. This stance perhaps made the courts’ task rather easier.

The leading judgment in the Supreme Court was given by Lord Phillips. His opinion is interesting in a jurisdictional sense, in so far as he held that Art 9 co-existed with, rather than replaced, privilege as a concept having neither a statutory or common law basis. In respect of Art 9, Lord Phillips had no doubt that the definition of ‘proceedings in parliament’ was a matter for the courts as part of its general constitutional duty to interpret statutes. Echoing the judgment of Lord Denman in Stockdale, Lords Phillips took a relatively narrow approach to the issue:

61 There are good reasons of policy for giving article 9 a narrow ambit that restricts it to the important purpose for which it was enacted—freedom for Parliament to conduct its legislative and deliberative business without interference from the Crown or the Crown’s judges....

62....Submitting claims for allowances and expenses does not form part of, nor is it incidental to, the core or essential business of Parliament, which consists of collective deliberation and decision making. The submission of claims is an activity which is an incident of the administration of Parliament; it is not part of the proceedings in Parliament.

Lord Phillips’ conclusion in respect of what he termed the ‘exclusive cognisance’ of each house to regulate its internal proceedings was similarly unhelpful to the defendants. His reasoning however seemed to be driven largely by the fact that the Commons itself did not seem to consider that its privileges extended to a matter of this sort. Such a deferential approach may be unproblematic where the view of the courts as to ‘exclusive cognisance’ coincides with that of the majority of the Commons. It may however prove much less palatable in circumstances where the view of the Commons is ostensibly inconsistent with statutory or common law requirements.

Lord Rodger’s opinion, while concurring in the result, was more blunt in its reasoning. He seemed doubtful that Art 9 and ‘exclusive cognisance’ were separate phenomena. But even if they were, neither could provide immunity from prosecution in respect of ¹⁰⁹ See Parpworth op cit at pp 974–976.

¹¹⁰ The MPs being the Labour members: Chaytor, Morley and Devine.

¹¹¹ [2010] EWCA Crim 1910; [2010] Cr App R 394.

¹¹² [2010] UKSC 52; [2010] 3 WLR 1707.

'an ordinary crime'. And while making a seditious speech in the house would not be an 'ordinary crime', fiddling one's expenses was, just as an MP would commit an 'ordinary crime' by assaulting a fellow MP in the chamber or stealing money from the till in one of the house's dining rooms.

The Bribery Act 2010

The enactment of the Parliamentary Standards Act 2009 was followed by Parliament's evident, albeit not explicit, acceptance that it should be a criminal offence for an MP to accept a bribe in relation to the performance of her/his parliamentary activities. This had been proposed by the Joint Committee on Parliamentary Privilege in 1999, but the measure was not enacted until 2010. The offences created under the Act—essentially both of giving and accepting a bribe—are however crimes of general application, and do not identify MPs as a specific category.¹¹³

The original version of the Bill¹¹⁴ (in cl 15) provided in explicit terms that the new offence would apply to MPs, and that Art 9 would not provide an MP with any protection against prosecution:

15. Proceedings in Parliament

- (1) No enactment or rule of law preventing proceedings in Parliament being impeached or questioned in any court or any place out of Parliament is to prevent any evidence of
- (a) words spoken by a member of either house of Parliament in proceedings in Parliament, or
- (b) any other conduct of such a member in such proceedings
- from being admissible in proceedings against the member for a bribery offence or in related proceedings.

The draft Bill was however subject to pre-legislative scrutiny by a joint Lords and Commons committee, which promptly recommended that cl 15 be deleted.¹¹⁵ The rather feeble basis for this was that the privilege issue should not be dealt with in a 'piecemeal' way, but should instead be the subject of more comprehensive consideration and reform. Given that ten years had by then passed since the Nicholls Committee had made such a recommendation, one might credibly think that successive majorities of members in the Commons were in no hurry for comprehensive reform to be broached.

Although this recommendation to remove cl 15 was accepted when the Bill began its passage, the (Labour) Minister promoting the Bill gave a clear indication at second reading that MPs' parliamentary activities fell within its scope:

There is one point that is not in the Bill but which the House would expect me to mention. The general offences in the Bill apply to all those performing functions of a public nature. As such, we intend that the Bill would apply to Members of this House and of the other place. The Joint Committee did not demur from this. It is, I believe, axiomatic that no Peer or Member of Parliament should be above the law.

Should any MP prosecuted under the Act seek to shelter behind Art 9—or indeed the 'exclusive cognisance' of the house—reference will presumably be made to this passage under the Pepper v Hart principle. However, the removal of cl 15 has unfortunate ¹¹³ See the discussion in Munro C (2011) 'Parliamentarians, privilege and prosecutions' Scots Law Times 1.

¹¹⁴ Ministry of Justice (2009) Bribery: draft legislation: available at: <<http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/+/http://www.justice.gov.uk/publications/docs/draft-bribery-bill-tagged.pdf>>.

¹¹⁵ See the committee press release available at: <http://www.law.qmul.ac.uk/news/docs/JCDBB%20Press%20notice_280709.pdf>.

implications, and one need not be overly cynical to wonder if these were both understood and seen as desirable by the then government and many MPs.

The main difficulty is that to make out an offence under the 2010 Act, the prosecution will often need to prove not just that an MP received an improper payment or benefit, but that she did so in return for a parliamentary activity, be it the casting of a vote for or against a particular legislative proposal, the moving of an amendment to a Bill, the content of a speech, or the asking of a spoken or written question to a Minister. The trial court would therefore have to form a view on the content of, and motives underlying, the MP's speech and conduct. Unlike the submission of an expenses claim, such activities might be thought to fall within the narrow (per Chaytor) construction of Art 9.¹¹⁶ We might wonder if bribery will be considered by a court to be an 'ordinary crime' (to borrow Lord Rodger's terminology) if it can only be made out after careful judicial examination of what an MP said and why she/he said it during the legislative process or in her/his dealings with Ministers. More importantly perhaps, we might wonder if a majority of members in the Commons would regard it in such a fashion. Given the track record of MPs in recent years, it may not be too long before the question arises.

Conclusion

Media coverage of the cash for questions scandal and the Nolan Report was perhaps most notable for revealing the casual equation frequently made, both by seasoned media commentators and by MPs themselves of the House of Commons with Parliament, and relatedly of the privileges of the house with legislation. This may perhaps be seen as a realistic interpretation of the contemporary balance of power between Parliament's three constituent parts. As noted in chapter six, the Commons is now much the more powerful of the two houses, and we shall see in chapter nine that the Monarch no longer plays a meaningful role in the legislative process.

The equation is, however, theoretically inept, and in practical terms both dangerous and underdeveloped, because it fails to take the further realistic step of observing that the Commons is generally just a vehicle for the promotion of factional, party interest. The Commons alone (except on those very rare occasions when no single party commands a reliable majority) does not in any sense perform the role that the revolution bestowed upon Parliament. The notion that the Commons plays a significantly independent role either as an actor within the legislative process or as a monitor of executive behaviour is generally quite fallacious in the contemporary political context.

It is perhaps an exaggeration to suggest that our examination of the Commons' legislative and supervisory roles, of the electoral system through which its members are chosen, and of the privileges within which MPs wrap themselves, leads to the conclusion that the lower house as presently constituted and regulated can defensibly be described as unrepresentative, incompetent, and corrupt. Such hyperbole perhaps contains more than a grain of truth, but it would as yet be premature to form firm conclusions as to the adequacy of our present parliamentary institutions. The next two chapters take us further towards the position from which a firm conclusion might more plausibly be drawn.

¹¹⁶ Presumably most attempts to bribe an MP would be prompted by the briber's hope to secure political advantage, and so necessarily relate to the MP's political activities. One could envisage 'non-political' bribes in this sense, a company seeking to 'persuade' MPs to choose a particular supplier of catering or computer facilities to the Commons for example, which would fall outside the sphere of what Lord Phillips in Chaytor termed 'core' or 'essential' parliamentary activities.

Chapter nine addresses a further set of non-legal principles of the constitution which regulate governmental and parliamentary behaviour, while chapter ten assesses the uses to which the executive's dominance of the legislature has been put in respect of perhaps the most important of constitutional values in a nominally democratic society—namely the extent to which 'the people' can effectively express the divergent political and moral beliefs which they hold.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Leopold P (1998) 'The application of the civil and criminal law to members of Parliament and parliamentary proceedings', in Drewry G and Oliver D (eds) The law and Parliament

Arnstein W (1983) The Bradlaugh case ch 1

Lock G (1989) 'The 1689 Bill of Rights' Political Studies 541

Marshall G (1998) 'Hansard and the interpretation of statutes', in Drewry G and Oliver D (eds) The law and Parliament

Doig A (2002) 'Sleaze fatigue in 'The House of ill-repute' Parliamentary Affairs 389

Leopold P (1999) 'Report of the Joint Committee on parliamentary privilege' Public Law 604

Stockdale E (1989) 'The unnecessary crisis: the background to the Parliamentary Papers Act 1840' Public Law 30

Case law and legislation

Bradlaugh v Gossett (1884) 12 QBD 271

Stockdale v Hansard (1839) 9 Ad & El 1

Pepper v Hart [1993] AC 593

R v Chaytor [2010] UKSC 52; [2010] 3 WLR 1707

Chapter 9

Constitutional Conventions

Thus far we have focused primarily on legal regulation of constitutional behaviour. Such controls may be construed as performing a political or moral function—to ensure that the constitution respects the demands of democracy and the rule of law. Chapter six addressed more clearly the constitutional inter-relationship between legal principle and political practice by discussing the changing functions of the House of Lords, especially instances of tension between the Lords' legal powers and shifting conventional understandings of its legitimate legislative role. This chapter assesses the nature and purpose of constitutional conventions more systematically.

We might begin by considering several hypothetical situations. Assume, for example, that the Queen personally opposes a government's policy to cut old age pensions. She decides that when the Bill promoting the policy is sent for the Royal Assent she will not sign it, even though it was passed by both the Commons and the Lords. She justifies her action on the grounds that 'the people' dislike the policy (observing that the government did not win a majority of votes at the last election) and claims her first loyalty is to her people, not to the Houses of Parliament or the government. Alternatively, assume that the Queen no longer wants David Cameron as Prime Minister, and concludes that if the Conservative Party (either alone or in coalition) has a majority of Commons seats after the next election she will invite Ken Clarke to be Prime Minister, even though Cameron remains Conservative Party leader.

Giving the Royal Assent and appointing a Prime Minister are prerogative powers still exercised by the Monarch personally. The courts have never indicated that such prerogatives are justiciable. Thus, if the Queen adopted either course, there is no apparent legal obstacle in her way. Nor does it answer this problem to suggest that Parliament could pass legislation preventing such behaviour—for such legislation could only emerge if the Queen assented to the relevant Bill. But it is not just the Queen who wields potentially important yet clearly non-justiciable constitutional powers.

Let us suppose, as a third hypothetical scenario, that at the next general election Labour wins a two-seat Commons majority, but has a smaller share of the vote than the Conservatives. David Cameron claims that the Conservative Party has 'won' the election, refuses to resign as Prime Minister, and he and his Party colleagues resolve (with the Queen's support) to stay in office as a minority government.

We will find neither an Act nor a common law rule indicating that the law of the constitution has been breached in those situations. But it seems most unlikely such events could ever occur. Could the Queen override the wishes of the Commons and Lords? Or impose an unwanted Prime Minister on the Commons' majority party? Would a Prime Minister really have to be dragged out of Downing Street after a general election defeat? That such hypotheses belong in the realm of fantasy is a result of their political impracticality—or, in other words, of their ‘unconstitutionality’. They indicate that vital pillars of our constitutional structure rest upon foundations with no obvious legal basis—foundations which we might call constitutional conventions.

The Diceyan perspective—laws and conventions distinguished

Dicey’s Law of the Constitution identified two distinct types of constitutional rule:

The one set of rules are in the strictest sense ‘laws’, since they are rules (whether derived from statute or ... the common law) enforced by the courts; ... The other set of rules consists of conventions, understandings, habits or practices which, though they may regulate the conduct of ... officials, are not in reality laws at all since they are not enforced by the courts.¹

Dicey does not distinguish laws from conventions because of their importance, or their role, but in terms of whether they are enforceable by the courts. The utility of that proposition is discussed below. But first, it may be useful to approach constitutional conventions from another angle. In Jennings’ view, a convention was characterised not just by its legal non-enforceability, but also because there was a reason for the rule.² We might therefore ask what constitutional role conventions supposedly play.

The functions and sources of conventions

A simple, if incomplete, way to characterise conventions’ constitutional function is that they fill in the gaps within the legal structure of government. This notion operates at different levels of generality. Very narrowly, conventions provide a moral framework within which government Ministers or the Monarch should exercise non-justiciable legal powers. Slightly more broadly, they function as one means of regulating the relationship between Ministers within central government. More widely, conventions also regulate the relationship between the different branches of government—especially between the Monarch and the Cabinet, between central government and the Commons and Lords, and between central government and local government. We analyse that final relationship in chapter ten. This chapter explores the first three. Before turning to conventions’ function and substance however, we should give some thought to their source.

The sources of constitutional conventions

As noted in chapter six, George V refused Asquith’s requests for a mass creation of Liberal peers to overcome the Lords’ Conservative majority during the 1909–1911 controversies. The King had sought advice from senior Conservative politicians. Asquith had described the Lords’ intransigence as ‘a breach of the constitution’. That breach was of a conventional, not legal nature. Asquith took a similar view of George V’s recourse to opposition party politicians for advice. In a minute to the King, Asquith explained why:

The part to be played by the Crown, in such a situation as now exists, has happily been settled by the accumulated traditions and unbroken practice of more than 70 years. It is to act upon the advice of the Ministers who for the time being possess the confidence of the House of Commons. ... It follows that it is not the function of a Constitutional Sovereign to act as arbiter or mediator between rival parties and policies, still less to take advice from the leaders on both sides, with the view to forming a conclusion of his own.

¹ (1915) op cit pp 23–24.

² (1959) op cit p 136.

Asquith assumed that the reason for the convention that the Monarch ‘act upon the advice of the Ministers who possess the confidence of the Commons’ was to ensure that the preferences of the party with majority Commons support were always given legal effect whenever personal prerogatives were deployed. We can see an obvious ‘democratic’ (albeit majoritarian) justification for the convention, since the party with a Commons majority usually represents the largest section (if not a majority) of the electorate.

Asquith also suggests three possible sources of conventions: ‘tradition’, ‘unbroken practice’, and a lengthy time span, here seventy years.³ We might reasonably assume that if a particular (non-legal) aspect of the government process possesses all three characteristics it can be regarded as a convention.

The idea that there are minimum requirements for practice to become a convention is reinforced by the argument that there are also a set of non-legal constitutional rules inferior to conventions. Dicey used such phrases as customs, practices, and usages to describe these lesser rules of behaviour. Jennings agreed with Dicey on this point. He suggested that these informal practices could be divided into those that eventually became conventions and those that did not. As already noted, Jennings additionally insisted that a convention only arose if there was an important ‘reason’ for its existence, ie that its provisions had substantial political significance.

Determining when a practice matures sufficiently to be a convention is a question defying authoritative answer. Chapter six suggested the Salisbury doctrine was a convention. Griffith and Ryle’s Parliament approves that classification. But another eminent commentator, Colin Turpin, concludes: ‘It may be doubted whether these principles have sufficient clarity, or are supported by a sufficient agreement to give them the status of conventions’.⁴

Such disagreement over so important an element of constitutional history implies we may never find analytical tools which tell us when a custom assumes conventional status. We might nonetheless proceed by assuming that a crucial test of whether a custom is a convention is whether the rule is respected by the people it supposedly controls. This suggests that convention spotting is more an empirical than a theoretical task. Consequently, the only way to decide how to classify rules of political behaviour is to examine situations where a supposed convention has either been respected or ignored. The rules on which we initially focus are the concepts of collective and individual ministerial responsibility.⁵

I. Collective ministerial responsibility

The Cabinet, like the office of Prime Minister, has no identifiable legal source. It assumed a recognisably modern form after about 1720, when we can also see the first Prime Minister emerging as the ‘first among equals’ within it. Both the office of Prime Minister and the institution of the Cabinet are therefore creatures of convention. As suggested in chapter five, except in periods when a ruling party has a small Commons majority, and must be acutely sensitive to its MPs’ wishes, the Cabinet is the hub of the legislative and executive arms of government: it is there that government policies are formulated and refined. Consequently, for a government with a reliable Commons majority, parliamentary sovereignty is in effect Cabinet sovereignty. Given the Cabinet’s obvious importance, it may seem odd that it operates without any appreciable legal structure. But the absence of legal controls on Cabinet behaviour does not mean that there are no principles regulating its activities.

³ A period which (from 1909) takes us back to the enactment of the Great Reform Act.

⁴ (1990) op cit p 491. ⁵ See generally Diana Woodhouse (1994) Ministers and Parliament.

The convention of ministerial responsibility is perhaps the most important non-legal rule within our constitution. It regulates the conduct of government (and especially Cabinet) activities, both in respect of Ministers' relations with each other, and with the two Houses of Parliament. The convention is divided into collective and individual branches. We consider individual responsibility in section four. Firstly, however, we address collective responsibility. This convention has three sub-divisions: the confidence rule; the unanimity rule; and the confidentiality rule.

Confidence

The confidence rule originally required a government to resign if it could not command majority Commons support—if the house had 'lost confidence' in the government. Initially the rule applied if a government was defeated on a major policy issue.⁶ During the mid-nineteenth century such resignations were commonplace: Jennings records five between 1852 and 1859.⁷

It is difficult to define 'major' issues. Presumably the Shops Bill on which the Thatcher government was defeated in 1986 did not meet that criterion. But this does no more than tell us that an issue is not sufficiently important to require a government's resignation if the government does not resign when it is defeated. That test would be entirely circular. Furthermore, there have been several instances of modern governments enduring Commons defeats on important issues, but continuing in office regardless. The 1974–1979 Labour administrations suffered frequent defeats. Its expenditure plans were rejected by the Commons in March 1976. It is difficult to disagree with the then Leader of the Opposition, Margaret Thatcher, that this policy was so fundamental a part of the government's raison d'être that defeat demanded resignation. The Cabinet declined to do so however. The government also refused to resign when defeated in an attempt to raise income tax levels in 1977, clearly a matter of major importance.

The experiences of the mid-1970s suggest that the convention's initial form no longer binds Cabinet behaviour. If a necessary feature of conventional status is that politicians consider themselves obliged to follow a given course of action, the confidence rule of the 1850s is clearly not a conventional feature of the contemporary constitution. But it would be inaccurate to claim the convention has disappeared entirely; rather, it has evolved into a different form.

The rule's modern version seems to require the government to resign only if defeated on an explicit no-confidence motion. The function of this shift in conventional understandings is readily discernible. Governments are rarely elected because of their policy on a single issue, but because of the overall package of policies and personalities they offer. A government's failure to command a Commons majority on one issue need not mean it cannot do so in other policy areas. Defeat in an explicit no-confidence motion, in contrast, implies the Commons considers the government wholly incompetent.

The reason behind the new convention is clear. In one, somewhat abstract sense, it stresses that the executive is accountable to the Commons, and so provides a different illustration of the principle of legislative supremacy. More prosaically, in the age of nationalised party politics, it provides an indirect means for the people, via their MPs, to signify withdrawal of their consent to a particular government.⁸ However we have only rather barren historical soil in which to root the new convention. There has been just one occasion since 1945 when the convention has been tested. James Callaghan's minority Labour government resigned in 1979 when defeated by one vote on an explicit no-confidence motion. One might doubt that this amounts to a tradition or long-term unbroken practice.

⁶ Norton P (1978) 'Government defeats in the House of Commons: myth and reality' Public Law 360.

⁷ (1959) op cit pp 512–519.

Only one other Prime Minister has resigned in comparable circumstances in the twentieth century, that one being Stanley Baldwin in 1924. Baldwin led a minority Conservative administration, which failed to gain Commons approval for the legislative programme outlined in the King's speech. (At the 1923 election the Conservatives won 258 seats, Labour 191, and the Liberals 159). Ramsay MacDonald subsequently formed a minority Labour administration from within the same Parliament, which survived for barely eleven months. That administration was also defeated on a confidence vote, although that vote led to a dissolution rather than simply a change of government.⁹ It thus seems that the contemporary confidence rule, if rarely invoked in practice, is straightforward in principle. The second limb of collective responsibility, the unanimity rule, seems quite the opposite.

Unanimity

The unanimity rule requires all Cabinet Ministers to offer public support for all Cabinet decisions, even if a Minister opposed the policy concerned in Cabinet. Ministers who find a particular policy unacceptable should resign from office. As Lord Salisbury explained in 1878:

For all that passes in Cabinet every member of it who does not resign is absolutely and irretrievably responsible and has no right afterwards to say that he agreed in one case to a compromise, while in another he was persuaded by his colleagues.¹⁰

The rule also supposes that ministerial differences of opinion have been aired in Cabinet. The convention demands collective loyalty to collective decisions. It could therefore be undermined either by Ministers who openly signalled their disagreement with government policy, or by Cabinet decision-making procedures which prevent Ministers having any say in policy formation.

The rule originally arose in the seventeenth century to protect Ministers from the King's attempts to undermine their power by exposing or encouraging public arguments. Since the Cabinet is no longer in conflict with the Monarch, the rationale for the rule has changed. The contemporary argument suggests the rule is needed to maintain public and business confidence in the unity and purpose of government. It is alleged that public Cabinet divisions would trigger such dire consequences as reduced investment from overseas, a run on the pound, or various other forms of economic or political instability.

There seem to be three ways to test whether the rule has conventional status. The first, and most elusive, would be to identify occasions when a Minister strongly opposed a particular policy, made and lost her argument in Cabinet, and then resolutely kept her dissent a secret from outside observers. Unfortunately, it is in the nature of a secret event that we do not know that it happened. We may, in retrospect, gain some insight by the eventual release of Cabinet papers (currently embargoed for at least thirty years), or (more promptly) by the memoirs of former Ministers, although the latter may present a skewed interpretation of events. The second test would seek instances when irreconcilable disagreement between Cabinet members led to resignations or dismissals of Ministers. Such episodes would reinforce the claim that the convention effectively determined government behaviour. The third test, which would seem to disprove the rule's conventional status, would search political history for public intra-Cabinet disputes in which all protagonists stayed in office. It is an indicator of the unfortunate indeterminacy of conventional rules that one readily finds examples to satisfy all three tests.

⁸ Although, a successful no-confidence motion might lead not to a dissolution, but to formation of a new administration from within the existing Parliament.

⁹ Norton (1978) op cit; Jennings (1959) op cit pp 28–30.

¹⁰ Quoted in Ellis D (1980) 'Collective ministerial responsibility and collective solidarity' Public Law 367.

Michael Heseltine's resignation from Thatcher's second administration in 1985 over the Westland affair offers a powerful illustration of the convention taking effect. Heseltine, then Defence Secretary, was embroiled within Cabinet in an argument as to whether the financially troubled Westland helicopter company should be rescued by American or European firms. Heseltine favoured the European option, but the Cabinet majority preferred the American bid. It is not clear if Heseltine would have resigned solely because of his disagreement with the substance of Cabinet policy. His own account stresses that he left office because the Cabinet did not accept the second limb of the unanimity convention—namely that a Minister may argue her case fully before her colleagues. Heseltine alleged that a Cabinet meeting scheduled for him to make his argument had been cancelled by the Prime Minister in order to force through the American takeover, a strategy which he interpreted as confirming that the Cabinet no longer operated in a collective manner.¹¹

A similar accusation that Margaret Thatcher rejected collective forms of decision-making was made by Nigel Lawson. Lawson resigned as Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1989, claiming his position had been undermined by the Prime Minister's preference for taking advice on economic policy from her personal adviser, Professor Alan Walters, rather than from her Chancellor. Lawson's decision to leave office has several obvious Conservative predecessors. In 1886, Lord Randolph Churchill, Chancellor in Lord Salisbury's administration, was isolated in Cabinet over his plans to cut military spending. Rather than defer to majority sentiment, Churchill quit the government altogether.¹² A similarly principled stand was taken by Chancellor Peter Thorneycroft and two junior Ministers in 1958, who felt the Cabinet was not committed to sufficiently rigorous anti-inflation policies. Neither the Churchill nor Thorneycroft departures dealt a fatal blow to their respective government's stability. Prime Minister Harold Macmillan famously minimised the impact of the 1958 events by referring to them as 'a little local difficulty'. The impact of Lawson's resignation is considered further below.

Illustrations supportive of the rule are not limited solely to the Conservative Party. In 1951, two members of the Labour Cabinet (Nye Bevan and Harold Wilson) resigned from Attlee's government in protest at plans to introduce prescription charges into the newly founded National Health Service. The action was widely construed as revealing a deep ideological split within the party.¹³ More recently, the resignation of both Robin Cooke and Clare Short from Tony Blair's Cabinet in 2003 in protest at the government's decision to join a military invasion of Iraq exemplified deep division within the governing party.

These episodes pale in comparison, however, to the events of 1931. The 1929–1931 Labour government was a minority administration. Its tenure coincided with the Great ¹¹ The episode repays close attention; see especially Hennessy (1986) op cit.

¹² For further details see Madgwick P (1966) 'Resignations' Parliamentary Affairs 59.

¹³ Pilot op cit pp 160–165; Hennessy P (1992) Never again pp 415–417.

Depression, which wrought severe distress on most western economies. A Cabinet committee proposed large cuts in public expenditure to address the crisis. These were opposed by eight Cabinet members. Faced with so profound a split in his government, the then Labour Prime Minister, Ramsay MacDonald, tendered his administration's resignation to the King.

At the Prime Minister's invitation, George V played a pivotal role in brokering a solution to the crisis. The suggestion for a coalition government headed by MacDonald was made by Sir Herbert Samuel, the leader of the Liberal Party, and enthusiastically pressed on Stanley Baldwin, the Conservative leader, by the King. The Liberals and Conservatives agreed to join a coalition administration, on the understanding that Parliament would be dissolved as soon as emergency legislation enacting the Cabinet committee's recommendation was passed. Only three of the Labour Cabinet's eighteen Ministers agreed to serve in a 'National' coalition government, in which MacDonald led what he described as 'a Cabinet of Individuals'—most of whom were Conservatives. At the subsequent general election, the 'National Government', led by MacDonald, was returned with a substantial Commons majority.

Reactions to Disraeli's proposals for the 1867 Reform Act also illustrate the operation of the unanimity rule. Three members of Lord Derby's Cabinet, all opposing further democratisation, resigned rather than support the Bill.¹⁴ Similarly, Richard Crossman's Diaries reveal that the 1966–1970 Labour Cabinet was deeply divided over lowering the voting age to 18.¹⁵ Such disagreement was not made public (at least not until the Diaries were published some years later!). Ministers opposed to the reform stifled their dissent; the government could thus present the Bill as a measure enjoying unanimous Cabinet support.

But electoral reform also provides quite contradictory examples, seemingly disproving the convention's existence. In 1883, for example, Joseph Chamberlain campaigned vigorously for continued extension of the franchise, to which the rest of Gladstone's Cabinet was clearly opposed.¹⁶

In recent years, several examples have arisen of collective solidarity being 'suspended' in respect of particular issues. This 'suspension' principle has latterly been deployed by both Labour and Conservative Cabinets over government policies towards the European Community.¹⁷ In 1975, the Labour Prime Minister Harold Wilson allowed Cabinet members to campaign on both sides in the referendum on whether Britain should remain in the EEC. Wilson explained his decision by saying that the split reflected a similar rift within public opinion.¹⁸ James Callaghan, Labour Prime Minister between 1976 and 1979, supported the idea of selectively applied conventions. Callaghan permitted his Cabinet openly to hold differing views in 1979 about the type of electoral system to be used for elections to the EEC Parliament. When accused of acting unconstitutionally, he replied that collective responsibility would always apply 'except in cases where I announce that it does not'.¹⁹ More informally, the second Major government was noticeably divided between 'Euro-sceptics' and 'Euro-enthusiasts', a point explored more fully in chapter thirteen. Members of the Conservative/Liberal coalition government saw no difficulty in campaigning in favour of opposing views during the 2011 referendum on electoral reform,²⁰ although since this had been foreshadowed in the coalition negotiations it is perhaps not apposite to see it as a further erosion of the unanimity convention.

¹⁴ Cowling op cit pp 163–165.

¹⁷ See chs 11 and 12 below.

¹⁹ HCD 16 June 1977 c 552.

¹⁵ Op cit pp 493–494, 500–501.

¹⁸ This episode is discussed more fully in ch 11.

²⁰ See 'Prospects of reform', ch 7, pp 223–224 above.

¹⁶ Jones op cit p 106.

As an organising principle, ‘suspension’ has little merit—a practice cannot be a binding rule if it can be disregarded at the whim of those it purportedly controls. Moreover, such arguments do not explain the 1883 Cabinet’s tolerance of Chamberlain’s independent line. The Cabinet portrayed Chamberlain’s dissent as an example of a principle of ‘Ministerial freedom of speech’, but such a concept is manifestly incompatible with a unanimity convention. Chamberlain’s behaviour was accepted because his dismissal or resignation was impractical from a party political perspective; it would have alienated many Liberal voters, with dire electoral results. He could thus defy the supposed convention and advance both his own prospects within the party and the prospects of more radical electoral reform being enacted.

A similar combination of personal ambition and policy preference seems to underlie James Callaghan’s very evident dissent, when Home Secretary, from the industrial relations policies of the second (1966–1970) Wilson administration. The government wished to impose legal sanctions on workers who took industrial action without trade union approval. Callaghan clearly aligned himself with trade union opposition to this proposal. Subsequently, he announced, without having sought Cabinet approval, that the government would take no new measures to regulate wage and price inflation. Many Cabinet members apparently considered that Callaghan was seeking to establish himself as the trade unions’ preferred successor to Harold Wilson, and demanded he be disciplined for disregarding the unanimity rule.²¹ No action was taken however, since the government, facing an imminent general election, could not risk losing the political and financial support the unions provided.

The inference we might draw from these examples is that whatever ‘reason’ one might adduce for the rule of cabinet unanimity, it is ignored for reasons of party political expediency too frequently for us to conclude that Asquith’s threefold test for conventional status is met. One might refine the convention by suggesting it operates differently for Conservative and Labour governments. Writing in 1980, Ellis argued Labour governments contained a wider range of opinion than Conservative administrations, and their members were less inclined than Conservatives to compromise ideological preferences to preserve party unity.²² So fractious an atmosphere was inimical to effective functioning of the unanimity rule, especially since, as noted in chapter seven, until the Blair/Brown era from 1997 to 2010 most Labour governments had precarious Commons majorities. Ministers representing distinct party factions may see no need to respect the unanimity rule if their faction’s continued support is a prerequisite of the government’s survival.

Confidentiality

Lawson and Heseltine withheld their explanation of their departures from Cabinet until after they had resigned. In so doing, they respected the unwritten letter of the unanimity rule. It is also however a convention of the constitution that Ministers who resign are afforded the opportunity to offer reasons for their action to the Commons (or, if peers, to the Lords). As we shall see in chapter thirteen, such speeches can have a devastating political effect. This is another manifestation of the confidence rule, since it enables MPs to evaluate the government’s performance after having heard both sides of the argument.

Once out of Cabinet, Lawson and Heseltine explained their actions in detail, both in the Commons and in the media. In so doing, they drew attention to another facet of collective responsibility, namely that all Ministers owe their Cabinet colleagues a duty of confidentiality. Ministers should not reveal how colleagues argued or voted in particular disputes: to do so would seriously undermine the unanimity rule and also inhibit Ministers from speaking their minds.

²¹ According to Crossman’s Diaries; op cit at pp 497–500. Crossman notes that Callaghan protested that there was nothing unconventional about his behaviour.

²² Op cit.

To date this rule seems to have been respected, at least formally. However, reports of Cabinet discussions are leaked to the press with sufficient regularity to suggest that in practice some Ministers ignore it. A more contentious issue is whether confidentiality should continue after a Minister leaves the Cabinet. And if so for how long, and how stringently? The rule's status, and the political and legal consequences which flowed from ignoring it, arose in A-G v Jonathan Cape Ltd—the Crossman Diaries case.²³

Can conventions become laws? 1: The Crossman Diaries case

Crossman, a member of Wilson's Cabinet between 1964 and 1970, wanted to provide a detailed account of Cabinet government in operation. Consequently, he kept a comprehensive diary of Cabinet decisions, intending to publish it following his retirement. Unfortunately for Crossman, he died prematurely; but his widow decided to publish the Diaries.

After extracts appeared in The Sunday Times, the government sought an injunction preventing further publication. It argued that the courts should preserve the confidentiality of three types of ministerial information: firstly, the views of individual Ministers; secondly, confidential advice to Ministers from civil servants; and thirdly, discussions about the appointment or transfer of senior officials. Crossman's publishers argued that the duty of Cabinet confidentiality had no legal basis; it was merely a moral obligation, respected or ignored according to the Minister's conscience.

Lord Widgery did not find history a helpful guide: 'I find overwhelming evidence that the doctrine of joint responsibility is generally understood and practiced, and equally strong evidence that it is on occasion ignored'.²⁴ Widgery eventually delivered a puzzling judgment. Firstly, he accepted that Ministers owed each other a legally enforceable duty of confidentiality. However, this duty did not derive from the convention turning into a law. It was created by 'stretching' existing common law principles about confidentiality in respect of other types of relationship, particularly marriage and commercial undertakings.²⁵ But secondly, Widgery held that unless the disclosures threatened national security, the duty would disappear ten years after the relevant events occurred. The government subsequently established a committee of inquiry, headed by Lord Radcliffe, to make recommendations concerning the publication of Ministers' diaries or autobiographies.²⁶ The committee proposed a fifteen-year delay on publication of sensitive material. The proposal has not been given statutory force: given the rapidity with which retired Ministers have subsequently marketed their memoirs,²⁷ it seems safe to assume that it should not be regarded as a convention.

If analysed formalistically, the judgment does not sweep away Dicey's claim that conventions are not enforceable by the courts. Technically, the case is not an example of a court enforcing a convention, but accepting that a convention was coincidentally underpinned by existing common law rules. That may seem a semantic distinction. In functionalist terms, we might argue that the court enforced a convention by cloaking it ²³ [1976] QB 752. ²⁴ [1976] QB 752 at 770.

²⁵ Argyll v Argyll [1967] Ch 302, [1965] 1 All ER 611; and Saltman Engineering Co Ltd v Campbell Engineering Co Ltd (1948), but not reported until [1963] 3 All ER 413, CA, respectively.

²⁶ Radcliffe (1976) Report on Ministerial Memoirs, (Cmnd 6386).

²⁷ Eg Clark A (1993) Diaries—the most revealing of the genre; Baker K (1993) The turbulent years; Lawson N (1992) The view from No 11; Ridley N (1991) My style of government.

with a common law label. There is no legal impediment to the courts doing so. The common law is recognised to be dynamic. In cases such as Burmah Oil, Lain, and GCHQ, ‘new’ common law principles emerged when judges considered that applying traditional ideas would have produced unsatisfactory results. Parliament may restore the former law by legislation reversing a court decision, but (short of passing legislation forbidding the courts from altering common law principles) it has no power to pre-empt judicial innovation. This inter-relationship between convention and common law within the courts is something to which we shall return. For the present, before concluding our discussion of collective responsibility, we divert our attention to an ostensibly non-justiciable issue—the relationship between the Monarch and her Ministers.

II. The Monarch

In formal terms, the Monarch retains substantial legal powers. Unlike the House of Lords, she has the legal capacity to veto any Bill passed by the Commons. The Monarch also seems to have the legal authority to appoint whomsoever she wishes to be Prime Minister, and to appoint and dismiss other Ministers at will; she may dismiss an entire government if she wishes. And she may at any time, without fear of legal reversal, dissolve Parliament and so force a general election to be held. All such actions are elements of the royal prerogative ‘peculiar and eccentric’ to the Monarch herself, and which, per GCHQ, appear non-justiciable. Nor could such prerogatives be altered or abolished by statute without the Monarch’s consent. As a legal creature, the Monarchy possesses (at least) co-equal status with the Commons.

Yet there is no part of the contemporary constitution in which the mismatch between legal principle and political fact is more pronounced than in respect of the personal prerogatives. The notion that a single individual should wield substantial legal powers bestowed solely by accident of birth is entirely antithetic to the particular form of parliamentary democracy on which the legitimacy of the constitution rests. This is not to say that one could not invoke alternative conceptions of ‘democracy’ to justify such powers in some circumstances. But as a matter of political instinct, one might readily infer that there would be very convincing reasons for the presence of constitutional conventions which subjected the exercise of the personal prerogatives to the wishes of the government which enjoyed the confidence of the Commons. A brief survey of the past 150 years suggests that such a convention has indeed emerged.

‘On the advice of her Ministers’? The conventional ‘democratisation’ of the personal prerogatives

As noted in chapter seven, William IV did not acknowledge that the Great Reform Act’s tentative push towards constitutional democratisation affected his power to remove a government which displeased him. In 1834, he dismissed Lord Melbourne’s Whig administration, which he regarded as unacceptably radical.²⁸ William invited Sir Robert Peel to lead a minority Conservative administration. Peel was more sensitive to the Act’s implications, and requested an immediate dissolution, hoping to legitimise both his own position and the King’s by winning the subsequent general election. The electorate, however, returned the Whigs and their allies with a workable Commons majority. William subsequently deferred to the Commons majority, and did not obstruct the formation of a new Whig administration.

²⁸ Brock op cit pp 315–317; Jennings (1959) op cit pp 403–405.

There have been no subsequent examples of such blatant interference by the Monarch. However, Queen Victoria engaged in secretive manoeuvrings to keep Gladstone out of power in 1886. Victoria, like many Liberal MPs, opposed Gladstone's policy of granting home rule to Ireland. She subsequently approached several prominent anti-Gladstonian Liberals to try and ensure that a Gladstone administration could not enact that policy. Her tone was explicitly partisan:

I appeal to you and to all moderate loyal and patriotic men, who have the safety and well-being of the Empire and the Throne at heart, and who wish to save them from destruction, with which, if the government again fell into the reckless hands of Mr Gladstone, they would be threatened, to rise above party and to be true patriots.²⁹

One might defend the Queen's action by characterising her appeal that politicians should forswear party allegiances in pursuit of greater national interests as echoing a Madisonian fear of faction. As an abstract exercise in democratic theorisation, that viewpoint has some substantive attractions, although one might doubt that the process through which such a national interest was defined, namely the Monarch's individual preferences, would satisfy even the most dilute notions of democratic process. But in the context of historical trends in the late-nineteenth century, Victoria's initiative was undoubtedly 'unconstitutional'.

By 1886, the Monarch's conventional capacity to engage in independent exercise of her legal powers had been substantially undermined by both the gradual extension of the Commons' electoral franchise to ever greater numbers of 'the people'—and relatedly—by the increasing ascendancy of the Commons vis-à-vis the Lords within Parliament. Neither trend formally affected the Monarch's legal powers, but both emphasised that electoral accountability rather than accident of birth should regulate access to governmental power. In so far as the legitimacy of her constitutional role depended on her maintaining a studied neutrality between those political parties which each enjoyed substantial electoral support, Victoria's machinations in 1886 revealed a distinct failure to accept (or understand) the constitutional implications of the social changes the country was undergoing.

This gradual process of subordinating legal power to political practice is demonstrated by subsequent Monarchs' increasingly tentative interventions in situations of political instability. As noted in chapter seven, the behaviour of Edward VII and George V in 1909–1911 was less than fully supportive of Asquith's wishes. At that point, the legal context in which the personal prerogatives were to be exercised was virtually the same as in 1886—the House of Lords remained a co-equal partner to the Commons, and the franchise had not been substantially extended since 1884. Twenty years later, that context had altered significantly. The passive role played by George V in forming the 1931 National government can be explained largely by the virtual completion of the democratisation process; since 1928, Britain had had a universal franchise for elections to the Commons, and since 1911 the Lords' inferior status within Parliament was a matter of law, not merely convention. Elizabeth II was admittedly intimately involved in the choice of a Conservative Prime Minister in the mid-1950s, but that was because the Conservative Party had no formal arrangements to choose its leader; the leader traditionally 'emerged' in some mysterious fashion after consultation among the party's senior figures. In the mid-1960s, the Conservative Party established a system in which its leader was chosen through a ballot of its MPs. The Labour Party already had such a process, and it seems inconceivable that it would now be legitimate for a Monarch to appoint as Prime Minister someone who was not the leader of her party. The principle powerfully illustrates not just the primacy of party interests over national interests within Parliament, but also of the ascendancy of convention over law at the heart of Britain's constitutional identity.

²⁹ Cited in Jennings (1959) op cit p 34. Gladstone suggested of Victoria that there was 'no greater Tory in the land'; quoted in Arnstein op cit p 151.

Refusing the Royal Assent

If we borrow Jennings' 'reason' test for conventional status, and (mis)apply it to the 1688 settlement, we might assume that the Monarch's formal co-equality with the Commons and the Lords served to protect both the Queen herself from an alliance of the two houses, and 'the people' from a lower and upper house temporarily seized by a desire to enact oppressive legislation. To suggest that the Queen might ever invoke her veto power would, however, seem utterly to contradict the trend towards democratisation which we employed to explain why the Monarch generally cannot use her personal prerogatives in an independent manner. This leads us yet again to examine the meaning of democracy in the contemporary constitution. If the concept means simply that a political party commanding a reliable Commons majority can pass any law whatsoever, a refusal of the Royal Assent to any Bill would be 'undemocratic'. Yet it is not difficult to imagine scenarios in which we might intuitively regard such action as essential to defend democratic ideals.

Assume, for example, that a government, fearing it will lose the next general election, promotes a Bill to extend the lifetime of a Parliament without opposition party agreement. At present the Lords may veto such a Bill, and so, in its anachronistic way, can operate as a 'democratic' safeguard against a dictatorial Commons majority. But the Lords does not (apparently) possess a veto over a third Parliament Act removing that veto power. What conventional understandings should guide the Queen's decision about granting the Royal Assent in the following situations?

Firstly if the Lords also approved the Bill extending the lifetime of the Parliament? Secondly to a new Parliament Bill, introduced against the Lords' wishes under the 1949 procedures, which removed the Lords' veto power on all legislation? And thirdly, if she assented to the second Bill, to a subsequent Bill extending the lifetime of the present Parliament? Alternatively, what course should the Queen follow in respect of a Bill which requires that the next general election be fought on constituency boundaries designed to secure a vast majority for the governing party?

We might suggest all such Bills would be 'unconstitutional', and so the Queen could legitimately withhold her assent. But the argument is a difficult one to sustain. One could contend, for instance, that refusing the Royal Assent would be legitimate because any such Bill would be seeking to change the basis of consent to government within the constitution—to effect, as the Duke of Wellington put it, 'a revolution by due process of law'. The flaw in this argument is that it entrenches contemporary understandings of 'consent', and suggests that we have now arrived at the ultimate form of democratic government. Yet these allegedly 'unconstitutional' Bills may be no more radical from our perspective than were Grey's Reform Bill or Asquith's Parliament Bill in the eyes of contemporaneous conservative opinion. In the absence of a supra-parliamentary constitution, we simply lack an authoritative yardstick against which to measure the substantive legitimacy of radical constitutional reform.

It is some answer to these questions to observe that no such Bills are ever likely to appear. In all reasonably foreseeable circumstances, there appears to be no difficulty in concluding that the Monarch's personal prerogatives are exercised according to the wishes of a Prime Minister whose government enjoys the confidence of the Commons. The reason for that convention is to subject the Queen's legal powers to democratic control—in so far as we consider Prime Ministerial control democratic. But that reason disappears when a Prime Minister's government does not possess the lower house's confidence. In such situations, the conventional constraints on the Monarch's legal powers are decidedly ambiguous.

Two such circumstances have constantly exercised the minds of constitutional analysts. The first relates to the appointment of the Prime Minister following a general election in which no party has won a majority of Commons seats. The second concerns a Prime Minister's request for a dissolution, prior to the expiry of the five-year term fixed by the Parliament Act 1911, when an alternative government might be formed from within the existing lower house.

Choosing a Prime Minister in a hung Parliament

In the February 1974 general election, Edward Heath's outgoing Conservative government failed to win an overall majority. But although Harold Wilson's Labour Party had the largest number of Commons' seats, it too had no majority. The balance of power was held by small parties, which had only thirty-seven seats.

There is no legal requirement that a government resign after a general election defeat. It does so, as a matter of convention, in deference to an electoral sentiment which indicates that another party is the people's preferred choice. That choice was however far from clear in 1974. While the electorate may have signalled displeasure with the Conservatives, it had not shown obvious enthusiasm for Labour. In these circumstances, Heath decided not to resign, but to negotiate with the smaller parties to see if they would offer him support in a coalition government. None did so. Heath then concluded that the correct course was for him to resign, and advise the Queen to invite Wilson to form a minority administration.

It is possible to argue that Heath should have automatically resigned, on the grounds firstly that Labour had won more seats than the Conservatives and, secondly, that the prospect of a Conservative/Liberal coalition had not been put to the electorate. However, there is neither a legal nor a conventional basis for the claim, in circumstances where no single party has a Commons majority, that the leader of the party with the most seats has any immediate entitlement to a favourable exercise of the personal prerogatives. Heath, and the Queen, faced a somewhat unusual situation; it would be difficult to describe their behaviour as constitutionally indefensible.³⁰

That the Monarch has in effect been wholly removed from this aspect of the operation of the constitution seems to be underlined by events following the 2010 general election.³¹ The process of negotiation and consultation between the Conservative, Labour and Liberal Democrat Parties was played out without any involvement from the Queen or her personal advisers.³²

Granting a dissolution after a transfer of party loyalty

A more difficult question arises in circumstances which have not yet occurred in the modern era. Let us suppose a party gains a majority of twenty seats at a general election. After one or two years of the Parliament's five-year term, following a bitter dispute over economic policy, twenty of its members cross the floor and join the opposition. (Since MPs hold their seats as individuals, not party representatives, they are under no legal obligation to resign and fight a by-election.) As a result, the Leader of the Opposition, ³⁰ See generally Brazier R (1982) 'Choosing a Prime Minister' Public Law 395.

³¹ See 'A more assertive and independent house?', ch 5, pp 153–154 above.

³² See the discussion in Kavanagh and Cowley (2010) op cit ch 10.

rather than the Prime Minister, possesses the confidence of the lower house, a point confirmed when the opposition successfully moves an explicit no-confidence motion.

The Prime Minister, hoping the electorate would return her party with a new majority, requests a dissolution, even though the Leader of the Opposition could form a viable administration. If the Queen granted a dissolution, she would be defying the Commons majority. This suggests dissolution would be unconstitutional, and that the Queen's correct course would be to invite the Leader of the Opposition to become Prime Minister. But the Queen would have to dismiss the current Prime Minister before she could do so. The Prime Minister, however, supported by her Cabinet, will neither resign nor advise the Queen to dismiss her and then appoint the Leader of the Opposition as her successor; she maintains that the realities of electoral politics are that voters are motivated by party loyalties, not the merits of individual candidates, and that the new commons majority has no electoral mandate.

In such circumstances, the Queen would have no alternative but to fashion a new constitutional convention. Since there is no Minister with majority support on whose advice she can act, she would have to choose her own advisers and form her own opinion on the relative merits of dissolution and dismissal. Yet, even if we limit our notion of 'democracy' to electoral majoritarianism, the democratic solution to this situation is unclear. The 'legal' 'majority' is surely the largest grouping of MPs within the Commons, each of whom has been sent there as the representative of her particular constituency. This majority would clearly prefer dismissal to dissolution. However the 'political' majority might readily be seen as the party which won the greatest share of the vote at the last election. This majority would obviously prefer dissolution to dismissal. Yet for the Queen to grant a dissolution would entail her exercising her prerogative powers in accordance with a version of democracy which Parliament itself has never accepted.³³

Variations on this theme are as endless as answers are elusive, and neither will be explored at length here.³⁴ But readers might consider how the Queen should act when one of the twenty defecting MPs is the Prime Minister, and the opposition party agrees to select her as its new leader. Alternatively, what should happen if the defectors do not include the Prime Minister, but, for example, the Foreign Secretary, who does not resign his office on switching parties, and who is adopted as Leader by the opposition before the Prime Minister asks the Queen to dismiss him, and then satisfies Asquith's criterion of being the Minister commanding a Commons majority? Whatever the Queen did in such circumstances would inevitably be regarded by the 'losers' as an illegitimate exercise of constitutional power..³⁵

However, we may at this point conclude that as a matter of constitutional practice, albeit not of constitutional law, the Monarch's personal prerogatives are generally exercised by the Prime Minister. This might lead us to wonder if our previous discussion of collective Cabinet responsibility was incomplete, and to ask just how much effective political power is wielded by the Prime Minister alone in our contemporary constitution?

³³ The legalistically minded might then wonder if the courts would accept that a justiciable issue had been raised here. The grant of a dissolution might be seen as elevating the prerogative above statute. There is, admittedly, no specific statute in issue here, but it is clear that our electoral law regards MPs as individuals, rather than party representatives. To grant a dissolution on the grounds of the electorate's presumed party allegiances would subvert that statutory scheme.

³⁴ Readers might wonder how the Queen should have responded to Edward Heath in 1974 had he advised her to dissolve Parliament rather than invite Harold Wilson to form a minority administration: see Brazier (1982) op cit.

³⁵ The fifth edition of this book contained a discussion of a scenario of this sort which arose in Australia in 1975. The relevant extract is available in the ORC.

III. Collective ministerial responsibility revisited: from Cabinet to Prime Ministerial government...?

It is perhaps an apocryphal tale that when the Duke of Wellington became Prime Minister, after a career spent in the army rather than the Commons, he remarked on his first Cabinet meeting: 'An extraordinary affair. I gave them their orders and they wanted to stay and discuss them'.³⁶ We might doubt if there ever was a 'golden age' of Cabinet government in which all Ministers participated fully in decision-making. But in the modern era, James Callaghan's aforementioned belief that he could suspend constitutional conventions whenever he saw fit provides lucid support for the argument that Britain's government is controlled by the Prime Minister rather than the Cabinet.

That argument was first aired in the nineteenth century in Walter Bagehot's leading work on the constitution.³⁷ Bagehot suggested that the Cabinet was becoming a 'dignified' rather than 'efficient' part of the constitution. Its role was increasingly ceremonial or symbolic, while real power was shifting to the Prime Minister and a few of his colleagues.

Bagehot's ideas were forcefully restated in a new edition of his book by Richard Crossman in the 1960s. Crossman's introduction, written before he became a Cabinet Minister, argued that the Prime Minister effectively dominated the Cabinet rather than being just 'first among equals'. Prime Ministers achieved this through three main powers: firstly, by being able to appoint and dismiss Ministers; secondly, by setting the agenda for Cabinet discussions, which permitted the Prime Minister to avoid challenges over particular issues by leaving them off the agenda altogether; and thirdly, by controlling the remit and membership of Cabinet committees.

Crossman argued that collective responsibility had assumed a new meaning by 1960. It no longer meant that all Cabinet Ministers were involved in making the decisions which they were obliged to support, but rather that all Ministers were expected to lend unquestioning support to decisions reached by Cabinet Committees, or a so-called inner Cabinet of senior Ministers, or the Prime Minister. The unanimity rule would thus have undergone a marked shift. If a Minister disagreed with Cabinet policy she would still be expected to either stifle her dissent or resign; she should not however expect to be a full participant in a collective decision-making process.

As we saw above, Michael Heseltine felt this trend had become an established, and (to him) unacceptable feature of the Thatcher Cabinets. His resignation was premised, we might say, on his refusal to accept the legitimacy of a Cabinet in which collective decision-making had become entirely a 'dignified' rather than 'efficient' part of the constitution.

Harold Wilson did not invent the committee-based form of Cabinet decision-making, but did use it more systematically than his predecessors. Nevertheless, Wilson himself disputed the Prime Ministerial government thesis. Writing in 1972, while in opposition, he suggested that 'The Prime Minister's task is to get a consensus of Cabinet or he cannot reasonably ask for loyalty and collective responsibility'.³⁸

There are undoubtedly sound justifications for a drift away from a fully collegiate model of Cabinet decision-making. As the government's workload has grown, it has become increasingly implausible to expect all Cabinet members to have the time or expertise to comment usefully on all fields of government activity. One is nevertheless left with the problem of deciding how best to enhance governmental efficiency without concentrating power in too few ministerial hands. The only satisfactory way to gauge the accuracy of ³⁷ (1867) The English constitution (1963 edn by Crossman R).

³⁶ Quoted in Hennessy P (1986a) Cabinet p 121. V

³⁸ Quoted in Ellis op cit at p 372.

Crossman's thesis would be to study the intimacies of Cabinet decision-making over a protracted period. Such a task is beyond the scope of this work;³⁹ we can however advert briefly to certain important episodes which indicate one can readily find examples which both underpin and undermine Crossman's argument.

There have been perhaps few more important policy decisions made in the post-war era than the 1945–1951 Attlee governments' conclusion that Britain should develop its own atomic weapons capacity. But to talk of this as a decision of the government, or even of the Cabinet, would be quite misleading. Attlee had permitted only a handful of his Cabinet to know about this policy. He recalled some years later that: 'I thought some of them [the Cabinet] were not fit to be trusted with secrets of this kind'.⁴⁰ Similarly, James Callaghan preferred to formulate the major strands of economic policy not in Cabinet, but in a small 'Economic Seminar', containing just a handful of Ministers. The role of Cabinet was merely to agree to whatever conclusions the 'Seminar' had reached.

Such dismissive Prime Ministerial treatment of Cabinet colleagues has not been a trait solely of Labour Prime Ministers. A graphic example of the apparently paradoxical way in which the Prime Minister's use of his great power within Cabinet can actually much weaken his position is provided by the notorious 'night of the long knives' in July 1962. As Prime Minister, the Conservative leader Harold Macmillan had cultivated an air of 'unflappability'. The party's electoral appeal was felt to depend largely on public perception that Macmillan would always act in a calm, rational fashion. That perception was shattered in just one day when Macmillan dismissed one third of his Cabinet. Macmillan's initial concern had simply been to replace his Chancellor of the Exchequer, Selwyn Lloyd, who he considered insufficiently interventionist on economic policy issues. However several Conservative defeats in by-elections, coupled with the government's poor standing in public opinion polls, and press rumours of an impending Cabinet reshuffle, led Macmillan to panic rather, and end up sacking seven Ministers, hoping that a new look government would be more electorally appealing.

That a Prime Minister can dismiss so many Ministers in so cursory a fashion cogently illustrates her short term dominance of the Cabinet. Yet, since that Prime Minister may have appointed those Ministers in the first place, their removal casts doubt on the Prime Minister's own competence, for one of her most important tasks is surely to select able colleagues. Macmillan subsequently described the sacked Ministers as 'worn out', and replaced them with much younger colleagues, but his strategy did not attract substantial backbench support. Whether Macmillan could have survived as party leader in the long term after antagonising so large a section of his party, and whether he could have led the Conservatives to victory in another general election, remained unanswered questions; he resigned as a result of ill health the following year.⁴¹

There are no legal rules controlling the identity of individuals appointed to ministerial office. Nor does it seem likely that there could be. It seems clear that the Prime Minister's choices are motivated by two factors: maximising her own standing within her party, while simultaneously maximising her party's standing with the electorate. Neither criterion seems justiciable. We might wonder if the constitution should require a Prime Minister to appoint the most able of her party's members to Ministerial office, but 'ability' is a concept which cannot be objectively defined. There would seem little alternative but to leave evaluation of the Prime Minister's selection and management of her Cabinet to her parliamentary party, and ultimately to the electorate. Both MPs and voters might ³⁹ The most accessible and informative guide is perhaps Hennessy (1986a) op cit.

⁴⁰ Quoted in Hennessy (1986a) op cit p 123.

⁴¹ See generally Horne A (1987) Macmillan 1957–1986.

plausibly be thought to place pre-emptive limits on the extent to which Prime Ministers can amend conventional understandings of collective responsibility. The difficulty, as Margaret Thatcher's tenure of 10 Downing Street eventually revealed, is predicting where those boundaries lie.

Thatcher was often portrayed as placing little faith in the idea of full Cabinet participation in policy-making. Shortly before the 1979 election, she had announced that her government would 'not waste time having any internal arguments'. Her first Cabinet contained many so-called 'wet' Ministers, who were not entirely supportive of her preferred economic policies. To some extent, these Ministers were simply bypassed. Peter Hennessy observes that the Thatcher Cabinet met far less frequently than its post-war predecessors, and also considered far fewer policy documents.⁴² A further tactic which the new Prime Minister deployed to control policy-making more tightly was to have Ministers present their initial ideas to her and her personal advisers, rather than to the Cabinet or even to a Cabinet Committee. This occasionally proved problematic. The decision to withdraw union recognition from GCHQ workers was made by only five Ministers.⁴³ Wider consultation may have identified the constitutional implications that the decision subsequently proved to have.

After the 1983 election, when the Conservative majority increased to over 140 seats, Thatcher 'purged' her Cabinet in a manner almost as draconian as the 'night of the long knives', secure in the knowledge that she would be antagonising only a limited section of the parliamentary party. By the late 1980s some commentators were suggesting that she had effectively instituted a form of Presidential government.⁴⁴ This substantial shift in constitutional arrangements was achieved without any formal legal changes whatsoever. Peter Hennessy concluded his discussion of Thatcher's style of Cabinet government more cautiously:

At worst she has put Cabinet government temporarily on ice.... the old model could, and probably will, be restored in the few minutes it takes a new Prime Minister to travel from Buckingham Palace to Downing Street.⁴⁵

Events were subsequently to prove that the 'old model' had merely been chilled, rather than deep frozen, in the Thatcher years.

... And back again?

At the 1987 general election, the Conservative Party retained a Commons majority of over 100 seats. In such circumstances, one might have expected Thatcher's control of her third government to have become even more personalised in both style and substance. However, while that may indeed have been the Prime Minister's intention, her belief that she could amend still further the conventional notion of collective Cabinet government proved misplaced.

Nigel Lawson's resignation as Chancellor, on the grounds that the Prime Minister was simply ignoring his advice, can be bracketed with Heseltine's earlier suggestion that the Prime Minister was crossing conventional constitutional boundaries. Both resignations threatened the Prime Minister's authority within the Conservative Party, in that they offered figureheads around which dissident backbench opinion might coalesce.

⁴² Hennessy (1986a) op cit ch 3.

⁴³ See 'III. Full reviewability—the GCHQ case (1983)', ch 4, pp 105–107 above.

⁴⁴ Doherty M (1988) 'Prime Ministerial power and ministerial responsibility in the Thatcher era' Parliamentary Affairs 49.

⁴⁵ (1986a) op cit p 122.

However their true significance was subsequently seen to lie in the individual contribution they made to a growing sense of collective unease within the parliamentary party. That unease was given an acute focus by the resignation of Sir Geoffrey Howe as Deputy Prime Minister in 1990, an event which had serious and immediate implications, both for Thatcher herself and the Prime Ministerial government thesis.

Howe resigned because he could no longer accept the Prime Minister's avowedly hostile attitude towards the EC (a matter explored in chapter twelve). In his resignation speech to the Commons,⁴⁶ Howe maintained that the Prime Minister had consistently and deliberately undermined the collective decisions which the Cabinet assumed it had reached on EC matters. Howe's account reinforced Michael Heseltine's earlier claims that Thatcher held conventional understandings as to the conduct of Cabinet business in some contempt, and the speech precipitated Heseltine's challenge to Thatcher for leadership of the Conservative Party. That challenge led rapidly to Thatcher's resignation as party leader (and thence as Prime Minister) and her eventual replacement by John Major. Her fate would suggest that her preference for an increasingly Presidential style of government amounted (eventually) to a serious error of political judgment: even the most powerful of Prime Ministers, it seems, must retain the support of senior Ministers.

In reviewing Thatcher's resignation, it is difficult to be sure where the effective political power that removed her actually lay.⁴⁷ Was it in the combined resignations of Heseltine, Lawson and Howe? Or with those remaining Cabinet Ministers who intimated to Thatcher that they would resign if she did not? If it was the latter, we might plausibly conclude that the convention of collective Cabinet government had merely been dormant during the 1980s, and simply required a sudden jolt to reawaken it. Or did that power lie with the many Conservative MPs who did not vote for Thatcher in the first round of the leadership election? If so, we see a further manifestation of the pre-eminence of party politics within the constitution. Or did the power lie (indirectly) in the electorate, who had indicated in many opinion polls that a Thatcher government could not hope to win another general election, and thereby frightened Conservative MPs in marginal seats into withdrawing support from their Prime Minister?

What is clear, however, is that Thatcher's successor, John Major, did adopt a more collective style of Cabinet government.⁴⁸ Michael Heseltine's return to Cabinet was one manifestation of this trend, as was Major's apparent concern to ensure that his ministerial team reflected the various factional groupings within his parliamentary party.

Recent history would suggest that Prime Ministerial styles—and the capacity of other Cabinet ministers to influence those styles—are not determined by party political allegiance. Tony Blair's premiership was characterised by one leading commentator as a 'command and control' approach to governance.⁴⁹ Hennessy cites as a particularly cogent illustration of this style the decision taken by Blair, and his Chancellor of the Exchequer, Gordon Brown, to relinquish governmental control of interest rate policy to the Bank of England. This extremely important economic policy decision was taken without any Cabinet discussion at all. Indeed, Hennessy notes, the decision was taken before the first Blair Cabinet had even met.⁵⁰ Cabinet meetings in the Blair government were of far shorter duration than under previous administrations, and were frequently conducted ⁴⁶ HCD 13 November 1990 c461; <<http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm199091/cmhansrd/1990-11-13/Debate-1.html>>.

⁴⁷ For various perspectives see Brazier R (1991) 'The downfall of Margaret Thatcher' 54 MLR 471; Alderman and Carter op cit.

⁴⁸ Marshall G (1991) 'The end of Prime Ministerial government?' Public Law 1.

⁴⁹ Hennessy P (2001) The Prime Minister ch 18.

⁵⁰ Hennessy P (2001) op cit at pp 480–481.

without the benefit (or perhaps, in the Prime Minister's view, the constraint) of a formal agenda.

IV. Individual ministerial responsibility

The second strand of the ministerial responsibility convention is individual ministerial responsibility, which supposedly identifies the situations in which Ministers should resign from government office. Its modern form has two parts. The first addresses the Minister's political or administrative competence; the second her personal morality.

Issues of competence

The competence rule originally held Ministers answerable to the Commons for every action undertaken by their departments' civil servants. Ministers took the credit when their officials got things right. Relatedly they took the blame when their staff got things wrong; if the error was sufficiently grave, a Minister would be expected to resign. A corollary of this proposition was that individual civil servants would not face parliamentary scrutiny or public criticism for their own failures. This is not to say that incompetent civil servants would find their careers unaffected, but that sanctions attached to failure were a managerial matter resolved within the executive, not, as for a Minister, a political matter resolved within Parliament.

Even by the early 1800s, the idea that a Minister should be personally responsible for everything done in his department was barely credible. But the scale of government has grown so much since 1850 that it has become completely impracticable for a Minister to know everything that is being done by her department's civil servants. So the initial form of this supposed convention has altered. It now seems necessary that a Minister has been personally involved in a particular decision before she must resign.

This redefinition of conventional boundaries began in a series of late-nineteenth-century episodes,⁵¹ and had hardened sufficiently to merit being described as a rule by the mid-1950s. The resignation of Sir Thomas Dugdale as Minister of Agriculture in 1954 following the Crichel Down controversy is a good illustration. Crichel Down involved a government department's failure to resell land to the family from whom it had been compulsorily purchased for military use just before World War II, in breach of assurances to that effect. Dugdale resigned when it became clear he had specific knowledge of his civil servants' activities, but had failed to appreciate the problematic nature of the action being undertaken.

Crichel Down's ramifications went beyond the issue of a Minister's personal culpability.⁵² The episode triggered a crisis of confidence in the 'green light' variant of the rule of law which had increasingly structured the government process in the immediate post-war era. The response of the then Conservative government was to promote a wide-ranging 'judicialisation' of many aspects of the administrative process, entailing more tightly defined legislative rules for executive bodies to follow, the creation of quasi-judicial appeal tribunals for citizens dissatisfied with certain types of government decision, and somewhat easier access to judicial review. The change in emphasis was encapsulated in the Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1958, whose provisions corresponded closely to the ⁵¹ See Finer S (1956) 'The individual responsibility of Ministers' Public Administration 377.

⁵² Hamson C (1954) 'The real lesson of Crichel Down' Public Administration 383.

theoretical perceptions of the rule of law advanced by analysts such as Harry Jones.⁵³ Longer term efforts were also made to enhance green light mechanisms of political control: Crossman's select committee initiative has already been mentioned, and another of his innovations is considered further below.

For present purposes, Crichton's significance lies in the clear indication that a Minister need not resign in response to the failings of civil servants of which he was not, and could not reasonably be expected to have been aware, irrespective of the gravity of the consequences. This suggests resignation is more likely to be triggered by a failure of policy, rather than implementation, since the former remains more obviously the province of Ministers themselves.

James Callaghan's 1967 resignation as Chancellor from Harold Wilson's second Labour government was clearly precipitated by policy failure, even though the failure was determined largely by matters beyond his control. The government had struggled for some years to maintain sterling's dollar exchange rate at $2.80. After repeated rumours of devaluation, followed by repeated government denials of any such intention, sterling was devalued. As Chancellor, Callaghan was the chief architect of a manifestly unsuccessful economic strategy. Nevertheless the devaluation arguably owed far more to previous governments' refusal to acknowledge Britain's declining economic status than to Callaghan's errors per se.

A more pertinent, more recent, example is offered by Lord Carrington's resignation as Foreign Secretary following the Argentinean invasion of the Falkland Islands in 1982. Carrington considered he had underestimated the severity of the Argentinean threat, and thought it necessary that somebody accept responsibility for the governmental failure that the invasion betokened.

This redefinition of the convention to require personal knowledge is strengthened by instances when Ministers have not resigned following gross errors by their civil servants. In 1982, for example, a man named Michael Fagan breached security at Buckingham Palace and wandered around unchallenged for hours before having a conversation with the Queen in her bedroom. William Whitelaw, the Home Secretary, was formally 'responsible' for the Metropolitan Police, who provided security at the Palace. Fagan's escapade revealed that security precautions were quite inadequate. Whitelaw's initial instinct was to go, but he was talked out of this by the Prime Minister. Her argument was firstly that no harm had befallen the Queen and, secondly, the Home Secretary could not be expected personally to supervise the minutiae of the Metropolitan Police's activities.

James Prior, Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, invoked a similar argument when thirty-eight IRA prisoners broke out of the Maze prison in 1983. Prior felt that convention would require his resignation only if the escape had resulted from a policy initiative he had taken—for example if he had given instructions to relax prison security measures. When an inquiry concluded that the escape resulted from management errors made by the prison governor, Prior decided not to resign. He sacked the prison governor instead.

The experience of one of Whitelaw's successors as Home Secretary, Kenneth Baker, suggests a Minister need not resign over such errors even when they happen with disquieting frequency. The most serious incident occurred in 1991, when several IRA prisoners escaped from Brixton prison, using a gun which had been smuggled into the gaol. The Chief Inspector of Prisons had reported some months earlier that security at Brixton was inadequate for high-risk prisoners. However the Home Office had neither stopped using Brixton for such detainees, nor improved its security facilities. One might have assumed this was a high level policy matter within the Home Secretary's personal sphere of responsibility. However, Mr Baker contended that responsibility lay with the prison governor.

⁵³ See 'Jones—the rule of law in the welfare state', ch 3, pp 57–58 above.

Baker subsequently resigned from the government when offered the less important post of Welsh Secretary in 1992. But his failings in office continued to haunt him. In 1993, he achieved the unenviable distinction of being held by the House of Lords in *M v Home Office*⁵⁴ to have committed contempt of court by authorising the expulsion of a political refugee in defiance of a court order. We can only speculate as to whether Baker would have seen this as a resigning matter.⁵⁵ It seems possible that he would have argued that he was just following the advice of his departmental lawyers. If so, it becomes difficult to conceive of any decision-making error which would require a Minister's resignation.

The competence limb of the convention now seems to be in a fluid, or perhaps fragile, state of health. It may however be rash to conclude that it has now evolved to the point where only the most calamitous incompetence will necessitate resignation. We should perhaps focus our attention not simply on the scale of the mistake, but also on the strength or weakness of the Minister's position within the governing party.

Errors of judgement

The sanction of resignation seems to attach more firmly to Ministers making severe errors of judgement rather than policy or administrative mistakes. In recent times, the Westland Affair provides a graphic example of this convention. The then Trade Secretary, Leon Brittan, had authorised the leaking of a letter from the Solicitor-General criticising the constitutional propriety of Michael Heseltine's behaviour. This leak breached another convention—that Law Officers' advice to Ministers should remain confidential within the government. Although the Cabinet initially disclaimed knowledge of the leak's source, the Solicitor-General's threat to resign if a leak inquiry was not conducted led to the revelation that Brittan had condoned a decision by his Press Officer to release the letter. Facing such evidence, Brittan had no option but to resign, albeit amid suspicions that his departure was intended to conceal the Prime Minister's reputed approval of the leak.⁵⁶

Westland provided yet another illustration of ministerial responsibility when the Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher, was subsequently compelled to defend her own role before the Commons in an emergency debate. The potential importance of debate in the House as a mechanism to control executive behaviour is revealed by Thatcher's own belief that a poor performance might result in her own resignation that evening. But an inept speech by Neil Kinnock, then Leader of the Opposition, enabled the Prime Minister successfully both to distance herself from the Westland intrigues and to downplay their constitutional importance.⁵⁷

Westland is an unusually important episode in modern constitutional history. Other recent resignations over errors of judgement have been more mundane. Nicholas Ridley, for example, resigned as Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in 1990 after expressing hostile attitudes towards Germany in a press interview. Such sentiments were considered quite inappropriate for a Minister, given the closeness of Anglo-German relations within both the EEC and NATO. Similarly, in 1988, Edwina Currie, a junior Minister, left the ⁵⁴ [1994] 1 AC 377.

⁵⁵ He had declined to do so when held in contempt by the Court of Appeal; see Marshall G (1992) 'Ministerial responsibility, the Home Office, and Mr Baker' Public Law 7.

⁵⁶ Brittan's case illustrates that resignation even on the grounds of gross personal culpability need not end a Minister's political career. Shortly after resigning, Brittan was appointed as an EEC Commissioner, a post of considerable political importance.

⁵⁷ See Young H (1991) One of us pp 454–457; Clark op cit pp 132–135.

government after alleging that almost all UK egg production was infected by salmonella. The statement's accuracy was questionable. Its devastating effect on British egg producers was not. Protracted vilification from the farming industry, and repeated media questioning of her abilities, persuaded Mrs Currie to resign. The episode need not have ended her ministerial career. She was invited to join the second Major administration, but declined to do so.

The Blair government did not escape such difficulties. Peter Mandelson, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and Geoffrey Robinson, the Paymaster-General, both resigned from the government in 1999 when it transpired that Robinson had lent Mandelson some £370,000 to buy a house. While it was questionable if the feeble post-Nolan requirements on MPs' disclosure of financial interests was breached here, concealing the loan was manifestly an error of judgement on both men's part, given that the Department of Trade was conducting investigations into the running of companies with which Robinson was closely involved. Mandelson's 'punishment' was however a light one. He returned to the Cabinet less than a year later. Somewhat bizarrely, Mandelson was subsequently compelled by prime ministerial and backbench pressure to resign from the Cabinet a second time, following accusations that he had sought to assist the Indian billionaire Hinduja brothers to gain British citizenship in return for them making a substantial contribution to the government's ill-fated Millennium Dome project.⁵⁸

It is difficult to extract a 'rule' (qua a predictable, binding behavioural code) from these or any other examples of resignation. Finer's celebrated study of the issue suggested party political expediency rather than moral principle was the critical factor in determining both whether a Minister should resign and her subsequent fate.⁵⁹ It certainly appears that subsequent resignations have been intended to have symbolic rather than practical effects. Callaghan's aforementioned resignation as Chancellor in 1967 was in effect a side-ways transfer, for he simply swapped offices with the Home Secretary, Roy Jenkins. One thus gains the impression that the reason for the resignation was an attempt to wipe the government's economic slate clean before the next general election. Such an interpretation reinforces Finer's earlier (1956) suggestion that a Minister's errors will not invariably precipitate resignation unless her conduct has alienated a substantial body of opinion within her own party.

That even a high level of support from one's party colleagues will not necessarily suffice to save a Ministerial career is however shown by the resignation of the Liberal Democrat MP David Laws from the coalition government in 2010. Laws was an evidently very popular figure with both Liberal Democrat and Conservative MPs when it became known that he was embroiled in the expenses scandal. Laws had claimed some £40,000 in rent payments to which he was not entitled, given that his 'landlord' was his (male) partner. Laws had apparently decided not to reveal that fact to the Commons' authorities to conceal his sexual orientation from public view.⁶⁰ As well as feeling compelled to resign from the government, Laws was subsequently suspended from the Commons for seven days. Given the scale of his expenses claim, he was perhaps fortunate not to follow other MPs into the criminal courts.⁶¹

But it is not just professional or political misjudgment that can bring the convention of individual ministerial responsibility into play. Questions as to moral or personal conduct ⁵⁸ As with Leon Brittan, resignation led not to the end of Mandelson's political career, but to his appointment by the Prime Minister as an EC Commissioner. Indeed, Mandelson was once again reappointed to the Cabinet, by Blair's successor as Prime Minister, Gordon Brown. ⁵⁹ (1956) op cit.

⁶⁰ Daily Telegraph 29 May 2010.

⁶¹ See 'Resources', ch 5, pp 126–128 above.

have also been a regular recent source of ministerial resignations. In these circumstances, questions of party solidarity seem less important.

Issues of morality

Few resignations have generated as much public curiosity as John Profumo's in 1963. Profumo, Minister of War in Macmillan's government, had an affair with a call girl, Christine Keeler. The liaison had obvious security implications, since Ms Keeler was simultaneously sleeping with a Russian Naval Attache. The affair itself may have been enough to have forced Profumo from office. To choose a mistress who was also a lover of an enemy agent would presumably also have amounted to a gross error of judgement. But Profumo's greatest sin was to lie to the Commons when Richard Crossman raised the matter in the house. When the truth was subsequently revealed, Profumo had no choice but to resign.

The resignations of Lord Lambton and Earl Jellicoe in 1973 from Edward Heath's government also had salacious and security-related overtones. Both peers had been conducting relationships with prostitutes, and Lambton was also reputed to have been using illegal drugs. Neither Minister returned to the government. But sexual indiscretion need not always end a ministerial career. Cecil Parkinson resigned from the Cabinet in 1983 when it was disclosed that he had an affair with Sara Keays, who eventually bore his child. Parkinson's behaviour was considered the more reprehensible as he had allegedly promised Keays he would leave his wife, a promise on which he reneged. However after some years on the backbenches, Parkinson re-entered the Cabinet in 1987.

It is too soon to conclude that the morality rule now demands only that Ministers interrupt rather than abandon their career, although the Mellor and Yeo resignations suggest immediacy in resigning is a fast disappearing element of the convention. Mellor, then a married man with several young children, served in John Major's Cabinet. He attracted voluminous media publicity in 1992 following his affair with a young actress. There was no suggestion of any threat to national security. The episode did however cast doubt on his fitness for office, in the sense both of his personal integrity (or lack thereof) and allegations that he felt too 'knackered' to devote as much energy as previously to government responsibilities. Tim Yeo, a junior environment Minister, suffered similarly extensive and critical publicity over an affair with a young Conservative Party worker, by whom he fathered an illegitimate child.⁶² Both Ministers, evidently with Prime Ministerial support, clung to office for several months hoping to ride out the media storm which engulfed them. Mellor decided to resign only when his adultery and apparent exhaustion were coupled with the revelation that he had accepted gifts from a prominent associate of the Palestine Liberation Organisation. Yeo did not resign until his local party members made it clear that they wished him to do so.

Most 'moral' resignations are triggered by the sexual 'misbehaviour' of male Ministers. The weight of evidence suggests there is a respected convention that such activities should lead to resignation, albeit only temporarily. The reason behind the rule is less clear, given that Britain's contemporary social mores indicate that adultery is an activity in which many citizens engage. One suggestion would be that Ministers should set a shining moral example, and are unfit for office if they cannot meet such exacting standards. Another argument would be that resignation is a 'punishment' not for sexual immorality per se, but for the hypocrisy of participating in activities of which the government supposedly disapproves. This contention is especially persuasive in respect of Parkinson, Mellor, and Yeo; all broke their marriage vows while members of Conservative administrations which laid great stress on 'traditional' family values. That Prime Minister John Major was revealed after leaving office to have been conducting an adulterous affair while Prime Minister with one of his junior Ministers, Edwina Currie, lends further force to that contention.

⁶² See Brazier R (1994) 'It is a constitutional issue: fitness for Ministerial office in the 1990s' Public Law 431.

Whether a Minister's personal life compromises his discharge of public duties is a large question. An answer is more easily found when one asks if individual ministerial responsibility could assume a legal basis. Designating behaviour as grossly immoral, or quite immoral, or not really immoral at all, is a highly value laden decision. One might assume that when opposition MPs express outrage at a Minister's misbehaviour they are more concerned with embarrassing the government than protecting the nation's moral fibre. The obvious political delicacy of these questions of ministerial morality provides a strong argument against having this aspect of the government process overseen by legal rules. It would be extremely contentious for a judge to say that a Minister was unfit for office because of the way he conducts his personal life.

That point seems equally applicable to questions of ministerial competence or misjudgement. There are no obvious criteria against which a court could measure a Minister's incompetence to decide if it was sufficiently grave to merit dismissal. Nor could a judge reach that conclusion without being accused of taking sides in what will invariably be a party political dispute.

This might indicate we could begin to construct some definition of conventions in terms of those parts of the constitution with which the courts could not interfere without jeopardising their supposedly impartial political status. This pushes us towards a suggestion that 'non-justiciability' may be an essential ingredient of conventional status. If a rule is important to the operation of the government process, and can be framed in a justiciable manner, the diluted Diceyan version of the rule of law to which the constitution adheres would suggest it should be given legal form. The role of the courts in promoting that process has been adverted to above in the Crossman Diaries case, and we will shortly pursue this argument in greater depth. Before doing so, however, we focus once again on the relationship between conventions and Acts of Parliament.

Reforming the executive: 1—the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration

Crichel Down's institutional fall-out continued well into the 1960s. We have already noted Richard Crossman's unsuccessful select committee initiative. His reform plans bore more immediate fruit in the creation of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration (PCA), colloquially known as the 'Ombudsman'.

The PCA was established by the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967. His role can be seen as plugging various holes in the systems of both parliamentary and judicial supervision of government activities. Section 5 empowered the PCA to investigate any activity of (most) government departments about which he had received a complaint from a member of the public. To emphasise that the PCA was complementing rather than replacing the Commons' own supervisory role, she was only permitted to investigate matters referred to her by an MP. Similarly, to emphasise that the PCA was complementing rather than replacing the supervisory role of the courts, the Act stressed that the PCA could not generally investigate complaints which could be pursued through legal action. The PCA operates with limited resources, but was granted (per s 8) extensive powers to examine government documents and require testimony from Ministers and civil servants. Unlike the courts, the PCA could not impose a remedy on an erring department, but it was widely assumed that governments would comply voluntarily with her suggestions. The PCA's 'independence' is protected in the same way as that of a High Court judge. While she is appointed by the Prime Minister, she holds office during 'good behaviour'; dismissal can only be effected by addresses from both houses.

The evil to which the PCA's energies were directed was 'maladministration'. This concept has never been precisely defined, either in statute or litigation. The so-called 'Crossman catalogue', offered by Richard Crossman during the Bill's passage remains the primary reference point. This embraced 'bias, neglect, inattention, delay, incompetence, ineptitude, perversity, turpitude and arbitrariness'. It may be, post-Pepper v Hart, that Crossman's catalogue now enjoys rather more authoritative legal status than formerly. But it seems we are still reduced to defining maladministration in negative terms; it reaches those aspects of the administrative process which while unsatisfactory, are not unlawful, and so cannot be the subject of an action for judicial review or a claim in tort or contract against the government body concerned.

A detailed assessment of the Ombudsman's (evidently successful and expanding) role in the past thirty years is more appropriately undertaken within a study of administrative rather than constitutional law, and is not attempted here. Our primary concern is her impact on traditional understandings of individual ministerial responsibility, a point best pursued by considering one of her earliest investigations.

Sachsenhausen

The Sachsenhausen controversy arose from an agreement negotiated between the British and German governments in 1964, under which Germany paid Britain £1m to distribute to war-time victims of Nazi persecution.⁶³ The agreement was an exercise of the prerogative. Foreign Office civil servants administered the funds through prerogative powers. The compensation rules were eminently justiciable. Claimants qualified if they had been detained in 'a concentration camp'; the amount received was a multiple of the time spent in detention. The scheme was however established prior to Lain, and there seemed no contemporaneous expectation that decisions would attract full judicial review.

The claims of several servicemen detained in premises adjacent to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp were rejected by Foreign Office officials who decided they had been ordinary prisoners of war, whose maltreatment was not covered by the scheme. Two successive junior Foreign Office Ministers reviewed the claims, as did the Foreign Secretary, George Brown. All confirmed the civil servants' decision.

The PCA's subsequent investigation identified serious flaws in the civil servants' decision-making procedures, and suggested that the decision was substantively indefensible. It is not clear if Ministers personally scrutinised the evidence de novo, or had simply relied on their official's advice. In either event, their decisions merely reiterated the original maladministration, and the PCA recommended that the servicemen be compensated in accordance with the scheme's criteria.

In a subsequent Commons speech, George Brown accepted the PCA's decision, announcing that compensation would be paid. However, he then criticised both the PCA's findings in the Sachsenhausen case itself, and also what he regarded as a more substantial question of constitutional principle:

⁶³ Information in the following paragraphs is drawn from Fry G (1970) 'The Sachsenhausen concentration camp case and the convention of ministerial responsibility' Public Law 336–357.

We will breach a very serious constitutional position if we start holding officials responsible for things that are done wrong. . . . If things are wrongly done, then they are wrongly done by Ministers. . . . It is Ministers who must be attacked, not officials.⁶⁴

Brown was correct in concluding that the creation of the PCA had forced a redefinition of the convention of individual ministerial responsibility. The PCA's extensive investigatory and reporting powers did raise the possibility that the individual failings of civil servants would be brought into both the parliamentary and public domain, rather than being dealt with as an internal management matter. One might think, as matter of policy, that this could be undesirable both because 'accused' civil servants could not defend themselves against such attack, and also because it raised the possibility that Ministers would evade personal responsibility by hiding behind an impartial report which laid blame at a civil servant's feet.

The constitutional difficulty raised by Brown's speech was that those issues of policy had already been settled. His speech may therefore itself be seen as a breach of the unanimity rule. He had been a member of the Cabinet which presented the 1967 Bill to Parliament. Had he respected conventional principles, he would presumably have been compelled either to resign from the Cabinet before publicly criticising its policy, or kept his disquiet as a matter only for the ears of his Cabinet colleagues. Brown had prefaced his remarks by saying he spoke in a personal rather than Cabinet capacity, but this contention seems even less satisfactory than other previously considered manifestations of the 'suspension' principle. Unanimity cannot be a conventional rule if Ministers may opt in and out of it whenever they wish.

One cannot trace a direct link between Ministers' apparently increasing insulation against resignation as the price for serious error and the expanding role of the PCA. The fact nevertheless remains that the present political climate seemingly makes it acceptable for Ministers such as Prior and Baker to maintain that the chain of responsibility for even very grave mistakes ends with a civil servant, not a politician. The PCA, however, was but a minor innovation compared to the restructuring of the civil service undertaken since the mid-1980s.

Reforming the executive: 2—'next steps' and privatisation

The 'Next Steps' reforms initiated by the third Thatcher government divided some parts of the Civil Service into separate 'policy formulating' and 'policy implementation' organisations. While policy formulation would remain the province of Ministers and civil servants within traditional government departments, implementation would be entrusted to so-called 'executive agencies'.

Under the Next Steps system, the department would draft a 'framework document' outlining the policies which the agency should apply. The agency thereafter proposes 'performance targets', subject to ministerial approval, which it would seek to meet each year. Agencies would be headed by 'Chief Executives', drawn from both government and private sector organisations. Similar reforms had been proposed by Harold Wilson's government in 1968, but had not been adopted. The third Thatcher government implemented the changes with some speed. Some fifty agencies had been established by 1992, including the Royal Mint, the employment service, and the prisons service.

⁶⁴ HCD 5 February 1968 c 123.

The agencies' relationship with their supervising department appeared to be 'quasi-contractual'.⁶⁵ This has considerable implications for traditional concepts of individual ministerial responsibility, for it raises the possibility that Ministers may 'contract out' of responsibility for governmental errors which would previously have been made within their departments. The fear that the Next Steps structure would produce a situation in which Ministers might disclaim their accountability to Parliament for agency errors was intensified in late 1994 by a series of failures in prison security. An attempted escape by IRA prisoners was rapidly followed by the discovery of live ammunition in one gaol, and explosives in another. At the same time, national newspapers ran stories alleging that the government had authorised a marked relaxation of security measures in respect of some IRA and other prisoners. Calls were made, both in the press and from opposition parties, for the resignation of Michael Howard, the Home Secretary.

These events raised the difficult question of identifying at which managerial point within a Next Steps agency a Minister's influence becomes sufficiently acute to make him responsible for the agency's errors. It seems possible that a Minister's responsibility would extend to the contents of the framework document, to the objectives of the annual performance agreements, and the choice of the agency's Chief Executive: imposing an absurd framework, setting ludicrous targets, or appointing a manifestly incompetent Chief Executive would presumably be a personal ministerial decision.

The Next Steps initiative further weakened the already enfeebled convention that a Minister accepts responsibility for a civil servant's failings. Nor has that decline in political accountability been accompanied by an increase in legal regulation. The Major governments produced various 'Citizen's Charters', which set targets for government agencies to meet in terms of such matters as the speed, accuracy and courtesy with which they address citizen's enquiries or concerns. The charters might be seen as reinforcing the role of the PCA, in so far as they were directed at various types of maladministration. They were not legislative instruments however, and there has thus far been no indication that either successive government or the courts regard them as creating common law rights.⁶⁶ The Blair government appeared enthusiastically to support what has now come to be known as 'the new public management'. The Citizen's Charter was promptly renamed 'Service First' in 1998, and a White Paper published in 1999 indicated that there would be no reversal of the trends of the past ten years.⁶⁷ Despite its significant impact on the relationship between the government and the Commons, the Next Steps initiative has less profound implications for ministerial responsibility than the extensive programme of 'privatisation' of government functions that was carried out by the Thatcher, Major and Blair administrations.

Privatisation

The first Thatcher administration subscribed enthusiastically to the model of government advocated by Hayek's Road to Serfdom, and just as previous Labour governments had used their de facto control of Parliament's sovereignty to 'nationalise' private industries, so the first Thatcher government used its Commons majority to return them to the private sector. The Thatcher administrations regarded activities such as shipbuilding, ⁶⁵ Oliver (1991) op cit p 65. On the reforms more generally see Oliver (1991) op cit pp 64–70; Woodhouse op cit chs 11–12.

⁶⁶ Drewry G (1993) 'Mr Major's Charter: empowering the consumer' Public Law 248.

⁶⁷ See Drewry G (2000) 'The new public management', in Jowell J and Oliver D eds (4th edn, 2000) The changing constitution.

and car and aerospace manufacturing as purely economic in nature, and thus no legitimate part of the government's responsibilities. Similarly, it was thought that services such as the telephone system, the railways, and gas, electricity, and water provision were better run as profit-making private businesses rather than some form of public sector social services.

In addition, the Thatcher, Major and Blair governments also believed that more overtly 'governmental' services should also be managed by private sector companies. Unlike the Next Steps reforms, privatisation does not dilute Commons control over service management, but rather removes it altogether. In persuading Parliament to privatise formerly public services, the government effectively abolishes ministerial responsibility for matters which may have a significant impact on citizens' lives and welfare. If we regard the constitution as being concerned essentially with structuring both the substance and the processes of the relationship between a country's government and its citizens, it seems that a major part of the constitution has undergone substantial reform in the past thirty years.

To conclude our analysis of conventions, we return to the question of the relationship between convention, statute and the common law—and find that it may be less straightforward than we might have thought.

V. Can conventions become laws? 2: Patriating the Canadian constitution

As chapter seven suggested in discussing the Lords' disinclination to invoke its delaying powers under the Parliament Act 1949, there may be areas of constitutional practice in which conventional reluctance to deploy legal authority eventually leads to the law shedding its political legitimacy. This chapter indicates that conventions might plausibly be seen as a melting pot in which differing concentrations of legal and political ingredients are constantly mixed. If so, we might ask if a diametrically opposite process to delegitimation could occur? Might it ever be possible for conventions to have been respected for so long, become so precisely defined, and be so important, that they could 'crystallise' into laws?

One obvious way to give conventions legal effect is to enact them as statutes. The Parliament Acts are themselves an illustration of that process. A more radical proposition is that the courts can achieve that effect through the common law. Crossman Diaries suggests the courts can de facto do so by finding that the common law 'coincidentally' mirrors conventional understandings. This is not the same however, either in symbolic or practical terms, as de jure acknowledgement of crystallisation. Events in the early 1980s offered an opportunity for that constitutional development to occur.

Patriating the Canadian constitution

The country of Canada, as a legal entity, was created by the UK Parliament's British North America Act 1867. The Act gave Canada a federal structure, which, reflecting the USA's system, granted some powers to the national Parliament and government, and others to the (now) ten provincial governments and legislatures. However, while the USA's Constitution could be amended by its 'people', the British North America Act required 'Canada' to ask Westminster to enact amending legislation. In the 1931 Statute of Westminster, the UK Parliament recognised that several of its former colonies had de facto achieved the status of independent nations. Section 4—which has already been quoted in chapter two in relation to the events leading up to Harris v Dorges—provided:

No Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this Act shall extend... to a Dominion as part of the law of that Dominion unless it is expressly declared in that Act that that Dominion has requested, and consented, to the enactment thereof.

Section 4's political consequence seemed to be that Parliament had sought to bind its successors never to legislate on Canadian issues unless requested to do so by 'Canada'. That consequence would of course be a legal impossibility if one adhered to orthodox notions of parliamentary sovereignty.⁶⁸ The 1931 Act also permitted the Canadian national Parliament to amend some parts of the Canadian constitution through domestic procedures. But 'Canada' was still obliged to place a Bill before the UK Parliament to amend the balance of power between the national and provincial spheres of government.

However, the Act did not specify what was meant by 'Canada'. Was this just the national Parliament, or the national government; or some or all of the Provinces as well; and/or the country's various racial and ethnic sub-groups? Nor did the Act say if there were circumstances in which the British Parliament might refuse to enact a measure passed from 'Canada'.

During the next fifty years, two conventions filled these legal gaps in the Canadian and UK constitutions. The first was that the Canadian national government would not send a Bill to Britain which altered the national/provincial division of power unless it enjoyed the support of all Provinces. The second was that the British Parliament would always enact Bills sent by the Canadian national government. The conventions arose (to adopt Asquith's typology) through 'tradition', 'unbroken practice' (several amendments had been effected in this way) and a lengthy passage of time (some fifty years). Their force was further strengthened by codification in a national government white paper published in the 1960s.

The reasons for the conventions are readily apparent. The first ensures that the federal nature of Canada's governmental system was safeguarded against unilateral amendment by the central legislature, or factional alteration by a majority or even minority of provincial governments. The particular form of federalism provided for by the allocation of powers between the national government and the provinces, in other words, sat atop Canada's hierarchy of constitutional principles. The second acknowledges that 'Canada' had achieved sufficient economic and political maturity to wield de facto, if not de jure, control of its own constitutional destiny.

In the late 1970s, Pierre Trudeau's national government wished to 'patriate' the Canadian constitution—to make all amendments a matter solely of domestic law. The patriation Bill also contained proposals significantly to amend federal/provincial relations. The Bill provoked considerable controversy in Canada; its contents had been supported by only two provincial governments.⁶⁹ The Bill's opponents pursued two strategies to prevent its passage. The first attempted to convince the British Houses of Parliament that the Bill had not been sent by 'Canada', and should therefore not be enacted. The ⁶⁸ As a matter of Canadian constitutional law however, one may safely assume that Canadian courts would not obey a subsequent British statute purporting to restore Parliament's previous authority. Nor, one assumes, would Parliament ever legislate in such a way. This 'transfer of sovereignty' to Canada was the source of Lord Sankey's oft-quoted dictum in British Coal Corp'n v R [1935] AC 500 at 520, PC: 'It is doubtless true that the power of the [UK] Parliament to pass on its own initiative any legislation that it thought fit extending to Canada remains in theory unimpaired.... But that is theory and bears no relation to realities'.

⁶⁹ For a detailed examination of the background see Romanov R, Whyte J and Leeson H (1984) Canada notwithstanding, esp chs 3–4.

second involved litigation before the Canadian Supreme Court to establish firstly that the Canadian constitution recognised a convention that demanded unanimous provincial consent before the Bill could be sent to Westminster; and secondly that the Canadian courts could give that convention legal effect.

The opinion of the British House of Commons

The Canadian crisis presented Mr St John Stevas' newly invigorated Commons Select Committee system⁷⁰ with an opportunity to engage in a non-partisan investigation of constitutional principle and practice. The first Thatcher government had indicated that it had no power to look behind a Bill sent from the Canadian national government to examine the basis of consent which the measure had attracted. Any such Bill, would, per the second aforementioned convention, be introduced into Parliament. But as we have already established, there is no legal mechanism through which the three constituent parts of Parliament can be compelled to approve a Bill.⁷¹ The question the Select Committee addressed was whether the Commons was morally or politically obliged simply to approve any Canadian Bill, or whether it should satisfy itself that the first of the aforementioned conventions (that the Bill enjoyed unanimous provincial support) had been satisfied. After taking evidence from many expert academic and political sources, the Committee produced a report rejecting the Trudeau government's presumption that Parliament should unquestioningly enact any Canadian Bill.⁷² The Committee suggested that the Commons was under no conventional obligation to approve a Bill enjoying so little provincial support. But nor need it withhold approval until unanimous support was obtained. Rather, it concluded:

All Canadians (and thus the governments of the provinces too) have, and always have had, a right to expect the UK Parliament to exercise its amending powers in a manner consistent with the federal nature of the Canadian constitutional system...⁷³

This expectation could be met if Parliament required Canadian Bills to enjoy a 'substantial' degree of provincial consent. The Committee proposed a complex formula, relating to geographical location and population patterns to determine if substantial consent had been achieved. Without such consent, Parliament could properly refuse to enact a Canadian Bill.

The Select Committee report nevertheless left several important questions unanswered. For example, if the two houses approved the Bill, would British courts override traditional understandings as to parliamentary privilege and Art 9 of the Bill of Rights and prevent the Bill being sent for the Royal Assent in a manner reminiscent of the Trethowan scenario?⁷⁴ Equally fascinating was the question of whether, if the British courts refused to intervene, the Queen would breach the convention of acting on her Ministers' advice and withhold her assent. Or, assuming assent was given, would a British court disregard the enrolled Bill rule and refuse to apply the statute? No doubt to the regret of constitutional lawyers, most of these questions never required a concrete answer. The eventual solution to Canada's difficulties was provided by its own Supreme Court.

⁷⁰ See 'The 1979 reforms', ch 5, pp 148–151 above. For a detailed account of this stage of the episode see Romanov et al op cit ch 5.

⁷¹ Although the Lords' objections could be by-passed by use of the Parliament Act 1949.

⁷² House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee (1981) British North America Acts: the role of Parliament.

⁷³ House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee (1981) op cit at para 103.

⁷⁴ See 'A-G for New South Wales v Trethowan (1931)', ch 2, pp 36–37 above.

The judgment of the Canadian Supreme Court

In *A-G of Manitoba v A-G of Canada*⁷⁵ the Canadian Supreme Court confirmed that there was a convention, established by years of practice and acknowledged by former federal governments, that the British Parliament should only be sent Bills supported by a substantial number of provinces. Two out of ten was not substantial. Consequently the federal government was breaching this constitutional convention. The reason for the convention was to ensure that 'Canada' retained its distinctively federal system of government.

For two dissentient judges, Martland and Ritchie JJ, the principle of federalism was an 'ultimate political fact' which demanded judicial obedience. The requirement of provincial consent to reform was so vital an element of Canada's constitutional order that it had assumed justiciable status—it had crystallised into law. But more than that, it had become a law possessing higher status than federal legislation.

If transposed to the British context, the implications of the dissenting judgments are revolutionary. Even the most imaginative interpretation of Crossman Diaries would maintain only that a convention could crystallise into a common law rule. That process presents no threat to parliamentary sovereignty, for common law rules can be reversed by statute. Rather, the Martland/Ritchie argument would lead us to conclude that some conventions might assume supra-statutory status; Dr Bonham's Case would again become a valid constitutional principle, and the extent of Parliament's supremacy would be unclear. That is of course little more than wild speculation. The argument operates at three steps removed from domestic law, since firstly the British constitution is not (as we shall see in chapter ten) a federal structure; secondly, the judgments of another nation's courts have no binding force in British law; and thirdly, the Canadian Supreme Court majority produced a more orthodox decision.

Having recognised a convention of substantial provincial consent, the majority concluded that while a convention could be admissible as evidence in helping judges decide the correct legal response to a particular problem, it could not become a law, no matter how long it had been respected and no matter how important a principle it embodied. Conventions were not justiciable, and could not become so. 'Crystallisation' was a figment of overactive legal imaginations. The Supreme Court could not stop the Trudeau government sending the Bill to Britain.

But by laying such stress on the importance of the convention of substantial provincial consent, the Supreme Court completely undermined the legitimacy of the federal government's efforts to ignore the Provinces. It was not possible as a matter of morality or political practicality for the government to go ahead.⁷⁶ The initial Bill was therefore withdrawn, and the Trudeau government re-opened negotiations with the Provinces in order to produce a conventionally legitimate patriation proposal. A Bill was eventually produced which attracted the support of nine Provinces. This Bill was subsequently sent to the Westminster Parliament, where it was enacted as the Canada Act 1982.

We can only speculate as to how a British court would have viewed an 'Act' which seemed to alter Canadian law but did not contain any reference to Canadian consent to its terms. The Diceyan view would be that any such reference is unnecessary—for the courts to demand it would amount to recognition of 'manner and form' entrenchment as a valid principle of British constitutional law, and thereby create a new 'ultimate political fact'. The whole basis of the constitution would then be undermined; for if we accept one statute is 'special' because of the political substance of its subject matter, there is no logical barrier to prevent other 'special' statutes emerging, and indeed for different statutes to enjoy different degrees of 'specialness' according to the enacting Parliaments' and interpreting courts' perceptions of their political importance. As a political or moral principle, such a 'revolution' may be no bad thing, and we will further consider its merits in chapter thirteen: yet as a matter of orthodox legal theory, it would seem unachievable. But the question of whether constitutional lawyers should regard legal theory as more important than political practice is one which we might consider once more in the final section of this chapter.

⁷⁵ [1981] 1 SCR 753, sub nom Reference re Amendment of Constitution of Canada (Nos 1, 2, 3) 125 DLR (3d) 1. For other critiques from a British perspective see Turpin (1990) op cit pp 102–115; Allan T (1986) 'Law, convention, prerogative: reflections prompted by the Canadian constitutional case' Cambridge LJ 305.

⁷⁶ See Romanov et al pp 183–190.

VI. From ministerial responsibility to ministerial accountability? The Matrix-Churchill controversy

The roots of the Matrix-Churchill controversy date back to 1984, during the war between Iran and Iraq.⁷⁷ In response to United Nations restrictions on the supply of arms to both countries, the second Thatcher government announced through a written answer to a Commons question that it would not issue the requisite licence approving the export to either country of any military equipment which might prolong or exacerbate the war. In 1988, at the end of the war, three junior Ministers (Lord Trefgarne in the Ministry of Defence, Alan Clark at the Department of Trade, and William Waldegrave at the Foreign Office), decided to change the policy, adopting a far less restrictive approach to Iraq. It is scarcely credible to believe that this was done without Cabinet approval. The restrictive policy was seen to have several disadvantages: firstly, it might reduce profits and employment in the British arms industry; and secondly it might compromise Britain's capacity to exercise political influence on middle eastern politics. No member of the government thought it appropriate to inform the Commons of this change in policy. Nor was the change revealed when John Major replaced Thatcher as Prime Minister. It seems unlikely that the government's tame majority in the house would have objected to the change in policy when it was made. But to announce the alteration to the house would also have meant announcing it to the press, and thence to the public and the rest of the world community. The government was, it seems, concerned to avoid the opprobrium it might attract from opposition parties, the press and other Member States in the United Nations if it became known that it had assisted the efforts of Iraq to re-arm itself. To acknowledge the change some years afterwards would have been even more problematic, given Iraq's subsequent invasion of Kuwait and Saddam Hussein's resultant 'Gulf War' against the US, the UK and their allies.

The hidden change in policy was revealed when the Customs and Excise service, unaware of the Waldegrave/Clark/Trefgarne initiative, commenced a prosecution against the directors of an engineering firm, Matrix-Churchill, for supplying Iraq with arms under the guise of non-military equipment. The defendants maintained that they had been encouraged to supply the weapons, and to lie about their nature, by the Department of Trade. Their lawyers naturally sought documentation from the government to support this claim. The government denied the allegation. Several senior Ministers then returned 'public interest immunity' certificates to the court, claiming that release of any of the documents would threaten national security.⁷⁸ To the government's great discomfort, Alan Clark, subpoenaed to attend the trial, confirmed the defendants' claims under cross-examination. His more senior colleagues had seemingly been prepared to let the defendants be convicted and perhaps sentenced to lengthy terms of imprisonment rather than reveal their own roles in the affair.

⁷⁷ The episode has prompted production of a large literature. The most searching analysis is offered by Tomkins A (1998) The constitution after Scott. See also Leigh I and Lustgarten L (1996) 'Five volumes in search of accountability: the Scott Report' MLR 695.

The government denied any wrongdoing. It claimed that arms sales policy had not been altered, but only 'reinterpreted', and that therefore the Commons and Lords had not been misled by the government's failure to inform them of the initiative. It further contended that Ministers had been legally obliged to issue the PII certificates. Prime Minister Major was nonetheless sufficiently embarrassed by the episode to 'allow'⁷⁹ the Commons to request the government to appoint (under prerogative powers) an independent Commission of Inquiry, chaired by Sir Richard Scott, then a member of the Court of Appeal.

Over three years passed between the establishment of the Commission and the publication of its report. The Report spanned some 1,800 pages, and was published in five volumes.⁸⁰ The inquiry proceedings were marked by constant government obstructionism. Sir Richard was not granted legal powers to compel the attendance of witnesses, nor to require that they give evidence on oath. The eventual Report criticised government recalcitrance and delay in providing requested documents. More significantly, while Ministers gave evidence to the inquiry, senior figures in the Conservative Party, led by the former Foreign Secretary Sir Geoffrey (then Lord) Howe, made systematic attempts pre-emptively to discredit Scott's findings by accusing the inquiry procedure of being biased in nature and partial in effect.

The core conclusion that the inquiry reached was that Ministers had changed policy and had misled the Commons by not announcing the alteration:

The answers to parliamentary questions... failed to inform Parliament [sic] of the current state of government policy on non-lethal arms sales to Iraq. This failure was deliberate.... The overriding and determinative reason was fear of strong public opposition to the loosening of restrictions.⁸¹

The impact of this conclusion was however much reduced by the Report's excessive length and verbosity. It was further reduced by the Major government's grotesquely cynical handling of the Report's publication. The government insisted on being given copies eight days prior to publication. During that time, Ministers familiarised themselves with its contents, and their departments produced highly distortive 'summaries' to give to the press. Commons debate was scheduled for the day of publication. MPs received copies ten minutes before the debate was to begin. The government had grudgingly allowed the Labour and Liberal Foreign Affairs spokesman an additional three hours to examine the report. In such circumstances, ensuing debate was a farce, and press coverage necessarily slanted to reflect the government's view. The Major administration's unwillingness to permit serious debate may not have amounted to a 'contempt of the house' in a formal sense, but it undoubtedly displayed contempt for the principle that the legitimacy of the government process should rest on the informed consent of the governed.

⁷⁸ On this area of law see Tomkins op cit ch 5.

⁷⁹ The Conservative majority in the house would not have taken such a step in the face of government opposition.

⁸⁰ (1996) Report of the Inquiry into the export of defence equipment and dual use goods to Iraq and related prosecutions (HC (1995–96) 115); hereafter referred to as 'Scott'.

⁸¹ Scott op cit para D4.42.

At an abstract level, the Matrix-Churchill episode is significant in prompting explicit recognition of a further shift in the conventional basis of the government's relationship with the Commons. From both an individual and collective perspective, ministerial responsibility seems to have been partially replaced by a notion of ministerial accountability.⁸² The presumption seems to be that the process of governance has now become so complex and multi-faceted that no Minister can be expected to keep abreast of all policy matters generated in her department; still less could a Cabinet or a Prime Minister have personal knowledge of the full range of government initiatives. To hold a Minister responsible for governmental failings is thus unrealistic. To hold her accountable, by which is meant that she is comprehensive and candid in informing the Commons of the details of the relevant failing is seen as a more plausible obligation for Ministers to accept. That such a redefinition of convention would excuse ministerial incompetence is perhaps a good reason (per Jennings) for not accepting it in principle. That the Thatcher and Major governments did not voluntarily even pay lip service to the notion of accountability to the Commons over their enthusiasm for selling military hardware to Iraq would suggest that even if a new convention has emerged, its integrity has already been thoroughly undermined.

In practical terms, the lesson one might draw from the Matrix-Churchill episode is perhaps that conventions are essentially useless creatures, and the Commons is an essentially useless institution, when it comes to providing governments of either party with an incentive to temper their enthusiasm for the vast profits made in the armaments industry with a more than rhetorical concern for the respect of democratic principle both at home and abroad.⁸³

VII. Turning convention into law: the 'Ponsonby rule' and the Constitutional Reform and Governance Act 2010

The suggestion made above that the primary function of conventions is to lend a 'democratic' character to the government's exercise of non-justiciable powers⁸⁴ is well-illustrated by the emergence and consolidation of the so-called 'Ponsonby rule' in the early twentieth century. As noted in chapter four, the government's power to make the United Kingdom a party to international law agreements derives from the personal prerogative powers of the Monarch. Thus far, even in the post-GCHQ era, the courts have not indicated that this power is one that might be subject to judicial view.⁸⁵ As a matter of legal theory therefore, it would have been entirely possible for a government to conclude treaties which are opposed by a majority of members of the Commons or Lords. Such action might very well lead to the government facing and losing a confidence vote in the lower house, but there has traditionally been no legal barrier to the government acting in this way.

The 'Ponsonby rule' was introduced in the 1920s at the initiative of the then Foreign Office Minister in the first Labour government, Arthur Ponsonby. The purpose of the rule was to enable both houses to consider and form a view on the merits of any proposed treaty before it was ratified by the government.⁸⁶ A draft treaty would be formally laid ⁸² On the rationale for such a shift see Woodhouse op cit ch 13.

⁸³ Cf Leigh and Lustgarten op cit at 724: 'The process by which Ministers responded to the Report and by which Parliament [sic] considered it could hardly have been a more graphic illustration of the central lesson of the entire Arms for Iraq episode; the futility and ineffectiveness of parliamentary scrutiny.'

⁸⁴ 'The functions and sources of conventions', ch 9, pp 261–262 above.

⁸⁵ 'Foreign Affairs?', ch 4, pp 109–110 above.

⁸⁶ <http://www.fco.gov.uk/resources/en/pdf/pdf4/fco_pdf_ponsonbyrule>.

before each house, with the government undertaking not to proceed to ratification for at least twenty-one days and to allow debate on the terms of the treaty if there was any significant demand to do so from members in either house. The rule appears to have been adhered to with sufficient consistency by governments of all parties to merit the description of being an established constitutional convention.⁸⁷

In response at least in part to backbench pressure for the Commons to subject government behaviour to closer scrutiny which emerged during the latter parts of the Blair/Brown government era,⁸⁸ the Brown government invited Parliament to give the convention a statutory basis. The subsequently enacted Constitutional Reform and Governance Act 2010 made various provisions in this regard. At first glance, s 20 seems to place the government's treaty-making power under the control of each house:

20 Treaties to be laid before Parliament before ratification

- (1) Subject to what follows, a treaty is not to be ratified unless—
 - (a) a Minister of the Crown has laid before Parliament a copy of the treaty,
 - (b) the treaty has been published in a way that a Minister of the Crown thinks appropriate, and
 - (c) period A has expired without either House having resolved, within period A, that the treaty should not be ratified.
- (2) Period A is the period of 21 sitting days beginning with the first sitting day after the date on which the requirement in subsection (1)(a) is met.

However s 20(4) allows the government to override a resolution of the House of Lords. More significantly, s 22 permits a Minister if she considers that 'exceptional circumstances' apply to a particular treaty, to by-pass the s 20 procedure altogether.

It is very difficult to envisage a situation in which a court would accept jurisdiction to assess if 'exceptional circumstances' did indeed exist. In contrast, a justiciable issue would presumably arise if a government which triggers the s 20 process then sought to ignore a Commons' resolution, since that issue is quite distinct from the substance of the treaty and/or whether it is desirable for the country to become a signatory to the treaty concerned. The resolution acquires statutory force by virtue of s 20(1)(c),⁸⁹ and the first clause of s 20(1) is quite unambiguous (a treaty is not to be ratified) as to the consequences of such a resolution. As a matter of legal theory, one would expect the courts to resolve any such dispute in accordance with the DeKayser/Laker/Fire Brigades Union rationale.⁹⁰ Whether a court would be willing to do in the context of what would undoubtedly be an extremely volatile political situation is open to doubt. Section 20 is perhaps best seen as a statutory initiative operating in the realm of legitimacy rather than legality. In giving the Ponsonby rule a statutory base, Parliament has made it politically much more difficult for a government to depart from the moral purpose which the convention was intended to serve.

⁸⁷ See Barret J (2011) 'The United Kingdom and Parliamentary scrutiny of treaties: recent reforms' International and Comparative Law Quarterly 225, and the sources cited at fn 5 therein.

⁸⁸ 'Conclusion', ch 5, pp 151–154 above.

⁸⁹ It is not a simple resolution in the Stockdale v Hansard sense; see 'Stockdale v Hansard (1839)', ch 8, pp 242–243 above.

⁹⁰ See 'Extending Laker: R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Fire Brigades Union' (1995), ch 4, pp 99–100 above.

Conclusion—the conventional basis of parliamentary sovereignty?

It was suggested in chapters five to seven that the sovereignty of Parliament was de facto the sovereignty of whichever political faction controlled majority support in the Commons. Much of the argument advanced in this chapter has indicated that the concentration of effective political power is often very intense even within a political party; small groups of senior Ministers or even the Prime Minister alone may occasionally be, to all intents and purposes, ‘elected dictators’.⁹¹

One might think that this type of institutional structure would be a recipe for oppressive, if not tyrannical law-making. But while we may question complacent claims that Britain’s form of democracy is incapable of improvement, it is absurd to claim that our constitution has proven profoundly insensitive to its citizens’ wishes. Yet this result has seemingly been achieved in spite of, rather than because of, the constitution’s legal structure. This might prompt us to adopt the argument made by Geoffrey Marshall that:

the most obvious and undisputed convention of the British constitutional system is that Parliament does not use its unlimited sovereign power of legislation in an oppressive or tyrannical way. That is a vague but clearly accepted conventional rule resting on the principle of constitutionalism and the rule of law.⁹²

In the light of the analysis presented thus far in this book, we might qualify that assertion somewhat. Episodes such as the sleaze controversy of the mid-1990s and the Matrix-Churchill affair might make us wonder whether avoiding tyranny and oppression is a sufficiently ambitious target for a modern constitution to set itself? That a democratic constitution may avoid such gross evils does not mean that there is no scope for further improvement in the structure and powers of its governing process.

The second qualification relates to the nature of ‘Parliament’. We have now established that legislative sovereignty is frequently de facto wielded by a small faction within a single political party that enjoys only minoritarian electoral support. In that context, we might plausibly conclude that the most important of all constitutional principles are that governing parties (and within them, Cabinets and Prime Ministers) resist the temptation to use Parliament’s unfettered legal powers to enact policies intolerable to the majority of the electorate and, moreover, that the electoral majority is not predisposed to consent to laws which impinge substantially on the liberty of minority factions.

The American revolutionaries, and the constitutional architects of most other western democracies, did not have so optimistic a view of their legislators’ or their citizenries’ political culture. Indeed, Madison and Jefferson saw sound reasons for taking a particularly pessimistic view of the political morality of Britain’s ruling elites. It was precisely because they considered that conventional constraints on governmental power could not be relied upon that the American framers erected so elaborate a system of procedural entrenchment of basic values to safeguard them against majoritarian intolerance or irrationality. The great paradox of British constitutional development is that its basic principle, the sovereignty of Parliament, was initially premised on a perceived need to protect fundamental values through an even more rigorous form of procedural entrenchment. In 1688, each faction of ‘the people’ (as then very narrowly defined) could veto legislation of which it disapproved. Yet now ‘the people’ comprise virtually the entire adult population and, in so far as the people are ridden by factions, their alliances derive from loyalties to a political party. If we transposed the 1688 revolutionaries' 'Three Estates of the Realm' methodology to contemporary British society, the tripartite Parliament in which each limb exercised veto powers would not be the Commons, Monarch and Lords, but the Conservative, Labour, and Liberal Democrat Parties. Yet the constitution currently empowers a government to ignore rather than accommodate the wishes of those among the people who support opposition parties.

⁹¹ The phrase is Lord Hailsham’s.

⁹² Marshall G (1984) Constitutional conventions p 9.

It would thus seem that the long-term legitimacy of our modern constitutional arrangements rests on the assumption that we have no need for a system of 'higher' or entrenched laws, protecting fundamental constitutional values against the whims of electoral majorities, because government and opposition parties are in broad agreement as to the basic political and moral principles which the constitution should express. In such circumstances, it would not greatly matter if one's preferred party lost a general election, for one could be sure that while the new government would pursue policies with which one disagreed, that disagreement would be of degree rather than kind. A political party might readily be expected to consent to laws that its supporters found unpalatable, but not intolerable. This may be because it accepts the intrinsic legitimacy of majoritarian law-making in respect of non-fundamental issues, and/or (more cynically) because it hopes to win the next general election and expects that its own consent to defeat would be reciprocated in respect of its own unpalatable laws by supporters of the previous government.

It is not possible in this book to delve in great detail into Britain's post-war political history. But at the risk of over-simplification, most commentators accept that the 1945–1975 period was marked by appreciable agreement between Labour and Conservative administrations about both the substance and the style of government.⁹³ The era is often referred to as one of 'Butskellite' consensus. 'Butskell' is an amalgam of the surnames of R A Butler and Hugh Gaitskell, respectively leading figures in the Conservative and Labour Parties. Both men adhered to the Keynesian school of economic policy, which advocated extensive government interference in the economy to smooth out the peaks and troughs of the economic cycle. Butskellism embraced a commitment to maintaining full employment, to government ownership of public utilities such as rail, telecommunications, gas, water, electricity and coal, to an extensive network of social security benefits for the elderly and unemployed, and to a comprehensive, government controlled national health service.

This is not to suggest that general elections in that era were not keenly fought, nor that the identity of the winning party made no discernible difference to the way the country was governed. Rather it stresses that the constitution did not face the problem of a people bitterly divided over basic issues.

Chapter six used the changing historical role of the House of Lords as a vehicle to explore the notion of democracy as a matter of procedural politics—the co-equal legislative status of the upper house had become politically unacceptable because of the consolidation of a conventional principle that 'consent' to government demanded legislators be electorally accountable. But we should be wary, especially given the characteristics of our electoral system, of assuming that periodic voting for members of the Commons is a sufficient guarantor of a democratic constitution. Chapter ten returns to the idea that democracy may also be a matter of substantive politics, by focusing not on the House of Lords, but on the institution of local government, in exploring the importance of inter-party consensus to the legitimacy of our constitutional arrangements.

⁹³ See George and Wilding op cit chs 3–4; Gamble (1981) op cit chs 3–4.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Brazier R (1991) 'The downfall of Margaret Thatcher' 54 MLR 471

Hennesy P (1986) 'Helicopter crashes into cabinet: Prime Minister and constitution hurt' Journal of Law and Society 423

Brazier R (1994) 'It is a constitutional issue: fitness for Ministerial office in the 1990s' Public Law 431

Norton P (1978) 'Government defeats in the House of Commons: myth and reality' Public Law 360

Finer S (1956) 'The individual responsibility of Ministers' Public Administration 377

Allan T (1986) 'Law, convention, prerogative: reflections prompted by the Canadian constitutional case' Cambridge LJ 305

Leigh I and Lustgarten L (1996) 'Five volumes in search of accountability: the Scott Report' MLR 695

Brazier R (1982) 'Choosing a Prime Minister' Public Law 395

Butler D (1976) 'The Australian crisis of 1975' Parliamentary Affairs 201

Case law and legislation

Attorney-General v Jonathan Cape [1976] QB 752

A-G of Manitoba v A-G of Canada [1981] 1 SCR 753

Manuel v A-G [1983] Ch 77

This page intentionally left blank

Part Three

The Geographical Separation of Powers

Chapter 10 Local Government

Chapter 11 The European Economic Community 1957–1986

Chapter 12 The European Community after the Single European Act

Chapter 13 The Governance of Scotland and Wales

This page intentionally left blank

Chapter 10

Local Government

We have thus far encountered federalism, in the sense of political mechanisms dividing governmental power geographically, in several different forms. Chapter one noted the inter-relationship in the USA between the people, the national government, and the State governments. The geographical separation of powers between national and State government and the subordination of both spheres of governance to the sovereign power of ‘the people’¹ were fundamental political principles underpinning the constitutional settlement, afforded explicit legal protection in the Constitution’s text. Chapter nine discussed how the Canadian constitution developed a similarly profound attachment to a national/provincial division of powers as a matter of constitutional convention.

Both Canadian and American federalism rest on the moral premise that the constitutions of large, democratic nations should permit ‘the people’s’ inevitably varying political sentiments to be given constant expression on matters of substantial political significance. Within the United States, the individual States may have quite different laws in place in respect of important as well as trivial political or moral issues. A unitary state where legislators face periodic re-election may provide its people with the opportunity to consent in a sequential sense, at a national level, to different governmental philosophies. It may have supra-legislative constitutional provisions which ensure that opposition parties have realistic prospects of winning future general elections if they formulate attractive policies. But such societies cannot provide their people, as does the USA, with any legally constituent basis for the simultaneous co-existence of alternative governmental programmes.

It is also possible, in theory, for a unitary state with a legislature exercising sovereign powers on a bare majority basis to offer its people substantial sequential and simultaneous pluralism within the government process. This would require that whichever political faction controlled a central legislative majority regarded allowing legal effect to be given to differing political preferences in different parts of the country as a fundamental principle of constitutional morality. Such legislators would fashion and maintain a governmental system facilitating effective expression of divergent political opinion. The fewer the powers that the national legislature gave to the national government, and the more it allocated to locally elected bodies, the less unitary and thence more ‘federal’ or ‘pluralist’ the constitution’s moral, functional basis would be. A country could be very federalist in functional terms, while formally being entirely unitary.

¹ In the sense of the amendment process in Art 5.

Post-revolutionary England adopted a constitutional structure recognising a unitary state, within which Parliament possessed total legislative competence. Presumptively therefore, any geographical division of governmental power within English (and later British) society could not have a constituent legal status; it could have only a moral (or, to use familiar terminology, conventional) basis.²

That the American and English revolutionaries adopted (and that their successors subsequently maintained) such divergent approaches to the geographical separation of powers might suggest either or both of two things. Firstly, that British society did not then (and has not since) contained geographically based divisions of political sentiment among its people; and/or, secondly, that it has such divisions, and they have been respected by successive parliamentary majorities. It is to exploring these issues, that the rest of this chapter is directed.³

I. Localism, tradition, and the 'modernisation' of local government

'Localism' was an important element of seventeenth-century English political culture. By then, some areas could already claim several hundred years of self-government. Kingston-upon-Hull was recognised as a unit of local government by 1299, while the town of Beverley traces its local government history back to 1129.⁴ Much local government activity was based on a fusion rather than separation of powers. Its origins frequently lay in the need to enforce and maintain law and order, so government officials frequently occupied posts which now appear as much judicial as executive in nature.⁵ Indeed, the English 'common law' emerged from efforts by successive monarchs to impose uniform legal principles on the many divergent inferior jurisdictions which have flourished in England since the Middle Ages.⁶

The twin socio-economic forces of urbanisation and industrialisation⁷ placed increasing demands on government from 1750 onwards, particularly in respect of maintaining public health and law and order, and providing transport infrastructure. Initially however, Parliament did not address these pressures in a systematic way. Rather, it created ad hoc units of local government in response to perceived social needs in particular areas. Often these government bodies had only one responsibility: for poor relief, or sewerage works, for example. Some, but not all of these office holders were elected (and electorates were then extremely small and entirely unrepresentative of local populations). Most were appointed by central government, which had often delegated that responsibility to powerful locally based politicians. In terms both of the type of powers that its office holders exercised, and the way that they were chosen, local government at this time might more

² Although see the discussion of the status of the Treaties/Acts of Union 1707 at 'Is parliamentary sovereignty a British or English concept?', ch 2, pp 43–46 above.

³ The first four editions of this book treated the issue of local government at substantially more length. The more condensed examination of the issue in the fifth edition and in this edition reflects an apparent recent decline in the importance of local government as a constitutional issue and a need to keep the overall scale of the book within manageable boundaries. Readers who wish to consider the topic in more depth will find pdf versions of chs 10 and 11 of the 4th edition of the book in the companion online resource centre at <<http://www.oxfordtextbooks.co.uk/orc/loveland6e>>.

⁴ Elcock H (2nd edn, 1986) Local government ch 1.

⁵ See Jennings I (4th edn, 1960) Principles of local government law ch 2.

⁶ Plucknett (1960) op cit ch 3.

⁷ See Loughlin M (1985) 'Municipal socialism in a unitary state', in McAuslan and McEldowney op cit; (1986) Local government in the modern state ch 1.

appropriately be described as a form of 'magistracy' rather than a manifestation of representative democracy.

The preponderance of single function authorities produced a very complex governmental structure. As well as presenting difficulties in co-ordinating service provision, the profusion of small single issue bodies prevented local government deriving the advantages of economies of scale, and offered many opportunities for corruption and patronage in allocating offices and the performance of public duties. It was not a system well-suited to the social, economic and political demands of a country in the throes of the world's first industrial revolution.

The Municipal Corporations Act 1835

Following the passage of the 1832 Great Reform Act, the Whigs (Liberals), then led by Lord Melbourne, promised further reform of the country's governmental structures, this time at the local level. Such radicalism triggered one of the last exercises of explicitly partisan monarchical intervention in the political process. William IV dismissed Melbourne's government and dissolved Parliament in the hope that an election would produce a Tory majority. However the January 1835 election returned the Whigs (with Melbourne as Prime Minister with an adequate Commons majority). Melbourne resumed office only after having extracted a pledge of support from the King,⁸ and immediately promoted a Bill to reform the country's system of sub-central government.

While the Bill's Commons passage was uneventful, it met determined opposition in the Lords. This is perhaps surprising, given the obvious 'defeat' that the Lords had suffered over the 1832 Great Reform Act. It seems more readily understandable, however, when one considers the Act's impact on aristocratic control over the country's governance. To some contemporary observers, it amounted to revolution:

There never was such a coup as this Bill... It marshalls all the middle classes in all the towns... in the ranks of reform: aye, and gives them monstrous power too. I consider it a much greater blow to Toryism than the Reform Bill itself.⁹

While the 1832 Act had cut a swathe through the foliage of the landed classes' political influence, the 1835 Bill promised to attack that influence at its roots: it signified that the twin economic forces of urbanisation and industrialisation had been joined by the political catalyst of increased pressure for the democratisation of the country's constitutional arrangements. The functionally haphazard, aristocratically dominated structure of sub-central government which then existed offended the emergent middle classes' attachment to the principles of both efficiency and representativeness in public affairs.

The Tories in the Lords campaigned vigorously against the Bill,¹⁰ passing numerous wrecking amendments. The government offered no resistance, seemingly believing that if given enough legislative rope the Tory peers would hang themselves from the scaffold of reformist, middle class public opinion. One contemporary commentator suggested that the government was:

content to exhibit its paltry numbers in the House of Lords in order that the world may see how essentially it is a Tory body, that it hardly fulfils the conditions of a great independent legislative assembly, but presents the appearance of a dominant party faction.¹¹

⁸ Brock op cit p 317.

⁹ See Turbeville (1958) op cit p 351; Brock op cit p 317.

¹⁰ See generally Turbeville (1958) op cit pp 351–358.

¹¹ Quoted in Turbeville (1958) op cit at p 354.

As in 1832, the intransigence of reactionary Tory peers finally foundered on Peel's refusal to condone their obstruction of an elected government's policy. Shorn of lower house support, Tory peers subsequently contented themselves with fashioning amendments which the Whig government would accept. This was not however the end of the legal battle over the Act.

The courts as defenders of local democracy—the emergence of the 'fiduciary duty doctrine'

Prior to enactment of the legislation, the officials of several boroughs attempted to prevent corporation assets falling into the hands of the newly enfranchised middle classes by disposing of corporation property to themselves or their nominees. Once the Act came into force, the newly elected authorities (acting through the Attorney General) sought recovery of the assets.

*A-G v Aspinall*¹² was the first of these cases. The application succeeded, the nub of the judgment being that the controllers of the corporation, whoever they might be, held its property on trust for their successors and that dispositions of such property; 'made collusively for less than full value' were unlawful.¹³ Lord Cottenham CJ analysed the case by drawing an analogy from the law of trusts, in which a trustee holding financial resources on trust for a beneficiary is placed under an implied 'fiduciary duty' to exercise her management powers over the resources to the best advantage of the beneficiary. In Lord Cottenham CJ's view, the officers of the now defunct corporations should be regarded as holding corporation assets on trust for the local population:

I cannot doubt that a clear trust was created by this Act for public, and therefore in the legal sense of the term, charitable purposes of all the property belonging to the corporation at the time of the passing of this Act; and that the corporation in its former state... were in the situation of trustees for these purposes... and subject to the general obligations and duties of persons in whom such property is vested.¹⁴

A clearer indication of what Lord Cottenham CJ had meant by 'collusive' in Aspinall was provided in A-G v Wilson.¹⁵ The Mayor and Aldermen of the borough of Leeds had greeted the 1835 Bill with a resolution to the effect that:

[T]his Court views with alarm the sweeping measure of corporation reform introduced into the House of Commons by Lord John Russell, as calculated to throw municipal government into the hands of political parties and religious sectaries, opposed to the best and most sacred institutions of the country.

The Mayor and Aldermen then transferred a substantial portion of the borough's assets to three of their number. On the basis of the evidence before the Court, Lord Cottenham CJ concluded that:

The deed of the 30th May 1835 was avowedly made for the purpose of stripping the corporation of all its property before the bill then in Parliament could pass.... These five defendants, being agents and trustees of the corporation funds, though the legal title was not vested in them, by an illegal exercise of the authority of the corporation, procured the funds to be diverted from their legal custody and purpose, and to be placed in other hands...¹⁶

These cases indicate that the fiduciary duty doctrine in relation to local authorities emerged within English law to deal with an extreme political problem; namely an attempt ¹² (1837) 40 ER 773; 2 My & Cr 613.

¹³ (1837) 40 ER 773 at 777.

¹⁴ (1837) 40 ER 773 at 777.

¹⁵ (1840) 41 ER 389.

¹⁶ (1840) 41 ER 389 at 398.

by appointed holders of public office to sabotage an Act of Parliament and to undermine the significance of the newly created local electoral process.

An incremental approach to reform

The 1835 legislation reformed only urban areas—the system of rural local government remained intact. Nor did the Act effect a significant transfer of powers to the new borough councils from existing single function bodies. Its importance lay rather in its recognition that councillors should hold office on the basis of periodic elections, and that their continued occupancy of that office should depend on their winning the consent of a local electorate whose right to vote was defined by a uniform, national franchise based on low levels of property ownership.¹⁷

Parliament nevertheless continued to create single issue bodies to address new social and economic problems at a local level. The Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 had vested responsibility for the administration of poor relief in local 'Boards of Guardians', rather than granting it to the soon to be reformed boroughs. Similarly, following acute public anxiety in the 1850s over the spread of cholera, Parliament created local 'Boards of Health', rather than bestow such powers on the boroughs. It was not until the 1870s that the legislature was ultimately convinced of the desirability of allocating this task to the boroughs.

By the 1880s, the boroughs' 'multi-functional'¹⁸ nature was firmly established. In addition to their public health powers, they gained extensive responsibilities in the areas of housing provision and town planning. Relatedly, Parliament had in 1871 created a central government department, originally titled the Local Government Board, to co-ordinate and oversee local authority activities.¹⁹

The system of rural local government was not rationalised in the sense of becoming multi-functional and elected according to a uniform franchise until the enactment of the Local Government Act 1888. A county council for London was created in 1899. The 1902 Education Act further reinforced councils' multi-functional importance by transferring responsibility for state elementary schooling from the specialist school boards established in 1870 to the county councils and the larger boroughs.

During the next two decades, Parliament made further significant extensions to local government's responsibilities for administering the newly emergent welfare state.²⁰ There were then some 1,500 units of elected, multi-functional local government. They were divided on the basis of powers as well as geography. Many authorities existed within a two-tier structure, in which different types of authority had different responsibilities.²¹ Thus a county council, which provided education and social services throughout its area, might contain within its boundaries several borough councils, each controlling such issues as housing and town planning. The picture was further complicated by some areas which ¹⁷ The local electoral franchise was more expansive than its parliamentary counterpart. The property qualification was lower and women were enfranchised at local level some years before being permitted to vote for members of the Commons.

¹⁸ See Loughlin M (1994) 'The restructuring of central-local government relations', in Jowell and Oliver op cit.

¹⁹ This role successively passed to the Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Housing and Local Government, and, from the 1970s onwards, the Department of the Environment (DoE). The relevant department is now the Department of Communities and Local Government.

²⁰ Which became firmly established following the eventual passage of Lloyd George's 'People's Budget'. For details of local government's role in this period see Hampson W (2nd edn, 1991) Local government and urban politics ch 2.

²¹ This presents a simplified picture. For more detail see Hampson op cit pp 17–20.

had only a single tier structure; larger boroughs might be granted ‘county borough status’, and thereby take over the county’s responsibilities within the borough’s boundaries.

Given their profusion, there was no scope for local councils to exercise powers on a scale comparable to those possessed by the State governments of the USA, or the Canadian provinces. But this does not mean that their powers were politically insignificant. In a welfare state, citizens will be intimately and acutely affected by governmental decisions in such fields as education, housing, social services and town planning. Moreover, the combined impact of these services would be sufficient to enable electors to express appreciably divergent opinions as to the precise content and conduct of citizen-government relations in their respective areas.

By 1920, the democratisation of British society was firmly established. Parliament had introduced a near universal franchise, and the legal reduction in the Lords’ powers effected by the Parliament Act 1911 stressed the elected chamber’s dominance in the legislative process. It was also the case that the ‘people’s’ political allegiance was almost equally divided between the Conservative and Liberal/Labour parties. A powerful local government sector, enjoying appreciable independence from central control, would thus offer defeated voters the opportunity to see their preferred policies given some effect. If our concept of democracy rests on reasonably sophisticated notions of popular consent to government, it is of crucial importance to consider, as a matter both of law and of convention, the principles which structured the relationship between central government, local authorities, and the national and local electorates from the 1920s onwards.

II. Local government’s constitutional status in the early twentieth-century—law and convention

The sophisticated understanding of consent might provide us with (per Jennings) a ‘reason’ for parliamentary self-restraint in respect of local political pluralism. From this perspective, it makes little sense to begin a search for conventional understandings of central/local relations prior to 1918. That date does offer, from a contemporary vantage point, the advantage of giving us (to borrow from Asquith) a sufficiently lengthy time span to scrutinise in order to see if any clear ‘traditions and settled practices’ have emerged.

Several strong presumptions as to the ‘correct’ allocation of power between central and local government were consolidated among politicians of all parties during World War II, when Britain was governed by a Conservative-Labour-Liberal coalition. The parliamentary roots of the Butskellite consensus are highly significant for consent-based theories of constitutional law, since Churchill’s war-time administration is the only modern government which can plausibly be portrayed as commanding the level of popular support which, in democracies such as the USA, would be sufficient to redefine ‘fundamental’ constitutional values.

The election campaigns of 1945, 1950 and 1951 featured hyperbolic denunciations by both parties of their opponent’s policies.²² But the depth of the consensus between mainstream Conservative and Labour policies is well illustrated by Churchill’s first Commons speech following his return as Prime Minister in 1951: ‘What the nation needs is several years of quiet, steady administration, if only to allow the socialist [ie Labour government's] legislation to reach its full fruition'.²³

²² Cf Churchill’s ludicrous claim in a June 1945 election broadcast that Labour’s economic policies could not be implemented without the creation of a Gestapo; see Butler and Sloman op cit p 227.

The 'socialist legislation' to which Churchill referred had entailed significant transfers of formerly local responsibilities to newly created national bodies, especially in the fields of health care and the management of gas, water, and electricity supplies. In terms of the multiplicity of its functions, local government in the Butskellite era was thus less important than it had been immediately before the war. It was also subject to more central oversight, in so far as legislation increasingly contained explicit powers which would enable Ministers to interfere with or override council decisions in certain circumstances.²⁴ However in terms of the scale of its activities, local government had become more important than ever. Local responsibilities lay primarily in the fields of housing, education, land-use planning, social work and consumer protection services. Given the substantive importance of such functions in a modern welfare state, their reservation to elected local government could be seen as a guarantor of political pluralism within the government process. Should the Labour, Liberal or Conservative parties win control of councils endowed by Parliament with such significant responsibilities, they might reasonably assume that their respective political preferences would be implemented in some parts of the country, irrespective of the outcome of general elections. This is not to suggest that that local councils would enjoy complete independence in these spheres of activity, but rather that they would possess sufficient autonomy to exceed or modify centrally determined standards.²⁵

There was a readily discernible party split along regional lines in general elections during the post war era. Crudely stated, a greater percentage of electors in London, Wales, Scotland and northern England consistently voted Labour rather than Conservative, and that tendency was reversed in the rest of southern England. Powerful and autonomous local councils would ensure that this geographically based divergence of opinion was constantly accommodated within the country's overall government structure. It is plausible to conclude that 'the people' in these regions would more readily consent to defeat at the national level if they could be sure that their respective political preferences could influence the government process on a significant, if limited scale in their particular areas.

The Butskellite view of government also acknowledged reasons of a less profoundly 'constitutional' nature for preserving a powerful and vibrant local government sector.²⁶ The first might be called the 'local knowledge' factor. This argument assumes that one will improve the efficiency of service provision if it is entrusted to an organisation that has an intimate knowledge of local social and economic conditions, especially if one is dealing with a package of services where trade-offs need to be made between the amount of resources that each is allocated.

A second justification falls under the heading of political education. Councils can serve as training grounds for politicians before they move on to central government. In another sense, local government's role as a political educator draws more people into the government process, thereby making them aware of their rights and responsibilities as citizens. This can be achieved not only through the route of becoming a councillor. Involvement with local pressure groups, or even individual lobbying over such issues as school closures ²³ HCD 4 November 1951; quoted in Jenkins R (1994) 'Churchill: the government of 1951–1955' at p 497, in Blake R and Louis W (eds) Churchill.

²⁴ Hampson op cit ch 10; Buxton R (1971) Local government ch 5.

²⁵ See especially Griffith J (1966) Central departments and local authorities ch 1.

²⁶ See Sharpe J (1970) 'Theories and value of local government' Political Studies 153.

or housing repairs also gives citizens the opportunity to participate in the government process.

A third justification sees local government as a vehicle for experimental social policies. The sheer diversity of political opinion to which local councils offer expression makes it likely that some authorities will formulate novel and innovative policies. Relatedly, the small geographical scope of any such authority's jurisdiction offers a guarantee of damage limitation if experimental policies prove unsuccessful.

Broadly stated, this Butskellite perception of local government suggests that there is more to the concept of 'democracy' in a modern multi-party state than a five-yearly stroll to the ballot box to express a preference concerning the party composition of national government. Rather, it indicates that democracy in post-war Britain was widely perceived as a perpetual and multi-faceted process, within which various sub-groups of 'the people' would push and pull 'government' at all levels in contradictory directions, and to which a geographical separation of powers could make a vital contribution.

The physical boundaries of local authorities

In terms of their physical boundaries, no less than in respect of their powers, local authorities have not enjoyed a sacrosanct, conventional status in the modern era. The Macmillan government had persuaded Parliament to create a Local Government Boundary Commission in 1958, which exercised powers analogous to those of its parliamentary namesake.²⁷ Boundary redrawing had previously been undertaken on an ad hoc basis, a process clearly vulnerable to accusations of political bias. Macmillan's initiative lent the issue a consensual rather than factional character.

However, the Commission was abolished during Harold Wilson's first administration. Wilson established a Royal Commission (the Redcliffe-Maud Commission) to review the structure of local government in England. Richard Crossman was then the Minister of Local Government, and was largely responsible for determining the Commission's personnel and terms of reference.²⁸

Redcliffe-Maud recommended radical reforms. It proposed as a first principle that England should contain just fifty-eight local councils, each exercising all the powers formerly divided between counties, county boroughs, and boroughs. A two-tier system would be retained only in London and several other large conurbations. The Commission also advocated the creation of eight 'provinces', whose governments (indirectly elected from the other local authorities) would exercise broad, strategic economic planning powers.

Redcliffe-Maud suggested that these reforms would eliminate conflict and confusion between different types of authorities with geographically overlapping responsibilities, heighten people's awareness of which government body was responsible for local service provision, and by enhancing both the geographical size and range of powers each council wielded significantly increase the political importance of local government. Had they been implemented, the proposals would have lent the overall structure of English government a distinctly more 'federal' character.

The Labour and Conservative parties were divided on the merits of the Redcliffe-Maud proposals, although both rejected the proposal for provincial government. Labour's initial Bill watered down the proposals significantly, although it did not reject in principle the extension of single tier local government. However the Wilson government lost office in the 1970 general election before its measures could be enacted. The Heath government, in contrast, while accepting that England contained too many small authorities, remained attached to the multi-tier principle. The Local Government Act 1972 (which came into force in 1974) abolished many of the 1,500 or so small councils which then existed, and merged them into larger units. The 'larger units' were still however numerous and therefore often quite small. In 1974 there were forty-seven county councils in England and Wales, thirty-six metropolitan district councils, and 333 district councils.²⁹ Only the metropolitan districts were single-tier authorities in the sense envisaged by Redcliffe-Maud and apparently preferred by the Labour Party. The Bill had been appreciably amended, at least in matters of detail, during its passage, when the government accepted that its original proposals should be adjusted to accommodate local sensitivities.³⁰ The Bill was nevertheless opposed at second reading by both the Labour and Liberal parties.

²⁷ Local Government Act 1958. See Jennings (1960) op cit pp 88–94.

²⁸ Crossman's Diaries suggest that his zeal for 'modernisation' in this process did not always override his concern with party political electoral advantage: op cit at p 201.

The size and range of powers exercised by local councils has obvious implications for the sector's efficacy as a representative of divergent political opinion. The larger a council, and the more extensive its powers, the greater scope it possesses to act as a meaningful 'alternative' to central government for a local electorate which opposes the party commanding a Commons majority. Neither the Conservative nor Labour parties during the Butskellite era saw any merit in creating a conventionally federal model (in the US or Canadian sense) of central/local relations; councils remained too small, too numerous and too functionally heterogeneous for that argument to have any force. But this is not to say either that local authorities therefore lacked a significant degree of political autonomy, or that the British constitution was insensitive to the pluralist nature of its people's political beliefs. Before introducing its Bill, the Heath government had stated that:

A vigorous local democracy means that authorities must be given real functions—with powers of decision and the ability to take action without being subjected to excessive regulation by central government through financial or other controls... [A]bove all else, a genuine local democracy implies that decisions should be taken—and should be seen to be taken—as locally as possible.³¹

The following pages address the extent to which such rhetoric reflected the realities of central/local relations.

III. Taxation and representation: the fiscal autonomy of local government

There is a close connection between fiscal and political autonomy within the 'government' process. The notion of 'government' carries within it the idea that elected representatives have the power to raise sufficient revenue to put the policies preferred by their electorate into practice: such limits as were imposed on this power would be a purely political matter regulated by the electoral process. An elected body whose revenue and expenditure was determined entirely by another government organisation would not in any meaningful sense be a 'government' at all, but would be merely an administering agency doing the bidding of its fiscal master. This point illustrates a proposition of general applicability to ²⁹ For a helpful explanation (and even more helpful maps) of the eventual structure see Hampson op cit ch 2.

³⁰ See Burton I and Drewry G (1972) 'Public legislation a survey of the session 1971–1972' Parliamentary Affairs 145.

³¹ DoE (1971) Local government in England p 6.

the British constitution in the modern era; that the more fiscal autonomy the council sector possessed, the greater its capacity to express pluralist political sentiment, and hence the more 'governmental' and less 'administrative' its constitutional role.

The multi-functional, elected local authorities with which Britain entered the modern era derived their funding from three sources. The first was grants from central government. The second was income from trading operations, especially rents from council houses. The third was a locally levied property tax, colloquially known as 'the rates', paid by local businesses and householders.

As table 10.1 suggests, the trend during the twentieth century until 1980 was for an increasingly larger part of local government's income to be central government grant. By the mid-1970s over 40% of a council's income came from grants; barely 25% derived from the rates.

One reason for this heavy financial input from central government lay in the need to avoid massive inequality in service provision between various councils. Local authorities obviously cover very different areas. There can be significant discrepancies both in their wealth and their needs for welfare services. In general, poorer areas will need more services but have less capacity to pay for them than more affluent regions. Central grants were allocated according to various complex formulae which tried to take these factors into account—in effect the process involved a transfer of wealth from richer to poorer areas to enable all councils to meet minimum standards of service provision

But while greater central funding may enhance equality, it threatens local authorities' political independence from central government. If a council could levy and spend only the funds which central government provided, the local electoral process would be a mere charade; the constitution might just as well provide for a local office of a central government department to administer whatever services central government wished to offer, and abolish local elections altogether.

Several steps were taken to reduce this risk. From the 1950s onwards,³² central grants were paid in a 'block', rather than being earmarked for specific services. This permitted councils to prioritise expenditure on different activities according to their particular political preferences. More significant was the apparent existence of a conventional rule that central government would not use statute to limit the revenue that local authorities raised through the rates. The question of local taxation levels was presumed to be a matter for a council and its electors. If rates were too high, the appropriate means to reduce them was for local electors to vote the party controlling the council out of office, and replace it with a party committed to lower levels of expenditure on local services. Central

Table 10.1 Sources of local authority income 1945–1975

| Year | Income (£m) | Rates % | Grants % | Trading operations % |
|------|-------------|---------|----------|----------------------|
| 1950 | 966 | 34 | 34 | 32 |
| 1955 | 1415 | 33 | 36 | 31 |
| 1960 | 2182 | 33 | 37 | 30 |
| 1966 | 3767 | 33 | 38 | 29 |
| 1970 | 5511 | 31 | 40 | 29 |

Source: Extracted from data in Layfield/DoE (1976) Local government finance.

³² Loughlin (1994) op cit.

government might request an authority to keep its rates within certain limits; it might negotiate about total spending plans and the amounts allocated to particular services; it might even threaten to reduce the grants it provided; but it did not ask Parliament to place legal limits on councils' tax levying 'independence'.

The significance of Parliament's conventional self-restraint on the question of local taxation was forcefully stressed by Jennings in 1960:

Local authorities are elected by the people of the area not to carry out as agents of the central government the policy of that government, but to carry out the policy of the electors of the area. The furtherance of that policy needs expenditure, and for the expenditure and the means of meeting it the local authority is again responsible, not to the central government... but to the electors.... The importance of this principle cannot be overestimated.... so long as the rating power is independent of [central government] control, local government as a whole must be, to a large extent, independent.³³

One must beware of exaggerating this degree of 'independence'. Indeed, independence is perhaps an inappropriate word to use here. 'Autonomy' may be a better term to describe local government's constitutional relationship vis-à-vis central government, given that so substantial a proportion of its financial resources derived from central grants. But 'autonomy' is a complicated concept. Its extent may depend as much on precisely how a council is permitted to spend its resources as on the amount of revenue itself. To explore this issue, we must examine the legal framework regulating council behaviour in rather more detail.

IV. The role of the judiciary

Councils are statutory creations, susceptible to judicial review to ensure that the powers that Parliament has granted them are not exceeded. However the absence of explicit legal limits on a council's rate levying power typified a general trend in legislation defining local government powers before 1980. Many local government statutes were drafted in very loose language, reflecting the fact that Parliament accepted both the need for local variation in service provision, and the competence of elected councillors to reach those exact decisions.

Consequently, we can find several important cases which suggest that the courts might be reluctant to apply the ultra vires doctrine to councils acting under loosely drafted statutes. In Kruse v Johnson,³⁴ the local authority had passed a bye-law³⁵ making it an offence to play an instrument on the highway within 50 yards of a dwelling house if asked to stop by an occupant or constable. The bye-law apparently expressed the wish of local electors to maintain peace and quiet in their neighbourhoods. Kruse was charged with the offence, but raised in his defence the assertion that the bye-law was invalid because it was 'unreasonable'. In addressing this question, the Court held that because councils were elected bodies accountable to their voters, bye-laws should be 'benevolently' interpreted. While a bye-law would be ultra vires if unreasonable, unreasonable bore a special meaning in this context. The substance of a decision would only be ultra vires if it was ³³ (1960) op cit pp 184–186.

³⁴ [1898] 2 QB 91.

³⁵ In effect a piece of delegated legislation whose geographical reach was confined within the council's boundaries.

‘manifestly unjust; or contained elements of bad faith or fraud; or involved gratuitous and oppressive interference with citizens’ rights’.³⁶

This expansive concept of substantive reasonableness in relation to local authority discretion was reiterated in 1948 in Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corpn, a case briefly noted in chapter three.³⁷ In Wednesbury, the Court of Appeal refused to interfere with a council decision to use its statutory power to licence cinemas to prohibit children from attending shows on Sundays. The Court considered the policy was well within the range of opinions that reasonable people might hold. The courts should only invalidate the substance of such a decision if it was so grossly unreasonable that no reasonable person could have thought it within the powers conferred by the Act.

These two cases both seemed to accept that the courts should be slow to question the merits of council policy decisions. Their rationale appears to be that Parliament has entrusted these democratically elected bodies to govern their particular areas in certain fields. This process necessarily involves the making of value judgements about political issues, a task which, in accordance with traditional notions of the separation of powers, one might reasonably assume that politicians are better equipped to make than judges. But Kruse and Wednesbury co-existed with another line of cases in which judges placed more restrictive limits on a council’s power to pursue its preferred policies. The best known is Roberts v Hopwood, a case which reached the House of Lords in 1925.

The ‘fiduciary duty’ doctrine revisited (and subverted?)

Poplar Council, a small inner-London authority, was controlled by a radical faction of the Labour Party in the 1920s. The councillors had an uneasy relationship with central government over their social policies. This conflict came to a head when the council decided to pay all its employees a flat rate wage much higher than that offered for similar private sector jobs or by many other local authorities.³⁸

Section 62 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 empowered the council to pay its employees ‘such wages as it thought fit’. The council assumed this meant either that there were no limits on its discretion, or at most, that its policy should be ‘benevolently’ interpreted per Kruse. This was the view taken by the Court of Appeal in Roberts.

However the House of Lords decided that the council’s apparently unfettered statutory power to pay ‘such wages as it thinks fit’ was subject to a common law ‘fiduciary duty’ to local ratepayers, analogous to the duty a limited company owes to its shareholders, or trustees owe to the trust’s beneficiaries. As noted above, this principle emerged within British constitutional law in order to protect the interests of the local population against the behaviour of electorally unaccountable municipal office holders. The origins of the principle seem to have been either overlooked or disregarded in the House of Lords. Neither Aspinall nor Wilson was cited in any of the opinions delivered by the Court. As construed by the House of Lords in Roberts, the fiduciary duty doctrine apparently required that local authorities be construed as businesses, operating on a profit and loss basis, rather than as governments which can redistribute wealth in whatever way attracts electoral support. The House of Lords characterised Poplar’s policy as the pursuit of ‘eccentric principles of socialist philanthropy’. Councillors should not allow their personal political or philosophical preferences to influence their policy choices.

This reasoning entirely ignores the argument that giving effect to local partisan political preferences is one of the main justifications for having elected sub-central government

³⁶ [1898] 2 QB 91 at 99.

³⁷ [1948] 1 KB 223, [1947] 2 All ER 680.

³⁸ [1925] AC 578, HL. For background to the case see Keith-Lucas B (1962) ‘Poplarism’ Public Law 52; Jones G (1973) ‘Herbert Morrison and Poplarism’ Public Law 11.

in a democratic unitary state. The decision attracted a stinging rebuke from Harold Laski, then a professor at the LSE:

the council's theory of what is 'reasonable' in the exercise of discretion is, even though affirmed by its constituents, seemingly inadmissible if it does not square with the economic preconceptions of the House of Lords; it is, it appears, a function of the courts to protect the electorate from the consequences of its own ideas.³⁹

Several Poplar councillors were gaoled for contempt of court after refusing to amend their policies.⁴⁰ However, central government (then Conservative-controlled) considered this an extreme sanction, and introduced legislation enabling councillors who approved unlawful expenditure to be personally surcharged and disqualified from office for five years.⁴¹

Conclusion

One might safely suggest that judicial supervision of council policy-making in the first half of the twentieth century displayed both very expansive and extraordinarily stunted⁴² perceptions of local government's role in a modern, 'democratic' state. The next section adds more historical flesh to this analytical skeleton by examining how central government and judicial control of local authorities was exercised in the Butskellite era in respect of one of the most important areas of council activity: the provision of housing.

V. Council housing

By 1974, the council sector contained over six million properties and housed seventeen million people.⁴³ Council housing performed several governmental functions in the Butskellite era in addition to the obvious concern of providing reasonable quality, low-cost accommodation for individual families. The 1945 Labour government regarded an expanding council sector as a useful tool for wealth redistribution. Conservative administrations were less attached to this principle, but shared enthusiasm for public housing's role in shaping the environment. And both parties found the labour intensive nature of house building a useful tool to regulate overall demand in the economy.

The public sector's style and scope varied considerably across the country. Local discretion over such macro-issues as stock size and design was not formally structured by tightly defined legislative rules;⁴⁴ decisions on such matters were largely determined by local election results. The absence of a precise legal framework might appear peculiar ³⁹ Laski H (1926) 'Judicial review of social policy in England' Harvard LR 832 at p 844. For a retrospective view see Fennel P (1986) 'Roberts v Hopwood: the rule against socialism' JLS 401.

⁴⁰ See Branson N (1979) Poplarism.

⁴¹ Board of Guardians (Default) Act 1926; Audit (Local Authorities) Act 1927. For comment see Keith-Lucas op cit.

⁴² This is perhaps best illustrated by Lord Sumner's comment in Roberts that the limits of a council's discretion was reached in such matters as deciding 'the necessity for a urinal, and the choice of its position'; [1925] AC 578 at 605, HL.

⁴³ For an overview of public sector development see Bowley M (1985) Housing and the state 1919-1945 ch 1; Merret S (1979) State housing in Britain; Malpass P and Murie A (1987) Housing policy and practice (1987) ch 2; Forrest R and Murie A (1988) Selling the welfare state ch 2.

⁴⁴ Although in the 1960s central government 'encouraged' councils to build particular types of dwelling, and to meet minimum (and, subsequently, maximum) standards of space and amenity provision, by variations in the financial support it offered; see Cullingworth J (1979) Essays on housing policy ch 1; Malpass and Murie op cit pp 78-81.

given council housing's important role in central government economic and land development policy. Legal compulsion was however largely unnecessary; councils formulated policies in close consultation with Ministers and civil servants at the Ministry of Housing and Local Government (MHLG) and (subsequently) the Department of the Environment (DoE), in a process which typified the consensual, negotiatory ethos informing central–local government relations between 1945–1970.

However, the 'national-local government system'⁴⁵ which dominated housing policy did not offer tenants any significant legal or political control over the management of their homes. Parliament's allocation of power to local authorities in this area was a paradigmatic example of 'green light theory', which afforded individual citizens few legal 'rights'. The Housing Act 1936 had simply placed the 'general management, regulation and control' of public housing within the discretion of the local authority with no discernible substantive or procedural constraints. With respect both to macro-issues such as the number and types of dwellings built, and to such micro-questions as allocation mechanisms, rent levels, maintenance standards, tenancy conditions, and management styles, council discretion was not closely regulated by statute.

Nor were the courts eager to subject local authorities' housing powers to the Wednesbury principles of substantive and procedural ultra vires. In Shelley v LCC,⁴⁶ the plaintiff was a tenant summarily served with an eviction notice. Shelley had no opportunity to argue against eviction, nor was evidence offered of any breach of the tenancy agreement. The council's decision would thus seem both procedurally and substantively ultra vires. The House of Lords however declined to intervene, asserting that housing authorities could 'pick and choose their tenants at will',⁴⁷ and evict them in similar fashion. Thirty years later, the judgments in Bristol District Council v Clark and *Cannock Chase District Council v Kelly*⁴⁸ confirmed the Shelley rationale; tenants had no recognisable rights in their housing.

Both Parliament and the courts adopted a similarly non-directive role over the issue of the rents that councils charged. Section 83 of the Housing Act 1936 required that rents be 'reasonable'. This did not make it clear to what extent councils might 'subsidise' rents from local taxation. In Belcher v Reading Corpn,⁴⁹ the Court held that 'reasonableness' required councils to balance tenants' interests, (the presumed beneficiaries of public subsidy), with those of ratepayers (the supposed financiers of the subsidy). Romer J held that rent levels would be unreasonably high only if significantly more costly than similar private sector dwellings.⁵⁰ Tenants thus had no legal right to subsidised rents. Belcher nevertheless upheld local authorities' politically accepted role to use rent policies to ameliorate market forces—council house rents would be unreasonably low, and thus breach the council's fiduciary duty, only if significantly less expensive than comparable private dwellings. The decision thus took a more 'benevolent' view of local fiscal autonomy than Roberts v Hopwood.

Litigation over council tenancies presented the courts both with a question of administrative law between an authority and its tenants, and a question of constitutional convention concerning local autonomy from central control. The 'hands-off' approach adopted ⁴⁵ See Loughlin (1985a) 'The restructuring of central–local government legal relations' Local Government Studies 59; Hampson op cit ch 9; and more exhaustively Rhodes R (1986) The national world of local government.

⁴⁶ [1949] AC 56, [1948] 2 All ER 898, HL.

⁴⁷ [1949] AC 56 at 66.

⁴⁸ [1975] 1 WLR 1443, [1975] 3 All ER 976, CA and, [1978] 1 WLR 1, [1978] 1 All ER 152, CA.

⁴⁹ [1950] Ch 380. See also Summerfield v Hampstead Borough Council [1957] 1 WLR 167, [1957] 1 All ER 221; Luby v Newcastle-under-Lyme Corpn [1965] 1 QB 214, [1964] 3 All ER 169, CA.

⁵⁰ [1950] Ch 380 at 392.

by both Parliament and the courts towards public housing administration reflected the wider norms regulating central-local government relations between 1945–1975. Tightly drafted statutes or interventionist case law would have overridden the traditional expectation that councils should govern their local areas, rather than simply administer centrally defined services on an agency basis. The inference one might draw from this is that legalisation of council/tenant relations might have to await a redefinition of the constitutional relationship between central and local government. Such a redefinition appeared to occur in 1972.

The Housing Finance Act 1972

Notwithstanding its evident commitment to principles of local fiscal autonomy prior to introducing the Local Government Bill 1972 to the Commons, the Heath government adopted a more directive policy towards rental levels in the Housing Finance Act 1972. This legislation sought to raise council house rents to levels analogous to those in the private rented sector, while providing rent rebates to poorer tenants. For many councils, this required a substantial rent increase. The government had anticipated that many councils might not wish to implement this legislation; consequently, the Act also gave the DoE stringent enforcement powers against obstructive authorities.⁵¹

Several Labour-controlled councils threatened not to apply the Act. Only one authority eventually refused to do so. Clay Cross council in Derbyshire, whose eleven councillors were all Labour Party members, resolutely refused to raise rents.⁵² DoE attempts to persuade the councillors to implement the Act failed, and they were subsequently surcharged and disqualified. At the subsequent election, local voters returned eleven new Labour councillors, all committed to maintaining the unlawful policy. The conflict was eventually resolved indirectly, in that Clay Cross was one of the many authorities merged into larger councils when the Local Government Act 1972 came into force in 1974.

The Clay Cross episode raises interesting questions both about the relationship between law and convention, and about the nature of the central/local government partnership convention itself. There is no doubt that the Clay Cross councillors broke the law. In that legalistic sense, the council's behaviour was obviously unconstitutional. In terms of convention, the picture is less clear. The traditional approach to housing policy had been that local authorities should have considerable freedom to set rent levels. Thus the Clay Cross councillors considered the Housing Finance Act to be conventionally 'unconstitutional'. Relatedly, they regarded their own illegal refusal to implement the Act as entirely legitimate. The practical difficulty which this stance presented for them was of course that they could not draw on the Heath government's alleged breach of convention as a defence in legal actions arising from their own breach of the law.

Nor was it clear that convention was on the council's side. There is no great weight of historical practice supporting the notion that councils might legitimately defy the law so flagrantly. From the perspective of conventional practice, the 'constitutional' course of action for the council to follow would have been (reluctantly) to have enforced the Act and hope that the Heath government's breach of convention would lead voters to turn it out of office at the next general election.

The objection to such a strategy is that it suggests the disputed policy is tolerable to the factions which oppose it, and thereby dilutes or diffuses popular antagonism to central government's preferences. One then faces the argument that had the American revolutionaries, or the 1832 electoral reformers, or the Suffragettes adopted similarly quiescent tactics, they might not have achieved the results we would now regard as entirely justified. It may of course be argued that the issue of local electoral control of council house rents in 1972 is qualitatively distinct from the enfranchisement struggles of the 1770s, 1830s, and 1900s: we might assume that 'democracy' within the British constitution is a concept that reached its fullest expression in 1930, when all adults became entitled to vote in parliamentary elections. From that perspective, there would be no justification for any defiance of any statute, for one would remain at liberty to argue and campaign for its repeal. This is a question to which we will return.

⁵¹ Which the courts proved reluctant to question; see Asher v Secretary of State for the Environment [1974] Ch 208, [1974] 2 All ER 156, CA.

⁵² Mitchell A (1974) 'Clay Cross' 45 Political Quarterly 165–175; Sklair L (1975) 'The struggle against the Housing Finance Act', in Miliband R and Smith J (eds) Socialist Register.

VI. From 'ambivalence' to 'authoritarianism'

It is difficult to draw firm conclusions about the constitutional position of local government in the period up to 1980. It is tempting simply to categorise central–local relations in the post-war era as a 'partnership' model,⁵³ in which governments of both parties adhered to a principle of constitutional morality which accepted that elected local authorities should enjoy appreciable political freedom, and should be persuaded rather than legally compelled to follow central government preferences on those occasions when central government regarded uniformity as desirable. From this viewpoint, we might plausibly conclude that the constitution did indeed by 1975 contain a convention that legislative majorities should generally tolerate a significant, geographically defined separation of powers—that parliamentary self-restraint in deference to the preservation of political pluralism had, as a matter of 'tradition and settled practice', become a matter of fundamental moral significance.

We should however recall that there was considerable consensus between the main political parties on major issues in this period. It is not politically intolerable from central government's perspective for Parliament to maintain a legal structure which allows local councils to pursue their own preferred policies over such important issues as housing if those policies diverge only mildly from central preferences. But in situations where that divergence was significant it is clear that central government would try to invoke formal legal powers in an attempt to force councils to comply with its wishes. Anthony Crosland, a member of Harold Wilson's Cabinets, offered a more cynical explanation of Ministers' attitudes towards local autonomy:

On the one hand, they genuinely believe the ringing phrases they use about how local government should have more power and freedom.... On the other hand a Labour government hates it when Tory councils pursue education or housing policies of which it disapproves, and exactly the same is true of a Tory government with a Labour council. This ambivalence exists in everybody I know who is concerned with relations between central and local government.⁵⁴

The 'ambivalence' adverted to by Crosland swung markedly in favour of greater central control by 1975. Both the Heath (Conservative) government in 1970 to 1974, and the Wilson and Callaghan's Labour administrations between 1974 and 1979 had been much concerned to control public expenditure in response to an economic crisis. Many areas of government activity, including local authority service provisions, were cut back. The Labour governments sought to control council expenditure through the negotiatory model of central/local relations. Authorities were requested or cajoled to reduce spending, but were not legally obliged to do so. Relatedly, the amount of tax revenue that a council raised was left to be determined at local elections.

⁵³ See Loughlin (1985a) op cit.

⁵⁴ Quoted in Bogdanor V (1976) 'Freedom in education' Political Quarterly 149–156.

Wilson's government had established a Committee of Inquiry (the Layfield Committee) to investigate local government finance. Layfield suggested that the issue raised profound questions about the nature of British democracy. Close central control over finance and meaningful political diversity could not co-exist. A choice as to which was the more important moral value was required. Layfield's preference was clear: '[T]he only way to sustain a vital local democracy is to enlarge the share of local taxation in total local revenue'.⁵⁵

The Labour government appeared unwilling to accept the pluralist argument. The 1977 DoE policy paper, Local government finance, analysed local government's role in a way which relegated localised forms of democracy almost to an afterthought.⁵⁶ The 1979–1983 Conservative government also wished to reduce local authority spending, but for the Thatcher government tight control of local government expenditure was one part of a systematic attempt to restructure the constitution's conventional basis.

The first Thatcher administration rejected the Keynesian orthodoxies favoured by previous Labour and Conservative administrations. It adhered instead to a Hayekian philosophy stressing a much reduced social and economic role for state institutions.⁵⁷ This philosophy entailed substantial reductions in public expenditure on welfare services, areas where local authorities traditionally exercised significant responsibilities and enjoyed appreciable discretion. The Thatcher administration was also determined to impose its preferred moral principles on all levels of government.

This authoritarian outlook did not fit easily with the pluralist model of central/local relations. Nor did it reflect the wishes of even a small majority of the electorate. In the UK as a whole, the Thatcher government had the support of barely 33% of eligible voters. In Scotland, Wales and northern England its levels of support were under 25%. The geographical fragmentation of support for Thatcherism was reinforced by the fact that many local authorities were controlled by opposition parties: the Conservatives suffered further considerable losses in the local government elections of 1980 and 1981.⁵⁸ But the limited nature of the 'consent' which 'Thatcherism' enjoyed did not persuade the government that it should moderate its wishes to impose its policies on the entire country. For local authorities, this absence of governmental self-restraint had profound consequences.

The legitimacy of the Thatcher government's plans lay partly in the argument that local authorities were not really 'democratic' institutions. Turnout for local elections since 1945 was low: it rarely exceeded 50%, and in 1975 fell below 33% in England. This compares unfavourably with turnout in general elections, which averaged 70%–80% since 1945.⁵⁹ The Thatcher administrations suggested these figures revealed a 'silent majority' of local electors who needed to be 'saved' by national government from the unrepresentative, extremist views of the small minority of political activists controlling local councils.⁶⁰ Given that the Thatcher governments had themselves attracted the support of barely one third of the national electorate, such arguments might not appear to withstand ⁵⁵ Layfield/DoE (1976) Report of the Committee of Enquiry into local government finance, p 300 (Cmd 6453).

⁵⁶ See para 2.3.

⁵⁷ See particularly Hall S (1983) 'The great moving right show', in Hall and Jacques op cit.

⁵⁸ See Butler D, Adonis A and Travers T (1994) Failure in British government: the politics of the poll tax, p 29.

⁵⁹ For detailed figures see the first edition of this book at pp 428–429.

⁶⁰ See Jenkins J (1987) 'The green sheep in Colonel Gadaffi Drive' New Society, 9 January 1987.

close scrutiny. The government nonetheless chose to ‘protect’ local people from elected councils by substantially reducing the powers that authorities could wield.

VII. Financial ‘reform’ 1: grant penalties and ratecapping

The Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 introduced ‘grant penalties’. The DoE calculated a total spending plan for each authority. Councils were not legally obliged to respect the spending target, but if expenditure exceeded the DoE’s expenditure target, the DoE withdrew a specified amount of grant. This meant that ratepayers had to finance both 100% of extra expenditure and the resultant loss of grant.

Many councils nevertheless continued to spend at higher levels than the DoE wished. Consequently, the Local Government Finance Act 1982 increased the rate of grant withdrawal. From the government’s perspective, this measure was little more successful than its predecessor. Some councils simply imposed ever-higher rates on local voters, and so received ever-lower central government grants, yet still attracted electoral approval.

Some penalised authorities also initiated judicial review proceedings to challenge expenditure targets. This strategy met with mixed results. In R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Hackney London Borough Council,⁶¹ the council argued that expenditure targets should be attainable; if the reductions could not be achieved without large cuts in services, surely the target must be substantively ultra vires? The court refused to enter what it saw as essentially a political dispute between central and local government; this was evidently another non-justiciable issue. Subsequently, in Nottinghamshire County Council v Secretary of State for the Environment,⁶² the House of Lords indicated that it had no wish to enter this political controversy. Lord Templeman observed that judicial review was not ‘just a move in an interminable game of chess’; rather than commence litigation, councils should ‘bite on the bullet’ and govern their areas within whatever financial constraints the DoE thought appropriate. Notwithstanding the courts’ reluctance to participate in this dispute, the DoE rapidly concluded that the grant penalties system was not very effective either in curbing council expenditure or in ‘persuading’ local electorates not to vote for high spending parties. Some councils overcame the threat of penalties by raising rates to such high levels that they no longer received any grant at all. That situation presumably enhances a council’s accountability to its local electorate, given that voters would pay almost the entire cost of locally provided services. It would also seem to insulate a council from central government control; threats to withdraw grant will not work if councils receive no grant anyway. Thus the government introduced more direct methods to curb council expenditure.

Ratecapping

The post-revolutionary constitution seemed always to have harboured a conventional rule that Parliament would not impose direct legal limits on a council’s power to raise revenue through the rates. The grant penalties legislation undermined that convention. In the Rates Act 1984, the Thatcher government cast it aside. The 1984 Act introduced the practice of ‘ratecapping’. This simply permitted the DoE to impose a ceiling on the amount of rates revenue a council could raise. The new control was placed on income rather than expenditure. Twenty authorities were originally targeted for capping; eighteen were Labour controlled.

⁶¹ (1985) Times, 11 May, CA.

⁶² [1986] AC 240, [1986] 1 All ER 199, CA.

The 'democratic' implications of ratecapping were profound; local voters wishing to choose a council providing extensive services simply could not do so, even if they were prepared to finance such services through increased local taxation. They might vote for any party they chose, but their chosen councillors could raise only that amount of revenue which central government deemed appropriate.⁶³

The government had some difficulty in pushing the 1984 Act through Parliament. A few Conservative MPs, and rather more Conservative peers, felt the Act would take too much power away from local authorities and their voters. They shared the sentiments of opposition parties that local government's conventional status as an independent political organ was being too severely undermined. But with a Commons majority of 140, the government's problems in the lower house were only minor, particularly as ready resort was made to the guillotine to stifle debate.⁶⁴ In the Lords, opposition, cross-bench and some Conservative peers were sufficiently alarmed by the 1984 Bill's anti-pluralist implications to mount a determined amendment campaign, which on occasion reduced the government's majority to single figures.⁶⁵ The Bill nevertheless emerged virtually unscathed. The focus of political opposition then shifted to its implementation.

Some Labour councils attacked the Rates Act as constitutionally illegitimate, and resolved to refuse to apply it. They hoped that widespread defiance would trigger a constitutional crisis which would force the government to return to the conventional, fiscally pluralist model of central-local relations. As the deadline for compliance approached, however, support for illegal defiance melted away. Only two councils eventually refused to abide by the Act's provisions—the London borough of Lambeth and Liverpool city council.⁶⁶ Many Lambeth and Liverpool councillors were eventually surcharged and disqualified from office as a result of their non-compliance.

Given the utter inconsistency of the ratecapping principle with conventional understandings of local government's constitutional role, it is understandable that several authorities declined to take Lord Templeman's earlier advice to 'bite the bullet' of government decisions which denied their electorates the power to vote for local services to be administered as they preferred. Both Birmingham and Greenwich councils initiated successful judicial review proceedings against ratecapping in 1986.⁶⁷ But these proved short-lived successes. The government had by now tired of defending its policies in the courts; judicial review was a time-consuming process, in which favourable outcomes could apparently not be guaranteed. Consequently, the government began to respond to defeats in the courts by promoting retrospective legislation.

The highly unconventional constitutional character of retrospective legislation has already been adverted to.⁶⁸ The Thatcher government saw no impediment to using retrospective legislation to curb local government's financial independence; what had previously been regarded as a presumptively 'unconstitutional' exercise of Parliament's sovereign power, invoked on a cross-party basis in response to extraordinary situations, had become a routinised, partisan feature of government policy.⁶⁹

⁶³ On the background to the Bill, and for a detailed description of its mechanics, see Jackman R (1984) 'The Rates Bill: a measure of desperation' Political Quarterly 161. For a more economic analysis see Wilson T (1988) 'Local freedom and central control—a question of balance', in Bailey S and Paddison R (eds) The reform of local government finance in Britain. ⁶⁴ See Loughlin (1994) op cit at n 49.

⁶⁵ See Welfare op cit. ⁶⁶ Butler, Adonis and Travers op cit p 65.

⁶⁷ R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Birmingham City Council (15 April 1986, unreported); R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Greenwich London Borough Council (17 December 1986, unreported). Neither case is reported, but both are noted in Loughlin (1994) op cit.

⁶⁸ See 'VII. Retrospective law-making.' ch 3, pp 78–83 above.

⁶⁹ Much like it seems, the use of Henry VIII clauses.

Grant penalties and ratecapping comprised the first two phases of the Thatcher governments' efforts to redefine conventional constitutional understandings about central–local financial relations. We address the third phase below. Before doing so however, we devote some further attention to the courts' role in determining the limits of local authorities' political and economic autonomy.

VIII. Collective politics and individual rights: the judicial role

A notable consequence of the grant penalty and ratecapping policies was that it became a normal aspect of central–local relations for councils to challenge the legality of government action. Between 1945 and 1980 it was rare for disagreements between central and local government to be resolved in this way.⁷⁰ Disputes were generally settled through negotiations which eventually produced acceptable compromise. After 1980, such compromises proved less readily attainable. But the so-called 'juridification'⁷¹ of the financial relationship between central and local government was not the only issue relating to local democracy in which the courts were embroiled.

'Fares fair': Bromley London Borough Council v Greater London Council

While most of the country had waited until the Local Government Act 1972 for its Victorian local government structures to be modernised, local government in London was overhauled in the mid-1960s. Many small councils were abolished, and new larger authorities created. The London county council was also replaced by a strategic council with limited functions for the entire capital. The 'Greater London Council' (GLC) assumed responsibility for, among other things, public transport systems, waste collection, major planning proposals and housing provision. An elected 'Inner London Education Authority' (ILEA) was also created, with wide-ranging education functions. The GLC's creation was the result of a prolonged process of negotiation, initiated by a Royal Commission investigation. The Commission's proposals were subsequently introduced as a Bill and, following substantial amendment in response to the wishes of the opposition and various local authorities, enacted in 1965.⁷²

The GLC's most noteworthy policy in the 1980s attempted to shift the burden of transport provision in London away from cars towards greater use of buses, tubes, and trains. The GLC's transport role was set out in the London (Transport) Act 1969, a statute introduced by Wilson's second Labour government. Section 1 required the GLC to provide an 'economic, efficient and integrated' transport system for Greater London. The Act did not give the GLC direct control of London's bus and underground networks; rather it created a body called the London Transport Executive (LTE) to co-ordinate and manage services. Following the 'green light' philosophy then prevailing in parliamentary circles, the 1969 Act did not specify precisely how the LTE should operate; but s 7 indicated that the LTE should as far as practicable avoid making a financial loss in successive years. The Act envisaged that the LTE and the GLC would work closely together, and in particular s 3 empowered the GLC to make grants to the LTE for 'any purpose'.

At this point we might ask what 'purposes' the 1969 Parliament intended London Transport to serve. From a social democratic perspective, the system might be seen as a social service, with operating losses subsidised by ratepayers. By encouraging people to ⁷⁰ Loughlin (1985) op cit; (1994) op cit.

⁷¹ The term is Martin Loughlin's; see (1985) op cit.

⁷² See Hampson op cit, pp 23–26.

use trains and buses rather than cars one presumably reduces traffic congestion and air pollution, speeds up journey times, reduces overcrowding on trains, and makes public transport a more pleasant and reliable way to travel to work and to leisure activities. An alternative, Hayekian view would see London Transport as a business like any other, providing a system that made an overall profit. If the LTE or GLC wanted to run loss-making routes, they would have to subsidise them through profits on other routes, not by taking subsidies from ratepayers.

Scrutiny of the Act, and of Hansard, indicates that Wilson's government was unclear about its preferences. When introducing the Bill, the sponsoring Minister had said that:

... the GLC might wish ... the LTE to run services at a loss for social or planning reasons. It might wish to keep fares down at a time when costs are rising and there is no scope for economies. It is free to do so. But it has to bear the costs.⁷³

But the Minister also stressed that the LTE should attempt to break even. Consequently, one could find neither a legislative nor governmental answer to the crucial question of whether the GLC could use s 3 to cancel out successive deficits the LTE might incur if it ran London Transport as a 'social service' rather than a 'business'.

In its manifesto for the 1981 GLC elections, Labour put forward a programme (called 'Fares Fair') to increase bus and tube services, and simultaneously cut fares by 25%. 'Fares Fair' would cost £120 million per year; a sum comprising a £69 million operating deficit, and a £50 million loss in central government grant because the programme took the GLC over its expenditure target. The Labour group planned to raise this money by levying a special rate on all the London boroughs.

Labour won a majority in the GLC elections. A legal challenge to Fares Fair was immediately launched by the Conservative controlled Bromley council, a suburban London borough liable to pay the supplementary rate. The issue before the Court was straightforward: what had Parliament meant when it ordered the GLC to maintain 'economic, efficient and integrated' transport services? Was London Transport a social service, heavily subsidised by London ratepayers? Or a business, whose primary concern should be to avoid operating losses? Or was that choice a matter for the GLC's elected representatives to make?

The House of Lords decided unanimously against the GLC.⁷⁴ The majority held that s 1's reference to an 'economic' service required the GLC to ensure that the LTE ran on a 'break even' basis. The GLC could use s 3 to provide a subsidy to make up for unforeseen losses, or to compensate for exceptional circumstances, but it was not 'economic' deliberately to adopt a s 3 subsidy policy which underwrote a long-term operating deficit. Lord Diplock adopted a slightly different argument. He considered that the argument over the first component of the policy's cost, the £69 million rating loss, was finely balanced. However he did not feel obliged to resolve this question, for the second element of the cost, the loss of £50 million of government grant, clearly breached the council's fiduciary duty to its ratepayers.

The judgments obviously owe much to the Roberts v Hopwood misapplication and subversion of the fiduciary duty doctrine. As in Roberts, the House of Lords did not consider that electoral approval had any bearing on the policy's legality. There is a temptation to explain the outcome of Bromley simply in terms of judicial bias; the GLC lost because a conservative House of Lords did not approve of cheap bus fares. This rather simplistic political reductionism (which in effect alleges that the courts are constantly engaged in an anti-Labour conspiracy which subverts the sovereignty of Parliament, the separation of powers, and conventional models of central-local relations) has attracted some support from authoritative commentators.⁷⁵ The argument is difficult to sustain. In respect of Bromley, one cannot avoid the conclusion that Wilson's government presented Parliament with an ambiguous Bill, which neither house clarified. The Act's text lent itself to two irreconcilable interpretations; it is unsurprising that the judiciary favoured the more fiscally conservative meaning.

⁷³ HCD 17 December 1968 cc 1247-1248.

⁷⁴ [1983] 1 AC 768.

Nevertheless, the re-emergence of the warped version of the fiduciary duty doctrine intensified the juridification process. The high profile it was afforded by Bromley led many councils routinely to seek counsel's opinions on the legality of their expenditure plans.⁷⁶ Yet it was not simply questions of fiscal autonomy that made local government such a significant area of constitutional controversy in the 1980s.

IX. Institutional 'reform'; the abolition of the GLC and metropolitan counties

The Local Government Act 1985 was a straightforward measure to abolish the GLC. The commitment to do this was belatedly slipped into the Conservative Party's 1983 election manifesto by the Prime Minister.⁷⁷ The governmental investigations preceding the creation of the GLC had spanned several years and comprised several thousand pages of investigation and proposals. The DoE report recommending abolition, Streamlining the cities,⁷⁸ took two months to produce, spanned thirty-one pages, and involved no significant consultation with opposition parties, local authorities, or the people of London. Its recommendation was that the council should be abolished and its functions given to the London boroughs or boards appointed by central government. The GLC was simply presumed to be an unnecessary tier of government, which added to bureaucracy without producing any worthwhile benefits.⁷⁹

The GLC campaigned skilfully against abolition. The campaign questioned the constitutional legitimacy of simply doing away with an elected local authority which represented over five million people, and on the technical efficiency of scrapping an authority which provided co-ordinated strategic services for one of the world's most important cities. The GLC attracted considerable public support. It also seemed that some Conservative MPs and many Conservative peers would vote against the government on this issue, as they had over ratecapping. The government's abolition timetable had two parts. The Local Government (Interim Provisions) Bill 1984 proposed that the GLC elections scheduled for May 1985 would be scrapped. Arrangements for transferring the GLC's powers to new bodies would not be effective until April 1986, and would be introduced in a subsequent Bill early in 1985. Parliament was thus being asked to approve the details of abolition before debating the merits of the central question. This procedural objection was compounded by the Bill's substantive effect. During the eleven-month gap between May 1985 and April 1986, the GLC's powers would be wielded by 'interim councils' based on the ⁷⁵ See Griffith J (1985) 'Judicial decision-making in public law' Public Law 564; Pannick D (1984) 'The Law Lords and the needs of contemporary society' Political Quarterly 318; McAuslan P (1983) 'Administrative law, collective consumption and judicial policy' MLR 1.

⁷⁶ Bridges L et al (1987) Legality and local politics.

⁷⁷ Butler, Adonis and Travers op cit pp 37–9.

⁷⁸ (1983) (Cmnd 9063).

⁷⁹ For an analysis of the motives behind abolition see O'Leary B (1987) 'Why was the GLC abolished?' International Journal of Urban and Regional Research 192; (1987) 'British farce, French drama and tales of two cities' Public Administration 369.

various London boroughs, which in effect would give the Conservative Party majority control of powers which the GLC's electorate had bestowed on the Labour Party.

The Lords inflicted a substantial defeat (191 votes to 143) on the government in Committee. The government then conceded that the existing GLC councillors could remain in office until the abolition in 1986.⁸⁰ The government did not however concede on the cancellation of the 1985 elections, presumably because it feared that London's voters might use it to signify massive popular disapproval of the abolition proposal. The Lords' stance did much to enhance its resurgent reputation; The Times hailed the government's defeat as 'a triumph for the principles of constitutionalism and specifically for the principle of a bicameral Parliament'.⁸¹ Upper house opposition continued when the abolition Bill itself was debated. An amendment creating an elected 'co-ordinating authority' to supervise all of the GLC's former powers was lost by only seventeen votes.

That the Bill was ultimately enacted virtually unscathed illustrates the fragility of conventional constitutional principles when they are opposed by a determined central government with a large Commons majority. The geographical boundaries of local government have been restructured many times before. But in the modern era, the process has not been conducted in so pre-emptory a way, nor on the basis of substantive terms prompting so much party political dispute and public opposition, and not without the creation of a new elected body to assume the powers of the abolished authorities.

X. Privatising local government

The abolition of the capital city's elected council is perhaps the most graphic example of local government's declining constitutional significance since 1980. But it is merely one part of a more complex tapestry. The GLC abolition Bill, seen in conjunction with the previous reforms to local government finance, was described in 1984 as the 'most determined assault on local government autonomy in recent history'.⁸² It is overly simplistic to suggest that this assault was 'anti-democratic' in nature. Rather it represented the triumph of a highly centralised, authoritarian perception of minoritarian democracy over a decentralised, consensual perception of pluralist democracy. This trend raises large questions as to the adequacy of Britain's contemporary constitutional arrangements; but before turning to that issue it is appropriate to examine several other legislative innovations enacted from the mid-1980s onwards.

The Widdicombe Report

The Widdicombe Committee of Inquiry into the Conduct of Local Authority Business,⁸³ was established by the DoE in 1985 following the GLC abolition imbroglio. The Committee's title perhaps hints at the kind of recommendations the government was hoping the report would produce—the concern apparently being more with 'business' than with 'government'. If so, the government was disappointed both by the Committee's investigations and its conclusions. Widdicombe identified an important role for party politics in the local ⁸⁰ See Welfare op cit; Shell (1992) op cit pp 168–173.

⁸¹ 30 June 1984; quoted in Shell (1992) op cit p 69.

⁸² Jackman op cit p 61.

⁸³ (1986) (Cmnd 9797). For comment see McAuslan P (1987) 'The Widdicombe Report: local government business or politics' Public Law 154.

government sector, and produced a package of recommendations which would seemingly have strengthened councils' capacities to pursue distinctive political agendas.⁸⁴

The resultant legislation, the Local Government and Housing Act 1989,⁸⁵ was highly selective in the principles it accepted from the Widdicombe report. The DoE policy statement which preceded the Act announced that the reforms were intended 'to ensure that local democracy and local accountability are substantially strengthened'.⁸⁶ However, the government defined 'democracy' in terms which increased the likelihood that the outcome of locally based decision-making procedures would accord with central government preferences.

Thus the Act responded to the fact that many Labour councillors were the employees of other councils by prohibiting such 'twin-tracking',⁸⁷ but refusing to accept that councillors should be paid for the tasks they performed. Relatedly, the Act created so-called 'politically restricted' posts in local authorities. Citizens employed in such jobs were not permitted to engage in such political activities as holding office in a political party, canvassing at elections, or speaking or writing in public in a way that might affect support for a political party. The Act made several other significant intrusions into local authorities' internal management processes, often by simply making provision for the DoE to issue regulations to control particular aspects of council behaviour. The Act exemplifies, as McAuslan suggests, a perception of democracy in a unitary state in which 'in so far as local government has a role in the governance of the United Kingdom... it is to carry out and obey central government policies in the manner required by central government'.⁸⁸

Forcing local government to conduct its activities along business lines is one method by which a government with a legislative majority can ensure that local electorates which prefer social democratic forms of government cannot vote for councils which can implement those principles. It is not however the only method. Rather than force elected councils to act like businesses, central government might simply decide to remove certain powers from the council sector altogether, and give them to individuals or bodies more likely to share central government's political predispositions. This following section examines how the Thatcher and Major governments applied this ideology to the management of council housing.

Housing—individuated and collective privatisation

A corollary of councils' traditional autonomy in the area of housing management was that neither Parliament nor the courts granted tenants legally enforceable rights against their landlords over the way that their homes were managed. Many councils evidently thought that tenants' 'rights' were unnecessary, considering councils' 'democratic accountability... a sufficient safeguard against any abuses'.⁸⁹ But by 1975, it was widely accepted that council house management could often justifiably be accused of inefficiency and insensitivity to tenants' wishes.⁹⁰

The Callaghan government's 1979 Housing Bill included a 'Tenant's Charter'. The Charter limited councils' eviction powers, forbade certain restrictive tenancy conditions, and would have required authorities to establish a Tenants' Committee which was to be ⁸⁴ See Leach S (1989) 'Strengthening local democracy? the government's response to Widdicombe', in Stewart J and Stoker G (eds) The future of local government.

⁸⁵ See Ganz G (1990) 'The depoliticisation of local authorities: the Local Government and Housing Act 1989, Part I' Public Law 224.

⁸⁶ DoE (1988) The conduct of local authority business p v.

⁸⁷ Except in respect of teachers.

⁸⁸ (1988) op cit pp 157–158.

⁸⁹ Cited in Laffin op cit, n 6, p 194.

⁹⁰ See for example Cullingworth op cit pp 38–47; Merret op cit, ch 8.

consulted on all aspects of housing management, including allocation policies and rent levels. The Bill fell with the Labour government in 1979.

The Tenants' Charter subsequently promoted by the first Thatcher government, enacted in the Housing Act 1980, superficially resembled Labour's Bill. The new legislation added a 'right to buy' for existing tenants, and dropped the Tenants' Committees proposal. The 1980 Act fundamentally recast the legal basis of a council's relationship with its tenants. In granting tenants legally enforceable rights, the Act necessarily curtailed local authority autonomy, at least at the formal level. From a functionalist perspective, however, the change did not appear to have either an immediate or a substantial effect.

A wide-ranging study of the Charter's implementation was carried out between 1980 and 1983 by the City University Housing Research Group (CUHRG).⁹¹ The Tenant's Charter was introduced with several other major housing initiatives. All authorities had to allocate considerable administrative resources to handling 'right to buy' sales; councils in London had the additional task of inheriting former GLC properties; and the entire local government sector was adjusting to the new financial regime created by the Local Government, Planning and Land Act. These various demands led councils to prioritise their housing management resources: CUHRG reported that many housing managers were concerned more with: 'coping with these other priorities and keeping their basic activities going, than with introducing the tenants' rights'.⁹² The survey's 'most striking' result was that many authorities did not realise that the Act's provisions were part of the tenancy agreement; only 56% of authorities had incorporated the Act's security of tenure requirements into their leases.⁹³ But in respect of the 'right to buy', a different picture emerged.

The right to buy

The Housing Act 1980's 'right to buy' entitled council tenants of three years standing to buy their home at a discount of 33% on its market value, with an extra 1% for each year of additional occupancy, to a 70% maximum. Over a million units were sold during the 1980s.

The right to buy was a controversial policy in 1980. Some Labour councils decided they did not want to apply it: several decided to make it difficult for tenants to become owner-occupiers.⁹⁴ The 1980 Act had given the DoE sweeping interventionist powers against authorities suspected of obstructing sales. Section 23 provided that where it appears, to the Minister, that the tenants are experiencing difficulty in buying their houses, the Minister may send in centrally appointed Housing Commissioners to take over the sales process.⁹⁵

Following complaints from tenants in Norwich, the Minister invoked s 23. The council challenged the use of this power, arguing it had deployed staff on other responsibilities which it was obliged to undertake and so there was nothing 'unreasonable' about the delays that tenants experienced. In Norwich City Council v Secretary of State for the Environment, the Court of Appeal characterised s 23 as: 'draconian... without precedent in legislation of this nature'.⁹⁶ But whether the council's action was reasonable was ⁹¹ Kay A, Legg C and Foot J (1985) The 1980 Tenant's Rights in Practice. ⁹² Ibid, at 18 and 22.

⁹³ Ibid, table 3.1.

⁹⁴ Ascher K (1983) 'The politics of administrative opposition—council house sales and the right to buy' Local Government Studies 12.

⁹⁵ An analysis of the power and subsequent case law is provided in Loughlin (1986) op cit n 44, pp 104–110.

⁹⁶ [1982] 1 All ER 737 at 748, per Kerr LJ. For an analysis of events see Murie and Maplass op cit pp 233–240.

irrelevant. The person whose conduct was in question was the Minister—was his intervention Wednesbury unreasonable? As no sales at all had been completed in Norwich in the first seven months of the Act being in force it would seem difficult to categorise his action in that way. His intervention was clearly a ‘legal’ exercise of executive power. Whether s 23 was itself a ‘legitimate’ exercise of legislative power is a different and more difficult question.

The right to buy enabled many less wealthy householders to become owners, and therefore to benefit from long-term increases in property values and to escape from a restrictive landlord-tenant relationship. The policy’s full impact on local government’s role as a housing provider is, however, only evident when one also considers central government policies towards the building of new council housing. The Thatcher administrations placed significant restrictions on new construction. Proceeds from the right to buy exceeded nine billion pounds by 1986. But councils were permitted to spend only a fraction of those receipts on new housing. Fewer council houses were built in the 1980s than in any decade since 1920. While over one million units were sold, only 330,000 were built.⁹⁷

‘Opting out’ and Housing Action Trusts

Nevertheless, over 20% of the population still lived in council houses in 1988. Few of these tenants could afford to buy their homes. Consequently the DoE sought other methods further to reduce the local authority’s landlord role. The Housing Act 1988 empowered tenants to ‘opt out’ of local authority control and ‘vote’ for a new, government approved landlord. Early votes indicated little tenant support for wholesale privatisation. This perhaps suggests that tenants, if not central government, continued to see councils as legitimate and desirable providers of subsidised housing.

Part III of the 1988 Act also introduced the ‘Housing Action Trust’ (HAT). HATs were government appointed boards which assumed control of public housing and land use planning in government designated inner-city areas. HATs were to act as temporary landlords, responsible for upgrading the housing and thereafter selling it, either to current occupants or new private sector landlords. HATs attracted little support from council tenants initially. Seven estates were originally targeted for HAT schemes. By late 1990, none had voted to leave council control. Several estates subsequently chose HAT status in 1991. This was perhaps not an entirely ‘free’ choice, in so far as prospective HATs were offered funds for refurbishment and redevelopment not available to local authorities.⁹⁸

‘Ring-fencing’ housing revenue accounts

Legislative initiatives also reduced local authorities’ traditionally loosely confined discretion to set rent levels. Significant reductions in DoE rent subsidies since 1980⁹⁹ compelled many councils to raise rents well above prevailing inflation rates. Councils’ scope to subsidise rents from their general revenue was obviously curbed by general DoE expenditure constraints during the 1980s. The Local Government and Housing Act 1989 reinforced this indirect pressure by ‘ring fencing’ councils’ housing budgets. Local authorities could no longer use their general revenue for housing purposes; council stock would have to ⁹⁷ See Loveland I (1992) ‘Square pegs, round holes: the “right” to council housing in the post-war era’ Journal of Law and Society 339.

⁹⁸ Owens R (1991) ‘If the HAT Fits’ ROOF 17 (November/December); Woodward R (1991) ‘Mobilising opposition: the campaign against housing action trusts in Tower Hamlets’ Housing Studies 44.

⁹⁹ Loughlin (1985) op cit p 104; Malpass and Murie op cit pp 110–113.

run on a 'break even' basis. Ring fencing provoked vigorous criticism from Labour and Conservative authorities. Many considered it an unwarranted, further limitation on council autonomy. Twenty authorities increased rents by over 30% in 1990, with Conservative controlled Canterbury DC and South Buckinghamshire DC levying 54% and 53% rises respectively.¹⁰⁰

Conclusion

The Thatcher and Major reforms to local authority housing provision system were concerned with curtailing ideological as well as fiscal pluralism, but it is frequently difficult to disentangle the two issues. The penultimate section of this chapter consequently returns to questions of local government finance, in discussing the rise and fall of the 'poll tax'.

XI. Financial 'reform' 2: the community charge

By 1980, the rates were seen by all political parties as having several defects. Since rates were levied on householders, many citizens were not legally obliged to pay them. Consequently many people were presumed to be immune from the financial consequences of voting for increased local authority spending. And since business ratepayers had no vote at all, their only way to register disapproval of council policies was to relocate—an often impractical option. A second flaw was that there was no direct link between the size of a rates bill and the services provided. Since rates were based primarily on property values, the amount a householder or business paid could depend more on the value of her house or shop than her council's spending plans. Thirdly, rates were not sensitively related to ability to pay. People could live in an expensive house but have only a limited income: the apocryphal little old lady living in her family home on a widow's pension is the obvious example. On the positive side, rates were easy to administer, and, since they were levied on properties not people, were difficult to evade. Rates reform was thus a popular but impractical political slogan. When Leader of the Opposition, Thatcher had promised her first administration would abolish the rates; that pledge was quietly forgotten.¹⁰¹ Indeed, the Thatcher government concluded in 1983 that: 'rates should remain for the foreseeable future the main source of local revenue for local government'.¹⁰²

Reform re-appeared on the political agenda in 1986, when a DoE report, Paying for Local Government, recommended replacing the rates with a 'community charge' or 'poll tax'. The government's volte-face seems to have been triggered by the evident failure of grant penalties and ratecapping to curb the spending of Labour controlled local authorities. The poll tax would be levied on a flat rate basis on everyone resident in a local authority area, and would thus require councils to compile a residence register. Some groups would be exempt, and there would be a limited rebate scheme for people on low incomes. Local councils would set the community charge for their respective voters; central government would set a uniform rate for businesses. Under the rates, councils had set both figures.

The government assumed that a flat rate, universal tax would convey to voters the true cost of electing a council providing expansive (and expensive) services. What is less clear ¹⁰⁰ See Ward M (1988) 'Priced out' (1988) Housing 9 (October); Warburton M and Malpass P (1991) 'Riding the rent rocket' ROOF 27 July/August.

¹⁰¹ Butler, Adonis and Travers op cit, p 22.

¹⁰² DoE (1983) Rates, p 14 (Cmnd 9008).

is whether the government intended that such transparency would ensure that local electoral choices would be made on the basis of fully informed consent (in which case they would presumably have to be respected as meaningful exercises in democratic practice), or whether it hoped that opposition parties would be 'priced out' of office.

As originally conceived, the community charge would not be subject to capping. This suggests that the government was willing to give local electorates unimpeded freedom to determine their council's expenditure. However when it became apparent that many councils still proposed to finance high spending through very high community charge levels, the government introduced capping powers into the Bill.¹⁰³ Charge capping seems completely inconsistent with the principle of increased political accountability between a council and its electorate. If a council is capped, voters who want lots of services and are prepared to pay for them cannot do so.

Furthermore, the poll tax's very nature suggests the latter objective was predominant. A flat rate tax is necessarily highly regressive—it falls with disproportionate severity on taxpayers with low incomes. This evidently led some Cabinet ministers, foremost among them Nigel Lawson, to regard it as an ill-advised venture. Leon Brittan (then Home Secretary) also voiced doubts, on the basis that compulsory registration for the tax might lead some people to 'disappear' from the electoral register to evade payment: the charge might thus be portrayed as a tax on voting. But in accordance with the unanimity limb of the convention of collective ministerial responsibility, neither Lawson nor Brittan resigned over the issue; their dissent was kept secret until they published their memoirs.

The Bill which eventually became the Local Government Finance Act 1988 met sustained opposition in the Commons and the Lords. In the Commons, the government's greatest difficulties were caused by one of its own backbenchers, Michael Mates, who moved an amendment relating the amount of poll tax levied to the individual's ability to pay. Government whips exerted considerable pressure on Mates to withdraw. When he declined to do so, they turned their attention (with more success) to Conservative MPs expressing support for the amendment. Notwithstanding such efforts at 'persuasion', thirty-eight Conservative MPs voted with Mates, while thirteen abstained.¹⁰⁴ In the Lords, a similar amendment was defeated by mobilising the backwoodsmen.¹⁰⁵ Local authorities' legal efforts to challenge the Act's implementation were unsuccessful.¹⁰⁶ However a more broadly-based political campaign against the poll tax proved considerably more effective.

A step too far? The demise of the poll tax

Many local authorities had opposed the poll tax because of its regressive nature and the threat that it posed to their political autonomy. This disquiet straddled party boundaries; Conservative councillors were among the fiercest of critics, some resigning the party whip in protest. Concern among councils increased markedly when they faced the prospect of collecting the tax.

¹⁰³ See Himsworth (1991) op cit.

¹⁰⁴ Butler, Adnois and Travers op cit pp 118–121.

¹⁰⁵ Welfare op cit.

¹⁰⁶ See R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council [1991] 1 AC 521, sub nom Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council v Secretary of State for the Environment [1990] 3 All ER 589; and more generally Himsworth op cit.

The legislation subjected householders to fines, initially of £50, and thereafter £10 per day, for not providing details of people living in their properties. If registered individuals refused to pay the tax, a local authority could seek a 'liability order' from the magistrates' court. This allowed councils to use various enforcement measures, including attachment of earnings, deductions from welfare benefits, and distress—an archaic remedy which enables private bailiffs to seize and sell a debtor's property. Refusal to pay the poll tax could (and did) ultimately lead to imprisonment.¹⁰⁷ Moreover, since the legislation made a designated individual liable for his/her spouse/cohabitee's payment, it was also possible to be jailed for someone else's non-payment.

The Labour Party had pledged to repeal the legislation if it won the next general election, but did not advocate non-payment. This reflected a legalistic interpretation of appropriate constitutional behaviour; how could the party present itself as an alternative government if it set a precedent for ignoring legislation, a precedent which might be used against future Labour administrations? Unofficially, however, many Labour Party members (including several MPs and many councillors) supported non-payment.

Opposition to the tax was magnified by a loose-knit group called the 'All-Britain Anti-Poll Tax Federation'.¹⁰⁸ Its leaders had links to far-left parties, but the membership appeared to cross party lines and included people who had not previously been politically active. The Federation's techniques included encouragement of non-payment, marches and demonstrations, offering legal assistance to individuals facing court action, and a practice called 'scum-busting', in which members formed a human barrier around the houses of people issued with liability orders, thereby preventing bailiffs from seizing goods.

Due in part to the success of the Federation's activities, non-payment rates reached 50% in some areas.¹⁰⁹ There was initially appreciable variation in the enthusiasm with which local authorities approached the collection process. However, when faced with the income shortfall caused by mass non-payment, even some of the more radical Labour councils began to make full resort to all collection processes.¹¹⁰ The Audit Commission, a central government watchdog of local authority finance, predicted that as many as four million people might have to be taken to court in 1991 and 1992 to collect poll tax arrears.¹¹¹

Conclusion

If the story ended here, it would be difficult not to regard the poll tax policy as revealing major deficiencies in Britain's constitutional structure. One might point to minority electoral approval for the principle; to rebellions within the parliamentary Conservative Party when the tax was enacted; to clear public opposition to the policy in opinion polls; to the display of more overt dissatisfaction through widespread non-payment; and to very limited enthusiasm on the part of the local politicians and professional officers responsible for the tax's collection. Despite all this, the poll tax's legality remained beyond challenge. As previous chapters have already suggested however, the operation of the British ¹⁰⁷ See Luba J (1991) 'Legal eye' ROOF January/February; Dickman J (1989) 'Debt and the poll tax' Municipal Review (May).

¹⁰⁸ See Nally S and Dear J (1990) 'No surrender' Municipal Journal, 12–18 October.

¹⁰⁹ Institute of Fiscal Studies (1990) Local government finance: the 1990 reforms.

¹¹⁰ See Hill D (1991) 'A job to do' New Statesman and Society, 8 March.

¹¹¹ Audit Commission (1990) The administration of the community charge.

constitution is shaped as much, if not more, by issues concerning the legitimacy of government behaviour than questions over its legality. And from the perspective of legitimacy, the poll tax proved to have significant defects.

As chapter twelve reveals, Thatcher's fall from power in 1990 was caused in part by her attitude towards the European Community. But her association with the poll tax also made her an electoral liability for many Conservative MPs, who feared that they would lose their seats at the next general election if the tax was not removed. Unsurprisingly, therefore, Michael Heseltine's challenge to Thatcher for the party leadership in 1990 was coupled with an announcement that he would, if elected, institute a thorough review of the community charge. John Major made a similar commitment when announcing his candidacy for the leadership. His government subsequently introduced a Bill replacing the poll tax with a so-called 'council tax', based primarily on property values. While less regressive and easier to collect than its predecessor, the council tax did not indicate any resurgence of pre-Thatcherite conventions concerning local authority fiscal autonomy: the DoE retained the power to 'cap' council tax levels. Nor did the Major government make any attempt to restore local autonomy in such areas as housing and education policy. Notwithstanding the demise of the community charge, the 'partnership', pluralist model of central-local relations was by 1997 becoming evermore clearly a feature of past constitutional history rather than current constitutional practice.

XII. The Blair government's reforms

The Blair governments did not promote any substantial reversal of this general trend. Labour's 1997 election manifesto offered several abstract statements which might be thought to herald the restoration of much of local government's former autonomy, for example that: 'Local decision-making should be less constrained by central government, and also more accountable to local people'.¹¹² But on the crucial issue of councils' fiscal powers, the manifesto promised only minor tinkering with, rather than reversal of, the existing legal position: 'Although crude and universal council tax capping should go, we will retain reserve powers to control excessive council tax rises'.¹¹³ Nor did the manifesto envisage any substantial restoration of local authorities' influence over education policy, housing provision or transport services.¹¹⁴ The suggestion that the Labour Party had accepted the Thatcherite position that councils' freedom of political judgement extended only to doing things of which central government approved was powerfully conveyed by the following passage:

Every council will be required to publish a local performance plan with targets for service improvement, and be expected to achieve them. The Audit Commission will be given additional powers to monitor performance and promote efficiency. On its advice, [central] government will where necessary send in a management team with full powers to remedy failure.¹¹⁵

¹¹² At 34.

¹¹³ Ibid., at 34.

¹¹⁴ For a suggestion that there has been a shift in kind, if not quality, see Vincent-Jones P (2000) 'Central-local relations under the Local Government Act 1999' MLR 84.

¹¹⁵ Ibid.

In a major policy statement, published in 1998 as a pamphlet entitled Leading the Way,¹¹⁶ Prime Minister Blair suggested that local authorities' proper constitutional role is to serve as the agents of central government:

However much government does at the centre it will often be dependent on others to make things happen on the ground where it matters. And that is where local government comes in. The delivery of the government's key pledges and policies also requires modern local government helping to make change happen.¹¹⁷

The Prime Minister's message was blunt. If councils did just what the government wants them to do:

You can look forward to an enhanced role and new powers. Your contribution will be recognised. Your status enhanced. If you are unwilling or unable to work to the modern agenda then the government will have to look to other partners to take on your role.¹¹⁸

The notion that local government has a legitimate constitutional role to play in enabling voters to express opposition or antagonism to central government policy did not enter the Prime Minister's argument. In that very important respect, Prime Minister Blair seemed to share common constitutional ground with his two immediate predecessors. The policy objectives underlying the Local Government Acts 1999 and 2000 went some way, albeit only a short way, towards refuting that assumption.

The Local Government Acts 1999 and 2000

The central policy objective contained in the 1999 Act was to subject all local authority decision-making to a 'Best Value' regime. The 'Best Value' principle is rather more expansive than a crude statutory reassertion of the Roberts/Bromley notion of the fiduciary duty, but is essentially a notion of 'efficiency' in which central government has the sole responsibility to determine what 'efficient' actually means. Councils are to be subject to rigorous inspection by central government bodies—primarily the bizarrely-named Best Value Inspectorate—to establish that these efficiency targets are being met. Those councils which are successful when measured against this yardstick would be rewarded with extra responsibilities and resources. Those which fail may find that their powers are removed and transferred to government-appointed boards.

The Blair governments' understanding of 'efficiency' in the local government context did not encompass the principle that local electorates should be able to instruct their authorities to pursue policies with which central government disagrees. The Best Value regime indicated that the Blair administration were as contemptuous as their immediate Conservative predecessors of the principle that local councils should govern rather than simply administer their areas.¹¹⁹

A second innovation provided for by the 2000 Act pointed however in a potentially more pluralist direction. The Act permits local authorities to hold a referendum in which voters may decide if they wish their council to be headed by a directly elected Mayor, who would wield a substantial portion of the authority's (admittedly very limited powers). A directly elected Mayor of cities such as Manchester, Birmingham or Leeds would exercise significant political authority, even though she would actually wield few governmental

¹¹⁶ The pamphlet was published by the Institute for Public Policy Research (IPPR).

¹¹⁷ Ibid., at 6.

¹¹⁸ Ibid., at 22.

¹¹⁹ See Wilson D (2001) 'Local government: balancing diversity and uniformity' Parliamentary Affairs 289.

powers. The new policy did not however seem to attract much enthusiasm from local voters. By February 2002, referenda had been held in only twenty-two areas. In fifteen of those areas, voters had rejected the directly elected Mayor option.¹²⁰

The governance of London

In this general context, the Blair government's plans to introduce a new tier of elected local administration in London seem oddly out of place; for they raised the very real possibility that the Blair government would create a new locus of political power which might afford it substantial discomfort in both the short and longer term.

A Mayor and Assembly for London

A government white paper published in 1998, began by suggesting that:

Since the abolition of the GLC in 1986, London has lacked strategic direction and leadership. Londoners and London organisations have complained about confused responsibilities, duplication of effort, conflicting policies and programmes and a general sense of drift. No one was in charge or able to speak up for London.¹²¹

Rather than recreate the GLC, the government proposed to establish a 'Greater London Authority' (GLA), composed of a directly elected Mayor and an elected Assembly of twenty-five members. The proposals were subsequently enacted virtually unamended in the Greater London Authority Act 1999. The Assembly would be the junior partner in the enterprise; it seemed likely to be a body possessing little political influence and even less political power.¹²² The proposals for the Mayor, in contrast, presented a considerable constitutional curiosity, for the government's plans envisaged an office which exercises little practical political authority but which could prove important in terms of political influence.

The GLA has been given some practical responsibility for several areas of governmental activity—including transport, land planning, economic development, environmental protection, and policing.¹²³ The Mayor is empowered to act both as the formulator and executor of most policy decisions, advised by a 'Cabinet' of her own choosing. The Assembly has a potentially significant checking and amendment role in respect of the GLA's budget, and some entitlement to be consulted by the Mayor over the formulation of policy. The Assembly may also initiate reports and investigations on matters of concern to the administration of the city, and is empowered to require the Mayor to explain and defend her activities in an annual report to its members.

Financial autonomy

The government's explanation of the motives behind the financial system it intended to impose on the GLA sounded distinctly Thatcherite in tone:

The new finance system will... meet the government's objectives of efficiency and value for money in public spending, while keeping the overall tax burden as low as possible. The ¹²⁰ The Times, 18 February 2002.

¹²¹ Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1998) A Mayor and Assembly for London, para 1.6.

¹²² Greater London Authority Act 1999, ss 59–60.

¹²³ Policing powers are among the more important of the GLA's functions, if only because the Police Authority for the London was previously the Home Secretary: see Part VI of the Act.

finance system will incorporate incentives to be efficient, be durable and robust, and seek to minimise the scope for conflict with central government.¹²⁴

The GLA has not been granted any powers to levy income tax, or a property tax, or a sales tax directly on local residents and businesses. It can raise income through the council tax, but it will do this indirectly by charging a precept to local authorities within the GLA area which will be quantified on each borough's own council tax forms.¹²⁵ The GLA's precepting power is subject to capping under the same rules as currently apply to other local authorities' council tax levies. The GLA will also derive income from government grants, charges for services, and the sale of capital assets. The white paper made no attempt to quantify the relative importance of these various sources of finance within the GLA's overall budget, which it suggested would initially be some £3.3 billion.

The GLA's fiscal power is limited to decisions about viring sums of money within its overall budget from one function to another. Even here, however, the GLA's discretion is tightly restrained. A substantial proportion of the GLA's grant revenue—particularly in respect of transport and economic development matters—is earmarked by central government for specific capital or recurrent expenditure. The GLA has no viring power at all over such monies. To put the matter bluntly, the GLA has no significant degree of budgetary autonomy.

This lacuna strikes a powerful blow at the heart of the government's claim that the GLA is substantially enhancing the democratic basis of London governance. A meaningful notion of 'government' surely demands that multi-function government institutions enjoy appreciable autonomy to raise and spend tax revenues, while a meaningful notion of democratic accountability surely demands that voters have some appreciable say in how much tax revenue their elected representatives raise and spend on their behalves. The GLA demonstrably fails both tests.

The electoral process

The Mayor is chosen by the supplementary vote (SV) system.¹²⁶ Electors may select a first and second choice candidate. Should any candidate not receive 50%+1 of the first preference votes, all but the two candidates attracting the most first preference votes are eliminated. Any second preference votes of defeated candidates which were given to the top two candidates will then be reallocated, leaving the person with the greater number of first and second preference votes as the winner. First and second preference votes will apparently be weighted equally at this stage, thus raising the possibility that the election will actually be won by a candidate who received fewer first preference votes than the eventual runner-up. To discourage frivolous or crank candidates, a 'significant deposit' would be required, which would be returned only if the candidate gains 5% or more of the vote. Candidates also have to be nominated by a 'significant number' of registered voters from each borough. These proposals will presumably restrict the field to the representatives of established political parties.

Assembly candidates must pay a 5% threshold deposit and be nominated by a set number of voters in their chosen constituency. The Assembly is elected by the additional member system (AMS). Fourteen seats are allocated to constituencies, which will return members on a first past the post basis. The remaining eleven members are drawn from party lists, in numbers which ensure that party representation closely reflects the overall ¹²⁴ Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions op cit para 6.7 (hereafter cited as DETR op cit).

¹²⁵ Greater London Authority Act 1999, ss 82–84.

¹²⁶ Greater London Authority Act 1999, ss 3–4, 17 and Sch 2.

distribution of the vote. The use of AMS means it is improbable that the Assembly will contain a single party majority, a fact which may have some significant impact in the way in which the Assembly goes about discharging its (limited) governmental duties.

Conclusion

In an interesting break with tradition, the government had promoted legislation allowing a referendum to be staged in London on the desirability of proceeding with the GLA proposals. The vote was held on 7 May 1998. Some 70%+ of those voting supported the government's plans. Turnout however was barely 35%, so the government could hardly claim a ringing democratic mandate for its plans.

The low turnout is not inconsistent with the participation levels recorded in local authority elections in general in recent years. Nor indeed was the Blair government's response to that low turnout significantly out of line with that of previous Conservative governments. It appeared unimpressed by the argument that voters may not turn out for local elections because they believe (quite justifiably) that local authorities no longer have any substantial political role. A substantial expansion of local power as a cure for low turnout was not on the government's agenda.

Conclusion

It is at present too soon to form any clear view on the practical significance for local government of the creation of the Conservative/Liberal Democrat coalition government in 2010. The Liberal Democrat Party had consistently championed a more expansive role for local authorities during the last third of the twentieth century, and that sentiment appeared to be endorsed in the coalition's Programme for government:

We will promote the radical devolution of power and greater financial autonomy to local government and community groups. This will include a review of local government finance.¹²⁷

However, the 'Localism Bill' which the coalition government promoted in 2011 seemed to be designed to reduce local authorities' powers still further by devolving some of their existing powers to sub-local bodies. While there is certainly eminent support for the notion that this initiative may be an effective way of encouraging more citizens to engage with political questions,¹²⁸ it is difficult to see that enactment of the Bill will better equip local authorities to function as a meaningful counterweight to central government on important political issues.¹²⁹

It was suggested in chapter nine that legislative self-restraint in deference to 'traditionally fundamental' political and moral principles might be the most important of Britain's constitutional conventions. There is room to dispute the precise conventional understanding of central-local relations in the modern era, but the preponderance of evidence suggests that prior to 1980 governments of both parties considered that maintaining some significant simultaneous political pluralism within the overall structure of government was an important constitutional principle.

¹²⁷ <http://www.cabinetoffice.gov.uk/sites/default/files/resources/coalition_programme_for_government.pdf> at p 11.

¹²⁸ See for example the analysis offered by Bogdanor in (2009) The new British constitution ch 10.

¹²⁹ See generally on this point the analysis in Loveland I (1999) 'Local authorities' in Blackburn R and Plant R (eds) Constitutional reform.

We might argue whether that principle should be regarded as a 'convention' in the orthodox sense, but there is little scope for disagreement as to its importance in the context of modern British society. The recent history of local government suggests that the pluralist principle was ignored by the Conservative administrations which enjoyed a Commons majority from 1979 onwards. The Thatcher and Major governments' defiance of accepted conventional norms was not limited exclusively to the question of the geographical separation of powers; their ready resort to the guillotine in Commons debates,¹³⁰ Ministers' increased disinclination to accept personal responsibility for departmental failings,¹³¹ and the creation of Next Steps Agencies within central government in respect of which Ministers do not accept accountability to the Commons, also indicate a political readiness (married with a legal capacity) to flout long-established moral values.

But it is in the area of local government that (to borrow from the Duke of Wellington) 'the revolution through due process of law' wrought on the constitution since 1979 is most evident. The paradox, of course, is that the 'revolution' to which Wellington referred was intended to introduce a more sophisticated notion of popular consent to government in British society. The Thatcher, Major and Blair administrations' incremental local government revolution appeared to seek quite the opposite result.¹³²

As noted above, some contemporary commentators regarded the Municipal Corporations Act 1835 as having a more radical impact on the allocation of political power than the Great Reform Act 1832. The reasons underpinning this interpretation are not difficult to discern. Elected, multi-functional and fiscally autonomous local authorities would permit differences in political opinion to be given constant expression. Once rooted at some (albeit modest) point in the governmental structure, political ideologies which reject central government orthodoxies may gain a familiarity and hence legitimacy which might lead more and more of 'the people' to evaluate the merits of divergent policies and exercise their power to vote accordingly, whether at the local or national level. If the ideas which had controlled the government process were to hold sway in post-1835 society, they would do so because of their intrinsic merits, not because Parliament had granted their proponents monopolistic control over the allocation of government power. Simply put, such commentators recognised (and feared) that a powerful local government sector would prove a vital vehicle for cultivating and maintaining the informed consent of the people in a large modern democracy.

Those principles are no less valid in the context of early twenty-first-century British society. Consequently, it is quite misleading to suggest that the restructuring of central-local relations enacted since 1980 has left the constitution's democratic basis unchanged simply because the electorate has remained free to return a Labour or Liberal government at successive general elections. The notion that political powers may become delegitimised through prolonged disuse has already been raised in respect of the House of Lords and the personal prerogatives of the Monarch.¹³³ The idea has equal force with respect to local government. In the Butskellite era, the local electoral process functioned as a perpetual 'market place of ideas',¹³⁴ within which competing political philosophies were formulated by politicians, selected by voters, tried and tested in practice, and thereafter re-affirmed or rejected according to the success they had achieved. The Thatcher and ¹³⁰ See 'The guillotine and closure', ch 5, pp 130–131 above.

¹³¹ See 'IV. Individual ministerial responsibility' ff, ch 9, pp 278 et seq above.

¹³² The most incisive critique of this period is now offered by Loughlin M (1998) Legality and locality.

¹³³ See 'The 1974–1979 parliament', ch 6, pp 170–172 and 'II. The Monarch', ff, ch 9 pp 269–271 above.

¹³⁴ The concept is borrowed from Holmes J (of the US Supreme Court) in Abrams v United States 250 US 616 (1919).

Major governments' 'reforms' reduced the scope for alternative ideas to be put into practice, thereby denying the voters power to make informed choices about party policy and ultimately undermining the basis of popular consent to the government process.

The Thatcher and Major governments' efforts to delegitimise social democratic policies by preventing their implementation at the local level should, moreover, be seen in conjunction with the increase in the number of 'governmental' functions, formerly exercised by local authorities, which are now controlled by single issue, (often) non-elected bodies, whose members are frequently appointed by government Ministers. It is inherent in the nature of such 'quangos'¹³⁵ that their policies are dictated by central government, not determined by local electors. The trend has led one commentator to identify 'a new magistracy' occupying more and more positions of political power.¹³⁶ The label, redolent with the aura of Britain's pre-1830 local government structure, starkly conveys the highly antiquated notion of democracy which Parliament has latterly pursued in respect of local government.

Yet it is a profound paradox of constitutional history that just as the Thatcher and Major governments so successfully deployed their Commons' and Lords' majorities to dismantle the country's internal structures of post-war pluralism and eradicate the influence of Butskellite philosophy on the government process, so they faced increasingly formidable opposition to their ideological agenda from a hitherto unexpected quarter. Chapters eleven and twelve address the impact on traditional constitutional understandings as to the geographical separation of governmental power of Britain's membership of the European Community.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

- Sharpe J (1970) 'Theories and value of local government' Political Studies 153
- Bogdanor V (2009) The new British constitution ch 10
- Loveland I (1999) 'Local authorities' in Blackburn R and Plant R (eds) Constitutional reform
- Loughlin M (1986) Local government in the modern state ch 1
- Loughlin M (1985) 'The restructuring of central–local government legal relations' Local Government Studies 59
- Laski H (1926) 'Judicial review of social policy in England' Harvard LR 832 p 844
- Keith-Lucas B (1962) 'Poplarism' Public Law 52
- Mitchell A (1974) 'Clay Cross' Political Quarterly 165
- Butler D, Adonis A and Travers T (1994) Failure in British government: the politics of the poll tax
- McAuslan P (1983) 'Administrative law, collective consumption and judicial policy' MLR 1

¹³⁵ The acronym originally stood for 'quasi-non-governmental organisations'. A new acronym, quacgos, would perhaps be more appropriate—'quasi-central government organisations'.

¹³⁶ Stewart J (1993) Defending public accountability. See also Davies H and Stewart J (1994) The growth of government by appointment: implications for democracy.

Loveland I (1992) 'Square pegs, round holes: the "right" to council housing in the post-war era' Journal of Law and Society 339

Wilson D (2001) 'Local government: balancing diversity and uniformity' Parliamentary Affairs 289

Case law and legislation

Bromley LBC v GLC [1983] 1 AC 768

Roberts v Hopwood [1925] AC 578

Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corpn [1948] 1 KB 223

A-G v Aspinall (1837) 40 ER 773

Chapter 11

The European Economic Community 1957–1986

As chapter two suggested, the UK's accession to the European Economic Community¹ has markedly affected traditional constitutional understandings; especially, but not exclusively, in respect of parliamentary sovereignty. This chapter and the next will not examine developments in the EEC's institutional structure in detail;² our primary concern is to chart the way in which this country's membership of the Community has prompted changes in the domestic constitutional order. It is nevertheless essential broadly to understand the EEC's history to appreciate its importance to modern British constitutional theory and practice.

The pervasive historical theme revolves around the meaning of European 'federalism'. Madison's classical account of a federal constitution divides the ordinary structure of government both horizontally and vertically. Each governmental unit has particular powers, into which other units cannot intrude, prescribed by a higher form of law, and alterable only by a cumbersome, super-majoritarian law-making process. Federalism in its pure sense is thus a legal rather than conventional doctrine. But, 'federalism', like democracy or the rule of law, may take many forms: the governmental divisions which federal constitutions adopt vary enormously.

As we saw in discussing Madison's views on federalism as a legal rule, the conventional versions of the concept which influenced British central–local government relations between 1945 and 1975, and Canadian provincial–central relations prior to 1982, federalism is usually adopted for a particular 'democratic' purpose. That purpose is to provide an institutional means within a country's overall governmental structure to enable large sections of 'the people' whose favoured political party does not control the national legislature and/or executive to have a significant, if subsidiary influence on how their country is governed.

One of the questions presented by the creation of the EEC in the late 1950s was to what extent one could sensibly describe its objectives and structure as 'federal'. The Community came into being as the result of a treaty agreed between six sovereign nations. Countries had for many years signed treaties with each other, promising to respect particular undertakings. But treaties were traditionally seen as agreements between countries. They could not therefore create 'federal' legal orders in the strict sense. For constitutional theorists, the crucial questions raised by the EEC are: firstly, is its legal system 'different' from those created by all other treaties; secondly, what impact does the EEC's legal system have on its Member States' constitutions; and thirdly, is that impact sufficient to demand that we now attach a new meaning to the concept of 'federal' government?

¹ There were technically three communities, the EEC, the ECSC and Euratom, which 'merged' in 1965. These two chapters deal only with the EEC. Following the coming into force of the Treaty of Maastricht in 1994, the European Economic Community (EEC) was formally renamed the European Community (EC), and its Member States also established a body known as the European Union (EU). This book refers to the 'EEC' in relation to pre-1986 events, and to the 'EC' thereafter.

² On which see successive editions of Craig P and DeBurca G EU law.

I. The Treaty of Rome 1: founding principles

The European Economic Community was created in 1957 by six countries which signed the Treaty of Rome (West Germany, Italy, France, Holland, Belgium and Luxembourg). The EEC's immediate origins can be traced to the foundation by the same six states of the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC) under the Treaty of Paris in 1951. The most basic concern of the founders of the ECSC was to prevent another war between France, Germany and Italy. The ECSC was intended to integrate its member countries' coal and steel industries so closely that war between the states would become impossible. The ECSC was also motivated by a belief among many politicians that co-ordinated rebuilding of these basic industries would hasten the Member States' economic recovery from the devastation inflicted by World War II. More amorphously, the ECSC offered a means for Italy and Germany to demonstrate that they could function as civilised, democratic societies.³

The Treaty of Rome appeared to be intended to push the idea of political co-operation through economic integration several steps further. The preamble to the Treaty began by asserting that the signatory States were; 'determined to lay the foundations of an ever closer union among the peoples of Europe'. The preamble continued by identifying a series of economic policy objectives which it was felt would promote that purpose. The Treaty's primary concern (outlined in Arts 2 and 3) was to create a 'common market' between the members of the European Economic Community. The common market would eventually require free movement of goods, workers, services, and capital across national boundaries; a common policy on agriculture; uniform rules governing competition law; and community rules regulating imports of goods from non-Member States. It seems plausible that the Treaty's architects envisaged that increased economic interdependence would slowly lead to some kind of political union, but quite how widely such sentiments were shared within the six original Member States is a matter for speculation.⁴

The organisation established by the Treaty of Rome was not a single country, and thus not 'federal' in the orthodox, de jure, sense. However, we have seen in previous chapters that constitutional behaviour may owe more to issues of practical politics than to legal theory. It may therefore be defensible to suggest that 'federalism' can be a de facto construct, and that specific allocations of powers between different organs of government might be of sufficient significance for us to conclude that a federal system has indeed emerged.

³ For an overview see Craig and DeBurca (op cit) ch 1; Pinder J (2nd edn, 1995) European Community ch 1.

⁴ On which there is now a vast body of literature. For an introduction see Pinder op cit; Urwin D (1995) The community of Europe: a history of integration.

We will draw a fuller picture of the EC's substantive role in the next two chapters. At this introductory stage, there are five essentially procedural issues to address. These are: firstly, the various types of EEC law; secondly, the various types of law-making process within the EEC; thirdly, the status of EEC laws compared with the domestic laws of the six Member States; fourthly, the ways in which EEC laws are enforced; and, fifthly, the relationship between law and politics (or, to use familiar terminology, between legal and conventional rules) within the EEC's constitution.

The types of EEC law and law-making processes

This book has suggested that most modern democracies accept the principle that their constitutions should recognise a hierarchy of laws. The more important the political value at stake, the more difficult it should be for the value to be changed. That principle is clearly expressed within the Treaty of Rome.

The Treaty itself is the original source of EEC law. In the context of the EEC's own legal order, the Treaty is a constituent document. The various governmental organisations which the Treaty created are bodies of limited competence; they can only do those things the Treaty permits. There is no doctrine equivalent to parliamentary sovereignty available to any EEC institution. The 'sovereign law-maker' within the EEC was identified by Art 236 of the Treaty. Article 236 provided for a process through which the Treaty could be amended. Amendment entails cumbersome procedures, involving an Inter-Governmental Conference between the signatory nations, and their unanimous support in accordance with their respective constitutional amendment mechanisms for any changes. So there was no possibility of a tyranny of a majority, or even of an overwhelming majority, concerning the basic scope of EEC law. Even tiny Luxembourg had a power of veto on Treaty amendment. The terms of the Treaty are therefore deeply entrenched in a procedural sense. The Treaty is often referred to as 'primary legislation' within the EEC's legal order. From a British perspective, that label can be misleading. A better characterisation might be to describe the Treaty as the Community's 'fundamental law'.

Many of the Treaty's provisions are drafted in loose terms. The Treaty is a 'traite cadre' rather than a 'traite loi'. Its text contains broadly framed objectives and basic principles about institutional structures and law-making procedures, rather than precise rules detailing what the Community can do and exactly how it must do it. Consequently, most EEC law is made without the need for Treaty Amendment. But within the Treaty, there is a clear hierarchy (or, perhaps more accurately, heterogeneity) of laws.

The Council of Ministers

Most EEC laws are in formal terms made by a body called the Council of Ministers. Each Member State has one representative on the Council of Ministers. This is generally the Minister whose domestic responsibilities coincide with the issue the Council is addressing.⁵ The Council was empowered (per Art 148) to make laws through three types of voting system. In some areas of EEC activity, the Treaty required unanimous Member State approval. In other fields, the Council may proceed by a qualified majority, in which each Member State's voting power is (crudely) adjusted according to its population size. Thirdly, the Treaty also permits some laws to be made by a simple majority system, which gives all Member States equal weight.

⁵ This would obviously mean that the personnel on the Council would constantly be changing; or, in practical terms, that the 'Council' would always exist in a multiple form; see Pinder op cit, pp 30–31. To enable the Member States to maintain a 'permanent' presence on the Council, Art 151 allowed the Council to create a Committee of Representatives to perform whatever tasks the Council thought appropriate. The body established is known by the acronym COREPER. Each state's delegation to COREPER is staffed by domestic civil servants and headed by each country's Ambassador to the Community.

These differential voting systems illustrate a theme pervading the EEC's institutional structure; namely a tension between inter-nationalism and supra-nationalism. A purely inter-national Community, in which every action required the consent of all Member States, would permit short-term national interests (or temporary political pressures within a particular country) to frustrate achievement of Community policy. In contrast, too strong an emphasis on supra-national objectives and law-making processes might have dissuaded some countries from joining the EEC at all, or alternatively have convinced Member States that they could not adequately protect their national interests within the Community, and would therefore have to leave it.

In crude terms, we might conclude that the more important an issue was to the national interests of Member States, the more likely it was that the Treaty would require unanimous voting—the most inter-national law-making process. Qualified majority voting originally weighted the Member States' votes according to the following formula: Germany 4; France 4; Italy 4; Luxembourg 1; Netherlands 2; Belgium 2. Twelve votes were required to pass the law. This is a more supra-national process than unanimity, but nevertheless permitted one big state plus one other to invoke shared national interests to block integrationist legislation. Simple majority voting is clearly the most supra-national of the three processes—perhaps unsurprisingly it was rarely provided for in the EEC's initial development.

But the Treaty did not envisage that the inter/supra-national balance within the Council's voting process would be static. Its framers presumed that as the EEC became more firmly established as an essential part of each Member State's constitutional structure, national suspicion of supra-national sentiment would diminish, in turn permitting a gradual move from the unanimous voting system towards qualified majority and ultimately simple majority voting. Consequently, the Treaty set out several phases in the Community's development (transition periods) by which certain EEC objectives were to be achieved. At the expiry of these periods, unanimous voting would be replaced with either the qualified or simple majority system in certain areas of Community activity. This provided an incentive for Member States to reach unanimous agreement—a failure to legislate might mean a less desirable law would subsequently be imposed on a recalcitrant member. However, the complex balance of international and supra-national forces within the law-making processes sketched by the Treaty extends far beyond the Council's voting mechanisms. To appreciate this point, we must consider the roles of two of the Community's three other main⁶ institutions: the Commission, and the Parliament.

The Commission and the Parliament

Unlike the Council, the Commission was intended to be an avowedly supra-national body. It had nine members, not more than two of whom could be nationals of the same Member State. Per Art 158, Commissioners were appointed for four-year terms by the common accord of the Member States. One Commissioner, selected by the common accord of the Member States, would serve as President of the Commission. A 'convention' emerged that Member States would approve each other's nominees. The Treaty did not specify how the nominations should be made. However, per Art 157, Commissioners were to be 'chosen for their general competence and of indisputable independence.' This independence was presumably to be from national pressures—whether directly, or indirectly from the Council—for Art 157(2) provided that Commissioners ‘shall not seek or accept instructions from any Government or other body.’ Per Art 163, the Commission would act by a simple majority. It also adopted a principle of collective responsibility—arguments among Commissioners were not made public.⁷

⁶ Since these chapters deal with the EEC only in broad terms, its minor institutions are not examined here.

Article 155 charged the Commission with various powers of promoting, implementing and monitoring measures: ‘with a view to ensuring the functioning and development of the Common Market.’ It was also the Commission’s task to introduce much of the legislation on which the Council would vote: the Council had little power of legislative innovation. Thus the supra/inter-national complexities of the Council’s various voting systems would be applied to measures which had themselves passed through the supra-national filter of the Commission’s collective decision-making process. The Commission was also endowed with a limited amount of autonomous legislative power which could be exercised without reference to the Council. Legislation of this sort clearly had a very supra-national character.

The Parliament (originally styled the ‘Assembly’) was composed of delegates chosen by each Member State from their own legislatures in approximate proportion to their population size.⁸ It had few powers. Some parts of the Treaty specified that the Council had to consult the Parliament before enacting legislation, but the Treaty did not compel the Council to take any notice of the Assembly’s opinions. The Parliament also had to be consulted by the Council over the Community’s budgetary process, but again its views did not bind the Council’s eventual decisions.⁹

Under Art 144, the Assembly could sack the entire Commission if two thirds of the members present so voted.¹⁰ It could not, however, dismiss individual Commissioners, which further strengthens the presumption that the framers anticipated that the Commission should act as a collective body. The dismissal power was so crude an instrument that it was unlikely ever to be used.

The forms of EEC ‘law’: Article 189

The Treaty’s sensitivity to supra- and inter-national tensions is further evidenced in Art 189, which empowers the EEC to produce various types of secondary legislation to fill in the gaps left by the Treaty’s nature as a traité cadre. Article 189’s text identified five types of ‘law.’

‘Regulations’ would be made by the Council in response to a proposal from the Commission. Regulations were to be ‘binding in their entirety.’ They were also to have ‘general application’, a concept which presumably meant that they would bind not just governmental bodies in Member States, but also citizens and companies. Regulations were also ‘directly applicable’, a concept initially taken to mean both that they acquired legal force as soon as they emerged from the EEC’s law-making process, and that Member States need take no steps to incorporate them into domestic law. These legal characteristics

⁷ The ‘reason’ presumably being to stop the Council or Member States exploiting divisions among the Commissioners.

⁸ Germany 36; France 36; Italy 36; Netherlands 14; Belgium 14; Luxembourg 6.

⁹ Article 200 initially required the following contributions from the Member States to the EC budget: Germany 28%; France 28%; Italy 28%; Belgium 7.9%; Netherlands 7.9%; Luxembourg 0.2%. It was expected that the Community would eventually be self-financing from the tax revenues placed on imported goods; but initially, the budget was an area of potentially significant inter-state disagreement. Anticipating this problem, Art 203 provided that the budget could be approved by a qualified majority.

¹⁰ And this comprised an absolute majority.

of ‘universality’ and ‘completeness’ suggest that regulations would be the most supra-national form of EEC legislation.¹¹

The second form of secondary legislation—which Art 189 referred to as ‘directives’—made more concessions to inter-national sentiment. Like regulations, directives would be enacted by the Council following a proposal from the Commission. Article 189 provided that directives would not be generally applicable, but could be addressed only to Member States. Directives would bind Member States, but only as to the result the EEC sought; the means of achieving that result would be left to each Member State’s discretion. Article 189 does not expressly say that directives could be directly applicable. This suggests that the Treaty would permit Member States either simply to incorporate a directive verbatim into domestic law, or to ‘translate’ it through their own law-making processes into the form of a domestic legal instrument.

‘Decisions’ were to be more supra-national in character than directives. They were to bind their addressee, and were unlikely to give Member States any discretion in implementation. However unlike regulations, decisions would not be generally applicable: they would bind only the individual, company, or Member State to whom/which they were addressed.¹² Most of the Commission’s autonomous legislative power was to be exercised in this way.

The Treaty’s individual articles specified the type of legislation to be used for particular EEC objectives. If one links this heterogeneity with the Council’s tripartite voting system and with the Commission’s initiatory role and the Parliament’s consultative powers, it is clear that the Treaty of Rome created a very elaborate law-making structure, with many checks and balances curbing the powers of the EEC’s own institutions and of its Member States.

Since that elaborate structure could be amended only by the cumbersome Art 236 procedure, the EEC established a very complex separation of powers within its constitutional structure. But this separation does not comfortably correspond to orthodox British understandings of that concept. No part of any of the EEC’s institutions was directly elected by the Member States’ citizens, which clearly raises some questions as to the Community’s democratic base. Such electoral control as citizens of Member States exercised on EEC law-making would pass through the indirect filter of their respective government’s representative on the Council of Ministers, and their governments’ nominees to the Commission and Assembly. But we should resist the temptation of adopting an over-simplistic definition of democracy. For in another sense, the EEC could be seen as bolstering democratic principles, by creating the possibility that citizens of a Member State who did not vote for their own government would find that other governments on the Council would more accurately reflect their own preferences on matters within the EEC’s competence, and thereby block or dilute a national government’s majoritarian or minoritarian preferences.

In British terms, the Commission appears to serve as the executive branch of the Community’s government, but one should qualify this in several ways. As already noted, it has some legislative powers which it may exercise independently of the Council. More significantly, the Commission was (and remains) a small organisation and, consequently, could not realistically be involved in the detailed implementation of Community law. For that task, the EEC was to rely primarily on Member State governments.

¹¹ See Winter J (1972) ‘Direct effect and direct applicability: two distinct and different concepts...’ CML Rev 425.

¹² Article 189 also identified two ‘legislative’ measures, recommendations and opinions, which, according to the text of the Treaty, were not to have binding effect.

The EEC Parliament was obviously not comparable to Parliament in the British sense. That it was not an elected body would seem of little import, given that it had no significant powers. But this perhaps raised the longer-term question of whether the EEC should contain a powerful, directly elected legislative branch. Quite where the Parliament would stand on the supra/inter-national axis was initially unclear. Its members' status as governmental appointees, rather than directly elected representatives, suggested it might simply reproduce inter-national tensions on the Council. But there was also the possibility that its members would form alliances according to political ideology rather than national origin, so that it might evolve into a pan-European forum. Article 138(3) required the Parliament to draw up proposals for an electoral system to choose its members. The proposals had to be approved unanimously by the Council, which seemed in no hurry to do so.¹³ This is perhaps unsurprising, since endowing the Parliament with elected status may have enhanced its legitimacy in democratic terms, and thereby strengthened the case for increasing its powers, and so shifting the institutional balance within the Community firmly in a supra-national direction.

The roles of the European Court of Justice (ECJ)

As stressed above, the Treaty is a constituent document. It was thus necessary that its framers devise some mechanism to ensure; firstly that the substance of the laws made via Art 189 and the processes by which those laws were made respected the limits imposed by the Treaty; and secondly that all the other activities of the EEC's institutions had a defensible legal base, either in the Treaty's text, or in secondary legislation lawfully passed under its authority.

Under Art 164, the ECJ was to ensure that 'in the interpretation and application of this Treaty the law is observed'. The ECJ initially had seven judges. They were (like Commissioners) to be people whose 'independence is beyond doubt', and who would be eligible for high judicial office in their own countries or were eminent legal scholars. The judges were to be appointed by common accord of the Member States for six-year terms. The Court would be assisted by officials known as Advocates-General, who would offer the judges a non-binding opinion on the merits of the cases brought before them.

The Treaty appeared to give the ECJ two distinct jurisdictions. The first might be styled as 'internal': its concern being to ensure that the Community's institutions and officials acted within the boundaries of the powers given to them by the Treaty. The second jurisdiction is best characterised as having an 'external' character; its focus was on the question of whether Member States and their respective domestic legal systems were giving proper effect to their Community obligations.

The internal jurisdiction had two main elements. The most important arose under Art 173. Article 173 empowered the ECJ—as a court of first instance¹⁴—to review the legality of acts of the Council or Commission at the instigation of the Council, Commission or a Member State. Article 173 also seemed to enable individuals in certain circumstances to initiate such proceedings. The grounds of illegality against which the acts of the EEC's institutions should be measured were also laid out in Art 173. Per Art 174, the ECJ could declare illegal acts void. This is obviously consistent with the notion that the Treaty should be regarded as 'fundamental law', and that the EEC's institutions could exercise only those powers granted to them by the Treaty. The second element of the internal jurisdiction arose under Art 215. This empowered the ECJ to impose tortious liability on the Community's institutions or officials in respect of losses they caused to individuals or companies.

¹³ Lasok D and Bridge J (1991) Law and institutions of the European Communities pp 246–253.

¹⁴ And of final instance as well, as the Treaty did not subject ECJ judgments to any appellate jurisdiction.

The Court's 'external' jurisdiction also had two elements. Articles 169–170 empowered the ECJ, if requested by the Commission or a Member State respectively, to determine if a Member State had breached its Treaty obligations. Such a power would in itself appear rather confrontational. The potential for conflict was softened by requiring the Commission to seek a negotiated settlement before passing the matter to the ECJ, and by the absence of any measure forcing an errant state to comply with a judgment against it. Any conclusion that the ECJ reached would have only declaratory status. The judgment's efficacy as a means to ensure that the relevant Member State complied with EEC law would be wholly dependent on the Member State being willing to do so. Neither Arts 169–170 nor any other provision of the Treaty empowered the ECJ to quash domestic legislation or executive action.

The second element of the Court's external jurisdiction was less clearly spelled out. Article 177 of the Treaty indicated that some role would be played by national courts in relation to litigation which raised questions as to the meaning of EC law. Article 177 granted to the ECJ alone the power to interpret the Treaty or to decide upon the meaning or validity of any EEC secondary legislation; (and so by implication denied any such power to national courts). Article 177 also indicated that national courts and tribunals could in certain circumstances ask 'questions' of the ECJ concerning issues of EC law, relating to the meaning of a treaty provision or the validity and meaning of secondary legislation, which arose in the course of domestic proceedings. This 'preliminary reference' procedure did not de jure present the ECJ as exercising an appellate jurisdiction over national courts. The procedure evidently envisaged that a domestic court would suspend or adjourn its proceedings pending the ECJ answering the question that had been raised, whereupon the domestic legal proceedings would resume. Quite what effect and impact Art 177 was intended to have was far from clear. More broadly, neither Art 177 nor any other Treaty provision revealed what should happen if the 'preliminary reference' procedure produced an answer from the ECJ which suggested EEC law was incompatible with domestic law.

The status of EC law within the legal systems of the Member States

The Art 169–170 jurisdiction replicated what was then regarded as an orthodox international law dispute settlement mechanism. A treaty creates a set of laws operating in the sphere of international law. Many treaties also create a specialised forum—again operating in the sphere of international law—for the resolution of disputes; and grants to signatory States or specially created enforcement bodies the power to initiate proceedings. To state the matter very simply, international law is taken to create legal relationships between countries but not within them. A treaty's terms are not presumptively enforceable in the domestic courts of a signatory State by or between individuals. Signatory States might wish a particular treaty to have such an internal legal effect. This would entail them making such an intention clear in the terms of the treaty which they create; and/or organising their own constitutions in a fashion which automatically gave international law an enforceable status within their respective territories.

To frame the matter more simply still, the dominant view at the time that the Treaty of Rome was created was that the status of international law within the legal system of a nation state was a matter for each nation state to determine.¹⁵ Within this notion of the domestic ‘status’ of international law, three essential questions arise.

‘Accessibility’, ‘hierarchy’ and ‘interpretive competence’

The first might be classed as one of ‘accessibility’; and is itself divisible into several component parts. Which domestic courts would be competent to apply international law norms to control legal relationships within the domestic territory? Who (or what) would be permitted to invoke international law rules before national courts; ie who could be a claimant? And whom (or what) could those rules be invoked against; ie who could be a defendant?

The second question is one of ‘hierarchy’. Assuming that some or all domestic courts can apply all or parts of a particular body of international law in domestic litigation, which rule of law should a domestic court apply if it finds that international law and domestic rules demand different solutions to the case before it?

The third question—which perhaps logically precedes the first two—might be styled as one of ‘interpretive competence.’ Which body has the power to give authoritative answers to questions concerning the accessibility and hierarchical position of international law within a country’s domestic legal system?

It is readily defensible to conclude that in 1957 most politicians and lawyers in the six founding States of the EEC (indeed in all western nations) would have concluded that the answer to the third question was: ‘Whichever body is given such power by the respective constitution of each signatory State’. But while one might find widespread transnational agreement on that issue of legal competence, the ways in which individual States used that competence to answer questions relating to the accessibility and hierarchal position of international law within their particular constitutional order were remarkably variegated. Even among the six founding States of the EEC, constitutional orthodoxies as to the domestic status of international law were profoundly different.¹⁶

In 1957, the constitution of the Netherlands¹⁷ afforded an extremely high status to international law agreements to which the Netherlands was a party. If an international law rule protected the rights of an individual, the Dutch constitution provided both that the rule had a higher status than any rule of domestic law and that the rule was automatically and immediately enforceable by any claimant against any defendant in any national court.

The then extant Belgian constitution granted international law a much lower internal status. A treaty’s provisions became accessible in domestic courts only to the extent to which they were expressly incorporated by an Act of the Belgian Parliament. It would be for the Belgian Parliament to determine by whom, against whom and in which domestic courts the incorporated Treaty provisions could be invoked, and what other provisions of domestic law the incorporated terms would override. The Belgian Parliament had no power however to entrench any such incorporating statute against future repeal.¹⁸

¹⁵ For a helpful introduction to a topic which is far more contentious than is suggested above, see inter alia, Brownlie I (4th edn, 1990) Principles of public international law ch 2; Jackson J (1992) ‘Status of treaties in domestic legal systems...’ American Journal of International Law 310.

¹⁶ And of course could be altered at any time in accordance with whichever amendment procedure the relevant constitution required. Furthermore, a country’s constitution might also provide that different treaties (or parts thereof) could have different internal legal effects.

¹⁷ Articles 65–66 of the Constitution, as amended in 1953. See Claes M and DeWitte (1998) B ‘Report on the Netherlands’, in Slaughter A, Stone Sweet A and Weiler J (eds) The European courts and national courts. For present purposes, it suffices to say that the Dutch constitution was framed on an American model, with the constitution operating as a fundamental law which limited the competence of the national legislature and executive.

¹⁸ Bribosia H (1998) ‘Report on Belgium’, in Slaughter et al op cit.

The other four Member States each had different constitutional arrangements.¹⁹ If the Treaty of Rome was simply an orthodox instrument of international law, the legal status of its provisions in the legal systems of Member States would vary substantially from one country to another, as no explicit steps were taken by the six Member States when the Treaty came into force to modify their constitutional arrangements in a way which would give EEC law an identical (and entrenched) status within the respective domestic legal systems.

The answers offered by a constitution to questions concerning the internal legal status of international law have profound implications for the allocation of that country's law-making powers. These implications operate in both a trans-national and an intra-national sense. And those implications may acquire an extremely tangled character if either or both of the international law and domestic law arenas contain complicated law-making structures and internal legal hierarchies. This is an issue perhaps better illustrated by a series of concrete examples than by abstract hypothesis, and so it will be returned to at various points below.

For the present, we might note that the text of the Treaty of Rome was virtually silent on each of the three 'status' questions. This silence is ostensibly surprising. It must have been appreciated by the framers of the Treaty that—even if all Member State legislatures and governments consistently made bona fide attempts to ensure that national law was compatible with EEC law—numerous occasions would arise when the two sources of law were mutually inconsistent. And one would have had to have been remarkably naïve not to have assumed that in some situations, Member State governments or legislatures might wilfully seek to contravene EEC law norms.

Almost 200 years earlier, such concerns about inconsistencies between rules of law emanating from different spheres of government had much exercised the minds of the framers of the United States' Constitution. As noted in chapter one, substantial (and potentially overlapping) powers were given by the Constitution to the various branches of the national government and to the States. To Madison and his contemporaries, it was 'self-evident' that conflict would arise between provisions of the Constitution itself, laws enacted by Congress, and laws produced by the States. It was equally evident that the Constitution itself should give clear instructions as to according to what hierarchical criteria and in which fora such conflicts should be addressed. Article VI of the Constitution thus provided that:

This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Article VI lays out a clear hierarchy of legal norms: the Constitution is superior to laws enacted by Congress, which in turn, if consistent with the Constitution, are superior to any laws produced by a State. Article VI also addresses questions of accessibility; all judges—and thus every court in the country—are bound by the enunciated hierarchy of laws. That principle necessarily entails that litigants in all State courts can invoke and rely upon the Constitution and Congressional legislation to override any inconsistent State law. Article VI is concerned to ensure both the uniform impact and the ready enforceability of the Constitution and Acts of Congress throughout the United States. No State may 'opt out' of any provision of the Constitution and Acts of Congress. Relatedly, by providing for the enforcement of those legal norms in all courts, Art VI provides individual citizens en masse with a vast number of local and familiar fora in which to protect their entitlements.

¹⁹ See generally the collection of essays in Slaughter et al op cit.

Use of the United States' Constitution as a comparator against which to analyse the Treaty of Rome is necessarily of limited utility. The American framers were seeking to create a country. The politicians who designed the Treaty of Rome ostensibly had no such grand ambitions. But both were much concerned with dividing law-making powers between different spheres of government, and—one would assume—with ensuring that the proposed divisions were effective in practice. Why then did the Treaty of Rome not address the three status issues in clear terms? Three explanations might be advanced.

The first is that the framers of the Treaty did not expect EEC law to operate as anything other than international law, and thus pinned their hopes for its uniform and effective application throughout the six Member States on the political goodwill of the countries' respective legislatures and governments. Some support for that presumption is found in Art 5 of the Treaty:

Member States shall take all...measures which are appropriate for ensuring the carrying out of the obligations arising out of this Treaty or resulting from the acts of the institutions of the Community. They shall facilitate the achievement of the Community's aims....They shall abstain from any measures likely to jeopardise the attainment of the objectives of this Treaty.

Article 5 makes no express references to domestic legal systems, nor domestic courts, nor to the hierarchical relationship of EEC and domestic law. It appears no more than a declaration of political good faith.

The second—and perhaps the least likely—hypothesis is that the presumptions that EEC law should be hierarchically superior to all domestic law and immediately enforceable in domestic courts were so obviously essential to the effective creation of a 'common market' that there was no need to express them explicitly. They were instead 'taken for granted' principles.

A third explanation is that the framers of the Treaty appreciated the importance of those presumptions, but were unwilling to articulate them clearly in the Treaty for fear that political or public opinion in the intended Member States would find such ideas so unacceptable that support for joining the Community would evaporate. Their hope or expectation may have been that such principles could be expressly accepted by a subsequent amendment to the Treaty and the Member States' respective constitutions, or that the principles might be found to be already present, albeit in hidden and fragmentary form, in the original Treaty itself.

At this point, a further reference to the way in which the United States' Constitution addresses the issue of the status of the country's various types of law is perhaps apposite. Article VI deals with questions of hierarchy and accessibility. It does not broach the issue of interpretive competence: which governmental body had the authority to determine if an Act of Congress conflicted with the Constitution; or if a State law was inconsistent either with the Constitution or an Act of Congress?

Article III of the Constitution provides, inter alia, that: 'the judicial power of the United States shall rest in one Supreme Court....' As noted in chapter one, Alexander Hamilton in The Federalist Papers No 78 had argued that the Court should have the power to invalidate national or State laws which were inconsistent with the Constitution. There is however no express statement in the text of the Constitution to the effect that the 'judicial power' entitles the Supreme Court to invalidate Acts of Congress or State laws if it considers them to breach the Constitution. The Court itself concluded in a series of cases decided in the early-nineteenth century that the Constitution implicitly granted it such powers,²⁰ and the ‘correctness’ of that conclusion was never subject to serious political or legal challenge. Observers of the development of the EEC did not have to wait long to see the European Court of Justice embarking upon a similar jurisprudential journey.

Questions of accessibility 1: the ‘direct effect’ of treaty articles

The Court’s initial response to the question of the accessibility of EEC law within domestic legal systems law was to conclude that parts of the Treaty possessed a status which the ECJ termed ‘direct effect’. The ECJ first articulated the principle in 1962.

Van Gend en Loos (1962)

Article 12 of the Treaty forbade Member States from increasing customs duties on goods imported from other EEC countries. Dutch legislation subsequently redesignated certain chemicals into an already existing tax band which imposed a higher duty. Van Gend challenged the legality of this redesignation before a Dutch court, asking that the court refuse to apply the Dutch law because it amounted to a new tax contravening Art 12. The Dutch court invoked Art 177 to refer two questions to the ECJ. The first concerned the substantive issue of the Netherlands’ government’s claim that the reclassification was not a tax increase. Unsurprisingly, the ECJ decided against the Netherlands on that point.²¹

The second, more significant issue, was the jurisdictional question of whether the Dutch court could entertain the action at all. As a matter of Dutch constitutional law, the Dutch court could do so if Art 12 created ‘rights’ for individuals. The ECJ concluded on that point that Art 12 did create individual rights. Although Art 12 was framed in terms of a restraint on governmental power, the corollary of that restraint was an individual entitlement. If governmental authorities cannot levy a new tax, the targeted taxpayer has a right not to pay any such tax.

From the viewpoint of the Dutch court, these answers were all that were required for it to resolve the case before it. As a result of the way in which the Dutch constitution treated international law, Art 12 immediately overrode the inconsistent provision of the domestic statute. The ECJ’s primary concern was, however, with a quite different issue. Manifestly, the Dutch constitutional rule that Art 12 was accessible in Dutch courts would be of no significance in Germany or Italy or any other Member State. The ECJ’s concern was therefore whether or not Art 12 of the Treaty was accessible in the domestic courts of all of the Member States simply and solely because of rules of EEC law? This question would seem in turn to raise two issues. Did EEC law require Art 12 to have that characteristic of pan-Community accessibility? And if so, did EEC law override any domestic legal rule to the contrary?

A new legal order?

The ECJ answered the first question in the affirmative. The crucial element of its reasoning for this conclusion was an assertion that the Treaty of Rome was not ‘international law’ in the orthodox sense:

The Community constitutes a new legal order of international law for the benefit of which the states have limited their sovereign rights, albeit within limited fields, and the subjects of which comprise not only Member States but also their nationals. Independently of the legislation of ²⁰ Marbury v Madison (1803) 1 Cranch 137; Fletcher v Peck (1810) 109 US 87; Martin v Hunters Lessee (1816) 14 US 304; Cohens v Virginia (1821) 19 US 264.

²¹ Case 26/62: [1963] ECR I.

Member States, Community law therefore not only imposes obligations on individuals but is also intended to confer upon them rights which become part of their legal heritage.²²

Several Member State governments had intervened in the ECJ proceedings to argue that the Treaty created only one mechanism to assess the compatibility of domestic legislation with EEC law; that mechanism being an action before the ECJ via Art 169 or 170. The ECJ did not however regard this as a sufficient remedy.²³ It reasoned that to restrict legal challenges against Member States to Arts 169–170 actions ‘would remove all direct legal protection of the individual rights of [EEC] nationals.’²⁴ If EEC law was to be effectively enforced, the national courts would have to serve as fora where the conformity of a Member State’s laws with the Treaty could be gauged at the instigation of individuals; only domestic courts were sufficiently numerous and proximate and familiar to citizens. As well as acting in defence of their own EEC entitlements, citizens invoking direct effect would police Member States’ compliance with EEC law.

A teleological interpretive technique

The Treaty has no obvious textual basis to support the existence of the direct effect principle. The Court made two rather unconvincing references to particular provisions in the Treaty’s text to buttress its conclusion. The first noted the reference in the preamble to the ‘peoples’ of the Member States as well as to their respective governments.²⁵ The second referred to Art 177, and suggested that the very presence of that provision in the Treaty indicated that national courts were expected to have the capacity to apply EEC law.²⁶

The ECJ found the primary justification for its conclusion in what it termed the ‘spirit, scheme, and general wording’ of the Treaty. The Court’s search for the meaning of EEC law was premised on the assumption that the Treaty should be construed in a ‘teleological’ or ‘purposive’ manner. The absence of any explicit statement in the Treaty to the effect that some or all EEC law would be accessible in domestic courts was not an insuperable barrier to the conclusion that the Treaty did actually contain that requirement. Such an interpretive strategy was quite foreign to then accepted principles of statutory interpretation within Britain’s constitutional tradition,²⁷ but it was not uncommon in the contexts of either the constitutional law of continental European countries or dominant tenets of international law.

²² Ibid, at 12.

²³ There would be several disadvantages to accepting Arts 169–170 as the only way to challenge the compatibility of domestic laws with EEC law. The first (logistical) problem is that there was only one ECJ, so it could handle only a very limited workload. Secondly, Arts 169–170 only permit actions to be brought by the Commission or another Member State; they do not allow litigation by individual citizens or private companies. Since the Commission and Member States would constantly be co-operating with each other in the EEC’s legislative process, it would be plausible to suggest that some breaches of EEC law would be ‘overlooked’ in order to maintain harmonious political relations. See the incisive article by Craig P (1992) ‘Once upon a time in the west: direct effect and the federalisation of EEC law’ Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 453. Since the United Kingdom was not a founding member of the EEC, one should be cautious about using ideas drawn from the Anglo-American legal tradition as tools to analyse the ECJ’s initial jurisprudence. It is nonetheless helpful to suggest that exclusive reliance on the Arts 169–170 mechanism to resolve disputes as to the compatibility of EEC and domestic law would not satisfy a ‘red light’, Diceyan model of the rule of law, in which citizens may challenge the legality of government action before the ‘ordinary courts of the land’, nor even Jones’ greenishly-tinged ‘meaningful day in court’; see ch 3 above. ²⁴ [1963] ECR I at 13.

²⁵ The ECJ did not however note that the great majority of principles laid out in the preamble made no overt reference to individuals.

²⁶ A more modest interpretation would be that Art 177 does no more than indicate that the preliminary reference procedure would be available to those Member States which wished to use it.

²⁷ See the discussion of Magor and St Mellens RDC at ‘Purposive (or “teleological”) interpretation’, ch 3, pp 68–69 above.

At the core of the ECJ's judgment lies the assumption that the effectiveness ('l'effet utile') of EEC law was substantially dependent upon there being a multiplicity of mechanisms and fora through which the law might be enforced. Legal rules which were impossible or very difficult to enforce would be of little value to the persons/organisations who/which were presumptively supposed to benefit from or be controlled by them.

A principle of limited or wide scope?

The principle of direct effect initially seemed to have limited scope. Van Gend itself concerned a Treaty article, rather than secondary legislation produced under Art 189. Thus it might sensibly have been assumed that direct effect would only apply to the Treaty itself, and not to Art 189 measures. The ECJ also implied that a Treaty article would only be directly effective if it had certain characteristics:

The wording of Article 12 contains an unconditional prohibition, which is not a positive but a negative obligation. This obligation is not qualified by any reservation on the part of states which make its implementation conditional upon a positive legislative measure enacted under national law. The very nature of this prohibition makes it ideally adapted to produce direct effect in the legal relationship between Member States and their subjects.²⁸

These criteria seem to establish a form of justiciability test—a concept we met in the British context in GCHQ. As noted in chapter four, 'justiciability' is a vague concept; it would have been rash in 1962 to predict how the ECJ would use it. A broad construction of Van Gend would suggest that all EEC law—both Treaty articles and the various types of secondary legislation produced under Art 189—had the capacity to be directly effective if it possessed a sufficiently justiciable character.

EEC law as an autonomous legal force

But perhaps the most significant element of the Van Gend judgment is one that can easily be missed on a first reading. The ECJ asserted that Art 12 acquired its status as directly effective law 'independently of the legislation'²⁹ of Member States' (emphasis added). In other words, the status of EC law within national legal systems was a matter for EEC law to determine. National constitutional rules as to the domestic status of 'international law' would apparently not apply to EEC law. The law of the Community, throughout the Community, was an autonomous legal force.

Shortly after Van Gend was decided, the ECJ underlined its view that EEC law was a quite distinct creature from ordinary international law. Its judgment in *Commission v Luxembourg and Belgium (Dairy Products)*³⁰—an Art 169 action—concluded that the public international law principle of reciprocity had no place in EEC law. The reciprocity principle provides that a State's breach of an international law rule vis-à-vis another State is excusable if that other State is also in breach. In Dairy Products, the ECJ indicated that this concept had no general application in the EEC law context.³¹

²⁸ [1963] ECR I at 13.

²⁹ Ibid., at 12. The term 'legislation' here is perhaps best construed as referring to law in a generic sense (ie any law) rather than to a statute as we would understand that term in the context of the hierarchy of laws within the United Kingdom's constitution.

³⁰ Case 90, 91/63 [1964] ECR 625.

³¹ 'In fact, the Treaty is not limited to creating reciprocal obligations between the different natural and legal persons to whom it is applicable, but establishes a new legal order which governs the powers, rights and obligations of the said persons, as well as the necessary procedures for taking cognizance of and penalizing any breach of it. Therefore, except where otherwise expressly provided, the basic concept of the Treaty requires that the Member States shall not take the law into their own hands. Therefore the fact that the

Questions of hierarchy 1: the ‘precedence’ or ‘supremacy’ of treaty articles over domestic legislation

It would seem sensible to suggest that if the Treaty of Rome was to create a ‘common market’ among the six Member States, then Community law (whether it be in the form of Treaty articles or secondary legislation) on such matters as free movement of goods and persons and on agricultural policy—indeed on all areas of Community activity—would have to override any incompatible domestic laws. As noted above, the constitutions of the Member States adopted varying responses to that question of hierarchy. Thus if the question of ‘hierarchy’ remained one for Member States’ own constitutions to determine, EEC law would not have uniform impact throughout the community. If a Member State could apply its own understanding of the hierarchical relationship between (some or all) EEC law and (some or all) domestic law, it could ‘opt out’ of EEC law and maintain its own laws in areas where the Treaty gave powers to the EEC. The practical basis of a ‘common market’ would therefore be substantially undermined. And if one Member State could do this, presumably all the others could as well.

That a Treaty article might be ‘directly effective’ in the domestic legal systems did not in itself address this problem. Direct effect is concerned with accessibility, not with hierarchy. If a domestic court could apply a provision of EEC law, but that provision was—according to the given Member State’s own constitution—of inferior hierarchical status to an inconsistent domestic law, then the EEC law would clearly not determine the outcome of the proceedings.

The question of hierarchy was thus of enormous importance to the functioning of Community law. Yet the text of the Treaty did not make any express statement as to the hierarchical relationship within domestic legal systems of the various provisions of EEC and national law. The nearest literal support within the Treaty for that proposition is found in Art 5. As suggested above, it is difficult to extract from this text any strong argument that provisions of EEC law—be they Treaty articles or secondary legislation—were to be regarded as normatively superior to incompatible provisions of domestic law. Nor had the ECJ been prepared squarely to address this matter in Van Gend. In that judgment, the Court offered at best an oblique hint that (certain types of) EEC law might be superior to (certain types of) domestic law in its observation that; ‘the Community constitutes a new legal order of international law for the benefit of which the states have limited their sovereign rights, albeit within limited fields.’³² Some two years later, the ECJ took a clearer position on this essential question.

Costa v ENEL* (1964)

Signor Costa was a political activist in Italy who was much opposed to recent Italian legislation which had brought Italy’s electricity supply industry under direct government control. The opponents of the legislation had invoked various political and legal challenges to the policy. Signor Costa’s part in the episode involved a refusal to pay a trifling sum of his electricity bill on the basis that: firstly, the relevant legislation was incompatible with various Treaty articles; secondly, the articles concerned were directly effective; and thirdly, that the articles possessed a superior status in domestic law to the legislation. If these three propositions were correct, the outcome would be that the Italian courts would Council failed to carry out its obligations cannot relieve the defendants from carrying out theirs’: ibid, at 629.

³² [1963] ECR I at 12. Under Dutch law, of course, Art 12 automatically took precedence over the inconsistent national legislation.

be obliged to refuse to apply the Italian legislation to the extent that it was consistent with EEC law.

That outcome was not required by Italian constitutional law at the time. As a matter of Italian law, the Treaty of Rome had the status of an ordinary statute passed by the national legislature. While it would override pre-existing statutes and lesser forms of domestic law, it was in turn inferior both to provisions of the Italian constitution and to subsequently enacted statutes. The Italian Constitutional Court had held in Signor Costa's case that the Treaty of Rome had not altered this basic principle of domestic law.³³ Both the accessibility of the Treaty articles concerned and their hierarchical status were matters for Italian law to determine. And as a matter of Italian law, the Treaty articles simply did not exist in the domestic legal system if they were inconsistent with subsequently enacted Italian legislation:

There is no doubt that the State is bound to honour its obligations, just as there is no doubt that an international treaty is fully effective in so far as a Law has given execution to it. But with regard to such Law, there must remain inviolate the prevalence of subsequent laws in accordance with the principles governing the succession of laws in time; it follows that any conflict between the one and the other cannot give rise to any constitutional matter. From the foregoing we reach the conclusion that for present purposes there is no point in dealing with the character of the EEC.³⁴

The irrelevance of national law

Following the position it had laid out in Van Gend, the ECJ, in contrast, evidently proceeded on the basis that there was 'no point in dealing with the character of Italian law'; the requirements of Italian constitutional law were irrelevant to the question of the status of EC law in the Member States:

...By contrast with ordinary international treaties, the EEC Treaty has created its own legal system which, on the entry into force of the Treaty, became an integral part of the legal systems of the Member States and which their courts are bound to apply.³⁵

The ECJ then turned to consider the nature of that 'independent source of law':

The transfer by the States from their domestic legal systems to the Community legal system of rights and obligations arising under the Treaty carries with it a permanent limitation of their sovereign rights, against which a subsequent unilateral act incompatible with the concept of the community cannot prevail.³⁶

The reason that such 'subsequent unilateral acts' could not prevail over Community law had an obvious, teleological, basis. If Member States were able to 'opt out' of Community laws which they found unpalatable, there would in effect be no 'common market' in a legal sense. A common market would require that Community law had uniform effect ³³ The Constitutional Court's judgment is reproduced along with the judgment of the ECJ in [1964] CMLR 425. For a more detailed treatment of the episode see Ruggeri Laderchi P (1998) 'Report on Italy', in Slaughter et al op cit. ³⁴ [1964] ECR 585 at 593.

³⁵ Ibid. An alternative way of framing this point—but one which leads to the same substantive result—is that the creation of the Community automatically and invisibly amended the constitutional laws of all of the Member States and, more importantly, thereafter prevented the Member States from amending their respective constitutions in a way that rejected the primacy of community law.

³⁶ Ibid. The ECJ's reference to 'permanency' is obviously problematic. It perhaps meant that the limitation applies while the country remained in the EEC, not that a Member State must stay in the EEC for ever. The Treaty made no explicit arrangements for a country to leave the Community. That result could have been 'legally' achieved through the Art 236 amendment process. But it might be thought that the 'ultimate political fact' was that a Member State could leave unilaterally if it wished.

throughout the Community: ‘The executive force of Community law cannot vary from one State to another in deference to subsequent domestic laws, without jeopardising the attainment of the objectives of the Treaty.’³⁷

The ECJ also offered a textual basis for this assertion, which it found in Art 189 of the Treaty:

The precedence of Community law is confirmed by Art 189, whereby a regulation ‘shall be binding and directly applicable in all Member States’. This provision, which is subject to no reservation, would be quite meaningless if a State could unilaterally nullify its effects by means of a legislative measure which could prevail over Community law.³⁸

The Court concluded with the observation that if its reasoning on this point was rejected, the Community simply could not exist in any meaningful sense:

It follows from all these observations that the law stemming from the Treaty, an independent source of law, could not, because of its special and original nature, be overridden by domestic legal provisions, however framed, without being deprived of its character as Community law and without the legal basis of the Community itself being called into question.³⁹

A principle of limited or wide scope?

The facts of Costa produced an apparent conflict between Treaty articles (ie the highest form of Community law) and domestic Italian legislation (ie a form of domestic law inferior to the provisions of the Italian constitution). If narrowly construed, the ECJ’s judgment might be taken to hold only that Treaty articles took precedence over national legislation. From such a perspective, it might be thought that a Treaty article did not take precedence over a national constitutional provision; nor that EEC secondary legislation would take precedence over domestic legislation or constitutional provisions. However, the ECJ’s judgment did not—and one assumes by design rather than accident—draw any distinction between different types of Community law or national law. Broadly construed, Costa asserts the blanket principle that all EEC law takes precedence over all national law, regardless of the various laws’ respective positions in their own internal normative hierarchy. Given the ECJ’s evident concern with ensuring the uniform substantive impact of Community law, and given the heterogeneity of normative legal hierarchies within the domestic legal systems of the Member States, adopting a blanket approach to the precedence of Community law would make obvious sense.

The judgment did not however seem to require that domestic law incompatible with the Community law be quashed or invalidated. The ECJ deployed rather less forceful terminology in identifying the practical way in which the precedence doctrine would be expressed. We are told that the domestic law ‘cannot prevail’, or that EEC law ‘cannot be overridden’ by the domestic law. This form of words might have been chosen in part for practical reasons. The ECJ presumably accepted that domestic laws which affected both EC nationals and people or organisations which did not derive any rights from the Treaty could properly be enforced by domestic courts against those non-EC nationals. It also seems likely that the ECJ was searching for a legal formula which—at least in symbolic terms—presented a less blunt challenge to the primacy of national law.

The ‘revolutionary’ implications of Van Gend and Costa

This latter point might be of considerable significance when one notes that the principle of precedence would be intimately linked with the principle of direct effect. If EEC law took precedence over domestic law and the EEC law in issue was directly effective then—in the ECJ’s view—the responsibility for not allowing domestic law to ‘prevail’ over EEC law would rest with the domestic courts. This would not cause any domestic constitutional difficulties in the Netherlands, where the constitution already mandated such a result. But in a country such as Italy, the interactive effect of the precedence and direct effect principles on the facts of a case such as Costa were utterly irreconcilable with orthodox constitutional understandings.

³⁷ Ibid.

³⁸ Ibid, at 594.

³⁹ Ibid.

The trial judge in Costa was presented with a decision of her national Constitutional Court which essentially told her that the EC law in issue was of no effect, while the judgment of the ECJ told her that the national law in issue could not be applied if it was inconsistent with directly effective Community law. The ECJ is telling the trial judge that domestic constitutional law hierarchies are irrelevant to EC law, while the Italian Constitutional Court is saying that EC law doctrine is irrelevant to national law. One might credibly assume that only a very bold judge in a low-level domestic court would conclude that she should follow the rulings of the recently established and ‘foreign’ ECJ rather than those of her own country’s highest court.⁴⁰

That observation highlights in a prosaic sense a point of much broader significance. In practical terms, Van Gend and Costa were simply declaratory statements of abstract legal principle. The ECJ’s judgments were not backed up by any kind of coercive force. If the principles laid out in those cases were to be effective determinants of legal relationships within the Community, those principles would have to be applied by national courts, either with the approval of, or in the face of, opposition from other governmental actors within the various Member States’ respective constitutional systems. In the mid-1960s, informed observers might well have doubted that such approval would be forthcoming.

Laws, conventions and ‘ultimate political facts’: the ‘empty chair crisis’ and the Luxembourg accords

The doctrines of precedence and direct effect evidently surprised several Member State governments. Van Gend and Costa also appeared just as the supra-national acceleration built into the Treaty, in the form of a move towards greater use of majority voting in the Council’s legislative process, became an imminent rather than distant reality. For the then French government, headed by General de Gaulle, this supra-national shift represented an unacceptable surrender of national autonomy to France’s partner states within the Community. De Gaulle’s government was particularly concerned by the prospect of losing its right of veto in the Council of Ministers over certain aspects of the Community’s agricultural policy regime. The possibility obviously arose that other Member State governments’ Ministers on the Council acting by qualified majority would enact regulations or directives on agricultural issues which the French government opposed.

The unhappy consequences, from De Gaulle’s perspective, of this occurring were exacerbated by the additional possibility—albeit remote—that French courts might accept that Van Gend and Costa required them to give precedence in the domestic legal system to such EEC secondary legislation even if that legislation conflicted with French law. Formally, the French constitution then in force accorded superior hierarchical status to ⁴⁰ It seems credible to assume that the ECJ was aware of this possibility and was anxious to avoid it becoming a reality. A point sometimes overlooked in respect of the Costa judgment is that of the four Treaty articles in issue, the ECJ held two not to be directly effective, lent the third a meaning that was essentially irrelevant to the argument Signor Costa raised, and held that the fourth granted the domestic court an extremely wide interpretive discretion. The case could thus be resolved on its facts in a way that accommodated the views of both the ECJ and the Italian Constitutional Court.

treaties to which France was a party than to domestic law. That formal position had no basis in reality however. It appeared to be an accepted political fact within the French constitutional tradition that no court would ever invalidate or refuse to apply domestic legislation on the basis that it contradicted provisions of international law to which France was a party.⁴¹

In 1965, in what has since become known as 'the empty chair crisis', the French government simply withdrew from the Council, and declined to take part in the Community's legislative process. The French government's wish was that even in respect of issues where the Treaty provided for the replacement of unanimous voting by majority processes, the Council should act only on the basis of unanimity in matters where a Member State's 'vital interests' were at stake.

France's absence from the Council obviously prevented the passage of any EEC legislation requiring unanimous approval. As a matter of EEC law, the other Member States could have continued to pass legislation which required only qualified majority or simple majority support. There would however have been little political point in them doing so if the French government was unwilling for that EEC law to have any effect in France. And even if French courts were to accept, in opposition to the likely view of the French government, that the implication of Van Gend and Costa was that any such directly effective law should be accorded precedence in domestic law, it would have seemed most unlikely that other Member States would have wished to provoke such internal constitutional conflict in France. It also seems that France's withdrawal from the Council would have breached Art 5, which could in turn have led to an Art 169 or 170 action. Again, however, this would not have been a practical course to pursue: its likely consequence would have been France's departure from the Community.

The French government's position amounted in effect to a denial of the legal basis of the Community and thus of the autonomous force of Community law. The 'empty chair' tactic indicated that the then French government regarded the Community merely as a form of political agreement which could simply be ignored whenever a Member State government found particular Community policies unpalatable.

The crisis was resolved in 1966 in a fashion which suggested that the other Member State governments accepted and approved this anti-legal perception of the nature of the EEC. The solution was laid out in the so-called 'Luxembourg Accords.' These 'reforms' to the Council's voting system were not introduced via a Treaty amendment per Art 236. Rather they were agreed by the Member States entirely outside the Treaty's legal structure, and were quite inconsistent with its terms. The nub of the Accords was an agreement that the Council would not invoke qualified or simple majority procedures on matters affecting a Member State's vital interests, but would delay adoption of any Commission recommendation until such time as unanimity could be achieved. The Accords did not clearly define what a 'vital' interest was; nor specify a timescale in which unanimity had to be achieved.⁴²

It is tempting to see the Accords as a 'convention' in the British sense.⁴³ Whether one can unproblematically apply such terminology is questionable. Yet they clearly amounted to a fundamentally important, but non-legal rule within the EEC's constitutional structure. Equally clearly, they refute the argument that the Treaty initially functioned as a de facto federal construct. France's action indicated that, contrary to the ECJ's statement in ⁴¹ See Plotner J (1998) 'Report on France', in Slaughter et al op cit.

⁴² See Nicol W (1984) 'The Luxembourg compromise' Journal of Common Market Studies 35.

⁴³ The 'reason' for it presumably being that without it France would leave the EEC, and the Community would collapse if it lost such an important member.

Costa, it had not ‘surrendered’ its sovereignty in any meaningful sense. It also suggested that ‘sovereignty’ might more sensibly be regarded as a political, rather than legal concept. Perhaps more accurately, it might be suggested that by the mid-1960s two distinct visions of the Community existed side by side. One vision, propounded by the ECJ, was of a community of law existing above matters of politics. The other, exemplified by the Luxembourg Accords, was of a community of politics for which law was no more than an optional and dispensable tool.

Questions of accessibility and hierarchy 2: the direct effect and precedence of decisions, regulations and directives

The ‘empty chair’ crisis did not seem to have any immediate impact on the ECJ’s evidently supra-national perception of its constitutional role. We may recall that in GCHQ the House of Lords concluded that the amenability of a government power to full judicial review should depend on its nature, not on its source.⁴⁴ We can see a similar rationale in the ECJ’s subsequent expansion of the reach of direct effect. In cases decided in the late-1960s and early-1970s, the ECJ confirmed in express terms the proposition that Van Gend identified a principle of broad application: if a provision of EEC law was ‘clear and unconditional’ in its nature, then its source was irrelevant to the question of its direct effect.

Politi (1971)—the direct effect and precedence of regulations

In Politi,⁴⁵ the ECJ held that if regulations created clearly defined individual rights, a citizen could invoke such rights before her own country’s courts. The ECJ did not rely on the ‘effet utile’ doctrine, or any other aspect of the controversial teleological interpretive strategy. Rather it simply pointed to the text of Art 189. This provided that regulations were to be ‘directly applicable’ in the Member States. One might wonder if ‘direct applicability’ means the same as ‘direct effect’. This is a complex legal point, but it need not detain us here, since most courts (including the ECJ) and commentators use the concepts interchangeably.⁴⁶ Notwithstanding this technical question, one can readily see why the ECJ might invoke a literalist approach to Treaty interpretation: it is less controversial, from an orthodox separation of powers perspective, for the Court to give a meaning to the Treaty’s precise words than to conjure a legal principle from its ‘spirit, scheme, and general wording’.

The ECJ also intimated—although in less than perfectly clear terms—that a regulation was a hierarchically superior form of law relative to any domestic legal provision: ‘The effect of a regulation, as provided for in Art 189, is therefore to prevent the implementation of any legislative measure, even if it is enacted subsequently, which is incompatible with its provisions.’⁴⁷ The ECJ’s reference to ‘any legislative measure’ was presumably intended to embrace laws enacted by national or sub-national legislatures. But would it extend also to the fundamental constitutional laws of the Member States?

As in Costa, the Court in Politi eschewed the language of ‘invalidation’ or ‘quashing’ of domestic law when describing the obligation which was imposed by EEC law on domestic courts. The responsibility of the domestic court would be to refuse to implement the domestic legislation to the extent of its inconsistency with directly effective EEC law.

⁴⁴ See ‘III. Full reviewability—the GCHQ case (1983)’, ch 4, pp 105–107 above.

⁴⁵ Case 43/71: [1971] ECR 1039.

⁴⁶ See Winter J (1972) ‘Direct applicability and direct effect: two distinct and different concepts in Community law’ Common Market Law Review 425; Pescatore P (1983) ‘The doctrine of direct effect: an infant disease of Community law’ European Law Review 155.

⁴⁷ [1971] ECR 1039 at para 9.

Grad (1970)—the direct effect of decisions

The Treaty text was less helpful in establishing the directly effective potential of decisions. Article 189 did not identify decisions as being directly applicable. Nevertheless, in its 1970 judgment in Grad, the ECJ reverted to a teleological form of reasoning to hold a decision could be directly effective:

It would be incompatible with the binding effect attributed to decisions by Article 189 to exclude in principle the possibility that persons affected may invoke the obligation imposed by a decision. Particularly in cases where, for example, the Community authorities by means of a decision have imposed an obligation on a Member State or all the Member States to act in a certain way, the effectiveness ('l'effet utile') of such a measure would be weakened if the nationals of that State could not invoke it in the courts and the national courts could not take it into consideration as part of Community law.⁴⁸

SACE SpA (1970)—the direct effect of directives

At the same time, the ECJ turned its attention to the question of whether a directive could have direct effect. The text of Art 189 did not obviously support that conclusion. Article 189 expressly provides that Member States would have discretion in choosing how to achieve the directive's intended result, which implied that Van Gend's criteria of negativity, precision, and unconditionality could not apply to this type of law. Yet in SACE SpA,⁴⁹ the ECJ answered the question before it in distinctly teleological terms. In deciding if a directive could be directly effective: 'it is necessary to consider not only the form of the measure at issue, but also its substance and its function in the system of the Treaty.'⁵⁰ The directive at issue in SACE SpA identified a date by which certain (clear and unconditional) Treaty obligations had to be fulfilled. The Court held that once that time limit expired, the directive's 'result' element became binding on the Member States to which it was addressed. If that result met the criteria of unconditionality and certainty, it could be directly effective. It did not matter that its source was a directive rather than a regulation or a Treaty article.

Cases like Grad and SACE SpA further illustrate the ECJ's teleological approach to its task. As well as confirming the 'nature not source' test, SACE SpA demonstrated the 'nature' a law must have to be directly effective was not fixed, since the 'result to be achieved' there required positive action by the Member States (ie abolishing all customs duties) rather than simply as in Van Gend, the negative restraint of not introducing new customs duties.

The precedence of decisions and directives?

In contrast to the position adopted in Politi, the ECJ in Grad offered little guidance on the question of whether a decision was hierarchically superior to any or all inconsistent domestic law. The ECJ said no more than that domestic courts should be able 'to take into consideration'⁵¹ the provisions of the decision in issue. Such phraseology certainly does not connote that the decision was hierarchically superior to domestic law. The Court was similarly evasive in SACE SpA, couching its conclusion on the point in minimalist and obscure terms, observing only that the directive concerned conferred 'rights' which the national courts must protect.

⁴⁸ Case 9/70: [1970] ECR 825.

⁴⁹ Case 33/70: [1970] ECR 1213.

⁵⁰ Ibid, at 1233.

⁵¹ [1970] ECR 825 at para 5.

Ending the uncertainty; the precedence of all EEC law over all domestic law?

While there was little scope for ambiguity in the ECJ's conclusion that regulations, directives and decisions were capable of having direct effect, the Court was remarkably inconclusive on the question of whether EEC law also required such EEC measures to possess a superior hierarchical status to some (or all) provisions of domestic law. This abstract jurisprudential question was one of profound political significance. Could it really be the case that EEC law demanded that national courts were required to grant precedence to any directly effective provision of EEC law if that provision was incompatible with a rule of domestic law? To pose the question more starkly: did EEC law require that even a piece of EEC secondary legislation—which a Member State may have opposed in Council, or which (in the case of a decision) might have been created solely by the Commission—overrode even a deeply entrenched provision of a Member State's constitution? The ECJ finally offered an answer to that question in 1970 as it encountered an acute conflict between its own effet utile jurisprudence and the provisions of the German constitution.

The German constitution had been radically remodelled after World War II. The country's system of governance was structured on a federal basis, with power divided between a bi-cameral national legislature and executive and a sub-national level of government (the Lande). Within the national governmental system, the government would be formed by the political party(ies) which commanded majority support in the lower house (Bundestag) of the legislature. As noted in chapter seven, the electoral system adopted for the Bundestag guaranteed a high level of congruence between a political party's electoral popularity and its representation in the Bundestag. The federal basis of the governmental system was substantively entrenched in the new constitution. The constitution also procedurally entrenched a series of basic human rights norms (the Basic Law) which could not be interfered with by either the national or Lande governments acting by simple majority. Such values could be overridden by a two-thirds majority in the national legislature. Echoing the position in the United States, the German constitution created a Federal Constitutional Court which was empowered to invalidate any executive or legislative measure which contravened the provisions of the Basic Law.

The Internationale Handelsgesellschaft litigation threw up a conflict between an EEC regulation controlling flour exports, and individual rights protected in Germany's 'Basic Law'. A Frankfurt court refused to enforce the regulations—which were accepted to be directly effective—because it considered them 'unconstitutional' under German law. In an Art 177 reference, the Frankfurt Court asked if it was obliged under EEC law to give precedence to the regulations even if they were inconsistent with the Basic Law. The ECJ's response was a forthright 'Yes':

Recourse to the legal rules of concepts of national law in order to judge the validity of measures adopted by the institutions of the Community would have an adverse effect on the uniformity and efficacy of Community law. The validity of such measures can only be judged in the light of Community law. In fact, the law stemming from the Treaty, an independent source of law, cannot because of its very nature be overridden by rules of national law, however framed, without being deprived of its character as Community law and without the legal basis of the Community itself being called in question. Therefore the validity of a Community measure or its effect within a Member State cannot be affected by allegations that it runs counter to either fundamental rights as formulated by the constitution of that State or the principle of a national constitutional structure.⁵²

⁵² Case 11/70: [1970] ECR 1125 at para 3.

The ECJ softened its judgment by observing that ‘the law’ it was charged to uphold by Art 164 included respect for fundamental human rights, implying it would invalidate any EEC secondary legislation which transgressed such principles.⁵³ This in itself is an innovative conclusion. It has an obvious political basis; Member States would be unlikely to remain in a Community in which other members could require them (through majority voting) to enforce laws violating their basic constitutional values. As such, it might be thought to be an essential part of the effet utile strategy. But its legal roots are obscure. There was no express textual human rights code within the Treaty of Rome against which the legality of regulations, directives or decisions could be measured. Article 119 prohibited gender discrimination in employment, while Art 7 prohibited discrimination based on national origins. However such ‘fundamental rights’ as freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, or the prohibition of racial discrimination did not feature in the Treaty’s text. Given the EEC’s initially limited ‘common market’ focus, the omission is perhaps unsurprising: the community was not (initially) competent in such ‘political’ matters. For countries such as Germany, whose constitutions safeguarded basic political values from their own legislatures or governments, this was a worrisome lacuna, as some EEC powers might cut across their own ‘fundamental rights’.

Member State judicial reaction to the direct effect and precedence of EEC law

The ECJ’s judgment in Internationale essentially told German courts that they were required by EEC law to refuse to give effect to the German Basic Law whenever that law contradicted a directly effective provision of Community law. More broadly, the judgment told all national courts—and all national governments and legislatures—that even their most deeply-entrenched constitutional values ‘could not prevail’ over any provision of EEC law. This forceful statement attracted a variety of responses from the courts of the Member States.

The German (judicial) reaction

When the Internationale case returned to Germany, the German Federal Constitutional Court⁵⁴ (FCC) accepted that the interpretation given by the ECJ to the regulations in issue meant that the regulations did not contravene Germany’s Basic Law. But, more importantly, the FCC refused to accept the ECJ’s conclusion of legal principle that any EEC law automatically took precedence over any domestic law. The FCC did not rule out the possibility that this principle could at some future date be consistent with the requirements of the German constitution. For the time being however, the Community’s own constitutional order had two deficiencies which prevented the ECJ’s ruling in Internationale being accepted by German courts:

[23] In this, the present state of integration of the Community is of crucial importance. The Community still lacks a democratically legitimated parliament directly elected by general suffrage which possesses legislative powers and to which the Community organs empowered to legislate are fully responsible on a political level; it still lacks in particular a codified catalogue

⁵³ This idea had first appeared in a 1969 ECJ judgment, Stauder v City of Ulm (Case 29/69) [1969] ECR 419 paras 25–27. The initiative has been attributed to a (prescient) concern in the ECJ that unease among the German judiciary about the lack of any human rights constraints on the actions of Community institutions would lead German courts to reject the direct effect and precedence doctrines; see Pescatore P (1972) ‘The protection of human rights in the European Communities’ CML Rev 73.

⁵⁴ [1974] 2 CMLR 540.

of fundamental rights, the substance of which is reliably and unambiguously fixed for the future in the same way as the substance of the Constitution and therefore allows a comparison and a decision as to whether, at the time in question, the Community law standard with regard to fundamental rights generally binding in the Community is adequate in the long term measured by the standard of the Constitution with regard to fundamental rights...

The FCC claimed it retained the power to evaluate EEC laws against Germany's Basic Law, clearly implying it would not allow inferior German courts to give automatic precedence to EEC laws until the 'fundamental human rights' and 'democratically elected parliament' principles were firmly established within the EEC's own internal constitutional order.⁵⁵ (The judgment is widely referred to as 'Solange No 1': 'so long as' the Community lacks an effective judicial mechanism to ensure that secondary legislation complies with human rights norms and lacks an obviously 'democratic' legislative process, German law will not afford precedence to EEC secondary legislation which appeared to contradict the Basic Law).

It is important to stress that the FCC was only going so far as to indicate that it might be prepared to allow all EEC law to be directly effective (ie the accessibility issue) in Germany and to take precedence (ie the hierarchy issue) over any inconsistent national law. The FCC was certainly not prepared to accept the ECJ's position on the third element of the domestic law status of EEC law question—namely the location of interpretive competence. If EEC law in Germany was to be directly effective and superior to domestic law it would be so as a matter of German constitutional law, not—as the ECJ maintained—simply because it was EEC law.

The German court's refusal to accept the autonomous effect of EEC law within Germany may be explained in part by a concern that the precedence principle betokened an unacceptable loss of German national sovereignty to the institutions of the Community. But the implications of the precedence and direct effect doctrines for orthodox understandings of sovereignty within Member States are also profound. A second explanation for the German court's conclusion is that if the ECJ's views were correct, the German government, acting through the mechanism of EC secondary legislation, would be able to achieve legally defensible political objectives that were beyond its power as a matter of domestic constitutional law. Relatedly, a government supported by a simple legislative majority might achieve results which the constitution reserved to a two thirds legislative majority. Further, and this point was perhaps of especial concern to the FCC, that court would also lose its status as the ultimate determinant of the meaning of the law in Germany whenever the matter in issue had an EEC dimension. To put the matter simply, EEC accession had significant implications not just for the locus of legal sovereignty in a trans-national sense (ie flowing from a country to the Community), but also in an intra-national sense (ie from one branch of national government to other branches).

The Belgian (judicial) reaction

The differential impact of the ECJ's effet utile jurisprudence on Member States as a result of the variegated constitutional structures within the six countries is neatly illustrated by comparing the reception afforded to the Internationale principle by Germany's Federal Constitutional Court with the contemporaneous response made by Belgium's Cour de Cassation. At that point, the orthodox understanding of the relationship between domestic law and international law under Belgium's constitutional arrangements was that international law would be enforceable in domestic courts only if the relevant treaty had been incorporated by legislation. The treaty would then—qua statute—override any previously enacted domestic legislation, but would in turn itself be overridden by any subsequently enacted statute.⁵⁶

⁵⁵ This account is necessarily rather simplistic. For a detailed consideration of a fascinating story see Alter K (2001) Establishing the supremacy of European law ch 3 (Oxford: Clarendon Press); Klott J (1998) 'Report on Germany', in Slaughter et al op cit.

The EEC Treaty had been so incorporated by Belgian legislation. The issue before the Cour de Cassation in Minister for Economic Affairs v SA Fromagerie Franco-Suisse 'Le Ski',⁵⁷ was whether—as orthodox domestic constitutional theory seemed to demand—Belgian courts should accept that directly effective EEC law was overridden by subsequently enacted and inconsistent Belgian legislation. In Le-Ski, the Cour de Cassation turned this traditional understanding on its head:

[8] The rule that a statute repeals a previous statute in so far as there is a conflict between the two, does not apply in the case of a conflict between a treaty and a statute.

[9] In the event of a conflict between a norm of domestic law and a norm of international law which produces direct effects in the internal legal system, the rule established by the treaty shall prevail. The primacy of the treaty results from the very nature of international treaty law.

[10] This is a fortiori the case when a conflict exists, as in the present case, between a norm of internal law and a 'norm' of Community law. The reason is that the treaties which have created Community law have instituted a new legal system in whose favour the member States have restricted the exercise of their sovereign powers in the areas determined by those treaties...

[12] It follows from all these considerations that it was the duty of the judge to set aside the application of provisions of domestic law that are contrary to this Treaty provision.

The Cour de Cassation's judgment—which in textual terms clearly drew heavily on Van Gend and Costa—might initially seem surprising, given that it betokened a substantial transfer of sovereign legal power on a trans-national basis from Belgium's Parliament to the Community. But it also entailed a substantial transfer of power in the intra-national sense, in that the Belgian courts were now claiming to be empowered to refuse to apply certain provisions of domestic legislation; an authority that the Belgian judiciary, in contrast to the powers enjoyed by the FCC in Germany, had previously not possessed.⁵⁸ The Cour de Cassation was undoubtedly taking something of a risk in domestic political terms by effectively amending the constitution in this way. It seems however that the Cour could justifiably have concluded that its initiative would not be much opposed by other governmental institutions.⁵⁹

The French (judicial) reaction

The judicial strands of France's constitutional tapestry produced a further complication for any attempts to explain in general terms the impact of the ECJ's effet utile jurisprudence. The French constitution recognises a functional and institutional split between the legislative, executive and judicial branches of the governmental system. But the French judicial system has long been institutionally fragmented, divided between public law courts (topped by the Conseil d'Etat) and private law courts (topped by the Cour de Cassation). That institutional fragmentation had never been, in ideological terms, a happy one. To put the matter crudely, the Conseil d'Etat was (as were the public law courts generally) widely regarded—and certainly by its own members—as a far more ⁵⁶ See generally Bribosia H (1998) 'Report on Belgium' in Slaughter et al op cit.

⁵⁷ [1972] CMLR 330.

⁵⁸ Albeit of course that this would entail an acceptance by the Belgian courts of their subordination to the ECJ in respect of community law issues.

⁵⁹ See Bribosia op cit at pp 18–21.

important and prestigious organisation than the Cour de Cassation (and the private law courts generally)⁶⁰ The Conseil d'Etat also claimed the ultimate jurisdiction to decide if a particular matter raised a public law or private law issue. That jurisdiction in effect placed the Conseil d'Etat in a superior constitutional position to the Cour de Cassation.

As noted above, Art 55 of the French constitution notionally empowered the Conseil d'Etat to give precedence to international law over domestic legislation. This seemed however to be a power that would never be exercised for political reasons. And the Conseil d'Etat initially showed no inclination to accept that such a result was required in respect of EEC law as a result of France's membership of the Community.

The issue raised before the Conseil d'Etat in *Syndicat Generale des Fabricants de Semoules*⁶¹ was stark and simple. Should the French courts refuse to apply a French statute that was inconsistent with a directly effective EEC regulation? Semoules was argued early in 1968, so pre-dated the ECJ's secondary legislation effet utile judgments in Politi, Grad and SACE SpA. But both Van Gend and Costa had been decided by this point.

The advisory opinion of the *Commissaire du Gouvernement*⁶² focused briefly on the evident inconsistency between the theory and practice of the constitution in respect of the domestic status of international law:

To be sure, under Article 55 of the Constitution a treaty which has been duly ratified has, as from its publication, an authority superior to that of statutes. The Constitution thus affirms a pre-eminence of international law over internal law and numerous voices (nearly all of the academic writers) have been raised to say that a provision which makes our Constitution one of the most receptive to an international legal order should not remain a dead letter.

But the administrative court cannot make the effort which is asked of it without altering, by its mere will, its institutional position.

It may neither criticise nor misconstrue a statute. That consideration has always led it to refuse to examine grounds based on the constitutional invalidity of a statute...

The opinion then concluded that the Conseil should not depart from its previous practice. The Conseil itself endorsed this position, holding simply and briefly that the French legislation at issue was a valid law.

Both the Commissaire and the Conseil reached their respective conclusions without making any reference at all to either Van Gend or Costa. The ECJ's effet utile jurisprudence was, it seemed, not just unpersuasive in determining the domestic status of EEC law in France; it was completely irrelevant.

A quite different attitude to EEC law was however taken by the Cour de Cassation in Administration des Douanes v Societe Cafes Jacques Vebre.⁶³ The question raised was whether a domestic court should decline to apply a French statute placing a discriminatory tax on coffee imported from Holland, which tax was apparently inconsistent with the provisions of Art 95 of the Treaty.⁶⁴ In complete contrast to the position adopted by the Conseil d'Etat in Semoules, the Cour de Cassation upheld the judgment of a lower (private law) court which had given practical effect to Art 55 of the constitution; namely that international law to which France was a party took precedence over contradictory ⁶⁰ See generally Neville-Brown L and Bell J (5th edn, 1997) French administrative law ch 4.

⁶¹ [1970] CMLR 395.

⁶² An officer of the Conseil whose function is analogous to that of the Advocate-General before the ECJ; See Neville-Brown and Bell op cit pp 104–105.

⁶³ [1975] 2 CMLR 336.

⁶⁴ Which the ECJ had held to be directly effective in Lutticke (Case 57/65) [1966] ECR 205.

domestic legislation.⁶⁵ The Cour de Cassation did not invoke any ECJ authority to sustain this proposition.

This might suggest that the Cour de Cassation was ‘simply’ adopting a different reading of the requirements of Art 55 of the constitution from that taken by the Conseil d’Etat. In domestic political terms, that would have been a boldly confrontational course for the Cour de Cassation to adopt, since it strikes at the superior constitutional position of the Conseil d’Etat and at the legislature’s practical immunity from the formal requirements of Art 55.

However, the Cour de Cassation also intimated that it was minded to accept the autonomous force principle of EEC law. Article 55 of the French constitution conditioned the (theoretical) domestic precedence of international law on the principle of reciprocity. But the Cour de Cassation rejected the suggestion that the question of whether or not Holland was in compliance with Art 95 had any relevance to the status of Art 95 in France, in essence adopting—but not expressly citing—the reasoning offered by the ECJ over ten years earlier in Dairy Products:⁶⁶

[7] But in the Community legal order the failings of a member-State of the European Economic Community to comply with the obligations falling on it by virtue of the Treaty of 25 March 1957 are subject to the procedure laid down by Article 170 of that Treaty and so the plea of lack of reciprocity cannot be made before the national courts.

This element of the judgment raises the inference that the Cour de Cassation saw in the effet utile principle a means to call into question or even overcome its previously subordinate position within the French constitutional system vis à vis the Conseil D’Etat.⁶⁷

The Italian (judicial) reaction

By this time, the Italian Constitutional Court was intimating that it had modified its own approach as laid out in Costa to the domestic status of EEC law. The issue before the Court in *Frontini v Minister delle Finanze*⁶⁸ was whether—as a matter of domestic constitutional law—all EEC secondary legislation was to be regarded as of equivalent status to Italian legislation? The Court’s answer to the question was a qualified ‘Yes’. In contrast to the concerns raised by the German Federal Constitutional Court, the Italian Court considered that the law-making procedures of the Community and the ECJ’s capacity to review the legality of secondary legislation were already sufficient robust to enable Italian law to extend what we might term a strong but rebuttable presumption of validity to EEC regulations, decisions, or directives.⁶⁹ The Court nonetheless stressed that this result arose as a matter of Italian law, not EEC law; and the judgment stressed that if it appeared that EEC secondary legislation was incompatible with fundamental values in the Italian constitution: ‘[T]his Court would control the continuing compatibility of the Treaty with the above-mentioned fundamental principles.’⁷⁰ The judgment did not obviously resolve the question of the precedence of EEC law vis-à-vis subsequently enacted domestic legisla-

⁶⁵ ‘[5] But the Treaty of 25 March 1957, which by virtue of the abovementioned Article of the Constitution has an authority greater than that of statutes, institutes a separate legal order integrated with that of the member-States. Because of that separateness, the legal order which it has created is directly applicable to the nationals of those States and is binding on their courts. Therefore the Cour d’Appel was correct and did not exceed its powers in deciding that Article 95 of the Treaty was to be applied in the instant case, and not section 265 of the Customs Code, even though the latter was later in date.’

⁶⁶ See ‘EEC law as an autonomous legal force’, pp 351–352 above.

⁶⁷ And for the private law courts en masse to escape their presumed subordinacy to the public courts in general. See the discussion in Alter op cit ch 4; Plotner op cit.

⁶⁸ [1974] 2 CMLR 372.

⁶⁹ See in particular paras 16–19 of the judgment.

⁷⁰ Ibid, at para 21.

tion. But the tone of the Court's reasoning perhaps suggested that when the Costa issue came before it again, its understanding of the domestic legal position would change.

Conclusion

These episodes serve as a useful corrective to misleadingly simplistic assertions that conflicts created by Community law simply and invariably pit the interests of an homogenous, monolithic EEC against a similarly homogenous, monolithic Member State. Such a bald dichotomy ignores the point that in both ideological and institutional terms the Community itself and its Member States are often likely to be highly fragmented constructs. In an ideological sense, it is entirely likely that major political parties within any given Member State will simultaneously hold quite different views on the desirability of Community intervention in certain fields. A change of government in a Member State may therefore produce a quite different domestic response to particular Community laws or policies. Similarly, in a country organised on a federal basis where the national and sub-national levels of government are controlled by different political parties, EEC initiatives might often attract both enthusiastic support and vociferous opposition from the various tiers of domestic government. And, perhaps most significantly from a constitutional lawyer's perspective, the ECJ's effet utile jurisprudence opened up the possibility of particular branches of a Member State's governmental system (most obviously but not exclusively the courts) stepping beyond the purely domestic constitutional constraints controlling their authority.

It would be equally misleading to assume that the Community can be regarded as a single entity, whether in structural or ideological terms. A diversity of political views is likely to exist between the various Member State governments when they sit as law-makers on the Council of Ministers. It is quite possible that a majority of Member State governments on the Council will disapprove of initiatives proposed by the Commission; that a majority of members of the Assembly/Parliament will take yet another view; and that the ECJ may conclude that any measure that does make its way through the Community's legislative process is unlawful.

It might be thought that these many complications were a readily discernible feature of the Community and Member States' political and legal landscapes in the early 1970s. But in the United Kingdom, where a prolonged and vigorously fought political battle to take the country into the Community was nearing its end, there was no obvious evidence that these points had been taken on board by Ministers, or by legislators, or by the judiciary—and still less by the public at large.

II. United Kingdom accession

British governments tried to take the country into the EEC twice during the 1960s. However new states could only be admitted with the consent of all the existing members, and on both occasions the French government vetoed British entry. The then (Conservative) Prime Minister Harold Macmillan regarded membership as a central element of his government's foreign and economic policy, and had assigned Edward Heath the task of negotiating terms of entry. Macmillan and Heath were, however, thwarted by De Gaulle's firm belief that British entry would lead to Anglo-American domination of the Community.⁷¹ The Labour Party at that time opposed entry; its then leader, Hugh ⁷¹ See Horne op cit pp 444–451.

Gaitskell, suggested membership would mean ‘the end of a thousand years of history’ of Britain as a sovereign state. Gaitskell’s historical sense was rather bizarre, but although a significant minority of Labour MPs favoured accession, most (including the next leader, Harold Wilson) then shared his sentiments.⁷² Wilson subsequently changed his mind, and his government (supported by many Conservative MPs and opposed by thirty-five Labour backbenchers) applied for entry in 1967. This too was vetoed by De Gaulle.

British opponents drew on two substantial political arguments against accession. The first related to Britain’s world role. Opponents of EEC entry felt that Britain should align itself with the Commonwealth countries and the USA, linking those nations to the EEC, rather than risk merging into a ‘European super-state’. The second argument focused on ‘sovereignty’. The principles of precedence and direct effect alarmed a small number of British politicians. This faction feared that some of Parliament’s powers would be irretrievably lost to Community institutions. Opponents of entry argued that such a transfer of political power was undesirable. But some also argued that it was constitutionally impossible for Britain to honour the obligations EEC membership entailed. We need here to recall two key elements of Diceyan theory: that Parliament cannot bind itself or its successors; and that no British court is competent to say that a statute is unconstitutional.

If we translate Costa and Internationale into orthodox British constitutional language, we seem to say that Parliament could no longer pass legislation inconsistent with EEC law; that any Parliament which incorporated the Treaty into British law would bind itself and its successors not to breach EEC law in the future. The direct effect principle articulated in Van Gend, Politi, Grad and SACE SpA is equally problematic from the viewpoint of orthodox, Diceyan theory. The principle demanded that if Parliament enacted a statute which contradicted a directly effective EEC provision, but which did not also withdraw Britain from the Community, a British court would have to refuse to apply that statute. Thus, the courts, via the medium of EEC law, would have a higher constitutional status than Parliament on EEC matters.⁷³ Furthermore, the ECJ’s teleological approach to Treaty and legislative interpretation was incompatible with British courts’ more literalist tradition; EEC membership would thus demand that the constitution abandon its traditional approach to the separation of powers.

EEC membership and parliamentary sovereignty: the legislators’ views—and their votes

With the benefit of hindsight, the earliest efforts of British commentators to analyse the potential impact of EEC membership on the British constitution appear woefully inadequate.⁷⁴ By the late 1960s, such analyses were becoming more sophisticated. Professor de Smith produced a prescient article in 1971, identifying the EEC as ‘an inchoate functional federation’, which while not initially a federal state, was likely to evolve in a direction demanding the ‘pooling’ of sovereignty.⁷⁵ de Smith suggested national sovereignty need not be abandoned if the UK acceded to the Treaty, since it might always withdraw from the Community. Nevertheless, he also presumed (in terms reminiscent of Wade’s seminal ⁷² Pimlott op cit pp 245–248; Jenkins R (1991) A life at the centre pp 144–146.

⁷³ It seems that few MPs grasped this point. Most viewed Parliament’s ‘sovereignty’ as something which might be lost to the EC, not to the domestic courts; see Nicol D (1999) ‘The legal constitution: United Kingdom Parliament and European Court of Justice’ Journal of Legislative Studies 131.

⁷⁴ See Keenan P (1962) ‘Some legal consequences of Britain’s entry into the European Common Market’ Public Law 327.

⁷⁵ de Smith S (1971) ‘The constitution and the Common Market: a tentative appraisal’ 34 MLR 597 at pp 597 and 614. Interestingly, the article made no reference at all to Van Gend.

analysis of parliamentary sovereignty) that 'full recognition of the hierarchical superiority of Community law would entail a revolution in legal thought.'⁷⁶ de Smith expected that a 'reformulation' of traditional understandings would suffice to deal with the likely eventuality of unintended conflicts between EEC and domestic law, and that such reformulation might be achieved by the simple expedient of the domestic courts presuming that Parliament never intended to breach EEC law and interpreting domestic legislation accordingly. This 'solution' might of course demand that the notion of 'interpretation' would itself have to be reinterpreted in a manner quite inconsistent with dominant British understandings of the courts' proper constitutional role.

The courts' traditional approach to international law would be inadequate for these purposes. We saw in chapter two that unincorporated treaties have no binding force in domestic law. However, that does not mean they are entirely without legal effect. British courts will assume that Parliament does not intend accidentally to legislate in breach of the country's treaty obligations. Thus in circumstances where a statute's phraseology could bear more than one meaning, the courts will choose whichever meaning best corresponds to the international obligations. Similarly, if a treaty has been incorporated into domestic law, subsequent statutes will be construed, in so far as their language is ambiguous, in a manner consistent with the obligations enacted in the incorporating statute. This interpretive technique would be of no assistance when a later statute expressly repealed or was impliedly irreconcilable with the incorporating legislation. It would also seem incompatible with the ECJ's characterisation of the Treaty as a 'new legal order', quite unlike other international law.

Professor Wade recommended more radical steps. He suggested either that a standard clause be inserted into every domestic statute enacted after accession, providing that the legislation took effect subject to the precedence of EEC law. Alternatively, Parliament might annually enact (with retrospective effect) a statute reaffirming the precedence principle.⁷⁷

Successive governments remained unconvinced of the need for such measures. Harold Wilson's 1966–1970 Labour government had made the extraordinary suggestion that all EEC measures would take effect in the United Kingdom as delegated legislation,⁷⁸ an analysis which betokens the subordinacy rather than precedence of Community law. Edward Heath's 1970–1974 administration, which eventually secured the UK's accession, seemed similarly confused. The government boldly stated that while it would introduce a Bill to incorporate the Treaty into domestic law, 'there is no question of any erosion of essential national sovereignty.'⁷⁹ The distinction between 'essential' and (presumably) 'non-essential' sovereignty is a novel one, and was replaced when the aforesaid Bill was before the Commons by a different but equally legally nonsensical proposition. MPs were informed by a government spokesman that nothing in the Bill undermined the 'ultimate' sovereignty of Parliament. What might happen to Parliament's penultimate or anti-penultimate sovereignty (whatever those strange creatures might be) was unclear! Neither of the main parties seemed willing to accept that it was either desirable or possible to entrench the precedence principle. The 1967 government had seemed to accept the inevitability of the Diceyan perspective, observing that if the UK was to honour its EEC

⁷⁶ Ibid., at 613.

⁷⁷ (1972) 'Sovereignty and the European Communities' 88 LQR 1–5. For a survey of other contemporaneous suggestions see Trinidad F (1972) 'Parliamentary sovereignty and the primacy of community law' 35 MLR 375.

⁷⁸ (1967) Legal and constitutional implications of United Kingdom membership of the European Communities para 22 (Cmnd 3301).

⁷⁹ (1971) The United Kingdom and the European Communities para 29 (Cmnd 4715).

obligations, 'Parliament would have to refrain from passing fresh legislation inconsistent with [Community] law.'⁸⁰

That is, however, not a legal solution. It may be that politicians of both parties adopted such equivocal positions because they feared that candid recognition of the Costa, Van Gend and Internationale principles would further harden internal opposition to accession, which, as we see below, already presented a threat to the government's European ambitions. Equally plausibly, it may be that they simply did not properly understand the legal significance of the step they were about to take.⁸¹

The European Communities Act 1972—the passage

The political question as to the desirability of EC membership exposed some unusual divisions in the, by then, firmly established split between the Labour and Conservative parties. Both the Labour left and Conservative right wings opposed the idea. Both factions disliked the partial 'loss' of sovereignty they assumed accession would entail, since that would reduce their capacity (should they ever form a Commons majority) to promote legislation favouring their respective (very different) political ideologies. The support for membership of some more centrist MPs in both parties depended on the entry terms (especially Britain's budget contribution) that the government negotiated. We will return to these divisions on several occasions, but we might gain an initial appreciation of the EEC's capacity to cut across party lines by examining the Commons' vote on the 1971 Bill.

Accession would have two domestic phases: a Commons vote on whether to accept the entry terms which, if successful, would be followed by the Bill 'incorporating' the Treaty into domestic law. At the 1970 election the Conservatives had won 330 seats, Labour 287, and the small parties 13. A rebellion by fewer than twenty anti-EEC Conservatives would have deprived the Heath government of a majority. Heath himself was passionately pro-accession: the great majority of Conservative MPs supported him, but forty announced they would not approve the terms.

Labour was more deeply split. As Prime Minister in the late 1960s, Wilson had supported EEC membership, reversing his previous opposition. In 1971, he and most of his Shadow Cabinet again opposed it. The 1971 Labour Party Conference voted overwhelmingly against membership, and Wilson authorised a three line whip instructing Labour MPs to vote against the terms. Sixty-nine Labour MPs, led by the Shadow Chancellor Roy Jenkins, defied the whip and voted with the government; a further twenty abstained. The government majority was 112. Had the whip been respected, the terms would have been rejected. This would probably not have been regarded as a resigning issue, as Heath had allowed Conservative MPs a free vote.

But while many Labour MPs approved the terms, they would not defy the whip on votes during the Bill's passage, in part because Heath had announced that he would treat the second reading as a confidence issue.⁸² Only a few (Jenkins foremost among them) elevated what they saw as Britain's national interest in joining the EEC above questions of party loyalty. On the Bill's third reading, the government's majority was just seventeen. For the moment, at least, the UK had entered the EEC. What now fell to be determined was the constitutional adequacy of the legislation enacted.

⁸⁰ Quoted in Wade 1972 op cit at pp 2–3.

⁸¹ Cf Nicol D (1999) op cit.

⁸² Norton (1978) op cit pp 363–364.

The European Communities Act 1972—the terms

As we saw in chapter two,⁸³ a government cannot change British law by using its prerogative powers to sign a treaty. If a treaty's terms are to be effective in British law, they must be given domestic legal status of some sort by statute. Parliament sought to determine the domestic status of Community law in the European Communities Act 1972 (ECA 1972). Four sections of the Act merit attention here, in terms of their consistency both with orthodox British constitutional theory and the ECJ's principles of precedence and direct effect.

Section 1 listed the various treaties to which the Act would apply. It also provided that the government might add new treaties to the list by using Orders in Council. This could be seen as a form of Henry VIII clause, in so far as it effectively allowed the government (via its prerogative powers) to give domestic effect to treaties, which treaties would by virtue of the lex posterior principle override existing domestic legislation.

Section 2(1), while framed in ungainly language, seems to provide that all directly effective EEC law will be immediately enforceable in domestic courts:

All such rights, powers, liabilities, obligations and restrictions from time to time arising by or under the Treaties, as in accordance with the Treaties are without further enactment to be given legal effect...in the United Kingdom shall be recognised and available in law, and be enforced, allowed and followed accordingly...

Section 2(2)(a) empowers the government, either through Orders in Council or statutory instruments, to 'translate' any non-directly effective EEC law into domestic law. Section 2(4) then provides that '... any enactment passed or to be passed... shall be construed and have effect subject to the forgoing provisions of this section.' Section 3(1) then states that:

For the purpose of all legal proceedings any question as to the meaning or effect of any of the Treaties, or as to the validity meaning or effect of any Community instrument shall be...[determined] in accordance with the principles laid down by and any relevant decision of the European Court.

There are several principles of startling constitutional significance in the ECA's few words. There is no constitutional difficulty in the ECA 1972 telling a court to give effect to EEC obligations even if there is a contradictory rule of common law. The ECA 1972 obviously overrides any inconsistent rule of common law. Nor would any problem arise if a directly effective measure of EEC law was inconsistent with a statutory provision which predated the coming into force of the ECA 1972. The ECA, as the later statute, would ensure that the EEC measure would prevail. But what would happen if the inconsistent British statutory provision was enacted after the ECA 1972 came into force?

The 'passed or to be passed' formula of s 2(4) seemed to instruct the courts that any such Act would not have domestic legal effect. As we saw in chapter two, Parliament had produced such forward-looking legislation before. The Treaty of Union was incorporated by an Act which said some of its provisions would endure forever.⁸⁴ But those provisions have been repealed. Similarly, the courts held that s 7(1) of the Acquisition of Land Act was impliedly repealed by an inconsistent later Act. Why should the ECA 1972 be any different? Indeed, how could it be any different? To recognise it as a ‘special’ statute would undermine the entire basis of the parliamentary sovereignty doctrine.

⁸³ See 'Inconsistency with international law', ch 2, pp 32–34 above.

⁸⁴ This is to take a Diceyan view of the Treaty's status, rather than to see it as a 'constituent' document establishing the British state; see 'Is parliamentary sovereignty a British or English concept?' ff, ch 2, pp 43–46 above.

How the courts would respond to these novel instructions was a matter for speculation. Writing in an academic journal, prior to the ECA 1972 coming into force, Lord Diplock had argued:

It is a consequence of the doctrine of [parliamentary sovereignty] that if a subsequent Act... were passed that was in conflict with any provision of the Treaty which is of direct application... the courts of the United Kingdom would be bound to give effect to the Act... notwithstanding any conflict.⁸⁵

For Lord Diplock, it seemed, there could be nothing ‘special’ about the ECA 1972. Lord Denning was initially rather more equivocal.

Parliamentary sovereignty: a non-justiciable concept?

Opponents of accession had lost the political argument. In a last effort to prevent entry, they tried a legal approach. In Blackburn v A-G,⁸⁶ Mr Blackburn asked the Court of Appeal to declare that it would be unconstitutional for the government to sign the Treaty of Rome, because to do so would amount to an irreversible surrender of parliamentary sovereignty.

In terms of domestic constitutional principle, this was an outlandish contention in two senses. Firstly, of course, orthodox constitutional theory wholly rejected the proposition that Parliament could limit its sovereignty, still less that the government could achieve this result. Secondly, for the government to sign the Treaty would require an exercise of the prerogative. In 1971, long before GCHQ, hardly any prerogative powers were subject to full judicial review. Even after GCHQ, treaty ratification is a non-justiciable prerogative power, within Lord Roskill’s ‘excluded categories’. Consequently, the Court of Appeal told Mr Blackburn that it could not intervene.

Mr Blackburn’s argument was however quite consistent with the ECJ’s judgments in Van Gend, Costa and Internationale. At the risk of being repetitive, it might again be emphasised that those judgments did not simply assert the precedence and direct effect of EEC law; they also asserted that Member States did not have the legal capacity to control the domestic status of EEC law. According to the analysis offered by the ECJ in Van Gend, the Heath government’s ratification of the Treaty of Accession would curtail the United Kingdom’s (by which one means Parliament’s) complete autonomy to control its constitution.

While the Court of Appeal did not appear to acknowledge this point in explicit terms, Lord Denning did make some interesting comments about the impact EEC membership would have on parliamentary sovereignty:

We have all been brought up to believe that, in legal theory, one Parliament cannot bind another and that no Act is irreversible. But legal theory does not always march alongside political reality.⁸⁷

At this point in his judgment, Lord Denning referred approvingly to Professor Wade’s 1955 article on parliamentary sovereignty in which Wade had argued that the root of ⁸⁵ (1972) ‘The Common Market and the common law’ Law Teacher 3 at p 8.

⁸⁶ [1971] 1 WLR 1037, [1971] 2 All ER 1380.

⁸⁷ [1971] 1 WLR 1037 at 1040.

the parliamentary sovereignty principle lay in 'ultimate political facts'.⁸⁸ But what is not clear from Blackburn is whether Denning thought that accession might entail the irrevocable surrender of sovereignty or merely the lending of it. The Court of Appeal assumed that Parliament would not legislate contrary to EEC obligations. If it did, what would the courts decide? Lord Denning was non-committal; 'We will consider that event when it happens.'⁸⁹ As one might expect, 'it' seemed to happen rather quickly. But in the interim, the ECJ had been continuing its teleological approach to EEC law, and the UK's political argument about membership had reawakened.

The 1975 referendum

Labour's two narrow election victories in 1974 brought into power a party deeply split over the desirability of EEC membership. Labour's 1974 manifestos had promised that voters would be given the opportunity to vote on continued membership by either another general election or a referendum. A third general election was not a plausible option, so a referendum seemed inevitable. The question which then arose was how the referendum should be conducted. Having renegotiated the UK's terms of membership, Prime Minister Wilson set off down a political path along which several constitutional principles fell by the wayside.

The first casualty was the convention of Cabinet unanimity. Wilson decided to 'suspend' the convention for the referendum campaign. His justification was that the question transcended party politics, although most commentators suggest his real motivation for both the referendum itself and the suspension was his assumption that there was no other way to keep his party together. The party's National Executive Committee had voted against remaining in the Community.⁹⁰ It was then announced that seven (identified) members of Wilson's Cabinet opposed continued membership, as did many backbench Labour MPs. A Commons motion approving the new terms was carried by a majority of 226; but only 137 of the 315 Labour MPs voted in favour. The success of government policy was entirely dependent on Conservative support. The second casualty was the Burkean notion of the MP as a representative law-maker rather than the delegate of her voters. Parliament had in effect chosen to divest itself of its sovereignty on membership, by allowing the people the unusual opportunity of expressing an opinion on a single matter, rather than, as in general elections, on a package of issues. Neither the government nor Parliament was legally bound to respect the outcome of the referendum, although one imagines it would have been impossible, as a matter of practical politics, to do otherwise.

The EEC thus brought to the forefront of British politics the fundamental question of the desirability of leaving all political issues to be determined by a bare parliamentary majority. Some commentators suggested the EEC referendum might have a 'ripple effect', in convincing Parliament that there were other issues on which the 'the people's' views should be directly ascertained. In the 1890s, Dicey had written approvingly of referendums as devices for 'the people' to express authoritative opinions on matters of great constitutional significance; although given his stunted perception of 'the people', it would be rash to see this approval as espousing an avowedly 'democratic' position.⁹¹

⁸⁸ See 'Are Trethowan, Harris and Ranasinghe relevant to the British situation?', ch 2, pp 40–42 above.

⁸⁹ [1971] 1 WLR 1037 at 1040.

⁹⁰ Irving R (1975) 'The United Kingdom referendum, June 1975' European Law Review 3; Pimlott op cit pp 654–660 suggests that Wilson feared that, in a repeat of 1931, Roy Jenkins would play the MacDonald role and emerge as the Leader of a predominantly Conservative coalition government.

⁹¹ See Irving op cit.

Such a conclusion is perhaps more justifiable in respect of the 1975 referendum. The campaign was not fought along traditional party lines, but might crudely be described as a contest in which right wing Conservatives and the left of the Labour party united in opposing membership, while the Labour centre-right and Conservative centre-left supported it. Both sides received substantial funds from the government to publicise their arguments. The question was very simple: ‘Do you think that the United Kingdom should stay in the European Community (the Common Market)?’. The result was a resounding victory for the pro-EEC lobby; 67.2% to 32.8% on a 65% turnout.

Thereafter, constitutional orthodoxies promptly reasserted themselves. The anti-EEC members of Wilson’s Cabinet re-embraced the unanimity convention, and traditional inter-party rivalries rapidly reappeared.⁹² Nevertheless, the mere fact that a referendum was held, the peculiar political divisions which it exposed, and the overwhelming support it revealed for EEC membership, suggested that the Treaty of Rome was undoubtedly a ‘special’ ingredient in Britain’s constitutional recipe. Yet while British politicians and British voters again raked over the old ground of even belonging to the Community, the ECJ was apparently still pursuing a federalist schemata of Treaty interpretation.

III. The Treaty of Rome 2: precedence and direct effect revisited

We have seen examples of innovative common law decisions in earlier chapters. But judicial dynamicism is not a trait exclusive to the common law; it was also embraced by the ECJ. And in the mid-1970s the Court took the opportunity to root its effet utile jurisprudence more firmly in the Community’s legal soil.

Confirming the direct effect of directives

Notwithstanding the ECJ’s judgment in SACE SpA, governments in several Member States maintained that directives, irrespective of their substance, could never have direct effect. The argument invoked by proponents of this position was that since Art 189 made it clear that directives reserved discretion to the Member States they could not be ‘clear and unconditional’ per Van Gend. However, in 1974, the ECJ confirmed SACE SpA in forceful terms.

Van Duyn v Home Office (1974)

The secondary legislation at issue in *Van Duyn*⁹³ was Directive 64/221. The directive contained detailed implementing measures for Art 48, the provision establishing free movement of workers within the EEC. Article 48 was not framed in ‘unconditional terms’; Member States may per Art 48(3) derogate from it for reasons of public policy, public health or public security. Article 56 required the EEC to issue directives regulating Member States’ use of the Art 48(3) derogations. Directive 64/221 Art 3 demanded that derogation be based solely on the ‘personal conduct’ of the individuals concerned.

The Home Office wanted to prevent Ms Van Duyn, a Dutch citizen, entering the country to work for the Church of Scientology, a cultish religion of which the government disapproved. She claimed that the government’s action infringed Art 48, and challenged the Home Secretary’s action before the British courts. In an Art 177 reference, the Court of Appeal asked the ECJ firstly if Art 3 of Directive 64/221 was directly effective, and secondly if membership of the Scientologists could be 'personal conduct'?

⁹² Lent a sharper edge by Thatcher’s election as Leader of the Conservative Party.

⁹³ Case 41/74: [1974] ECR 1337.

The ECJ held Art 3 directly effective because it confined the discretion accorded to the Member States by Art 48(3) with sufficient precision to make it justiciable: a national court could easily ensure that decisions a Member State made on this question were indeed based on the individual's personal conduct. In language reminiscent of Van Gend, the ECJ confirmed that there was no principled reason to exclude the possibility that directives (wholly or in part) could be directly effective:

It is necessary to examine, in every case, whether the nature, scheme and general wording of the provision in question are capable of having direct effects on the relations between Member States and individuals.⁹⁴

But while the British government's arguments were rejected on this point, the ECJ also decided membership of the Scientologists could be 'personal conduct'. The British court could thus hold that Van Duyn's exclusion did not breach EEC law.

The ECJ's decision might be thought as much an exercise in diplomacy as law-making.⁹⁵ Judgment was delivered just before the UK's 1975 referendum. By permitting the Home Secretary to exclude Ms Van Duyn while simultaneously upholding SACE SpA, the Court reaffirmed a principle of long-term significance to efforts to enhance EEC law's 'effet utile', while handing British supporters of EEC membership a precedent to refute opponents' claims that remaining in the Community required surrendering control over such basic issues as excluding undesirable foreign citizens. One cannot gauge if Van Duyn did influence voting behaviour in the referendum, or ascertain if the ECJ was consciously (if covertly) pursuing an avowedly political agenda, but it would be rash to exclude either possibility.

The horizontal direct effect of treaty articles—Walrave and Koch (1974)

A common thread in all of the ECJ's effet utile case law discussed so far has been that the 'defendant' was a governmental body of some sort. A more complicated question presented itself to the ECJ in Walrave and Koch v Union Cycliste Internationale.⁹⁶ The defendant was a private sector organisation—the Union Cycliste Internationale. The UCI was the governing body for the sport of cycle racing on roads. In formal terms, it had no governmental basis. One of the rules which it applied to cycle racing was that cyclists themselves and their motor-cycle pacemakers had to be of the same nationality. The rule was challenged by two Dutch pacemakers who wished to work for non-Dutch teams. Undoubtedly, if the rule had been imposed by a Member State law then the law would breach various directly effective Treaty provisions: the Art 7 prohibition on nationality-based discrimination; the Art 48 presumption of free movement of (employed) workers; and the Art 59 presumption of free movement of (self-employed) workers. (The ICU's rule would also breach the terms of an important piece of secondary legislation (Regulation 1612/68) which laid down detailed provisions concerning the free movement of workers.) In such circumstances, the Treaty articles and regulation could be said to be vertically directly effective; ie the legal action is upwards from a citizen against a government body. The question raised in Walrave was whether these provisions were also applicable in legal ⁹⁴ Ibid, at para 12.

⁹⁵ For a searching analysis see Weiler J (1986) 'Eurocracy and mistrust...' Washington Law Review 1103.

⁹⁶ Case 36/74: [1974] ECR 1405.

actions between individuals and/or companies; ie whether the provisions were horizontally directly effective. The ECJ considered that the Treaty articles and Regulation 1612/68 were directly effective in both vertical and horizontal planes:

[17] Prohibition of such discrimination does not only apply to the action of public authorities but extends likewise to rules of any other nature aimed at regulating in a collective manner gainful employment and the provision of services.

[18] The abolition as between Member States of obstacles to freedom of movement for persons and to freedom to provide services, which are fundamental objectives of the Community..., would be compromised if the abolition of barriers of national origin could be neutralised by obstacles resulting from the exercise of their legal autonomy by associations or organisations which do not come under public law.

[19] Since, moreover, working conditions in the various Member States are governed by means of provisions laid down in law or regulations and sometimes by agreements and other acts concluded by private persons, to limit the prohibitions in question to acts of a public authority would risk creating inequality in their application.

The teleological basis for this conclusion is readily apparent. One such reason related to the fact that very substantial amounts of economic activity within the Community were carried out in the private sector. If all these activities were placed beyond the reach of directly effective EEC law, the substantive scope of the ‘common market’ would be very tightly constrained. A second reason for according horizontal direct effect to EEC law arose from the differential allocation among the Member States of particular types of economic activity between the public and private sectors. If, for example, railways were run as a governmental concern in Member State A, then relevant EEC laws would affect the operation of the railway system in that country even if the EEC laws were only directly effective in the vertical plane. But if EEC law had only vertical direct effect, it would not affect the operation of railways in Member State B where railways were a private sector responsibility. A third—and obviously related—reason was to remove the possibility that some Member State governments might try to negate the impact of EEC law on some areas of economic activity by formally transferring responsibility for their conduct or supervision from public sector bodies to private sector organisations.

It is notable that the ECJ did not engage at all in Walrave with potentially tortuous arguments as to whether the ICU could be regarded as a ‘governmental body’ for the purposes of EEC law. One could readily offer a plausible rationale to sustain that conclusion; namely that the ICU controlled an important area of economic activity which would presumably have to be regulated by a government body if the ICU did not exist. Rather the ECJ concluded that the notion that non-governmental bodies were legitimate targets of Community law controls was uncontentious. This seems a logical extension of Van Gend’s principle that the Treaty bestowed rights on individuals. If effective realisation of those rights depended on other individuals respecting reciprocal obligations, it seemed obvious that those individuals should resolve disputes as to the meaning of EEC law in their national courts. Walrave expressly identified horizontal direct effect as a characteristic of Treaty articles and regulations. And it would seem plausible to conclude on the basis of Walrave that any Commission decision that was addressed to a private sector organisation would also give rise to horizontal direct effect. If narrowly construed, Walrave is perhaps authority only for the proposition that horizontal direct effect reaches only certain private sector regulatory bodies, and not to individuals or companies. However, the ECJ wasted little time in confirming that horizontal direct effect could reach into the smallest nooks and crannies of private sector economic activity.

The justiciability test and the horizontal direct effect principle reaffirmed and expanded—Defrenne v Sabena (1976)

Just as the form which EEC legislation took could not preclude enforcement by national courts, neither does it assure that end. We saw in *Chandler v DPP*⁹⁷ that putting a prerogative power into statutory form did not necessarily make it justiciable. In Defrenne v SABENA,⁹⁸ the ECJ drew a similar conclusion regarding direct effect.

Article 119 required Member States to ‘ensure and maintain the principle that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work.’ Ms Defrenne worked as an air hostess for SABENA, a Belgian airline which was essentially owned and managed by the Belgian government. SABENA paid its hostesses less than male stewards for identical duties. While admitting discrimination, SABENA claimed Art 119 was not directly effective. SABENA contended that Art 119’s principle was too complex an economic concept to be justiciable before national courts; more detailed legislation explaining the meaning of equal pay and equal work would be needed before Art 119’s principle became ‘unconditional’.

The ECJ was only partly convinced by this argument. It held that gender discrimination could take two forms: ‘direct and overt’ or ‘indirect and disguised’. Direct discrimination arose where (as for Ms Defrenne) differing wages were paid for exactly the same job, or where discrimination was specifically permitted in legislation or collective labour agreements. Such inequality could be detected by: ‘purely legal analysis... the court is in a position to establish all the facts which enable it to decide whether a woman is receiving lower pay than a male worker.’⁹⁹ However indirect discrimination, involving inequality between different jobs or industries could only be established against more detailed legislative criteria. Not until such legislation had been enacted could the prohibition on indirect discrimination become directly effective. Once again, the ECJ stressed that it is the nature, not the source, of the EEC law that determines its enforceability in domestic courts.

An equally important element of Defrenne was the ECJ’s conclusion that Art 119’s justiciable terms were enforceable in national courts in a very expansive horizontal sense. Given that SABENA was in formal terms a public sector body, the case could have been resolved on the basis that Ms Defrenne’s action was vertical in nature. However as in Walrave, the ECJ rejected any need to find a ‘governmental element’ to SABENA’s activities. Rather, the Court concluded that all economic activity—even to the level of contracts between individuals—was controlled by Art 119:

[39] Since Article 119 is mandatory in nature, the prohibition on discrimination between men and women applies not only to the action of public authorities, but also extends to all agreements which are intended to regulate paid labour collectively, as well as to contracts between individuals.

As we will subsequently see, the horizontal direct effect of directives proved a more contentious issue. But before that question was broached, the ECJ once again underscored the unambiguous nature of the precedence principle.

Immediate precedence: Simmenthal (1977)

As suggested above, the evident willingness of the Italian Constitutional Court in Frontini to reconstrue domestic constitutional principles in a fashion which mirrored the requirements of the effet utile jurisprudence did not immediately lead to a reversal of the Court's judgment in *Costa. Simmenthal*¹⁰⁰ concerned the compatibility of certain Italian laws regulating meat imports with EEC law. The Italian court hearing Simmenthal's claim referred two questions to the ECJ. The first related simply to the domestic law's substantive compatibility with the EEC regulations, and need not concern us here. The more important question concerned the consistency with EEC law of the Italian constitution's requirement that Italian legislation which breached international obligations could only be invalidated or disappplied by the Italian Constitutional Court. It could not be disappplied by an inferior court such as the one hearing Simmenthal's claim. Some considerable time would elapse before a case had made its way to the Constitutional Court, during which the Italian law in issue would remain in force.

⁹⁷ See ‘V. ‘Justiciability’ revisited—are all statutory powers subject to full review?’, ch 4, pp 111–112 above.

⁹⁸ Case 43/75: [1976] ECR 455. ⁹⁹ Ibid., at paras 22–23.

The ECJ held that it was not enough that a Member State's courts give effect to the precedence of EEC law eventually: domestic courts had to do so immediately. It was the duty of any national court to 'disregard forthwith' any national law conflicting with EEC law: 'without waiting until those measures have been eliminated by action on the part of the national legislature concerned... or of other constitutional authorities.'¹⁰¹

Several more years were to pass before the Italian Constitutional Court refashioned Italy's domestic constitutional law principles to mirror this ECJ requirement. In its 1984 judgment in Granital SpA, the Court—with some delicacy—held that its previous decisions had to be reconsidered. The gist of its conclusion was that, as a matter of Italian constitutional law, its previous holding in Costa was incorrect:

...[O]n the basis of Article 11 of the Constitution—as stated above—the full and continuous application of Community law is guaranteed. Directly applicable EEC legal provisions enter and stay in force in Italy on the same basis, without their direct effect being impaired by any municipal statute. It is irrelevant, for this purpose, whether a statute was previously or subsequently enacted. A Community regulation is in any event paramount with regard to the matters it covers...¹⁰²

In the meantime, a quite different attitude was struck by France's Conseil d'Etat. The Conseil's 1980 judgment in Cohn-Bendit offered a clear message that not only did it reject the ECJ's claim to have sole jurisdiction to determine the status of EEC law in domestic legal systems, but also that it was not even willing to allow French law to match the ECJ's requirements on the principles of precedence and direct effect. Cohn-Bendit bluntly refuted the ECJ's conclusion in SACE SpA and Van Duyn and held that an EEC directive could not be directly effective at all in certain situations.

Effet utile before the Conseil d'etat:the Cohn-Bendit controversy

In May 1968, student-led protests against the French government threatened the overthrow of the existing constitution. Daniel Cohn-Bendit, a German national studying in Paris, was a leader of the protest. 'Danny the Red', as he was popularly known, was subsequently deported and banned from re-entering France, on the obvious ground that he posed a threat to public order.

¹⁰⁰ Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v Simmenthal SpA (Simmenthal II): Case 106/77: [1978] ECR 629.

¹⁰¹ Ibid, at para 7.

¹⁰² Granital SpA v Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato (Decision 170 of 8 June 1984) (1984) CML Rev 756 at 761–762—unofficial translation.

Ten years later, Cohn-Bendit's revolutionary fervour had dimmed, and he was offered a job in France. The entry ban was still however in place. He claimed before the French courts that the ban infringed his rights under Art 48, unless it was justified under the Art 48(3) derogations. As we saw in Van Duyn, Directive 64/221 allowed those derogations to be invoked only if the threat to public order, public safety or public health arose from the individual's personal conduct. Cohn-Bendit was in effect asking the French court to conclude that his personal conduct no longer threatened public order, and thence overturn the banning order.

The French court hearing the case tried to make a reference to the ECJ concerning the direct effect of Directive 64/221, but was forbidden to do so by the Conseil d'Etat. The French government had in the interim revoked the exclusion order, but it invited the Conseil d'Etat to rule whether, as a matter of French constitutional law, Directive 64/221 could be directly effective. The Conseil d'Etat simply concluded that directives could not have direct effect in these circumstances.¹⁰³ The Treaty's framers had stated in Art 189 that a regulation would be directly applicable and binding in its entirety; it could therefore be directly effective. That the framers had not said so about directives, but had specifically granted Member States discretion in implementing the law, must mean that they envisaged that directives would not have direct effect.

The Conseil d'Etat restricted its search for the meaning of EEC law solely to the Treaty's text, rejecting the ECJ's teleological approach to interpretation. From a narrowly legalistic perspective, the Conseil's conclusion has some merit, but it is utterly inconsistent with both the Costa and Van Gend principles. The Conseil d'Etat's judgment rejects the proposition that the interpretation of EEC law is ultimately a matter for the ECJ. If the courts in France could assert an unchallengeable jurisdiction to determine the meaning of EC law in France, no doubt other superior courts in other Member States could assert a similar power in respect of their own countries. In that event, the supremacy and direct effect principles would be completely undermined. One commentator describes Cohn-Bendit as: 'a clear and deliberate act of defiance... a blow at the foundations of the community.'¹⁰⁴

It is impossible to gauge to what extent the Conseil d'Etat was following a nationalistic political agenda, and how far it was motivated by a genuine belief in the legal integrity of its conclusion. Much the same ambiguity seemingly pervades the UK courts' initial efforts to address the constitutional implications of accession.

IV. EEC law, parliamentary sovereignty, and the UK courts: phase one

The UK judiciary's earliest encounters with EEC law suggested that the radical principles of Van Gend, Costa and Internationale, and Parliament's evident attempt to enact those principles in the ECA 1972, would meet a trenchant restatement of orthodox Diceyan theory. Lord Denning's non-committal attitude in Blackburn was soon followed with a somewhat firmer view in Felixstowe Dock and Railway Co v British Docks Board.¹⁰⁵ The case raised the possibility that the provisions of a Bill shortly to be enacted would ¹⁰³ Minister of the Interior v Cohn-Bendit [1980] 1 CMLR 543.

¹⁰⁴ Hartley T (1988) The foundations of European Community law p 232. Ch 8 of Hartley's book offers an interesting discussion of the various Member States' responses to the precedence and direct effect issues.

¹⁰⁵ [1976] 2 CMLR 655, CA.

contravene Art 86's rules on competition law. However Lord Denning did not think that possibility raised a difficult constitutional issue:

It seems to me that once the Bill is passed by Parliament and becomes a Statute, that will dispose of all this discussion about the Treaty. These courts will have to abide by the Statute without regard to the Treaty at all.¹⁰⁶

It is not clear if Lord Denning felt that the ECA 1972 had not limited Parliament's sovereignty, or whether it simply could not do so. Nevertheless, in his view, the ECJ's 'new legal order' had apparently not taken root in British constitutional soil.

Lord Denning seemed to adopt a different approach in respect of the ECJ's adherence to teleological methods of treaty and legislative interpretation. In H P Bulmer Ltd v J Bollinger SA, he suggested British judges would have to forgo their traditional, literalist techniques, and:

follow the European pattern. No longer must they examine the words in meticulous detail. No longer must they argue about the precise grammatical sense. They must look to the purpose or intent. . . . They must divine the spirit of the Treaty and gain inspiration from it. If they find a gap, they must fill it as best they can.¹⁰⁷

Lord Denning's advice¹⁰⁸ extended however only to the Treaty and to EEC legislation, not to British statutes. Domestic legislation, it seemed, even if dealing with EC matters, would still be interpreted according to orthodox principles. It came therefore as a surprise when Lord Denning himself advocated a radical break with constitutional tradition some two years later.

The end of the doctrine of implied repeal? Macarthy v Smith (1979)

*Macarthy Ltd v Smith*¹⁰⁹ arose from an Art 119 dispute. Mrs Smith was employed at a lower wage by Macarthy than the man who previously did her job. She claimed this breached Art 119. Macarthy contended that the British courts should apply the relevant British legislation (the Equal Pay Act 1970 as amended by the Sex Discrimination Act 1975), which forbade discrimination only between men and women doing the same job for the same employer simultaneously. If Macarthy's interpretation of the domestic legislation was correct, the British courts faced a difficulty. For British purposes, Art 119 came into force in 1973. The Sex Discrimination Act was passed two years later. Should the later Act prevail, as Dicey's theory would suggest? Or should EEC law, per Costa, be regarded by the court as the superior form of law?

In the Court of Appeal, Lord Denning thought that a literal reading of the British legislation supported Macarthy's claim. However, following his own advice in Bulmer, he rejected a literalist approach. Rather, the Act should be construed subject to the 'over-riding force' of the Treaty 'for that takes priority even over our own statute.'¹¹⁰ Denning's own view of Art 119 was that its prohibition on unequal pay extended beyond 'same time' situations to successive employment.¹¹¹ Construing the Treaty and the 1975 legislation: 'as ¹⁰⁶ Ibid, at 659.

¹⁰⁷ [1974] 3 WLR 202 at 216, CA.

¹⁰⁸ Reiterated, reinforced and also applied to other Treaties in Jones Buchanan & Co Ltd v Babco Forwarding and Shipping (UK) Ltd [1977] QB 208, CA.

¹⁰⁹ Case 129/79: [1979] 3 All ER 325, CA.

¹¹⁰ Ibid, at 329.

¹¹¹ Ibid. Denning was in a minority on this point. The majority (Cumming-Bruce and Lawton LJ) were uncertain as to Art 119's scope, and referred the question to the ECJ. They seemed to agree however with Denning's approach to the constitutional issue.

a harmonious whole... intended to eliminate discrimination against women',¹¹² Denning found in Mrs Smith's favour.

Denning suggested he was obliged to adopt this expansive interpretive strategy because of the ECA 1972, s 2. That would in itself give the ECA a somewhat 'special' status, but Denning's argument went beyond technical questions of interpretation. He also concluded that s 2 had abolished the doctrine of implied repeal for British statutes affecting EEC matters. Domestic courts should assume that if ever a British statute was impliedly inconsistent with an EEC obligation the inconsistency arose because Parliament had erred in the language chosen: legislators could not have intended to achieve such a result, so the courts would save them from the consequences of their mistake by according precedence to EEC law.

This radical contention endows the ECA with a very 'special' constitutional status.¹¹³ In effect, Denning's judgment in Macarthys recognised a weak 'manner and form' entrenchment of the precedence and direct effect of EEC law (the 'manner and form' in issue being a special form of words rather than an enhanced majority). These values were not however substantively entrenched, for:

If the time should come when Parliament deliberately passes an Act with the intention of repudiating the Treaty or any provision of it... and says so in express terms then I should have thought it would be the duty of our Courts to follow the statute of our Parliament. I do not envisage any such situation... Unless there is such an intentional and express repudiation of the Treaty, it is our duty to give priority to the Treaty.¹¹⁴

Denning did not explain how the 1972 Parliament had managed to bind itself and its successors in this (limited) way. There is, as we have repeatedly suggested, no obvious legal principle supporting such a conclusion. One must therefore conclude that Denning was recognising a new 'ultimate political fact'—that accession to the EEC had in some (evidently rather mysterious fashion) 'revolutionised' orthodox constitutional understandings.

This argument rests on the presumption that the political, economic and foreign policy implications of acceding to the Treaty were so profound that the courts had to assume a new, protective role. The presumption operates on two levels. The first, itself controversial, is that Parliament should be protected from the adverse political consequences of unintended breaches of the United Kingdom's EEC obligations. The second, more controversial still, is that UK citizens should be protected from unwittingly incompetent or deceptive parliamentary efforts to renege on the UK's EEC commitments.

We might think that, as an exercise in constitution building, such protective devices would be desirable. But they are constituent rather than interpretive values, and as such, beyond conventional understandings of the judicial role. Despite its obscure roots, Denning's judgment staked out new constitutional ground. But the House of Lords showed itself reluctant to disapprove it.

A matter of interpretation? Garland v British Rail (1983)

The issue before their Lordships in *Garland*¹¹⁵ was whether the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 prohibited gender discrimination in relation to concessionary travel facilities

¹¹² Ibid.

¹¹³ An excellent analysis is offered in Allan T (1983) 'Parliamentary sovereignty: Lord Denning's dexterous revolution' OJLS 22.

¹¹⁵ [1983] 2 AC 751.

¹¹⁴ [1979] 3 All ER 325 at 329, CA.

extended to British Rail's retired employees. Such discrimination seemed as though it might contravene Art 119, so the prospect again arose of a conflict between EEC law and a subsequent domestic statute.

Somewhat peculiarly, Lord Diplock (for a unanimous House) made an extensive reference to how he would approach the question if the EEC was an ordinary international law treaty:

it is a principle of construction of United Kingdom statutes... that the words of a statute passed after the Treaty has been signed and dealing with the subject matter of the international obligation of the United Kingdom are to be construed, if... reasonably capable of bearing such a meaning, as intended to carry out the obligation and not to be inconsistent with it.¹¹⁶

This technique would be incompatible with Van Gend's 'new legal order' principle, and would thus breach the ECA 1972 s 3. It would be not 'irrelevant',¹¹⁷ as one commentator put it, but legally indefensible from the ECJ's perspective.

Lord Diplock perhaps made this point to highlight the innovative nature of EEC law, for he did not decide the case on that basis. Rather he suggested that the ECA 1972 s 2 had introduced a new rule of statutory interpretation to which the courts were now subjected. A UK court should construe all domestic legislation in a manner respecting EEC obligations: 'however wide a departure from the prima facie meaning of the language of the provision might be needed in order to achieve consistency.'¹¹⁸ In this case, the 1975 Act could be interpreted as compatible with EEC law 'without any undue straining of the ordinary meaning of the language used.'¹¹⁹ In that respect, Diplock shared Denning's sentiment in Macarthys. He also agreed with Denning that UK courts must obey a statute breaching EEC law in 'express positive terms'. He was more circumspect about the doctrine of implied repeal: this was not an appropriate case to decide that question.

Barely ten years after accession, Lords Diplock and Denning had both moved considerably from their previously Diceyan position towards the EEC's constitutional impact. They had not gone far enough to satisfy Van Gend and Costa, but the dynamicism of their respective approaches to the issue of the impact of EC law on orthodox British constitutional theory is undeniable. Yet while British courts struggled to accommodate long established principles of EEC law, the ECJ was facing jurisprudential difficulties of its own.

V. Direct effect—the saga continues

As noted earlier, the ECJ had concluded that Treaty articles and regulations could be both vertically and horizontally directly effective. This characteristic of 'universal enforceability' of aspects of EEC law is an important part of the effet utile doctrine. But Art 189's text seemingly precluded the horizontal direct effect of directives; it stated they are binding only on the addressee Member State. As we have seen, the ECJ had not generally allowed textual considerations to constrain its articulation of 'the law'. We might therefore initially find its judgment in Marshall somewhat surprising.

¹¹⁶ Ibid., at 394–395.

¹¹⁷ Hood-Phillips O (1982) 'A Garland for the Lords: Parliament and community law again' LQR 524–526.

¹¹⁸ [1983] 2 AC 751 at 771.

¹¹⁹ Ibid.

The horizontal and vertical direct effect of directives? Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority (1986)

*Marshall*¹²⁰ returned to the adequacy of the UK's attempts to implement Art 119. Mrs Marshall's employer—which was part of the National Health Service—operated a discriminatory retirement age policy: men could work until sixty-five, women had to retire at sixty. This was lawful under the UK's sex discrimination legislation, but seemed incompatible with Directive 76/207.¹²¹ The Court of Appeal asked the ECJ if the Directive precluded discriminatory retirement ages, and, if so, whether Mrs Marshall could enforce the directive against her employer in the national courts.

The ECJ answered both questions affirmatively. However it then made a more general point. Directives could only be directly effective against 'public authorities': they could not be enforced in national courts against private sector organisations or individual citizens. Mrs Marshall's employer was a public or governmental body for these purposes: had she worked for a private hospital, she could not have claimed her EEC entitlements until Parliament had implemented the directive by amending the domestic legislation.

Marshall is a very surprising judgment for several reasons. Firstly, there was no need for the ECJ to address the general question of whether a directive could have horizontal direct effect. Mrs Marshall's case would have been resolved simply on the basis of the conclusion that her employer was a governmental body. Secondly, the judgment is premised on a literalist rather than teleological construction of the Treaty. In Marshall, allusions to the 'spirit, scheme and general wording' of the Treaty are notably absent, while a reference to the explicit text of Art 189 (stressing that directives are addressed only to Member States and so cannot have horizontal effect) enjoys an unusually prominent position.

That in itself is somewhat unusual. It becomes more so when one appreciates that in teleological terms the Marshall principle appears to run counter to the whole thrust of the ECJ's previous effet utile case law. This takes us to the third reason. Marshall manifestly creates the problem of partial application of EEC law that the ECJ took such pains to avoid in Walrave and Defrenne in respect of Treaty articles. Within any Member State where the same kind of economic activities were carried out in the public and private sectors, the very real possibility arose that its public sector employees would have easier access to EEC benefits than private sector workers.¹²² Such partiality could also arise in a transnational sense. In a Member State where, for example, health care services were provided entirely by the government, the substantive contents of directives would automatically be accessible in domestic law in respect of that area of economic activity. In a Member State where health care was largely a private sector activity, the availability of that substantive law would be contingent on the Member State having properly implemented the directive in domestic law. And it need hardly be said that the various Member States had very different traditions concerning allocation of particular economic activities to the public and private sectors.¹²³ These are hardly subtle points. It must have been apparent to the ECJ that its judgment would create these problems.

¹²⁰ Case 152/84: [1986] ECR 723.

¹²¹ A piece of secondary legislation which addressed some aspects of the 'indirect and disguised' discrimination adverted to in Defrenne.

¹²² See Curtin D (1990) 'The province of government: delimiting the direct effect of directives in the common law context' European Law Review 195; Arnall A (1987) 'The incoming tide: responding to Marshall' Public Law 383.

¹²³ It might also be thought that Marshall provided Member States with an incentive to 'privatise' certain public sector activities in order to escape the automatic impact of unwelcome directives.

The fourth curiosity of Marshall is that it fits very unhappily with proposals then being refined by the Commission to invite the Member States to implement some major amendments to the original Treaty. It was evident by the early 1980s that the reality of a truly ‘common market’ among the Member States had yet to be achieved: a great many national law barriers to the free movement of goods, workers and services remained in place. The amendments being floated by the Commission proposed that the Community embark upon a rigorous ‘Single Market’ program of legal harmonisation of Member States’ laws.¹²⁴ The programme was to rely substantially on the use of directives. Its success could hardly be helped, and would more likely be markedly hindered, by the ECJ’s conclusion in Marshall. This too is an obvious point. All in all, Marshall, if viewed in isolation, seems a quite extraordinary judgment.

Making sense of Marshall? the emergence of ‘indirect effect’

We can perhaps begin to find a better explanation for Marshall by placing the case in a slightly broader context. Consideration might firstly be given to a judgment delivered shortly before Marshall in the combined cases of Von Colson and Harz.¹²⁵ The cases presented the ECJ with blatant examples of gender discrimination; in Von Colson by a government employer, and in Harz by a private company. The ECJ suggested that the literal meaning of the German law passed to implement the relevant EC Directive (No 76/207) did not give adequate effect to the EC law’s intentions. If—as the ECJ was soon to announce in Marshall—directives had only vertical direct effect, Ms Von Colson could have relied upon the directive itself, but Ms Harz could not. Rather than approve so patently discriminatory an outcome in the two cases, the ECJ opted for a strategy which allowed both claimants to enforce their EC rights in the same way. The principle which the ECJ uncovered in Von Colson has come to be known as ‘indirect effect’. The nub of the ECJ’s judgment was that the German courts hearing the Von Colson and Harz cases were obliged by EC law to interpret domestic law in a manner that facilitated the achievement of EC objectives. The duty of loyalty imposed by Art 5 of the Treaty bound not just national legislatures and governments, but embraced:

...all the authorities of the Member states including...the courts. It follows that, in applying the national law and in particular the provisions of a national law introduced in order to implement Directive 76/207, national courts are required to interpret their national law in the light of the wording and purpose of the directive in order to achieve the result referred to in the third paragraph of Art 189....in so far as they are given discretion to do so under national law.¹²⁶

The above extract typifies the rather ambiguous nature of the ECJ’s Von Colson judgment. Read superficially, Von Colson seems to suggest no more than the uncontroversial proposition that a domestic court interpret ambiguous domestic legislation in a manner that accords with its country’s international law obligations. But once the judgment was placed in the context of the EC as a ‘new legal order’, several rather thorny questions arose.

A principle of limited or wide scope?

For example, did ‘discretion under national law’ include the precedence principle espoused by the ECJ in Costa, Internationale and Simmenthal, or was it to be restricted to ‘purely’ domestic legal principles. Similarly, was the national courts’ ‘interpretive’ technique to ¹²⁴ The issue is discussed in more detail in ch 13.

¹²⁵ Case 14/83: [1984] ECR 1891; and Case 79/83: [1984] ECR 1921.

¹²⁶ Ibid, at paras 26 and 28.

mirror the ECJ's own teleological, integrationist position, or remain loyal to less adventurous domestic principles? In a country with a literalist interpretive tradition, a narrow construction of the Von Colson principle on this point might render the principle quite useless. This obviously raises a 'uniformity' problem across the Member States.

Relatedly, was 'national law' to be interpreted as a concept entirely at large within the domestic legal system, or one limited solely to legislation introduced specifically to implement a directive? If the former view was taken, national courts could presumably scour all domestic laws for a suitable legal peg on which to hang the EEC law right, or even, in some legal systems, fashion a new law themselves with which to achieve the result sought by the directive. If the latter view prevailed, Von Colson would not assist citizens in Member States which had assumed that domestic legislation pre-dating the relevant directive fulfilled the EEC's objectives, or had not introduced any implementing legislation at all.

The implications of Von Colson

While providing a route round Marshall in some instances, Von Colson perhaps raised more questions than it solved. Yet in one sense the judgment might be seen as an extraordinarily clever exercise in supra-national judicial constitution-making, as the ECJ recast the problem of unimplemented directives from being a dispute between the Member State and the ECJ to a dispute between the Member State's government and/or legislature and its own courts.

There are two reasons—each flowing from considerations of domestic constitutional tradition—to assume that domestic courts might be more willing to accept the effet utile principle if it could be pursued through indirect rather than direct effect. Firstly, indirect effect merely enjoins domestic courts to 'interpret'. They are not asked to 'make' or 'impose' law. They are thus engaging in a much more obviously 'judicial' role. Secondly, national courts are required to interpret the Member State's own law, which law one assumes has been promoted by a government and enacted by a legislature¹²⁷ in order to give effect to the directive concerned. The national court is thus only giving legal effect to a political value which has already been accepted as legitimate by other governmental actors who have unwittingly failed properly to carry out the State's obligations.

Indirect and direct effect also have quite different implications for the nature of the relationship between the ECJ and national courts. Direct effect creates an ECJ/national court relationship which is in essence vertically hierarchical. Domestic courts are to all intents and purposes being told that they must simply apply laws whose meanings are determined exclusively by the ECJ. The national court is no more than an agent of the ECJ. Indirect effect accords much more authority and responsibility to national courts. The relationship the principle creates between the ECJ and the national might defensibly be portrayed as one of partnership rather than hierarchy; in which the ECJ is heavily dependent upon the creativity of national courts. Von Colson was perhaps intended to signal that the ECJ was radically rethinking the nature of its relationship with domestic courts. The ECJ perhaps further emphasised this point in Johnston v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, when it held that a domestic court should invoke the direct effect of a directive against a government body only if it was unable to achieve the same result through creative interpretation of national law.¹²⁸

This gives rise to the inference that the ECJ's judgment in Marshall may have been prompted in part by an ECJ concern—in the light of Solange (No 1) and Cohn-Bendit—to offer reassurance to national courts which were unwilling even to allow domestic law to mirror the requirements of the effet utile doctrine that the ECJ was sensitive to their concerns. The Conseil d'Etat's judgment in Cohn-Bendit presented the ECJ with a profound strategic difficulty. For the ECJ to have expressly criticised the Conseil d'Etat would likely have triggered an escalation in the disagreement between the two courts. Yet the ECJ could hardly be expected to reverse its own conclusion in Van Duyn; to do so would compromise the effet utile principle, undermine the ECJ's own jurisprudential integrity in a general sense, and send an invitation to other national courts to challenge the content of ECJ jurisprudence. Marshall, Von Colson and Johnston can be seen as an ingenious middle way between those two unpalatable and impractical alternatives. Marshall signals an end to the seemingly inexorable onward march of the direct effect principle, and thus to the de facto subordination of national courts to the ECJ. The judgment, rooted largely in a literalist interpretation of Art 189, makes a methodological nod to the Conseil d'Etat's approach to Treaty construction in Cohn-Bendit. The obviously deleterious implications of Marshall for the uniform impact of EEC law are then partially ameliorated by Von Colson, in a fashion which enhances the role of national courts in determining the meaning of EEC law and offers national courts protection against domestic constitutional criticism. That enhancement is then promptly lent an extended reach in Johnston. Quite how this new phase of inter-judicial relationships would develop remained to be seen.

¹²⁷ It is of course possible that in some Member States the power to produce the 'laws' required might rest exclusively with the government.

¹²⁸ Case 222/84: [1986] ECR I651 at paras 53–54.

An analytical overview: 'normative' and 'decisional' supra-nationalism

The interplay of law and politics was a pervasive feature of the EEC's early constitutional development. In an influential critique in 1981, Joseph Weiler suggested that this process was best understood in terms of a distinction between what he termed 'normative' and 'decisional' supra-nationalism.¹²⁹

Normative supra-nationalism concerned the formal status of EEC law vis-à-vis the domestic law of the Member States. In decisions such as Van Gend, Costa, Internationale and Simmenthal, the ECJ had fashioned principles which indicated that 'the relationship between the legal order of the Community and that of the Member States has come to resemble increasingly a fully fledged (USA type) federal system.'¹³⁰ Yet Weiler suggested that just the opposite trend was evident in respect of decisional supra-nationalism, which concerned the characteristics of the practical reality of institutional relations within the Community's legislative and administrative processes. In this sphere, the EEC had become increasingly inter-governmental in nature. The Luxembourg Accords exemplified this trend; as did the emergence of a body known as the 'European Council', a forum for regular summit meetings of heads of government of the Member States, which (like the Luxembourg Accords) existed entirely outside the Treaty's legal structure, but manifestly had an important influence on the conduct of Community business in the Council of Ministers. Weiler also suggested that a similar, albeit not obviously 'unconstitutional' result was produced by the growing influence of COREPER¹³¹ on the Commission's task of initiating legislation. The combined effect of these developments was that the Council had become a forum for individual countries to engage in 'package deal decision-making' and 'high powered political horse-trading'.¹³² Moreover, the Commission and Parliament were ill-equipped to counter this trend, in part at least because of the community's ¹²⁹ (1981) 'The Community system: the dual character of supra-nationalism' Yearbook of European Law 267.

¹³¹ See footnote 5 at p 340 above.

¹³² (1981) op cit at 288.

¹³⁰ Ibid, at p 273.

so-called ‘democracy deficit.’ Without an electoral mandate from ‘the people’ of the EEC, neither institution could forcefully assert an integrationist agenda against the nationalist wishes of (elected) Member State governments.

Although this normative/decisional divergence presented an apparent paradox, in that the EEC was in one sense increasingly coming to resemble a pure form of federal constitutionalism, while in another it seemed no more than a loose association of entirely autonomous sovereign states, Weiler suggested that, on further consideration, the EEC could not, in the short term, have survived in any other way. By pulling in opposite directions, these forces had created:

an equilibrium which explains a seemingly irreconcilable equation: a large...and effective measure of transnational integration, coupled at the same time with the preservation of strong, unthreatened, national Member States.¹³³

Weiler’s argument is a contentious one, and since it lies in the realm of constitutional and political theory, cannot be ‘correct’ in any definitive sense. But for our purposes, it is more important for the questions it raises than any answer it might provide. For if the EEC was by then established as a unique form of governmental authority, if it was indeed unlike anything with which Britain’s 300-year-old constitution had previously dealt, one might wonder if the stage had not been set for Professor Wade’s legal revolution to make its long-awaited appearance? That is a question addressed in chapter twelve.

The reduction of the ‘democratic deficit’ and the emergence of human rights as general principles of EEC law

Some tentative steps had been taken to address the Community’s ‘democratic deficit’ in the 1970s, primarily by altering the powers and composition of the Parliament. A Treaty amendment which became effective in 1975 greatly enhanced the Parliament’s role in the budgetary process.¹³⁴ Perhaps more significantly, from 1979 onwards, the Parliament was to be composed of members directly elected by each nation’s electorate, thereby providing it with a ‘democratic’ basis from which to argue that its powers within the Community’s law-making process should be increased.¹³⁵

In the same period, the ECJ also sought to reassure domestic courts as to the substantive legitimacy of EEC law through a more enthusiastic and explicit embrace of an implied doctrine of human rights protection within the Treaty, fleshing out the skeletal jurisprudence adverted to in Internationale. In Nold,¹³⁶ the ECJ suggested it would annul EEC secondary legislation which contravened fundamental constitutional principles common to the Member States, and also indicated it would draw on international human rights treaties for guidance as to what those principles might be. Subsequently, in Hauer v Land Rheinland-Pfalz,¹³⁷ the ECJ explicitly referred to the European Convention on ¹³³ Ibid., at 292.

¹³⁴ Ehlermann C (1975) ‘Applying the new budgetary procedure for the first time’ CML Rev 325; Lasok and Bridge op cit pp 258–264.

¹³⁵ British Labour MPs opposed to any such increase ‘persuaded’ the Callaghan government in 1978 to introduce a bill providing that any Treaty enhancing the EP’s powers could not be ratified by the government unless approved by an Act of Parliament. This measure, enacted as s 6 of the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978, had two effects. The first was to qualify the government’s power to incorporate new Treaties into domestic law via Orders in Council. The second, more generally, was to place a clear statutory limit on the government’s foreign policy prerogatives. It was not however clear then, some seven years before GCHQ, if this statutory limit would prove justiciable.

¹³⁶ Case 4/73: [1974] ECR 491.

¹³⁷ Case 44/79: [1979] ECR 3727.

Human Rights in gauging the ‘constitutionality’ of EEC secondary legislation. The ECJ did not go so far as announcing the Convention’s de facto incorporation into EEC law, yet that seemed an implicit consequence of its judgment. That implication did appear to satisfy Germany’s Federal Constitutional Court. That court had never in fact exercised its self-proclaimed power to prevent domestic enforcement of EEC measures which contravened the Basic Law, but in Wünsche-Handelsgesellschaft,¹³⁸ it indicated that it was—in a manner similar to the position embraced a decade earlier by the Italian Constitutional Court in Frontini and reiterated in Granital in 1984—content to assume that the compatibility of EEC secondary legislation with basic human rights norms was now adequately policed by the ECJ.

Conclusion

The combined effects of the preliminary ‘democratisation’ of the Community’s institutional structure and the ECJ’s continued attachment to the effet utile strategy were not in themselves sufficient, as Weiler had predicted, to maintain the Community’s integrationist momentum. The European Parliament had promoted a Draft Treaty on European Union (DTEU) in 1984, which advocated a radical overhaul of Community institutions and (unsurprisingly) a substantial extension of its own powers. The initiative, which seemed to entail significant political as well as economic integration, was not embraced by the Member States. But the mid-1980s, it had become evident that even the level of economic integration initially envisaged by the Treaty’s framers had yet to be achieved. The Commission consequently sought to re-energise the Community, proposing a wide range of measures (both normative and decisional in nature) which eventually led to the first major amendment to the Treaty of Rome, some thirty years after its birth, in the shape of the Single European Act.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

- Jackson J (1992) ‘Status of treaties in domestic legal systems...’ American Journal of International Law 310
- Weiler J (1981) ‘The Community system: the dual character of supra-nationalism’ Yearbook of European Law 267
- Pescatore P (1983) ‘The doctrine of direct effect: an infant disease of Community law’ European Law Review 155
- Allan T (1983) ‘Parliamentary sovereignty: Lord Denning’s dexterous revolution’ OJLS 22
- Craig P (1992) ‘Once upon a time in the west: direct effect and the federalisation of EEC law’ Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 453
- Nicol D (1999) ‘The legal constitution: United Kingdom Parliament and European Court of Justice’ Journal of Legislative Studies 131
- Weiler J (1986) ‘Eurocracy and mistrust...’ Washington Law Review 1103

¹³⁸ [1987] 3 CMLR 225.

Case law and legislation

Van Gend en Loos [1963] ECR 1

Costa v ENEL [1964] ECR 585

Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [1970] ECR 1125

European Communities Act 1972 ss 2–3

Macarthy Ltd v Smith [1979] 3 All ER 325

Garland v British Rail Engineering Ltd [1983] 2 AC 751

Politi [1971] ECR 1039

Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire AHA [1986] ECR 723

Defrenne v SABENA [1976] ECR 455

Von Colson [1984] ECR 1891

Chapter 12

The European Community after the Single European Act

This chapter traces the history of the EEC from 1986 to 2008. It begins by analysing the origins and objectives of the Single European Act. It then examines the ways in which the ECJ has developed principles to facilitate the enforcement of EC law, and considers to what extent our domestic courts have applied such ideas. After exploring the controversies engendered by the Maastricht, Amsterdam and Lisbon Treaties, the chapter concludes by assessing in what senses, if any, continued EC membership will entail a loss of the United Kingdom's 'sovereignty' to a federal European constitution and a rebalancing of power within the constitution between Parliament and the courts.

I. The Single European Act—the terms

The SEA's roots lay in the Commission's perception that the Community's original objectives were being achieved at a painfully slow rate. The Treaty of Rome had envisaged that the four fundamental freedoms of movement for goods, capital, persons and services upon which the Community was to be based would be achieved by 1970. But even by 1984, this objective remained unfulfilled: national laws still contained many barriers to the creation of a truly 'common market'. That such barriers remained in place is a cogent illustration both of the limits of the ECJ's supra-nationalist competence and the continued vitality of nationalist, protectionist sentiment in the more inter-national arena of the Community's legislative process. The Commission's response to this impasse was to seek new means to realise the Treaty's original ends.

In the 1960s and 1970s, the Commission had sought to create the 'common market' by embarking on a programme of harmonisation through detailed Community legislation. These so-called 'Euronorms' imposed a uniform regulatory structure on each of the Member States. By 1984 the 'Euronorm' approach was regarded as inappropriate for several reasons. Firstly, the Commission's small size limited the amount of legislation it could initiate. Secondly, several Member States were sceptical about the need to homogenise regulatory structures, suggesting that a 'common market' need not be a uniform market, but could accommodate appreciable geographical divergences in the substance and application of EEC law principles.¹ The third reason, flowing from the second, was that it frequently proved impossible to achieve all the Member States' agreement on the intricacies of proposed Euronorm legislation.

The regenerative programme first outlined in the Commission's 1985 White Paper consequently represented a move away from what has been described as the Commission's 'almost theological dogmatism'² in pursuit of uniformity. The White Paper attempted to reinvigorate a stalled programme of economic integration by reforming both the methods and substance of the Community's law-making process.

The proposed new Treaty art 8A announced the intention to create an 'internal market' by 1 January 1993. The shift from an emphasis on the 'common market' to an 'internal market' was not simply a question of relabelling. The internal market proposed that the Community seek enhanced economic integration by rejecting the Euronorm's methodology, and relying instead on a process of 'mutual recognition' of acceptable standards. As Forwood and Clough note, the internal market strategy was based on a 'minimalist approach to economic regulation' in which the notion of 'equivalence' is the key.³ Goods and services lawfully marketed in one Member State should be saleable throughout the community.

However, the White Paper's original integrationist thrust was much diluted when exposed to the nationalistically motivated scrutiny of the successive Inter-Governmental Conferences required by the Art 236 amendment process.⁴ That these negotiations were protracted and keenly contested by the Member States is sometimes portrayed as a weakness in the Community's decision-making structure. But the tortuous process might equally plausibly be seen as perfectly compatible with that view of democracy which contends that alterations to a constitution's fundamental principles should not be easy to effect.

It is perhaps therefore not surprising that the amendments introduced to the original Treaty by the SEA present an even more complex balancing of inter-national and supra-national forces than provided by the original Treaty.⁵ In the supra-national sphere, one can point to an extension of the Community's substantive competence into the fields of environmental protection, regional development, research and technical innovation, and some aspects of social policy.⁶

In contrast, the Community's continuing inter-national dynamic was expressed by various Member States during the amendment negotiations with sufficient vigour to recast the Commission's initial internal market strategy in a more circumscribed form. Thus, for example, the Commission's original intention that art 8A should announce the 'complete removal of all physical, technical and fiscal barriers within the community' eventually emerged with the caveat that the internal market was to be pursued 'without prejudice to the other articles in the Treaty'. This is well illustrated by the progressive dilution of the mutual recognition reforms. The Commission had initially proposed simply

¹ This is perhaps an obvious conclusion for countries where sub-central units of government have appreciable legislative competence in economic policy; a key ingredient of federal systems of government is that the constitution affords effective legal protection to such diversity.

² Edward D (1987) 'The impact of the Single European Act on the institutions' CML Rev 19 at p 26.

³ (1987) 'The Single European Act and free movement' EL Rev 383.

⁴ Corbett R (1985) 'The 1985 intergovernmental conference and the Single European Act', in Pryce R (ed) The dynamics of European Union.

⁵ Constraints of space permit only a very selective analysis of the SEA's provisions here. For further details see Shaw op cit pp 37–42, 78–95 and ch 15; Ehlermann C (1987) 'The internal market following the Single European Act' CML Rev 361.

⁶ See Ehlermann (1987) op cit.

to sweep away national powers to obstruct free movement. This step was however too radical a reform for all of the Member States to approve. The subsequent acceptance in Art 100b that the Council of Ministers should retain the power to decide the extent of equivalence required by EC law provides a graphic example of the resolution of questions of economic sovereignty by the evident subordination of supra-national legal principle to inter-national political pragmatism. Furthermore, the bulk of the internal market programme would be implemented through directives, a form of EC law which, as noted in chapter twelve, has a less obviously supra-national flavour than regulations in the light of the ECJ's judgments in Marshall and Von Colson.

But such concessions to inter-national sensitivity were in turn subject to supra-national checks and balances. A specific (albeit apparently not legally binding)⁷ date (31 December 1992) was set for achievement of the internal market programme. Relatedly, the 'equivalence' standards underpinning the mutual recognition principle were to be based on 'high standards', and while the new Art 100a para 4 formally permitted Member States to derogate somewhat from the free movement principle in defence of major 'needs', their invocation of this power was subjected to close Commission control.

The SEA also enhanced the Community's supra-national profile by extending the use of qualified majority rather than unanimous voting within the law-making process. In particular, Art 100a provided that all internal market measures could be enacted in this way. Such reforms offer an obvious antidote to the frustration of EC objectives by a single Member State. However some commentators (no doubt with the 'Empty Chair' crisis in mind) questioned whether imposing such legal compulsion on reluctant states was the best way forward: unanimity may be difficult to achieve, and delay the implementation of integrationist policies, but will produce substantive outcomes from which Member States will be less likely to resile.⁸

The SEA acknowledged that many areas of government activity could not sensibly be brought within the EC's legal competence. Perhaps the best example of this is the Declaration attached to the SEA to the effect that the reforms to the Treaty should not be construed as derogating from the Member States' powers to take such measures as they considered necessary regarding immigration control for regulating the movements of non-EC nationals, combating crime, and preventing terrorism.⁹

It is more difficult to decide whether to locate two other substantial innovations introduced by the SEA on the Community's supra-national or inter-national basis. Title I of the SEA gave a formal legal status to the meetings of the European Council, while Title III formalised the hitherto entirely informal process of 'European Political Co-operation', primarily in the area of foreign policy. But while 'recognised' by the SEA, these two aspects of Community action were not incorporated into the body of EC law; rather they were to exist outside the Treaty in the sphere of traditional international law agreements. From a federalist perspective, their greatest significance perhaps lay in their long-term potential to 'normalise' joint Member State action in explicitly non-justiciable areas, and thereby pave the way at a future date for the Community's legal competence to extend into avowedly 'political' fields.

⁷ See Edward op cit.

⁸ See for example Ehlermann's analysis (1987 op cit) of the harmonisation of indirect taxation laws within the Community.

⁹ The legal status of Declarations is unclear. But as Toth points out, the more expansive scope and pro-nationalist sentiment of the SEA declaration suggests the ratifying governments of the Member States hoped that it would temper the ECJ's integrationist inclinations: (1986) 'The legal status of declarations attached to the SEA' CML Rev 803.

Reducing the democratic deficit—Treaty amendment

That the EEC had failed to produce a truly common market by 1986 is unsurprising given the cultural heterogeneity, linguistic pluralism, and economic nationalism of the various Member States. However, the difficulty might be thought to be exacerbated by the institutional balance of power in the Community legislative process. As suggested in chapter eleven, the original Treaty cast that balance firmly in favour of the internationally constructed Council at the expense of the more supra-national Commission and Parliament.

An increase in the Commission's powers would have offered one route to achieving a more Communitaire balance of legislative power. But any such reform would also have intensified accusations as to the EEC's so-called 'democratic deficit'. The SEA consequently sought a modest rebalancing of the supra/inter-national axis by enhancing the legal status of the European Parliament. Such a reform could plausibly be construed as encouraging pan-European sentiment within the Community while simultaneously defusing criticism that Community decision-making processes are too far removed from electoral influence.

The SEA's amendments fell far short of the Parliament's DTEU proposals,¹⁰ but were nevertheless an advance on the Treaty of Rome's original institutional balance.¹¹ The most important initiative was the creation of a parliamentary power of 'co-operation' in the legislative process in some areas of Community competence, foremost among them internal market measures per Art 100a, some aspects of free movement of workers, workplace health and safety regulation, environmental protection and the common transport policy. The Council cannot simply ignore the Parliament's views when the co-operation procedure is being employed:¹² the initiative thus gave the Parliament an audible voice in important areas of Community activity. Its significance should not however be exaggerated. An early assessment concluded that the Parliament 'is still some way from becoming an equal chamber with the Council in a fully bi-cameral system, but some progress has been made in this direction'.¹³ One might plausibly add to that statement that the progress was initially both slight and stilted.¹⁴

Moreover, the SEA left one of the Parliament's basic weaknesses untouched—namely its lack of a single geographical site. The Parliament has always operated partly in Luxembourg, in Strasbourg and in Brussels. Such fragmentation undermines its efficiency, and deprives it of a coherent physical identity with which to convey its significance within the Community's structure. While the Parliament has repeatedly sought a single site,¹⁵ the power to grant that request lies with the Council, which has thus far failed to respond.

¹⁰ To the disappointment of some Member State governments. See for example the Luxembourg position in European Council (1986) Speeches and statements made on the occasion of the signing of the Single European Act at pp 16–18.

¹¹ See Boyce B (1993) 'The democratic deficit of the European Community' Parliamentary Affairs 458.

¹² The complexities of the procedure are helpfully explained in Shaw op cit at pp 79–82.

¹³ Corbett R (1989) 'Testing the new procedures; the European Parliament's first experiences with its new "Single Act" powers' 7 Journal of Common Market Studies 362 at p 364.

¹⁴ The increase in the EP's powers did however necessitate explicit statutory approval of the SEA Treaty in the UK in accordance with s 6 of the EPEA 1978, rather than the process of 'incorporation' via Order in Council provided for in the ECA 1972, s 1; see 'The European Communities Act 1972—the terms', ch 11, 'The reduction of the "democratic deficit" and the emergence of human rights as general principles of EEC law', footnote 135, p 385 above.

¹⁵ See Luxembourg v European Parliament: Case 230/81: [1983] ECR 255, ECJ.

On a more grandiose plane, the SEA's preamble announced that the Member States were:

DETERMINED to work together to promote democracy on the basis of the fundamental rights recognised in the constitutions and laws of the Member states, in the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the European Social Charter, notably freedom, equality and social justice.

Despite this statement of intent, the SEA did not introduce any substantial scheme of human rights protection into the Treaty's text, nor take the obvious step of incorporating the provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights into Community law. Nevertheless, the preamble may be seen as tacit Member State acceptance of the ECJ's by then evident fondness for concluding that the EC's constitutional order contained implied terms analogous to the ECHR's provisions.

The preamble encapsulates a recurrent feature of Community law-making; namely Member States' acceptance of the abstract legitimacy of political values to which they are not prepared to give explicit legal status. For some commentators, such legal lacunae in the SEA's formal structure were a cause of regret. Ehlerman, for example, seemed to assume the necessity of an almost messianic role for formalistic legal change as a mechanism for effective Community integration in concluding that: 'the SEA not only fails to live up to the Commission's expectations, but also leaves much to be desired in its wording'.¹⁶ In contrast, Edward advances a rather more pragmatic view, describing the SEA as a 'political manifesto... a moral and political commitment'.¹⁷

It is perhaps surprising that seasoned EC commentators should place much emphasis on the 'wording' of the SEA. For one could not accurately predict in 1986 what interpretation the ECJ would subsequently give to the amended version of the Treaty. In the first thirty years of the Community's existence, the ECJ had propounded—and (eventually) won Member State acceptance of—a series of integrationist legal principles which do not feature in the Treaty's text. It would seem entirely plausible to assume that the ECJ would subsequently bring such an ethos to bear on the SEA. But for at least one national government, the fear of the EC's 'creeping competence' was triggered not by the ECJ's jurisprudence, but by the integrationist enthusiasm of the President of the Commission.

Domestic disquiet: Margaret Thatcher's Bruges speech

The driving force behind the SEA reforms had been the Commission President, Jacques Delors, a Frenchman who had served as a Minister in Francois Mitterand's socialist government. Delors was committed to the incrementalist ideal of furthering political union between the Member States, and suggested in a speech in 1988 that the EC would evolve into a federal government akin to that of the USA.

Such sentiments alarmed Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, who promptly publicised her own view of the Community's future development in a speech delivered at the College of Europe, Bruges, on 20 September 1988. Thatcher premised her view of Europe's development on what she regarded as the essential issue of preserving British 'sovereignty':

Willing and active co-operation between independent sovereign states is the best way to build a successful European Community... It would be folly to try to fit [the Member States] into some sort of identikit European personality.¹⁸

¹⁶ (1987) op cit p 404. ¹⁷ (1987) op cit p 20.

¹⁸ The speech is thoroughly reported in The Times, 21 September 1988.

It would be somewhat misleading to describe this view as defending ‘national’ sovereignty. Rather it entailed undiluted retention of the UK Parliament’s omnicompetent legal authority so that successive Thatcher governments could continue (unhindered by either domestic or EC dissent) to impose their preferred ideological agenda on the people of the United Kingdom:

We have not successfully rolled back the frontiers of the state in Britain only to see them re-imposed at a European level with a European superstate exercising a new dominance from Brussels....The lesson of the economic history of Europe in the 1970s and 1980s is that central planning and detailed control don’t work, and that personal endeavour and initiative do....¹⁹

Given the UK’s poor economic performance during the 1980s, Thatcher’s lauding of Hayekian theory may seem ill-founded, especially since the economically most successful state, Germany, had a highly interventionist government and advocated still closer EC integration. But the speech’s main significance was that it suggested that the Thatcher government would adopt a sceptical, obstructionist approach to all integrationist EC initiatives.

The Commission described the Bruges speech as ‘unrelentingly naive’. Its contents had not been cleared with the then Foreign Secretary, Sir Geoffrey Howe, who evidently viewed its style and content with ‘weary horror’.²⁰ The speech lent a sharper edge to the fundamental divisions over European policy which had riven the Conservative Party ever since the 1972 Accession rebellion. It was enthusiastically received in the party’s Euro-sceptic wing,²¹ but was met with dismay by several senior Cabinet members and a substantial number of Euro-enthusiast backbenchers.²² As we shall see below, Thatcher’s perception of both the nature and location of what we might term the ‘ultimate political fact’ of the UK’s EC membership was eventually to prove seriously flawed.

In the shorter term, it had a significant effect. In 1989, eleven Member States had adopted a Community Charter of Fundamental Social Rights of Workers. The so-called ‘Social Charter’ advocated a significant extension of the Community competence in social policy matters, to encompass workers’ rights to fair remuneration and adequate protection against unfair dismissal, redundancy, and unsafe working conditions. The British government opposed such measures, seeing them as a re-expansion of the ‘frontiers of the state’. The Charter was merely a ‘Declaration’, not a binding part of EC law. Even in this form, however, it was unacceptable to the Thatcher government, which refused to sign the Declaration.²³

II. Normative supra-nationalism—the ECJ continues

The passage of the SEA presented the ECJ with continuing as well as new challenges. The following section addresses two issues. The first concerns the domestic legal impact of unincorporated or incorrectly incorporated directives; the second, the nature of ‘democracy’ within the EC’s law-making process.

The ‘indirect effect’ of directives—continued

Six years after Von Colson, in Marleasing, the ECJ resolved the temporal ambiguity created by Von Colson in concluding that existing domestic law, as well ¹⁹ Ibid.

²⁰ Young (1991) op cit p 550.

²¹ Clark op cit pp 225–227.

²² See Young op cit ch 23.

²³ See generally Shaw op cit ch 16.

as newly introduced measures, would be subject to the Von Colson approach to interpretation:

...in applying national law, whether the provisions in question were adopted before or after the directive, the national court called upon to interpret is required to do so, as far as possible, in the light of the wording and purpose of the directive in order to achieve the result pursued by the latter....²⁴

Marleasing also intimated that the ECJ expected domestic courts to take an expansive approach to the question of their interpretive autonomy. The formula used in respect of that issue was re-cast as ‘as far as possible’, a phrase omitting the reference to ‘discretion given by domestic law’ that featured in the Von Colson judgment. The obvious inference was that domestic courts whose own constitutional orthodoxies limited them to literalist approaches to statutory interpretation should not regard themselves as so constrained in future.

We will shortly consider the impact of both cases in the UK’s domestic law. Firstly, however, we turn to ECJ innovations in the regulation of the Community’s own law-making process.

Reducing the democratic deficit: judicial initiatives

The Treaty has always required that EC institutions identify the ‘legal base’ of their legislative actions. This would seem a logical demand in respect of any legislative body which has only limited competence. Prior to 1986, the ECJ was called upon on several occasions via Art 173 proceedings to decide if the acts of a particular institution had any defensible legal base at all within the Treaty.²⁵

However, the super-imposition of new Community competences in the SEA on to the existing Treaty raised the prospect that it would theoretically be possible for the Community to achieve particular objectives through more than one type of law-making process. In such circumstances, the Treaty itself did not specify which process was to be accorded priority. The question was not simply an abstract one; it had substantial implications for both the ‘institutional balance’ and the supra/inter-national balance within the Community’s legislative machinery. It was clear, for example, that the Parliament’s relative importance vis-à-vis the Council would be enhanced if an Act’s legal base required the co-operation procedure rather than the consultation process. Similarly, supra-national forces would enjoy greater influence at the expense of inter-national sentiment if legislation could be adopted via qualified majority or simple majority voting rather than unanimity. In either case, the legal base chosen would be likely to influence the substantive content of the legislation enacted. One might plausibly assume that the enacting institutions should opt for whichever base was most likely to facilitate achievement of Community objectives. However the SEA offered no precise criteria against which to assess that question. This was a legal lacuna which the ECJ rapidly took the opportunity to fill.

The issue before the ECJ in *EC Commission v EC Council (Generalised Tariff Preferences)*²⁶ concerned the legal basis of a Council regulation fixing the tariff regime for certain imported goods. The Council had adopted the measure via Art 235, which required unanimous voting and consultation of the Parliament. The Commission maintained that the measure should have been adopted via Art 113, which demanded qualified majority voting (but had no role for the Parliament). In upholding the Commission's claim, the ECJ offered a broad statement of principle in respect of legal base questions:

²⁴ Case C-106/89: [1990] ECR I-4135 at para 8.

²⁵ Störling: Case 138/78: [1979] ECR 713, ECJ; France, Italy and United Kingdom v EC Commission: Case 188-190/80: [1982] ECR 2545, ECJ; Germany v EC Commission: Case 281/85, 283-285/85, 287/85: [1987] ECR 3203, ECJ. See generally Biebr R (1984) ‘The settlement of institutional conflicts on the basis of Article 4 of the Treaty’ CML Rev 505.

²⁶ Case 45/86: [1987] ECR 1493, [1988] 2 CMLR 131, ECJ.

It must be observed that in the context of the organisation of the powers of the Community the choice of the legal basis for a measure may not depend simply on an institution's conviction as to the objective pursued but must be based on objective factors which are amenable to judicial review.²⁷

Quite what was meant by 'objective factors' was unclear. In subsequent litigation,²⁸ the ECJ conflated this notion of 'objectivity' with the requirement that the Community must always choose the most 'democratic' and integrationist legislative method when a choice is available. Thus a simple majority vote is to be preferred to qualified majority procedures, which are themselves preferable to unanimity. Similarly, processes which demand the co-operation of the Parliament are preferable to those requiring merely consultation.

To label such criteria 'objective' is something of a judicial sleight of hand, for it assumes that supra-nationalism and minimising the democratic deficit are 'natural' or uncontested values.²⁹ In the context of the ECJ's jurisprudential tradition, those assumptions are readily understandable, but that is to ignore questions as to the legitimacy of the tradition itself. As we have repeatedly seen, that larger question remains distinctly controversial in the eyes of some domestic political and judicial audiences. We return to the issues of institutional balance and democratic deficit in considering the terms of the Maastricht Treaty. Before doing so however, we address the reception afforded by the UK courts to the principles espoused by the ECJ in Von Colson and Marleasing.

III. EC law, parliamentary sovereignty and the UK courts: phase two

Chapter eleven recorded that the British judiciary took some time to come to terms with the constitutional implications of the precedence and direct effect principles. Von Colson and Marleasing presented a rather different challenge, since they required national courts to adopt avowedly teleological or purposive interpretive techniques in respect of domestic legislation, and, in so far as 'national law' was a concept broadly construed, to create new common law principles to give practical effect to EC directives. British courts could plausibly point to the ECA 1972 s 2 as a parliamentary command for them to accept the supremacy and direct effect principles. However the literal interpretation of s 2 was that it reached only directly effective EC law; it would thus not apply to any attempt to enforce ²⁷ Ibid, at para 11. Readers seeking a domestic analogy might refer to the De Keyser Royal Hotel case ('The superiority of statute over prerogative: A-G v De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd (1920)', ch 4, pp 94–97 above).

²⁸ EC Commission v EC Council: Case C-300/89 Titanium dioxide [1991] ECR I-2867, ECJ; European Parliament v EC Council: Case C-295/90 Student residence rights [1992] ECR I-4193, ECJ. For an overview see Bradley K (1987) 'Maintaining the balance: the role of the Court of Justice in defining the institutional position of the European Parliament' CML Rev 41; Crosby S (1991) 'The single market and the rule of law' EL Rev 451.

²⁹ The ECJ's predisposition to enhance the Parliament's status within the Community's institutional balance was displayed in decisions which, in apparent contradiction of the terms of the Treaty, afforded the Parliament the capacity to challenge the legality of acts of the Commission and Council before the Court. See European Parliament v EC Council: Case C-70/88 (Chernobyl): [1991] ECR I-4529, ECJ.

the provisions of a directive against a non-governmental body. Consequently, if British courts felt that they required a domestic, statutory basis for applying the Von Colson and Marleasing principles, they would have to turn to the ECA 1972 s 3. Alternatively, British courts might simply amend common law principles of statutory interpretation to achieve the same end. Both techniques would have unorthodox constitutional connotations. But after a hesitant start, the House of Lords responded enthusiastically to the challenge.

Duke v GEC Reliance Ltd

Like Mrs Marshall, Mrs Duke worked for an employer who required women to retire at 60, but permitted men to work until 65. Such discrimination, Mrs Duke assumed, contravened the Equal Treatment Directive. In Marshall, the ECJ held that Directive 76/207 (and indeed all other directives) did not have horizontal direct effect. Mrs Marshall could rely on the directive because the area health authority was a government body; but since GEC was a private company, Mrs Duke could not do so. She was forced instead to rely on either the Von Colson principle—namely that Art 5 of the Treaty required UK courts to interpret the Sex Discrimination Act ‘in so far as it is given discretion to do so under national law’ to give effect to the directive’s intentions—and/or that the ECA 1972 directed the courts to interpret the SDA 1975 in this way.

The House of Lords rejected both arguments.³⁰ Section 2(4) could only have the effect Mrs Duke wished in respect of directly effective EC provisions. As noted above, that conclusion is unavoidable if s 2 is interpreted in a literalist fashion. However, the Court also declined to apply Von Colson, not because it considered the ECJ’s principle unsound, but because the principle was not relevant to Mrs Duke’s factual situation. Von Colson, Lord Templeman concluded, did not require national courts to invent new domestic laws empowering them to ‘distort’ domestic statutes in order to give effect to all non-directly effective EC directives. Such ‘distortion’ would be permissible only in respect of domestic legislation passed to give effect to pre-existing EC law. In respect of UK statutes pre-dating the relevant EC directive, the court could only invoke the traditional interpretive theory applied to international law obligations; namely that an ambiguous statutory term should be given whichever meaning best satisfied the UK’s international obligations. Unfortunately for Mrs Duke, Lord Templeman considered that the SDA 1975 s 6(4) unambiguously permitted discriminatory retirement ages; it could not be interpreted in any other way.

The difference between ‘interpretation’ (which Lord Templeman thought acceptable) and ‘distortion’ (which he considered illegitimate) may be elusive. Critics of Duke suggested that it would have been possible for the House of Lords to have found for the plaintiff.³¹ Indeed, its failure to do so created several anomalies, both between the UK and those Member States where the directive was fully implemented, and within the UK between women working for public and private sector companies. Nevertheless, Duke did indicate that domestic legislation introduced in order to implement a directive would be open to judicial ‘distortion’ to produce a result consistent with EC law.

³⁰ [1988] AC 618, [1988] 1 All ER 626, HL.

³¹ Fitzpatrick B (1989) ‘The significance of EEC Directives in UK sex discrimination law’ Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 336–355; Szyszczk E (1990) ‘Sovereignty: crisis, compliance, confusion, complacency’ EL Rev 480–488.

Pickstone v Freemans

The plaintiff in *Pickstone v Freemans plc*³² contended that she and other women colleagues working as ‘warehouse operatives’ were paid less than male ‘warehouse checker operatives’ whose work was of equal value to their own. The SDA 1975 had initially provided that comparative studies of the ‘value’ of different jobs could be conducted only with the employer’s consent: an obstructive employer could therefore prevent women employees establishing that discrimination had occurred. The Commission regarded this ‘employer’s veto’ as in breach of EC law, in so far as it prevented individuals enforcing their EC entitlements. In a subsequent Art 169 action, the ECJ upheld the Commission’s claim, holding that EC law required that employers could not be permitted to deny employees access to job evaluation mechanisms.³³

The UK government (acting per ECA 1972 s 2(2)) subsequently introduced regulations which, according to the speech of the sponsoring Minister in the Commons, were intended to implement the ECJ’s judgment. This was done by empowering industrial tribunals to order job evaluation studies in certain circumstances. However, Pickstone revealed a flaw in the regulations’ text. On their face, they seemed to preclude an action before a tribunal when a man was employed in exactly the same job at the same pay as the woman complainant. If this was correct, an employer could evade evaluation of different jobs by employing one ‘token’ male among a predominantly female workforce (as Freemans had allegedly done). The UK would therefore have failed to comply with its EC obligations.

A unanimous House of Lords refused to reach this conclusion. Lord Keith felt that ‘Parliament cannot possibly have intended such a failure’.³⁴ Consequently he thought it appropriate to go beyond the bare words of the regulation, and to construe it ‘purposively’ by examining Hansard to confirm that ‘Parliament’s’ intention was to comply with the directive. Thus construed, the regulation was consistent with EC law. This technique was in itself a quite radical innovation.³⁵ But Lord Templeman went a step further. His examination of Hansard led him to conclude that: ‘In my opinion there must be implied in paragraph (c) ... the words “as between the woman and the man with whom she claims equality”’.³⁶

Litster v Forth Dry Dock and Engineering Co Ltd

Litster raised a dispute over Directive 77/187, which the EC enacted to ‘provide for the protection of employees in the event of a change of employer, in particular to ensure that their rights are safeguarded’. Article 4(1) specifically provided that: ‘The transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business shall not in itself constitute grounds for dismissal by the transferor or the transferee’. The rationale behind the directive was to ensure that employers could not evade unfair dismissal or redundancy payment legislation through the simple expedient of transferring their business to someone else.

The UK tried to incorporate Directive 77/187 through the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981. Regulation 5(1) provided that any transfer ³² [1989] AC 66, HL.

³³ EC Commission v United Kingdom: Case 61/81 [1982] ICR 578, ECJ.

³⁴ [1989] AC 66 at 112, HL.

³⁵ This case of course pre-dated Pepper v Hart, and provided part of the justification for the overturning of the traditional rule in the latter case. We will return to the inter-relationship of the two cases below.

³⁶ [1989] AC 66 at 120, HL.

did not extinguish the employee's contractual rights, but made them enforceable against the new employer. The problem in Litster arose because reg 5(3) then provided that reg 5(1) applied only to employees employed by the transferor 'immediately' before the transfer. The employees in Litster were sacked at 3.30pm on the day of the transfer. The transfer happened at 4.30 pm. The new company claimed that this one-hour gap meant that the workers were not employed by the transferor 'immediately' before the transfer, and so could not enforce their contractual rights against the new owner.

The ECJ had recently held that workers should be regarded as still employed by the transferor if the only reason for their dismissal was the projected transfer.³⁷ It was accepted on the facts that this was indeed the reason for the dismissal in Litster, but the employer argued that the British courts were bound to apply the UK legislation in its literal sense; literally construed, a gap of one hour could not amount to immediacy.

The House of Lords accepted that a literal interpretation of 'immediately' supported the transferee's argument.³⁸ A unanimous house nevertheless found in the employees' favour, albeit through slightly different reasoning. Lord Templeman accepted that Von Colson required domestic courts to adopt a purposive approach to domestic law 'issued for the purpose of complying with directives'.³⁹ However, in contrast to his decision in Duke, he saw no need to read words into the domestic legislation. Rather, he preferred to construe reg 5(3):

... on the footing that it applies to a person employed immediately before the transfer or who would have been so employed if he had not been unfairly dismissed before the transfer for a reason connected with the transfer.⁴⁰

Lord Oliver referred back to Pickstone to justify purposive construction of domestic law introduced to give effect to EEC law 'even though it may involve some departure from the strict and literal application of the words which the legislature has elected to use'.⁴¹ He regarded the employer's strategy as a transparent device to evade the spirit of the regulations. Lord Oliver considered it beholden upon the courts to counter such evasion by implying words into the domestic legislation:

In effect this involves reading reg. 5(3) as if there were inserted after the words 'immediately before the transfer' the words 'or would have been so employed if he had not been unfairly dismissed in the circumstances described in reg 8(1)'.⁴²

Pickstone and Litster*—usurping the legislative function?

By adding words to legislation, Lord Templeman in Pickstone and Lord Oliver in Litster seemed to embrace the position adopted forty years earlier by Lord Denning in Magor,⁴³ a position promptly then dismissed by Lord Simonds as a 'naked usurpation of the legislative function'. There would seem to be two possible ways to explain this development. Both imply there is something 'special' in the constitutional sense about EC membership, but neither presents a direct threat to orthodox theories of parliamentary sovereignty.

Firstly, Lords Templeman and Oliver might argue that ECA 1972 s 3 orders the UK courts to adopt whichever interpretive technique the ECJ currently required of them. The ECA 1972 would thus be unorthodox (indeed perhaps even 'unconstitutional') from a conventional perspective, in so far as it seeks to give the courts pervasive commands about interpretive techniques, a matter traditionally regarded as a question of common law. Such an Act (while obviously not 'illegal') could plausibly be seen as incompatible with traditional understandings of the rule of law and the separation of powers.

³⁷ P Bork International A/S v Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark: Case 101/87: [1989] IRLR 41, ECJ.

³⁸ [1990] 1 AC 546, [1989] 1 All ER 1134, HL. ³⁹ Ibid, at 558. ⁴⁰ Ibid. ⁴¹ Ibid, at 559.

⁴² Ibid, at 577. ⁴³ See 'Purposive (or "teleological") interpretation', ch 3, pp 68–69 above.

The second explanation is less radical, amounting to no more than a judicial recognition that EC membership has triggered such a profound change in social and economic conditions that it is time for the common law to recognise the legitimacy of a new interpretive strategy in order to protect EC law entitlements. That conclusion need have no root in the ECA 1972, nor indeed in any other statute. And until such time as the courts' new presumption is negated or amended by statute, it presents no theoretical threat to Parliament's sovereignty.

Yet while Litster and Pickstone can be reconciled with Diceyan orthodoxies, they did not meet the ECJ's requirements in Marleasing.⁴⁴ The reasoning deployed by the House of Lords in Litster gives full effect to the narrow interpretation of Von Colson. The house appeared to say that it was 'given discretion under national law' (per Von Colson) to invent a new common law rule of statutory interpretation in respect of legislation passed specifically to implement pre-existing EC law (or to find such a command in the ECA 1972), but such 'discretion' did not extend (as required by Marleasing or the broad interpretation of Von Colson) to applying similar rules to domestic legislation pre-dating the relevant EC measure. It is difficult to discern any logical basis in domestic legal theory for such a distinction.⁴⁵ Stripped to its bones, the judicial methodology employed in Duke and Litster is to ask: 'What would Parliament have done if it had realised that the literal meaning of the words it wished to use was incompatible with a new EC law?'. The answer, of course, is that 'Parliament would have used the words which we are now implying into the Act'. The methodology required by Marleasing is just the same—namely to ask 'What would Parliament have done if it had realised that it needed to alter the literal meaning of the words in an existing statute in order to avoid incompatibility with a new EC law?'. The answer, of course, is that 'Parliament would have enacted amending legislation containing the words which we are now implying into the original Act'. In both circumstances, the court is putting words into Parliament's mouth. It is no less a radical innovation for a court to do so when Parliament has spoken in error than when it has, again in error, failed to speak at all. The House of Lords appeared to recognise this illogicality shortly afterwards, and in *Webb v EMO Air Cargo*⁴⁶ it adopted the temporal aspect of Marleasing.

IV. The end of parliamentary sovereignty? Or its reappearance?

Despite their radical practical implications, Duke and Litster could be portrayed in theory simply as a new innovation in judicial interpretation of statutes. They did not involve a blunt challenge to legislation which could be reconciled with EC law only by affording the concept of 'interpretation' a meaning that paid no heed at all to linguistic limitations and encompassed the presumably distinct concept of defiance. That challenge, however, was not long in coming.

⁴⁴ See also Finnegan v Clowney Youth Training Programme Ltd [1990] 2 AC 407, [1990] 2 All ER 546, HL.

⁴⁵ See the critical comment by Szyszczak (1990) op cit. For an attempt to do so see Steiner J (1990) 'Coming to terms with EC directives' 106 LQR 144.

⁴⁶ [1992] 4 All ER 929, [1993] 1 WLR 49. For comment see Szyszczak E (1993) 'Interpretation of Community law in the courts' EL Rev 214.

The demise of the legal doctrine? Factortame

The Factortame litigation arose from a dispute over fishing rights in British waters. The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 had allowed foreign owned vessels to register as 'British', and thereby gain the right to fish in British waters. By the late 1980s, some ninety-five boats owned by Spanish companies had done so. The British government, alarmed by the impact this 'foreign' fleet was having on fishing stocks, asked Parliament to enact the Merchant Shipping Act 1988 (MSA 1988). The 1988 Act altered the registration rules to require a far higher level of 'Britishness' in a ship's owners or managers.⁴⁷ None of the ninety-five Spanish ships could meet this test. Factortame, one of the affected companies, subsequently launched an action in the British courts claiming that the MSA 1988 was substantively incompatible with EC law.

The High Court referred the substantive question to the ECJ. It was likely that eighteen to twenty months would elapse before the ECJ issued its judgment. The High Court therefore granted Factortame an interim injunction 'disapplying' the Act and ordering the Secretary of State not to enforce it against any ship that met the previous registration criteria.⁴⁸ The Court of Appeal set aside the order for an interim injunction, on which point Factortame appealed to the House of Lords.⁴⁹

Lord Bridge gave the sole judgment. He accepted that not issuing an interim injunction would cause irreparable damage, perhaps even bankruptcy to Factortame, since the company had no immediate prospect of using its boats elsewhere. He also accepted that the House of Lords would accord precedence to EC law if the ECJ eventually ruled that the MSA 1988 breached EC law. This apparently clear acceptance of the precedence doctrine goes considerably further than the formulae advanced in Macarthys or Garland. Lord Bridge suggested that the 1972 Parliament had passed legislation in the form of the ECA 1972 s 2 which in some mysterious manner was incorporated into every subsequent UK Act which affects a directly effective EC right. The inference thus appeared to be that the courts would no longer obey an Act of Parliament which breached directly effective EC law even if the Act expressly stated it was intended to achieve that result.

But that conclusion was not germane to the present appeal, the nub of which was that a British court should refuse to allow the government to apply an Act of Parliament because of the possibility the Act might subsequently prove incompatible with EC law. Lord Bridge could not find any domestic authority for such a radical proposition. Nor was he ultimately persuaded that there was an overriding principle of Community law requiring the House of Lords to issue the interim injunction. However, Lord Bridge finally concluded that any such duty on the domestic courts arose only in respect of substantive rights already clearly established under EC law. The 'rights' claimed by Factortame had yet to be pronounced upon by the ECJ. Consequently, the House of Lords referred its own question to the ECJ, asking if it should disapply domestic law in order to safeguard as yet unproven EC law rights.

⁴⁷ Including, inter alia, requirements that individual owners had to be British citizens or residents, and that corporate owners had to be incorporated in Britain, with 75% of their shares owned by British citizens/residents.

⁴⁸ See Gravells N (1989) 'Disapplying an Act of Parliament pending a preliminary ruling: constitutional enormity or common law right' Public Law 568.

⁴⁹ R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd [1990] 2 AC 85.

The litigation before the ECJ

Shortly thereafter, the ECJ heard an Art 169 action against the UK which claimed that the MSA 1988 Act breached the UK's Treaty obligations. In EC Commission v United Kingdom,⁵⁰ the Commission asked the ECJ to make an interim order per Art 186 ordering the British government not to enforce the 1988 Act. The ECJ saw some merit in the UK's position, since the 1988 Act might prove a defensible means to pursue the EC's own objective of conserving long-term fish stocks. However the Act's overt discrimination against non-British EC nationals seriously undermined the UK's case. Moreover, there was no doubt that enforcement of the Act would inflict extremely heavy losses on the Spanish shipowners. In those circumstances, the ECJ granted an interim order requiring the UK to 'suspend' the 1988 legislation.

The ECJ subsequently gave judgment on the question referred to it by the House of Lords, in R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame (No 2).⁵¹ After referring explicitly to the Simmenthal principle of immediate supremacy, the Court observed that national courts were obliged by the 'principle of co-operation laid down in Article 5' to ensure that domestic legal systems give practical legal effect to directly effective EC rights. Any provision within the national legal system which impairs this effect contravenes EC law. This principle applied as readily to questions of interim as final relief. Consequently, if the sole obstacle to interim relief is 'a rule of national law', the national court must set aside that rule.

Back in the House of Lords...

The House of Lords announced that it had held in Factortame's favour, and would disapply the MSA 1988, in June 1990. Its reasons would be given at a later date. The announcement provoked apocalyptic denunciations from Prime Minister Thatcher about losses of national sovereignty to the Commission. The leading judgment in *R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame (No 2)*⁵² was given by Lord Goff. However Lord Bridge took the opportunity to comment on claims (whose source he diplomatically chose not to name) that the decision 'was a novel and dangerous invasion by a community institution of the sovereignty of the UK Parliament'.⁵³ Such criticism was misconceived. Parliament had been quite aware of the precedence doctrine in 1972, so any 'limitation' of sovereignty that EC membership entailed was 'voluntary'. The ECA 1972 had ordered domestic courts to respect that 'voluntary limitation', so there was nothing novel in this judgment.⁵⁴

As Lord Goff made clear, the ECJ's decision in Factortame did not determine the outcome of the domestic litigation. Rather it required the British courts to reject those principles of domestic law (the non-availability of interim injunctions against the Crown and the courts' incapacity to disapply clearly worded statutes) which presented an absolute bar to Factortame's claims. Lord Goff made only a passing reference to the ECJ's decision, apparently seeing no need to justify or explain it, but accepting it as an uncontentious (if brand new) principle of national law to be integrated into the existing common law rules governing the availability of interim injunctions.

⁵⁰ EC Commission v United Kingdom: Case C-246/89R: [1989] ECR 3125, ECJ.

⁵¹ Case C-213/89: [1990] ECR I-2433.

⁵² [1991] 1 AC 603, sub nom Factortame Ltd v Secretary of State for Transport (No 2) [1991] 1 All ER 70.

⁵³ [1991] 1 AC 603, at 658.

⁵⁴ Lord Bridge perhaps oversimplified the issue. As ch 11 suggested, British judges and British governments displayed confusion in the late 1960s and early 1970s as to the nature and implications of Costa and Van Gend. Moreover, many innovative aspects of the ECJ's own constitutional jurisprudence had appeared after the UK's accession.

Those rules suggested that interim relief was only available if there was no possibility of the plaintiff eventually gaining damages to cover any loss suffered pending resolution of the main question. No such damages could (at that time)⁵⁵ be recovered from the government. The Court had then to ask itself if there was a 'strong prima facie case' indicating that the plaintiff would ultimately be successful. Lord Goff considered that the EC Commission v United Kingdom decision suggested that the ECJ would answer the substantive issue in Factortame's favour, which would in itself predispose the Court to grant interim relief. However, he also implied that he doubted that the plaintiff needed to show such a high probability of eventual success in this case.

The EC Treaties as 'higher law'

Radical though the 'disapplication' doctrine laid out in Factortame undoubtedly was, it might initially have been thought to be a principle of limited application. Was the power to be exercised, for example, only by the House of Lords; or did it extend to all national courts and tribunals? Relatedly, was the power triggered only after a reference to the ECJ via Art 177, or might it be applied whenever a national court considered a statutory provision to be inconsistent with EC law?

Simmenthal—to which Factortame might be seen as a belated response—would suggest that the power lay with any court, and it arose irrespective of whether any reference to the ECJ was made. The House of Lords subsequently endorsed this position in R v Secretary of State for Employment, ex p Equal Opportunities Commission.⁵⁶ In the immediate aftermath of this case it became clear that even employment tribunals, which occupy a lowly position within the United Kingdom's constitutional hierarchy, considered themselves competent to apply the Factortame doctrine.⁵⁷ In practical terms, the Factortame rationale rapidly became—as far as all courts were concerned—an obviously comfortable part of the constitutional furniture.

In a more abstract vein, the unfortunate jurisprudential and political lacuna left unfilled by the Factortame litigation is that the House of Lords did not grapple with the fundamental question of just how it was that in 1972 the UK Parliament managed to do something that had always been beyond its predecessors' grasp—namely 'voluntarily' to limit its sovereignty? As HRW Wade has pointed out, Lord Bridge's reasoning makes very little sense, whether as an excursion in legal theory or as a recipe for practical politics.⁵⁸ The obvious problem is that if Parliament managed in 1972 to entrench the ECA, on what basis can one sensibly maintain that it could not now or in the future entrench other legislation as well? It might be argued that the EC is 'unique' in this respect, because, perhaps, of the political significance of its powers and/or its elaborate institutional structure. But that is merely an assertion. It is no less plausible to say that other important moral or political factors could acquire a similar constitutional status, with the result that, as Wade puts it 'the new doctrine makes sovereignty a freely adjustable commodity whenever Parliament chooses to accept some limitation'.⁵⁹

This is perhaps not as alarming a spectre as it may appear. Factortame entrenchment is—it seems—of an extremely weak procedural kind. It does not take the form of requiring super-majorities within Parliament, nor that there be resort to any extra-parliamentary device such as a referendum; it merely requires that a bare parliamentary majority expresses itself in unusually blunt language. A new Merchant Shipping Act which said

⁵⁵ But see now the discussion of Francovich and Brasserie de Pecheur below.

⁵⁶ [1994] ICR 317, HL.

⁵⁷ See Nicol D (1996) 'Disapplying with relish? The Industrial Tribunals and Acts of Parliament' Public Law 579.

⁵⁸ (1996) 'Sovereignty—revolution or evolution?' LQR 568.

⁵⁹ (1996) op cit p 573.

in s 1 that it was intended to repudiate the UK's obligations under the Common Fisheries Policy would presumably have been applied by Lord Bridge and his colleagues. It is doubtful that it could have been disappplied through the judicial techniques ostensibly used in Factortame (No 2).

Factortame need not therefore be read as suggesting that Parliament can grant itself a power equivalent to that given to colonial legislatures in s 5 of the Colonial Laws Validity Act 1865 to entrench any political values it chooses by altering the legislative 'manner and form' required to change them.⁶⁰ An entrenchment mechanism of this sort is a dangerous device, as it would enable a bare legislative majority enjoying only minority electoral support to set such high thresholds for the repeal of its preferred laws that they could never be altered. But if Parliament was able to create even a very weak form of entrenchment in 1972, might it not be able to create much stronger entrenchment devices in future?

Wade's conclusion that Factortame amounts to a 'judicial revolution' is initially enticing. It maintains in essence that it was not Parliament through the ECA 1972 but the judges themselves who have altered the constitution's rule of recognition. In other words, the old orthodoxy was correct, but it was within the power of the courts to change it at any time. This argument displaces rather than solves the problems posed by Lord Bridge's analysis. The obvious difficulty is that if the courts have managed in 1990 to entrench the European Communities Act, on what basis can one sensibly maintain that they could not now or in the future entrench other legislation as well? Wade's doctrine 'makes sovereignty a freely adjustable commodity whenever the courts choose to impose some limitation'.

Allan's analysis of Factortame is more satisfactory on this issue.⁶¹ Allan has long offered a rather isolated voice in our constitutional discourse to the effect that orthodox understandings of parliamentary sovereignty are, and always have been, ill-conceived.⁶² Allan's suggestion that our current constitutional settlement permits the courts to disapply legislation which is irreconcilable with the concepts of democracy and the rule of law offers a fascinating point of departure for discussing the Factortame saga.

Allan's thesis rests on the presumption that the orthodox, Diceyan view of parliamentary sovereignty misconceives the political objectives that the English Revolution of 1688 was trying to achieve. The Diceyan position, and its more modern restatements, espouse a purely formalist conception of the relationship between statute and the courts. The courts (and presumably everyone else) 'recognise' statute as the highest form of law simply because the 1688 Revolution was fought (and won) by men who wished to establish the legal superiority of measures enacted by the Commons, Lords and Monarch acting collectively over both the actions of either house, of the Monarch acting under prerogative powers, or of the courts acting under the power of the common law. However, if, following Professor Wade, we regard parliamentary sovereignty as the ultimate political fact of the constitution, it does not seem outlandish to ask (as Dicey and Professor Wade did not) why the revolutionaries wished to achieve this objective? What political or moral purpose was the ultimate political fact intended to serve?

Questioning the 'Why' rather than the 'What' of parliamentary sovereignty

Paul Craig has latterly offered an intriguing answer to this question.⁶³ Craig's critique begins by noting that 'much of the current literature fails to pay attention to the reasons why Parliament should or should not be regarded as sovereign'.⁶⁴ He attempts to ⁶⁰ See A-G for New South Wales v Trethowan (1931), ch 2, pp 36–37 above.

⁶¹ (1997) 'Parliamentary sovereignty: law, politics and revolution' LQR 443.

⁶² See particularly (1983) op cit; (1985) op cit; (1993) op cit.

⁶³ (1991) 'Sovereignty of the United Kingdom Parliament after Factortame' Yearbook of European Law 221.

⁶⁴ Ibid., at 234.

fill in this gap by digging deeper into and behind the legal sources underpinning the Diceyan position. Orthodox theories place much reliance, for example, on arguments voiced by Sir William Blackstone, the leading eighteenth-century jurist, in his celebrated Commentaries on English law. The key passage asserts that Parliament ‘can in short do everything that is not naturally impossible . . . True it is, that what the Parliament doth, no authority can undo’. On its face, Blackstone’s text provides unequivocal support for the orthodox position.

However, Craig’s critique, unlike the analysis offered by Wade in 1955, then asks why Blackstone was led to this conclusion. As suggested in chapter two, the notion that sovereignty should lie in a tripartite Parliament, within which each element possessed veto powers, reflected a belief that the Commons, Lords and Monarch acting in unison were the only legitimate arbiters of the national interest. The 1688 Revolution can thus be seen as an attempt to create an anti-majoritarian source of sovereign legal authority. It is this essentially political purpose, Craig suggests, which underlay the acceptance of Parliament as the highest source of law. To put the argument simply, Blackstone and those whose views he represented endorsed the principle of parliamentary sovereignty because they could conceive of no more broadly based mechanism for ensuring that laws enjoyed the consent of the people. Parliament was ‘sovereign’ for political or moral reasons—namely that it minimised the possibility that the English people⁶⁵ would be subjected to factionally motivated legislation.

The sovereign Parliament was not created for a modern society. Its proponents in 1688 had no conception that the powers of the Monarch would diminish to insignificance, nor that the House of Lords would voluntarily acquiesce in the removal of its co-equal powers in the legislative process. Still less would they have envisaged a near universal electorate for the Commons and the emergence of national political parties. Our concept of ‘the people’ is, of course, now much changed. We regard modern Britain as a mature democracy in which the legitimacy of a sovereign Parliament rests on the periodic consent of the electorate. Yet in our mature democracy Parliament functions as an extremely effective vehicle for the majoritarian or even minoritarian sentiments of a single political party to be given legal effect. While 1688 envisaged Parliament as a consensual forum designed to identify the national interest, it now operates as an arena of conflict intended to promote party interests.

It is at this juncture that Allan’s suggestion that notions of ‘democracy’ and ‘the rule of law’ can serve as limits on Parliament’s legislative competence become significant in relation to the Factortame conundrum. The EC Treaties stand in marked contrast to our domestic law-making process. Their terms are not the product of majoritarian or even super-majoritarian law-making. Their every provision has been arrived at through a consensual negotiatory process, demanding the unanimous approval of a growing number of nations—nations which themselves represent differing political philosophies and a multiplicity of cultural inheritances. And as the Treaties have been successively amended by the same protracted, negotiatory, consensual law-making process, so the innovate jurisprudence of the European Court and the Member States’ domestic courts have implicitly been granted a unanimous, cross-national seal of legislative approval. The prospect of an EC Treaty provision being narrowly majoritarian, has been reduced almost to vanishing point. In that functional sense, Treaty provisions are a ‘higher’ form of law than can be produced by any of the EC’s Member States within their own legal systems. The Treaties

⁶⁵ Narrowly defined of course as the Monarch, the Lords and the small portion of citizens permitted to participate in electing members of the Commons.

thus represent a modern manifestation of the ideal for which England's seventeenth-century 'revolutionaries' strove.⁶⁶

In comparison with the Treaties, the Merchant Shipping Act fares very poorly when measured against this ideal. It is perhaps unfortunate that legal analysis of the Factortame episode has generally been confined to exploring the judgment's impact on the relationship between Parliament and the courts. Even Allan, notwithstanding his concern with substantive values of democracy and the rule of law, approaches the issue in this way. Neither Allan's nor Wade's critique addresses the individual citizen's interest in the case. What has rather been forgotten in respect of Factortame is that this particular constitutional episode was triggered by the deliberate decision of a xenophobic minoritarian government to use its Commons and Lords majorities (the one generated by the support of 34% of the electorate; the other derived from the principle of hereditary peerages) to enact a crudely segregationist economic policy which—in addition to clearly breaching the Treaty of Rome—was intended to bankrupt several business enterprises and throw many people into unemployment. It would be a very strange view of 'democracy' which nonetheless accorded legitimacy to such behaviour.

There is little indication that such overtly 'political' reasoning underpinned the Factortame decisions. It may well prove to be the case, as Craig has argued, that Factortame rests on no more than an adjustment to, or development of, the courts' role as interpreters of legislative intent.⁶⁷ That assertion can however only be proven 'correct' as a matter of law if political developments afford the opportunity to put it to a legal test. This could occur in one of two scenarios.

Will domestic courts apply statutes which expressly contradict EC law?

The first would arise if a Euro-sceptic government, commanding a majority in the Commons and Lords, were to promote legislation (perhaps, for example, another Merchant Shipping Act unilaterally withdrawing the UK from the Common Fisheries Policy) which stated in s 1:

This Act is intended to breach the obligations accepted by the United Kingdom in its capacity as a member state of the European Community. The courts of the United Kingdom are hereby expressly ordered to apply the terms of this Act, irrespective of any rule of law deriving from the European Communities Act 1972 or the Treaties establishing the European Community or any judgment of the European Court of Justice.

We might then suppose that a non-UK EC national who wished to fish in UK waters in accordance with the terms of EC law launched an action in the English courts seeking an injunction to prevent the Act being applied. There would then be no scope for a domestic court to uphold the precedence of EC law through innovative techniques of interpretation. Nor could resort be made to theories distinguishing implied and express statutory commands.

If a domestic court wished to uphold the Costa and Van Gend principles in this situation, it could do so only by bluntly stating that Parliament had no power to disapply EC law while the UK remained a member of the Community. Building on Costa and the 'loyalty duty' contained in Art 5 of the Treaty, the argument would be that EC law cannot be 'supreme' if its supposed supremacy is divisible or suspendable at the whim of a national Parliament. If Parliament wishes unilaterally to terminate the 'effet utile' of EC law in the ⁶⁶ This rationale obviously has less force in respect of EC secondary legislation, especially if that legislation can be enacted by qualified or simple majority vote.

⁶⁷ (1991) op cit.

UK, it may do so only by passing legislation which repeals the European Communities Act 1972 and withdraws this country from the EC. This sounds, of course, like a very speculative hypothesis; but it perhaps takes a far smaller leap of the jurisprudential imagination to go to this point from Factortame (No 2), than it did to reach Factortame (No 2) from the views which prevailed in many political and legal circles when the UK joined the EC in 1972.

Will domestic courts apply a statute withdrawing the United Kingdom from the EC?

Yet even this scenario, irreconcilable though it may seem with orthodox constitutional principles, does not betoken a permanent loss of parliamentary sovereignty. The final step in that direction could only be taken if Parliament enacted legislation purporting to withdraw the United Kingdom from the Community and the UK courts then refused to apply the Act. Thus far, little serious thought has been given to the argument that Parliament cannot expect such legislation to be applied by domestic courts.⁶⁸ But such an argument is a perfectly logical development of the foundations laid by the European Court over thirty years ago in Van Gend and Costa and of those set down by the House of Lords in Factortame (No 2).

As noted above, the ECJ told us in Van Gend that the EC was 'more than just an agreement between Member States'. It was rather:

... a new legal order of international law for the benefit of which the states have limited their sovereign rights, and the subjects of which comprise not only the Member States but also their nationals.⁶⁹

An alternative way of expressing this principle is to say that we as citizens of the United Kingdom each enjoy certain entitlements (and are subjected to certain obligations) which our domestic organs of government, acting unilaterally, are not legally competent to alter. As the Community's legal competence expanded following the Single European Act, new entitlements and obligations have been created, and the original ones bestowed by the Treaty of Rome have become more firmly rooted in our legal and political culture. This would imply that any such alteration in the UK's relationship with the EC could lawfully be accomplished only through the mechanisms of EC law. The question then becomes how can that alteration lawfully be effected?

Prior to 2009, Community law contained no express provisions for Member State withdrawal.⁷⁰ The only way that result could lawfully be achieved (as a matter of EC law, and hence, given the supremacy of EC law over contradictory domestic statutes, as a matter of domestic law) is if the EC Treaties were amended to reconstitute the Community with one fewer member. That process, as specified in Art 236, requires the convening of an Inter-Governmental Conference, at which all existing Member States must agree to alterations to the Treaty's provisions. From this perspective, as a matter of EC law (and of acute political irony), any one of the other Member States would have a veto power over UK departure from the Community.⁷¹

To suggest that UK courts might simply refuse to apply the provisions of legislation seeking to withdraw the UK from the Community is, quite clearly, a fanciful argument. The sovereignty of Parliament, as generally understood, would undoubtedly be ⁶⁸ Wade has hinted at the possibility; (1996) op cit at p 570: 'It may be accepted, at least at this point in time, that Parliament could indeed repeal the Act of 1972 altogether'.

⁶⁹ Case 26/62: [1963] ECR I at para 12.

⁷⁰ See further 'Conclusion', p 417 below.

⁷¹ Since the EC is (per Van Gend) a 'new legal order of international law', the rules in 'ordinary' international law permitting unilateral State withdrawal from treaty arrangements would not apply.

challenged in the most confrontational of ways by such judicial action. There is nonetheless some force in the contention—for the reasons outlined above—that for the UK courts to deny our modern Parliament the power either expressly to breach EC law, or to leave the Community altogether, would not challenge the sovereignty of Parliament but rather restore its original purpose. Perhaps this would indeed amount to a revolution; but more in the sense of our constitutional order turning a full circle and returning to the anti-majoritarian ethos underpinning the 1688 revolution than of embarking on a wholly new and uncharted political adventure.

The reappearance of the political doctrine? Monetary union, collective ministerial responsibility and the fall of Margaret Thatcher

Several factors contributed to Conservative MPs' decision to remove Margaret Thatcher as their leader (and thence to her decision to resign as Prime Minister) in November 1990. As chapter ten suggested, the unpopularity of the community charge led many Conservative MPs to fear defeat in the next general election. Thatcher's close personal identification with the poll tax offered an obvious reason for some Conservative MPs to want a new leader. Others remained continually unhappy with her evident preference for a presidential style of Cabinet government (a preference which had triggered the resignations of Heseltine in 1985 and Nigel Lawson in 1989). But the catalytic event was Thatcher's attitude towards the UK's EC membership.

The Treaty of Rome (Title II, Chapter 1) had contained various (seemingly non-justiciable) provisions heralding a co-ordinated approach to macro-economic policy. Member States undertook to maintain the stability of their respective currencies and an approximate equilibrium in their balance of payments. The Commission was empowered to monitor Member States' performances in this regard, and to offer financial assistance to Member States suffering a severe currency or balance of payments crisis.

These modest co-ordinatory policies were seen by some observers as a tentative first step towards full blown 'monetary union', which would ultimately require a single EC currency and a central EC bank controlling the Community's money supply and interest rates. This objective has an obvious economic logic in the context of creating a truly 'common' market, as it removes the transaction costs engendered by currency exchanges and ensures that businesses in particular Member States are not advantaged or disadvantaged vis-à-vis their EC competitors as a result of their own government's monetary policy.

But full monetary union also had profound political implications. A single EC currency and a central EC bank would present a distinct challenge to orthodox notions of national sovereignty. By the late 1960s, it is possible to argue that western economies were sufficiently closely interconnected for it to be practically impossible for any one European country successfully to pursue economic policies entirely independent of those adopted by neighbouring states. Nevertheless, economic and monetary union would remove such practical controls as national governments still possessed, thereby significantly extending the de facto federal nature of the Community and adding further force to arguments for a full political federalisation on the American model.

The EC's first steps towards monetary union had begun in 1969, but rapidly foundered during the recession of the early 1970s. Roy Jenkins, having resigned from the Labour government to become President of the Commission in 1977, put the issue at the top of the Commission's list of priorities, and by 1979 the European Monetary System (EMS) was in place. The EMS existed outside the legal structure of the Treaty, and so was not a Community measure in the strict sense. Its central feature was the Exchange Rate Mechanism (ERM), which placed fairly tight limits on fluctuations in currency exchange rates. Member States were not obliged to join the ERM, and successive Labour and Conservative governments chose not to do so, preferring to retain autonomy in exchange rate and interest rate policies. The SEA itself made scant reference to monetary union, beyond noting the obvious point that giving the EMS and ERM a legal basis within Community law would require further Treaty amendment. However in 1988, the European Council instructed Jacques Delors to produce a phased plan for achieving de facto and de jure economic and monetary union. The 1989 Delors Report on Economic and Monetary Union envisaged a three-stage process. Firstly, a gradual 'convergence' of the Member States' economies in respect of such matters as inflation rates, economic growth, and the balance of payments; secondly, the locking of all Member States' currencies into a far tighter ERM, which would tolerate only very small currency fluctuations; and thirdly, the introduction of the single currency.

While many Member State governments welcomed the plan, the UK government expressed reservations. The Conservative manifesto for the 1989 EC elections warned that monetary union would 'involve a fundamental transfer of sovereignty.... The report, if taken as whole, implies nothing less than the creation of a federal Europe'.⁷² Nevertheless, at the Madrid Summit in 1989, the European Council agreed to begin the first stage in 1990, and to initiate the process of Treaty amendment to establish a timetable for phases two and three. The British government also agreed that it would enter the ERM at some point in the near future.

It seems that the Thatcher government regarded the Madrid summit as a recipe for delay rather than prompt action. However, the other Member States took quite the opposite view, with the result that by mid-1990, the Prime Minister and some of her Cabinet colleagues were making distinctly hostile comments about the Delors plan. We noted in chapter nine that Nicholas Ridley, perhaps the Cabinet member most in sympathy with Thatcher's EC views, had resigned in July 1990 after giving an interview critical of Germany. Some parts of that interview merit further attention here. Ridley had suggested that monetary union was simply 'a German racket designed to take over the whole of Europe'; he thought that the scheme posed an intolerable threat to British sovereignty: 'You might just as well give it to Adolf Hitler, frankly'.⁷³

Ridley's resignation might have been thought to suggest that Ministers holding such sentiments should at the least not express them in such terms. But the Cabinet was clearly split on the monetary union question. The UK finally joined the ERM in October 1990, yet immediately afterwards the Prime Minister herself engaged in a Ridleyesque tirade against the Delors plan. At the European Council's Rome Summit, the other eleven Member States expressed their willingness to accelerate plans for further monetary integration. Thatcher resolutely opposed any such initiative, describing the summit as 'a mess' and her fellow heads of government as living in 'Cloud Cuckoo Land'. On her return to the Commons, Thatcher accused Jaques Delors and the Commission of trying to 'extinguish democracy', and announced she would greet every 'federalist' EC measure with a resounding 'No!'.

Thatcher's outburst prompted Geoffrey Howe (the then Deputy Prime Minister) to resign from the Cabinet. His initial explanation that his resignation was over the question of government policy towards the EC was to be expanded upon in a speech to the Commons on 13 November 1990.⁷⁴ Howe was never noted as an inspiring orator. He once earned the memorable soubriquet from Dennis Healey that to be criticised by him in debate was 'like being savaged by a dead sheep'. His resignation speech did not contain any stylistic fireworks; but its content had an explosive political effect.

⁷² Quoted in Nicoll W and Simon T (1994) Understanding the new European Community at p 158 (London: Harvester Wheatsheaf).

⁷³ The Spectator 14 July 1990.

⁷⁴ HCD 13 November 1990 cc 461-465.

Howe attributed many of the country's economic difficulties to the government's refusal to join the ERM in 1985. He then revealed that the government's eventual commitment to join had been extracted from an unwilling Prime Minister only when he (then Foreign Secretary) and Nigel Lawson (the then Chancellor) had threatened to resign from the Cabinet if it did not do so. Yet Howe suggested that the question of ERM membership was merely a symptom of a more pervasive Prime Ministerial distaste for the European Community. Echoing Lord Bridge's oblique criticism in Factortame (No 2), Howe asserted that it was a serious error to regard closer European integration, as the Prime Minister appeared to do, as involving the 'surrender of sovereignty'. Making an overt reference to the Bruges speech, Howe argued that such hyperbolic language served only to create:

... a bogus dilemma, between one alternative, starkly labelled 'co-operation between independent sovereign states', and a second, equally crudely labelled alternative, 'centralised federal super-state', as if there were no middle way in between.⁷⁵

Howe observed that the EC's development was more likely to proceed in a direction which coincided with British interests if the government argued its case from the centre of the EC policy-making process, rather than standing on the sidelines and eventually being dragged reluctantly into a reformed Community in which the political agenda had been set to reflect the preferences of its other members. But Howe's criticism of Thatcher did not dwell merely on tactics; it reached also to the question of her basic attitude towards the UK's EC partners. Howe saw no merit in what he termed Thatcher's 'nightmare image' of an EC 'positively teeming with ill-intentioned people, scheming in her words to "extinguish democracy", to "dissolve our national identities" and to lead us "through the back-door into a federal Europe"'.⁷⁶ Against such Europhobic 'background noise', it was impossible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be taken seriously by other Member States in any discussion of EC economic policy.

Howe's speech is a graphic example of the Commons' capacity to serve as a forum for calling the executive to account. The speech revealed not simply a disagreement between a Prime Minister and a senior colleague on a matter of major substantive importance, but also suggested that the country was being governed by a dogmatic leader who held an ill-mannered contempt for any divergent opinion (be it within Cabinet or from other EC Member States), and who utterly rejected traditional principles of Cabinet government. Such criticisms of Thatcher had frequently been made by opposition parties; but they were likely to carry more weight with Conservative MPs when delivered by the man who had served as Chancellor and Foreign Secretary for over ten years in Thatcher's Cabinets.

Thereafter, domestic political events moved with great rapidity. Michael Heseltine, five years after leaving the Cabinet, challenged Thatcher for leadership of the Conservative Party. Her failure to win an adequate majority in the subsequent election held among Conservative MPs led to her resignation as party leader and Prime Minister, and then to John Major's eventual succession.

These events reinforce the presumption that EC membership has wrought significant changes in both orthodox constitutional theory and orthodox constitutional practice. In practical terms, the constitutional history of twentieth-century Britain has been dominated (except during the two world wars) by a straightforward party political division, in which single-party governments with relatively distinct and coherent ideological beliefs have deployed a Commons majority to use Parliament's legal sovereignty to pursue their preferred policy programmes. But that picture may now be changing. In part, that is attributable to the courts' recognition of supra-legislative constraints on parliamentary sovereignty on EC matters. It may be fanciful to equate Costa and Factortame with the pre-revolutionary supra-legislative notion of 'common right and reason', but the analogy is not entirely spurious. But perhaps of greater immediate significance to analysts of the British constitution is the argument that the demise of Margaret Thatcher, seen in conjunction with the extraordinary party political alignments produced in the 1972 Accession controversy and the 1975 referendum, indicates that the EC has introduced a profound ideological fault line into the very core of the traditional party political divide. In 1990, it seemed plausible to suggest that neither the Labour nor Conservative Party could any longer rely on its MPs to present a unified front on EC questions. Equally, it appeared that EC questions could never be settled in any definitive sense, for Euro-sceptics seemed wedded to the belief that only a bare Commons majority would be needed to unravel whatever EC commitments Parliament had previously undertaken. In combination, these factors held out the prospect of a significant weakening of Prime Ministerial authority vis-à-vis the Cabinet, and of government authority vis-à-vis the Commons. We will return to this question in the final section of this chapter. But before doing so, we must make one final journey to the case law of the ECJ.

⁷⁵ Ibid, at c 463.

⁷⁶ Ibid, at c 464.

V. The Francovich remedy

Thatcher's dominance of Britain's political agenda in the 1980s (and thence of much of Britain's constitutional history in that decade), lent her resignation major domestic significance. Yet it was of little moment for the on-going development of the Community's constitutional history. Very rapidly, all eyes turned to the proposals that would eventually feature in the Maastricht Treaty on European Union. But in the interim, the ECJ was continuing its efforts to clarify the relationship between EC law's normative supra-nationalism and the Member States' respective constitutional autonomy.

Francovich

The EC Directive at issue in *Francovich*⁷⁷ (No 80/987) required Member States to institute (by October 1983) a scheme which guaranteed a minimum level of financial protection for workers whose employers became insolvent. The maximum amount of compensation envisaged was modest, being only three months' salary. Nevertheless, Italy chose to ignore the directive. The Commission instituted an Art 169 action against Italy in 1987.⁷⁸ The ECJ held Italy to be in breach of its Treaty obligations, but the Italian government still refused to implement the directive. Francovich was owed some six million lira by his employer, who had become insolvent in 1985. An Italian court had given judgment in Francovich's favour against the employer under Italian insolvency laws, but since the employer had no resources, it was not possible for that judgment to be enforced. Mr Francovich consequently sued the Italian state in the domestic courts for the compensation he would have received if Directive 80/987 had been correctly incorporated into national law. In an Art 177 reference, the ECJ was asked; firstly, if the directive was directly effective against the Italian state; and, secondly, if it was not directly effective, ⁷⁷ Francovich and Bonifaci v Italy: Cases C-6, 9/90: [1991] ECR-I 5357, [1993] 2 CMLR 66, ECJ.

⁷⁸ EC Commission v Italy: Case 22/87: [1989] ECR 143.

could Mr Francovich nevertheless claim damages against Italy to reimburse him for the loss he had suffered as a result of the directive's non-implementation?

It is conceivable that the ECJ might have found Directive 80/987 directly effective, and thereafter simply applied the supremacy principle to 'instruct' the domestic court to award Francovich the minimum compensation the EC law required. However the Court concluded (somewhat unconvincingly)⁷⁹ that the measure was not directly effective, since it afforded Member States the choice of financing the scheme themselves or requiring it to be underwritten by private sector institutions.

One could suggest two powerful reasons for assuming that the remedy alluded to in the second question would be a very effective means of ensuring that Member States complied with their EC law obligations. Firstly, a damages remedy—especially if it embraced punitive as well as compensatory damages—could prove extremely expensive for the government concerned. Secondly, it would be much more difficult in domestic political terms for a government to ignore a judgment of a national court in an action brought by one of its own citizens than a judgment of the 'foreign' ECJ in an action initiated by the Commission. One might equally suggest that the very efficacy of the remedy would explain why it has no explicit existence in the Treaty's text: the original Member State governments would surely not have wished to subject themselves to such a regime.

Notwithstanding the absence of any explicit textual base for the claimed remedy, the ECJ found in Francovich's favour on the second question. The Court employed an interpretive methodology very reminiscent of its technique in Van Gend, suggesting that: 'This problem must be examined in terms of the general scheme and basic principles of the Treaty'.⁸⁰ This purposive approach led the ECJ to hold that: 'the principle of the liability of the state for damage to individuals caused by a breach of Community law for which it is responsible is inherent in the scheme of the Treaty'.⁸¹

Literalists might suggest that 'inherency' is simply a cloak underneath which the ECJ has invented an entirely novel principle of law, which could legitimately be introduced into the EC's constitution only by an amendment to the Treaty via Art 236. The Court did also suggest that this inherent principle also enjoyed some textual basis in Treaty Art 5, but even that conclusion demands some fairly creative interpretation.

The ECJ continued by identifying three conditions which had to be satisfied before individuals could rely on this newly discovered principle. Firstly, that the relevant EC measure was intended to confer benefits on individuals. Secondly, that the substance of such benefits was clearly defined by the directive. And thirdly, that a causal link existed between the individual's loss and the Member State's breach of its Treaty obligations. Since all three conditions were met in Francovich's case, he could recover damages from the Italian state. Francovich seemingly opened a new chapter in the history of the domestic impact of EC law. The judgment itself left unanswered many important questions: how tight a causal link would be required between the Member State's misfeasance and the loss caused; would liability attach only to egregious and deliberate failure to implement a directive (evidenced by failure to comply with an Article 169 judgment) or extend even to unwitting mistakes; would there be a ceiling on the quantum and heads of damages available; on which particular organ of government would liability ultimately fall; and to what extent would the ECJ be prepared to allow the national courts to devise their own answers to these issues?⁸² More broadly, one might wonder if the remedy should be ⁷⁹ Steiner J (1993) 'From direct to Francovich: shifting means of enforcement of community law' EL Rev 3.

⁸⁰ [1993] 2 CMLR 66 at para 30.

⁸¹ Ibid, at para 35 (emphasis added).

⁸² For initial speculation see Steiner (1993) op cit: Craig P (1993) 'Francovich, remedies and the scope of damages liability' 109 LQR 595.

limited simply to failure to implement a directive,⁸³ or whether it should extend to any breach of EC law?

A principle of broad or limited scope?

Yet even if Francovich was initially to be narrowly construed, the ECJ's gradual extension of the initially limited concept of direct effect created in Van Gend might suggest that Francovich would grow into an expansive and highly effective tool for citizens to use to enhance the effet utile of EC law. This supposition was borne out a few years later in Brasserie du Pêcheur SA v Germany.⁸⁴ The issue before the ECJ in Brasserie was whether the damages remedy was to be regarded solely as an alternative to direct effect available only in respect of non-implementation of a directive, or whether it was an additional remedy that might be invoked in respect of any breach of EC law. Unsurprisingly, the ECJ favoured the latter approach:

[T]he right of individuals to rely on the directly effective provisions of the Treaty is only a minimum guarantee and is not sufficient in itself to ensure the full and complete implementation of the Treaty...[I]n the event of a right directly conferred by a Community provision upon which individuals are entitled to rely before the national courts...the right to reparation is the necessary corollary of the direct effect of the Community provision whose breach caused the damage sustained.⁸⁵

When seen in conjunction with Marleasing, Francovich and Brasserie du Pêcheur also reinforce the supposition that the ECJ is developing its own version of the 'mutual recognition' rather than 'Euronorms' approach to integration which underpinned the Single European Act. Both judgments place responsibility for ensuring the effet utile of Community law firmly in the domestic constitutional arena, the onus being placed on national courts to pull their respective legislatures into line with EC principles. On a grander scale, these might lead us to suggest that the EC is now lending a further, geographical dimension to traditional British understandings of the separation of powers, in the sense that national judiciaries may be beginning to see themselves as sharing more common ground with their counterparts in the ECJ and the other Member States than with their own countries' legislative and executive branches. It might be argued, for example, that we can identify a 'ripple effect', in which principles espoused by the ECJ and thereafter applied by the domestic courts in respect of EC matters have also begun to influence judicial decision-making on purely domestic issues. An obvious example of this in the English context is the judgment in Pepper v Hart,⁸⁶ in which—using Pickstone as a springboard—the House of Lords departed from the traditional 'exclusionary rule' and concluded that reference might be made to Hansard as a guide to statutory interpretation. That result was not, nor could be, in any sense required by EC law. Rather we might suggest that the constitutional principles of the EC have become sufficiently firmly established in the minds of British judges to begin to merge into the courts' constantly evolving conceptions of the contemporary role of the common law. If the hypothesis about a 'ripple effect' is proved accurate, then a further, significant shift towards a purely federalist constitution has slipped, indirectly, and largely unnoticed via the EC's 'new legal order' into the domestic legal system. Other shifts, in contrast, played out in the political rather than judicial arenas, have attracted rather more attention.

⁸³ Ie, to plugging the enforceability gap created by Marshall which Von Colson and Marleasing left unfilled.

⁸⁴ Case C-46/93: [1996] ECR I-1029, ECJ.

⁸⁵ Ibid, at paras 20 and 22.

⁸⁶ See 'Opening Pandora's box', pp 254–258 above.

VI. Maastricht and Amsterdam

The substantive reforms to the Community's legal structure introduced by the Maastricht Treaty on European Union (TEU) in 1993 were perhaps less far-reaching than those in the Single European Act.⁸⁷ Yet the amendment process proved extremely problematic in several states.

Before that political process ran its course, however, France's Conseild'Etat took a significant step towards accepting that French law should fully accept the precedence and direct effect doctrines. The Conseil's judgment in *Rauol Georges Nicolo*⁸⁸ did not reverse Cohn-Bendit in express terms, but certainly indicated that the status of EC law within France had undergone a profound change. In Nicolo, the Conseil accepted the advisory opinion from the Commissaire du Gouvernement that French law should now rest on the basis that Art 55 of the French constitution did require the domestic courts to attach precedence to EC treaty articles even if they were inconsistent with the requirements of subsequently enacted French legislation. Shortly afterwards, in *Boisdet*⁸⁹, the Conseild'Etat extended this principle to accept the applicability of the precedence and direct effect principles in respect of EC secondary legislation. Boisdet effectively did overrule Cohn-Bendit. Once again, however, the point must be made that the Conseil d'Etat offered these developments as changes in French constitutional law. Neither judgment accepted the ECJ's insistent contentions as to the autonomous status of Community law.

The terms of the Maastricht Treaty

The least controversial of the amendments was one of nomenclature; the Community was formally renamed as the EC rather than the EEC. Questions of labelling retained a symbolic importance throughout the negotiatory process. The British government insisted that any reference to the creation of a 'federal' Europe be deleted from the TEU's text. An ambivalent formula was eventually adopted; that the TEU would be 'a new stage in the process of creating an ever closer union among the peoples of Europe, in which decisions are taken as closely as possible to the citizen',⁹⁰ but which would respect the 'national identities' of Member States.

The TEU introduced several minor extensions in the EC's competence.⁹¹ The Community gained powers over consumer protection, industrial policy, and some education and cultural matters. More significantly, a specific timetable was set for phases two (1 January 1994) and three (1 January 1997 or 1999) of Delors' plan for monetary union.

Further modest efforts were made to reduce the Community's continuing democratic deficit. A new type of law-making process, requiring 'co-decision' between the Parliament and the Council in some areas, has increased the Parliament's influence. Some effort was also made to strengthen the links between the Community and individual citizens by creating a (largely symbolic) status of EU 'citizenship', and by empowering EC nationals to stand for office and vote in local or European elections anywhere in the Community.⁹² The TEU also created a 'Committee of the Regions' within the EC's institutional structure, ⁸⁷ For a longer, but accessible guide see Hartley T (1993) 'Constitutional and institutional aspects of the Maastricht Agreement' 42 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 213. ⁸⁸ [1990] 1 CMLR 173.

⁸⁹ [1991] CMLR 3. ⁹⁰ TEU, Art A.

⁹¹ See by Lane R (1993) 'New Community competences under the Maastricht Treaty' CML Rev 939.

⁹² Raworth P (1994) 'A timid step forwards: Maastricht and the democratisation of the EC' EL Rev 16.

intended to give a voice (but little power) in the Community to sub-central units of government within the Member States.

The Maastricht negotiations emphasised the plurality of meanings attached to the concept of federalism, both by different Member States, and by different political parties within an individual country.⁹³ The constitutional device eventually adopted to paper over these ideological cracks was the concept of 'subsidiarity'. This in itself is a term bearing several meanings relating to decentralisation of decision-making power.⁹⁴ The TEU defined it in what is now Art 3b of the EC Treaty:

In areas which do not fall within its exclusive competence, the Community shall take action... only if and in so far as the objectives of the proposed action cannot be sufficiently achieved by the Member states and can therefore, by reason of the scale or effects of the proposed action, be better achieved by the Community.

The TEU also introduced significant reforms in respect of the Social Charter. Eleven of the twelve Member States had wished to place the 1989 Declaration on a legal basis within the Treaty of Rome, thus making it directly effective in all Member States. The Major government rejected this reform. This resulted in the rather peculiar legal creature of a Protocol on Social Policy, attached to the TEU, in which the other eleven states agreed to incorporate the Charter, and all twelve states agreed that the eleven could use Community institutions (including the ECJ) to administer it.

But for both proponents and opponents of a United States of Europe, other aspects of the TEU may have seemed of greater long-term importance. The TEU provided that the EC itself was now to be seen as merely one 'pillar' of the 'European Union' (EU). The other two pillars would be Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP) and Justice and Home Affairs (JHA), which in combination substantially extend the range of the former system of 'European Political Co-operation' introduced by the Single European Act. In formal, legal terms, the CFSP and JHA were not part of the EC, and should perhaps be seen as an exercise in traditional inter-governmental co-operation rather than another 'new legal order' operating in parallel to the Community. However they were serviced by the EC's institutions, and there can be little doubt that many proponents of the Maastricht reform anticipated that all three pillars would eventually merge into a single legal order. CFSP and JHA take the Member States into far less justiciable territory than that covered by the EC. Nationalist sentiment is likely to be most intense over questions of foreign and defence policy: national governments would seem unlikely to wish to cede control over so emotive an issue as involvement in foreign wars, which may dilute EU responses to the point that they are utterly ineffective. Certainly the first test of the EU's ability to operate as an effective foreign policy player, the war in former Yugoslavia, suggested that the framers of the TEU had underestimated the difficulties that would attend joint initiatives in this area.

The inference that Maastricht may have gone too far too fast may also be drawn from consideration of the fate of the plans to achieve monetary union within the EC. The ERM collapsed late in 1993, before the TEU came into effect. The Member States could not maintain exchange rate stability in the face of massive speculation on the international money markets against the weaker currencies. Consequently several countries, including Britain, left the system. The Community's failure to resist these forces undermined its credibility in the eyes of supporters of further integration, and was construed as a sign of more pervasive weakness by its opponents. It is therefore unsurprising that the ratification and incorporation of the Treaty proved so tortuous in several Member States.

⁹³ See Koopmans T (1992) 'Federalism: the wrong debate' CML Rev 1047.

⁹⁴ Peterson J (1994) 'Subsidiarity: a definition to suit any vision' Parliamentary Affairs 116; Emiliou N (1994) 'Subsidiarity: panacea or fig leaf', in O'Keeffe D and Twomey P (eds) Legal issues of the Maastricht Treaty.

The ratification and incorporation of the Maastricht Treaty

Under the terms of Art 236 of the Treaty of Rome, those parts of the TEU which amended the EC Treaty could not come into force until it had been ratified by all the Member States in accordance with their own constitutional procedures. The people of Denmark had initially rejected the terms of the Treaty in a referendum. Some rapid renegotiation between the Member States ensued, whereupon the TEU was approved by a tiny majority in a second Danish referendum. Public opinion was also sharply divided in France, in which the requisite referendum produced a very small majority in favour of the Treaty. In Germany, the political argument was clearly won by pro-Maastricht forces, although the German government subsequently faced an (unsuccessful) legal challenge which argued that the TEU was inconsistent with provisions of the Basic Law.⁹⁵ Ratification of the TEU presented considerable political difficulties in the UK. The non-EC pillars of the Treaty were unproblematic; since there was no need to incorporate their provisions into domestic law, the government could satisfy its international law obligations simply by ratifying the measures through an exercise of the prerogative. In contrast, the TEU's reforms to the EC would have to be incorporated. Since the TEU increased the powers of the European Parliament, the government was bound by the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978 s 6 to gain parliamentary approval of the TEU before ratifying it. Given the then small size of the government's Commons majority,⁹⁶ and the presence of a dozen anti-EC backbenchers within Conservative ranks, it was not clear that approval would be forthcoming. After a series of complex political manoeuvres in the Commons,⁹⁷ the government was defeated by eight votes on a motion concerning the Social Policy Protocol. The Prime Minister thereupon announced that the government's motion on the Protocol would be the subject of a vote of confidence the next day, and implied that a defeat would lead to a dissolution. For rebel Conservative MPs, the prospect of a general election in which they might lose their seats was sufficiently daunting to bring them back into (the party) line. The government's majority in the confidence vote was forty.

But the controversy had not run its course. In a manner reminiscent of Mr Blackburn's feeble attempt to prevent the UK's accession to the Community in 1971, right-wing Eurosceptics launched a legal action after their cause had been defeated in the Commons.⁹⁸ The action was fronted by Lord Rees-Mogg, a cross-bench peer and former editor of The Times, and financed by Sir James Goldsmith, an expatriate financier. Such arguments as Rees-Mogg could muster against ratification and incorporation were peremptorily dismissed by the High Court, whereupon Goldsmith withdrew his financial support and the plaintiff declined to seek an appeal. The litigation was a trivial event compared to the extraordinary convolutions that had gripped the Commons and divided the Conservative Party in previous months; convolutions that continued in the following months.

⁹⁵ Brunner v European Union Treaty [1994] 1 CMLR 57.

⁹⁶ The Conservative majority at the 1992 election was twenty-one.

⁹⁷ These are described at length in the first edition of this book at pp 554–557.

⁹⁸ R v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, ex p Rees-Mogg [1994] QB 552, [1994] 1 All ER 457. For a detailed analysis see Rawlings R (1994a) 'Legal politics: the United Kingdom and ratification of the Treaty of European Union (part two)' Public Law 367.

At the 1992 Edinburgh Summit, the Member States had agreed to a modest increase in the Community budget from 1995 onwards. When the Major government introduced legislation in November 1994 to incorporate that obligation into domestic law, it encountered a substantial rebellion from backbench Conservative MPs who had opposed the Maastricht reforms. For a government whose majority was then only fourteen, the prospect of a Commons defeat was very real. The Prime Minister then announced that the second reading vote would be a matter of confidence, evidently on the basis that a government which could not honour its international obligations could not continue in office. Should the government be defeated, the entire Cabinet would resign and the Prime Minister would ask the Queen to grant a dissolution.⁹⁹ Rebel Conservatives promptly accused the Prime Minister of constitutional sharp practice in elevating a minor financial matter to the status of a confidence issue, and some discussion ensued as to whether the Queen would be conventionally obliged to grant a dissolution in such circumstances. Such speculation ultimately proved of only academic interest. The threat of a general election at a time when the Labour Party enjoyed a substantial lead in the opinion polls was again sufficient to bring most potential rebels back into the government camp. Nevertheless (in a manner reminiscent of Roy Jenkins' elevation of his perception of national interest over party interest in the 1972 accession votes), eight Conservative MPs abstained at second reading. They were subsequently stripped of the party whip, and rumours abounded that their local constituency associations were being pressurised by Conservative Central Office to withdraw their support from the errant MPs at the next general election.

The Treaty of Amsterdam

The Labour Party's victory at the 1997 general election took much political heat out of the constitutional controversies attending the United Kingdom's membership of the Community. The Labour Cabinet was firmly pro-European in outlook, and while a small number of backbench Labour MPs fell into the Euro-sceptic camp, they were an insignificant grouping within the parliamentary party as a whole. The Conservative Party under its new leader William Hague continued its stridently Euro-sceptic tone, but given the size of the government's Commons majority Conservative Euro-scepticism had also become wholly insignificant.

The Blair government immediately demonstrated its pro-EC credentials by incorporating the Social Charter into UK law. It stood back however from participating in the launch of the single European currency in 1999. The government's official position on this issue was that it supported the single currency in principle, but would not join it until economic conditions were appropriate. The government also promised that the United Kingdom would not join the agreement unless the electorate voted to do so in a referendum.¹⁰⁰

The new government also found itself plunged immediately into a new round of Treaty amendment negotiations. The proposals aired in the Amsterdam Treaty were relatively modest in effect.¹⁰¹ Its most significant innovation was to transfer much of the Justice and Home Affairs pillar of the EU into the EC, thereby bringing its terms within the jurisdiction of the ECJ. While the Amsterdam amendments did not incorporate the European Convention on Human Rights into the EC's legal order, the new Treaty did extend the EC's competence into a range of overtly 'political matters'. Under Art 13, the Community ⁹⁹ Technically, of course, Mr Major would have to have asked for the dissolution before resigning.

¹⁰⁰ For a detailed treatment of shifts in Labour Party policy towards the EU in this era see Fella S (2006) 'New Labour, same old Britain? The Blair government and European treaty reform' Parliamentary Affairs 621.

¹⁰¹ See Craig P (1998) 'The Treaty of Amsterdam: a brief guide' Public Law 351.

now has powers to address discrimination not just on the basis of nationality, but also gender, sexual orientation, disability, race and ethnicity and religious belief. The Amsterdam Treaty also further refined the Community's institutional balance, enhancing the power of the Parliament by extending the range of legislative matters which had to be taken by the co-decision procedure. The ratification process proved less problematic than was the case with the Maastricht Treaty. It was only in Denmark that there seemed any likelihood that the proposals would be rejected. In the event, they were approved by a comfortable majority in a referendum.

It might however be suggested that the proposal of any amendment proposals so soon after Maastricht damaged the EC's credibility. It becomes increasingly difficult to regard the EC treaties as containing 'constituent' principles if those principles are altered every few years. Such rapid change suggests that the treaties are more appropriately seen as part of the rather sordid world of party politics rather than as a cross-national and cross-party attempt to identify and adhere a series of fundamental political values.

That unfortunate impression was reinforced by events in 1998, when it emerged that several Commissioners had been engaging in unethical and possibly corrupt behaviour, particularly in relation to appointing unqualified friends and political supporters to lucrative jobs within the Commission's bureaucracy. The scandal was sufficiently grave to prompt the Parliament to debate a censure motion directed against the Commission as a whole. Although the motion was narrowly defeated, the Commission eventually resigned en masse. While those of its members not implicated in the scandal were re-appointed to office, the others were in effect dismissed, and early in 2000 a criminal investigation was initiated against Edith Cresson, a former Commissioner who had once served as Prime Minister of France.

Conclusion

The impression that the EU is now a political and legal order engaged in a process of constant constitutional amendment was reinforced when a further inter-governmental conference met at Nice in 2000. The proposals under consideration at Nice were in part issues left unresolved at Amsterdam. The primary questions to be addressed concerned the admission into the EU of as many as ten new Member States, many of them countries from the former eastern bloc, and the alterations that such enlargement would demand for voting systems within the Council and structure of the Commission and the Court.¹⁰² A proposal was also made that the EU should add its own Charter of Rights to the Treaty framework. The United Kingdom was opposed to giving any such Charter justiciable status, and it was eventually agreed that the Charter would have the status of a 'Solemn Proclamation' appended to the new Treaty.¹⁰³ The amendments were initially rejected by Ireland, and in a manner reminiscent of Denmark's eventual ratification of Maastricht, the proposals were eventually approved by Irish voters late in 2002.

The admission of ten new members, many of them poorly developed in economic terms and lacking any deeply-rooted democratic culture, promises to present the EU with substantial challenges in the years ahead. The difficulties of securing consensus among so many and so very different governments and peoples for any further major change to the treaties was graphically illustrated by the ignominious collapse of attempts to introduce a 'constitution' for the Community in 2004 and 2005. The proposed 'constitution' was the result of an inquiry headed by the former French President, Giscard D'Estaing. If adopted by the Community, the constitutional Treaty would have introduced substantial changes to the scope of Community competence, to its institutional structure, and to the status of Community law within the Member States. Its terms were decisively rejected in referendums in France and Denmark, and the proposals were withdrawn without being put forward for the approval of the majority of Member States.

¹⁰² A helpful guide is offered in Shaw J (2001) 'The Treaty of Nice: legal and constitutional implications' European Public Law 195.

¹⁰³ See Rogers I (2002) 'From the Human Rights Act to the Charter: not another human rights instrument to consider' European Human Rights LR 343.

The capacity of 'rejected' Treaty amendments to resurface and subsequently gain acceptance from the Member States was hardly a novel feature of the Community's development by this time. It was perhaps therefore unsurprising that proposals which in the view of many commentators¹⁰⁴ bore a very close resemblance to those of the 'constitution' re-appeared in a draft Treaty which was approved by an intergovernmental conference held at Lisbon in 2007. The Blair and Brown governments subsequently insisted that the terms of the Lisbon Treaty were so different from—and so less significant than—those of the rejected constitution that they did not regard themselves as bound (in a moral sense) by the promise made in the Labour party's 2005 election manifesto that a referendum would be held to establish if voters wished the United Kingdom to ratify the EU constitution. The government's position on this point likely owed more to an assumption that voters might not support the new Treaty than to a sincere belief that the Treaty's contents differed meaningfully from those that had been in the constitutional Treaty. The Lisbon Treaty was then rejected by Irish voters in 2008. With admirable persistence, the Irish government re-submitted the question to a further referendum in October 2009, this time securing a positive answer from voters. The Treaty came into force shortly thereafter.

For a British constitutional lawyer, however, the alterations made by the Lisbon Treaty to the powers and internal arrangements of the EU are perhaps of lesser interest than the impact that accession to the EC has had on the UK's internal constitutional dynamics. It is undeniable that a substantial and continually increasing proportion of the laws applicable in the United Kingdom are found in the Treaties and secondary legislation. It is similarly clear that the gradual extension of the Community's competence beyond the nominally 'economic' sphere into a range of 'political' issues has lent the EC a far more federal identity than it possessed thirty years ago. In that respect, the effective 'sovereignty' of the UK as a nation has been curtailed. Whether Parliament retains the capacity to reclaim that authority remains to be seen. But even if we accept that the courts do not have power to disapply a statute purportedly withdrawing the UK from the EC, the innovative stream of jurisprudence flowing from Macarthys through Garland and Pickstone and Litster to Factortame and beyond has substantially restructured the internal balance of constitutional power between the legislature, the executive and the courts.

In 2002, sitting in the High Court in Thoburn v Sunderland City Council,¹⁰⁵ Sir John Laws reaffirmed the proposition that the doctrine of implied repeal was no longer applicable in respect of EC matters. Intriguingly, the judgment also suggested that the ECA 1972 possessed what Sir John Laws called 'constitutional' status, which lent it a different legal character (ie being immune to implied repeal) to ‘ordinary’ Acts of Parliament.¹⁰⁶ More interestingly, the case appears to be the first instance of counsel arguing (in accordance with the ECJ’s jurisprudence) that EC law takes effect in the United Kingdom simply because of its autonomous status as EC law and not through the ‘incorporating’ device of the ECA 1972.¹⁰⁷ The Court rejected that submission:

¹⁰⁴ Most significantly MD'Estaing himself; see his letter to Le Monde of 26 October 2007: 'Traité européen: "les outils sont exactement les mêmes, seul l'ordre a été changé dans la boîte à outils".'

¹⁰⁵ [2003] QB 151, [2002] 1 CMLR 1461. Thoburn was one of the 'metric martyr' cases, in which shopkeepers and market traders found themselves being prosecuted for failure to comply with EC sourced rules requiring weights and measures of goods offered for sale to be exclusively in metric scales. See Boyron S (2002) 'In the name of European law: the metric martyrs case' European LR 771.

Whatever may be the position elsewhere, the law of England disallows any such assumption. Parliament cannot bind its successors by stipulating against repeal, wholly or partly, of the 1972 Act. It cannot stipulate as to the manner and form of any subsequent legislation. It cannot stipulate against implied repeal any more than it can stipulate against express repeal. Thus there is nothing in the 1972 Act which allows the Court of Justice, or any other institutions of the EU, to touch or qualify the conditions of Parliament’s legislative supremacy in the United Kingdom. Not because the legislature chose not to allow it; because by our law it could not allow it. That being so, the legislative and judicial institutions of the EU cannot intrude upon those conditions. The British Parliament has not the authority to authorise any such thing. Being sovereign, it cannot abandon its sovereignty.¹⁰⁸

The Conservative/Liberal coalition was at pains to underline this reasoning in promoting a European Union Bill in 2010, which was enacted as the European Union Act 2011. The primary political purpose of the Act (in s 2) was to require that any further extension¹⁰⁹ of the EU’s political competence could not be approved by a British government unless the proposal had been supported by a majority of voters in a referendum.¹¹⁰ The autonomous effect of EU law point was addressed in s 18:

18 Status of EU law dependent on continuing statutory basis

Directly applicable or directly effective EU law (that is, the rights, powers, liabilities, obligations, restrictions, remedies and procedures referred to in section 2(1) of the European Communities Act 1972) falls to be recognised and available in law in the United Kingdom only by virtue of that Act or where it is required to be recognised and available in law by virtue of any other Act.

Section 18 might be thought to be wholly pointless from a legal (whether domestic or EU in nature) perspective. The provision will have no effect on the ECJ’s view of the status of EC law. And in domestic terms, given that orthodox theories as to the sovereignty of Parliament rest on its status as an ‘ultimate political fact’, Parliament’s reiteration of the principle in a statutory text is meaningless. Section 18 is perhaps best seen as, in part, an attempt by the coalition government to pander to the Euro-sceptic fringe of the Conservative Party,¹¹¹ and, in part, a warning shot fired by politicians across the bows of ¹⁰⁶ Since the judgment purports to offer principles which are not confined solely to EC law matters—and thus has broad implications for the continued vitality of the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty—it is revisited at a later stage of this book.

¹⁰⁷ [2003] QB 151 at 182–184. The counsel was Eleanor Sharpstone QC, who subsequently went on to be an Advocate-General at the ECJ. ¹⁰⁸ Ibid, at 184–185.

¹⁰⁹ With some identified exceptions.

¹¹⁰ See the speech of the then Foreign Secretary, William Hague, at the Bill’s second reading; HCD 7 December 2010 at c191:

Indeed, the crowning argument for the Bill was the behaviour of the last Government, who opposed a referendum on the EU constitution, then promised one, then refused to hold one on its substantially similar reincarnation as the Lisbon Treaty. The Bill will prevent Governments from being so deceptive and double-dealing when it comes to giving voters a say.

¹¹¹ A number of whose parliamentary members promoted more radical Bills in the 2010–2011 session. Cf Philip Hollobone’s (self-explanatory) European Communities Act 1972 (Repeal) Bill and Peter Bone’s Bill to require a referendum to be held on whether the United Kingdom should remain in the EU.

judges who the politicians fear may be prone to succumb to the temptations of aligning their constitutional loyalties to the EU rather than Parliament.

From the viewpoint of the political scientist rather than the lawyer, the UK's membership of the Community has been notable for offering us a political issue which transcends the usual rigidities of ideological loyalty within the Conservative and Labour Parties. Perhaps more significantly however, the Community has lent an increasing degree of normalcy within our constitutional morality to the presumption that governmental power—be it legislative, executive or judicial in nature—can and indeed ought to be divisible on a geographical basis. While mainstream political parties may disagree as to how much governmental competence should be exercised through the mechanism of Community law, there is broad acceptance of the legitimacy of the principle that a law-maker other than Parliament should determine how some important political questions are to be resolved. In chapter thirteen, we examine the way in which our modern constitution has addressed that question of the geographical separation of governmental power in the context not of the relationship of the United Kingdom qua country with other nation states, but of the relationship within the United Kingdom of England, Scotland and Wales.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Craig P (1991) 'Sovereignty of the United Kingdom Parliament after Factortame' Yearbook of European Law 221

Wade HRW (1996) 'Sovereignty—revolution or evolution?' LQR 568

Allan TRS (1997) 'Parliamentary sovereignty: law, politics and revolution' LQR 443

Steiner J (1993) 'From direct to Francovich: shifting means of enforcement of community law' EL Rev 3

Corbett R (1985) 'The 1985 intergovernmental conference and the Single European Act', in Pryce R (ed) The dynamics of European Union

Hartley T (1993) 'Constitutional and institutional aspects of the Maastricht Agreement' 42 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 213

Craig P (1998) 'The Treaty of Amsterdam: a brief guide' Public Law 351

Case law and legislation

R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd (no. 2) [1991] 2 AC 603

Marleasing [1990] ECR I-4315

Francovich [1991] ECR I-5357

EC Commission v United Kingdom [1989] ECR 3125

Litster v Forth Dry Dock and Engineering Ltd [1990] 1 AC 546

Chapter 13

The Governance of Scotland and Wales

The *McCormick v Lord Advocate*¹ litigation in the 1950s indicated that at least some of the Scots people rejected the orthodox view of the Treaty of Union that Scots MPs were simply absorbed into the English Parliament.² Since Scotland's population was far smaller than England's, the principle of approximate parity of constituency sizes adopted in respect of parliamentary elections since 1948 necessarily meant that Scotland sent only a small minority of MPs to the Commons.³ Scotland's 'separateness' was to some extent recognised by the creation of a Secretary of State for Scotland in 1926, and by the existence of a Scots 'Grand Committee' in the Commons,⁴ yet neither initiative afforded Scotland any constituent political autonomy. Its Secretary was merely one member of the Cabinet; the Grand Committee merely a small fraction of MPs.

But Scots discontent was not limited solely to questions of parliamentary representation. Rather it expressed in an acute form a more general perception that Scotland's historical status as a 'nation', and its contemporary status as a discrete area of the United Kingdom whose people had a distinctive political and cultural identity, had been unacceptably submerged beneath a legislative and governmental structure pervasively and perpetually dominated by 'English' concerns. Such sentiments appeared to be gaining wider support from the early 1960s onwards, when Scots (and Welsh) nationalist parties began to attract substantially increased electoral support. In response to this pressure, both the Conservative and Labour Parties had indicated in the late 1960s that they would be prepared to introduce legislation creating distinctively Scots and Welsh 'national' governments. The second Wilson government established a Royal Commission (the Kilbrandon Commission) to address the question of the relationship between the various countries of the United Kingdom. Its report, published in 1973, recommended that Parliament enact potentially far-reaching schemes of 'devolution'.⁵

¹ See McCormick v Lord Advocate (1953), ch 2, pp 45–46 above.

² Dicey was perhaps the prime example of this theory. As Bogdanor notes, Dicey's analysis of Anglo-Scots relations spoke always of the Act (rather than the Acts) of Union, a linguistic sleight of hand which implicitly rejects the merger theory of union: see Bogdanor V (1979) 'The English constitution and devolution' Political Quarterly 36.

³ Some 11% of MPs represented Scots constituencies.

⁴ See Turpin (1990) op cit pp 183–188.

⁵ For a useful summary of the Commission's investigations, the varying views of its members, and its conclusions see Mackintosh J (1974) 'The report of the Royal Commission on the Constitution 1969–1973' Parliamentary Affairs 115.

Neither Conservative nor Labour governments in the 1970s ever suggested that Wales or Scotland should become independent sovereign states, nor even that the United Kingdom should become a federal country like the USA. Any such proposal would of course run into the legal difficulty of the sovereignty of Parliament. In terms of strict legal theory, any grant of 'independence' that Parliament might make to Wales or Scotland (or indeed England), or any legislation that sought to reconstruct the UK's unitary state on a federal basis, would lack constituent legal status; a subsequent Parliament could at any time restore the previous arrangements. As we saw in respect of Canada, such legal niceties may be swept aside by the brute force of new political facts. But the political realities which shaped the Kilbrandon report offered no obvious, immediate threat to the legal structure of the constitution. They did, however, point to a significant redefinition of conventional understandings.

Kilbrandon's concept of 'devolution' was an idea quite distinct from either federalism or independence in the formal, legal sense of those terms. The idea suggests that Parliament is delegating or lending legal competence in certain areas of government activity. But it is not giving its sovereignty away, for it reserves the power to revoke or redefine the nature of the delegation at any future date. Scotland was to have an elected Assembly (often colloquially referred to as the Scottish Parliament), whose members were to be chosen through a process analogous to that used for the Commons. In technical terms, however, it would be quite inaccurate to describe a body implementing devolved powers as a legislature, or to label its 'laws' as legislation. The Scots Assembly would be an executive body, just like a local council, empowered to produce bye-laws in certain specified fields. It might indeed prove, as a matter of practical politics, to be a tier of local government unlike any other the British constitution had ever contained; but it would nevertheless depend (at least until political realities dictated otherwise) for its continued legal existence on the whim of Parliament.

The Scotland Act 1978 and the Wales Act 1978

The schemes of devolution ultimately enacted⁶ in the Scotland Act 1978 and Wales Act 1978 were presented to the Commons by the then Prime Minister James Callaghan as:

... a great constitutional change... There will be a new settlement among the nations that constitute the United Kingdom. We shall be moving away from the highly centralised State that has characterised our system for over two and a half centuries.⁷

Whether the Acts would mark a first step in a longer march towards significant constitutional change is an open question. No answer was ever given to that question however, since the provisions of the Act never came into force. The Labour government had broken to some extent with the tradition of 'parliamentary government' by including in both the Scotland and Wales Act a provision that required the proposed changes to be approved by a referendum conducted among the Scots and Welsh electorates respectively before they could be implemented.⁸ The Acts required not simply that a majority of those voting supported devolution, but also that any such majority comprised at least 40% of the eligible electorate. The government was empowered to repeal the Act if its terms were not approved by the electorates. In Wales, on a mere 59% turn-out, 80% of voters rejected the devolution proposals. In Scotland, 55% of voters approved the change. However, since the turnout was only 64%, the 40% threshold was not reached.⁹

⁶ The Bill was resolutely opposed by the Conservative Party. Its Commons passage was secured because the Labour government, by then in a Commons minority, had the support of the Liberals and the Scots and Welsh nationalist parties. ⁷ HCD 13 December 1976 c 993.

⁸ This being perhaps another example of the 'ripple effect' of EC membership on the domestic constitution. The Wilson government had deployed a referendum on the question of EEC membership in 1975; see 'The 1975 referendum', ch 11, pp 371–372 above.

The outcome of the referendums suggests that there was no great enthusiasm among the Scots or Welsh for the Labour government's proposals. Scots Nationalist MPs nevertheless saw the election result as sufficient reason to vote against the Labour government in a subsequent vote of confidence, with the result that the government resigned, Parliament was dissolved, and the first Thatcher administration was returned at the ensuing general election. The Thatcher and Major governments deployed their majorities in the Commons and Lords to repeal the Scotland and Wales Acts, and saw no need to introduce devolution Bills of any sort, notwithstanding the fact that their share of the Scots vote in successive general elections was so small that barely a dozen of Scotland's seventy-two MPs were Conservatives. Throughout the 1980s, therefore, Scotland was governed by a party pursuing policies that enjoyed the support of only a small minority of the Scots people. In the 1995 local government elections, the Conservatives were unable to win a majority of seats on any Scots local authority. By this time, the Scots Nationalists were stridently committed to the creation of an independent Scots state, while the Labour and Liberal Parties advocated a more extensive form of devolution (including the crucial power to levy taxation) than that proposed in the Scotland Act. The status quo was preferred only by a party which had attracted little more than 40% of the popular vote in general elections since 1979; but as we have already seen on many occasions, such minoritarian support is quite sufficient to control every level of the law-making process under the British constitution's particular form of democratic government.

I. The Scotland Act 1998

At the 1987 general election, the Conservatives won only ten of Scotland's seventy Commons seats. They nevertheless had a large majority in the Commons overall. The evident unpopularity of the Conservatives in Scotland—and a growing sense of injustice that the country should be governed by an 'English' Conservative administration—led the Labour and Liberal parties in Scotland, along with various other small parties and some trade union and church groups, to convene a 'Scottish Constitutional Convention' to debate the case for radical reform to Scotland's governmental system.¹⁰

The Convention's discussions continued throughout the 1990s,¹¹ and culminated in 1995 in the publication of a policy document entitled 'Scotland's Parliament, Scotland's Right', which urged the creation of a Scots legislature and executive which would exercise substantial political powers and enjoy a large degree of autonomy from the Westminster Parliament. Much of the letter and some of the spirit (albeit in diluted form) of the Convention's proposals found their way into the Labour Party's manifesto proposals for the 1997 general election. The manifesto highlighted Scots devolution as one of the most urgent priorities for a Labour government. The extent to which the Conservative government had lost any plausible claim to legitimacy within Scotland was forcefully underlined by the result of the 1997 general election. The Conservatives did not win a single seat in Scotland in 1997. This dire performance was in part the result of the first past the post system; in all the Conservatives attracted some 17.5% of the Scots popular vote.

⁹ See Balsom D and McAllister I (1979) 'The Scottish and Welsh devolution referenda of 1979: constitutional change and popular choice' Parliamentary Affairs 394.

¹⁰ The Scottish Nationalist Party boycotted the Convention, on the basis that it regarded complete independence for Scotland as the only acceptable reform. See McClean R (1999) 'A brief history of Scottish home rule', in Hassan G (ed) A guide to the Scottish Parliament.

¹¹ The Conservatives had won twelve Scots seats at the 1992 general election. The Major government remained implacably opposed to any reform of Scotland's governmental system.

The new government lost little time in acting on its manifesto commitment. A white paper, Scotland's Parliament,¹² was published in July 1997. In a preface to the white paper, the Prime Minister characterised Scotland as 'a proud historic nation' and stated that his government's reform programme was designed to enhance the Scots people's control over domestic Scottish politics. The government's plans did not extend as far as the Constitutional Convention had urged, but nevertheless outlined a reform programme which appeared to offer the Scots electorate a substantial measure of political autonomy.

The white paper proposed that the new structure of government within Scotland would be modelled on the existing United Kingdom system. There would be a fusion rather than separation of powers between the 'legislature' and the 'executive'. The Scots government would be headed by a First Minister, whose administration would be drawn from, and hence have to command the support of, a majority of members of the Parliament.¹³

It was proposed that the Parliament would contain 129 members. Its electoral system would be markedly different from the straightforward first past the post method used for the House of Commons, and would be loosely based on the process used to elect members of the German Bundestag.¹⁴ Each elector would have two votes. Some seventy-three MSPs¹⁵ would represent the same constituencies as the Scots members of the UK Parliament, and would be chosen by the orthodox 'first past the post' system. The electors' second vote would be for a party rather than an individual candidate. The other fifty-six MSPs would be selected from eight regional party lists, with allocation of additional members being designed to ameliorate—if not eliminate—any seats won/votes cast discrepancies arising in the constituency seat section. This system makes it very likely that, unless one party managed to gain an extremely high percentage of the popular vote,¹⁶ the Scots Parliament will always be hung. This in turn would suggest that the Scots government would be either a minority or coalition administration.

The Constitutional Convention had begun its activities with the announcement that:

We, gathered as the Scottish Constitutional Convention, do hereby acknowledge the sovereign right of the Scottish people to determine the form of government suited to their needs.

The echoes that this statement had of the US Declaration of Independence were studiously ignored in the white paper. Its text laid repeated emphasis on the legal fact that the creation of a Scots Parliament did not and could not in any way detract from the continuing sovereignty of the Westminster legislature.¹⁷ This position implicitly repudiates any notion that the Scots people possess in the legal sense 'sovereign rights', whether over their form of government or any other matter. The government also stressed, in a less legalistic fashion, that the United Kingdom would remain as a unitary state. There was ¹² Cm 3658.

¹³ The white paper did not use the formal label of 'the Cabinet' to describe the senior members of the Scots government, but it seems likely that this will be the commonplace terminology.

¹⁴ See 'The German system', ch 7, p 218 above.

¹⁵ MSP being the accepted abbreviation for 'Member of the Scottish Parliament'.

¹⁶ Although, given that Scotland has four major political parties, it would be technically possible for a single party to win all seventy-three constituency seats with less than 30% of the constituency vote and without receiving any party list votes at all.

¹⁷ One might note that the white paper maintained a diplomatic silence on the issue raised in McCormick v Lord Advocate to the effect that that the Treaties of Union may impose some limits on the Westminster Parliament's powers; see 'McCormick v Lord Advocate (1953)', ch 2, pp 45–46 above.

no suggestion that the reform would in legal terms attempt to restructure the constitution on a federal basis, still less that Scotland would become an independent, sovereign nation. The envisaged legislation was not to be a latter-day equivalent of the 1931 Statute of Westminster.¹⁸

In addition to believing that substantial devolution was an intrinsically correct policy to pursue, the Labour government appeared to have concluded that granting Scotland a substantial degree of self-governance would reduce rather than intensify growing pressure among some sections of the Scots electorate—particularly the Scottish Nationalist Party—for full independence. The notion that Scotland might survive and flourish as an independent nation was much less outlandish in 1997 than it would have been twenty years earlier. The substantial expansion of the EC's competence since 1980 made the Westminster Parliament less significant in economic terms to Scotland than it had hitherto been, and advocates of independence could also point to the rapid emergence of small sovereign states in eastern Europe following the collapse of the Soviet Union to buttress the feasibility of their position. Whether the Blair government judged this issue correctly remained to be seen.¹⁹

The white paper advocated that the division of political power between the UK and Scottish Parliaments would entail certain matters being 'reserved' to the UK Parliament. But any matter not so reserved would be presumed to have been devolved to the Scottish legislature. By a process of deduction (ie by seeing which powers were to be reserved), one could see that the Scots Parliament would enjoy substantial control over inter alia; all levels of education, local government, land development and environmental regulation, many aspects of transport policy, the national health service, the legal system (both civil and criminal law), agriculture and fisheries, and over sports, arts and cultural heritage policy. Those matters to be reserved to the UK Parliament and government included constitutional reform, foreign policy, defence, macro-economic policy and social security law.

As was suggested in the previous discussion of local authorities, granting a government body a nominally long list of political powers has only limited meaning if the body concerned does not have the fiscal competence to exercise those powers in the way that its voters consider appropriate. The raising and spending of revenue would be of crucial significance to the degree of autonomy that the Scots Parliament would enjoy.

The white paper envisaged some substantial and some rather modest changes to the previous financial system. From the late 1970s onwards, under what was known as the 'Barnett formula', Scotland's share of the public revenues has been based increasingly on its pro rata share of the UK's overall population.²⁰ A 'block grant' has been allocated to Scotland, which the Secretary of State was at liberty to allocate to different services as he/she thought appropriate. Under the devolved system of government, the block grant system remains unchanged, save for the fact that it will be for the Scots government and executive to determine just how that revenue should be spent. This would of course enable the Scots government substantially to increase expenditure on a given service, for example schooling, but only if it reduced expenditure by the same amount in other areas.

¹⁸ See however Bogdanor's suggestion that the relationship between the Scots and UK legislatures will in effect be quasi-federal: (1999a) 'Devolution: decentralisation or disintegration' Political Quarterly 185.

¹⁹ See Bogdanor (1999a) op cit: and Brazier R (1999) 'The Constitution of the United Kingdom' Cambridge LJ 96.

²⁰ Scotland has historically enjoyed a higher per capita share of public expenditure than England. That advantage was reduced, but not eliminated by the Barnett formula; see Mait C and McCloud B (1999) 'Financial arrangements', in Hassan op cit.

The devolution proposals also envisaged that the Scots Parliament should enjoy what was described as a 'limited' tax-raising/reducing capacity of its own. This would comprise a power to increase or cut the rate of income tax by up to three pence in the pound. The Blair government's insistence that macro-economic policy be a 'reserved' matter precluded the grant of any substantial fiscal autonomy to the Scots Parliament. The 'three pence in the pound formula' is however little more than tokenism, and makes something of a mockery of the notion that a government must possess significant tax raising powers if it is to govern in accordance with the wishes of its own electors rather than simply administer in conformity with the preferences of a hierarchically superior authority.

That the devolution proposals have as much a symbolic as a practical dimension was indicated by the white paper's insistence that a devolution Bill would only be tabled if Scots voters approved the principle of devolution in a referendum. Legislation providing for a referendum was rapidly enacted, and the vote was scheduled for 11 September 1997. The referendum posed two questions. The first was whether voters approved in principle the creation of a Scots Parliament with a substantial array of devolved, 'legislative' powers. The second was whether those powers should include a capacity to vary the rate of income tax levied by the UK Parliament by up to three pence in the pound.

The Scottish Nationalist Party—having boycotted the Constitutional Convention whose deliberations underpinned the white paper—decided to support the proposals in the referendum, albeit with the evident intention of wishing to seek full independence for Scotland at a later date. The Conservative Party maintained the stance it had adopted at the general election; that devolution was an irreversible step towards independence, and that to support it would signal the disintegration of the United Kingdom as a single country.²¹ Such sentiments evidently did not deter Scots voters. In marked contrast to the result of the 1979 referendum, the 1998 poll produced large majorities for a 'Yes' answer (on a high turnout) for both questions. The Blair government subsequently proceeded to lay a devolution Bill before the Commons and Lords.

The terms of the Act

It was a sign of the strength of the first Blair government's Commons majority that the terms of the white paper were approved without serious quibble in the House of Commons. (The House of Lords, mindful no doubt of the fact that any obstruction of the Bill would be both a breach of the Salisbury Convention and a clear defiance of the referendum result, offered no resistance to the Bill.) It would nonetheless be rash to laud the promptness of the Bill's passage as a tribute to representative democracy. Given the substantial complexities of the Act's eventual provisions,²² one cannot help but be left with the feeling that rather few Labour and Liberal Democrat backbenchers had any detailed understanding of just exactly what they were voting for.²³ It is perhaps unrealistic to expect backbenchers to have a lawyerly grasp of all the subtleties and complications of the Bill, but its rapid enactment can be seen as a further illustration of the Commons' persistent failure to act as an effective evaluator of the government's policy proposals.

The government's drafting of the Bill was evidently not designed to facilitate backbench scrutiny. As Brazier notes: 'Even passages of fundamental constitutional importance are not given the prominence which it may be said that they deserve, but are tucked away in ²¹ See for example 'MP with no enemies goes into battle to preserve the UK' The Guardian 9 March 1998.

²² The Act has over 130 sections, as well as 9 schedules.

²³ See Craig P and Walters M (1999) 'The courts, devolution and judicial review' Public Law 274 for a helpful outline of the intricacies of the Act.

the 132-section statute, leaving it to the assiduous reader to find them'.²⁴ That assiduity is a trait in which the Commons en bloc has been singularly lacking in recent years perhaps need not be further remarked upon.

The Act is too lengthy a document to be examined in detail here, but some of its key sections might be noted. Section 1 begins with the bald announcement that; 'There shall be a Scottish Parliament'. Sections 1–10 then sketch out the electoral system through which MSPs are to be chosen, in terms which followed the proposals made in the white paper. Per the terms of ss 2–3, the Scots Parliament may sit for a maximum of four years between elections, although provision is made for more frequent elections in exceptional circumstances. Sections 22–27 and s 36 delineate the rules surrounding the legislature's internal proceedings. Section 19 creates the position of Presiding Officer (the Scots Parliament's equivalent of the Speaker of the Commons), and provides for her/his election by a majority of MSPs. The structure and powers of the Scots government are laid out in ss 44–58. Rules relating to the allocation of the block grant and the Parliament's tax raising powers are contained in ss 64–80.

In respect of the relationship between the Parliament and the Scots government, the Act gave a legal basis to values which in the context of the United Kingdom Parliament enjoy only conventional status. Section 45 provides, for example, that the First Minister is to be appointed by the Monarch.²⁵ However, that power of appointment can—per s 46—be exercised only in response to a 'nomination' by the Parliament. A similar 'legalisation' of conventional principles is imposed by s 47, which inter alia requires that Ministers of the Scots executive must resign from office if the government has lost the confidence of the Assembly.

The Act nonetheless leaves a good many important political questions unanswered by legal rules. For example, what is meant by 'nomination' per s 46 is not legally defined. We might safely assume that a potential candidate to be First Minister has been 'nominated' per s 46 if she secures the support of a majority of MSPs in a parliamentary vote.²⁶ But, as noted above, the electoral system used to choose MSPs is likely to produce a Parliament in which no single party has an overall majority. If there are several candidates for the post of First Minister, is the person who enjoys the highest level of support within the Parliament to be considered as 'nominated', even if she does not command majority support? Questions of this sort, it seemed, were to be left to be resolved by the practicalities of political manoeuvring rather than legal argument.

The autonomy of the Scots Parliament

Sections 28 and 29 are among the most significant of the Act's provisions. Section 28 confirms that the Parliament will have the power to pass legislation on Scots matters. Section 29 then places various substantive limits on the Parliament's legislative competence.²⁷ Section 33 introduces a form of pre-enactment judicial scrutiny of Bills at the ²⁴ (1999) op cit p 103.

²⁵ The appointment of a First Minister is thus an exercise of a statutory power by the Monarch, and not, as is the appointment of the Prime Minister, an exercise of the prerogative.

²⁶ Cf para 9.6 of the white paper: 'The First Minister... will normally be the leader of the party able to command majority support of the Scottish Parliament'.

²⁷ The Parliament may not legislate on any reserved matter. These are laid out in great detail in Schedule 5 to the Act. In addition, it may not legislate with extra-territorial effect, nor in breach of any provision of European Community law. The impact of the Human Rights Act 1998 in Scotland and Wales will also be rather more dramatic than in the UK as a whole. The Scots Parliament and the Welsh Assembly (discussed below) are both subjected to the provisions of the Human Rights Act 1998 in a way that the UK Parliament is not. All of the 'laws' that they produce, irrespective of the form that the laws take, will be liable to invalidation request of the UK or Scots government's law officers. Should a Bill be thought to exceed the Parliament's powers—in the Act's parlance 'to raise a devolution issue'—it may be referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (ie to the law lords) for consideration. A Bill may not be enacted unamended if the law lords conclude it would breach s 29. The UK government is also empowered under s 35 to block enactment of any Scots Bill which it has reasonable grounds to believe to affect national security, international relations, or any reserved matter.²⁸

The Act envisages that the Parliament may enact Bills which are not understood at the time to contravene s 29. Provision is therefore made for so-called 'devolution issues' to be raised by litigants in subsequent court proceedings. Schedule 6 of the Act sets out a referral procedure, (loosely modelled on the EC's Art [177] 234 device), through which lower courts may interrupt the proceedings before them to seek the opinion of the High Court or Court of Appeal (the Inner Court of Session if the proceedings are taking place in Scotland) on whether a particular legislative provision breaches s 29. A further appeal lay initially to the Privy Council (and now the Supreme Court).

The legislation itself contains a rather unusual provision in s 101. This is essentially an instruction to the courts to interpret ambiguous Scots legislation as being within, rather than beyond, the Parliament's competence if either meaning is possible. Section 101 offers a statutory echo of a much broader common law principle that has been largely obsolete in United Kingdom law for some years. Like the Scots executive, the Scots Parliament is technically a statutory executive body. When exercising justiciable powers, most statutory bodies are presumptively²⁹ subject to judicial review on the grounds of illegality, irrationality, and procedural impropriety. That presumption will undoubtedly apply to actions taken by the Scots government. There is however an historical exception to this general rule, rooted in Britain's former status as a colonial power,³⁰ which supports the argument that Scots 'legislation' could only be subject to review on the grounds of illegality.

That the Scots Parliament may not legislate incompatibly with the provisions of European Community law nor (to the extent that they are 'incorporated' by the Human Rights Act 1998 into domestic law) to the provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights makes this less of a legal lacuna than would previously have been the case. Many governmental decisions previously quashed on the basis of irrationality or procedural unfairness would also fall foul of one or other provision of the 1998 Act or of EC law, to which s 29 of the Act requires the Parliament to conform.³¹ (As we shall see in chapters nineteen to twenty-one, the Scots Parliament's subjection to the Human Rights Act stands in marked contrast to the position which the Act has in respect of the United Kingdom Parliament, and serves as a reminder of the non-sovereign status of the Scots legislature). The lacuna would however be significant in respect of Scots legislation by the courts on the grounds of their incompatibility with the 1998 Act. See Lord Hope (1998) 'Devolution and Human Rights' European Human Rights LR 367. The terms and schemata of the European Convention on Human Rights and the Human Rights Act 1998 are discussed in some detail in chs 19–21 below.

²⁸ There is no ouster clause explicitly precluding judicial review of the exercise of this power, but it seems likely that its use would be regarded as non-justiciable. Conversely, the Act also contains what amounts to a Henry VIII clause in respect of s 29 in s 63. This enables the UK government to transfer additional powers on matters relating to Scotland to the Scots government by Order in Council.

²⁹ Ie in the absence of an ouster or limitation clause in the relevant statute.

³⁰ See in particular the analysis offered by Craig and Walters op cit at pp 288–293.

³¹ One might suggest that s 29 renders the common law ground of illegality redundant. Section 29 of the Scotland Act is in essence a statutory restatement (and expansion) of the illegality principle in administrative law.

which impinged neither on requirements of the Human Rights Act nor provisions of EC law.³² It is in respect to these powers that some rather aged case law may acquire a new significance.

Colonial case law on legislative autonomy

The issue before the Privy Council in *R v Burah*³³ concerned the validity of a statute passed by the Indian legislature which sought to alter the jurisdiction of the court system established by the British statute which created the Indian constitution. In the course of its judgment, the Privy Council made it quite clear that Indian legislation could be overturned on the basis of illegality; ie that the Parliament was interfering with issues that the British legislature had not granted it authority to address. However the courts would not entertain challenges based on irrationality or procedural impropriety:

If what has been done is legislation, within the general scope of the affirmative words which give the power, and if it violates no express condition or restriction by which that power is limited... it is not for any Court of Justice to inquire further, or to enlarge constructively those conditions and restrictions.³⁴

The essentially non-democratic nature of the Indian legislature at that time (1878) perhaps makes Burah a precedent of limited utility in respect of the Scots Parliament. More assistance might be derived from Privy Council decisions on Canadian constitutional law. *Riel v R*³⁵ turned on the meaning to be attributed to the proviso in the British North America Act 1867 to the effect that the Canadian Parliament could pass legislation; ‘for the administration, peace, order and good government’ of the country. Riel contended that this provision required the courts to consider whether the policy enacted in legislation did indeed amount to ‘good government’. The Privy Council saw no merit in this argument: ‘[T]here is not the least colour for such a contention. The words of the statute are apt to authorise the utmost discretion of enactment’.³⁶

The decision in *Edwards v A-G for Canada*³⁷ is perhaps the most interesting judgment however; in part because of its relative historical proximity to the present day, and in part because of its subject matter, which spoke very clearly to matters of both individual human rights and the representativeness of the governmental system. As noted in chapter two, British courts had held in the nineteenth and early-twentieth century that women were incapable at common law of being regarded as ‘men’ or male ‘persons’ for the purposes of voting in elections to the Commons.³⁸ By the late 1920s, the UK Parliament had reversed that assumption through legislation, as had most of the provincial legislatures in Canada. Women were also by then eligible under statute to sit in the British and Canadian Houses of Commons. The question which arose in Edwards was whether women could sit in the Canadian Senate. Section 24 of the British North America Act 1867 provided that ‘per-

³² The extent to which the courts will be prepared to regulate the Parliament’s non-legislative activities remains unclear. The Act affords the Parliament substantial discretion in respect of many facets of its internal proceedings. Section 29 obviously requires that those proceedings—unlike those of the Westminster legislature—respect the requirements of the European Convention; (as noted in ch 20, the Human Rights Act 1998 expressly exempts ‘proceedings in Parliament’ from the need to conform to the Convention). Whether the courts will also impose administrative law standards of rationality and procedural fairness on Scots parliamentary proceedings is an intriguing and thus far rather neglected question.

³³ (1878) 3 App Cas 889.

³⁴ Ibid, at 905; per Lord Selborne.

³⁵ (1885) 10 App Cas 675.

³⁶ Ibid, at 678; per Lord Halsbury. A similar rationale had been applied two years earlier to the activities of Canada’s various provincial legislatures vis-à-vis the national Parliament in Hodge v R (1883) 9 App Cas 117, PC.

³⁷ [1930] AC 124.

³⁸ See the discussion of Chorlton v Lings and Nairn v University of St Andrews at ‘Chorlton v Lings (1868)’ ff, ch 2, pp 46–48 above.

sons' could sit in the Senate. In the late 1920s, several Canadian women sought a declaration from the Canadian courts that s 24 included women. The Canadian Supreme Court held, placing much reliance on Chorlton v Lings and Nairn v University of St Andrews, that women were not 'persons' within s 24.³⁹

The Privy Council reversed this judgment. At the core of its decision lay the proposition that the British North America Act 1867 was a 'constitution' rather than an ordinary statute, and so should not be subjected to orthodox techniques of statutory interpretation. As Lord Sankey put it, in a passage replete with splendidly mixed metaphors:

The British North America Act planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits. Their Lordships do not conceive it to be [their] duty... to cut down the provisions of the Act by a narrow and technical construction, but rather to give it a large and liberal interpretation so that [Canada] to great extent... may be mistress in her own house.⁴⁰

In essence, the Privy Council appeared to be holding that the intention of the British Parliament in enacting the British North America Act in 1867 was to permit the courts in future years to attach new meanings to the Act's text in response to changing political, economic and social circumstances within Canadian society. That the Act itself made no explicit textual allusion to this principle was irrelevant; the principle was evidently to be regarded as inherent in any Westminster statute which creates a 'constitution'. On the particular facts of the case, the Privy Council concluded that gratuitous gender discrimination in relation to occupancy of legislative office had become an obsolete moral principle in Canada by 1930, an (ultimate?) political fact that was firmly evidenced by national and provincial statutes entitling women to vote in legislative elections and to occupy elected political office.

It would require something of a leap of the imagination to accept that the Scotland Act has fashioned a 'constitution' in this sense. Nonetheless, Edwards and the other cases mentioned above have led Craig and Walters to suggest that 'there is considerable scope for an interpretative approach [to the Scotland Act] that is sensitive to the fact that the courts will be reviewing the actions of democratically elected bodies'.⁴¹ This could be considered a rather limited objective for the common law to pursue—and rather underplays the significance of the colonial case law—since just the same observation might be made in respect of the actions of local authorities.⁴² Indeed, Craig and Walters' suggestion is strongly reminiscent of Lord Russell's judgment in *Kruse v Johnson*⁴³ that a council's power to make bye-laws be construed 'benevolently'. Adequate judicial recognition of the very different political (and thence constitutional) status of the Scots Parliament and local authorities would suggest that the courts should go considerably further than simply being 'benevolent' when assessing if the Parliament has exceeded its powers.

There is an obvious temptation to assume that the courts' approach to matters concerning the Scots Parliament will be driven by the purposive jurisprudence which is now so firmly established as a tenet of EC law. That the Scotland Act does not instruct the courts to adopt this interpretative technique is no bar to them doing so: with the exception of the provision contained in s 101,⁴⁴ the choice of interpretative principles remains a matter of common law. Any allusion to purposive interpretation obviously begs the question of just

³⁹ [1928] SCR 276.

⁴⁰ [1930] AC 124 at 136. ⁴¹ Op cit, at p 292.

⁴² The vast difference between the court's perception of the vires of a colonial parliament and a domestic local authority is forcefully conveyed if one recalls that Edwards was decided at much the same time as Roberts v Hopwood.

⁴³ See 'IV. The role of the judiciary', ch 10, pp 311–313 above.

⁴⁴ Which could perhaps be seen as a (very) mild endorsement of teleological jurisprudence.

what ‘purpose’ the Scotland Act is intended to serve. The Act itself does not contain any preamble answering this question. A plausible line of speculation would be to suggest that the judiciary will allow its task of interpreting the Scotland Act (and subsequent related legislation, whether Scots or United Kingdom in origin) to be influenced (but obviously not determined) by the ‘sovereign right of the Scots people’ thesis which underpinned the final recommendations of the Scottish Constitutional Convention.⁴⁵ Re-casting this sentiment in more constitutionally orthodox terms, the courts might readily be expected to assume that the purpose underpinning the Scotland Act is to maximise the extent to which the Scots electorate, acting through its representatives in the Scots Parliament, determines the outcome of Scots political questions. To address this point, we need also to consider what impact—if any—the Act will have on the sovereignty of the UK Parliament.

The continuing sovereignty of the UK Parliament?

The question of how much autonomy the courts afford to the Scots Parliament will also be affected by the meaning that the courts attach to s 28(7) of the Scotland Act. Section 28(7) seems, from a traditionalist constitutional standpoint, to be a wholly unnecessary provision. It states simply that the power given to the Scots Parliament to enact legislation for Scotland; ‘does not affect the power of the United Kingdom Parliament to make law for Scotland’. In essence, the clause is saying that Parliament cannot entrench the initial autonomy it grants to the Scots legislature. This statutory restatement of orthodox Diceyan principle has perhaps been included in the Act in response to the new constitutional climate engendered by Factortame (No 2), which does indicate that Parliament can now (in a limited sense) safeguard some political values against future repeal. Section 28(7) is perhaps intended to deter the courts from allowing the Factortame principle to seep into non-EC related constitutional contexts. It is also likely to be invoked by the UK government to rebut Scots accusations of undemocratic behaviour should the Westminster Parliament choose to pass legislation on a devolved matter. But its inclusion in the Act may have unexpected legal consequences.⁴⁶

The Labour government’s evident unwillingness deliberately even to attempt to entrench any part of the Scotland Act stands in marked contrast to the recommendations of the Constitutional Convention. The Convention had advocated that any devolution legislation should include an entrenching device—(reminiscent of s 4 of the Statute of Westminster)⁴⁷—namely that the Westminster Parliament should not be able to enact future legislation reducing the powers of the Scots legislature unless the Scots legislature consented to the Act in question. The white paper made no reference to this proposal, nor to the issue of entrenchment generally.⁴⁸ The presence of s 28(7) in the Act would suggest that this omission arose because the Blair government regarded entrenchment as politically undesirable, rather than legally unachievable.

Notwithstanding Pepper v Hart, a government’s wishes cannot determine a court’s interpretation of a statutory provision. A court which accepted the presumption that ⁴⁵ Craig and Walters op cit note that an analogous principle has been adopted by the Canadian Supreme Court in interpreting the Canadian constitution, even though that constitution initially derives from an Act of the Westminster Parliament; see Reference Re Secession of Quebec [1998] 2 SCR 217. Canada is of course a sovereign state, which Scotland manifestly is not.

⁴⁶ It is also very difficult to reconcile with the Blair government’s forceful statement vis-à-vis the ECHR in Rights brought home to the effect that it is not possible to entrench legislation in the United Kingdom; see ‘Rejecting entrenchment’, ch 21, p 637 below.

⁴⁷ See ‘Harris v Dönges (Minister of the Interior) (1952)’, ch 2, p 38 above.

⁴⁸ See Myles A (1999) ‘Scotland’s Parliament White Paper’, in Hassan op cit.

the Scotland Act was indeed intended to maximise the autonomy of the Scots electorate would not be sailing (and here the potential influence of the EC becomes apparent) into wholly uncharted constitutional waters if it held that s 28(7) requires the courts to apply UK legislation affecting matters devolved to the Scots Parliament by the 1998 Act only if the subsequent UK statute expressly states that the Scotland Act is being amended. To take the argument further, it might be suggested that s 28(7) could even be construed as confirming only that the Westminster Parliament can repeal the Scotland Act in its entirety. And unless and until it does so, any UK Act purportedly interfering with a devolved power will have no legal effect.

Professor Brazier has offered a hypothetical but quite plausible scenario that would put a thesis of this sort to an exacting test. The Scots Nationalist Party has committed itself, should it ever form a government in Scotland, to conduct a referendum to ascertain if the Scots people wish Scotland to become an independent nation. In Professor Brazier's view, an attempt by the Scots Parliament even to hold a referendum on this issue would be ultra vires s 29, as it is a 'constitutional' matter and so reserved to the UK Parliament.⁴⁹ This is a debatable point. For the Scots Parliament to seek to discover if the electorate would welcome further constitutional reform does not necessarily amount to constitutional reform per se. Whether it does or does not do so will be dependent on the background principles that the courts invoke when interpreting ss 28–29. A court which adopted a variant of the Edwards rationale in determining the legal consequences of the Scotland Act would presumably conclude that it does not.

These are presently fanciful conjectures. They will become less so if the UK Parliament makes no early attempt to reduce the powers of the Scots legislature, and markedly less so if those powers are actually increased by subsequent Westminster legislation. In either event, the conventional status of the Scots Parliament's legislative autonomy will be strengthened by the mere passage of time, by the observance of the principle by Westminster legislators, and by the continued vitality of the reason for its existence—namely the Scots people's legitimate democratic desire to exercise control over matters of Scottish domestic politics.

The first Scottish parliament and government

The results of the first Scottish general election, held in May 1999, were perhaps not altogether what the Labour government had hoped for. The Labour Party failed to win an overall majority of seats in the new legislature, and also fell substantially short of gathering a clear majority of votes cast. As had been widely predicted, the election produced a hung Parliament. One cannot be sure that electors would have voted in the same way if the Parliament was to be chosen solely on the basis of the 'first past the post' system. But if one assumes they would have done so, it is evident that the opposition parties (the SNP and the Conservatives) have benefited hugely from the Blair government's readiness to promote legislation which provided for a proportional system.

A coalition administration was eventually formed between the Labour and Liberal Democrat parties, within which Liberal MSPs would occupy several positions of appreciable political significance. Donald Dewar, the then Secretary of State for Scotland, became First Minister. Dewar had already indicated that he saw his political future as lying in Scotland rather than Westminster, and that he would not seek re-election to the House of Commons. The Act itself is somewhat ambiguous on the issue of individuals fulfilling a dual political role in Scotland and at Westminster. A Minister in the Scots Executive ⁴⁹ (1999) op cit.

Table 13.1 Scottish Parliament election May 1999

| Party | Constituency vote | | Party list vote | | Total seats |
|--------------|-------------------|-------|-----------------|-------|-------------|
| | % | seats | % | seats | |
| Labour | 38.8 | 53 | 33.8 | 3 | 56 |
| Liberal | 14.2 | 12 | 12.5 | 5 | 17 |
| Conservative | 15.6 | 0 | 15.4 | 18 | 18 |
| SNP | 28.7 | 7 | 22.0 | 28 | 35 |
| Others | 2.7 | 1 | 11.4 | 2 | 3 |

is not permitted to serve as a Minister in the UK government, although Scots Ministers and MSPs are not required to resign from the House of Commons. After the 1999 election, some MSPs also had seats at Westminster. It is difficult to believe that they could adequately perform both roles, and many of the members with seats in both legislatures indicated that they would not contest seats in the Commons at the next general election.

Given that Donald Dewar was a senior member of the Blair cabinet, it was unlikely that his administration would take any policy initiatives which were incompatible with the Blair government's preferences. This point had indeed been made prior to the Scottish election: the Labour Party had announced in its Scots election manifesto that a Scots Labour government would not ask the Parliament to exercise its tax-raising powers in the foreseeable future. In the run-up to the 1999 election, the Liberal Democrats had stressed that the abolition of university tuition fees would be an essential component of their governmental programme. That commitment was quietly diluted in the subsequent coalition negotiations. There thus seemed no likelihood of any significant ideological friction between the Blair and Dewar governments in the first few years of the Scots Parliament's existence.

That the Scots Parliament had succeeded rapidly in establishing its political autonomy within the United Kingdom is evidenced by the successions to the office of First Minister which followed the untimely death of Donald Dewar. The second incumbent as First Secretary was a man named Henry MacLeish, who was little known in Westminster circles. His tenure of office proved brief, as he was forced to resign in 2001 following a scandal over his apparent misuse of the office expenses previously paid to him while he was an MP at Westminster. His successor as leader of the Labour Party in Scotland and First Minister, Jack McConnell, had no political reputation to speak of in United Kingdom circles. The choice of Scotland's First Minister, it seems, has become a matter wholly of Scots domestic politics. Such 'domestication' of the process through which major political figures emerge in Scotland is perhaps to be welcomed in one sense. It seems most unlikely that any of the major political parties could foist a leader with no substantial and popular profile in Scotland on its Scottish members. However the corollary of this is a marginalisation of Scots politics with the United Kingdom. There is as yet no indication—nor even much discussion of the point—that occupying senior political office in Scotland might be a stepping stone to becoming leader of a political party at a national (ie United Kingdom) level. The impracticality of such inter-parliamentary mobility will be reinforced if the evidently emergent convention that individuals should not sit in both the Scots and United Kingdom Parliaments becomes firmly established.

The 2003 and 2007 elections

Mr McConnell led the Labour party to a victory of sorts in the 2003 parliamentary election. Labour was returned as the largest party, albeit with only a minority (fifty) of the Parliament's 129 seats. Negotiations between the Liberal and Labour Parties led to the formation of another coalition administration, with Mr McConnell nominated again as First Minister.

The process of governance within Scotland continued without generating any significant constitutional controversy under the McConnell government. The Labour/Liberal administration continued to chart a political course that was mildly distinct from that pursued by the Blair government in a several areas of social policy. By the time the third set of parliamentary elections were held in 2007, the notion that Scotland should have its own Parliament and government appeared to have become a wholly normalised presumption within contemporary constitutional morality.

The 2007 election results further indicate that the two-part electoral system manages to produce a Parliament in which party representation very closely follows the respective party's overall share of the vote. But perhaps of more significance was the fact that the 2007 election left the Scottish National Party as the largest party within the Parliament. The Labour party was unable to persuade the Liberal democrats to join it in another coalition administration, with the result that Alex Salmond, the leader of the Scottish Nationalist party, was the Parliament's eventual nominee as First Minister.

Mr Salmond took office as the leader of a minority government. The United Kingdom was therefore faced for the first time with a United Kingdom government and a devolved government controlled by different political parties. The new government's capacity to

Table 13.2 Scottish Parliament election May 2003

| Party | Constituency vote | | Party list vote | | Total Seats |
|--------------|-------------------|-------|-----------------|-------|-------------|
| | % | seats | % | seats | |
| Labour | 34.6 | 46 | 29.3 | 4 | 50 |
| Liberal | 15.4 | 13 | 11.8 | 4 | 17 |
| Conservative | 16.6 | 3 | 15.5 | 15 | 18 |
| SNP | 23.8 | 9 | 20.9 | 18 | 27 |
| Others | 7.7 | 2 | 16.5 | 15 | 17 |

Table 13.3 Scottish Parliament election May 2007

| Party | Constituency vote | | Party list vote | | Total Seats |
|--------------|-------------------|-------|-----------------|-------|-------------|
| | % | seats | % | seats | |
| Labour | 32.1 | 37 | 29.1 | 9 | 46 |
| Liberal | 16.2 | 11 | 11.3 | 5 | 16 |
| Conservative | 16.6 | 4 | 13.9 | 13 | 17 |
| SNP | 32.9 | 21 | 31.0 | 26 | 47 |
| Others | 0.2 | 0 | 8.9 | 3 | 3 |

pursue its ideal political agenda was obviously much compromised by its minority status within the Parliament. A governing party which controls barely one third of the seats in a legislature is unlikely to champion radical policies. Such proved to be the case with the first Salmond government, and the early years of SNP governance in Scotland were notable for the absence of any sharp political controversy between the Salmond and Blair/Brown administrations.

The potential for divergence increased following the 2011 Scots elections, in part because the SNP managed to gain an overall majority in the Parliament and in part because of the greater gap between its own political ideology and that of the Conservative dominated British coalition government. The size of university tuition fees became a sharp point of policy difference between the two governments, as did the financing of personal care for elderly people. Conservative Ministers did appear, however, to have accepted devolution as a morally entrenched principle. No suggestions were made that the Scotland Act ought to be repealed. Nor did the Salmond administration make any immediate attempt to pursue the politically contentious idea of holding a referendum on the question of full independence for Scotland. In the short term, the most likely next step would appear to be a legislative extension of the Scots Parliament's powers, especially in relation to its fiscal autonomy. A Bill to that effect was close to completing its parliamentary passage in the autumn of 2011.⁵⁰

Conclusion

There is a clear danger of both exaggerating and understating the constitutional significance of the Scotland Act 1998. As with any Act (except perhaps the European Communities Act 1972) orthodox theory would have it that the Scotland Act could be amended or wholly repealed by the United Kingdom Parliament at any point in the future. In a narrow legalistic respect, therefore, the Act is of limited significance. As suggested above, it is not wholly implausible to argue that the domestic courts might eventually attribute the same 'special' constitutional status to the Scotland Act as they have afforded to the European Communities Act 1972. But in the short term, this seems unlikely. The texts of the two statutes treat the issue of entrenchment in different ways, and, unlike the 1972 legislation, the Scotland Act is not emerging into a pre-existing legal context which demands that the sovereignty of the UK Parliament be modified to accommodate the principles of the direct effect and supremacy of a supra-national source of law. From a

Table 13.4 Scottish Parliament election May 2011

| Party | Constituency vote | | Party list vote | | Total Seats |
|--------------|-------------------|-------|-----------------|-------|-------------|
| | % | seats | % | seats | |
| Labour | 31.7 | 15 | 26.3 | 22 | 37 |
| Liberal | 7.9 | 2 | 5.2 | 3 | 5 |
| Conservative | 13.9 | 3 | 12.4 | 12 | 15 |
| SNP | 45.4 | 53 | 44 | 16 | 69 |
| Others | 1.1 | 0 | 12.1 | 3 | 3 |

⁵⁰ <<http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/bills/lbill/2010-2012/0079/en/2012079en.htm>>.

purely domestic perspective, the courts may regard the Scotland Act as 'special' in so far as they may deploy interpretative principles as to the vires of the new Parliament's activities derived from case law concerning colonial legislatures rather than indigenous statutory bodies. While this would be an interesting innovation, it is hardly a revolutionary one. This will perhaps prove to be an area of the constitution in which questions of legal theory play a distinctly inferior role to considerations of political practice.

II. Devolved government in Wales after 1998

The Blair government's proposals for devolution to Wales were an altogether more modest affair than those anticipated for Scotland. Their successful implementation also proved to be more problematic than those applied in Scotland. The level of popular support for Welsh devolution was pathetically low. Some 50.3% of the voters who took part in the referendum voted in favour of devolution, while 49.7% opposed. Moreover, the turnout was a dismal 51%. This meant that the devolution proposal was positively supported by barely 25% of eligible voters. Any subsequent legislation could thus lay no convincing claim to be legitimised by popular consent, a case which could clearly be made in respect of Scots devolution. The initially ponderous momentum the proposals enjoyed was further slowed shortly after the referendum when Ron Davies, Secretary of State for Wales and the designated leader of the Labour Party in the projected Assembly, resigned from the government and his post as leader of the party in Wales, in the aftermath of a sex scandal.

The Government of Wales Act 1998

The subsequently introduced Bill was presented in the expectation within the Blair government that the resultant Act would introduce a limited scheme of devolved government that was likely to be subject to extension and expansion. The modesty of the government's initial ambitions,⁵¹ enacted virtually unamended in the Government of Wales Act 1998, was reflected in the names attached to the new system of Welsh governance. Wales would not, like Scotland, have a Parliament, but an 'Assembly'. The Assembly would consist of sixty members. Forty members would be returned on a first-past-the-post basis from individual constituencies. Twenty would be elected from a regional list system.

The Welsh 'government'—the term is used guardedly for reasons outlined below—would not be headed by a First Minister, but by a 'First Secretary'. And her 'Cabinet' colleagues would not be Ministers, but 'Assembly Secretaries'. The Assembly itself was not given 'legislative powers', but rather was empowered to 'enact' policy through transfers of authority from the Secretary of State for Wales.⁵² The absence of any grant of 'legislative' power to the Assembly explains in large part the fact that the 1998 Act did not delineate the Assembly and the 'government' as separate legal entities, as was done in the Scotland Act 1998 in respect of the Scottish Parliament and Executive. The system of governance created by the Act did not rest in legal terms on a separation of powers between an executive and legislative branch, but designated the Assembly as a single corporate body in much the same way that Parliament had traditionally created local authorities.

The scope and nature of Welsh devolution were also markedly different from the model used in Scotland. Rather than grant the Assembly a general competence and then reserve specific powers to the UK Parliament, the Government of Wales Act 1998 treated the Assembly as if it were a local council that was given specific powers. The formal mechanics of this transfer of authority entailed the delegation of powers previously exercised by the Secretary of State for Wales via the device of an Order in Council.⁵³ The use of this technique necessarily meant that the Assembly could not acquire powers that were not already possessed by the Secretary of State. Any future broadening of the Assembly's political authority beyond those limits would be contingent upon the enactment of new enabling legislation by Parliament.

⁵¹ See Welsh Office (1997) A voice for Wales (Cm 3718).

⁵² See generally Brazier (1999) op cit; Craig and Walters op cit: Rawlings R (1998) 'The new model Wales' Journal of Law and Society 461.

The powers that were initially allocated to the Assembly, designated by Schedule 2 of the Act as 'fields' of authority, were reasonably extensive; including, inter alia, the provision of health services, education and training, environmental protection, town planning, housing and social services. Significantly, however, the Act did not grant the Assembly any tax raising powers. The provision made by the Act in s 80 for financing the Assembly's pursuit of its preferred policies in the designated fields was brief in the extreme, and clearly designed to afford the British government complete control over the Assembly's total expenditure:

Grants to Assembly

- 80 (1) The Secretary of State shall from time to time make payments to the Assembly out of money provided by Parliament of such amounts as he may determine.
- (2) Any Minister of the Crown, and any government department, may make to the Assembly payments of such amounts as the Minister or department may determine.

In combination, the formal provisions of the 1998 Act would indicate that the Assembly could sensibly be seen as a powerful instrument of local governance, but it could in no sense be seen as a structure of national governance.

The Assembly nonetheless immediately proved to be of some considerable political significance. This was primarily the result of the electoral process chosen by the government to select the Labour Party's candidate as First Secretary and by the electoral process created by Parliament to select the Assembly's members. It rapidly became apparent that Labour Party members in Wales wished Rhodri Morgan, an independently-minded back-bench MP, to be their candidate as First Secretary. The Blair government thought Morgan too 'independent' for its taste, and so devised a rigged electoral college that ensured the candidacy was won by Alun Michael, a Cabinet Minister.

However, the first elections to the Assembly indicated that the Welsh electorate would not be as biddable to the Blair government's preferences as the Labour Party. The result of the election left Alun Michael as First Secretary of a minority Labour administration. He subsequently lost a vote of confidence in the Assembly, and resigned, to be replaced by Morgan. The devolved government thus rapidly established itself as a mechanism for delivering a salutary—if largely symbolic—rebuke to the Blair government. The episode exposed a curious inconsistency of thought within the Blair administration. Having promoted a legal structure which offered some appreciable opportunity for voters of Wales to see their preferred moral values—albeit to a limited extent and on a limited range of issues—given legal effect, the Blair government took substantial (if ultimately unsuccessful) steps to manipulate the political content of that legal structure in a fashion which minimised the likelihood of that opportunity being embraced.⁵⁴

⁵³ Section 22.

⁵⁴ Readers may find in this an echo of Crosland's comment as to the 'ambivalence' felt by Ministers of both parties during the Butskellite era towards the principle and practicality of affording significant political autonomy to local government; see 'VI. From 'ambivalence' to 'authoritarianism'', ch 10, p 315 above.

It also rapidly became apparent that the de jure absence of a separation of powers between the 'legislative' and 'executive' branches of the new Welsh government was not an accurate guide to the way in which the Assembly was operating in practice. In part perhaps as a consequence of the Labour Party's decision to form a minority administration rather than to engineer a broader, cross-party coalition, the Assembly promptly began to function in 'conventional' terms in a fashion which implied that its members regarded themselves as sitting in a 'Parliament' in the traditional, Westminster sense, in which they formed into 'government' and 'opposition' blocs. The suggestion was promptly made that, notwithstanding its legal form, the Assembly was functioning as a 'virtual Parliament'.⁵⁵ Political circumstances provided a further impetus for that trend in the 2003 Assembly elections, in which the Labour Party won thirty of the Assembly's sixty seats. Rhodri Morgan was again nominated and appointed as First Secretary, leading a 'virtual government' which enjoyed the statistical curiosity of being neither a majority nor minority administration.

The Assembly also took prompt steps to nudge the devolution process further along the road towards greater political autonomy for Wales by establishing a commission (the 'Richard Commission')⁵⁶ to consider how the powers and operation of the Assembly might best be developed. The report of the Commission identified various areas for reform. The Commission recommended that the legal basis of devolved governance should be altered to recognise the reality of the 'virtual Parliament' functioning of the Assembly by creating formally separate executive and legislative branches within the Assembly. Unsurprisingly, the Commission also suggested that the powers of the Assembly be extended and that new mechanisms be devised to enable the Assembly to acquire additional powers without the need for new legislation to be enacted by Parliament.

The Richard proposals were broadly welcomed by the Blair government, which responded in a white paper, Better governance for Wales,⁵⁷ published in 2005. The Blair government accepted that the corporate structure of the Assembly substantially blurred people's understanding of which politicians were actually responsible for particular policies and decisions and also substantially compromised the capacity of the Assembly to evaluate executive proposals and scrutinise executive action. The white paper also acknowledged the need for a more streamlined mechanism to facilitate the Assembly's

Table 13.5 Welsh Assembly election May 1999

| Party | Constituency vote | | Party list vote | | Total Seats |
|--------------|-------------------|-------|-----------------|-------|-------------|
| | % | seats | % | Seats | |
| Labour | 37.6 | 27 | 35.5 | 1 | 28 |
| Liberal | 13.5 | 3 | 12.5 | 3 | 6 |
| Conservative | 15.8 | 1 | 16.5 | 8 | 9 |
| Plaid Cymru | 28.4 | 9 | 30.6 | 8 | 17 |
| Others | 4.8 | 0 | 5.0 | 0 | 0 |

⁵⁵ See the discussion in Rawlings R (2005) 'Hastening slowly: the next phase of Welsh devolution' Public Law 824.

⁵⁶ (2004) Report of the Commission on the powers and electoral arrangements of the National Assembly for Wales. For a helpful summary and analysis of the report see Jones T and Williams J (2005) 'The legislative future of Wales' MLR 642.

⁵⁷ Welsh Office (2005) Better governance for Wales.

Table 13.6 Welsh Assembly election May 2003

| Party | Constituency vote | | Party list vote | | Total Seats |
|--------------|-------------------|-------|-----------------|-------|-------------|
| | % | seats | % | Seats | |
| Labour | 39.5 | 30 | 36.6 | 0 | 30 |
| Liberal | 14.2 | 3 | 12.7 | 3 | 6 |
| Conservative | 20.5 | 1 | 19.1 | 10 | 11 |
| Plaid Cymru | 21.1 | 5 | 19.7 | 7 | 12 |
| Others | 4.7 | 1 | 11.9 | 0 | 1 |

acquisition of more extensive powers in the future. The government also envisaged that at some (presumably distant) point in time, it might be appropriate for the Assembly to be granted legislative powers analogous to those possessed by the Scottish Parliament, and indicated that provision would be made in a new Government of Wales Act for a referendum to be held to consider that issue.

The Government of Wales Act 2006

That Welsh devolution continues to be very much a constitutional work in progress is perhaps best evidenced by the fact that while the 2006 Act reformed the legal structure of the Assembly, enhanced its powers, and facilitated its acquisition of further powers in future, it did not recreate the Assembly as a 'Parliament' in a formal, titular sense. The obvious question which arises is how far the 2006 Act goes in a functional, practical sense towards investing the Assembly with a parliamentary identity.

While the Assembly was not styled as a Parliament, its members who hold executive office were renamed as 'Ministers' (rather than the previous 'Secretaries') by Part 2 of the Act. The formal identification of a 'government' drawn from the Assembly lay at the heart of the 2006 Act's legal recognition of a separation of powers within the devolved system of governance. The First Minister would be nominated by the Assembly and appointed by the Queen. The Act made provision for the government to consist of up to twelve Ministers and/or Deputy Ministers, appointed by the First Minister, all of whom must also be Assembly members.

The 2006 Act endowed the Assembly with a circumscribed area of legislative competence within specified fields of policy. These 'fields' followed the areas outlined in the 1998 Act. Within each 'field', more detailed 'matters' could be specified. Additional 'fields' and 'matters' can obviously be introduced by future Acts of Parliament. But the 2006 Act also allows for the initiative for adding 'matters' to particular fields to come from the Assembly, by way of proposals to the Secretary of State. Should the Secretary of State not approve such proposals, she must give reasons for her refusal. In the event that she does approve the proposals, she must lay them in the form of a draft Order in Council before each house of Parliament, where they are subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. The Assembly was empowered to pass laws to be known as 'Measures' in respect of any 'matter'. Subject to certain designated substantive limitations, 'measures' are given equal legal status to Acts of Parliament, which necessarily entails that within its designated fields of competence the Assembly has the power to repeal or amend existing legislative provisions.

Quite how much political autonomy the Assembly will acquire under these arrangements remains substantially in the gift of the British government. And quite how ready successive British governments will be to accept (and finance) the Welsh government's pursuit of policies which they find unpalatable remains to be seen. But certainly in formal terms, the 2006 Act could defensibly be described as a further significant step towards the creation of a constitutional order in which legal effect is given to the moral principle that citizens' varying political ideologies are afforded the opportunity to be expressed simultaneously in the practical realm of governance as well as in the abstract realm of ideas.

The 2006 Act was to come into force following the Assembly elections scheduled for May 2007. Labour remained the largest party in the Assembly, but lacked an overall majority. Somewhat unexpectedly, a Labour/Plaid Cymru coalition was subsequently formed, with Rhodri Morgan again nominated as First Minister. The initial indications were that this new Welsh government would continue to pursue social and economic policies which diverged markedly if modestly from the policy agenda favoured by the Brown government for England.

The gradual nature of the trend towards increasing political autonomy for Wales continued in 2011, when a referendum was held to elicit the Welsh people's views on an extension of the Assembly's law-making powers to the full extent envisaged by the 2006 Act. Only 35% of the population participated in the referendum, although of those who did vote some 65% supported the proposal. In contrast to the position in Scotland, the 2011 elections in Wales did not produce any increased political pressure for consideration of independence. On a notably low turnout of barely 40% of eligible voters, the Labour party won thirty of the sixty Assembly seats. Surprisingly perhaps, support for the Welsh

Table 13.7 Welsh Assembly election May 2007

| Party | Constituency vote | | Party list vote | | Total Seats |
|--------------|-------------------|-------|-----------------|-------|-------------|
| | % | Seats | % | Seats | |
| Labour | 32.2 | 24 | 29.6 | 2 | 26 |
| Liberal | 14.8 | 3 | 11.7 | 3 | 6 |
| Conservative | 22.4 | 5 | 21.5 | 7 | 12 |
| Plaid Cymru | 22.4 | 7 | 21.0 | 8 | 15 |
| Others | 8.3 | 1 | 16.2 | 0 | 1 |

Table 13.8 Welsh Assembly election May 2011

| Party | Constituency vote | | Party list vote | | Total Seats |
|--------------|-------------------|-------|-----------------|-------|-------------|
| | % | Seats | % | seats | |
| Labour | 42.3 | 28 | 36.9 | 2 | 30 |
| Liberal | 10.6 | 1 | 8.0 | 4 | 5 |
| Conservative | 25.0 | 6 | 22.5 | 8 | 14 |
| Plaid Cymru | 19.3 | 5 | 17.9 | 6 | 11 |
| Others | 2.8 | 0 | 12.7 | 0 | 0 |

nationalist Plaid Cymru party fell sharply. In constitutional terms, as a matter both of law and of politics, the issue of devolution has thus far proved to be a much less significant event in Wales than in Scotland.

Conclusion

That the Scotland Act 1998 and Government of Wales Act 2006 fall far short of creating a 'federal' United Kingdom's constitution in a fashion which is, in legal terms, comparable to that in which the notion is understood in the United States sense is undeniable. The institutions of devolved governance in Scotland and Wales do not have, and cannot have for so long as we remain attached to orthodox presumptions as to the sovereignty of Parliament, any entrenched legal status. Yet the constitutional significance of the devolution legislation should not be underestimated. The Acts' most significant feature is the substantial step they take towards the assertion of *simultaneous political pluralism*⁵⁸ as a fundamental (if conventional) tenet of British constitutional morality. The Blair governments knowingly and enthusiastically invited Parliament to enact legislation which created new governmental bodies within the United Kingdom constitution which—in addition to possessing significant political power—were by no means guaranteed to be controlled by the Labour Party. That a government was willing to entertain the probability that its policy initiatives would reduce its own power marks a complete break with the authoritarian ethos of the Thatcher and Major eras, and might properly be regarded as evincing a level of ideological support for the principle of simultaneous political pluralism which is quite unprecedented in the modern era.

In addition, the adoption of a system of proportional representation for electing the Scots Parliament and Welsh Assembly makes it very unlikely that legislative policy in Scotland and Wales will ever be determined by political parties enjoying only minoritarian electoral support. The adequacy of the Commons' electoral system and the minoritarian governments it almost invariably produces will thus be exposed to a constant, indigenous source of comparison. Perhaps even more importantly, the notion that a 'Parliament' can and should be a body possessing limited law-making competence will begin to become normalised within British political culture. At present, predictions as to the future development of the Scots and United Kingdom Parliaments seem to be dominated by the supposition that the former will become more like the latter.⁵⁹ We may find in the longer term that the reverse argument acquires increasing force.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Balsom D and McAllister I (1979) 'The Scottish and Welsh devolution referenda of 1979: constitutional change and popular choice' Parliamentary Affairs 394

⁵⁸ See 'Local Government', ch 12, pp 301–302 above.

⁵⁹ One minor consequence of the initial 'success' of the devolution experiment is that the number of Scots seats in the Westminster Parliament has been reduced (by twelve) so that the 'electoral quota' for Scots and English constituencies is the same; see 'Apportionment criteria—a non-justiciable issue?', ch 7, p 205 above. Given that the Labour party has enjoyed such a disproportionately high level of electoral success in Scotland in recent years, that innovation itself is a remarkable display of political generosity. Its effect is of course to make it more difficult for the Labour Party to win a Commons majority.

Bogdanor V (1979) 'The English constitution and devolution' Political Quarterly 36

Bogdanor V 'Devolution: decentralisation or disintegration' Political Quarterly 185

Brazier R (1999) 'The Constitution of the United Kingdom' Cambridge LJ 96

Craig P and Walters M (1999) 'The courts, devolution and judicial review' Public Law 274

Tierney S (2000) 'Constitutionalising the role of the judge: Scotland and the new order'
European LR 49

Case law and legislation

R v Burah (1878) 3 App Cas 889

Riel v R (1885) 10 App Cas 675

Part Four

Administrative Law

Chapter 14 Substantive Grounds of Judicial Review

Chapter 15 Procedural Grounds of Judicial Review

Chapter 16 Challenging Governmental Decisions: The Process

Chapter 17 Locus Standi

This page intentionally left blank

Chapter 14

Substantive Grounds of Judicial Review

The grounds on which the courts have traditionally been prepared to conclude that a government action may be unlawful have been alluded to frequently in earlier chapters. The next two chapters offer a rather more systematic approach to this branch of administrative law, by revisiting some of those previously mentioned decisions in the context of a detailed discussion of other leading cases.

Since Parliament is a sovereign law-maker, it has the legal capacity to enact statutory rules against which the courts may assess the lawfulness of the actions of any or all governmental bodies. The provisions of the ECA 1972 are a powerful example of such statutory grounds of judicial review. From an administrative lawyer's perspective, one way to characterise the impact of the ECA 1972 is that it has made breach of a directly effective provision of Community law a ground of judicial review which can be invoked against government bodies. In the main however, as was suggested in chapter three, the grounds of judicial review are creatures of the common law; they have been created and developed by the courts.¹ It is with those grounds of review that the next two chapters are concerned.

The various grounds of review recognised at common law fall essentially into two spheres. Substantive grounds of review are concerned with the content or outcome of the decision made. Procedural grounds of review, in contrast, address the question of the way in which a decision is made. As we shall see in chapter fifteen, it is entirely possible that the substance of a decision is quite lawful, but the decision itself will be unlawful because of a procedural flaw. In this chapter, we focus on the substantive grounds of review. The courts have traditionally recognised two such grounds—illegality and irrationality.² These are addressed in sections one and two below. Section three then considers a third ground, which is an emergent rather than established principle in English law—that of proportionality.³

¹ See 'III. Judicial regulation of government behaviour: the constitutional rationale', ch 3, pp 59–62 above.

² 'Irrationality' is the contemporary usage for the concept once referred to as 'Wednesbury unreasonableness': see 'III. Judicial regulation of government behaviour: the constitutional rationale', ch 3, pp 59–62 above. The terms are used interchangeably in the rest of this book.

³ For the reasons alluded to in the preface to this book, the contents of this chapter address only a limited range of the issues that would be discussed under this heading in a book devoted solely to administrative law. This chapter is intended to be an illustrative rather than exhaustive foray into the realm of illegality. Thus for example (to the certain relief of students and the probable relief of their teachers) I have taken at face value

I. Illegality

Lord Greene MR's judgment in *Wednesbury*⁴ had noted that the various grounds of review were not wholly discrete categories, but might often merge and overlap. The same point might be made about the various sub-categories of each ground of review. For the purposes of this book, illegality has been broken down into the following component parts: excess of power; the relevant/irrelevant considerations doctrine; unlawful delegation of power; unlawful fettering of power; and the estoppel doctrine.

Excess of powers

The notion that a government body's decision is unlawful because the body has attempted to exercise a power that it simply does not possess might be thought a very straightforward concept to apply. An obvious example, mentioned in chapter three, would arise if a government body invoked a statute which empowered it to build schools as an authority for it to build houses. Such executive activity could readily be understood as involving what is sometimes termed an 'excess of power'. An alternative, and often used formulation in these circumstances would be to say that the government body has gone 'beyond the four corners of the Act'.⁵ The test becomes rather more complicated however when one considers that the content of legislation, in so far as it can be presented as having a geometrical shape, may look less like a neat rectangle and more like a blob of custard dropped from a great height on to a hot plate. And even if the contours of the relevant statute might initially appear to have a readily identifiable shape, the twin processes of their application by the executive and their interpretation by the courts may produce unexpected results.

The much-cited judgment in *A-G v Fulham Corpn*⁶ is a helpful way of introducing this topic. The case centred on the powers granted by a series of Baths and Washhouses Acts, passed between 1846 and 1878. Fulham Corporation had operated several such facilities to which people came to have baths and to launder their own clothes. It subsequently decided to offer a home delivery laundry service. The service was projected to make a substantial operating deficit each year, and would be subsidised from local taxation. The vires of this policy were then challenged by the Attorney-General.

The judgment did not rest upon a literal construction of any particular provision of the Act. Sargant J seemed instead to apply the 'golden rule' of statutory interpretation in attempting to establish the overall purpose underlying the legislation. This technique led him to conclude that 'the scheme of the Act appears to be to give washing facilities to persons who are not able to provide for themselves places where they may cleanse themselves

Lord Diplock's suggestion in GCHQ that Anisminic abolished the distinction between jurisdictional and non-jurisdictional errors of law, and omitted any discussion of that doctrinally rather impenetrable issue.

Students may also find it helpful to evaluate the principles and cases discussed in the next four chapters against the theoretical analyses of the rule of law outlined in "Red light" and "green light" theories', ch 3, p 59 above.

⁴ Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corpn [1948] 1 KB 223, [1947] 2 All ER 680, CA.

⁵ That label is obviously inappropriate if it is the limits of a prerogative power that are in question. It should be noted that following the UK's accession to the EEC in 1972, a government action would be 'illegal' in this core sense if it breached a directly effective provision of EC law. It is beyond the scope of this book to offer even a cursory outline of the various substantive provisions of EC law, although some aspects of the ECJ's jurisprudence will be touched upon below. For a smoothly integrated approach to the impact of EC substantive law on UK administrative law see successive editions of Craig's Administrative law.

⁶ [1921] 1 Ch 440.

or wash their clothes'.⁷ He then observed that it was a settled facet of the illegality doctrine that a policy would be intra vires, even if it did not fall squarely within the scheme of the Act if it could be regarded as 'incidental to, or consequent upon, those things which the legislature has authorised'.⁸

The notions of incidentalism or consequentialism would seem substantially to reduce the scope for a policy to be held illegal. On these facts, however, the principle did not assist the Corporation. In Sargant J's view, the provision of a home delivery laundry service was 'a completely different enterprise'⁹ from just providing facilities where people could do their own washing.

There is no compelling empirical basis for that conclusion. The case could clearly have been decided the other way just as readily, an observation which highlights the often ambiguous reach of the illegality principle. It seems that Sargant J's decision was probably swayed by a factor which he himself described as irrelevant to the question before him—and which he then considered at some length:

[T]he service is being performed at about half ... of the cost to the Council. That is an instance I think, although it is immaterial for the present purpose, of the light-hearted way in which operations are conducted by persons who have not their own pockets to consider, but who have behind them what they regard as the unlimited or nearly unlimited power of the ratepayers.¹⁰

Sargant J's observations in A-G v Fulham as to the feasibility (or lack of it) of the council's scheme might be thought to have set the jurisprudential scene for the House of Lords' judgment in Roberts v Hopwood a few years later.¹¹ In Roberts, we may recall,¹² the House of Lords had unanimously concluded that Poplar Council's £4 per week minimum wage policy was void on the ground of illegality. The council had assumed it was acting within the limits of s 62 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, which empowered it to pay 'such wages as it thinks fit'. The House of Lords had held that s 62 had to be construed subject to a common law 'fiduciary duty' imposed upon governmental bodies. Since the payment made by the council bore no close relation to the market value of the work performed it was not a wage or salary at all, but a 'gift'. As such it was beyond the four corners of s 62.

In the Court of Appeal¹³ however, the notion that the council was under a fiduciary duty to its ratepayers—and thus that s 62 had to be construed in that context was rejected. While the court accepted that prevailing market rates had some bearing on establishing if a payment was indeed a 'wage', it also concluded that the concept of a 'wage' was sufficiently elastic to permit a significant departure from the sums paid in the private sector for similar work.

The origin of the fiduciary duty principle in respect of local government actions was discussed in chapter ten.¹⁴ The doctrine can plausibly be seen as a common law mechanism designed to enhance rather than restrict an elected body's substantive autonomy. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Roberts is consistent with that understanding of the principle. The judgment of the House of Lords in Roberts, and Sargant J's observations in Fulham, appear to reject or ignore it.

⁷ Ibid, at 451.

⁸ Ibid, at 450; citing James LJ in Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co Ltd v Riche (1875) LR 7 HL 653.

⁹ Ibid, at 453. ¹⁰ Ibid, at 454.

¹¹ [1925] AC 578, HL. ¹² 'The role of the judiciary', ch 10, pp 311–312 above.

¹³ R v Roberts, ex p Scurr [1924] 2 KB 695, CA.

¹⁴ See 'The Municipal Corporations Act 1835' ff, ch 10, pp 303–305 above.

Notwithstanding this point, one might question the accuracy of portrayals of the House of Lords' decision in Roberts as a simple manifestation of right-wing political bias by the judiciary.¹⁵ Quite how well-founded that contention was in respect of the judges involved in Roberts is unclear. In so far as the content of the judgment reflected right wing political views, one might readily suggest that those views accurately reflected the wishes of the 1855 Parliament, whose survey of the then political landscape would not have revealed any 'socialists' controlling government bodies. The ghost of Roberts in the guise of the fiduciary duty doctrine re-appeared thirty years later in Prescott v Birmingham Corpn,¹⁶ when the court concluded that a council's concessionary fare scheme was illegal; and again, a further thirty years later in Bromley v GLC, when the House of Lords invalidated the GLC's 'Fares Fair' policy. As suggested in chapter ten, the court's reading of the relevant legislation at issue in that case was readily defensible, even if one might just as readily have construed the Act to uphold the GLC's policy.

The point to be drawn here is perhaps that illegality, while ostensibly a straightforward concept, becomes markedly more opaque when it is placed—as it (generally) must be—in the context of the principles of statutory interpretation.¹⁷ Liversidge v Anderson offers a compelling illustration of this. In Lord Atkin's view, Liversidge's detention was 'illegal', as Anderson's power to detain Liversidge only arose if Anderson had 'reasonable cause' to believe him to be of hostile origins or association. However, for the majority, that power arose if the Home Secretary had a bona fide belief in Liversidge's hostile associations. As long as that belief existed, the detention would not be illegal.¹⁸

An equally pertinent illustration of the point can be found if one stays in the rather narrow field of a local authority's fiduciary duty when deciding on its employees' wage rates. The High Court's 1983 judgment in *Pickwell v Camden London Borough Council*¹⁹ was triggered by the council's decision to end a strike by its employees by offering them a pay deal that was substantially (15%–20%) above the rate subsequently negotiated on a national basis by the relevant union and local authority associations. Forbes J accepted that the council was indeed under an implicit fiduciary duty to spend its money wisely. However, the council's fiduciary duty was now to be read in conjunction with another implicit but equally pervasive obligation 'to provide a wide range of services to its inhabitants'.²⁰ If high payments were needed to secure that objective, then those payments could defensibly be construed as a wage.²¹

That the nominally simple 'four corners' approach to illegality is more complicated than it might first appear is also well illustrated by the more recent judgment in R v Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, ex p World Development Movement Ltd (popularly known as the Pergau Dam case).²² The Overseas Development and Co-operation Act 1980 s 1 provided that the Foreign Secretary:

... shall have power, for the purpose of promoting the development or maintaining the economy of a country ... outside the UK, or the welfare of its people, to furnish any person or body with assistance, whether financial, technical or any other nature.

¹⁵ See Laski op cit; Fennell op cit; 'The 'fiduciary duty' doctrine revisited (and subverted?)', ch 10, pp 312–313 above.

¹⁶ [1955] Ch 210, CA.

¹⁷ That point would of course not apply when the power in issue was alleged to derive from common law rather than statute.

¹⁸ One might make just the same observation regarding the different view expressed by the Court of Appeal and House of Lords in Rossminster as to the claimed illegality of the Inland Revenue's search of the applicant's property; see 'R v IRC, ex p Rossminster Ltd' (1980), ch 3, pp 71–72 above.

¹⁹ [1983] QB 962.

²⁰ [1983] 2 WLR 583 at 603.

²¹ A conclusion which seems quite consistent with the original understanding of the fiduciary duty doctrine.

²² [1995] 1 WLR 386, [1995] 1 All ER 611.

In the late-1980s, several British firms became involved in a bid to build a dam in Pergau, Malaysia. The initial project was costed at £316m. Officials from the Overseas Development Agency (ODA) subsequently visited Malaysia to examine the proposal. They concluded that the project was ‘at the margin of economic viability’, and the (Conservative) Foreign Secretary agreed to provide aid of £68m. In April 1989, the anticipated cost of the project was re-estimated at £397m, which led an ODA economist to conclude that the project was now ‘clearly uneconomic’. In February 1990, the ODA completed a new appraisal and described the scheme as a ‘very bad buy’. The World Bank considered it ‘markedly uneconomic’ and noted that it could have devastating consequences for the local environment. The Secretary of State nevertheless decided to grant the aid. He took the view that not to do so would ‘affect the UK’s credibility as a reliable friend and trading partner and have adverse consequences for our political and commercial relations with Malaysia’.²³ The Foreign Secretary maintained that s 1 did not limit the provision of aid to projects that were viable in narrow, economic terms, but also permitted aid which served ‘wider political and economic considerations, such as the promotion of regional stability, good government, human rights or British commercial interests’.²⁴ This argument, perhaps ironically, bears an obvious resemblance to the interpretation of the ‘economic, efficient and integrated’ formula in s 1 of the Transport (London) Act 1969 urged on the House of Lords by the GLC in Bromley.²⁵ Rose LJ followed the Lords’ methodology in that case. The issue was a simple one: did s 1 impliedly require that development projects be economically sound?.

Parliament could obviously have expressly inserted the word ‘sound’ into s 1 had it wished to do so. The question for the court was to decide what implications should be drawn from its failure to do so. Does the absence of the word mean, as the government contended, that an aid project that was weak in the narrow economic sense was nonetheless legal if other, broader concerns could be invoked to support it? Or, as the World Development Movement maintained, was the requirement that development projects make good economic sense so obvious that there was no need for Parliament to say so expressly? Rose LJ favoured the latter view:

As to the absence of the word ‘sound’ from s 1(1), it seems to me that if Parliament had intended to confer a power to disburse money for unsound development purposes, it could have been expected to say so expressly... This development, is on the evidence, so economically unsound that there is no economic argument in favour of the case.²⁶

The Pergau Dam judgment excited some considerable political controversy,²⁷ but is a readily defensible exercise in literalist statutory interpretation with obvious antecedents in both Roberts and Bromley. The judgment essentially construed s 1 as containing an implied fiduciary duty on the government’s aid spending. One might question whether or not the common law fiduciary duty doctrine should play any part in regulating government bodies’ expenditure plans, but Pergau Dam would suggest that the courts do now apply the doctrine on a non-party political basis.

From a jurisprudential perspective, the courts’ use of the illegality rule to invalidate government decisions is perhaps more problematic when it is premised not on the literal meaning of particular words or phrases in a statute, but—as in the Fulham case—when it purports to ascertain the meaning of a particular provision in the light of the

²³ [1995] 1 WLR 386 at 399.

²⁴ Ibid.

²⁵ See “‘Fares fair’: Bromley London Borough Council v Greater London Council”, ch 10, pp 320–322 above.

²⁶ Ibid., at 402.

²⁷ See the discussion of “The ‘judicial supremacism’ controversy” of the 1990s in ch 20, pp 623–634 below.

overall scheme or policy of an Act. The House of Lords' judgment in *Padfield v Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food*²⁸ is an extreme example of this point.

An Act of 1931 had introduced the Milk Marketing Scheme, which required dairy farmers to sell all their milk to regional Milk Marketing Boards. Both consumers and producers had representation on the various Boards. The subsequent Agriculture Marketing Act 1958 made provision for two distinct bodies to hear complaints about the scheme's operation. The Act appeared to envisage that most complaints would be referred to a Consumer's Committee. However s 19(3) provided that:

A committee of investigation shall... (b) be charged with the duty, if the Minister in any case so directs, of considering and reporting to the Minister on... any... complaint made to the Minister as to the operation of any scheme which, in the opinion of the Minister, could not be considered by a Consumers' Committee.

In the mid-1960s, producers in the south-east region wanted a larger price rise than the Regional Board would grant. Their preferred remedy was to rely on a 'Committee of Investigation' to consider the issue, presumably because they thought a Consumers' Committee would not be so sympathetic to their interests. The Minister refused to pass the complaint to a Committee of Investigation, on the basis that in his opinion the matter could satisfactorily be considered by a Consumers' Committee. His understanding of s 19(3) was that referral to a Committee of Investigation would only be appropriate when he felt that the relevant Regional Board was not acting in the public interest.

The text of s 19(3) seems to afford the Minister a very wide discretion. However, the House of Lords proceeded to lend s 19(3) a somewhat unexpected meaning. Rather than adopting the literal rule of construction, Lord Reid's leading judgment followed an interpretative technique with distinctly teleological overtones. He began with the ostensibly uncontroversial proposition that: 'Parliament must have conferred the discretion with the intention that it should be used to promote the policy and objects of the Act'.²⁹ He then deduced the 'policy and objects of the Act' by examining both its entire text and the historical circumstances surrounding its enactment. This was, he suggested, a statute with an unusual substantive effect:

When these provisions were first enacted in 1931 it was unusual for Parliament to compel people to sell their commodities in a way to which they objected and it was easily foreseeable that any such scheme would cause loss to some producers.³⁰

The inference of this would seem to be that all producer complaints should be investigated, to ensure that any losses were fully justified and that producers could know their interests were being fully considered. Lord Reid was therefore led to conclude that: '[I]t is plainly the intention of the Act that even the widest issues should be investigated if the complaint is genuine and substantial, as this complaint certainly is'.³¹

Notwithstanding Lord Reid's constant evocation of parliamentary intent as the source of his decision, cynical observers of judicial behaviour might conclude that his reasoning in Padfield seems to pay as little heed to orthodox understandings of the relationship between Parliament and the courts as his contemporaneous judgment in Anisminic. In effect, Lord Reid ignored the plain meaning of s 19(3) and converted the power it bestowed upon the Minister into a duty whenever a complaint was 'genuine and substantial'³²—thereby ensuring that the Minister's failure to refer the complaint to a Committee

²⁸ [1968] AC 997, HL.

²⁹ Ibid, at 1030.

³⁰ Ibid.

³¹ Ibid, at 1031.

³² Lord Morris, the sole dissident in the case, seemed to rest his judgment on much more orthodox grounds; cf his comment at 705: 'If Parliament had intended to impose a duty on the Minister to refer any of Investigation automatically became illegal.³³ The case perhaps suggests that the ECJ's contemporaneous embrace of the 'spirit, scheme and general wording' approach to the interpretation of the Treaty of Rome was not quite so alien to the English judicial tradition as one might have initially believed.³⁴

The use of what appears de facto to be purposive judicial reasoning to bring government action within the illegality doctrine is also evident in the Court of Appeal's judgment in Congreve v Home Office.³⁵ The Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949, s 1 made it a criminal offence for any person to use a radio or television without having a licence issued by the government. Section 1 also permitted the Home Secretary to issue regulations to charge a fee for such a licence. In 1975, the fee was set at £12 per year. In an attempt to increase the revenue generated by the licence, Harold Wilson's third Labour government announced in February 1975 that the fee would be raised to £18 with effect from 1 April 1975. In the following weeks, several newspapers pointed out that licence holders whose current licences expired shortly after 31 March 1975 might save themselves some £6 by purchasing another licence before 1 April. Many citizens took this advice. The Home Office responded by revoking all such licences, and sending their purchasers letters ordering them to return the £12 licences and buy new £18 licences on the date that their original licence expired. Congreve, a solicitor in a leading city firm, refused to comply, and sought a declaration that the Home Office policy was illegal.

From a purely political perspective, such an action by a government with a Commons majority of two might be thought quite asinine. It was also found to amount to maladministration by the Parliamentary Ombudsman. Neither failing necessarily makes a policy unlawful. But in the view of the Court of Appeal, the Home Office's behaviour was indeed illegal as well.

Lord Denning MR's leading judgment deployed the same melodramatic language that he later invoked in Rossminster. He began by expressing some suspicion about the legitimacy of s 1:

The statute has conferred a licensing power on the Minister: but it is a very special kind of power. It invades a man in the privacy of his home, and it does so solely for financial reasons so as to enable the Minister to collect money for the Revenue.³⁶

Denning regarded the purchase of a licence as creating a property right for the buyer. Nothing in the Act clearly forbade an individual from holding two or more licences which overlapped for a short period. Section 1 undoubtedly empowered the Minister to revoke a licence in some circumstances; if the purchase had been premised on fraud, for example. But in the absence of such circumstances, or some other good reason, the Act did not and every complaint, or even any and every complaint of a particular nature, it would have been so easy to impose such a duty in plain terms. I cannot read the words in s 19(3) as imposing a positive duty on the Minister to refer every complaint as to the operation of the scheme'.

³³ Padfield could have been decided on much narrower grounds. It does seem clear that the Minister had misunderstood the scope of the Committee of Investigation's powers of inquiry, and had apparently relied heavily on that misunderstanding in respect of Padfield's complaint. On those facts, the court could simply have quashed the Minister's refusal while also accepting that the Minister, having properly understood the Committee's role, could nonetheless lawfully refuse to refer the complaint.

³⁴ See the discussion of Van Gend en Loos at 'Van Gend en Loos (1962)', ch 11, pp 349–352 above. That it is actually quite difficult even to identify the interpretive technique that Lord Reid used in Padfield is a further indication of the broad scope of the effective power that traditional constitutional understandings accord to the judiciary.

³⁵ [1976] QB 629.

³⁶ Ibid., at 649.

empower the Minister to revoke a licence. For him to attempt to do so simply because it would generate additional revenue for the Treasury was a ‘misuse of power’.³⁷

Congreve might broadly be construed as supporting the notion that ‘misuse of power’ is a distinct sub-category of the illegality doctrine. As such, it would demand that courts always be willing to inquire into the motives which underlay the impugned decision. That inquiry was unproblematic in Congreve itself, as the Home Secretary candidly stated that his purpose was to raise money. In other cases, where the defendant was less forthcoming, an inquiry into motives could lead the court into rather delicate political territory. The case might therefore better be construed more narrowly, as an illustration of the simple point that the courts have consistently maintained that governmental powers to levy taxation can only be created by explicit statutory language.³⁸

The uncertainties inherent in the ‘four corners of the Act’ characterisation of illegality are further magnified when we recall the judicial presumption that many (if not most) statutory provisions can properly be regarded as ‘always speaking’.³⁹ This point is nicely illustrated—in respect of a rather prosaic issue—by the judgment of the House of Lords in Akumah v LB of Hackney.⁴⁰ Mr Akumah had repeatedly parked his car on a local council housing estate in breach of the parking scheme that the local authority had established. He had received a good many penalty tickets and eventually his car was impounded. The issue before the court was whether the council derived the power to run such a scheme from s 21(1) of the Housing Act 1985. Section 21(1) was cast in very general terms:

The general management, regulation and control of a local housing authority’s houses is vested in and shall be exercised by the authority and the houses shall at all times be open to inspection by the authority.’

Section 21(1) of the 1985 Act was a re-enactment of a provision first enacted in the 1930s, at a time when very few people owned cars and there was no need for councils to control parking. Seventy years later, car parking had become an important issue in many cities, but Parliament had not altered the text of the original provision to give local authorities express powers to deal with the matter.

The interpretive technique adopted by the House of Lords in Akumah might be seen as either teleological or always speaking in nature:

21....[I] is inherent in the management of houses in a housing estate that parking on the estate should be regulated. Unregulated parking could in many housing estates lead to congestion of the roads and the unavailability of places for residents to park their cars if other persons can park there at will. It is also important to ensure access for service and emergency vehicles to the houses on the estate. Those factors are clearly capable of affecting the amenity of life for the residents and their access to and enjoyment of their houses and flats on the estate. I find no difficulty in accepting that safeguarding and improving that amenity and facilitating that access and enjoyment are proper functions of a council managing a housing estate.⁴¹

As in Fulham however, it is difficult to fashion a compelling argument to support the proposition that the House of Lords could not have equally credibly come to the opposite

³⁷ Ibid, at 651.

³⁸ Cf Roskill LJ, ibid at 657–658: ‘If the Secretary of State wishes to put his position in this respect beyond all argument, he should seek the necessary Parliamentary powers—if he can obtain them; and Denning at 652: ‘[The Home Office letters] were an attempt to levy money for the use of the Crown without the authority of Parliament; and that is quite enough to damn them: see A-G v Wilts United Dairies’ (1922) 38 TLR 781, HL.

³⁹ See ‘Complicating the literal rule: (most) statutory provisions are “always speaking”’ pp 64–65 above.

⁴⁰ [2005] UKHL 17, [2005] 1 WLR 985.

⁴¹ Ibid, at 993; per Lord Carswell (for a unanimous court).

conclusion. A judgment to the effect that if local authorities wanted to regulate parking—and impose penalties on individuals who breached such regulations—then they should persuade Parliament to grant them such powers in express terms could be considered quite consistent with constitutional principle.

The presumption of non-interference with ‘basic rights’

The narrow construction of the Congreve rule offered above is unproblematic because it speaks to a ‘fundamental’ constitutional principle which has an explicit basis in a statutory text—namely the Bill of Rights. But one can also find applications of the illegality doctrine which rest on the assumption that certain ‘fundamental’ or ‘basic’ rights exist at common law or are implicitly protected by statute, and that the defence of those rights provides a legitimate contextual or background principle against which a statutory text should be construed. We have encountered this point on several occasions already. The House of Lords’ construction of the Defence of the Realm legislation in De Keyser as being intended to respect the common law rule that the government could only in the most limited circumstances take a citizen’s property without paying compensation is a good example of this.⁴²

Relatedly, one might offer up Gilmore and Anisminic as illustrations of a ‘basic right’ presumption at common law that Parliament cannot deprive citizens of access to the courts other than by the most explicit statutory formulae.⁴³ R & W Paul Ltd v Wheat Commission can also be invoked to support this contention.⁴⁴ The Arbitration Act 1889 permitted parties who had agreed to resolve commercial disputes by arbitration rather than litigation to appeal to the High Court on a point of law against the arbitrator’s decision. Subsequently, the Wheat Act 1932 created a body called the Wheat Commission to regulate the wheat industry. The Wheat Act s 5 empowered the Commission to make bye-laws to give effect to the Act. Bye-law 20 made provision to refer disputes between producers and the Commission to an arbitrator, and appeared to make the arbitrator’s decision on all disputes final. The company in this case wished to refer the arbitrator’s decision to the courts. Bye-law 20 seemed to preclude this. The question thus raised in this action was whether the Commission had the power to pass bye-law 20. The House of Lords held that the Commission had exceeded its powers. Bye-law 20 was illegal because it interfered with the basic right of access to the courts:

The Arbitration Act is a statute of general application, and it confers a valuable and important right of resort to the courts of law. To exclude its operation from an arbitration is to deprive the parties... of the rights which the Act confers... If that is intended, express words to that effect are in my opinion essential.⁴⁵

A more recent example of this basic right approach to illegality—and one rooted purely in common law—is provided by Raymond v Honey.⁴⁶ Under the Prison Act 1952, s 47, the Home Secretary may make rules for the regulation and management of prisons. Rules 33 and 37 seemed to empower prison governors to prevent mail being sent by prisoners in certain circumstances. Raymond, the governor, prevented some of Honey’s [a prisoner] mail being sent to Honey’s lawyers. Honey subsequently initiated contempt of court proceedings against Raymond. Contempt of court is a broad concept in English law. The ⁴² See ‘The superiority of statute over prerogative: A-G v De Keyser’s Royal Hotel Ltd (1920)’, ch 4, pp 94–97 above.

⁴³ See ‘Ouster clauses—Gilmore (1957) and Anisminic (1969)’, ff, ch 3, pp 76–78 above.

⁴⁴ [1937] AC 139, HL. See the discussion in Browne-Wilkinson, Lord (1992) ‘The infiltration of a Bill of Rights’ Public Law 397.

⁴⁵ [1937] AC 139 at 154, per Lord Macmillan, HL.

⁴⁶ [1983] 1 AC 1, HL.

accepted definition was offered by Lord Russell in 1900 in R v Gray, and encompassed 'Any act done which is calculated to obstruct or interfere with the due course of justice'.⁴⁷ The governor's action clearly fell within this definition. His defence to the action was that he had been authorised to obstruct prisoners' mail by the Prison Regulations. This in turn raised the issue of whether s 47 of the Act permitted the Home Secretary to make regulations granting a governor such powers. The House of Lords concluded that s 47 did not have that effect. As Lord Wilberforce put it:

... under English law, a convicted prisoner, in spite of his imprisonment, retains all civil rights which are not taken away expressly or by necessary implication...

There is nothing in the Prison Act 1952 that confers power to make regulations which would deny, or interfere with, the right of the respondent, as a prisoner, to have unimpeded access to a court. Section 47... is quite insufficient to authorise hindrance or interference with so basic a right.⁴⁸

At this time, the English courts' use of the 'basic right' principle was patchy and erratic. One could not identify with any precision which 'basic rights' existed,⁴⁹ nor the circumstances in which the courts would be ready to invoke them as a means to set a particular interpretative context within which particular statutory powers should be construed. As such, the principle lent the concept of illegality a still more complicated and uncertain character. As we shall see in subsequent chapters, the doctrine has assumed a far more coherent shape in recent years. For the moment however, we continue our analysis of the more clearly established facets of the illegality principle.

Relevant and irrelevant considerations

It has generally been accepted that a decision will be illegal if its contents were arrived at because the decision-maker either took account of irrelevant considerations or failed to take account of relevant considerations. Roberts v Hopwood can be advanced as the classic illustration of this principle. In Roberts in the House of Lords, Lord Atkinson had concluded that the £4 per week wage policy was also unlawful because the council had been influenced by 'some eccentric principles of socialist philanthropy' or by a 'feminist ambition to secure the equality of the sexes in the matter of wages in the world of labour'.⁵⁰ One might defend the House of Lords on this point by suggesting that in 1855, when s 62 of the Metropolis Management Act was passed, legislators would not have seen any 'socialists'⁵¹ or 'feminists' in control of local authorities, and so could not have envisaged that s 62 would be used for such ends. Yet, once again, the Court of Appeal had taken a different view on this issue. The stress which both Scrutton LJ and Atkin LJ laid on the representative character of the council implicitly accepts that party political views, be they socialist, social democrat or conservative, are a legitimate influence on the exercise of the elected body's discretionary powers. Both judges also made explicit reference to the council's concern with gender equality. For Scrutton LJ, that was 'a matter of acute controversy, which is hardly for either the auditor or the judges to determine'.⁵² In Atkin

⁴⁷ [1900] 2 QB 36.

⁴⁸ [1983] 1 AC 1 at 10 and 12, HL.

⁴⁹ We might perhaps easily agree that parking one's car where one wished is not such a right, which was why the House of Lords was content to take an indulgent (from the executive's perspective) approach to s 21 of the Housing Act 1985 in Akumah.

⁵⁰ [1925] AC 578 at 594, HL.

⁵¹ The Labour Party began to establish itself as a force in local government in the early 1900s.

⁵² [1924] 2 KB 695 at 721, CA.

LJ's view, the fact that the council may have been motivated by this factor had no bearing on the illegality issue.⁵³

The great weakness of the relevant/irrelevant consideration principle from a constitutional perspective is that it provides a nominally legitimate vehicle for the courts to steer themselves very close to the political/moral merits of a given decision. Which factors are (ir)relevant to the exercise of a given governmental power is a matter on which Parliament has generally not expressed any (and certainly not an exhaustive) opinion. Unlike the core 'excess of power' limb of the illegality doctrine, this principle is much more difficult to justify in terms of clear judicial obedience to a statutory requirement. The inference thereby arises that the courts are placing tighter constraints on executive autonomy than Parliament had envisaged.⁵⁴ The unpredictable nature of the relevancy test also creates difficulties from the perspective of legal certainty; a point graphically illustrated by the differing opinions of the Court of Appeal and House of Lords in Roberts.

Unlawful delegation of powers

It would, in contrast, seem quite uncontroversial to assert that the illegality doctrine should place limits on the power of a designated decision-maker to pass on certain of her legal powers to other bodies or individuals. In respect of the exercise of statutory powers, Parliament has, one assumes, given particular powers to particular people/bodies for particular reasons; such as, for example, their expertise in respect of the issue in question or their representative character. Should those powers in effect be exercised by some other body or individual, Parliament's wishes would clearly be frustrated.

The basic parameters of the rule against delegation are well illustrated in Ellis v Dubowski.⁵⁵ The Cinematograph Act 1909 had empowered county councils to impose conditions on the grant of licences to operate cinemas in their respective areas. Middlesex County Council's licensing conditions included a provision which banned the showing of any movie which had not been approved by the British Board of Film Censors. The High Court concluded that the provision was unlawful:

The condition sets up an authority whose ipse dixit is to control the exhibition of films. The effect is to transfer a power which belongs to the County Council... [A] condition putting the matter into the hands of a third person or body not possessed of statutory or constitutional authority is ultra vires.⁵⁶

The statutory scheme did permit the county council to delegate its powers to district councils, or to local magistrates. Nor would it be unlawful for the county council to have taken the BBFC's views about a particular film into account when deciding whether it could be shown in a local cinema. What it could not do, however, was grant the BBFC an effective power of veto on the issue.⁵⁷

The rule was applied with similar clarity in Allingham v Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries.⁵⁸ The Defence Regulations 1939 under which Mr Liversidge had been imprisoned had a far wider scope than dealing simply with potential enemies and saboteurs. Regulation 62 gave the Minister of Agriculture a sweeping power to control the cultivation of land, be it publicly or privately owned. Regulation 66 then empowered him to ⁵³ Ibid, at 729.

⁵⁴ A second weakness, which will become apparent in the following section, is that a case might be made for treating this ground of review as a facet of irrationality rather than illegality. ⁵⁵ [1921] 3 KB 621.

⁵⁶ Ibid, at 625.

⁵⁷ For a more recent illustration of precisely the same point see R v Greater London Council, ex p Blackburn [1976] 1 WLR 550, [1976] 3 All ER 184 CA. ⁵⁸ [1948] 1 All ER 780.

delegate his power to a local executive committee. In order to make its decisions more quickly, the committee in Bedfordshire then sub-delegated its power to one of its employees. Allingham was a local farmer, who challenged the instructions he had been given in respect of his land. The basis of his challenge was that the committee had no power to sub-delegate the powers it possessed as a delegate of the Minister.

The court accepted this contention, bringing it within the orthodox maxim of delegatus non potest delegare.⁵⁹ The committee had no statutory authority to allow others to carry out the tasks with which it had been entrusted. It would have been proper for the committee to allow its officers to make recommendations as to the use of land, and even for it to accord substantial weight to such recommendations in reaching its decisions. But each of those decisions had to be the product of its own collective mind.

*H Lavender & Son Ltd v Minister of Housing and Local Government*⁶⁰ illustrates the point that the rule against delegation works as readily between institutions as within them. Lavender had sought permission from its local council to extract gravel from a farm that it owned. When the council refused permission, Lavender exercised a right of appeal to the Minister of Housing and Local Government (MHLG). The Minister rejected the appeal, noting that as a matter of policy he would not approve such applications unless the Minister of Agriculture raised no objection to the proposal. The High Court concluded that this amounted to a de facto delegation of the MHLG's statutory powers to the Minister of Agriculture. While the MHLG was entitled to seek and consider the views of other Ministers, he was not entitled to bind himself to follow them. As Wills J characterised the situation:

It was the decision of the Minister of Agriculture not to waive his objection that was decisive in this case, and while that might properly prove to be the decisive factor for the MHLG... it seems to me quite wrong for a policy to be applied which in reality eliminates all the material considerations save only the consideration, when that is the case, that the Minister of Agriculture objects.⁶¹

The rule that a statutory body can only delegate its powers if it has clear statutory authorisation is complicated a little by the proposition that such authorisation need not have an explicit textual base, but can rather arise as a matter of necessary implication. The leading example is the House of Lords' judgment in Local Government Board v Arlidge.⁶² In that case it was considered permissible for the LGB to delegate its powers to hold inquiries concerning the closure of unfit properties to a senior official. The Court took the view that to hold otherwise would severely compromise the LGB's administrative efficiency. But the principle is not one of general application. In Barnard v National Dock Labour Board,⁶³ for example, the Court of Appeal refused to accept that the NDLB was empowered as a matter of necessary implication to delegate its powers to dismiss or suspend dock workers to a senior manager, notwithstanding the fact that such delegation would have saved the NDLB considerable time and expense.⁶⁴ The position is however rather different when one is dealing with the activities of a Minister of the Crown within her own department.

⁵⁹ A delegate has no power to delegate. ⁶⁰ [1970] 1 WLR 1231, [1970] 3 All ER 871.

⁶¹ [1970] 1 WLR 1231 1241. ⁶² [1915] AC 120, [1914–15] All ER Rep 1, HL.

⁶³ [1953] 2 QB 18, [1953] 1 All ER 1113, CA.

⁶⁴ The basis for the distinction is perhaps that while both cases concerned government interference with individual 'liberty' (ie the demolition of Arlidge's house and Barnard's dismissal from his job), the power at issue in Arlidge also required the LGB to take into account an obvious and immediate public interest, viz the structural safety and sanitary standards of the neighbourhood; see Viscount Dilhorne in Arlidge [1914–15] All ER Rep 1 at 6–7, HL. No such factors were relevant in Barnard. The inference would be that where a broad public interest in an issue clearly outweighs an individual interest, the requirement that delegation (if done

As noted in chapter nine, the convention of individual ministerial responsibility has undergone a significant change in the modern era. It is no longer presumed that a Minister is responsible—in the sense of being under a moral obligation to resign her office—for the failings of her department unless she was personally involved in the matter concerned. The scope of departmental activity has long been far too wide for such a rule to be practical.⁶⁵ This point did not escape the courts' attention when considering to what extent a Minister might lawfully 'delegate' her legal responsibilities.

The leading decision is Carltona v Works Commissioners.⁶⁶ The case arose from the Commissioners use of a power granted by reg 51 of the Defence Regulations 1939 to take possession of any land if it considered it necessary to do so in the interests of public safety or defence. That Parliament should grant any powers to this body was something of an oddity, since the Commissioners had no physical existence. Their powers were actually vested by statute in the Minister of Works and Planning. The notice requisitioning Carltona's property was issued by a senior civil servant in the Ministry of Works and Planning, and it was accepted that the Minister himself had not given any personal attention to the matter. Carltona thus contended that there had been an unlawful delegation of power. In the Court of Appeal, Lord Greene MR concluded that this argument was quite misplaced:

[T]he functions which are given to ministers (and constitutionally given to ministers because they are constitutionally responsible) are functions so multifarious that no minister could ever personally attend to them.... The duties imposed upon ministers and the powers given to ministers are normally exercised under the authority of the ministers by responsible officials of the department. Public business could not be carried on if that were not the case. Constitutionally, the decision of such an official is, of course, the decision of the Minister.⁶⁷

In the event that such delegation was inappropriate, Lord Greene considered that the proper remedy was for the Minister to be called to account on the floor of the Commons or Lords rather than in the courts.

Carltona tells us that, in effect, no delegation occurs in these circumstances. The official is not a delegate of the Minister, but is rather her 'alter ego'. The principle has been consistently applied by the courts.⁶⁸ It is not however without complications. Six years after Carltona, in Lewisham Metropolitan Borough and Town Clerk v Roberts, Lord Denning observed that:

Now I take it to be quite plain that when a Minister is entrusted with administrative as distinct from legislative functions he is entitled to act by any authorised official of his department. The Minister is not bound to give his mind to the matter personally. That is implicit in the modern machinery of government.... No question of agency or delegation... seems to me to arise at all.⁶⁹

This comment raised the possibility that the alter ego principle applied only to 'authorised' officials, which in turn suggests that in the absence of such authorisation, an unlawful delegation would have occurred. However, it was made clear in *R v Skinner*⁷⁰ that 'authorisation' could be a very informal affair. The defendant in Skinner appealed against his conviction for drink-driving on the basis that the Minister of Transport had unlawto promote administrative efficiency) requires clear statutory authorisation will be relaxed. But see further the discussion of the estoppel principle below.

⁶⁵ See 'IV. Individual ministerial responsibility', ch 9, p 278 above. ⁶⁶ [1943] 2 All ER 560, CA.

⁶⁷ Ibid, at 563. ⁶⁸ See generally Lanham D (1984) 'Delegation and the alter ego principle' LQR 587.

⁶⁹ [1949] 2 KB 608 at 621, CA. ⁷⁰ [1968] 2 QB 700, [1968] 3 All ER 124, CA.

fully delegated her statutory power to approve breath test devices of the type used on Skinner to a senior official. The argument did not attack Carltona as a general principle, but tried to maintain that in situations where a ministerial decision could impact upon the liberty of the individual, the Minister should act in person rather than through an alter ego. The court saw no legal merit in that contention. The judgment also made it clear that ‘authorisation’ need not be explicit, but could be found simply in the official’s conformity with the relevant department’s established administrative routines.⁷¹

That the legitimate reach of the alter ego principle can be very expansive is illustrated by the House of Lords’ decision in Oladehinde v Secretary of State for the Home Department.⁷² The case involved one of the most explicit of governmental interference’s with the liberty of the person; namely the power to deport foreign nationals who had overstayed their right to remain in the UK. Prior to the enactment of the Immigration Act 1988, the decision to deport had been taken in practice by a Senior Executive Officer within the Home Office. Following the passage of the Act, the Home Secretary expressly authorised a number of Immigration Inspectors to take the decision. Oladehinde’s counsel suggested that since the Immigration Inspectors were technically employed under statutory powers, and so were not part of the Home Office, they could not be brought within the alter ego principle. The House of Lords rejected this proposition, observing that whatever its precise legal status, the Immigration Inspectorate had in practice ‘evolved’ into the Home Office’s organisational structure over the years. Immigration Inspectors were comparable in seniority to the Home Office officials who had previously taken the deportation decision, and as such were appropriate figures to take those decisions after 1988. This supposition was further reinforced by the fact that the Act had explicitly required that the Home Secretary exercise certain powers in person, which raised the inference that there were no legislatively imposed limits on his/her capacity to devolve other parts of the process to his/her officials.

As Lanham has observed, the Carltona principle now has an expansive reach:

[T]he courts have moved a long way from the rule against delegation so far as powers vested in Ministers are concerned. Not only can persons other than the donee of the power actually exercise the power, there is little control either of the method of authorisation or the suitability of the person by whom the power is exercised.⁷³

This state of affairs undoubtedly oils the wheels of the administrative process within central government departments, increasing the speed and cutting the cost of decision-making. That is—in a narrow sense of the word—‘efficient’. One might however wonder if the cost of that efficiency is that some decisions are made by officials who may not be properly fitted to take them. Any suggestion that the courts have been insufficiently rigorous in policing the Carltona principle might obviously be rebutted by pointing out that an inapposite use of the alter ego principle can be questioned within Parliament. But, as suggested in chapter five, it is naive to assume that the Commons and Lords exercise much effective control over the minutiae of governmental decision-making.

Fettering of discretion

The rule against the fettering of discretion rests on the presumption that—except in situations where a clear statutory or common law rule obliges a government body to reach one and only one particular decision—decision-makers must give a reasoned consideration on an individuated basis as to how a power should be exercised or a duty discharged.

⁷¹ See the extracts from the cross-examination of the official concerned; ibid, at 705–706. For a similar analysis see Re Golden Chemical Products Ltd [1976] Ch 300.

⁷² [1991] 1 AC 254.

⁷³ Op cit p 611.

*R v LCC, ex p Corrie*⁷⁴ provides a straightforward application of the rule. The London Council (General Powers) Act 1890 s 14 gave the LCC a broadly framed power to make bye-laws regulating the use of its parks. The LCC subsequently passed a bye-law which prohibited the selling of any goods in its parks unless the vendor had previously sought and received the council's permission. In response to a concern that the parks were being used for undesirable commercial activities, the LC then resolved, without changing the bye-law, that no permissions would be granted in future. Corrie wished to sell pamphlets on behalf of a charity for the blind. Her application for permission to sell them was met with the response that, in accordance with the new resolution, no permissions would be granted in future. She then applied to the courts for a writ of mandamus to force the LCC to consider her application on its individual merits, rather than in conformity with its policy.

The court unanimously granted the writ. It concluded that the LCC had been charged with a 'judicial' function, which demanded that attention be given to the individual merits of each application. It also concluded that applicants derived a 'right' from the 1890 Act. This was not a right to receive permission, but to have their applications properly considered. The corollary of this right was that the council was under an obligation to consider each application for a permit on a case-by-case basis.

However, the rule against fettering does not preclude a government body forming strong presumptions as to the way in which discretionary powers should be exercised. In other words, while a government body may adopt a policy to structure the exercise of its powers, it may not adopt a rule which exactly controls the way they are used. This point was clearly expressed by Bankes LJ in R v Port of London Authority, ex p Kynoch Ltd:

There are on the one hand cases where a tribunal in the honest exercise of its discretion has adopted a policy, and without refusing to hear an applicant, intimates to him what its policy is, and that after hearing him it will in accordance with its policy decide against him, unless there is something exceptional in his case....[N]o objection could be taken to such a course. On the other hand there are cases where the tribunal has passed a rule...not to hear any application of a particular character by whomsoever made. There is a wide distinction to be drawn between these two classes.⁷⁵

This principle recognises that policy presumptions of this sort greatly ease the administrative process, in much the same way as the delegation of power within an organisation. The decision does of course raise the difficulty of deciding at what point a 'policy' has become so rigid that it mutates into a rule; the 'wide distinction' to which Bankes LJ alluded may on occasion be rather narrow.

The more recent House of Lords judgment in *British Oxygen Co Ltd v Minister of Technology*⁷⁶ confirms the broad thrust of the Kynoch doctrine, and might in some respects be seen as even more indulgent of administrative expediency. The Minister was empowered by s 1(1) of the Industrial Development Act 1966 to 'make to any person carrying on a business in Great Britain a grant towards approved capital expenditure...providing new machinery or plant'. In order to speed its decision-making process—by reducing the number of applications—the Ministry decided to institute a policy of not making grants for items valued at less than £25. British Oxygen, which had sought a grant for a great many gas cylinders costing £20 each, claimed that the 'policy' was de facto a rule, and so an unlawful fetter on the s 1 discretion. The House of Lords rejected this argument.

⁷⁴ [1918] 1 KB 68.

⁷⁵ [1919] 1 KB 176 at 184, CA.

⁷⁶ [1971] AC 610, [1970] 3 All ER 165, HL.

Having approved the ‘general principle’ outlined in Kynoch, Lord Reid (in the leading judgment for a unanimous court) observed that some statutory powers might legitimately be constrained by very tight policy choices:

I do not think that there is any great difference between a policy and a rule... [A] Ministry or large authority may have had to deal already with a multitude of similar applications and then they will almost certainly have evolved a policy so precise that it could well be called a rule. There can be no objection to that—provided the authority is always willing to listen to anyone with something new to say.⁷⁷

The point—alluded to in British Oxygen—that the legality of any structuring of discretion turned on the precise substance of the statutory power/duty in issue was firmly reinforced in A-G (ex rel Tilley) v Wandsworth London Borough Council.⁷⁸ The council was potentially under a duty to provide housing to families with children through one of two statutory routes. The first duty, under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, removed that responsibility if a family was ‘intentionally homeless’.⁷⁹ The second arose—more obliquely—under s 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963, which obliged local authorities ‘to make available such advice, guidance and assistance as may promote the welfare of children by diminishing the need to receive children into or keep them in [local authority] care’. In 1980, Wandsworth had adopted a policy, other than in exceptional cases, to refuse to offer housing to children and their families under the 1963 Act if the child’s parents were ‘intentionally homeless’ and so not entitled to housing under the 1977 Act. There was some dispute at trial as to whether or not the exceptions to the ‘policy’ were genuine. However the Court of Appeal (upholding the High Court) suggested that even a genuine policy (ie one that admitted of exceptions) would be an unlawful fetter in respect of this particular statutory provision. In Templeman LJ’s view:

I am not myself persuaded that even a policy resolution hedged about with exceptions would be entirely free from attack. Dealing with children, the discretion and powers of any authority must depend entirely on the different circumstances of each child before them for consideration.⁸⁰

Tilley does not undermine the general applicability of the British Oxygen rationale. It does however reinforce the point that the rationale is one of general and not universal application. There is no doubt a readily discernible qualitative distinction to be drawn between governmental powers that are premised squarely on an individuated issue (ie the best interests of a child) and those relating to a generic matter (ie applications for industrial grants). One might offer as a guiding principle in this area of the law the suggestion that the permissible rigidity of a policy will vary in accordance with the degree of individuation inherent in the power to which the policy is applied. The formula is essentially tautological however. This is perhaps an area of law where the question of how ‘rule-like’ a policy may be is best answered by extrapolation from case law dealing with closely analogous powers, rather than by application of more general principle.

⁷⁷ Ibid, at 171. Cf Viscount Dilhorne, ibid at 175: ‘It seems somewhat pointless and a waste of time that the Board should have to consider applications which are bound as a result of its policy to fail’. For a less indulgent approach see Eastleigh Borough Council v Betts [1983] 2 AC 613, [1983] 2 All ER 1111, HL.

⁷⁸ [1981] 1 WLR 854, [1981] 1 All ER 1162.

⁷⁹ For example because the family had been evicted from its former home because a parent had been in rent or mortgage arrears; see generally Loveland (1995) op cit.

⁸⁰ [1981] 1 WLR 854 at 858.

Estoppel

The problems posed by the doctrine of estoppel in public law also operate at several levels. The most acute difficulty is that presented by the factual scenario in Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries v Hulkin.⁸¹ Let us suppose that a government body, having misunderstood its statutory powers, grants a tenancy to an individual citizen in respect of land when it actually has no power to do so. To permit the tenancy to stand would require that we accept that the government body can act 'illegally', in the core sense of going beyond its legal powers. One might therefore assume that the 'tenancy' should be considered invalid. To hold otherwise would be to undermine the illegality principle, and so jeopardise both the sovereignty of Parliament and the rule of law in their orthodox senses. Yet this might work a substantial injustice on the 'tenant'. A 'tenant' who has acted in honest reliance on the government body's power to grant a tenancy may very well have taken such steps as giving up a former tenancy, changing her job, moving her children to new schools, or spending substantial sums on decoration or refurbishment of the property. Considerations of substantive fairness might then lead us to assume that the 'tenancy' should be upheld.⁸² But the position then becomes further complicated if we suggest that a third party's interests in the land concerned may be substantially compromised if the 'tenancy' is not invalidated.

In Hulkin, the Court of Appeal (per Lord Greene MR) had considered the matter easily resolved. Any injustice that might be done to an individual could not be invoked to sustain a substantively unlawful decision:

[Accepting] that the Minister had no power under the regulations to grant a tenancy, it is perfectly manifest to my mind that he could not by estoppel give himself such a power. The power given to an authority under a statute is limited to the four corners of the power given. It would entirely destroy the whole doctrine of ultra vires if it was possible for the donee to extend his power by creating an estoppel.⁸³

While obviously defensible in terms of its result, the reasoning informing Lord Greene MR's judgment is conceptually problematic from a constitutional law perspective. Hulkin's objective, to remain as a tenant, cannot be achieved by any 'extension' of the Minister's power. It is a trite point that the executive branch of the UK government has no law-making powers; its legal competence derives either from statute or common law. A Minister is no more able to extend her powers through estoppel than she is by scribbling in an additional section on a statute or announcing that she has found a new common law power. Hulkin therefore cannot succeed by estopping the Minister from 'revoking' the tenancy. The Minister cannot revoke something which she had no power to create. And even if we were to accept this flawed premise, judicial enforcement of an estoppel would not entail the Minister extending her powers, but the court doing so. An alternative characterisation of the case would be to suggest that in order to retain his 'tenancy', Hulkin would have to establish that the court was estopped from quashing the Minister's decision. This approach is however doubly flawed. The court has no pre-existing relationship with Hulkin in respect of the tenancy, and so could not be the subject of an estoppel. But more importantly, the court has no more power than a Minister to 'extend' the powers granted to the Minister by Parliament.⁸⁴ To win his case, in a manner that is compatible ⁸¹ (1948) unreported, CA, but discussed at length in Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries v Matthews [1950] 1 KB 148, [1994] 2 All ER 724.

⁸² If the grant of the tenancy was 'illegal'.

⁸³ Cited in Matthews [1950] 1 KB 148, at 154.

⁸⁴ Although it could of course, in the absence of statutory limitations to the contrary, create new powers at common law.

with orthodox notions of parliamentary sovereignty, the rule of law and the separation of powers, Hulkan must convince the court that the relevant statute⁸⁵ contains a provision to the effect that Parliament has instructed the courts that, in certain limited factual circumstances, they should recognise a government action as lawful even if, absent such circumstances, the action exceeds the ostensible limits of the Minister's powers.

One can offer very good reasons for assuming that a court would not embrace this approach. The imputation of such an intention to Parliament would be wholly inconsistent with orthodox principles of statutory interpretation; it would demand that the courts embrace a style of teleological construction which attached overriding importance to the avoidance of substantive injustice in certain situations. In addition to threatening orthodox notions of parliamentary sovereignty, such a strategy would raise acute problems of legal certainty. To which government acts would it apply? What criteria would an applicant have to meet to invoke it? There are thus very good 'constitutional law' explanations for Mr Hulkan not having his tenancy; but they have nothing to do with a Minister extending her powers.

The estoppel problem is much less intractable if it is not certain that binding a government body to uphold a particular course of action would result in an illegal decision. The plaintiff in *Robertson v Minister of Pensions*⁸⁶ had suffered what he claimed was a disability caused by a war-related injury. In seeking advice about his pension entitlements in respect of the injury,⁸⁷ he approached the Ministry of War. An official in that Ministry informed Mr Robertson unequivocally that the injury was attributable to his war service, and he was entitled to a pension. Acting in reliance on this statement, Mr Robertson did not take any steps to seek further, expert medical confirmation of the cause of his injury. Unbeknown to Mr Robertson, and evidently to the official at the Ministry of War, responsibility for making decisions on this question had been transferred by statute to the Ministry of Pensions some years earlier. The Ministry of Pensions subsequently ordered Mr Robertson to undergo a medical examination, on the basis of which it concluded that he was not eligible for a pension. That conclusion was then upheld by a pensions appeal tribunal, against whose decision Robertson appealed on a point of law to the High Court.

The factual gist of Mr Robertson's case was that had he sought a medical examination when he first approached the War Office, that examination would have supported his claim. His point in law was that the Ministry of Pensions was estopped from resiling from the Ministry of War's letter. Denning J decided in Mr Robertson's favour. His judgment rested on two grounds. The narrower basis of his judgment was that the War Office and the Ministry of Pensions were both part of the 'Crown': a representation or decision made by one department was therefore to be regarded as being made by any other department. This is in itself a curious conclusion, in so far as it seems to extend the alter ego principle used in the delegation cases discussed above from being just an intra-departmental device to being an inter-departmental device. The principle is difficult to reconcile with the later judgment in Lavender, for example. But Robertson is most often cited for Denning J's rather broader statement of principle, evidently as applicable to statutory bodies as to the Crown:

In my opinion, if a government department in its dealings with a subject takes it on itself to assume authority on a matter with which he is concerned, he is entitled to rely on it having ⁸⁵ Or the common law, if a prerogative power is in issue.

⁸⁶ [1949] 1 KB 227, [1948] 2 All ER 767.

⁸⁷ That entitlement hinged on the question of whether the disability was war-related.

the authority which it assumes. He does not know, and cannot be expected to know, the limits of its authority.⁸⁸

Lord Denning took the opportunity to reiterate that broad statement of principle in the Court of Appeal in Falmouth Boat Construction Co Ltd v Howell.⁸⁹ Moreover, his judgment intimated that the principle would stretch to cover government officials who had made decisions that they had no legal authority to make. However, in a manner with distinct echoes of his criticism of Denning's judgment in Magor and St Mellons,⁹⁰ Lord Simmonds flatly rejected the proposition when the case reached the House of Lords.⁹¹ Lord Simmonds began by restating the Hulkin principle: 'That which is prohibited cannot be lawfully done . . . , and if it cannot be lawfully done it cannot be the subject of a claim enforceable at law'.⁹² He then poured a substantial amount of jurisprudential cold water on Denning's Robertson principle:

My Lords, I know of no such principle in our law nor was any authority for it cited. The illegality of an act is the same whether or not the actor has been misled by an assumption of authority on the part of a government officer however high or low in the hierarchy.⁹³

This is a simple restatement of orthodox constitutional theory, and has compelling force in respect of decisions made in excess of the decision-makers' powers. But it has no obvious bearing on 'estoppel' situations where the citizen is attempting to bind an authority to a decision that would be lawful, but which for policy reasons the relevant authority decides it does not want to respect. For this reason, the High Court's judgment in *Southend-on-Sea Corpn v Hodgson (Wickford) Ltd*⁹⁴ is rather unsatisfactory. Hodgson had bought a property with a view to using it as a builder's yard. A senior official in the local authority had told them that the site had long been used for such purposes, and no planning permission was necessary for that use. It subsequently emerged that the official was mistaken. The local authority then decided not to grant planning permission, even though it was arguably entitled to do so as a matter of law. The High Court seemed to conclude that it was not possible in any circumstances for a government body to be bound by such a representation, on the basis that an estoppel would improperly fetter the exercise of its discretion. This seems an unnecessarily inflexible conclusion. A more sensible way to approach the issue might be to suggest that avoiding inflicting a substantial burden on a citizen who has relied in good faith on mistaken advice is a relevant consideration when the authority considers how to proceed. That concern should not determine the eventual outcome, since estopping the authority might work an injustice on third parties. On these facts, for example, it is quite likely that had Hodgson applied for planning permission, the application would have been opposed by neighbours, whose opinions may have led the council not to grant permission. If the council is bound by its official's mistake, the third parties are deprived of their entitlement to participate in the decision-making process and suffer the perhaps unwelcome presence of a builder's yard near their homes.

Yet the judicial pendulum seemed to swing too far in the other direction in the Court of Appeal's judgment in Lever Finance Ltd v Westminster (City) London Borough Council,⁹⁵ a case resting on facts very similar to those at issue in Hodgson. Denning suggested that, in practice, many planning authorities de facto delegated their powers to senior officers,

⁸⁸ [1949] 1 KB 227 at 232. ⁸⁹ [1950] 2 KB 16, [1950] 1 All ER 538, CA.

⁹⁰ See 'Purposive (or "teleological") interpretation', ch 3, pp 68–69 above.

⁹¹ [1951] AC 837. ⁹² Ibid, at 844.

⁹³ Ibid, at 845. See also Lord Normand at 849: 'But it is certain that neither a minister nor any subordinate officer of the Crown can by any conduct or representation bar the Crown from enforcing a statutory prohibition or entitle the subject to maintain that there was no breach of it'.

⁹⁴ [1962] 1 QB 416, [1961] 2 All ER 46. ⁹⁵ [1971] 1 QB 222, [1970] 3 All ER 496.

even though—until the passage of s 64 of the Planning Act 1968—they had not de jure been entitled to do so.⁹⁶ A citizen acting in good faith was thus entitled to assume that decisions taken by officials within the scope of their ‘ostensible authority’ would be binding. That this result might prejudice the interests of equally blameless third parties did not seem to enter into Lord Denning’s reasoning.⁹⁷

This principle was rejected by a differently constituted Court of Appeal in Western Fish Products Ltd v Penwith District Council.⁹⁸ The Court held that an authority could only be bound to respect a representation mistakenly made by one of its officers—if the representation led to a decision within the scope of its powers—in limited circumstances. The Court laid particular stress on the need for the citizen to establish that he/she had strong grounds for believing that the representee actually had the legal power to make the relevant decision. It also intimated that an estoppel should be upheld only if the outcome would not work an injustice on third parties.

The substantive problems raised by the estoppel scenario have continued to exercise the courts in recent years. However, the classification of the problems has undergone a change—even if their substantive content has remained unaltered. As we shall see in chapter fifteen, the Lever/Western Fish issue now tends to be seen as a facet of the procedural irregularity doctrine; a reclassification which perhaps offers greater scope for the kind of innovative solution discussed above to the constitutional problem posed by ‘illegal’ estoppels.⁹⁹

II. Irrationality

Like the ground of illegality, irrationality is concerned with the substantive content of a government decision. However, it is more readily regarded as being concerned with the political or moral rather than (in the strict sense) legal character of the decision concerned.¹⁰⁰

The formula used by Lord Diplock in GCHQ to define the irrationality doctrine might suggest that very few government decisions could be unlawful on this ground. In Lord Diplock’s view, irrationality only arose if a decision was:

...so outrageous in its defiance of logic or of accepted moral standards that no sensible person who had applied his mind to the question to be decided could have arrived at it.¹⁰¹

The test then is not simply that the decision defies logic or accepted moral standards; nor even that it defies these criteria to an outrageous extent; rather it requires the defiance to be so outrageous. This form of words is perhaps even more indulgent of executive autonomy on ‘moral’ grounds than Lord Greene MR’s phraseology in Wednesbury: ‘something ⁹⁶ The Carltona alter ego principle applies only to Ministers; it does not embrace non-ministerial government bodies.

⁹⁷ It is also difficult to characterise Lever Finance as an ‘ignorant citizen’ on these facts. It was, after all, a property development company, a body one might sensibly expect to be wholly familiar with the legal structure of the planning process. ⁹⁸ [1981] 2 All ER 204, CA.

⁹⁹ On the closely related principle of res judicata see: Re 56 Denton Road, Twickenham [1953] Ch 51, [1952] 2 All ER 799; Rootkin v Kent County Council [1981] 1 WLR 1186, Bradley A (1981) ‘Administrative justice and the binding effects of official acts’ Current legal Problems 1: Akehurst M (1982) ‘Revocation of administrative decisions’ Public Law 613.

¹⁰⁰ For a more sophisticated account, which breaks the ground down into several discrete sub-heads, see Walker P (1995) ‘What’s wrong with irrationality’ Public Law 556.

¹⁰¹ [1985] AC 374 at 410–411, HL.

so absurd that no sensible person could ever dream that it lay within the powers of the authority'.¹⁰²

Irrationality and 'the merits' of a governmental decision

It is often suggested that in applying the irrationality test the court has no concern with the substantive merits of the decision being challenged. That is a rather unfortunate and misleading characterisation however. The irrationality test certainly does not permit a court to impose its own preferred solution on the decision-making body. But the court is concerned to establish if the substantive decision has any merit at all. If the decision lacks that quality entirely, it will be unlawful. In that limited sense, the irrationality test is concerned with the political merits of government decisions.

A local authority—empowered by statute to employ teachers on such terms as it thinks fit—which refused to employ a teacher because she had red hair would be making an obviously irrational decision. But one which decided to employ only teachers with Master's degrees, or more than five years previous teaching experience, would not be acting irrationally, even if many other authorities set much less exacting standards. If irrationality is construed in this expansive way, it is easy to see why the policies in issue in such cases as Kruse v Johnson,¹⁰³ or *Wednesbury*¹⁰⁴ itself, did not come within the test. The council's policies in each of those cases may have struck many observers as misguided, or ineffective, or just plain stupid; but those characteristics, singly or in combination, do not amount to the extreme departure from logic or prevailing moral standards that the Diplock/Greene tests seemingly require.

Seen in this way, irrationality as a ground of review rests on a presumption that in a politically pluralist society it is entirely probable that different governmental decision-makers could quite properly produce significantly, even markedly different responses to a particular situation.¹⁰⁵ It is only when a given response oversteps the range of permissible responses that the decision-maker will have produced an irrational decision. This rationale has particular force when the governmental decision in issue has been made under a statutory provision which is couched in terms such as 'the Minister may attach such terms and conditions as she thinks fit' or 'the Minister may make such provision as she considers reasonable'. Parliament's use of such discretion-laden formulae is a statutory recognition that legislators do not expect the application of the statutory provision to lead to a particular outcome. The irrationality principle can thus be presented in an abstract, political sense as a constitutional device which requires the courts to accept that the boundaries of moral consensus within which government bodies are confined are very broad in substantive terms.

¹⁰² [1948] 1 KB 223 at 229, CA. Although one might suggest that subsequent commentators have overlooked Lord Greene MR's use of the word 'dream', rather than for example 'consider' or 'conclude'. Departures from normality are an integral element of dreams; irrationality would presumably then only arise if the content of the decision lay not just in, but at the extreme edge of the realm of fantasy.

¹⁰³ A ban on playing loud musical instruments in residential areas; see 'IV. The role of the judiciary', ch 10, pp 311–313 above.

¹⁰⁴ Excluding children from the cinema on Sunday mornings; see 'IV. The role of the judiciary', ch 10, pp 311–313 above.

¹⁰⁵ This may arise in either a sequential sense—ie to allow successive governments to adjust policy without having to persuade the Commons and Lords to pass a new Bill; and/or a simultaneous sense ie to allow different bodies (especially local authorities) to pursue different policies at the same time.

Mis-using the irrationality test? Coming too close to the 'merits' of a governmental decision

From that perspective, the House of Lords' conclusion in *Roberts v Hopwood*¹⁰⁶ that Poplar's wages policy was irrational as well as illegal is difficult to defend. That a decision is illegal does not mean that it is also irrational. A decision-maker might after the most careful and sensible consideration of a particular course of action proceed on the basis of a misunderstanding of her legal powers. That may be unlawful, but it is a mistake that could be made by the most prudent of persons. But it is extremely difficult to sustain the argument that a decision is irrational if it enjoys widespread support. Poplar's wage policy undoubtedly enjoyed such support among local voters. To conclude that the substance of the policy was per se irrational thus demands that we conclude that the Labour Party's supporters at the local elections had all taken leave of their senses. Collective hysteria is, admittedly, not an unknown phenomenon. But the courts might be venturing into rather dangerous political territory if they were explicitly to maintain that a widely-held belief amounted to an outrageous defiance of accepted moral standards.¹⁰⁷ That danger is that in adopting a narrow understanding of the boundaries of political consensus, the courts confine the limits of governmental power much more tightly than Parliament intended and so undermine the sovereignty of Parliament.

The opinions offered in the Court of Appeal in Roberts seem more satisfactory on this point. Scrutton LJ approached the question of irrationality in the light of the principle of 'benevolent interpretation' propounded by Lord Russell in Kruse v Johnson. Poplar's wages were undoubtedly in excess of market equivalents, in some instances substantially so. Such wages might have been irrational if fixed by a non-elected body. But the fact that the council was a representative assembly lent the concept of irrationality an additionally expansive character; it was therefore a test which a council was unlikely to fail.

Yet one can also point to cases in which the courts have explicitly accepted the 'benevolent interpretation' rationale but still invoked irrationality to invalidate government decisions which would appear to have a plausible basis. One such case is the Court of Appeal's decision in Hall & Co Ltd v Shoreham-by-Sea UDC.¹⁰⁸ Hall had sought planning permission to develop a plot of land close to a main road for industrial purposes. Councils were empowered by the Town and Country Planning Act 1947, s 14 to grant permission unconditionally or 'subject to such conditions as they think fit'. When approving Hall's application, the council required that the company also provide an ancillary access road, open to public traffic, which would reduce the prospect of delays being caused on the main road. Hall contended, inter alia, that the condition was irrational, as it imposed on the company the burden of building and maintaining what was in effect a public highway. The High Court rejected this argument, concluding that the condition obviously bore a sensible relation to legitimate planning concerns.¹⁰⁹

This judgment was reversed in the Court of Appeal.¹¹⁰ Willmer LJ's judgment accepted that; '[planning] conditions imposed by a local authority, like byelaws, should be benevolently construed, and in this connection I would venture to follow the same approach as Lord Russell of Kilowen CJ in Kruse v Johnson'.¹¹¹ He also accepted that the 'objective' that the planning condition was intended to achieve was 'a perfectly reasonable one'. However, while the objective was acceptable, the means chosen to achieve it were not. This was ¹⁰⁶ See 'IV. The role of the judiciary' ff, ch 10, pp 311–313 above.

¹⁰⁷ It must be stressed that the level of popular support for a particular policy has no bearing at all on the policy's legality; that is a technical matter which only judges are competent to determine.

¹⁰⁸ [1964] 1 WLR 240, CA.

¹⁰⁹ (1963) 61 LGR 508.

¹¹⁰ [1964] 1 WLR 240.

¹¹¹ Ibid, at 245.

evidently because the condition imposed an unduly onerous burden on the plaintiffs. The objective would more appropriately be achieved by the council building a new public highway itself. This reasoning is difficult to support. One might accept that there were several 'better' ways for the council to achieve its planning objectives. That does not per se mean that the method actually chosen was irrational.

A similar rationale was deployed by the High Court in *R v Hillingdon London Borough Council, ex p Royco Homes Ltd.*¹¹² The council had attached several conditions to the granting of planning permission for Royco's proposed housing application. One condition required that the houses be offered to people on the council's own housing waiting list. The court held that the condition was irrational because it 'requir[ed] the applicants to take on at their own expense a significant part of the duty of the council as a housing authority'.¹¹³

Widgery LJ's own analysis would suggest that both Hall and Royco might better be classified as illegality cases, consistent in effect with a narrow construction of Congreve. In both cases the council was essentially levying a tax on the applicants, through the indirect route of demanding that they provide a substantial public service as the price of being granted planning permission.¹¹⁴

A 'better' application of the test

Two rather more satisfactory applications of the irrationality doctrine have latterly been offered by the House of Lords in *Brind v Secretary of State for the Home Department*¹¹⁵ and by the Court of Appeal in R v Ministry of Defence, ex p Smith.¹¹⁶ The Brind litigation was provoked by the government's efforts to address the problem of terrorism in Northern Ireland. The government formed the opinion that the terrorists' causes would be hindered if the radio and television media were not permitted to broadcast statements made by members of terrorist organisations or by members of political parties which the government designated as supportive of such groups. The ban extended however only to the speaker's actual voice; her words could be quoted verbatim by reporters, or, as frequently happened, dubbed by actors. Prime Minister Thatcher evidently believed the measure would deprive terrorists of the 'oxygen of publicity'.¹¹⁷ The Home Secretary assumed he could impose the ban on the IBA¹¹⁸ under the powers granted to him by the Broadcasting Act 1981, s 29:

... the Secretary of State may at any time by notice in writing require the authority to refrain from broadcasting any matter or classes of matter specified in the notice.¹¹⁹

Brind was a journalist who considered that the ban was ultra vires s 29, and thus unlawfully infringed free expression. He based his arguments on several grounds. The first is considered here. The others are addressed at a later stage. Brind firstly contended that ¹¹² [1974] QB 720. ¹¹³ Ibid, at 732.

¹¹⁴ Cf Willmer LJ in Hall [1964] 1 WLR 240 at 249: '[the condition] amounts in effect to a requirement that the plaintiffs shall dedicate the ancillary road when it is built to the public'. ¹¹⁵ [1991] 1 All ER 720.

¹¹⁶ [1996] QB 517, [1996] 1 All ER 257, CA.

¹¹⁷ Extracts from the speech made by Douglas Hurd, then Home Secretary, when explaining the ban to the Commons are reproduced in Lord Ackner's opinion at 729. Interestingly (since the case preceded Pepper v Hart), Lord Ackner did not seem to think that this reference to Hansard was precluded by parliamentary privilege or Art 9 of the Bill of Rights.

¹¹⁸ The Independent Broadcasting Authority, the body responsible for regulating commercial television and radio services.

¹¹⁹ In respect of the BBC, the Home Secretary assumed that he could issue the ban under cl 13(4) of the BBC's licensing agreement with the government, which provided that: 'The Secretary of State may from time to time... require the Corporation to refrain... from sending any matter or matters of any class...'

the ban was irrational. The Court saw little merit in that argument. Lord Bridge thought it was 'impossible' to reach that conclusion: 'In any civilised country the defeat of the terrorist is a public interest of the highest importance. . . . What is perhaps surprising is that the restriction is of such limited scope'.¹²⁰

Similarly, Lord Ackner considered it entirely understandable that the government had concluded that terrorists enhanced their legitimacy by appearing on television and radio. There is little scope for disagreeing with this dismissal of the irrationality point. The test applies only to ludicrously illogical or morally outrageous decisions. The government's decision in Brind seems well within the range of views that reasonable people might hold. The policy may indeed have been ill-advised, and was probably counterproductive, but ineffectiveness and a lack of wisdom do not amount to irrationality.

The government policy at issue in *Smith*¹²¹ was the long-standing practice that people of homosexual sexual orientation were not permitted to serve in the United Kingdom's armed forces. The prohibition applied simply on grounds of abstract sexual orientation; there was no requirement that the orientation manifest itself in any tangible way. Nor could the prohibition be overcome by a particular soldier's service record; even the most exemplary of recruits would be discharged from the service if it became known that he/she was not heterosexual. The justification for the policy, which was implemented through the government's prerogative powers, was that the presence of known homosexuals in the armed forces would compromise military efficiency, expose young recruits to sexual exploitation, and cause difficulties in the context of the communal living arrangements which the armed forces used.

Like the applicant in Brind, Smith contended that the policy was unlawful on several grounds. At this juncture, we consider only the irrationality argument. Smith's counsel contended that one might marshal several arguments to suggest that the policy was ill-advised and unnecessary. A soldier's sexual orientation was not a bar to military service in several other NATO and Commonwealth countries, which would suggest that military effectiveness was not compromised by employing gay men and lesbians. Similarly, within the United Kingdom, gay men and lesbians were permitted to work in the police and fire services; both of which were professions in which co-operative work was essential. It also seemed beyond dispute that—especially during World War II—a great many openly gay men had served with conspicuous distinction in the army, navy and air force. If their presence did not, under those most acute of circumstances, compromise military efficiency, how could the presence of non-heterosexual servicemen do so in the present day?

These might all be regarded as perfectly valid arguments, and in combination would suggest there was much to be said in favour of altering the policy. It also seems evident that both the High Court and Court of Appeal in Smith found them to be convincing.¹²² As Lord Bingham put it, this shift in public and professional attitudes had a significant bearing on the defensibility of the government's policy:

I regard the progressive development and refinement of public and professional opinion at home and abroad . . . as an important feature of this case. A belief which represented unquestioned orthodoxy in Year X, may have become questionable by Year Y, and unsustainable by Year Z.¹²³

But mustering a plausible, even a strong argument in favour of changing a governmental policy has no obvious bearing on whether or not that policy is irrational. The pertinent ¹²⁰ Ibid, at 724.

¹²¹ [1996] QB 517, CA.

¹²² For further discussion see Norris M (1996) 'Ex p Smith: irrationality and human rights' Public Law 590.

¹²³ [1996] QB 517 at 554.

test is whether there is some plausible argument in favour of the policy. In respect of the ban on gay men and lesbians serving in the armed forces, that proviso seemed to be met. The Minister could point to the fact that in both 1986 and 1991 the ban had been reconsidered by the Commons Defence Select Committee; on both occasions the Committee recommended its retention.¹²⁴ He had also conducted a survey of opinion within the armed services, which revealed widespread opposition to any removal of the ban. These reinforcements of the government's view precluded the finding that the policy was irrational: 'The threshold of irrationality is a high one. It was not crossed in this case'.¹²⁵ In Lord Bingham MR's chronological scheme, Smith was discharged in 'Year Y', and not 'Year Z'.¹²⁶

Smith raises an important issue of what—for want of a better term—we might call common law policy. The Minister's survey of opinion in the armed forces revealed that much opposition to removing the ban was rooted in violent and bigoted beliefs. Illustrative of this point are comments such as:

If a homosexual was on board he will have an accident waiting for him when no-one is looking... [Royal Naval able seaman]

I would never serve in a unit where a known homosexual is serving and I like many others would quite happily smash their faces in if I found any in my unit... [Corporal, Royal Signals Service]

I would not give first aid to a homosexual under any circumstances [RAF Senior Aircraftsman].¹²⁷

The question of principle which then arises is whether the presumption that a government decision which enjoys appreciable levels of public support cannot be irrational should be rebutted if that support is premised on bigoted opinion? In this context, the 'red hair' scenario is an unhelpful analytical tool. One assumes that a ban on redheads serving in the army would be bigoted in a moral sense and also irrational in the legal sense. Yet that particular policy is hardly one that will attract widespread approval. The court would thus be spared the difficulty of deciding how a widely held belief could amount to an 'outrageous defiance of accepted moral standards'. If the government and members of the armed forces and the great majority of the public were to be seized with anti-red haired sentiment, however, it is difficult to conclude that a ban on redheads would be irrational.

A court would enter problematic constitutional territory if it were to assume that 'rationality' must have an objective meaning, irrespective of how widely approved a particular policy may be. Judicial excursions of that sort do perhaps take the common law too close to the moral/political merits of a decision. This is not to say that the decision must therefore be lawful; it may still fail the tests of illegality or procedural fairness. But these tests of course relate to (and here our terminology necessarily becomes rather obscure) the esoteric, legal merits of the decision; not to its exoteric, moral merits. The argument that the courts might legitimately approach that second category of the merits more closely than the irrationality doctrine permits has however been a lively one since 1985, when Lord Diplock suggested in GCHQ that the doctrine of 'proportionality' might soon come to play a role in English administrative law.

¹²⁴ The Court did not address the question—mooted in chapter five—of whether one could plausibly consider Conservative dominated select committees to have been willing and able to form a view independently of the Thatcher and Major governments' wishes on a matter like this.

¹²⁵ [1996] QB 517 at 558, per Lord Bingham.

¹²⁶ Intriguingly however, Lord Bingham MR did indicate that we might have moved from Year Y to Year Z in the two years between Smith being discharged and the Court delivering its opinion; ibid., at 266.

¹²⁷ The quotes are taken from a report in The Guardian, 5 March 1996.

III. Proportionality—a new ground of review?

By the mid-1980s, the proportionality principle was an established feature in the administrative law of several of the UK's partner countries within the EC. It was also, more pertinently, an integral part of the so-called general principles of Community law established by the ECJ.¹²⁸ This meant that whenever the UK courts were addressing the legality of government action within the area of Community competence, the doctrine would provide an additional substantive ground of review.

Bringing the courts closer to the 'merits' of a decision

There is no entirely straightforward way to define the principle. But some indication of its scope can be gleaned from consideration of the cases in which it has been applied by the ECJ. A useful example is offered in Bela-Mühle Josef Bergmann KG v Grows-Farm GmbH & Co KG.¹²⁹ The case concerned a regulation passed by the Council for the purpose of reducing the vast over-supply of skimmed milk powder in the Community. The regulation attempted to compel farmers to use animal feed derived from skimmed milk powder rather than soya. Soya-based feeds were however only one-third of the price of the milk products. The legality of the regulation was successfully challenged, on the basis that it imposed far too onerous a burden on farmers, and was thus a disproportionate measure.

The principle is as readily applicable to the actions of Member States as to Community institutions. Re Watson and Belmann,¹³⁰ concerned an attempt by the Belgian government to establish that Treaty Art 48(3) entitled it to deport workers from other Member States if they had failed to comply with administrative requirements to register their presence with the local police. The ECJ accepted that Member States had a legitimate interest in keeping accurate records of non-national workers. It also accepted that a registration requirement was a lawful means to pursue this end, and that imposing punishments on workers who failed to register was an appropriate way to enforce the requirement. However it also concluded that deportation was too serious a punishment to apply to workers who failed to register. A fine would be the proportionate response in such circumstances.

As Steiner notes in reviewing this strand of the EC's case law, proportionality: 'puts the burden on an administrative authority to justify its actions and requires some consideration of alternatives. In this respect, it is a more rigorous test than one based on reasonableness'.¹³¹ In other words, the test requires that the court looks much more closely at the political merits of a decision than it does under the irrationality doctrine.

To re-use the terminology deployed above in respect of irrationality, we might also express the concept by suggesting that proportionality review can be presented in an abstract, political sense as a constitutional device which requires the courts to accept that the boundaries of moral consensus within which government bodies are confined are discernibly less broad in substantive terms than those which apply to respect of irrationality-based review.

¹²⁸ The leading critique is offered by Jowell J and Lester A (1988) 'Proportionality: neither novel nor dangerous', in Jowell J and Oliver D (eds) New directions in judicial review. See for example Hartley T (4th edn, 1998) The foundations of European Community law ch 5; Craig P and de Burca G (2nd edn, 1998) EU Law pp 349–357; de Burca G (1993) 'The principle of proportionality and its application in EC law' YEL 105.

¹²⁹ Case 114/76: [1977] ECR 1211, ECJ; popularly known as the 'Skimmed milk powder case'.

¹³⁰ Case 118/75: [1976] ECR 1185, ECJ.

¹³¹ (3rd edn, 1992) EC law p 58.

In its Community law manifestation, the proportionality test imposes a more substantively intrusive (than irrationality) ground of judicial review on government action by requiring the court to undertake a structured, multi-stage examination of the content of the decision under challenge. Firstly, the court must ask if the government body is acting in pursuit of a legitimate objective. If the answer is 'No', the action is unlawful. If the answer is 'Yes', the court will then consider if attaining that legitimate objective necessarily demands that the body interfere with a presumptively lawful entitlement possessed by an individual or company. Again, if the answer is 'No', the action is unlawful. If the answer is again 'Yes', the court will ask itself, thirdly if the government body has chosen the means to achieve its legitimate end which interferes as little as possible with the presumptive entitlements. Only if the answer to that final question is also 'Yes' will the governmental decision have survived proportionality review.

Many of the government actions we have considered against the irrationality principle would no doubt pass a proportionality test. In Wednesbury, for example, the council's legitimate aim would be to encourage children to go to church or play sports on Sunday mornings. This interferes both with the children's entitlement to attend the cinema, and the cinema owners' entitlement to sell its seats. But the interference is a modest one. Had the prohibition extended throughout the weekend, it would most likely have failed a proportionality test, but still passed muster against the yardstick of irrationality. Similarly, in Kruse v Johnson, proportionality would demand that a breach of the bye-law merited only a modest fine. A large fine, while not necessarily irrational, would probably be disproportionate. Relatedly, one might sensibly conclude that the policy at issue in Brind would not have been disproportionate. The Home Secretary's interference with Brind's capacity to do his job as a television reporter was so trivial in scope that it is hard to imagine a less restrictive way for the government to pursue its legitimate aim of depriving terrorist supporters of publicity.

Smith raises rather different issues. In so far as the government's policy was pandering to bigotry among service personnel, it would not have been pursuing a legitimate aim. As such, it would have fallen at the first stage of the test. And if the aim was the legitimate one of safeguarding operational efficiency, that might have better been achieved by a policy forbidding inappropriate sexual behaviour than one proscribing particular sexual orientations.

A new understanding of the separation of powers?

Proportionality could thus be seen as constitutionally problematic in both a substantive and jurisdictional sense. The substantive problem arises because proportionality might be characterised as something close to an appellate jurisdiction, which requires courts to substitute their own views of the best way for a government body to achieve a particular objective for that of the designated decision-maker. The second problem arises because appellate jurisdiction is a statutory rather than common law creation. For the courts to modify the common law to produce a new ground of review which came close, in de facto terms, to giving the judiciary an appellate jurisdiction would in a functional if not formal sense amount to a usurpation of legislative power.

These objections were forcefully stated by several members of the House of Lords in Brind, in which the plaintiff had invoked proportionality as a second ground of challenge to the Home Secretary's action. As suggested above, it seems unlikely that the policy would have failed a proportionality test. But for the majority of the Court, this was not a question that ought even to be asked. Lord Roskill—having referred to Lord Diplock's suggestion in GCHQ that proportionality might some day emerge as a new ground of review—continued:

I am clearly of the view that the present is not a case in which the first step can be taken for the reason that to apply that principle in the present case would be for the court to substitute its own judgment of what was needed to achieve a particular objective for the judgment of the Secretary of State upon whom that duty has been laid by Parliament.¹³²

For the same reason, Lord Ackner concluded that: ‘there appears to me to be at present no basis upon which the proportionality doctrine . . . can be followed by the courts of this country’.¹³³ Lord Lowry was equally forceful: ‘[T]here can be very little room for judges to operate an independent judicial review proportionality doctrine in the space which is left between the conventional judicial review doctrine and the admittedly forbidden appellate approach’.¹³⁴

These objections are not compelling. Notwithstanding their Lordships’ sentiments to the contrary, proportionality does not by any means demand that the court adopts an essentially appellate jurisdiction. Properly construed, irrationality is such a lax test that there should be plenty of legitimate jurisprudential scope for the courts to place further limits on the political merits of government decisions without setting themselves up as appellate tribunals. The only reason for assuming that no such scope exists is if the courts are actually misapplying the irrationality doctrine, and using it improperly as a device to sail unacceptably close to the detailed political merits of government decisions: to move any closer to the merits from that position would, of course, be to assume a de facto appellate jurisdiction.

There is some indication that this has indeed happened on occasion. Hall v Shoreham UDC is perhaps the most obvious example of this, in so far as the Court explicitly labelled the council’s policy as irrational because there were ‘better’ ways (ie methods that impacted much less heavily on the applicant) for the council to achieve its policies. Jowell and Lester’s influential analysis of the proportionality issue also suggests that Congreve and Bromley v GLC can be explained in a similar way. This suggestion perhaps rather blurs the issue, as both cases could readily be defended as instances of the courts using a quite narrow application of the illegality doctrine.

More helpfully, Jowell and Lester identify cases in which the courts seem quite openly to have advocated use of a proportionality test. The most regularly cited illustration of this point is the Court of Appeal’s judgment in R v Barnsley Metropolitan Borough Council, ex p Hook.¹³⁵ Hook was a stallholder in Barnsley market, whose licence was terminated by the council after he became involved in an abusive altercation with two council street cleaners who had admonished him for urinating in the street.¹³⁶ In attempting to sanction Mr Hook for this behaviour, the council was presumably pursuing a legitimate end, whether it be safeguarding its employees from threatening abuse or encouraging stallholders to respect rudimentary standards of hygiene. Lord Denning nonetheless intimated that the sanction was excessive:

So in this case, if Mr Hook did misbehave, I should have thought the right thing would have been to take him before the magistrates under the bye-laws, when some small fine should

¹³² [1991] 1 AC 696 at 750

¹³³ Ibid, at 763.

¹³⁴ Ibid, at 767.

¹³⁵ [1976] 1 WLR 1052, [1976] 3 All ER 452, CA. Jowell and Lester also cite R v Brent London Borough Council, ex p Assegai (1987) Times, 18 June.

¹³⁶ Curiously, most references to the case tend to omit the abusive altercation, which is perhaps a more serious matter than peeing in the gutter.

have been inflicted. It is quite wrong that the Barnsley Council should inflict upon him the grave penalty of depriving him of his livelihood. That is a far more serious penalty than anything the magistrates could inflict.¹³⁷

One might plausibly argue that the sanction was not disproportionately severe, given the undesirability of market traders spraying their urine over the streets and verbally abusing the council employees responsible for cleaning up the mess. Herein lies the practical difficulty of the proportionality doctrine; namely that it requires courts to invalidate decisions that many observers might consider quite sensible.

It is hardly surprising that many judges, unlike Lord Denning, might cavil at admitting so candidly that they are placing tight restrictions on the range of politically meritorious decisions that government bodies may lawfully make. Nonetheless, the requirement that proportionality be applied by UK courts in matters raising questions of EC law creates an obvious inconsistency in domestic administrative law, in both jurisdictional and substantive terms. Proportionality would thus have seemed another good candidate to be caught up in the ‘ripple effect’ of EC law. However as we shall see in subsequent chapters, the courts have latterly been spared the difficulty of taking the step that Lord Diplock canvassed in GCHQ by a legislative initiative promoted by the Blair government.

Conclusion

It is readily apparent that the substantive grounds of review comprise a fluid area of administrative law. This is not just because, in the broader sense, wholly new common law grounds of review may gradually emerge. It is also because the boundaries of long-established grounds are themselves somewhat unpredictable in scope. These characteristics are not however unique to the substantive grounds of review. As suggested in the following chapter, much the same argument might be made in respect of the procedural grounds of review.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Browne-Wilkinson, Lord (1992) ‘The infiltration of a Bill of Rights’ Public Law 397

Jowell J and Lester A (1988) ‘Proportionality: neither novel nor dangerous’, in Jowell J and Oliver D (eds) New directions in judicial review

de Burca G (1993) ‘The principle of proportionality and its application in EC law’ YEL 105

Walker P (1995) ‘What’s wrong with irrationality’ Public Law 556

Lanham D (1984) ‘Delegation and the alter ego principle’ LQR 587

Case law and legislation

Roberts v Hopwood [1925] AC 578

Congreve v Home Office [1976] QB 379

¹³⁷ [1976] 1 WLR 1052 at 1057–1058, CA. The case was actually decided in Mr Hook’s favour on grounds of a procedural irregularity

R v Ministry of Defence, ex p Smith [1996] QB 517

R v Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, ex p World Development Movement Ltd [1995] 1 WLR 386

Carltona v Works Comrs [1943] 2 All ER 560

British Oxygen Co Ltd v Minister of Technology [1971] AC 610

Western Fish Products Ltd v Penwith District Council [1981] 2 All ER 204

Chapter 15

Procedural Grounds of Judicial Review

One might intuitively wonder what useful purpose is served by subjecting governmental action to a ground of judicial review concerned not with the content or substance of a given decision, but with the way the decision was made. If the outcome of the decision-making process was neither illegal nor irrational, it would be entirely possible for the government body whose decision was unlawful because of a procedural flaw to remake the decision, correcting its procedural error, and to produce precisely the same substantive result as before. It may be thought that all that is thereby achieved is to slow down and increase the cost of government decision-making, while simultaneously embroiling the courts in fruitless litigation. Two forceful arguments can be asserted to rebut this proposition.¹

The first argument speaks to the instrumental value of a concern with procedural standards. It would maintain that there is a linkage between the substance of a decision and the way in which the decision is made. An insistence on a particular type of procedure may enhance the likelihood that the content of the decision is not just legal/rational in the narrow sense, but that it represents—if not the best choice—then at least a good choice within the range of alternatives open to the government body. There is no cast-iron guarantee that this happy state of affairs would be achieved, but there is a fair probability that this would occur.

The second argument concerns the intrinsic value of fair procedures. In a narrow vein, this argument would maintain that individuals intimately affected by a particular decision will be more likely to accept its legitimacy if they consider that they have been treated with a sufficient degree of seriousness and respect by the relevant decision-maker. More broadly, it might be thought that we all as citizens are more likely to accept the legitimacy of the governmental process if government decision-makers are known to be prevented from acting in arbitrary or capricious ways.

Within the Anglo-American political and legal tradition, the paradigmatic example of procedural fairness is perhaps provided by the criminal trial in respect of a serious crime.

¹ See Richardson G (1986) 'The duty to give reasons: potential and practice' Public Law 437; Craig P (2nd edn, 1989) Administrative law ch 7; Craig P (1994) 'The common law, reasons and administrative justice' Cambridge LJ 282–302. For a sophisticated analysis in the American administrative law context see Mashaw J (1976) 'The Supreme Court's due process calculus for administrative adjudication in Matthews v Eldridge...' University of Chicago LR 28.

It might be thought that in respect of this particular facet of governmental decision-making the most rigorous of procedural standards should apply. This would include such factors as the accused knowing in great detail the nature of the case against her; that she be given ample time to prepare her own arguments; that she be afforded the assistance of expert legal advisers; that she or her counsel be permitted to cross-examine prosecution witnesses and to call witnesses of her own; that there be stringent rules concerning the admissibility of evidence; and that the jury (which would decide guilt or innocence) and the judge (who would preside over the trial and if necessary impose a sentence) would approach their tasks without any pre-existing personal or political bias inclining them towards a guilty verdict. The trial process is distinctly 'red light' in nature, designed to offer substantial protection to the interests of the accused (ie in her continued liberty) against governmental interference.

Such stringent procedures are intended to maximise the possibility that the decision-making process produces the 'correct' outcome. But it is readily apparent that the criminal trial demands extremely heavy investment in time and money. The process is expensive and slow. It would hardly seem feasible to subject all aspects of governmental decision-making processes to such a rigorous procedural regime. And as the scope of governmental intervention in economic or social affairs increases, so the need to distance the conduct of much governmental decision-making from this idealised procedural regime becomes more acute.

That prosaic concern is reinforced by more abstract considerations deriving from the notion of the separation of powers. The determination of guilt in a criminal trial is manifestly a 'judicial' function, in which the court's responsibility is to make a finding as to the precise merits of the issue before it. Since much governmental decision-making has been entrusted by Parliament to the executive rather than the judiciary, it can readily be presumed that there is no legislative expectation that it conform to judicial models. Nonetheless, executive decisions can impact substantially upon questions of great importance to individual citizens. Liversidge's detention by Sir John Anderson is an obvious example of this, as is the Inland Revenue Commissioners' seizure of Rossminster's files and papers. Much executive action is, in contrast, dealing with ostensibly rather trivial issues. One might intuitively suppose that this notion of there being a 'hierarchy of rights' in terms of the substantive impact of government decisions would also be reflected in common law requirements imposing varying levels of procedural rigour on the particular decision in issue.

English law on the question of procedural fairness (or as the issue was traditionally styled, 'natural justice') is essentially concerned with striking a balance between these competing considerations. This area of administrative law is generally accepted to be divisible into two distinct parts. The first is often referred to under the Latin maxim audi alteram partem; the literal translation is that 'the other side must be heard', and is generally taken to mean that a person affected by a governmental decision should be afforded some opportunity to present his/her case to the decision-maker and that she should be given a reasonably clear indication of the case that may be made against her. The second, often referred to under the label nemo iudex sua causa (literally—'no-one shall be judge in her own cause'), addresses the question of to what extent it is permissible for a decision-maker to have—or to be suspected to have—a personal bias in respect of a decision she has made.

This chapter explains the way in which the courts have used the procedural fairness doctrine by focusing on a number of leading cases to identify the values which appear to be shaping the content of the law. The bulk of the chapter analyses case law drawn from the 'modern' (ie post-1960) era. But it is helpful to preface that part of the chapter by considering several seminal decisions from earlier periods.

I. Audi alterem partem—the right to a fair hearing

A recurrent (if not ever present) theme in much early audi alterem partem case law is the courts' attempt to draw a distinction between, on the one hand, government decisions which affected the 'rights' of individuals and, on the other, those which impacted only on matters of 'privilege'. Relatedly, much judicial energy was expended on determining if a given executive decision should be classified as '(quasi)-judicial' or 'administrative' in nature.

These distinctions may be thought to have an obvious jurisprudential root in Diceyan theory as to the purpose of the rule of law. If that purpose is, inter alia, to protect private rights and liberties against the executive, it is important to establish when such rights are in issue, for the consequence of their being put in jeopardy would be that the government's decision-making process (absent a clear legislative indication to the contrary) would be expected to correspond if only in broad terms to a judicial model. Alternatively, it might be contended that Parliament has on occasion—irrespective of whether or not the statutory power in issue affects individual rights—required executive bodies to act in a quasi-judicial fashion. If this has been done explicitly, there is no difficulty in concluding that the bodies' decision-making procedures must closely resemble the judicial model. If the statute is silent on the point, that conclusion becomes more problematic, in so far as it would have to rest on judicial presumptions as to the extent to which Parliament has impliedly 'contracted in'² to existing common law principles.

The pervasive difficulty however, which is revealed by examining several leading cases, is in finding generalisable criteria with which to draw a distinction between 'rights' and 'privileges' and/or 'quasi-judicial' and 'administrative' functions.

The initial rise, dilution and fall of the audi alterem partem principle

One of the most forceful assertions of the audi alterem partem principle in the Victorian era is offered in Cooper v Wandsworth Board of Works.³ Section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 introduced a limited form of land use planning control. It provided that new buildings should not be erected unless the relevant local Board of Works⁴ had been given seven days notice of the project, and also empowered the Board to demolish any buildings erected in breach of this provision. The text of the Act did not expressly require any hearing to be carried out prior to demolition. Cooper had apparently begun to erect a building without giving the requisite notice. The Board then demolished the building overnight.

Mr Cooper commenced proceedings for trespass. The Board contended that it had lawful authority under s 76 of the Act to enter Cooper's land and raze his house. The demolition was clearly not illegal, and was probably defensible in terms of its rationality. The case turned on whether the Board's decision-making process was procedurally acceptable.

The Court concluded that the Board had acted unlawfully in not granting Mr Cooper a hearing before deciding to demolish his house. The absence of an express requirement for a hearing in the Act was seen as no obstacle to this conclusion. As Erle CJ put it: 'powers granted by that statute are subject to a qualification that has been repeatedly recognised, that no man is to be deprived of his property without his having an opportunity of being heard'.⁵ Byles J made the point in similar terms: 'although there are no positive words in a statute requiring that the party shall be heard, yet the justice of the common law will supply the omission of the legislature'.⁶ The more interesting point is why the 'justice of the common law' demanded that such a condition be attached to the exercise of this power?

² See 'III. Judicial regulation of government behaviour: the constitutional rationale', ch 3, p 59 above.

³ (1863) 14 CBNS 180.

⁴ This being one of the ad hoc, subject specific local government bodies created by Parliament in the nineteenth century; see 'I. Localism, tradition, and the 'modernisation' of local government', ch 10, pp 302–306 above.

The various members of the Court were divided on whether or not the Board's power was 'judicial' or 'administrative'. Willes J concluded that this was a 'judicial' power, while both Erle CJ and Byles J suggested that the distinction was largely irrelevant, as past case law contained many instances of the audi alterem partem principle being applied to what they considered to be essentially administrative functions. The Court was however unanimous in concluding that because the Board's action interfered substantially with Mr Cooper's property rights, it should have afforded him a hearing before reaching its decision.

It is not clear from the judgment how closely this hearing would have to approximate to court procedures. Some indication as to what that requirement might be was subsequently offered by the House of Lords in Board of Education v Rice.⁷ The case concerned the exercise of what was essentially an appellate jurisdiction conferred upon the Board to resolve disputes between local education authorities and their employees. The Court accepted that such a function, even if were to be described as 'administrative', had to be discharged in accordance with the audi alterem partem principle:

But I do not think they [the Board] are bound to treat such a question as though it were a trial. They have no power to administer an oath, and need not examine witnesses. They can obtain any information in any way they think best, always giving a fair opportunity to those who are parties in the controversy for correcting or contradicting any relevant statement prejudicial to their view.⁸

The supposition that judicial methods were an inappropriate reference point to structure the procedures of government bodies, even if the body concerned was exercising a recognisably 'judicial' function, was promptly reinforced in Local Government Board v Arlidge.⁹ The Housing & Town Planning Act 1909 authorised a local inspector, after holding an inquiry, to issue closing orders in respect of houses he/she considered unfit for human habitation. The statute provided for an appeal against this to the Local Government Board.¹⁰ The statute did not specify the procedures that were to be followed either at the inquiry or the appeal. Arlidge was permitted to appear in person at the inquiry, to be represented by counsel, and to cross-examine witnesses. The inspector nonetheless imposed a closure order on Arlidge's house. Arlidge was allowed to make written representations at the appeal stage, but was not granted an oral hearing, nor allowed to see the Inspector's report. He subsequently maintained that these failings constituted a breach of natural justice, in that they departed too far from a judicial model of decision-making. This argument failed at first instance, but was accepted in the Court of Appeal.

In the House of Lords, the Court of Appeal's judgment was unanimously overruled. Viscount Haldane LC rejected the Court of Appeal's presumption that in the absence of statutorily defined procedures one must assume that Parliament implicitly intended that ⁵ (1863) 143 ER 414 at 418. The case raised a nice theoretical point, not considered by the Court; namely whether Mr Cooper could have a property right in his house if it had been built unlawfully.

⁶ Ibid, at 420.

⁷ [1911] AC 179, HL.

⁸ Ibid, at 182 per Lord Loreburn LC.

⁹ [1915] AC 120, [1914–15] All ER Rep 1, HL. A different facet of this case was discussed at 'Unlawful delegation of powers, ch 14, p 455 above.

¹⁰ The forerunner of the Department of the Environment; ie a central government department.

a body follow judicial procedures. He reached this conclusion notwithstanding the fact that a ‘right’ was in issue:

There is no doubt that the question is one affecting property and the liberty of a man to do what he chooses with his own. Such rights are not to be affected unless Parliament has said so. But Parliament, in what it considers higher interests than those of the individual, has so often interfered with such rights on other occasions, that it is dangerous for judges to lay much stress on what a hundred years ago would have been a presumption considerably stronger than it is today.¹¹

Haldane’s reasoning amounts to a recognition that the substance of government–citizen relations has undergone a profound change, and that governmental procedures must therefore change as well. The judgment offers an early but perfectly clear shift from red light to green light theory; or, if one prefers, from a rigid Hayekian concern with judicial process towards Jones’ more dilute notion of a ‘meaningful day in court’.¹² Somewhat confusingly, Viscount Haldane then indicated that the LGB must—since it was performing an appellate function—act ‘judicially’. He followed the lead given in Rice in determining the content of this concept in this case. The Board need not offer an oral hearing; granting the opportunity to make written representations would suffice. Nor need it give Arlidge a copy of the Inspector’s report. The requirement was simply that the Board:

deal with the question...without bias and...give to each of the parties the opportunity of adequately presenting the case made. The decision must be come to in the spirit and with the sense of responsibility of a tribunal whose duty it is to mete out justice...Parliament must be taken, in the absence of any declaration to the contrary, to have intended [the Board] to follow the procedure which is its own and is necessary if it is to be capable of doing its work efficiently.¹³

These sentiments were echoed by Lord Parmoor—‘there is no obligation to adopt the regular forms of legal procedure. It is sufficient that the case has been heard in a judicial spirit’¹⁴—and by Lord Shaw, whose judgment evinced an explicit concern that the audi alterem partem principle should not be invoked to impede administrative efficiency to an onerous degree:

Judicial methods may, in many points of administration, be entirely unsuitable, and produce delays, expense, and public and private injury...[C]ertain ways of and methods of judicial procedure may very likely be imitated; and lawyer-like methods may find especial favour from lawyers. But that the judiciary should presume to impose its own methods on administrative or executive officers is a usurpation. And the assumption that the methods of natural justice are ex necessitate those of Courts of Justice is wholly unfounded.¹⁵

A two stage question?

Cooper, Rice and Arlidge have in common a clear indication that the courts’ concern with audi alterem partem raised two questions. The first, essentially a threshold question, was simply whether or not the principle was applicable to a given decision. (The cases indicate that while a formal distinction was drawn between rights/privileges and judicial/administrative decisions for this classificatory purpose, there were in practice few governmental ¹¹ [1914–1915] All ER Rep 1 at 6, HL. The methodology is closely comparable to that used by Lord Wilberforce in Rossminster sixty years later: see ‘R v IRC, ex p Rossminster Ltd (1980)’, ch 3, pp 71–72 above.

¹² This is perhaps particularly evident in this case because the 1909 Act transferred appeal rights against the council’s decision from the courts to the LGB. On Hayek and Jones see ‘Hayek—the road to serfdom’, ch 3, pp 56–57 above.

¹³ [1914–15] All ER Rep 1 at 6, HL.

¹⁴ Ibid., at 14–15.

¹⁵ Ibid., at 9.

processes impacting on individual citizens which did not pass the threshold test.) If so, the second question addressed the content of the procedural protection that the applicant should be afforded. A logical consequence of this approach would be that in situations where the first question was answered in the negative, there were no common law restraints on the decision-maker's choice as to procedure. This point is well illustrated by the 1920 judgment in R v Leman Street Police Station Inspector, ex p Venicoff.¹⁶

The Aliens Restriction Act 1914 had been enacted during World War I. The Act, inter alia, empowered the Home Secretary to detain and deport aliens if he considered such action to be conducive to the public good. Venicoff challenged his detention and scheduled deportation on the grounds that the Home Secretary had not granted him an adequate hearing before making the decision.¹⁷ The Court took the view that there was no requirement that the audi alterem partem principle be respected here:

The legislature in its wisdom took from the Courts during the war the power of inquiry into the facts of particular cases... In dealing with a regulation such as that with which we are now concerned the value of the order would be considerably impaired if it could be made only after holding an inquiry, because it might very well be that the person against whom it was intended to make a deportation order would, the moment he had notice of that intention... take steps to evade apprehension.¹⁸

The Court reached this conclusion notwithstanding the fact that the decision impacted severely upon Venicoff's 'liberty' in the most obvious of ways. It might be thought that the conclusion could be limited to powers created in time of war, when (Liversidge being a primary example) 'normal' administrative law principles were relaxed in order to facilitate the government process. However much the same rationale is evident in Goddard CJ's first instance judgment in Russell v Duke of Norfolk.¹⁹ Russell was a race-horse trainer, whose licence was revoked for 'misconduct' by the Jockey Club following allegations of race fixing. As a result, Russell could no longer work in the horse-racing industry. In effect, he had lost his livelihood. He had been granted a rather perfunctory hearing prior to the decision, at which he had been permitted to make a statement but not to challenge in any meaningful way the details of the case against him. Despite the severity of the consequences inflicted upon Russell by the withdrawal of his licence, Lord Goddard CJ could see 'no possible ground' for assuming the audi alterem partem principle applied.

Goddard adopted the same approach three years later in R v Metropolitan Police Comr, ex p Parker.²⁰ The Commissioner possessed a (properly) delegated power under the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act 1869 to revoke taxi licences. He revoked Parker's licence following Parker's conviction for various traffic offences and allegations that Parker had been using his cab as part of a prostitution operation. There is little scope to doubt that the revocation was substantively defensible. Parker had also been given the opportunity to rebut the allegations against him at a hearing before a committee chaired by an Assistant Commissioner. His complaint rested on the basis that he had not been allowed to call witnesses in his own defence. Procedures of this sort would comfortably have satisfied the Rice/Arlidge test. However, Lord Goddard indicated that there was no entitlement to natural justice at all in respect of this decision. He offered three reasons for this conclusion.

¹⁶ [1920] 3 KB 72, DC.

¹⁷ The action was for habeas corpus, against the police officer who was detaining Venicoff in accordance with the Home Secretary's instructions.

¹⁸ [1920] 3 KB 72 at 80, per the Earl of Reading CJ.

¹⁹ [1948] 1 All ER 488.

²⁰ [1953] 1 WLR 1150.

The first was that Parker had lost only a ‘privilege’, not a ‘right’: ‘The licence is nothing but a permission’. As a rule, where a licence is granted, the licensor does not have to state why he withdraws his permission.²¹ The second was that the Commissioner’s action was an ‘administrative’ rather than ‘judicial’ function; it is ‘impossible to say that the commissioner... was in a judicial or quasi-judicial position. He was in fact exercising a disciplinary authority’.²² The third explanation was rooted in more obviously policy based concerns, and betokened an extremely ‘green light’ approach to this facet of administrative law:

it is most undesirable, in my opinion, that [the Commissioner] should be fettered by threats of orders of certiorari and so forth, because that would interfere with the free and proper disciplinary exercise of the powers that it may be expected he would otherwise use.²³

This approach to the issue was not merely an idiosyncrasy on Lord Goddard’s part. In the same year as Parker was decided, the Privy Council issued judgment in Nakkuda Ali v Jayaratne.²⁴ The case concerned the power of a Ceylonese government official, the Controller of Textiles, to revoke a trader’s licence if he had reasonable grounds to believe that the trader was ‘unfit’ to hold a licence. The Court held that the audi alterem partem principle did not apply to this activity, on the grounds that the licence was a privilege and that its grant and withdrawal were executive and not judicial actions.

Such cases emphasise that the threshold question of whether or not a particular decision-making process was subject to the audi alterem partem principle had become of central importance in the immediate post-war period. That the answer to the question might be unclear is nicely illustrated by the Court of Appeal’s judgment in Russell v Duke of Norfolk.²⁵ In contrast to Lord Goddard CJ’s decision at first instance, the three judgments offered in the Court of Appeal (by Tucker, Asquith and Denning LJ) all concluded that the Jockey Club’s withdrawal of a trainer’s licence was subject to the audi alterem partem principle. However, the judges also concluded that the principle had not been breached on these facts; in respect of this particular decision, the content of natural justice was quite limited. The point is best put by Tucker LJ:

Throughout this inquiry, [the plaintiff] was... given an opportunity of presenting his case... It is true that he was not in terms asked: ‘Have you got any witnesses? Do you want an adjournment?’. A layman at an inquiry of this sort is of course at a grave disadvantage compared with a trained advocate... Counsel for the plaintiff... said ‘What would be said of local justices who acted in this way?’. With all due respect, the position is totally different. This matter is not to be judged by the standards applicable to local justices.²⁶

Tucker LJ continued by noting that the content of a fair hearing would be highly context specific: ‘The requirements of natural justice must depend on the circumstances of the case, the nature of the inquiry, the rules under which the tribunal is acting, the subject matter that is being dealt with, and so forth’.²⁷ In so far as there was to be a lowest common denominator, applicable to all decisions to which the audi alterem partem principle applied, it was the rather vague requirement that: ‘the person concerned should have a reasonable opportunity of presenting his case’.²⁸

That this judgment pre-dated both Parker and Nakkuda Ali, and that all three cases concerned what was in effect the loss of the plaintiff’s preferred livelihood, indicates that the right/privilege and judicial/administrative dichotomies remained a powerful factor in this area of the law. But Russell also rather suggested that a plaintiff who successfully passed the threshold test might find herself entitled to such a low level of 'natural justice' that neither the instrumental, nor intrinsic, rationales for imposing procedural restraints on decision-making behaviour were being well-served.

²¹ Ibid, at 1154. ²² Ibid, at 1155. ²³ Ibid. ²⁴ [1951] AC 66, PC.

²⁵ [1949] 1 All ER 109, CA. ²⁶ Ibid, at 118. ²⁷ Ibid, at 118. ²⁸ Ibid.

This point is well illustrated by the Privy Council's decision in University of Ceylon v Fernando.²⁹ Fernando had been accused of cheating in an exam. If upheld, the charge would have ruined his reputation and career prospects. The Privy Council accepted that these proceedings were quasi-judicial, and subject to the rules of natural justice. However this did not mean that Fernando was entitled to cross-examine (either in person or through counsel) the witnesses against him.

The re-emergence of the principle? Ridge v Baldwin

The 1963 judgment of the House of Lords in *Ridge v Baldwin*³⁰ appeared decisively to reject the practical difference between judicial/administrative decisions for audi alterem partem purposes, although it did little to indicate that the content of the requisite hearing ought to be strengthened. Ridge was the former Chief Constable of Sussex. He had been tried for corruption, but acquitted. The Police Authority (then quaintly named 'the Watch Committee') nonetheless decided to dismiss him. The Committee was empowered to do so per the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, s 191(4) if it thought him 'negligent in the discharge of his duty, or otherwise unfit for the same'. Since Ridge's integrity and competence had been heavily criticised by the judge presiding over his trial, his dismissal would not seem to have been either illegal or irrational. However, he had been sacked immediately after the trial. He had not even been informed that the Committee was considering this course of action, and had no opportunity to make a case to its members. Following representations from Ridge's solicitor, the Committee agreed to reconvene to permit Ridge the opportunity to persuade them to revoke their decision. Ridge and his lawyer were allowed to make a statement at the hearing, but not to call witnesses or cross-examine Committee members. Ridge subsequently sought a declaration that his dismissal was void on the ground that the hearings breached the requirements of natural justice.³¹ Neither the High Court nor the Court of Appeal accepted that natural justice applied in this situation, on the basis that the Committee's function was administrative not quasi-judicial in nature.³²

This conclusion was reversed in the House of Lords. Lord Reid's leading judgment suggested that the line of cases typified by Venicoff, Parker and Nakkuda Ali rested on insecure jurisprudential and political foundations. This was in part because it was inappropriate to attach much significance to judgments addressing the exercise of war powers:

It seems to me to be...almost an inevitable inference from the circumstances in which defence regulations were made and from their subject matter that...[Parliament's] intention must have been to exclude the principles of natural justice...But it was not to be expected that anyone would state in so many words that a temporary abandonment of the rules of natural justice was one of the sacrifices which war conditions required—that would have been almost calculated to create...alarm and despondency.³³

²⁹ [1960] 1 WLR 223, [1960] 1 All ER 631, PC.

³⁰ [1964] AC 40, [1963] 2 All ER 66, HL.

³¹ Ridge's practical concern was to have the dismissal quashed. This would have the effect of re-instating him in his job. He would then immediately resign before the Committee met again. If he resigned, he retained his pension rights. If he was sacked for negligence or unfitness, he would not do so.

³² [1963] 1 QB 539, CA; affg [1963] 2 All ER 523.

³³ [1964] AC 40 at 73. Lord Reid also vindicated Lord Atkin's dissent in Liversidge by describing the majority judgment as a 'very peculiar decision': ibid.

A second, more pervasive, problem had arisen from a widespread judicial presumption that a government body's duty to act 'judicially' was not—as in Cooper, Rice and Arlidge—to be inferred as a matter of course whenever its decisions impacted substantially on an individual's interests, but had rather to be 'super-added' either explicitly or as matter of necessary implication by the relevant statutory scheme.³⁴ Lord Reid saw no need for such a requirement.

He also suggested that the courts had rather misunderstood the changing nature of the relationship between government and the citizenry. It was undoubtedly true that since 1900 Parliament had granted the government more and more extensive powers. Many such powers addressed matters of policy which affected many people en masse. Decisions of that sort need not be subject to the rules of natural justice. However, Lord Reid implied that the courts had extended that presumption too broadly, and had overlooked the fact that many government decisions still involved a power akin to imposing a 'penalty' upon particular individuals. In respect of powers of that type, a common law presumption as to procedural rigour based on nineteenth and (very) early twentieth-century precedent was justified.³⁵

The presumption was not absolute however, even in situations where what was in issue was the loss of livelihood. Lord Reid drew a careful (if somewhat formalistic) distinction between three types of 'employment' situation. In respect of contracts of employment, there seemed to be no role for common law based principles of natural justice to apply. Such procedural constraints as attached to the exercise of an employer's powers would have to be found in the relevant contract or in any statutory provisions imposed on the post. In the absence of a contract (in effect when the employment of civil servants was in issue),³⁶ common law restraints on procedure would apply only to office holders who were dismissible for cause (such as Ridge); those holding office at pleasure could be dismissed without any form of hearing.

Contemporary commentators have regarded Ridge as a landmark decision, comparable in its jurisprudential significance with contemporaneous judgments such as Padfield and Anisminic. Craig, for example argued that the judgment had two major implications for the audi alterem partem principle:

on the one hand [the majority] rediscovered the nineteenth century jurisprudence which had applied the principle to a broad spectrum of interests and a wide variety of decision-makers. On the other hand they disapproved of some of the impediments which had been erected in the twentieth century.³⁷

It is however important not to overstate the significance of the case. While Ridge undoubtedly restored the reach of the audi alterem partem doctrine to its Victorian extent, it did little to enhance its content. Reid's judgment lacks any positive statement on the question of how much procedural protection Ridge was entitled to. In a passage towards the end of his judgment,³⁸ Reid implies that had the Committee actually revoked Ridge's dismissal prior to its second meeting (thereby indicating that it was addressing the issue with an open mind)³⁹ and given him fuller details of the case against him, it would have satisfied

³⁴ Ibid, at 74.

³⁵ Cf his criticism of the Privy Council in Nakkuda Ali for not considering any cases from before 1911.

³⁶ Courts did not accept that civil servants had 'contracts' of employment until the mid-1980s; see 'III. Full reviewability—the GCHQ case (1983)', ch 4, p 105 above. ³⁷ (1989) op cit p 204.

³⁸ [1964] AC 40 at 79–80.

³⁹ Had it done so, one assumes Ridge would not have attended the second hearing, but would have instantaneously resigned to safeguard his pension rights.

the requirements of natural justice.⁴⁰ Nothing in the judgment suggests that Ridge was entitled to a high level of procedural protection.⁴¹

The emergence of the procedural fairness doctrine and the appearance of the legitimate expectation

The indication given in Ridge that the common law was now to be more concerned with maximising the reach of the audi alterem partem principle than identifying and enhancing its content was quickly reinforced by the High Court's decision in Re HK.⁴²

A single stage question?

Section 2(2) of the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962 granted a right of entry to the UK to a citizen of any Commonwealth country who: 'satisfies an immigration officer that he... (b) is the... child under sixteen years of age of a Commonwealth citizen who is resident in the United Kingdom'. HK, a citizen of Pakistan, claimed to be the 15-year-old son of a resident Commonwealth citizen. However, on his arrival at Heathrow, an immigration officer formed the initial impression that HK was over 16 years old.⁴³ There followed what seems to have been a rather rapid and rudimentary 'hearing' at the airport, in which HK was examined by a doctor and both HK and his father were interviewed (separately and without any form of expert representation) by immigration officers. The officers were unconvinced that HK was under 16, and arranged for him to be deported back to Pakistan the next day. This decision was challenged on the basis that the procedures adopted by the immigration officers were insufficiently rigorous.

In his leading judgment, Lord Parker CJ followed Ridge v Baldwin in suggesting that Nakkuda Ali, if not wrongly decided, was certainly poorly expressed. Lord Parker doubted that s 2 imposed a 'judicial' function on immigration officers. Officers were nonetheless subject to 'a duty to act fairly'. Salmon LJ echoed this reasoning:

[D]ecisions [under s 2] are of vital importance to the immigrants since their whole future may be affected. In my judgment it is implicit in the statute that the authorities in exercising these powers and making decisions must act fairly in accordance with the procedures of natural justice.⁴⁴

However, the Court also considered that the content of the 'duty to act fairly' was rather anodyne. As Lord Parker put it, the obligation that fell on the officer was merely to: 'give the immigrant an opportunity of satisfying him of the matters in the sub-section, and for that purpose let the immigrant know what his immediate impression is so that the ⁴⁰ On the more general issue of whether a governmental body can cure procedural defects in its original decision by holding a second, procedurally defensible hearing see the judgment of Lord Wilberforce in Calvin v Carr [1980] AC 574, [1979] 2 All ER 440; and the analysis by Elliot M (1980) 'Appeals, principles and pragmatism in natural justice' MLR 66.

⁴¹ One might contrast this position with a contemporaneous academic critique produced in the USA which was to have a profound influence on the development of constitutional and administrative law in that country. In several articles in the Yale Law Journal, Charles Reich argued that not only should the reach of the procedural fairness doctrine be extended to all facets of the governmental process which affected individual interests, but that its content should also be modelled on a judicial process; see Reich C (1963) 'Midnight welfare searches and the Social Security Act' Yale LJ 1346; (1964) 'The new property' Yale LJ 733–787; (1965) 'Individual rights and social welfare: the emerging legal issues' Yale LJ 1244.

⁴² [1967] 2 QB 617, sub nom Re K(H)(infant) [1967] 1 All ER 226.

⁴³ HK's Pakistani passport recorded his date of birth as 29.2.1951; a non-existent date, as 1951 was not a leap year. This anomaly, coupled with HK's mature physical appearance, underpinned the officer's conclusion.

⁴⁴ [1967] 2 QB 617 at 633..

immigrant can disabuse him'.⁴⁵ The brief interview which HK had been afforded at Heathrow was evidently sufficient to meet this requirement.

One might wonder if any useful purpose—be it of an intrinsic or instrumental kind—is served by so perfunctory a standard of procedural due process. Furthermore, if so little protection was afforded to an individual interest which was (as Salmon LJ put it) 'vital' to the applicant concerned, the protection offered to 'non-vital interests' would presumably need be little more than barely discernible.

This supposition seemed to be reinforced by several cases in the late-1960s and early-1970s in which the courts accepted that a governmental decision was subject to natural justice/fair procedures, but reduced the substance of the protection almost to vanishing point. Of particular note were the decisions in *R v Aston University Senate, ex p Roffey*⁴⁶ and Breen v Amalgamated Engineering Union,⁴⁷ in which (respectively) the High Court and Court of Appeal indicated that procedural fairness did not always require that the individual be granted a hearing. Similarly, in Malloch v Aberdeen Corpn,⁴⁸ the House of Lords offered the curious suggestion that in some situations where a hearing would be required the individual need not be given any prior notice of the details of the case which she had to answer. Quite what value (other than the purely symbolic) a hearing might have in such circumstances is difficult to fathom.

It might readily be conceded that in respect of some types of governmental decision there may be strong public policy grounds both for limiting the content of any hearing and for relieving the decision-maker of any obligation to provide precise information of the case an applicant has to answer. An example is offered by R v Gaming Board for Great Britain, ex p Benaim and Khaida.⁴⁹ The applicants had been refused a licence to run a casino. They had been granted a hearing by the Gaming Board prior to the decision being made. They were not however permitted to know details of the evidence that the Board had considered which had led it to conclude that they were not fit persons to be granted a licence. The Board refused to provide such information, on the basis that it would jeopardise the confidentiality of its sources. This was a consideration of some importance given the suspected links between the gambling industry and organised crime. In the Court of Appeal, Lord Denning held that this was a pertinent factor for the court to consider. He also observed that the plaintiffs were not being deprived of any existing entitlement, but were rather seeking a permission to begin a new venture. In these circumstances, the Board's duty to act fairly demanded that Benaim and Khaida be given:

an opportunity of satisfying them of the matters specified... They must let him know what their impressions are so that he can disabuse them. But I do not think that they need quote chapter and verse against him as if they were dismissing him from an office as in Ridge: or depriving him of his property, as in Cooper.⁵⁰

Such a conclusion obviously runs the risk that the Board is acting on the basis of flawed evidence, or indeed of no evidence at all. Lord Denning's judgment implies that this is a lesser evil than running the risk that potentially useful sources of information be deterred from offering evidence to the Board.

Lord Denning's own readiness to trust unhesitatingly in the competence and integrity of government decision-makers is perhaps best revealed by his absurd comments a few years later in R v Secretary of State for Home Affairs, ex p Hosenball.⁵¹ Hosenball was an American journalist, whose activities were embarrassing the (then Labour) government.

⁴⁵ Ibid, at 630. ⁴⁶ [1969] 2 QB 538. ⁴⁷ [1971] 2 QB 175, [1971] 1 All ER 1148, CA.

⁴⁸ [1971] 1 WLR 1578, [1971] 2 All ER 1278, HL. ⁴⁹ [1970] 2 QB 417, [1970] 2 All ER 528, CA.

⁵⁰ [1970] 2 QB 417 at 430. ⁵¹ [1977] 1 WLR 766, [1977] 3 All ER 452, CA.

The Home Secretary subsequently sought to deport Hosenball. He claimed that ‘national security’ was in issue, although he declined to give any explanation as to how Hosenball’s activities had this effect. In Lord Denning’s view, notwithstanding the severe consequences for Mr Hosenball of the Home Secretary’s decision, the government was under no obligation to give Hosenball details of the case against him so that he might convince the Home Secretary that the government’s suspicions were ill-founded:

There is a conflict here between the interests of national security on the one hand and the freedom of the individual on the other. The balance between these two is not for a court of law. It is for the Home Secretary. He is the person entrusted by Parliament with the task. In some parts of the world national security has on occasions been used as an excuse for all sorts of infringements of individual liberty. But not in England... Ministers... have never interfered with the liberty or freedom of movement of any individual except where it is absolutely necessary for the safety of the state.⁵²

These sentiments are redolent of Denning’s similarly silly observations in *Hanratty*⁵³ and do him little credit. The proposition that no government Minister has ever taken inappropriate advantage of the courts’ general unwillingness to accept the justiciability of national security issues is risible.⁵⁴ To empty the procedural fairness doctrine of all meaningful content in such circumstances may be justifiable, but it is done at the certain cost that the autonomy thereby afforded to the government may be abused and the probable cost that it will be.⁵⁵

Benaim and Khaida obviously did not raise a ‘national security’ issue—nor did it concern a ministerial decision—but nonetheless addressed a public policy issue of sufficient sensitivity to persuade the Court of Appeal that only a dilute level of procedural rigour need be attached to the Gaming Board’s licencing decisions. The matters in issue in cases such as Roffey, Breen and Malloch had no such ‘delicate’ ramifications however.⁵⁶ The dilution of the content of procedural fairness in such cases appeared to rest largely on the grounds that it would ease the administrative process.

This line of decisions attracted forceful academic criticism from DH Clark, in an article published in Public Law.⁵⁷ While welcoming the evident extension in the reach of the natural justice principle since Ridge,⁵⁸ Clark took a less sanguine view of the way in which some decisions had treated the question of its content. His concern essentially was that there was little point in saying that in principle the safeguard of procedural fairness applies to all governmental decisions (unless removed by statute) if the concept is so flexible that the benefit thereby bestowed on the individual may be worthless: ‘even as the doctrine finds new fields to conquer it is being emasculated from within, honoured

⁵² Ibid., at 461.

⁵³ See ‘Hanratty (1971)—reasserting orthodoxy?’, ch 4, p 103 above.

⁵⁴ See, for example, the discussion of the Matrix-Churchill controversy at ‘VI. From ministerial responsibility to ministerial accountability? The Matrix-Churchill controversy’, ch 9, pp 291–293 above.

⁵⁵ See the discussion of GCHQ at ‘III. Full reviewability—the GCHQ case’ (1983), ch 4, pp 105–107 above. See also Geoffrey Robertson’s analysis of the way in which Denning’s hyperbolic rhetoric in Hosenball has been deployed in some Commonwealth countries whose democratic credentials are less firmly established than those of the United Kingdom: (1999) The justice game ch 10.

⁵⁶ Roffey concerned the expulsion of students from university on the grounds of poor academic performance; Breen the (non-)appointment of a trade union official; and Malloch the dismissal of a teacher.

⁵⁷ (1975) ‘Natural justice: substance or shadow’ Public Law 27. The paper merits careful attention.

⁵⁸ ‘Ridge v Baldwin restored light to an area benighted by the narrow conceptualism of the previous decade... It would not be immoderate to describe as dramatic the pace of consequent advancement beyond the old frontiers’: ibid., at 27.

in name, but dangerously devalued in substance'.⁵⁹ Clark argued in contrast that audi alterem partem ought to be viewed as: 'a basic procedural minimum standard irreducible without negating its raison d'être';⁶⁰ that raison d'être being to enhance the likelihood that 'good' substantive decisions were produced, and that the legitimacy of the decision-making process be maximised. To achieve those objectives, the 'basic minimum' had to include an entitlement to a hearing and a clear indication of the case that had to be met.

Other commentators took a more positive view of these developments. Mullan, drawing a comparison between recent English, Canadian and New Zealand decisions saw a good deal of merit in what he termed a 'spectrum theory' approach to natural justice.⁶¹ Innovatively, Mullan suggested that the two extreme ends of his 'spectrum' would be set not by archaic or formalistic distinctions between 'rights and privileges' and/or 'judicial and administrative' decisions, but by the criterion of justiciability. The extent to which governmental decisions would be required by the common law to approximate to an idealised, court-based standard of procedural rigour would depend upon the nature of the decision and the immediacy and intensity of its impact upon a particular individual. As a given decision appeared less and less justiciable, so the process of making it would become subject to less and less legalistic procedural constraints, until eventually a concern with due process would almost disappear.

While 'spectrum theory' may have a certain conceptual neatness, and might seem a useful analytical tool with which (given the benefit of hindsight) to critique some of the post-Ridge case law, its value as a practical, prescriptive tool with which to assess just 'how much fairness' should be applied to particular governmental decisions would appear limited. This was in part due to the intrinsic limitations of the idea itself. But such force as the idea had was also overshadowed by the appearance and rapid consolidation of a new principle in English administrative law—that of the 'legitimate expectation'.

Legitimate expectation—an entitlement to a procedural benefit or a substantive benefit?

The notion of the 'legitimate expectation' emerged in the Court of Appeal's 1969 decision in Schmidt v Secretary of State for Home Affairs.⁶² As noted in chapter eleven, the British government had by the mid-1970s taken a dim view of the 'religion' of Scientology, to the extent that EC nationals (specifically Ms Van Duyn) found themselves barred from working for the Church of Scientology in the UK.⁶³ This governmental disapproval had become clear in 1968, when the then Labour government announced that it would take steps to curb the growth of the sect. Among the measures to be taken were a ban on non-British citizens studying at the Church's British headquarters. No new students would be admitted to the country, and those already in the UK would not have their permission to stay in the UK renewed. This new policy posed an acute problem to Mr Schmidt and fifty other non-British citizens studying with the Church, as their permissions to stay would expire before they completed their studies. Their application for an extension of their permission to stay was refused by the Home Secretary. Among various grounds of challenge to this ⁵⁹ Ibid, at 28. Cf also his suggestion at p 63 that the doctrine was 'undergoing a metamorphosis that would convert it into a mere slogan or ill-defined aspiration'.

⁶⁰ Ibid, at 37.

⁶¹ Mullan D (1975) 'Fairness: the new natural justice' University of Toronto LJ 280–316. For (respectively) a more jurisprudential analysis and a helpful critique of this area of administrative law see Loughlin M (1978) 'Procedural fairness: a study of the crisis in administrative law theory' University of Toronto LJ 215; and Harlow and Rawlings (1984) op cit pp 78–94.

⁶² [1969] 2 Ch 149, CA.

⁶³ See 'Van Duyn v Home Office (1974)', ch 11, pp 372–373 above.

decision was the contention that Schmidt should have been granted a hearing before the Home Secretary reached his decision.

The Court rejected this argument, on the narrow ground that aliens had no right of entry into the UK in the first place, and so had no concomitant right to have any permission to stay that they may have been granted extended. Lord Denning indicated that he thought Venicoff correctly decided in terms of its result, although the reasoning underpinning the judgment was now outmoded in so far as it was based on:

the fact that the Home Secretary was exercising an administrative power and not doing a judicial act. But that distinction is no longer valid. The speeches in Ridge v Baldwin show that an administrative body, may in a proper case, be bound to give a person who is affected by their decision an opportunity of making representations. It all depends on whether the person has some right or interest, or, I would add, some legitimate expectation of which it would not be fair to deprive him without hearing what he has to say.⁶⁴

Lord Denning was prepared to accept that Mr Schmidt had a legitimate expectation that he could remain in the UK until the expiry of his permission to stay. In the event that the Home Secretary revoked that permission prematurely, Mr Schmidt would be entitled to a hearing in order to attempt to persuade the Home Secretary not to frustrate his expectation. Non-renewal of permission did not however create such an entitlement. Widgery LJ's judgment also recognised the existence of a legitimate expectation as a trigger for procedural fairness. While no such expectation arose on these facts, he indicated—rather more broadly—that in cases involving the economic interests of citizens a non-renewal of a licence or permission by a government body might be subject to a requirement of procedural fairness. This would suggest that a case such as Parker would now have to be decided differently.

Schmidt suggested that while the courts saw no little merit in the judicial/administrative decision dichotomy, they would prefer to embellish rather than abolish the former distinction drawn in natural justice cases between rights and privileges by adding the legitimate expectation as a third, intermediate category of individual interest. Which individual interests would fall within this new category was however far from certain, as was the level of procedural protection such interests would attract.

Procedural not substantive protection?

That the first question might attract a very broad answer was indicated three years later by the Court of Appeal's judgment in R v Liverpool Corp'n, ex p Liverpool Taxi Fleet Operators' Association.⁶⁵ The decision in issue concerned the council's power to licence taxi-cab drivers in its area. In the late-1960s, the council issued some 300 licences each year for one-year periods. It subsequently considered whether to increase the number of licences. As part of its decision-making process, it invited the trade association representing existing licence holders to make representations to its relevant committee during which the association was represented by counsel. The council decided to increase the number of licences quite substantially, but promised (in writing on several occasions through senior councillors and officers) that no increase would be given effect until the council had succeeded in persuading Parliament to pass a private Act⁶⁶ empowering the council to ban the operation of unlicensed mini-cabs in the area. The council subsequently sought to break that promise. The association then asked the court to hold that the council was bound to respect the substance of its promise.

⁶⁴ [1969] 2 Ch 149 at 170, CA.

⁶⁵ [1972] 2 QB 299, sub nom Re Liverpool Taxi Owners' Association [1972] 2 All ER 589.

⁶⁶ On which see 'Private Bills', ch 5, p 135 above.

In a narrow sense, one might doubt if Liverpool Taxi can properly be regarded as a 'legitimate expectation case', since that phrase does not anywhere appear in any of the three judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal.⁶⁷ In Denning's analysis, this was an estoppel case, to be decided in accordance with his own judgments in Robertson and Lever Finance.⁶⁸ He proceeded on the assumptions that: firstly, this particular licencing function was subject to the requirements of procedural fairness; and secondly, the council's promise to delay an increase in the number of licences granted until the relevant Act had been passed was substantively intra vires—ie that it did not unlawfully fetter the council's discretion.⁶⁹ Lord Denning then invoked the amorphous notion of 'the public interest' to support the proposition that the council was not at liberty to resile from the substance of its promise: 'except after the most serious consideration and hearing what the other party has to say: and then only if they [sic] are satisfied that the overriding public interest requires it'.⁷⁰

The implications of this reasoning are significant. Firstly the entitlement to a hearing (which entails a reasonably high level of procedural protection) seems to be triggered not by the association's economic interest in the decision, but by the council's own promise. This is an innovative, but not radical proposition, resting on the premise that it is per se procedurally unfair for a government body to break clear, substantively intra vires promises, and then to continue to make a new decision (whatever its content) without affording a new hearing to those individuals intimately affected by the new decision. This was the basis upon which both Roskill LJ and Sir Gordon Willmer decided the case and so should be taken as the opinion of the Court.⁷¹ Much more radical—and much more constitutionally problematic—is the second limb of Denning's formula; (which is strictly merely obiter). In effect, Denning is saying that the council's promise had taken it into a position where the Court could subject the range of substantive decisions the council might then make in exercising its powers in so far as they applied to individuals who legitimately expect the promise to be honoured to much narrower limits than would be applied if the promise had not been made.⁷² This is essentially to subject the council to a proportionality test in these particular circumstances, although Denning did not acknowledge (or perhaps perceive) that his judgment had that effect.⁷³ Roskill LJ and Sir Gordon Willmer

⁶⁷ By Lord Denning MR, Roskill LJ and Sir Gordon Willmer.

⁶⁸ See 'Estoppel', ch 14, pp 461–463 above. See also Ganz G (1986) 'Legitimate expectation: a confusion of concepts', in Harlow C (ed) Public law and politics.

⁶⁹ See 'Fettering of discretion', ch 14, pp 458–460 above.

⁷⁰ [1972] 2 QB 299 at 308.

⁷¹ An important point to note here is that a hearing would have been required before the council could resile from its promise to delay any increase in licences until the Bill had been passed even if it had not additionally promised to hold such a hearing; ie it was not the promise of a hearing that triggered the requirement of a hearing.

⁷² It seems tolerably clear that, like Roskill and Willmer, Denning considered that the substantive benefit which the association could legitimately expect was that no new licences would be issued until the Act regulating mini-cabs had been passed, and not simply that the association be given another hearing before that decision was changed.

⁷³ This is a distinct position from raising an estoppel in respect of the council's decision. If the court were to estop the council from breaking its promise, the court would essentially be exercising an appellate function by determining the precise outcome of the decision-making process. The 'overriding public interest' formula, in contrast, gives the council some room for substantive manoeuvre, albeit markedly less than it previously enjoyed. Lord Denning was also shortly to stress in Cinnamond v British Airports Authority ([1980] 2 All ER 368, [1980] 1 WLR 582, CA) that any expectation on which an applicant sought to rely had to be 'legitimate', a quality that would not attach to (as in Cinnamond) an expectation generated by repeated criminal behaviour.

made no such allusion; their judgments indicated that as long as a new hearing was held, the council could lawfully make just the same range of decisions as it could if its initial promise had not been made.⁷⁴

The possibility that the legitimate expectation—as Denning construed it—might provide a backdoor route through which courts might in some circumstances come much closer to the political merits of a decision than was permitted by the Wednesbury unreasonableness test did not seem to be immediately appreciated after Liverpool Taxi. The presumption seemed rather to be—following Roskill and Willmer—that a legitimate expectation, whether it derived from a government body’s action or was inherent in an applicant’s interest, could give rise only to a procedural benefit. Thus in R v Hull Prison Board of Visitors, ex p St Germain the Court of Appeal invoked the concept to conclude (for the first time) that the disciplinary functions of prison Boards of Visitors could be quashed if they failed to conform to the requisite standard of fairness: a prisoner’s interest in not being subject to disciplinary punishment was not a right in the orthodox sense, but was an interest of sufficient importance to be interfered with only through fair procedures.⁷⁵ Mr St Germain had been punished for his part in a series of riots at Hull prison by the revocation of some two years of expected remission of his sentence, a ‘punishment’ which was clearly of major significance.

The majority in St Germain had arguably limited its extension of the procedural fairness doctrine to the disciplinary functions of Boards of Visitors.⁷⁶ These were presumed to be ‘judicial’. Disciplinary powers exercised by prison Governors were however classified as ‘administrative’; (the old dichotomy clearly had not passed into obsolescence). These powers should not be subjected to the natural justice doctrine because (echoing Lord Goddard in Parker) that would place too great a burden on the Governor’s decision-making behaviour. In Leech v Deputy Governor of Parkhurst Prison,⁷⁷ the House of Lords rejected this formalistic distinction. It held that a Governor’s functions could be divided into disciplinary and management issues, and that the disciplinary element would be subject to the requirements of natural justice. More broadly, Lord Bridge suggested that this principle would extend to any governmental power which affected ‘the rights or legitimate expectations’ of individuals. In a clear break with the Parker rationale, Lord Bridge also attached unusually explicit significance to the intrinsic value of procedural fairness, observing that any burdens this extension of natural justice might impose upon prison Governors would be outweighed by the benefits resulting from prisoners knowing that their grievances about disciplinary decisions would have a full airing at a fair hearing.

A tripartite approach to the requisite level of procedural protection

The legitimate expectation idea was also used in *McInnes v Onslow Fane*⁷⁸ to offer rather more precise guidance on the issue of the content rather than just applicability of the procedural fairness doctrine. Mr McInnes, after an extremely chequered career ⁷⁴ Nor did Roskill LJ make any reference to estoppel as a source for his conclusion. Rather he regarded it as a new administrative law principle which he styled as ‘fairness’: [1972] 2 QB 299.

⁷⁵ [1979] QB 425, [1979] 1 All ER 701, CA. This case was argued only on a preliminary, jurisdictional question. On the (once again rather low) level of protection subsequently held to be appropriate, see R v Hull Prison Board of Visitors, ex p St Germain (No 2) [1979] 3 All ER 545, [1979] 1 WLR 1401. Four years earlier, in Fraser v Mudge [1975] 1 WLR 1132, the High Court had hinted that Boards of Visitors might be subject to the rules of natural justice, but did not decide the issue; see the discussion in St Germain. Fraser v Mudge is revisited in a slightly different context below.

⁷⁶ The point is not wholly clear. See the discussion by Webster J in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Tarrant [1985] QB 251 at 271–272.

⁷⁷ [1988] AC 533, [1988] 1 All ER 485.

⁷⁸ [1978] 1 WLR 1520, [1978] 3 All ER 211.

in and around the fringes of the boxing industry, had by 1976 made five successive but unsuccessful applications to the British Boxing Board of Control for a licence to operate as a manager. All his applications were rejected without him being granted a hearing, and without him being apprised in any detail of the factors which led to the Board's refusals. Megarry VC's judgment suggested that licencing decisions of this sort could be divided into three categories for procedural fairness purposes. The first category was 'forfeiture' cases, in which the decision under challenge had revoked or abridged a still extant licence. The third category was 'application' cases, in which a licence was being sought for the first time. Between these two extremes lay the second category, in which 'the applicant has some legitimate expectation from what has already happened that his application will be granted'.⁷⁹

The first category would attract a high level of procedural protection: 'the right to an unbiased tribunal, the right to notice of the charges, and the right to be heard in answer to the charges'.⁸⁰ The mere application cases, in contrast, would apparently merit no worthwhile protection at all. No hearing would be necessary, and the applicant need not be given even the gist of the case against her. Megarry VC did not offer any details of the protection to be provided in the intermediate category; such 'intermediate' decisions would presumably attract an 'intermediate' level of procedural rigour.⁸¹

That a legitimate expectation might trigger a particular level of procedural protection may have raised practical difficulties in deciding how much was enough, but it was not a conceptually problematic idea. The possibility that a legitimate expectation might have the effect of narrowing a government body's substantive discretion was more contentious. That idea had been given some currency by the Court of Appeal in Chief Constable of North Wales Police v Evans, but was then firmly rejected by the House of Lords.⁸² Evans was a probationer constable. Under the relevant statutory scheme, the Chief Constable could dismiss a probationer if she considered that he would not be a 'reliable and competent officer'. Evans was dismissed on the basis of unfounded rumours about his personal life, and was not given any form of hearing or other opportunity to rebut the allegations. In the House of Lords, Lord Hailsham had described Evans' treatment as 'little short of outrageous'. Evans' status was clearly comparable to that of Ridge, and as such he was entitled to procedural protection. As in Ridge, the Court set the content of fairness at a low level. Evans need not be granted an oral hearing, but had to be given at least an opportunity to refute the charge.

However perhaps the most important aspect of the judgment is noted by Craig:

The House of Lords explicitly disapproved of statements made in the Court of Appeal that a court should exercise a general power to consider whether the decision reached was fair and reasonable. It was firmly stated that where review was based upon breach of natural justice the court should only be concerned with the manner in which the decision was reached and not with the correctness of the decision itself.⁸³

⁷⁹ [1978] 1 WLR 1520 at 1529. Megarry VC intimated that already possessing a licence triggered a legitimate expectation of renewal, as would presumably—although he was not explicit on this—representations that a licence would be granted by the Board's officials. ⁸⁰ Ibid.

⁸¹ This tripartite analysis of licensing decisions has a superficial conceptual neatness. However, it may be difficult to generalise significantly from McInnes. Megarry VC paid no obvious attention, for example, to the scale of or public interest in the licence concerned. Should, for example, the revocation of a market stallholder's licence merit greater procedural protection than an application to renew a licence to run a transatlantic airline?

⁸² [1982] 1 WLR 1155, [1982] 3 All ER 141, HL.

⁸³ (1989) op cit at p 213.

Construed in this way, the judgment implicitly rejects Lord Denning's reasoning in Liverpool Taxi. But the judgment may also be seen as indicative of a pervasive judicial failure or unwillingness to distinguish between a proportionality-based level of substantive review and an appellate jurisdiction.⁸⁴ To decide if the substantive content of a decision is correct is de facto to exercise appellate powers; to decide whether or not it is defensible within a narrower range of options than permitted by the Wednesbury unreasonableness test need not have this effect at all. The judgment, whether ill-conceived or not, is nonetheless clear authority for the proposition that a government body's procedural failings should not be used as a stepping stone for a court to narrow its substantive discretion.

Blurring the edges of the procedural/substantive dichotomy

This evident clarity was then rather obscured by several decisions in the mid-1980s.⁸⁵ The applicant in *A-G of Hong Kong v Ng Yuen Shiu*⁸⁶ was an illegal immigrant to Hong Kong from Macau. As part of a general tightening of its policy towards illegal immigration, the Hong Kong government announced that illegal entrants from Macau would not be deported until they had been granted an individuated hearing so that their claim to stay could be carefully considered. Such a hearing was not specifically required by the relevant statutory scheme, but it is clear that the government was acting substantively intra vires in making the promise. Mr Ng was not afforded such a hearing. The Privy Council subsequently held that Mr Ng had a legitimate (or as Lord Fraser styled it 'reasonable') expectation that this promise be honoured. Lord Fraser, who delivered the sole judgment, also held that a legitimate expectation could arise in several ways:

The expectations may be based on some statement or undertaking by, or on behalf of, the public authority which has the duty of making the decision, if the authority has, through its officers, acted in a way that would make it unfair or inconsistent with good administration for him to be denied such an inquiry.⁸⁷

In other respects, however, the judgment seemed to restrict the scope of the principle. Lord Fraser stressed that 'this is a very narrow case on its facts'.⁸⁸ He also emphasised that whatever the source of the legitimate expectation, it could trigger only procedural entitlements which would no have impact on the range of substantive decisions that might eventually be reached.

This seems clear. The seeds of potential confusion sown by Ng Yuen Shiu derive from two sources. The first was that the substantive benefit Mr Ng was seeking was itself a procedural right. All he was asking for was a hearing, not that he be permitted to stay in Hong Kong. He thus left the Court having succeeded in binding the Hong Kong government to the precise substance of its promise. The second derives from Lord Fraser's reliance on Liverpool Taxi, and his failure to note the significantly different implications of Lord Denning's opinion and the judgments of Roskill LJ and Sir Gordon Willmer in that case. In Lord Fraser's view, those three judgments all held that the council's substantive autonomy was not changed by its generation of a legitimate expectation on the part of the association. That is however incorrect, and by failing to draw the distinction, and by quoting at length from Lord Denning's opinion, Lord Fraser perhaps lent an unintended credibility to its substantive implications.

⁸⁴ See the discussion at 'III. Proportionality—a new ground of review?', ch 14, pp 470–472 above.

⁸⁵ A very helpful and incisive analysis is provided in Forsyth C (1988) 'The provenance and protection of legitimate expectations' Cambridge LJ 238.

⁸⁶ [1983] 2 AC 629, [1983] 2 All ER 346, PC.

⁸⁷ Ibid., at 350.

⁸⁸ Ibid., at 352.

Those implications were certainly afforded great credibility in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Khan.⁸⁹ Mr Khan was seeking to adopt his nephew, who then lived in Pakistan. A Home Office policy letter detailed the criteria which a person in his situation would have to meet to bring a child to the UK for adoption. Having complied with these criteria Mr Khan was informed that the letter incorrectly represented Home Office policy, that more restrictive criteria actually applied, and that he could not meet them. Parker LJ's leading judgment in the Court of Appeal invoked Ng Yuen Shiu as approving Lord Denning's opinion in Liverpool Taxi. Parker LJ held that Mr Khan had a legitimate expectation that the policy outlined in the statement would be followed. This legitimate expectation had no general impact on the Home Secretary's power to apply a different policy, located at any point within the boundaries of irrationality. But, the substantive autonomy the Home Secretary retained in respect of Mr Khan, and anyone in his position, had apparently shrunk:

The Home Secretary, if he undertakes to allow in persons if certain conditions are satisfied, should not in my view be entitled to resile from that undertaking without affording interested parties a hearing and then only if the overriding public interest demands it.⁹⁰

With respect to Mr Khan, the Home Secretary had it seemed engaged in a course of conduct which essentially subjected his substantive discretion to something akin to proportionality rather than irrationality review. An alternative way of characterising the judgment would be that the Court of Appeal was indicating that the Home Secretary was now estopped vis-à-vis Mr Khan from making a substantive decision which the court did not regard as serving an overriding public interest.

In *R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Ruddock*⁹¹ the intimation that a legitimate expectation placed tight limits on a public body's capacity to depart from published policy promises was made more strongly than in Khan. The applicant was a prominent member of CND, who suspected her phone was being tapped by the security services. If her suspicion was correct, the security services were acting in breach of guidelines issued by the Home Secretary which identified the criteria she/he would invoke to authorise such tapping.⁹² The Court of Appeal concluded that the policy statement created a legitimate expectation (presumably to all citizens) that phones would not—absent overriding public policy considerations—be tapped unless the guideline criteria were satisfied. This would have to be more than a procedural benefit; given the nature of the power in issue, the idea that a potential surveillance target be invited to a hearing to discuss whether the policy should be changed is absurd.⁹³ The substantive benefit claimed is however modest; the Home Secretary may change his policy, but must announce he is doing so and may not depart, except in limited circumstances, from whatever policy is currently in force.

Despite the modesty of this jurisprudential ambition, it appeared to be dismissed as constitutionally inappropriate by the House of Lords in Re Findlay; Re Hogben; Re ⁸⁹ [1984] 1 WLR 1337, [1985] 1 All ER 40, CA.

⁹⁰ [1984] 1 WLR 1337 at 1344; emphasis added. Cf also at 1347: 'vis a vis the recipient of such a letter, a new policy can only be implemented after such recipient has been given a full and serious consideration whether there is some overriding public interest which justifies a departure from the procedures stated in the letter'.

⁹¹ [1987] 1 WLR 1482, [1987] 2 All ER 518.

⁹² We might note that ten years later, the supposedly subversive Ms Ruddock was a Minister in the first Blair government.

⁹³ Cf Forsyth C (1997) 'Wednesbury protection of substantive legitimate expectations' Public Law 375. The point being that a hearing would obviously alert a suspect to the benefit of no longer using her phone.

Honeyman; Re Matthews.⁹⁴ The policy in question in this case was when prisoners became eligible for parole. In late-1983, the Home Secretary altered government policy on this matter. The previous policy was that prisoners became eligible for parole after serving one third of their sentence; under the new policy, half of the sentence would have to be served. The applicants argued, inter alia, that the change of policy was unlawful in so far as it frustrated their legitimate expectations to be eligible for parole after one third of their sentence. This was perhaps too ambitious an argument to make. It goes much beyond Khan, in that it leaves no scope for 'overriding public policy considerations' to enable the Home Secretary to amend the initial policy. As such, it essentially invited the court to adopt an appellate jurisdiction. That invitation was unsurprisingly refused. Lord Scarman's sole judgment held that while the prisoners may have had a legitimate expectation, it could only be an expectation to be treated in a procedurally fair fashion in accordance with whatever policy the government had in force at the time: 'Any other view would entail the conclusion that the unfettered discretion conferred by the statute upon the minister can in some cases be restricted so as to hamper, or even to prevent, changes of policy'.⁹⁵ It is unfortunate that Lord Scarman should suggest that the Home Secretary's discretion in this matter was 'unfettered', as it was obviously subject to Wednesbury constraints. The thrust of his conclusion is however clear; that no procedural failing can initiate a change in the scope of a government body's substantive discretion.⁹⁶

The opposing lead counsel in Findlay (Stephen Sedley QC for the applicant and John Laws for the government) were both sitting as High Court judges in the mid-1990s, when they produced very different opinions on the substantive legitimate expectation issue. In R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Richmond-upon-Thames London Borough Council,⁹⁷ Laws J faced an attempt by several London councils to bind the Secretary of State—unless overriding public policy reasons justified a contrary decision—to respect the substance of a promise made to limit the number of flights permitted to land at and depart from Heathrow airport. Richmond's counsel, Richard Gordon QC, invoked Lord Denning in Liverpool Taxi and Parker LJ in Khan to support the existence of this limited notion of a substantive legitimate expectation. Laws J dismissed Mr Gordon's argument as 'barren'. One might however suggest that Laws J's approach perpetuated the judiciary's familiar unwillingness to accept that there is a clear distinction to be drawn between ordering a Minister to reach one particular decision (ie an appellate jurisdiction) and limiting his/her room for substantive manoeuvre to decisions underpinned by overriding public policy considerations. The scope inherent in the latter concept may be substantial; it will just not be so wide as permitted by the irrationality test.⁹⁸

Sedley J's judgment in *R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p Hamble (Offshore) Fisheries Ltd*⁹⁹ accepted that the creation of a legitimate expectation by a government body did entitle the court to assess if a decision which would disappoint that ⁹⁴ [1985] AC 318, [1984] 3 All ER 801, HL. ⁹⁵ [1985] AC 318 at 338.

⁹⁶ Astute commentators might have suggested that Lord Scarman's endorsement of orthodox principle was confined to this particular power, as, following the above quotation, he continued: 'Bearing in mind the complexity of the issues which the Secretary of State has to consider and the importance of the public interest in the administration of parole I cannot think that Parliament intended the discretion to be restricted in this way': ibid. This supposition is rather contradicted, however, by Lord Diplock's approval of Lord Scarman's reasoning in Hughes v Department of Health and Social Security ([1985] AC 776 at 788, HL), a case concerning the ostensibly far more justiciable issue of civil servants' retirement ages. It was at this time, we might recall, that Lord Diplock floated in GCHQ the possibility that proportionality could become a ground of review. He too evidently saw no link between proportionality and the recognition of substantive legitimate expectations.

⁹⁷ [1994] 1 WLR 74, [1994] 1 All ER 577.

⁹⁸ See especially the passage at [1994] 1 WLR 74 at 92–96.

⁹⁹ [1995] 2 All ER 714.

expectation was ‘fair’ in substantive terms. He recognised that this did not equate to the court assuming an appellate jurisdiction (although he did not explicitly characterise his principle as a proportionality test):

To postulate this is not to place the judge in the seat of the minister...[I]t is the court’s task to recognise the constitutional importance of ministerial freedom to formulate and to reformulate policy; but it is equally the court’s duty to protect the interests of those individuals whose expectation of different treatment has a legitimacy which in fairness outtops the policy choice which threatens to frustrate it.¹⁰⁰

The principle may better have been framed with a qualifying adverb (‘clearly’ or ‘markedly’ perhaps) attached to ‘outtops’; unqualified, the verb does rather hint at an (almost) appellate power. Unqualified or no, however, Sedley J’s reasoning was promptly refuted as ‘heretical’ and explicitly overruled by the Court of Appeal in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Hargreaves.¹⁰¹ Hargreaves’ position was closely analogous to that of Findlay, although the benefit in issue in his case was a prisoner’s entitlement to ‘home leave’ rather than parole. At the time of Hargreaves’ commitment to prison, the government’s policy was that prisoners would be eligible for home leave, subject to good behaviour, after serving a third of their sentence. This policy was outlined in a letter given to prisoners on arrival in gaol. Prisoners also signed something called a ‘compact’, in which they were informed that certain benefits (including home leave) would be available to them if their behaviour was satisfactory. After Hargreaves was gaoled, the Home Secretary altered government policy on home leave, extending the qualifying period from one third to one half of the sentence.¹⁰²

Rather curiously, the Court of Appeal held that no legitimate expectation arose on the facts of this case, on the basis that no clear indication had ever been given to the prisoners that home leave became available at a particular point in their sentences.¹⁰³ Even if such an expectation had arisen, however, it could do no more than had been identified in Findlay; that is entitle Hargreaves to have his case considered in accordance with whatever (rational) policy was in force at the time. The Court approved the reasoning as well as the result of Lord Scarman’s judgment in Findlay.

The scope of the legitimate expectation principle was then further elaborated by the Court of Appeal in R v Secretary of State for Education, ex p Begbie.¹⁰⁴ The case concerned the ‘Assisted Places’ scheme, promoted by the first Thatcher administration and enacted in the Education Act 1980, under which some children had their fees to attend private sector schools paid by the government. Prior to the 1997 general election, the Labour Party had indicated that it would abolish the scheme should it be elected to form a government. The issue raised in Begbie was whether various statements made by Labour politicians before and after the 1997 election about continued funding of places for children who had entered the scheme prior to its projected abolition had generated a substantive legitimate expectation on the part of the applicant (who had a child in that position).

The Court of Appeal saw no basis for assuming that any statements made by politicians while in opposition could generate a substantive legitimate expectation when such politicians subsequently gain government office. That conclusion seems unavoidable, given that in legal terms the politician had no governmental authority when the representation was made. The judgment also indicated that where a government body’s initial position

¹⁰⁰ Ibid, at 731.

¹⁰¹ [1997] 1 WLR 906.

¹⁰² There was no suggestion that this was an irrational decision.

¹⁰³ See the forceful criticism of the Court’s conclusion on this point in Forsyth (1997) op cit.

¹⁰⁴ [2000] 1 WLR 1115.

rested on a mistake or incompetence on its part, it should be permitted to resile from that position. A further welcome development for a government body's perspective was that the Court firmly indicated that some degree of detrimental reliance on the applicant's part was required in cases where the representation relied upon was made to a specific person rather than the public at large. Perhaps rather confusingly however, the court also suggested that a substantive legitimate expectation could arise from a policy statement to the public at large; in which case no detrimental reliance would be required.¹⁰⁵

It seemed likely that widespread judicial acceptance of even a partial substantive legitimate expectation would have to await judicial recognition of proportionality as a legitimate ground of substantive review. It is no coincidence that the notion of a substantive legitimate expectation has long been an element of the ECJ's general principles of law existing alongside, and closely overlapping with, the principle of proportionality. Indeed, it might sensibly be argued that some cases often invoked as examples of the ECJ applying the substantive legitimate expectation principle could better be classified as examples of the ECJ using the proportionality test, in so far as the legitimate expectation was held to trigger a substantial narrowing of the government body's substantive discretion rather than to empower the Court to specify the content of the decision made.¹⁰⁶ There have been instances when the ECJ has invoked the concept to bind a Community body to the precise detail of a particular representation,¹⁰⁷ but generally the principle has been used to reduce rather than eliminate the decision-maker's discretion.

A substantive legitimate expectation by another name?

The judgment of the Court of Appeal in *R v North and East Devon Health Authority, ex p Coughlan*¹⁰⁸ appeared to circumvent this potentially thorny question by labelling the ground of substantive review that the courts should apply in such circumstances as 'unfairness' or 'abuse of power'. Ms Coughlan was a severely disabled person, who had been placed by the health authority in a particular residential facility and promised that the facility would be 'a home for life'. For financial reasons, the authority subsequently wished to close the facility and relocate Ms Coughlan. The Court of Appeal expressly approved the reasoning deployed in Khan and Hamble Fisheries; the health authority should be permitted to resile from the substance of its promise to Ms Coughlan only to satisfy 'an overriding public interest'. More significantly, the Court confirmed that the evaluation of whether there was such an interest was a matter for the court itself. On the ¹⁰⁵ [2000] 1 WLR 1115 at 133 per Sedley LJ:

But, Mr. Beloff [counsel for Ms Begbie] submits, reliance is not a necessary precondition of enforcement of a legitimate expectation. He cites the passage at paragraph 13–030 of de Smith, Woolf & Jowell, Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 5th ed., p. 574, from which Peter Gibson L.J. has quoted the key passage. I have no difficulty with the proposition that in cases where government has made known how it intends to exercise powers which affect the public at large it may be held to its word irrespective of whether the applicant had been relying specifically upon it. The legitimate expectation in such a case is that government will behave towards its citizens as it says it will. But where the basis of the claim is, as it is here, that a pupil-specific discretion should be exercised in certain pupil's favour, I find it difficult to see how a person who has not clearly understood and accepted a representation of the decision-maker to that effect can be said to have such an expectation at all. A hope no doubt, but not an expectation.

¹⁰⁶ See especially the discussion of Mulder v EC Council and EC Commission: C-104/89, C-37/90 [1992] ECR I-3061, ECJ in Forsyth (1997) op cit and Craig P (1996) 'Substantive legitimate expectations in domestic and Community law' Cambridge LJ 289–312. See also Sofrimport SARL v EC Commission: C-152/88 [1990] ECR I-2477, ECJ, and CNTA SA v EC Commission: 74/74 [1975] ECR 533, ECJ.

¹⁰⁷ Most notably the 'staff salaries' case EC Commission v EC Council: 81/72 [1973] ECR 575, ECJ.

¹⁰⁸ [2001] QB 213, [2000] 3 All ER 850, CA.

basis of the information before it, the Court of Appeal concluded that no such overriding public interest existed.

The ‘fairness’ label has a pedigree in legitimate expectation case law. As noted above, it formed the basis of Roskill LJ’s decision in Liverpool Taxi. In that case however, its reach was limited to procedural rather than substantive matters. Its invocation in Coughlan as a ground of substantive review lends an unnecessary opacity to this point of law. At one point in the Court’s judgment, Lord Woolf MR observed that; ‘labels are not important’.¹⁰⁹ This might be thought rather disingenuous. While no doubt of little significance to Ms Coughlan and the health authority, the label applied by the court to the ground of review on which it premised its judgment is important in constitutional terms. De facto, the Court of Appeal’s judgment was subjecting the health authority to proportionality review. It is perhaps unfortunate that the Court did not say so explicitly, as it thereby exposes itself to the accusation that it was seeking to expand the reach of judicial review by covert rather than transparent means.¹¹⁰

The Court of Appeal confirmed its preference for the notion of ‘abuse of power’ as a covering label for the analysis of legitimate expectation cases in R v London Borough of Newham, ex p Bibi.¹¹¹ The Court also suggested that no distinction need be drawn between substantive and procedural expectations; the same approach should be adopted in either situation. The Court’s reasoning, which drew heavily on Professor Craig’s analysis¹¹² of the problem, suggested that:

In all legitimate expectation cases, whether substantive or procedural, three practical questions arise. The first question is to what has the public authority, whether by practice or promise, committed itself; the second is whether the authority has acted or proposes to act unlawfully in relation to its commitment; the third is what the court should do.

In Bibi, the local authority has mistakenly believed itself to be under an obligation to grant a secure tenancy¹¹³ in one of its own properties to the applicant. Having promised to do so in a letter to the applicant, the authority then realised that it was not under any such obligation, and resiled from its representation. The Court was not prepared to apply the Coughlan test on these facts; ie to insist that a secure tenancy be granted unless the local authority could demonstrate overriding public policy reasons to justify why that should not be done. The judgment that the local authority had acted unlawfully was ultimately premised on the local authority’s failure to consider what weight it should attach to the fact that it had actually made the promise before deciding not to provide the substantive benefit in issue.

In addition to subsuming the legitimate expectation concept within a wider notion of ‘abuse of power’, Bibi also weakened the relevance of the principle of estoppel in the administrative law context. In a conclusion that is difficult to reconcile with its earlier judgment in Begbie, the Court considered that it was not necessary to found a legitimate ¹⁰⁹ [2001] QB 213 at para 76.

¹¹⁰ In contrast to the view expressed in Begbie, the Court indicated that the principle of a substantive legitimate expectation should be limited to; ‘cases where the expectation is confined to one person or a few people, giving the representation the character of a contract’; (ibid, at para 59). One might also note that the judgment did not necessarily mean that Ms Coughlan will indeed have a ‘home for life’ in that particular facility. The authority might well succeed at some future date in convincing a court that changing circumstances have lent an ‘overriding’ character to its wish to close the facility down.

¹¹¹ [2001] EWCA Civ 607, [2002] 1 WLR 237.

¹¹² Craig P (5th edn, 2003) Administrative law pp 418–431.

¹¹³ This being the type of tenancy introduced by the Housing Act 1980: see ‘Housing—individuated and collective privatisation’, ch 10, p 324 above.

expectation—as it would be to found a claim in estoppel—that the claimant had relied to her detriment on the representation made.¹¹⁴

The severance between the legitimate expectation and estoppel principles was subsequently underlined by the House of Lords in R v East Sussex County Council, ex p Reprotech Ltd.¹¹⁵ The case rested on facts similar to those in the Lever Finance and Western Fish litigation, but the House of Lords indicated that such facts should in future be approached in a quite different way:

It is true that in early cases such as... Lever (Finance) Ltd v Westminster Corp..., Lord Denning MR used the language of estoppel in relation to planning law. At that time the public law concepts of abuse of power and legitimate expectation were very undeveloped and no doubt the analogy of estoppel seemed useful. In the Western Fish case the Court of Appeal tried its best to reconcile these invocations of estoppel with the general principle that a public authority cannot be estopped from exercising a statutory discretion or performing a public duty.... It seems to me that in this area, public law has already absorbed whatever is useful from the moral values which underlie the private law concept of estoppel and the time has come for it to stand upon its own two feet.¹¹⁶

It has been suggested that the Reprotech decision marks the ‘end of estoppel’ as a ground of judicial review.¹¹⁷ That contention seems soundly based in respect of land use planning law, and indeed in respect of other areas of government activity which raise broad questions of public interest. Whether it will have a pervasive effect remains to be seen.¹¹⁸

But, notwithstanding the innovations which appear to have been introduced by the substantive legitimate expectation case law, it must be emphasised that all of the cases discussed in this section have involved attempts to bind government bodies to substantively intra vires decisions. The argument that the common law could recognise the concept of a substantive legitimate expectation as a device to overcome the classic Hulkin estoppel dilemma (ie whether one should, to avoid substantive injustice to an innocent citizen, bind a government body to a decision it had no power to reach) has yet to be successfully made.¹¹⁹ It would at present seem no more feasible to reach that destination through the legitimate expectation route than through the mechanism of estoppel.¹²⁰ That it is possible to sustain that result in EC law—or, the example deployed in Forsyth’s influential critique, in German law¹²¹—is of little relevance to domestic law. In both EC and German law, the powers ostensibly bestowed by a ‘legislature’ on an executive body are themselves subject to higher legal rules; the Treaty and the ECJ’s own general principles of law within ¹¹⁴ [2002] 1 WLR 237 at paras 27–31.

¹¹⁵ [2002] UKHL 8, [2003] 1 WLR 348, [2002] 4 All ER 58. ¹¹⁶ [2003] 1 WLR 348 at para 35.

¹¹⁷ Purdue M (2002) ‘The end of estoppel in public law’ Journal of Planning and Environmental Law 509.

¹¹⁸ Interestingly in the light of Reprotech, the broad thrust of recent legitimate expectation decisions might be characterised as lending the idea a character which is increasingly akin to estoppel, in the sense both of requiring that the representation be targeted at a specific audience and that, in general, the applicant can demonstrate reliance on the representation; see for example Nadarajah v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2005] EWCA Civ 1363; R (Wheeler) v Office of the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [2008] EWHC 1409 (Admin) and R (Bancoult) v Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (No.2). [2008] UKHL 61; [2009] 1 AC 453. For a summary of the recent legitimate expectation cases, see Knigh, C (2009) ‘Expectations in transition’ Public Law 15.

For a more reflective conceptual analysis see Watson J (2010) ‘Clarity and ambiguity: a new approach to the legitimacy in the law of legitimate expectations’ (2010) Legal Studies 633.

¹¹⁹ See ‘Estoppel’, ch 14, pp 461–464 above.

¹²⁰ It does now seem that such an outcome could arise through the provisions of the Human Rights Act 1998; see Stretch v United Kingdom [2003] EHRR 320.

¹²¹ (1988) op cit.

the Community's legal system, and the terms of the constitution in Germany. In these legal systems, the ultra vires problem is much less acute than in the UK.¹²²

The content of procedural fairness—legal representation and an obligation to give reasons for decisions

An entitlement to representation by counsel is regarded as an essential element of the procedural protection afforded to litigants in a criminal trial. The entitlement is however far less widely available in respect of hearings held by governmental bodies other than courts.

The applicant in *Pett v Greyhound Racing Association Ltd*¹²³ had been accused of doping his greyhounds. The Association, which policed the ethics of greyhound racing, announced that he would be subject to disciplinary proceedings and refused to allow him to be represented by counsel. Pett subsequently sought an interlocutory injunction to prevent the hearing being held until he had established whether he had a right to counsel at the hearing. Lord Denning indicated that he thought Pett's claim was well-founded:

It is not every man who has the ability to defend himself on his own. He cannot bring out the points in his own favour, or the weaknesses in the other side. He may be tongue-tied or nervous, confused or wanting in intelligence... If justice is to be done he ought to have the help of someone to speak for him. And who better than a lawyer...¹²⁴

Lord Denning (supported by Davies and Russell LJ) appeared to limit the reach of this principle to cases where a person's reputation and livelihood was at stake. The above passage was however strictly obiter. At the full trial, Pett v Greyhound Racing Association Ltd (No 2),¹²⁵ Lyell J reached the conclusion that even applicants in Mr Pett's position had no automatic right to representation. That their reputations and livelihoods might be at stake was not sufficient to trigger this level of protection.

Nor was the Court of Appeal prepared to accept that this entitlement should be extended to prisoners facing disciplinary proceedings by a Governor or Board of Visitors. In Fraser v Mudge, Roskill LJ offered what—from a policy perspective—might be regarded as the other side of the coin to the reasoning advanced by Lord Denning in Pett:

One looks to see what are the broad principles underlying these rules. They are to maintain discipline in person by proper, swift and speedy decisions, whether by the governor of the visitors; and it seems to me that the requirements of natural justice do not make it necessary that a person against whom disciplinary proceedings are pending should as of right be entitled to be represented by a solicitor or counsel or both.¹²⁶

A parallel line of case law addressed the separate question of whether, even if an applicant had no automatic right of representation, the decision-maker might nonetheless be obliged to consider if in the circumstances of the particular case, such representation should be permitted. The Court of Appeal had lent this principle a potentially expansive reach in Enderby Town Football Club Ltd v Football Association Ltd,¹²⁷ emphasising that no body should adopt a rigid rule never to permit representation.

In R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Tarrant,¹²⁸ the High Court held that it would be irrational for a Board of Visitors to refuse to allow representation ¹²² It would of course arise if the executive decision in question was ultra vires the EC Treaties or the German constitution respectively. ¹²³ [1969] 1 QB 125, CA.

¹²⁴ Ibid, at 132. ¹²⁵ [1970] 1 QB 46, [1969] 2 All ER 221.

¹²⁶ [1975] 1 WLR 1132 at 1134, CA. ¹²⁷ [1971] Ch 591, [1971] 1 All ER 215, CA.

¹²⁸ [1985] QB 251, [1984] 1 All ER 799.

where there was scope for doubt as to whether a prisoner's behaviour fell within the legal definition of a particular offence (in this case 'mutiny'). Representation need not however be permitted if all that was in issue was a question of fact, even if the offence charged (in this case assault) could attract substantial penalties. Some indication that Tarrant applied this principle too generously was subsequently given by the House of Lords in R v Board of Visitors of HM Prison, The Maze, ex p Hone, in which the Court stressed that allowing legal representation on a routine basis would have the unwelcome results of causing: 'wholly unnecessary delays in many cases, to the detriment of all concerned including the prisoner charged, and to wholly unnecessary waste of time and money, contrary to the public interest'.¹²⁹

The common law had until very recently been as reluctant to recognise a general duty that government bodies give reasons for their decisions as it has been to grant applicants an entitlement to legal representation. In the aftermath of the Crichel Down controversy,¹³⁰ Parliament imposed such a duty on a wide range of statutory bodies in the Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1958. That bodies were not brought within the remit of this Act might imply that Parliament did not intend that the common law should subject them to a similar obligation. The argument against the recognition of this doctrine as a general facet of procedural fairness is largely one of the time and expense that it would impose upon decision-makers. A lesser argument is that giving reasons may compromise the anonymity of informants, as for example in Benaim and Khaida. It is however clear that both the instrumental and intrinsic justifications for a concern with procedural fairness have especial resonance in respect of this particular content issue.¹³¹ In addition, the giving of reasons would make subsequent review of or appeal against the decision in question more straightforward. These factors may explain the courts' evidently greater willingness to apply the doctrine in a more extensive, if piecemeal fashion in recent years.

The Court of Appeal's judgment in *R v Civil Service Appeal Board, ex p Cunningham*¹³² is a good illustration of this trend. The Civil Service Appeal Board (CSAB) performed the role of an industrial tribunal in relation to civil servants. Under the terms of the Civil Service Code, the CSAB was to treat civil servants no less favourably than they would be treated by an industrial tribunal applying the terms of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978. Cunningham, a prison officer, maintained that the compensation awarded to him by the CSAB was far lower than he would have been given by an industrial tribunal. The CSAB had not offered any reasons for its decisions. The Court of Appeal rejected the proposition that the common law imposed a general duty to give reasons on government bodies. It nonetheless concluded that reasons should be given in this situation. This was in part because the CSAB's function 'mirrored' that of industrial tribunals, which were required to give reasons; in part because the Code had generated a legitimate expectation that reasons should be given; and in part because the imposition of that requirement would not have any obviously adverse implications for the administrative process. The obligation was however to be limited to 'outline reasons'; the CSAB did not have to provide full details of its reasoning. In Lord Donaldson MR's opinion 'fairness requires a tribunal such as the board to give sufficient reasons for its decision to enable the parties to know the issues to which it addressed its mind and that it acted lawfully'.¹³³

¹²⁹ [1988] 2 WLR 177 at 186, HL.

¹³⁰ See 'Issues of competence', ch 9, p 278 above.

¹³¹ Richardson G (1986) op cit; Craig (1993) op cit pp 310–316.

¹³² [1991] 4 All ER 310, CA.

¹³³ Ibid, at 320.

Subsequently in R v Parole Board, ex p Wilson,¹³⁴ the Court of Appeal imposed a similar duty on the Parole Board's decision as to whether a prisoner serving a life sentence should be refused parole on the basis that his release would pose a danger to the public. The principle was extended in *R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Doody*¹³⁵ to encompass the Home Secretary's powers to fix the minimum period that prisoners sentenced to life had to serve before they became eligible for parole.¹³⁶ This conclusion was presented by Lord Mustill as part of; 'a perceptible trend towards an insistence on greater openness, or if one prefers the contemporary jargon, "transparency", in the making of administrative decisions'.¹³⁷

This approach appeared to spill over into other areas of the government process. In R v London Borough of Lambeth, ex p Walters, the High Court held that such a duty to give reasons attached to all aspects of the homelessness provisions of the Housing Act 1985, notwithstanding the fact that a local authority was placed under specific statutory duty to give reasons in respect of particular decisions under the Act.¹³⁸ Walters was however promptly disapproved by the Court of Appeal in R v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council, ex p Grillo.¹³⁹ The Court ruled that this was not an area where the common law 'should supply the omission of the legislature'. While the giving of reasons might be desirable as an element of 'good and courteous administration', the terms of the Act negated the inference of any general duty to do so.

Sedley J's judgment in R v Higher Education Funding Council, ex p Institute of Dental Surgery reinforced the view that there would be limits to the scope of the duty to give reasons. The decision in issue was an evaluation of the research activity of an academic institution. Sedley J regarded this as an essentially non-justiciable question, and thus one which the common law would not require to be supported with reasons.¹⁴⁰ The judgment was also however notable for Sedley J's suggestion that certain classes of decisions should be subject to a duty to give reasons; these being those which affected personal liberty or which appeared aberrant in substantive terms.

These categories were extended by the Court of Appeal in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Fayed.¹⁴¹ Fayed had made an unsuccessful application for British nationality under the terms of the British Nationality Act 1981, which had been rejected by the Home Office in the most cursory of terms; ('after careful consideration your application has been refused'). Section 44(2) of the Act expressly provided that the Home Secretary need not give any reasons for any decision granting or refusing citizenship. The Court concluded that but for that provision, the common law would have imposed a duty to provide clear reasons for a refusal of citizenship, given the importance of the decision to the applicant concerned.

¹³⁴ [1992] QB 740, [1992] 2 All ER 576, CA.

¹³⁵ [1994] 1 AC 531, sub nom Doody v Secretary of State for the Home Department, [1993] 3 All ER 92, HL.

¹³⁶ See Craig P (1994) 'The common law, reasons and administrative justice' Cambridge LJ 282.

¹³⁷ [1994] 1 AC 531 at 561.

¹³⁸ [1994] 2 FCR 336. For comment see Loveland (1995) op cit pp 344–346. The rationale of the authority's argument was that the explicit requirement that an authority give reasons in respect of particular parts of the Act implied that it need not do so in respect of the remaining parts of the Act.

¹³⁹ [1996] 2 FCR 56, 28 HLR 94.

¹⁴⁰ 'It may be a misfortune for the applicant that the court, which in Cunningham's case could readily evaluate the contrast between what the board awarded and what an industrial tribunal would have awarded, cannot begin to evaluate the comparative worth of research in clinical dentistry; but it is a fact of life: [1994] 1 All ER 651 at 670.

¹⁴¹ [1998] 1 WLR 763, [1997] 1 All ER 228.

Conclusion

The Fayed decision exemplifies the argument that in recent years the courts have been applying a more stringent set of procedural criteria to the making of governmental decisions. In addition to extending the reach of the procedural fairness principle, the courts have been taking (modest) steps also to enhance its content. This area of law still retains however a considerable degree of imprecision, especially on the question of exactly what procedural fairness entails. The point is perhaps best put by Lord Bridge's now oft-quoted comment in Lloyd v McMahon:

My Lords, the so-called rules of natural justice are not engraved on tablets of stone... [W]hat the requirements of fairness demand when any body... has to make a decision which will affect the rights of individuals depends on the character of the decision-making body, the kind of decision it has to make and the statutory or other framework in which it operates... [T]he courts will not only require the procedure in the statute to be followed, but will readily imply so much and no more to be introduced by way of additional procedural safeguards as will ensure the attainment of fairness.¹⁴²

II. The rule against bias

The second limb of the natural justice doctrine has proven rather less complicated than the audi alterem partem principle.¹⁴³ The rule against bias (nemo iudex sua causa—'no-one may be a judge in his own cause') is concerned to ensure that government decision-makers do not have a personal interest in decisions that they take. This has long been held to be a fundamental tenet of English public law. The strength and longevity of the rule is neatly illustrated by recalling Dr Bonham's Case.¹⁴⁴ The legislation which Coke CJ had suggested was 'against common right or reason' in that case had in effect allowed a governmental body to settle disputes in which it was a party. In the post-revolutionary era, Parliament may if it wishes (subject now to the constraints of EC law) permit such bias, but the undesirability of such situations is now so deeply embedded in the common law that only the most explicit of statutory authorisations could achieve that effect.

The types of bias considered problematic at common law might crudely be labelled as either 'financial' or 'ideological' interests. Such interests may give rise (depending on the intensity of the interest) to the automatic disqualification of a particular decision-maker, or to disqualification if it is established that a suspicion of bias could be thought to be well-founded. The courts' concern has generally been focused not on actual bias, but on the possibility that bias may arise. Much of the case law in this area has been concerned with 'judicial' decision-making, a term broadly defined to include judges per se, magistrates, jurors and executive bodies performing judicial or quasi-judicial functions. The relevance of the principle to purely 'administrative' decisions is less pronounced.

Direct financial interests

The objections to a decision-maker having a direct financial interest in a given decision are obvious. She may favour her own financial concerns above the public interest and so produce a substantively undesirable decision; and even if she does not do so anyone else affected by the decision might reasonably suspect that she has. The rule against bias had been forcefully applied in this situation.

¹⁴² [1987] AC 625 at 702–703, [1987] 1 All ER 1118 at 1161.

¹⁴³ A thorough and incisive view of the complexities of this issue is offered in Beatson and Matthews op cit ch 7.

¹⁴⁴ See 'Pre-1688—natural or divine law', ch 2, p 21 above.

The leading case is Dimes v Grand Junction Canal.¹⁴⁵ The case involved a claim that Lord Cottenham LC had sat in proceedings involving a company in which he had shares. There was no suggestion that he had acted in a biased way; the applicant's objection was to the obvious risk that Lord Cottenham's financial involvement would undermine public confidence in the Court's impartiality. The judgment thus had to be set aside. Lord Campbell put the point very clearly:

it is of the last importance that the maxim that no man is to be a judge in his own cause should be held sacred... This will be a lesson to all inferior tribunals to take care not only that in their decrees they are not influenced by their personal interest, but to avoid the appearance of labouring under such an influence.¹⁴⁶

The incompatibility of a judge's financial interest with the unbiased administration of justice was reiterated in 1866 by Blackburn J in R v Rand: 'There is no doubt that any direct pecuniary interest, however small, in the subject of inquiry, does disqualify a person from acting as a judge in the matter'.¹⁴⁷ A judge who has such an interest is subject to what was later termed 'automatic disqualification' from the case concerned. The strength of the suspicion that has to arise before bias is established is largely unproblematic when direct¹⁴⁸ financial interests are at stake, but it becomes a much more difficult question when the financial interest is rather more oblique.

Indirect financial interests—a mere suspicion or a real likelihood

The difficulties that may be caused by claims of indirect financial bias are well illustrated by the judgments in *R v Sussex Justices, ex p McCarthy*¹⁴⁹ and R v Barnsley Licensing Justices, ex p Barnsley and District Licensed Victuallers' Association.¹⁵⁰ McCarthy arose because a solicitor who worked on a part-time basis as clerk to the Justices had sat in a criminal case concerning a car accident which involved a defendant who a client of his firm was suing in a civil action arising from the same accident. There was no suggestion that the clerk/solicitor had actually acted in a biased fashion in the criminal case. But this was not a relevant issue. Lord Hewart CJ again stressed that it was appearances that mattered:

A long line of cases shows that it is... of fundamental importance that justice should not only be done, but should manifestly and undoubtedly be seen to be done... Nothing is to be done which creates even a suspicion that there has been an improper interference with the course of justice.¹⁵¹

The notion of a mere 'suspicion' is however a very wide test; it seems to suggest there need only be a possibility of bias, not a strong probability. This was narrowed somewhat by the presumption that the 'suspicion' is supposed to arise in the mind of a dispassionate observer, not a party to the proceedings (who would be likely, because of her own bias, to magnify any suspicions as to the impartiality of the decision-maker).

¹⁴⁵ (1852) 3 HL Cas 759, 10 ER 301, HL.

¹⁴⁶ 10 ER 301 at 315, HL.

¹⁴⁷ (1866) LR 1 QB 230 at 232. The court nonetheless concluded that the financial interest in issue in this case—local justices' status as trustees of a hospital and friendly society which had a financial stake in the outcome of the decision—did not amount to a direct interest.

¹⁴⁸ This is in itself a potentially troublesome issue.

¹⁴⁹ [1924] 1 KB 256.

¹⁵⁰ [1960] 2 QB 167, [1960] 2 All ER 703, CA.

¹⁵¹ [1924] 1 KB 256 at 259.

In R v Barnsley Licensing Justices, ex p Barnsley and District Licensed Victuallers' Association, the decision at issue was the justices' grant of a licence to sell alcohol to the local co-operative society—an organisation of which all the justices were members. As such, they were entitled to a share of any profits that the society might make. The Court of Appeal concluded that this interest was sufficient to raise a real likelihood of bias. The case is however most notable for Devlin LJ's judgment, in which he intimated that Lord Hewart CJ's 'even a suspicion' test in McCarthy was too broadly stated:

[I]n my judgment, it is not the test. We have not to inquire what impression might be left on the minds of the present applicants or on the minds of the public generally. We have to satisfy ourselves that there was a real likelihood of bias, and not merely satisfy ourselves that that was the sort of suspicion which might reasonably get abroad.¹⁵²

Both Ormerod LJ and Lord Evershed MR also used the 'real likelihood' formulation in their judgments, which led to the suggestion that the bias test would now be less easily satisfied than hitherto.

The law was then thrown into a state of some confusion by the subsequent Court of Appeal judgment in *R v London Rent Assessment Panel Committee, ex p Metropolitan Properties Co (IFGC) Ltd.*¹⁵³ Lannon was a solicitor who also chaired a rent assessment committee. His father was in dispute with his (the father's) landlord. Lannon was advising his father. Lannon subsequently sat on a rent assessment committee which set the rents (at an extremely low level) at another property owned by the landlord. Lord Denning MR accepted that Mr Lannon's financial interest in the rent level set was 'remote... indirect and uncertain'. He nevertheless quashed the committee's decision. He did so by invoking the 'real likelihood' formula, but lent that formula a meaning that seemed to come close to the 'even a suspicion' test by observing that in Barnsley Devlin LJ 'appears to have limited [the McCarthy] principle considerably, but I would stand by it'.¹⁵⁴ He then offered a test which seemed to include elements of both Lord Hewart CJ's and Devlin LJ's ostensibly disparate approaches to this issue:

[I]n considering whether there was a real likelihood of bias... the court looks at the impression which would be given to other people... [I]f right-minded persons would think that, in the circumstances, there was a real likelihood of bias on his part, then he should not sit... Nevertheless, there must appear to be a real likelihood of bias. Surmise or conjecture is not enough... The reason is plain enough. Justice must be rooted in confidence: and confidence is destroyed when right-minded people go away thinking: 'The judge was biased'.¹⁵⁵

The result of this rather opaque reasoning was that administrative law now seemed to harbour two formulae in respect of indirect pecuniary interests; 'suspicion of bias' (on the part of dispassionate observers) or 'real likelihood of bias' (in the view of the court). Presumably these two formulae did not mean the same thing; the latter test seems to be harder to satisfy. As Beatson and Matthews suggest,¹⁵⁶ this uncertainty generated a good deal of contradictory case law, including judgments which advanced the unlikely proposition that the two formulae did indeed produce just the same test.¹⁵⁷ The point was not subject to exhaustive analysis by the House of Lords until 1993, in R v Gough.¹⁵⁸

¹⁵² [1960] 2 QB 167 at 187, [1960] 2 All ER 703 at 715.

¹⁵³ [1969] 1 QB 577. ¹⁵⁴ Ibid., at 599. ¹⁵⁵ Ibid.

¹⁵⁶ Op cit at pp 287–290.

¹⁵⁷ R v Liverpool City Justices, ex p Topping [1983] 1 WLR 119, [1983] 1 All ER 490.

¹⁵⁸ [1993] AC 646, [1993] 2 All ER 724, HL.

Clarifying the law? the Gough formulae

Gough had been convicted of robbery. After the trial, he recognised one of the jurors as his brother's next door neighbour, and made the rather speculative assertion that this created a suspicion of bias sufficient for the verdict to be quashed. The claim received short shrift from the court. The primary concern in the judgment was to clarify what Lord Goff referred to as the 'bewildering' state of the law on this point.

Lord Goff (with whom the rest of the court concurred) rooted this uncertainty primarily in the co-existence of the 'suspicion' and 'real likelihood' formulae. He attempted to clarify matters by confirming that a direct pecuniary interest should lead to automatic disqualification. In respect of indirect financial interests—and it seems non-financial interests—the Court offered the following test:

I think it unnecessary... that the court should look at the matter through the eyes of the reasonable man, because the court in cases such as these personifies the reasonable man... [H]aving ascertained the relevant circumstances, the court should ask itself whether, having regard to those circumstances, there was a real danger of bias on the part of the relevant member of the tribunal in question, in the sense that he might unfairly regard... with favour or disfavour, the case of a party to the issue.¹⁵⁹

Lord Goff stressed that he was thinking in terms of a possibility rather than probability of bias, but also managed to convey the impression that his 'real danger' formula was not a simple assertion of the 'mere suspicion' test. The test formulated by Lord Woolf in his concurring judgment seemed, in contrast, to owe rather more to Devlin LJ's views, being framed in terms of: 'a real danger of injustice having occurred as a result of the alleged bias'.¹⁶⁰ One might doubt that Gough allayed the doctrinal confusion over this issue, but its significance has latterly come to be overshadowed by an evident extension of the automatic disqualification principle to ideological as well as financial interests.

Ideological bias in 'judicial' decisions

The question before the House of Lords in *R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Pinochet Ugarte (No 2)*¹⁶¹ was triggered by the attempts of the Spanish government to have Pinochet, the Chilean dictator, extradited from Britain to face trial in Spain for various human rights abuses committed against Spanish citizens in Chile. In Pinochet,¹⁶² the House of Lords had approved the extradition by a majority of three to two. Somewhat unusually, the Court had allowed various interested parties, including Amnesty International, to participate in the proceedings by offering their respective views of the relevant law.

It then emerged that one of the majority, Lord Hoffmann, in addition to being a member of Amnesty, served as a director of an associated charity. Pinochet then argued that this interest amounted to bias which should automatically have excluded Lord Hoffmann from sitting.

The House of Lords subsequently reconvened and concluded that Lord Hoffmann was disqualified from sitting, and that the judgment had to be 'set aside'. The principle outlined in Lord Browne-Wilkinson's leading judgment was clearly expressed:

if the absolute impartiality of the judiciary is to be maintained, there must be a rule which automatically disqualifies a judge who is involved, whether personally or as a Director of ¹⁵⁹ [1993] AC 646 at 670.

¹⁶⁰ Ibid, at 671.

¹⁶¹ [2000] 1 AC 119, [1999] 1 All ER 577, HL.

¹⁶² [2000] 1 AC 61, [1998] 4 All ER 897, HL.

a company, in promoting the same causes in the same organisation as is a party to the suit.¹⁶³

It might readily be thought that Lord Hoffmann's interest was sufficiently remote on these facts to preclude any finding of automatic disqualification. The Gough test would then have come into play, and it would have been for Pinochet to establish that there was 'a real danger of injustice having occurred'. That would seem a stiff test to surmount on the facts, even if one accepts the questionable contention that a judge's support for an organisation whose raison d'être is to promote respect for international law could amount to 'bias' in the first place.

The judgment does imply that no automatic disqualification would have arisen if Amnesty had not actually intervened in the case, or if Hoffmann had—in previous judgments or academic writings—expressed support for Amnesty's view of the law but was not a member of the group. Whether the Gough test would be met in such circumstances is a matter for speculation.¹⁶⁴

The supposition that Pinochet might prompt a flood of spurious bias claims from disgruntled litigants appeared to be borne out by the various cases joined in Locabail (UK) Ltd v Bayfield Properties Ltd.¹⁶⁵ The alleged bias in Locabail itself was that the judge (who was a QC sitting in a part-time capacity) was a partner in a firm of city solicitors which was acting for a client which was suing the husband of the (de facto) defendant in the action. The contention was that this 'conflict of interest' might be thought to dispose the judge to find in the plaintiff's favour. The Court of Appeal concluded that any financial interest the judge might have was far too tenuous to fall within the Dimes principle of 'automatic disqualification'.¹⁶⁶

Nor did it think the Gough test was met. The judge had no knowledge that his firm (which was very large) was acting against the defendant's husband; thus, as the Court put it: 'How can there be any real danger of bias, or any real apprehension or likelihood of bias, if the judge does not know of the facts that, in argument, are relied upon as giving rise to the conflict of interest'.¹⁶⁷

The same rationale was invoked to dismiss the bias claim raised in O'Callaghan. Here the judge's family firm owned property which was leased to a company against which the applicant was conducting extensive litigation. The judge had no knowledge of the leases, and played no active part in the firm's business decision. His interest was 'nominal and indirect', and thus could not substantiate a bias claim.

The allegation in Williams was wholly absurd. The applicant was engaged in litigation for sexual harassment and racial discrimination against the Inland Revenue. Having lost her claim before an industrial tribunal, Williams then claimed that the Gough test was ¹⁶³ [2000] 1 AC 119 at 135.

¹⁶⁴ See Malleon K (2000) 'Judicial bias and disqualification after Pinochet (No 2)' MLR 119; Jones J (1999) 'Judicial bias and disqualification in the Pinochet case' Public Law 391.

¹⁶⁵ [2000] QB 451, [2000] 1 All ER 65, CA. The case was joined with Timmins v Gormley; Williams v Inspector of Taxes; R v Bristol Betting and Gaming Licensing Committee, ex p O'Callaghan.

¹⁶⁶ The Court of Appeal did seem somewhat to limit the extensive meaning that could be lent to Dimes and Rand, noting that: 'In the context of automatic disqualification the question is not whether the judge has some link with a party involved in a cause before the judge but whether the outcome of that cause could, realistically, affect the judge's interest' ([2000] QB 451 at para 8). It also intimated that it approved recent Australian decisions on this issue which accepted that a de minimis exception should apply to the automatic disqualification principle.

¹⁶⁷ [2000] QB 451 at para 55. This does not imply that McCarthy was wrongly decided. The Court stressed in this case that the solicitors' firm in question was very large, employing 500 lawyers; there could be no sensible expectation that any partner could be familiar with its entire caseload.

met because the tribunal chair, some forty years earlier, had spent three years working for the Inland Revenue. The Court saw no merit in this claim: '[N]o right-thinking person knowing of the connection of [the chair] with the Inland Revenue would feel that there was any danger of bias in this case. The suggestion that there might be was fanciful'.¹⁶⁸

However, in Timmins, the Court did accept that the Gough test was met. The litigation was a personal injury action, in which the plaintiff had been awarded an ostensibly surprisingly large sum. The defendant's insurance company claimed that the judge fell within Gough because he had in recent years written several scathing critiques in professional journals about the way in which insurance companies attempted to refute or minimise their liability in personal injury cases. The Court of Appeal saw no basis for assuming that a judge's extra-judicial writings could per se amount to apparent bias. But a judge who engaged in such activities had to be 'circumspect in the language he uses and the tone in which he expresses himself. It is always inappropriate for a judge to use intemperate language about subjects on which he has adjudicated or will have to adjudicate'.¹⁶⁹ Because the judge in question had used particularly trenchant language in his articles, a real danger of bias could be thought to arise.

Locabail will no doubt deter bias allegations based on a judge's indirect and tenuous financial interest or institutional affiliations.¹⁷⁰ Timmins may however prompt dissatisfied litigants to trawl academic and professional journals for any hint that a judge holds them or their ilk in disfavour. The Court noted it reached its conclusion with 'misgiving'; which may indicate that the judgment was an unfortunate one which ought soon to be reversed. As in Pinochet itself, the conclusion raises the unwelcome inference that we must assume that judges are incapable of recognising and discounting their 'political' views when presiding over litigation.

Further clarifying the law? the Porter v Magill formula

The flurry of litigation on the bias point following Pinochet and Gough promptly led the Court of Appeal, and thereafter the House of Lords, to offer a further refinement of the correct test to apply in respect of this aspect of the procedural fairness doctrine. The Court of Appeal in *Re Medicaments and Related Classes of Goods (No 2)*¹⁷¹ concluded that:

The court must first ascertain all the circumstances which have a bearing on the suggestion that the judge was biased. It must then ask whether those circumstances would lead a fair-minded observer to conclude that there was a real possibility, or a real danger, the two being the same, that the tribunal was biased.¹⁷²

The House of Lords subsequently endorsed this test in Porter v Magill,¹⁷³ save for the further minor modification that the reference to 'real danger' be removed from the formula.

It might be suggested that this drift in the case law evinces a concern to attach greater significance to the second of the two 'intrinsic reasons' identified at the start of this chapter for applying procedural fairness rules to the activities of governmental bodies. But it might also be argued that this strand of administrative law doctrine was becoming bedevilled with an evermore elaborate linguistic superstructure which positively invites disgruntled litigants to engage in ingenious semantic arguments in attempting to overturn unfavourable decisions.

¹⁶⁸ Ibid, at para 96.

¹⁶⁹ Ibid, at para 85.

¹⁷⁰ See now also Taylor v Lawrence [2003] QB 528; discussed below.

¹⁷¹ [2001] 1 WLR 700.

¹⁷² Ibid, at para 85.

¹⁷³ [2002] 2 AC 357.

The Court of Appeal's robust conclusion in *Taylor v Lawrence*¹⁷⁴ might therefore be welcomed as sending such litigants a clear signal that claims of tenuous bias would not succeed. The claimed bias in Taylor arose from the fact that the judge in the case had previously instructed the firm of solicitors representing the successful party to draw up his will. The Court of Appeal held that this was not a matter that could be thought to have any bearing on the judge's conduct. The Court also indicated that it could see little scope for assuming that any credible suspicion of bias could arise simply because a judge and a party's lawyers had a pre-existing professional relationship.

Bias in non-judicial proceedings

A further way of holding that Poplar Council's wage policy that was in issue in Roberts v Hopwood was unlawful would be to suggest that the council had succumbed to bias in making its decision. This bias would be found in the councillor's evident embrace of 'eccentric principles of socialist philanthropy' and 'feminist ambition', motives which the House of Lords considered wholly improper. The obvious problem with such a rationale is that it wholly excludes any legitimate role for political ideology in the making of governmental decisions, a proposition which is obviously nonsensical in the modern era.

It was subsequently made clear in *Franklin v Minister of Town and Country Planning*¹⁷⁵ that a decision-maker was not 'biased' simply because she formulated policy in accordance with her pre-existing political beliefs. Lord Thankerton indicated that the nemo iudex rule has no application to this type of 'political decision':

My Lords, I could wish that the use of the word 'bias' should be confined to its proper sphere. Its proper significance, in my opinion, is to denote a departure from the standard of even handed justice which the law requires from those who occupy judicial...or quasi-judicial office...¹⁷⁶

Personal financial interests will however be just as unacceptable in this context as in respect of judicial decisions. This is clearly illustrated by R v Hendon RDC, ex p Chorley,¹⁷⁷ in which it was held that a suspicion of bias arose if a member of a council planning committee was an estate agent with a financial interest in a piece of land being considered for a grant of planning permission.

Conclusion

The concept of procedural fairness has generated a vast body of case law in the modern era, and will no doubt continue to do so in future. But the law on this point, even when seen in conjunction with the law relating to the traditional substantive grounds on which government action can be held unlawful, offers only a partial picture of the way in which administrative law fits into the broader constitutional principles of the rule of law and the sovereignty of Parliament. Chapters sixteen and seventeen add to that picture by exploring two vital, related issues: which legal procedures must an applicant follow when challenging a government decision; and who is entitled to initiate legal proceedings?

¹⁷⁴ [2003] QB 528.

¹⁷⁵ [1948] AC 87, HL.

¹⁷⁶ Ibid, at 92, HL.

¹⁷⁷ [1933] 2 KB 696.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Reich C (1964) 'The new property' Yale LJ 733

Clark D (1975) 'Natural justice: substance or shadow' Public Law 27

Forsyth C (1988) 'The provenance and protection of legitimate expectations' Cambridge LJ 238

Craig P (1994) 'The common law, reasons and administrative justice' Cambridge LJ 282

Mallleson K (2000) 'Judicial bias and disqualification after Pinochet (No 2)' MLR 119

Case law and legislation

Ridge v Baldwin [1964] AC 40

R v North and East Devon Health Authority, ex p Coughlan [2001] QB 13

Re HK [1967] 2 QB 617

Schmidt v Secretary of State for Home Affairs [1969] 2 Ch 149

R v Gough [1993] AC 646

Porter v Magill [2002] 2 AC 357

R v Liverpool Corpn, ex p Liverpool Taxi Fleet Operators' Association [1972] 2 QB 299

R v East Sussex County Council, ex p Reprotech Ltd [2002] UKHL 8; [2003] 1 WLR 348

Chapter 16

Challenging Governmental Decisions: The Process

Questions as to the legal process which should be followed by claimants seeking to challenge the lawfulness of governmental decisions have assumed a heightened importance within English administrative law in the past thirty years. This trend was triggered by a modification to the Rules of the Supreme Court, introduced in 1977, which was then given statutory form in the Supreme Court Act 1981. The reform introduced a procedural device called the ‘application for judicial review’ (hereafter referred to as AJR). The terminology is itself apt to cause confusion, as a very substantial part of litigation conducted in the field of constitutional and administrative law—which in its entirety is often referred to loosely as ‘judicial review’—was not initiated through the AJR process or its immediate predecessors.

The starting point for analysing this subject is the historical duality within English administrative law of the mechanisms through which citizens might question the lawfulness of government action.¹ This duality might be categorised as one between ‘private law’ and ‘public law’ remedies. In many instances, legal actions against government bodies might take exactly the same procedural form as actions against private individuals. Entick v Carrington, for example, was technically an action for trespass—that is a private law tort—even though its real concern was to establish the lawfulness or otherwise of the government’s claimed power to suppress seditious through the use of general warrants. Similarly, Liversidge v Anderson, an action for unlawful imprisonment, was nominally a private law action (as was habeas corpus), even though its true purpose in that case was to ascertain the meaning of the government’s powers of detention under reg 18B. Equally, the question of whether a government body’s actions were illegal, irrational, or procedurally unfair might arise in an action for breach of contract or restitution. In addition, the private law stream contained the remedies of declaration or injunction; (the former designed to ‘declare’ the law on a particular point, the latter being a coercive order requiring a defendant to cease a particular course of behaviour). These remedies might be sought through procedural devices known as a ‘writ’ or ‘originating summons’.

The ‘public law’ stream contained the three so-called ‘prerogative remedies’ of certiorari, prohibition and mandamus. Certiorari was a device to quash (or invalidate) unlawful decisions; prohibition had the same effect as the injunction; and mandamus was intended to force a government body to exercise its legal powers when it was refusing to do so.

¹ The most helpful, detailed introduction to this issue is provided in successive editions of Craig’s Administrative law.

The private and public law streams had developed for different reasons, and had quite different characteristics. The declaration and injunction were initially designed solely to regulate disputes between private individuals. (This is evidenced quite clearly in the way such cases are styled; eg Anisminic v Foreign Compensation Commission.) The actions took for granted firstly that litigants would have a direct interest in the dispute, and secondly that trivial or vexatious litigation would rarely occur. The development of the private law remedies was informed by two central assumptions. Firstly, that the court's role would often be as finder of both fact and law; ie it would make decisions on the precise merits of a particular issue. Secondly, because the action was designed to resolve disputes between 'individuals', the efficient administration of government would rarely be compromised by such litigation.²

The prerogative remedies, in contrast, developed as a means of ensuring that all government bodies remained within the limits of their lawful powers; individual litigants here were theoretically acting on behalf of the Monarch in seeking to establish if the law had been breached.³ Had Anisminic been an action for certiorari, it would have been styled R v Foreign Compensation Commission, ex p Anisminic. One obvious consequence of this is that the prerogative remedies were traditionally assumed not to be available against the Crown, on the basis that the Crown could not bring legal proceedings against itself.⁴ The development of the remedies also rested on the presumptions firstly that the court's role would generally be simply to establish if an obviously unlawful decision had occurred (ie it would not be looking closely at questions of fact nor reaching any conclusion as to the detailed merits of the governmental decision in issue); and secondly that all prerogative remedy applications would necessarily have implications for the efficient administration of government.

To put the matter crudely, remedies in the private law stream—whether the remedy sought be an action in breach of contract or in tort or an attempt to seek a declaration or injunction through the writ or originating summons route—offered applicants several substantial procedural advantages compared to the prerogative remedies.

Firstly, the private law stream had much longer time limits than the prerogative remedies. Time limits for the declaration or injunction could be as long as six years, while for the prerogative remedies they were generally limited to six months. This difference could obviously be vital if evidence of unlawful government action did not come to light until a year or more after the decision in issue was made. If a six-month limit was enforced, the lawfulness of such decisions could not be assessed, a consequence which would obviously compromise purist understandings of the rule of law. On the other hand, the short time limits for the prerogative remedies served an obvious purpose. Once the limit had expired, a government body could be sure that its decisions could not be quashed by the courts, a factor which might be of great significance to activities such as land or property development.

² The one—major—caveat to this point being that the Crown was regarded as an 'individual' for the purposes of a declaration. It was not possible until the enactment of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 to sue the Crown de jure in contract or tort. Instead, litigants had to proceed through the arcane device of a 'petition of right', in which a nominated official would stand in the place of the Crown as a defendant, and the Crown would underwrite the official's liability; see the first edition of this book at pp 98–99.

³ See the reference to Baggs' Case at 'III. Judicial regulation of government behaviour: the constitutional rationale', ch 3, p 60 above.

⁴ They would however be available against Ministers if the Minister was exercising a statutory power which had been given to the Minister in her personal capacity, rather than to the Crown per se.

Secondly, the prerogative remedies required that the applicant be granted 'leave' to proceed by the court before a full hearing was initiated. Leave was a filter mechanism intended to protect government bodies (and indeed the courts themselves) from having to spend large amounts of time dealing with hopeless or mischievous cases. If the court took the view—on a brief perusal of the applicant's case—that the claim was wholly unmeritorious, leave would be refused, and no time need be spent on assessing the details of the claim. The application for leave, which placed the burden of proof on the plaintiff, was not required for a private law action. Unmeritorious claims could only be struck out at the instigation of the defendant.

Thirdly, the private law remedies came with a strong presumption that extensive discovery of documents and cross-examination of witnesses would be permitted. This was an obvious consequence of the assumption that private law remedies dealt with matters of fact as well as of law, and would often be concerned with imposing a detailed solution on the merits. Discovery and cross-examination were, in contrast, not widely available within the public law stream, as the prerogative remedies had not been designed as fact-finding mechanisms. Clearly, if a government body's allegedly unlawful activity was 'hidden' in its papers or the minds of its officers, the private law stream would have been far more useful to an applicant. Additionally, it was possible to combine declaratory or injunctive relief with damages, which were not available with the prerogative remedies.

Simply put, if the allegedly unlawful nature of the government body's decision was not immediately apparent, a plaintiff was much more likely to win if she could proceed by the declaration or injunction rather than one of the prerogative remedies. In more theoretical terms, this public/private dichotomy can readily be presented as raising a rule of law issue. The more widely that private law procedures were available to applicants, the more rigorously the decisions of government bodies would be examined by courts.

It is important to stress the significance of the linkage between what might on their face seem to be 'mere' matters of procedure within administrative law and the grounds of review themselves. There would be little point in having, for example, rules against unlawful delegation of power, or the fettering of discretion, or rules requiring fair procedures, if strict time limits prevented many decisions from being challenged, or if restrictive provisions as to discovery and cross examination meant that vital information could not be obtained.⁵

There were nonetheless disadvantages to the declaration and injunction. They were accepted as remedies available only at the court's discretion, not as of right. A court might conclude that an application was made too late, or that discovery and cross-examination were not appropriate. Or it might even hold that a claim was well-founded but then refuse to grant relief. Furthermore, it was traditionally held (a tradition lasting until Factortame (No 2)) that injunctions were not available against the Crown. This placed a substantial portion of central government beyond the reach of the injunction, although it was never wholly clear exactly which parts of central government should be regarded as 'the Crown' for these purposes.⁶ Both the declaration and injunction were also subject to restrictive tests of 'locus standi' or 'standing'. We consider this issue in detail in chapter seventeen.

⁵ To frame the matter in crude theoretical terms, the private law route offers a 'red light' approach to the control of government action, while the public law route is notably more 'green light' in nature; see "Red light" and "green light" theories, ch 3, pp 59 above.

⁶ In Nireaha Tamaki v Baker [1901] AC 561, the Privy Council had held that an injunction could lie against a Minister acting in a personal capacity, but not against a Minister acting in an official capacity, when she was in theory the Crown itself. As noted above, this was also an issue in respect of the scope of the prerogative remedies, since the Crown could not act against itself. The Crown could however in theory act against central government bodies which were not part of the Crown. This is too complex an issue to be

At this point we might simply note that it was appreciably more difficult for many applicants to convince the courts that they had locus standi for a declaration or injunction than for the public law remedies. And if an applicant lacked standing (ie was not permitted to 'stand' before the court and argue her case), she could not pursue her action at all.

The detailed history of the inter-relationship between the public and private law streams of administrative law is too complex a matter to be addressed here.⁷ For our limited purposes, it suffices to say that in the first half of the twentieth century the courts appeared to be reluctant to permit the declaration and injunction to be widely used as a means to challenge the exercise of governmental powers. In so far as challenges were permitted, they were steered primarily through the public law route.⁸ In effect, this amounted to the courts favouring a diluted version of the rule of law.

The turning point? Barnard v National Dock Labour Board

The applicant in *Barnard v National Dock Labour Board*⁹ was a dock worker who had been suspended from his job. The power to suspend workers had been given by Parliament to the NDLB. The applicant suspected that, as a matter of routine, this power had been unlawfully delegated to the port manager.¹⁰ There was however no way of establishing this from the notice of suspension. Proof of the point could only be gathered through having discovery of the NDLB's documents and/or by cross-examining its members. Barnard therefore sought a declaration; certiorari would have been a useless remedy. Rather oddly, the defendant made such documents available on receipt of the writ, instead of arguing immediately that the declaration was an inappropriate remedy in this case. The unlawful delegation was thereby revealed. It was not until the case came to court that the NDLB sought to have the action struck out on procedural grounds.

Given that the Court knew for sure that the NDLB's action had been substantively unlawful in this case, the striking out motion was unlikely to succeed. The rationale informing the judgment was well put by Denning LJ:

If the tribunal does not observe the law, what is to be done? The remedy by certiorari is hedged round by limitations and may not be available. Why, then, should not the court intervene by declaration and injunction? If it cannot so intervene, it would mean that the tribunal could disregard the law... In certiorari there is no discovery, whereas in an action for a declaration there is. The plaintiffs only discovered the true position shortly before the trial, about two and a half years after the suspension. That shows that, but for these proceedings, the truth would never have been known.¹¹

Whether the court would have been so ready to lift any procedural barriers to Mr Barnard gaining a substantively just result if he had come to court only with a strong suspicion that unlawful delegation had occurred is open to question. The case is nonetheless of crucial significance in illustrating the intimacy of the linkage between matters of 'mere' procedure and the substantive reach of administrative law. Had the court taken the view that certiorari was the appropriate remedy, the result would have been that both the rule addressed in this book. For an indication of the difficulties it may pose see the discussion of Oladehinde at 'Unlawful delegation of powers', ch 14, p 458 above.

⁷ Successive editions of Craig's Administrative law again provide the most incisive detailed analysis of this issue.

⁸ As noted in ch 15, this was also the period in which the courts frequently took the view that the rules of natural justice did not apply to 'administrative' decisions, or those affecting 'privileges' rather than 'rights'.

⁹ [1953] 2 QB 18, [1953] 1 All ER 1113, CA.

¹⁰ See 'Unlawful delegation of powers', ch 14, pp 455–458 above.

¹¹ [1953] 2 QB 18 at 41, CA.

of law and the sovereignty of Parliament (in their orthodox senses) would have been compromised. In broad terms, Barnard can be seen as heralding a shift in the courts' attitudes both towards government bodies (ie being more willing to subject executive action to scrutiny) and towards the citizen (ie being more willing to protect individual interests against government encroachment). In broader terms, it represented a step towards a more purist understanding of the rule of law.

The Barnard rationale was reinforced by the 1959 decision in Pyx Granite Co Ltd v Ministry of Housing and Local Government.¹² The applicant was attempting to challenge the lawfulness of conditions attached to planning permission. It was out of time to proceed by certiorari, and so sought to use a declaration. The MHLG argued that certiorari should be seen as an exclusive remedy in these circumstances. The Court rejected the contention that the public law route should be the only means through which a plaintiff might challenge the lawfulness of decisions of this sort:

I know of no authority for saying that if an order or decision can be attacked by certiorari the court is debarred from granting a declaration in the appropriate case. The remedies are not mutually exclusive, though no doubt there are some orders, notably convictions before justices, where the only appropriate remedy is certiorari.¹³

This judicial initiative was reinforced in a political sense by the report of the Franks Committee in the mid-1950s in response to the Crichel Down episode.¹⁴ Franks had urged that a far more judicialised approach ought to be taken to the administrative decision-making processes. This created a climate of opinion which regarded government with suspicion, thereby legitimising more extensive court intervention through the relaxation of procedural barriers to effective redress. A good many of the seminal administrative law decisions of the 1960s and 1970s would not have happened without the procedural innovation accepted in Barnard. Anisminic is perhaps the best example, but we might also recall that both Ridge v Baldwin and Padfield were initiated through private law rather than public law procedures. In the early 1960s, there was, Craig suggests, a presumption that: 'The declaration was meant... to be the shining white charger cutting through outmoded limitations encrusted upon the pick and shovel prerogative orders'.¹⁵ That this did not in fact happen seems to be due largely to the restrictive standing tests applied to the declaration.¹⁶ The result was that by the early-1970s English administrative law, notwithstanding the large strides being made in respect of the grounds of judicial review that might be invoked to challenge government action, was riven with a profound ambiguity on matters of legal process; an ambiguity which, in some cases, might mean that entirely meritorious cases were never properly argued in court.

The Order 53 reforms

The Law Commission turned its attention to this conceptual confusion in 1971. Its first proposal was that English administrative law should recognise an entirely separate procedural system for public law matters, akin in some senses to the rigid divide between public and private law in France. This proposal attracted substantial criticism, on the grounds that the Law Commission had not satisfactorily defined what was meant by 'public law', that the proposal was not compatible with the English legal tradition, and that an exclusive public law system—if modeled on the existing prerogative remedies—might ¹² [1960] AC 260, HL.

¹³ Ibid, at 290; per Lord Goddard CJ.

¹⁴ See 'Issues of competence', ch 9, pp 278–280 above.

¹⁵ (1994) op cit p 549.

¹⁶ Ibid; the issue is discussed in detail in ch 17 below.

substantially weaken the courts' capacity to subject government decision-making to effective scrutiny.

The reforms the Commission proposed in 1976 were nominally much simpler.¹⁷ They envisaged a dual procedure in which the declaration and injunction would be available either through private law procedures (technically the 'writ' or 'originating summons') or, along with the prerogative remedies, through a new mechanism known as the 'application for judicial review' (AJR). Actions in contract or tort against governmental bodies would not be affected by the new procedure.

The Commission's proposals represented a balanced approach towards the supposedly competing concerns of protecting citizens against unlawful executive decision-making, and protecting lawful government decision-making from vexatious or frivolous applicants. It is certainly clear that (following the sentiments expressed in Pyx Granite) the Law Commission did not intend the AJR to be an exclusive remedy; that is to say there would be some situations (although precisely which was unclear) where an applicant would seem to have a choice of using either the AJR or the declaration or injunction through a writ or originating summons.

The reforms were initially implemented by an amendment to the Rules of the Supreme Court, which introduced a modified Order 53. The changes were subsequently given a statutory basis in s 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981.¹⁸ The new Order 53 encompassed all the prerogative remedies and the declaration and injunction in a single procedural form.¹⁹ The declaration and injunction could be granted in situations where any of the prerogative remedies are available, if having considered all the circumstances of the case in issue, the court considered it just and convenient to do so. The AJR retained the requirement of leave, and also introduced a strict time limit of three months. However, even within that period, an application could be ruled out of time if there had been undue delay. These two factors obviously indicated that the reform was intended to protect public bodies against tardy and vexatious claims. In contrast, r 8 seemed to relax the previously tight limits on the availability of discovery and cross-examination; these could now be granted at the discretion of the court in respect of all five remedies. There was nothing explicit in the text of the new Order 53 to confirm that the declaration or injunction would no longer be available through the writ or originating summons procedure, although it was by no means clear what the relationship between the public and private law streams would be. Some hint was given by r 9(5), which empowered the court to transfer applications begun through the AJR to private law procedures, but did not permit movement in the other direction. This raised the possibility that some applicants could find that the substantive merits of their cases would not be heard simply because they chose the wrong procedure.

¹⁷ Law Commission (1976) Report on remedies in administrative law.

¹⁸ For the rest of this chapter, the term 'Order 53' is used to include the relevant provisions of s 31.

¹⁹ Order 53 r 1 was framed in the following terms:

(1) An application for (a) an order of mandamus, prohibition or certiorari, or (b) an injunction under section 9 of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1938 restraining a person from acting in any office in which he is not entitled to act, shall be made by way of an application for judicial review in accordance with the provisions of this Order.

(2) An application for a declaration or an injunction (not being an injunction mentioned in paragraph (1)(b)) may be made by way of an application for judicial review, and on such an application the Court may grant the declaration or injunction claimed if it considers that, having regard to (a) the nature of the matters in respect of which relief may be granted by way of an order of mandamus, prohibition or certiorari, (b) the nature of the persons and bodies against whom relief may be granted by way of such order, and (c) all the circumstances of the case, it would be just and convenient for the declaration or injunction to be granted on an application for judicial review.

Initially, however, it seemed that the courts might interpret Order 53 in a way that did not permit procedural technicalities to have such an important substantive effect.²⁰

The initial Order 53 case law

The crucial issue to be resolved was whether the applicant had a choice between the private law and public law procedures. The policy implications of this issue are obvious. If the applicant is given the choice, it would suggest that the courts are more concerned with protecting citizens' interests, and ensuring that the executive acts within legal limits, than with protecting government from scrutiny and thereby expediting administrative processes.

In De Falco v Crawley Borough Council,²¹ Lord Denning's Court of Appeal evidently favoured that approach. The case concerned a challenge to a council's decision under the homeless persons legislation (then the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977). The challenge had been initiated as a breach of statutory duty action, in effect a private law action in tort. Lord Denning (while finding for the council on the merits) rejected the council's suggestion that Order 53 was now the sole route for applicants to challenge decisions under the 1977 Act:

[T]he Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, contained nothing about remedies... It has been held by this court that, if the council fails to provide accommodation as required by s 3(4), the applicant can claim damages in the county court: see Thornton v Kirklees Metropolitan Borough Council [1979] 2 All ER 349, [1979] QB 626. I am very ready to follow that decision and indeed to carry it further, because this is a statute which is passed for the protection of private persons, in their capacity as private persons. It is not passed for the benefit of the public at large... No doubt such a person could, at his option, bring proceedings for judicial review under the new RSC Ord 53... So the applicant has an option.²²

Lord Denning's advocacy of a procedural choice for applicants challenging homelessness decisions might be contrasted with Gouling J's judgment in Heywood v Board of Visitors of Hull Prison.²³ Heywood, like Mr St Germain,²⁴ had been involved in the Hull prison riots, and had subsequently been punished by the prison Board of Visitors by loss of remission. He had sought a declaration through the private law route of a writ. The Board argued that he must use Order 53. If so, he would be time barred, and the litigation would never reach the merits of his claim. Gouling J supported this argument:

[I]t is obviously undesirable that the plaintiff should seek relief by action rather than by application for judicial review...

There are very good reasons (among them an economy of public time and the avoidance of injustice to persons whom it is desired to make respondents) for that requirement of preliminary leave. If an action commenced by writ or originating summons is used instead of the machinery of Ord 53, that requirement of leave is circumvented.²⁵

Gouling J was particularly concerned that what he considered (evidently notwithstanding Order 53, r 8) the much more generous rules relating to discovery and ²⁰ It should also be noted that some more prosaic reforms were introduced in an attempt to speed up the judicial process in administrative law cases. From 1981 onwards, a single judge (rather than the previous three) would be able to hear both leave applications and inter partes hearings, and a more concerted attempt was made to ensure that the High Court contained a de facto 'administrative division'; see Blom-Cooper L (1982) 'The new face of judicial review: administrative changes in Order 53' Public Law 250.

²¹ [1980] QB 460, CA.

²² Ibid., at 468.

²³ [1980] 1 WLR 1386, [1980] 3 All ER 594.

²⁴ See 'Procedural not substantive protection?', ch 15, p 488 above.

²⁵ [1980] 1 WLR 1386 at 1390.

cross-examination available through the private law route would have an undesirable impact on the board's decision-making:

[T]he machinery of an action as to discovery and giving of evidence may result in placing members of the tribunal concerned in a position not really compatible with the free and proper discharge of their public functions, or at least result in attempts to put them in that position...²⁶

Goulding J distinguished De Falco, on the basis that the homelessness legislation was designed to create individual rights (ie it raised a private law issue), while the prison system is run for the public interest (ie it raised a public law issue). There is no express indication in the text of Order 53 that such a distinction should be drawn. Nor, one might add, that it should not. De Falco and Heywood thus seemed to present quite divergent, policy-driven interpretations of the reforms.

The twin issues of homelessness and prison discipline continued to lend an aura of uncertainty to the impact of the Order 53 reforms. In Parr v Wyre Borough Council,²⁷ another homelessness case, Lord Denning's Court of Appeal again implied that applicants should have a choice of procedure, although here the suggestion was that an Order 53 action could sometimes prove more effective, and considerably quicker, than a county court action. However, Lord Denning then (without proper explanation) appeared to conclude that his approach in De Falco and Parr had been misconceived. In Lambert v Ealing London Borough Council,²⁸ he indicated that the AJR should be an exclusive remedy in homelessness cases. This ambiguity then appeared equally starkly in respect of prison disciplinary proceedings.

I. O'Reilly v Mackman (1982)

*O'Reilly v Mackman*²⁹ was another case emerging from the aftermath of the Hull Prison riots. The action was not begun until some three years after the impugned decision (here the imposition of a loss of remission by the Board of Visitors) was made. The applicants were time-barred from proceeding via Order 53. Additionally, they claimed that their action would require extensive discovery and cross-examination, which rendered it more suitable to proceed in the private law rather than public law stream.

In the High Court, the Board invoked Heywood as authority for a rule that only the AJR could be used in such circumstance. To accept that argument would necessarily mean that Mr O'Reilly would have no effective remedy. Peter Pain J rejected the argument and its consequences, and indicated that Heywood had been wrongly decided:

The law offers the plaintiff a choice... It seems to me to be an abuse of language to say that the plaintiff is abusing the process of the court because he exercises the choice in the way he thinks best in his own interest.³⁰

The 'rule of law' argument underpinning Peter Pain J's conclusion is well brought out by his observation that only express words in a statute could convince him that Order 53 was intended to operate as an 'exclusive' remedial route. This is redolent of Lord Denning's ²⁶ Ibid, at 1390–1391. ²⁷ (1982) 2 HLR 71, CA.

²⁸ [1982] 1 WLR 550, [1982] 2 All ER 394, CA.

²⁹ [1982] 3 All ER 680, QBD, [1983] 2 AC 237, CA and HL. For an extremely cogent analysis of the litigation see McBride J (1983) 'The doctrine of exclusivity and judicial review' Civil Justice Quarterly 268.

³⁰ [1982] 3 All ER 680 at 688. He took the view that a loss of remission was no less a 'private right' from the individual applicant's perspective than an entitlement to be rehoused.

approach to the ouster clause in issue in Gilmore,³¹ and serves to emphasise the point that a judicial decision to consign a case to a worthless procedure amounts de facto to the court ousting its own jurisdiction.

It is perhaps therefore ironic that Lord Denning was a member of the Court of Appeal in O'Reilly that overturned Pain J's judgment. Building upon his rejection of De Falco in Lambert, Lord Denning (supported by Ackner and O'Connor LJ) concluded that the availability of the AJR should preclude applicants resorting to the declaration through the private law stream, not only for challenges to homelessness decisions and those of prison Boards of Visitors, but for all governmental decisions. To allow such actions to proceed in the private law stream:

would open the door to great abuse. Nearly all these [applicants] are legally aided. If they were allowed to proceed by ordinary action, without leave, I can well see that the public authorities of this country would be harassed by all sorts of claims, long out of time, on the most flimsy grounds.³²

Lord Denning MR observed that the Law Commission's insistence that its proposed reforms should not be an exclusive remedy 'does not appeal to me, at any rate so far as the remedy by action for a declaration is concerned'.³³ To allow such an action would be 'an abuse of process of the court'. Lord Denning seemed to assume that the purpose of the Order 53 reforms was to provide additional protection to government bodies by the requirement of leave, the limited availability of discovery, and the equally limited availability of cross-examination—which should be 'rarely allowed'.³⁴

The Court of Appeal's judgment was upheld, albeit in a somewhat diluted form, in the House of Lords, where Lord Diplock issued the sole judgment.³⁵ The crucial point on which the House rested its decision was that, for procedural purposes, a sharp distinction had to be drawn between matters of 'private law' and 'public law'. While Mr O'Reilly stood to spend substantially more time than he had expected in prison if the Board's conclusion was not overturned, this did not amount to a private right. As Lord Diplock put it:

It is not, and it could not be, contended that the decision of the board awarding him forfeiture of remission had infringed or threatened to infringe any right of the appellant derived from private law, whether a common law right or one created by a statute. Under the Prison Rules remission of sentence is not a matter of right but of indulgence...³⁶

Lord Diplock acknowledged that before 1977, the prerogative remedies did not adequately protect applicants' interests, and it was therefore quite acceptable, and often indeed necessary, for the courts to allow an applicant to proceed by way of declaration or injunction. But, he continued:

The position of applicants for judicial review has been drastically ameliorated by the new Ord 53. It has removed all those disadvantages, particularly in relation to discovery, that were manifestly unfair to them and had, in many cases, made applications for prerogative orders an inadequate remedy if justice was to be done...³⁷

³¹ See 'Ouster clauses—Gilmore (1957) and Anisminic (1969)', ch 3, pp 76–78 above.

³² [1983] 2 AC 237 at 257–258.

³³ Ibid., at 254. It is not clear if Lord Denning intended to limit his argument solely to declarations. This passage supports that assumption, but he also expressly disapproved Thornton, which was a breach of statutory duty action.

³⁴ Ibid., at 256.

³⁵ [1983] 2 AC 237.

³⁶ Ibid., at 275. As noted above, Peter Pain J at first instance had concluded that O'Reilly was raising an issue of private rights.

³⁷ Ibid., at 285.

Since Order 53 had now removed these obstacles. Lord Diplock concluded that:

Therefore it would in my view as a general rule be contrary to public policy, and as such an abuse of the process of the court, to permit a person seeking to establish that a decision of a public authority infringed rights to which he was entitled to protection under public law to proceed by way of an ordinary action and by this means to evade the provisions of Order 53 for the protection of such authorities.³⁸

Lord Diplock's presumption that discovery and cross-examination would be much more readily available under the Order 53 procedure than they had been previously in respect of the prerogative writs could be little more than speculation at that stage, given the limited body of Order 53 litigation by then undertaken.³⁹ The integrity of O'Reilly would thus depend in large part on the way in which the High Court would respond to applicants' requests for discovery and cross-examination.

If Lord Diplock's presumption on this point was to prove correct, then the 'protection' that was being extended to public authorities via Order 53 was limited essentially to the matters of leave and of short time limits. As a policy choice, this conclusion is readily understandable. The rationale in respect of short time limits necessarily accepts that the arguably (or even obviously) unlawful actions of government bodies will go unremedied; but this (it can be argued) is a price worth paying if it means that government decisions acquire a veneer of legal certainty within a short time, and thereby enable policies to be pursued and decisions to be acted upon.

Whether that price was worth paying in Mr O'Reilly's case might give us pause for thought. The outcome of the case is that we simply do not know if the Board acted lawfully in revoking his remission; his argument on the merits was never made because he failed to surmount a procedural obstacle. He had undoubtedly come very late to court—some three years after the Board of Visitors' decision. The delay was however readily explicable. The legal rule that Boards of Visitors were subject to the rules of natural justice had only been established in 1979—by Mr St Germain, one of Mr O'Reilly's fellow rioters.⁴⁰ O'Reilly himself (and Mr Heywood) could not have known that he had any legal remedy available until St Germain had run its course. To deprive a plaintiff in this situation of a remedy seems, in terms of substantive justice, a harsh decision for the court to reach; a point which perhaps goes some way to explaining Peter Pain J's judgment at first instance. Order 53 did leave the courts a residual discretion to extend the three-month time limit; but it would seem that a generous approach to that issue would undermine the 'protection' that Lord Diplock assumed the legal reforms were intended to introduce.⁴¹

³⁸ Ibid.

³⁹ The case law then decided offered little support for Lord Diplock's view; see George v Secretary of State for the Environment (1979) 38 P & CR 609, CA, and Air Canada v Secretary of State for Trade (No 2) [1983] 2 AC 394, HL. Both cases indicate that discovery should only be granted sparingly under Order 53, and Air Canada intimates that it should only be granted in exceptional cases. See also Khawaja v Secretary of State for the Home Department [1984] AC 74 per Lord Bridge at 117: 'it may be that the express discretion conferred on the court to permit cross-examination by the new procedure for judicial review has been too sparingly exercised'. One might note that in Rossminster (1980) the House of Lords had explicitly indicated that the discretion should be used sparingly.

⁴⁰ See 'Procedural not substantive protection?', ch 15, p 488 above.

⁴¹ Order 53 initially required applications to be made promptly and at most within three months. Section 31 then appeared to change the test to one of 'undue delay', but was drafted in a way that did not repeal the Order 53 provisions. There has been no clarifying statute, but case law suggests that three months is a maximum; cases brought within that limit may be refused on grounds of delay; see for example R v Stratford-on-Avon, ex p Jackson [1985] 1 WLR 1319, CA; Caswell v Dairy Produce Quota Tribunal for England and Wales [1990] 2 AC 738, HL. It might be thought that three months or less is too short a time.

It should also be noted that Lord Diplock took some considerable care to root his 'exclusivity principle' in parliamentary intent, rather than—as Lord Denning had done—to present it as a judicial choice.⁴² This is perhaps because the House of Lords did not wish to take full responsibility for a procedural initiative which might well increase the likelihood that unlawful government action would go unchecked.

Exceptions to the general principle?

Lord Diplock's 'exclusivity principle' was not however to be a principle of universal application. It would, it seemed, apply only to 'public law' issues. There was an unfortunate lacuna in the judgment, in so far as Lord Diplock did not explain how—over the broad range of government activities—we might distinguish 'public law' and 'private law' matters for these purposes. Craig has argued that it is doubtful if we could find a convincing theoretical rationale for distinguishing between the two types of interest:

statements that a public body must have a sufficiently 'public' element or must be exercising a public duty cannot function as anything other than conclusory labels for whatever we choose to pour into them: they cannot guide our reasoning in advance.⁴³

Craig has suggested that there are three possible ways to construct a predictable distinction, but notes that all of them have flaws.⁴⁴ The first would be to focus on the source of the decision. If the defendant organisation was a government body we might safely assume that a public law issue arose. However, there are obvious problems in defining 'government'. This is a familiar problem in the context of the vertical direct effect of EC directives,⁴⁵ and would be no less difficult to resolve in the purely domestic sphere. Equally, it is perfectly clear that government bodies often engage in purely 'private' activities, such as making contracts or acting negligently. Is it to be assumed that the identity of the defendant would override the basis of its relationship with the applicant for procedural purposes?

A second approach might be to focus on the nature of the power. A decision would be a public law matter, irrespective of the identity of the defendant, if its content impacted significantly on the public interest. But it would not seem any easier to define the 'public interest' than to define 'government'.

A third, rather formalistic approach might be to equate 'public law' with the traditional scope of the prerogative remedies. But as Craig notes, the scope of these remedies has always been dynamic, and would therefore offer a rather unstable test.

The elusive nature of 'public law' can be seen as a major definitional fault line running through Lord Diplock's opinion in O'Reilly. Assuming we could identify the concept however, Lord Diplock also anticipated that even when a public law issue was raised, there would be two—and perhaps more—exceptions to the requirement that the AJR be invoked:

My Lords, I have described this as a general rule; for, though it may normally be appropriate to apply it by the summary process of striking out the action, there may be exceptions, particularly where the invalidity of the decision arises as a collateral issue in a claim for infringement of a right of the plaintiff arising under private law, or where none of the parties objects to the adoption of the procedure by writ or originating summons. Whether there should be other ⁴² Order 53 had by this point been given a statutory root in s 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981.

⁴³ (1989) op cit p 420.

⁴⁴ See Craig P (1997) 'Public law and control over private power', in Taggart M (ed) The province of administrative law.

⁴⁵ See 'V. Direct effect—the saga continues', ch 11, pp 380–385 above.

exceptions should, in my view, at this stage in the development of procedural public law, be left to be decided on a case to case basis...⁴⁶

II. The Post-O'Reilly case law

O'Reilly appeared to have created the clear split between public law and private law which the Law Commission had toyed with in the early-1970s, but then rejected in its 1976 report. The policy implications of O'Reilly were potentially profound, in that the case moved away from the Law Commission's advocacy of procedural choice towards a procedural regime apparently balanced in favour of protecting public bodies.

That O'Reilly should not be read in quite so draconian a fashion was hinted at by a subsequent House of Lords' judgment issued on the very same day. In Cocks v Thanet District Council,⁴⁷ the Court arrived at the convoluted and essentially nonsensical proposition⁴⁸ that the homelessness legislation could be divided into 'private law' and 'public law' issues for procedural purposes. It also emphasised that most such decisions would fall within the AJR procedure.

The suggestion that O'Reilly and Cocks may have been underpinned by a judicial concern that government bodies were being subjected to too many challenges—especially in the fields of housing and immigration—was reinforced by the House of Lords' extraordinary 1985 decision in Puhlhofer v Hillingdon London Borough Council.⁴⁹ In Puhlhofer, the Court (per Lord Brightman) explicitly disapproved of the use of judicial review to challenge local authority decision-making towards homeless persons. Since Cocks had already restricted the availability of private law procedures in this area, Puhlhofer effectively placed homeless persons in a position of having virtually no effective protection against ultra vires decision-making. In effect, it seemed, the courts had read an ouster clause into the legislation.

Contemporary empirical evidence suggested that such judicial concerns were misplaced. Sunkin's innovative 1987 study found no evidence that government bodies were being, or ever had been, deluged by legal challenges.⁵⁰ In respect of the homelessness legislation, for example, Sunkin noted that local authorities had received some 219,000 applications in 1986. Some thirty-two of these decisions had led to an Order 53 application.

It was also evident, following the GCHQ decision, that there was an arguable inconsistency between the House of Lords' evident readiness to pull more types of governmental decision-making within the field of judicial supervision, and its unwillingness to allow challenges to be raised through the most effective procedural route. This possible tension perhaps underlay the House of Lords' clear statement in *Davy v Spelthorne Borough Council*⁵¹ that an action for damages in negligence against a government body was not precluded by the availability of the Order 53 procedure. Describing the case as 'a sequel' to O'Reilly, Lord Fraser saw no grounds for thinking that the litigation was a 'public law' matter at all: 'The present proceedings, so far as they consist of a claim for damages, ⁴⁶ [1983] 2 AC 237 at 285..

⁴⁷ [1983] 2 AC 286, HL.

⁴⁸ See Loveland I (1993) 'An unappealing analysis of the public-private law divide: the case of the homelessness legislation' Liverpool LR 39.

⁴⁹ [1986] AC 484, [1986] 1 All ER 467, HL. For a discussion of the case see Loveland (1995) op cit pp 98–101.

⁵⁰ Sunkin M (1987) 'What is happening to applications for judicial review?' MLR 432. See also Sunkin M (1987) 'Myths of judicial review' LAG Bulletin (September) 8; (1991) 'The judicial review caseload' Public Law 490.

⁵¹ [1984] AC 262, HL.

appear to me to be simply an ordinary action for tort. They do not raise any issue of public law as a live issue'.⁵² More broadly, Lord Wilberforce appeared to caution counsel and judges against regarding the 'public-private divide' as an organising principle for procedural purposes:

the expressions 'private law' and 'public law' have recently been imported into the law of England from countries which, unlike our own, have separate systems concerning public and private law. In this country they must be used with caution, for, typically, English law fastens, not upon principles, but upon remedies.⁵³

In *Wandsworth London Borough Council v Winder*⁵⁴ the House of Lords offered a further exception to the O'Reilly principle. Wandsworth used the evidently broad discretion left to it by the Housing Act 1980 over the matter of council house rents⁵⁵ to raise rents by some 50%. Mr Winder, a tenant refused to pay the entire increase, but paid his old rent plus an amount to cover inflation. Over a year later, the council began possession proceedings against Mr Winder in the county court—in effect an action for breach of contract.

Mr Winder then sought to raise the defence that the rent rise was irrational and thus void, with the result that he had not breached the terms of his lease. The council claimed that this was a public law issue, which could only be addressed via Order 53. The administrative consequences if Mr Winder was permitted to raise the defence and then win on the merits would have been profound; every rent that Wandsworth had collected for the past year might have been unlawful, money might have had to be returned to thousands of tenants, a new rent (with retrospective effect) would have to be set and then collected. This would seem to be just the type of scenario against which Lord Diplock might have wished public bodies to be protected. Mr Winder could obviously have initiated Order 53 proceedings as soon as the rent increase was passed. However, the House of Lords held that O'Reilly did not prevent a public law matter being raised in private law proceedings in these circumstances. There appeared to be two reasons for this conclusion. The first was that Mr Winder was addressing a public law matter that impacted on his existing private legal right, ie his tenancy. Secondly, perhaps more importantly, Mr Winder himself had not chosen the form of action. He was merely responding to the council's challenge to his legal right. In Lord Fraser's view:

It would in my opinion be a very strange use of language to describe the respondent's behaviour in relation to this litigation as an abuse or misuse by him of the process of the court. He did not select the procedure to be adopted. He is merely seeking to defend proceedings brought against him by the appellants. In so doing he is seeking only to exercise the ordinary right of any individual to defend an action against him on the ground that he is not liable for the whole sum claimed by the plaintiff.⁵⁶

⁵² Ibid., at 273. Cf Lord Fraser's approval of Fox LJ's comment in the Court of Appeal (1983) 81 LGR 580 at 596: 'The claim, in my opinion, is concerned with the alleged infringement of the plaintiff's rights at common law. Those rights are not even peripheral to a public law claim. They are the essence of the entire claim so far as negligence is concerned'.

⁵³ [1984] AC 262 at 276, HL. ⁵⁴ [1985] AC 461, [1984] 3 All ER 976.

⁵⁵ See 'V. Council housing', ch 10, pp 313–316 above.

⁵⁶ [1985] AC 461 at 509. For a review of these cases, and a powerfully persuasive analysis of the flaws in O'Reilly, see Forsyth C (1985) 'Beyond O'Reilly v Mackman: the foundations and nature of procedural exclusivity' Cambridge LJ 415. See also Beatson J (1987) "'Public" and "private" in English administrative law' LQR 34. For a critical analysis of Winder see Woolf H (1986) 'Public law—private law: why the divide?' Public Law 220.

The flip side of the O'Reilly coin

As indicated in the Pett decisions discussed in chapter fifteen,⁵⁷ prior to the Order 53 reforms it appeared to be broadly accepted that the activities of bodies regulating sports industries could be challenged by private law proceedings. However in Law v National Greyhound Racing Club Ltd,⁵⁸ the NGRC argued that a trainer who alleged that there were procedural flaws in his suspension following a dog-doping accusation should have to proceed through the AJR. The NGRC argued in effect that it performed a 'governmental function' in regulating the greyhound racing industry; ie that the activity was so important that 'but for' the existence of the NGRC itself, the government would have to step in to perform this role. As such, the NGRC should benefit from the protections alluded to by Lord Diplock in O'Reilly.

While the Court of Appeal could readily see why the NGRC was making this argument,⁵⁹ it considered that the contention had little merit. Even if one could identify a 'public law' element in the NGRC's activities, the nature of the relationship between the Club and Mr Law was the quintessentially private law matter of a contract. In consequence, a private law procedure was the only suitable route for the applicant to take.⁶⁰

In Law and the other cases discussed so far, the applicant has been seeking to gain access to the private rather than public law stream, on the basis that that stream is the most likely to lead her to her desired outcome. However, there are some situations in which an applicant might actually prefer to proceed through a public law mechanism while the government defendant wished to have her steered into a private law remedy.

Employment disputes are a primary example of this. The United Kingdom now has a substantial body of law (much of it EC generated) protecting employees against their employers. But it is only in very rare circumstances that these statutory provisions offer employees the remedy of 'specific performance'—namely that they are re-instated in their jobs. Certiorari would however have this effect; if the employee's dismissal was quashed and thus held to be void, she would never have been dismissed at all.

This concern underpinned the applicant's procedural choice in R v BBC, ex p Lavelle.⁶¹ Ms Lavell had been sacked from the BBC following allegations of theft. She sought to argue that because the BBC was a publicly financed body, created by royal charter, its activities should all be regarded as raising a public law issue. Woolf J rejected this contention. Following Law, he concluded that Ms Lavell's dispute with the BBC was a pure master/servant question, which should be resolved through private law remedies.

A rather different approach was taken by Hodgson J at first instance in R v East Berkshire Health Authority, ex p Walsh, in which he had concluded that the political significance of the National Health Service in modern Britain was sufficiently pronounced to make the ⁵⁷ See 'The content of procedural fairness—legal representation and an obligation to give reasons for decisions', ch 15, p 499 above. ⁵⁸ [1983] 1 WLR 1302, CA.

⁵⁹ Ibid, at 1311; per Slade LJ: '[I]t is easy to understand why the NGRC would prefer that any person who seeks to challenge the exercise of its disciplinary functions should be compelled to do so, if at all, by way of an application for judicial review. In this manner the NGRC would enjoy the benefit of what Lord Diplock in O'Reilly v Mackman described as "the safeguards imposed in the public interest... on the validity of decisions made by public authorities in the field of public law". Notwithstanding recent procedural changes, these safeguards are still real and substantial. Leave is required to bring proceedings... There is a time-bar of three months... The court retains firm control over discovery and cross-examination...'

⁶⁰ Cf Lawton LJ, ibid at 1307: 'In my judgment, such powers as the stewards had to suspend the plaintiff's licence were derived from a contract between him and the defendants... A stewards' inquiry under the defendants' rules of racing concerned only those who voluntarily submitted themselves to the stewards' jurisdiction. There was no public element in the jurisdiction itself... [T]he courts have always refused to use the orders of certiorari to review the decisions of domestic tribunals.' ⁶¹ [1983] ICR 99.

dismissal of NHS employees a ‘public law’ matter as well as a case of breach of contract.⁶² This conclusion was promptly overturned in the Court of Appeal, on the basis that the existence of a contractual relationship precluded an action via Order 53.

Notwithstanding the fact that he had been overruled in Walsh, Hodgson J felt able to conclude in *R v Home Secretary, ex p Benwell*⁶³ that employment as a prison officer fell within the scope of Order 53. This conclusion seems readily defensible, since at that time (pre-GCHQ) it was assumed that prison officers did not have contracts. Unless the AJR was available to such applicants, there would be no means at all of assessing whether their employer had acted lawfully.⁶⁴

A ‘nature’ not ‘source’ of power test—the Datafin (1987), Aga Khan (1993), Servite Houses (1999) and Wachmann (1993) decisions

The ‘but for’ argument that had failed to sway the Court of Appeal in Law was made with greater success in R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, ex p Datafin.⁶⁵ The Take-over Panel, which was created in 1968, was the body responsible for policing the ethics of merger and take-over activities in the United Kingdom. It was neither a statutory nor common law body, nor were any of its members (some twelve in number) government appointees. The Panel’s members were representatives of major financial institutions, and applied a non-binding code of ethical practice to firms engaged in take-over or merger activities. Breach of the code did not entail legal sanctions, but would in effect lead to the blackballing of the firms concerned. The Panel effectively exercised monopolistic control over this area of economic activity. Datafin had complained to the Panel that it had been the victim of unethical practices by another firm. Its complaint was investigated but rejected. Datafin then sought judicial review of the Panel’s decision.

The Panel argued that since it was de jure a non-governmental body, its decisions could not be challenged via Order 53. Since it did not have a contractual relationship with any of the firms whose activities it policed, there was no possibility of a breach of contract action being initiated. Nor did there seem to be any realistic prospect of Datafin being able to found an action in negligence against the Panel. If the Panel was not subject to challenge via Order 53, its activities would seemingly be wholly beyond judicial control.

Hodgson J had accepted this consequence at first instance. His judgment was then reversed in the Court of Appeal. Sir John Donaldson MR’s leading judgment offered several reasons which, in combination, led him to the conclusion that the Panel was subject to judicial review.⁶⁶

The first was that the quantitative significance of the Panel’s activities—in contrast to that of the NGRC for example—was immense. The Panel dealt with issues involv-

⁶² The judgment appears to have been reported, only at (1983) Times, 15 November, and is discussed in the Court of Appeal’s decision: [1984] ICR 743.

⁶³ [1985] QB 554, [1984] 3 All ER 854. The judgment contains a splendidly petulant criticism of the Court of Appeal’s decision in Walsh.

⁶⁴ An excellent analysis of this area is offered in Walsh B (1989) ‘Judicial review of dismissal from employment: coherence or confusion?’ Public Law 131. Subsequently, in McClaren v Home Office [1990] ICR 824, the Court of Appeal took the view that prison officers should be regarded as having an employment relationship with the government which, if not contractual in the narrow sense of the term, was nonetheless sufficiently contractual to permit challenges to the Home Office’s decisions to be made through private law proceedings.

⁶⁵ [1987] QB 815, CA.

⁶⁶ Datafin failed on the merits, on the basis that it was essentially asking the Court to exercise an appellate rather than supervisory jurisdiction over the substance of the Panel’s decisions.

ing hundreds of millions of pounds, and in so doing affected the financial interests of hundreds of thousands of shareholders. Secondly, it was clear that 'but for' the Panel, the government would have to take a central role in this field. The issue was simply too important to be left unregulated. Thirdly, it was already apparent that the Department of Trade played a significant background role underpinning the Panel's activities. Fourthly, since the Panel exercised monopolistic powers in this area, it would be inappropriate to suggest that Datafin had 'consented' to its supervision. Fifthly, as applicants would not have any plausible remedy in either contract or negligence, or through the somewhat esoteric action in unlawful restraint of trade, against the Panel, Order 53 provided the only means of legal control. Citing the celebrated judgment of Scrutton LJ in Czarnikow v Roth Schmidt & Co,⁶⁷ Sir John Donaldson reasoned that: '... to exclude this safeguard for the administration of the law is contrary to public policy. There must be no Alsatia in England where the King's writ does not run'.⁶⁸ He then concluded that: '[I]t is really unthinkable that, in the absence of legislation such as affects trade unions, the panel should go on its way cocooned from the attention of the courts'.⁶⁹

This conclusion seems wholly defensible. To have upheld Hodgson J's first instance judgment would, in effect, have been to issue the government with an invitation to manoeuvre governmental behaviour beyond the reach of judicial supervision by transferring public functions to private sector bodies.⁷⁰ That outcome would have been difficult to reconcile with any meaningful notion of the rule of law.⁷¹ The caveat that might however be attached to the Datafin judgment is that the facts of the case presented a substantial number (the five listed above) of factors which pointed firmly towards the conclusion that the Panel's activities should be subject to judicial review. In circumstances where some of those factors were not present, or were less significant in quantitative terms, it might transpire that the courts would feel compelled to accept that little outposts of 'Alsatia' could be found on our administrative law landscape.

The Jockey Club: a public or private body?

In terms of its financial significance, the Jockey Club lies somewhere between the NGRC and the Take-over Panel. Since 1970, when it was granted a Royal Charter, the Jockey Club's legal origins have lain in the prerogative. As such it has—in contrast to the NGRC and the Take-over Panel, a de jure 'governmental' source. Despite these distinctions, in R v Jockey Club, ex p Massingberd-Mundy,⁷² the High Court considered that it was bound by the Court of Appeal's judgment in Law to the effect that anyone who had a contractual relationship with the Jockey Club (as in fact did everyone involved in the horse racing industry) should challenge its decisions through private law rather than public law procedures.

This analysis was upheld in R v Disciplinary Committee of the Jockey Club, ex p Aga Khan.⁷³ One of the Aga Khan's horses had 'won' the Oaks at Epsom in 1992. The horse was subsequently disqualified after traces of a prohibited substance were detected in its urine. A challenge to this decision through contract, even if successful, could not have ⁶⁷ [1922] All ER Rep 45 at 50, CA.

⁶⁸ [1987] QB 815 at 827. 'Alsatiass' being a colloquial name for the medieval areas known as 'sanctuaries', where criminals could shelter from the attentions of the criminal law.

⁶⁹ Ibid, at 839.

⁷⁰ See Forsyth C (1987) 'The scope of judicial review: "public duty" not source of power' Public Law 356.

⁷¹ See in particular the analysis by Murray Hunt; Hunt M (1997) 'Constitutionalism and the contractualisation of government', in Taggart M (ed) The province of administrative law. Hunt engages with the case law at a distinctly more abstract 'constitutional' level than much of the analytical literature.

⁷² [1993] 2 All ER 207.

⁷³ [1993] 1 WLR 909, [1993] 2 All ER 853, CA.

given the Aga Khan the outcome that he desired—namely to have his horse reinstated as the winner of the race. Consequently, he attempted to proceed via Order 53 in order to have the disqualification quashed. His counsel marshalled several arguments to convince the Court that the AJR procedure was appropriate. Firstly, the Jockey Club's source in the prerogative lent it a governmental character. Secondly, it performed functions of such public importance that 'but for' its existence, an explicitly governmental body would have to take over its role. Thirdly, its role gave it monopolistic control over a major industry; anyone wishing to participate in the horse racing industry had to submit to its terms and conditions.

The Court of Appeal found these arguments unconvincing. At least in respect of applicants who had a contractual relationship with the Club, private law procedures were the appropriate mechanism to bring challenges. The Court did imply that the AJR procedure might be available to applicants who did not have a contractual relationship with the Club, but declined to decide the point.⁷⁴

'Private' actors and 'public' functions: the Servite Houses case (1997)

To observers on many points of the political spectrum, it might seem that there are few more quintessentially 'public' functions than the provision of residential nursing care to people who are unable to look after themselves. Responsibility for providing such care to certain types of people was placed on local authorities by s 21 of the National Assistance Act 1948, which was an important element of the Atlee government's programme of extending the reach of the welfare state. The enthusiasm of the Thatcher and Major administrations for the privatisation of public welfare provisions led Parliament to amend the 1948 Act in 1993 (by inserting a new s 26) to permit local authorities to discharge their s 21 duties by making contractual arrangements with private sector care providers. The London Borough of Wandsworth embraced this reform with substantial vigour, and made contracts with—inter alia—a charity called Servite Houses to provide s 21 facilities.

The applicants in *R v Servite Houses and Wandsworth LBC, ex p Goldsmith and Chatting*⁷⁵ were elderly disabled women who were placed by Wandsworth in accommodation owned and managed by Servite. Servite had decided that the relevant care home (called Mary Court) was too expensive to continue to run, and in accordance with its contract with Wandsworth gave notice to terminate the arrangement. At the end of the notice period, all of the residents of Mary Court placed there by Wandsworth would have to leave. The applicants contended that Servite had promised them 'a home for life' in Mary Court. Neither applicant had a contractual relationship with Servite in which to root such a commitment, and so they sought to argue that Servite had generated a substantive legitimate expectation in the Coughlan sense⁷⁶ towards them. In order to succeed with that argument, however, the applicants first had to convince the Court that Servite was subject to the grounds of judicial review.

⁷⁴ For comment see Bamforth N (1993) 'The scope of judicial review: still uncertain' Public Law 239. See for example the factual situation raised in R v Jockey Club, ex p RAM Racecourses Ltd [1993] 2 All ER 225. See also R v Football Association, ex p Football League [1993] 2 All ER 833, in which the High Court rejected the argument that the FA's activities could be subject to judicial review. This may be largely attributable to the existence of a contractual relationship between the League and the FA. Perhaps surprisingly however, given the economic significance of soccer in this country, the Court also held that the 'but for' argument did not assist the League. Rose J suggested that if the FA did not exist, the regulation of football would more likely be undertaken by companies in the entertainment industry rather than by government.

⁷⁵ (2001) 33 HLR 35.

⁷⁶ See 'A substantive legitimate expectation by another name?', ch 15, pp 496–497 above.

In a carefully reasoned judgment which showed particular awareness of the 'constitutional' implications of the 'privatisation' of governmental activities, Moses J concluded with evident reluctance on the basis of authorities such as Datafin and Aga Khan that Servite's decision could not be challenged by way of judicial review. The mere fact that Servite was contracting with a government body did not in itself lend Servite a governmental character for judicial review purposes. Nor could Moses J discern any provisions in the amended Act which gave a sufficient degree of 'statutory underpinning' to Servite's activities:

In those circumstances, it seems to me wrong for a court of first instance to identify Servite's function as a public function absent any of the features upon which courts have in the past relied. That is not to say that a fresh approach ought not to be adopted so that the court can meet the needs of the public faced with the increasing privatisation of what were hitherto public law functions. But any advance can, in my judgment, only be made by those courts which have the power to reject the previous approach enshrined in past authority. I conclude that Servite was not exercising a public function.⁷⁷

Servite offers a powerful illustration of the intimate linkage between the grounds of review and the mechanisms through which those grounds can be invoked. Or, to put the matter in more grandiose terms, between the substance-based and process-based dimensions of the rule of law. Coughlan marked a notable advance in terms of the entitlement that individuals could successfully assert against government bodies. But in the context of s 21 residential provision, the significance of the Coughlan principle of a substantive legitimate expectation would be much reduced if s 21 accommodation were to be contracted out by a local authority. Any representation as to 'a home for life' (or indeed any lesser period) in a given facility made by the private sector provider would not create a substantive legitimate expectation because the provider would not be subject to judicial review, and any such representation made by the relevant local authority would likely be worthless as it is not credible to assume that any private sector provider would contract with a council to honour any representations that the authority might make to individual residents.

While the ratio of Servite would be limited to s 21 provision, the reasoning that underlies the judgment might be thought to offer an unhappy incentive to governmental bodies to privatise any and all of their service provision whenever Parliament has permitted them to do so. For that reason, it is perhaps unfortunate that Servite was not appealed so that the 'fresh approach' alluded to by Moses J might have been adopted by the Court of Appeal.

The relevance of justiciability

The High Court was presented with a problem of a rather different nature in R v Chief Rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of Great Britain and the Commonwealth, ex p Wachmann.⁷⁸ Wachmann was a rabbi who had been suspended by the Chief Rabbi following an investigation into complaints about Wachmann's alleged professional misconduct. The Chief Rabbi's conclusion in effect made Wachmann unemployable as a rabbi. Wachmann did not have a contractual relationship with the Chief Rabbi, which indicated that the only possible means of legal challenge (Wachmann claimed bias and procedural irregularities in the Chief Rabbi's decision) would be the AJR. The Court held that Mr Wachmann was not raising a public law issue, although the tone of Simon ⁷⁷ (2001) 33 HLR 35 at para 93.

⁷⁸ [1992] 1 WLR 1036, [1993] 2 All ER 249.

Brown J's judgment rather suggests that he felt Mr Wachmann was not even raising a justiciable issue:

[T]he court is hardly in a position to regulate what is essentially a religious function—the determination whether someone is morally and religiously fit to carry out the spiritual and pastoral duties of his office. The court must inevitably be wary of entering so self-evidently sensitive an area...

[T]o entertain this challenge would involve a clear departure from and extension of the principles established by the Datafin case.⁷⁹

III. Retreating from O'Reilly? The Roy case

The applicant in *Roy v Kensington and Chelsea and Westminster Family Practitioner Committee*⁸⁰ was a general medical practitioner working in the National Health Service. General practitioners in the NHS have a statutory entitlement to a scale of fees based on a statutory formula. However, Family Practitioner Committees were empowered to withhold a portion of those fees if they considered a practitioner to have failed to carry out his/her duties adequately. The dispute in Roy's case arose when the FPC withheld part of his fee. Roy challenged the decision by seeking a declaration via a writ that he was entitled to the full sum. The FPC's initial response was that since its relationship with Dr Roy was not contractual, he was raising a purely public law issue and could thus proceed only via Order 53.

Lord Lowry's leading judgment for a unanimous House of Lords created the strong impression that O'Reilly, if not misconceived per se, had certainly been lent an inappropriate interpretation in subsequent years. Lord Lowry accepted counsel's suggestion that O'Reilly could be construed in two ways.⁸¹

The 'broad view' of the case—which would reduce the scope of the exclusivity principle—was that the AJR would be the sole remedy to be used only where there was no private law element at all to the decision in issue. The 'narrow view'—which would extend the reach of the exclusivity principle—was that the AJR would be the sole remedy whenever a public law issue is raised, unless the case comes within the specified exceptions.

Lord Lowry observed that he instinctively preferred the 'broad view', an observation which one assumes the House of Lords intended lower courts to follow in future. However, he managed to decide the case in Dr Roy's favour by adopting the 'narrow view'. He suggested that there were three reasons for regarding Dr Roy's claim as an exception to the exclusivity principle. The first of these was that while Dr Roy's relationship with the FPC was not contractual in the orthodox sense, it nonetheless had 'contractual echoes', in that Dr Roy was laying claim to what Lord Lowry characterised as a 'private statutory' right. The second was that the private right 'dominated' the public law issue in the case. The third reason was that the claim required examination of a disputed issue of fact.

The second point is little more than a re-affirmation of the Winder principle. The first point illustrates quite neatly the instability of the public right or private right dichotomy offered in O'Reilly. The scope of that case could be fundamentally altered without modifying the exclusivity principle at all by the alternative mechanism of lending a 'private'

⁷⁹ [1992] 1 WLR 1036 at 1042–1043.

⁸⁰ [1992] 1 AC 624, [1992] 1 All ER 705, HL. For contemporaneous comment see Cane P (1992) 'Private rights and public procedure' Public Law 193.

⁸¹ Neither of which—unfortunately—was very clearly formulated.

character to previously ‘public’ rights. That technique would of course simply displace rather than solve the dilemma that O’Reilly throws up, and has the added disadvantage of exposing the courts to accusations that they are engaging in a jurisprudential sleight of hand in order to evade, rather than overrule, an inconvenient principle.⁸² The third point—the reference to disputes as to fact—is significant, for it implies that the House of Lords did not envisage that discovery and cross-examination (which would be vital if factual disputes were in issue) would be routine elements of AJR proceedings.

That supposition was echoed by Rose LJ in R v Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, ex p World Development Movement Ltd, in rejecting the WDM’s request for access to detailed minutes of the Foreign Secretary’s deliberations on the Pergau dam aid grant:

[It is] common ground that in judicial review proceedings general discovery is not available as it is in a writ action under Ord 24, rr 1 and 2, that an application can be made under Ord 24, r 3, which by virtue of Ord 24, r 8 will be refused if discovery is not necessary for disposing of the case fairly.⁸³

Despite Lord Diplock’s predictions to the contrary in O’Reilly, it appeared that this issue remained of considerable importance over twenty years later.

It may however be that the most significant element of the Roy judgment is Lord Lowry’s clear intimation that the House of Lords was no longer as exercised by the prospect of applicants ‘abusing the process of the court’ as Lord Diplock and his colleagues had been:

unless the procedure adopted is ill-suited to dispose of the question..., there is much to be said in favour of the proposition that a court having jurisdiction ought to let a case be heard rather than entertain a debate concerning the form of proceedings.⁸⁴

This apparent reassertion of the courts’ primary responsibility as being to establish if an applicant’s claim is well-founded, rather than to be bogged down in arguments as to procedure, has obvious (if much less melodramatic) echoes of Lord Denning’s judgment in Barnard.⁸⁵ But any hopes that Roy would lead the courts to clarify rather than complicate this area of the law were at least initially disappointed by the judgment in Bugg v DPP.⁸⁶

IV. Public law principle as a defence in criminal proceedings

From the mid-1980s onwards, Mr Bugg had been making a considerable nuisance of himself to the Ministry of Defence. He was one of a number of anti-nuclear protesters who (updating Mr Chandler’s preferred form of activism in the 1960s)⁸⁷ had engaged in persistent incursion into MoD airbases. Such incursions nominally amounted to a breach of certain criminal bye-laws, produced by the MoD under statutory powers. Mr Bugg had taken great delight in frequently demonstrating that he and his colleagues had not breached the bye-laws or—the issue at stake in this case—that the bye-laws concerned were themselves ultra vires.

In Bugg v DPP,⁸⁸ Mr Bugg convinced the High Court that several MoD bye-laws under which he and his colleagues had been prosecuted were indeed invalid. However the case ⁸² See also the discussion by Cane P (1992) op cit.

⁸³ [1995] 1 WLR 386 at 396.

⁸⁴ [1992] 1 AC 624 at 655.

⁸⁵ See also the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Clark v University of Lincoln and Humberside [2000] 1 WLR 1988, [2000] 3 All ER 752, CA.

⁸⁶ [1993] QB 473, [1993] 2 All ER 815.

⁸⁷ See ‘V. ‘Justiciability’ revisited—are all statutory powers subject to full review?’, ch 4, p 111 above.

⁸⁸ [1993] QB 473, [1993] 2 All ER 815.

is most notable for its procedural implications. The prosecutions had taken place in a magistrates' court. When Mr Bugg had attempted to raise the alleged invalidity of the bye-laws as a defence, the prosecuting authorities—building on O'Reilly—had contended that this issue could only be addressed via an AJR. Mr Bugg would obviously have been long out of time to pursue this course. Unless he could raise the defence, the risk arose that he would be prosecuted, convicted and sentenced in respect of a 'crime' which might lack any lawful basis.

In a most peculiar judgment, the High Court⁸⁹ concluded that a defendant in such circumstances could plead the unlawful nature of the bye-law as a defence if that claim was rooted in either illegality or irrationality. However she could not do so if the claim lay in procedural impropriety. The Court did not contend that such a defence would amount to 'an abuse of process', so the case should not strictly be seen as an extension of O'Reilly. Rather Woolf LJ concluded that the criminal courts had no jurisdiction to enter such an enquiry and were not 'properly equipped to do so'.⁹⁰ The distinction was evidently drawn because illegality and irrationality would be obvious flaws, which would not require any examination of 'evidence', whereas procedural impropriety might well be identifiable only after extensive perusal of such evidence.

Quite what rationale underpinned this analysis is something of a mystery, as the distinction is entirely nonsensical in several senses. A criminal court, concerned as it must be with detailed evaluation of evidence, is perfectly competent in the technical sense to consider factual allegations about procedural impropriety. If Woolf LJ's point was really intended to suggest that criminal courts lacked the expertise to apply principles of administrative law, two further problems arise. The first is that High Court judges who deal with administrative law litigation often sit as trial judges in criminal cases; their administrative law expertise presumably does not disappear when they do so. Secondly, while it is plausible to argue that a lay magistrate may lack the legal skills properly to apply the legal esoterica of the procedural impropriety jurisprudence, she would presumably be equally at sea when faced with a problem rooted for example in the rule against unlawful delegation, or the fettering of discretion, or whether irrelevant considerations had been taken into account. More obviously, it is readily apparent that procedural impropriety (in the form for example of bias or a complete failure to hold a hearing or consult statutorily specified parties) could be discerned without any detailed evidential questions being addressed, and that conversely (Barnard and Anisminic being prime examples) substantive illegality may be well hidden within the decision-making body.⁹¹

The judgment also represented a departure from recent⁹² and more long-established authority. In the latter category, *DPP v Head*⁹³ is perhaps the most helpful of cases. Head was prosecuted under the Mental Deficiency Act 1915, s 56(1) for having sex with a person classified as 'mentally defective' under s 9 of that Act. At trial, it emerged that the victim of the crime may not have been lawfully classified under s 9. If this was correct, she was not 'a mental defective', and Head would not have committed the s 56 offence. Head obviously had not challenged the victim's classification (nor had anyone else) at the time it was made. Even under the more generous pre-1977 time limits, a certiorari action would have

⁸⁹ Woolf LJ and Pill J.

⁹⁰ The form of words was perhaps inspired by Lord Lowry's closing comments in Roy.

⁹¹ See Feldman D (1993) 'Collateral challenge and judicial review: the boundary dispute continues' Public Law 37.

⁹² DPP v Hutchinson [1990] 2 AC 783, [1990] 2 All ER 836, HL; Plymouth City Council v Quietlynn [1988] QB 144.

⁹³ [1959] AC 83, HL.

been time barred. In the view of the majority of the House of Lords, there was no room to doubt that Head should be able to rely on this defence:

It is conceded that the court had material before it which would have led to the [classification] being quashed on certiorari or other appropriate proceedings. The next question, as it appears to me, can be stated in this way. Is a man to be sent to prison on the basis that an order is a good order when the court knows it would be set aside if proper proceedings were taken? I doubt it.⁹⁴

The House of Lords had rejected the suggestion that any distinction could be drawn between different types of unlawful order for these purposes. As such the judgment is a forceful assertion of an expansive notion of the rule in respect of criminal liability. Bugg clearly compromised that principle.

The correctness of Woolf LJ's reasoning in Bugg was questioned by the House of Lords in R v Wicks,⁹⁵ although the decision was not overruled. Mr Wicks had rebuilt his house in a manner which required planning permission without having troubled himself to seek it. He then refused to stop the rebuilding, and was eventually served by his council with an enforcement notice under s 172 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. He nonetheless continued with his building, even though non-compliance with an enforcement notice is a criminal offence. At the subsequent criminal trial—having unsuccessfully exercised a statutory right of appeal under the 1990 Act to the Secretary of State for the Environment—he attempted to argue that the enforcement notice was unlawful. The House of Lords accepted that the common law recognised a 'guiding principle' that a defendant should always be able to raise the alleged invalidity of a government measure which formed the root of a criminal prosecution. The substantial judgments delivered by Lords Hoffmann and Nicholls overtly cast doubt on the Bugg distinction. The Court was nonetheless prepared to conclude that Mr Wicks should not be able to raise this administrative law point in the criminal proceedings. The 'guiding principle' could be rebutted by considerations specific to the decision in issue. In this case, the provision of a statutory appeal against the enforcement notice in addition to a potential AJR proceeding afforded the defendant an adequate remedy, and the intensity of the public interest in having planning laws promptly enforced militated against permitting a challenge other than by way of Order 53.

The unworkable distinction introduced by Bugg was subsequently removed entirely by the House of Lords in Boddington v British Transport Police.⁹⁶ Boddington was an inveterate smoker, who took exception to the fact that the operator of his daily train into London had exercised powers under a bye-law wholly to forbid smoking on trains. Boddington decided to ignore the ban and, when subsequently prosecuted for so doing, sought to raise the alleged irrationality of the bye-law as his defence. Predictably, the BTP contended that a challenge of this sort could only be initiated under Order 53. The magistrate accepted this argument. Boddington was convicted and fined £10. He then appealed against his conviction to the High Court, claiming that he should have been permitted to raise the public law defence.

This view was rejected at first instance by Auld J. Auld J appeared to extend the reach of Bugg by holding that a magistrate's court would not be competent to entertain any challenge to the validity of a bye-law or of delegated legislation in the course of criminal proceedings. To allow this to happen would, he suggested, cause chaos in the criminal courts.

⁹⁴ Ibid, at 687; per Lord Somervell.

⁹⁵ [1998] AC 92, [1997] 2 All ER 801, HL. See Bradley A (1997) 'Collateral challenge to enforcement decisions—a duty to apply for judicial review?' Public Law 365.

⁹⁶ [1999] 2 AC 143, HL. See Forsyth C (1999) 'Collateral challenge and the foundations of judicial review: orthodoxy vindicated and procedural exclusivity rejected' Public Law 364; Craig P (1998) 'Collateral attack, procedural exclusivity and judicial review' LQR 535.

The House of Lords reversed Auld J's judgment, and unanimously concluded that Boddington was entitled to raise the defence. Lord Steyn offered a carefully argued judgment which convincingly married detailed points of administrative law with broader questions of constitutional principle and condemned Bugg as 'contrary to authority and principle'.⁹⁷

In the first field, Lord Steyn (apparently adopting the broad view of O'Reilly alluded to by Lord Lowry in Roy) observed that O'Reilly's exclusivity principle should be limited to 'situations in which an individual's sole aim was to challenge a public law act or decision'.⁹⁸ The principle did not apply when private rights were at stake, or when an individual was defending an action initiated by a government body. Lord Steyn also rejected the idea that Woolf LJ's distinction between procedurally and substantively unlawful decisions had a defensible base, either in pragmatic⁹⁹ or conceptual terms.¹⁰⁰

In a more overtly constitutional vein, Lord Steyn observed that: 'the rule of law requires a clear distinction to be made between what is lawful and what is unlawful. The distinction put forward in Bugg undermines that axiom of constitutional principle'.¹⁰¹ The constitutional consequences of Bugg, namely that a person might be convicted of a 'crime' which might be found not to exist if subject to legal challenge were 'too austere and indeed too authoritarian to be compatible with the traditions of the common law'.¹⁰² This was not however to be an absolute rule. Rather it should be construed as an extremely strong presumption which could only be rebutted if the statutory scheme surrounding the decision in issue made it wholly clear that a departure from orthodoxy was warranted.

Lord Irvine's judgment is perhaps more effective in identifying the constitutional implications of the Order 53 litigation. In forceful terms, he concluded that Boddington had to be allowed to raise his defence: 'It would be a fundamental departure from the rule of law if an individual were liable to conviction for contravention of some rule which is itself liable to be set aside by a court as unlawful....'.¹⁰³

Conclusion

To accept Boddington as (for the moment) the last word on Order 53 issues would be rather ill-advised. Notwithstanding the grand constitutional terms in which Lords Steyn and Irvine dressed their judgments in that case, Boddington deals only with a narrow area of the ⁹⁷ [1992] 2 AC 143 at 172.

⁹⁸ Ibid.

⁹⁹ 'An issue of substantive illegality may involve daunting issues of fact... In such a case, the issues of law may also be complex. In contrast, an issue of procedural invalidity of a bye-law may involve minimal evidence... And the question of law may be straight-forward': ibid at 169–170.

¹⁰⁰ 'There is also a formidable difficulty of categorisation created by Bugg's case. A distinction between substantive and procedural invalidity will often be difficult to draw... In Wednesbury, Lord Greene MR pointed out that different grounds of review "run into one another": ibid at 170. ¹⁰¹ Ibid., at 171.

¹⁰² Ibid., at 173.

¹⁰³ Ibid., at 153. It would nonetheless seem that Wicks is still good law. Lord Irvine's judgment in Boddington drew a clear distinction in respect of governmental actions which precipitated criminal liability between bye-laws issued to the world at large (as in Boddington) and administrative decisions targeted at a specific individual (as in Wicks). In the latter scenario, the individual would have ample opportunity to impugn the lawfulness of the decision, whether by—as in Mr Wick's case—a statutory appeal and then an AJR application, or through an AJR alone. We might note, for the sake of completeness, that the House of Lords saw no merit in Boddington's irrationality defence, and upheld the conviction.

public law–private law divide. The case tells us little about the way in which procedural questions should be resolved when the action in issue is being instigated rather than defended by the individual citizen. It may be that we might apply the same constitutional logic found in Boddington to the broader O'Reilly issue, and find that it points us very strongly in the direction of (at least) adopting the 'broad view' of O'Reilly propounded by Lord Lowry in Roy.¹⁰⁴ But it would seem unlikely that this technique could plausibly take us as far as re-embracing the unhindered procedural duality that seemed to be offered in Barnard and Pyx Granite and which was apparently supported by the Law Commission in 1976.

In October 2000, various technical and linguistic changes were introduced to the application for judicial review procedure. Order 53 was replaced by what is now Part 54 of the Civil Procedure Rules. A 'claimant' (rather than a 'plaintiff') now makes a 'claim' (rather than an 'application') for judicial review. The names of the prerogative remedies were also altered: certiorari became a 'quashing order'; mandamus became a 'mandatory order'; and prohibition became a 'prohibitory order'. De jure recognition was also given to a state of affairs long existing de facto, namely that the High Court contained a specialist Administrative division. The style of citation of judicial review cases was also amended; from R v Government Body, ex p Claimant to R (Claimant) v Government Body. A 'pre-action protocol' for judicial review claims under Part 54 was also introduced within the Civil Procedure Rules. The protocol specifies a number of steps which parties ought to follow before commencing proceedings; the objectives being either to lead parties to resolve their dispute without the need for litigation or, if that is not possible, to clarify the issues that will have to be pursued before the court.

The object underlying the alterations was to simplify and expedite the conduct of litigation raising administrative law issues.¹⁰⁵ Whether the changes have that effect remains to be seen. What they are unlikely to do is finally resolve the conceptual difficulties generated by O'Reilly v Mackman and its progeny.¹⁰⁶

Notwithstanding its intrinsic complexity, the Order 53/part 54 case law is of great importance in constitutional terms, since it lays out so clearly the extent to which our legal system's understanding of the rule of law and the sovereignty of Parliament are conditioned not so much by the content of judicially generated constraints on governmental behaviour, as by the issue of access to them within a procedural regime which enhances rather than restricts the likelihood that a claimant can prove her case. But the Order 53 debate forms only one element of this 'access to justice' question within our modern constitutional law. Of equal significance is the topic considered in chapter seventeen—the matter of locus standi.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Hunt M (1997) 'Constitutionalism and the contractualisation of government', in Taggart M (ed) The province of administrative law

¹⁰⁴ See for example Mercury Communications Ltd v Director General of Telecommunications [1996] 1 WLR 48, HL. A caveat against this point is raised by a short line of cases addressing the inter-relationship between the AJR and habeas corpus. See in particular R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Muboyayi [1992] QB 244, CA, and the critique by Sir William Wade (1996) 'Habeas corpus and judicial review' LQR 55.

¹⁰⁵ See Fordham M (2001) 'Judicial review: the new rules' Public Law 4; Cornford T and Sumkin M (2001) 'The Bowman Report: access and the recent reforms of the judicial review procedure' Public Law 11.

¹⁰⁶ See Ingman T (2002) The English legal process pp 607–610.

- McBride J (1983) 'The doctrine of exclusivity and judicial review' Civil Justice Quarterly 268
- Hunt M (1997) 'Constitutionalism and the contractualisation of government', in Taggart M (ed) The province of administrative law
- Forsyth C (1985) 'Beyond O'Reilly v Mackman: the foundations and nature of procedural exclusivity' Cambridge LJ 415
- Craig P (1997) 'Public law and control over private power' in Taggart M (ed) The province of administrative law
- Beatson J (1987) "'Public" and "private" in English administrative law' LQR 34
- Woolf H (1986) 'Public law—private law: why the divide?' Public Law 220
- Blom-Cooper L (1982) 'The new face of judicial review: administrative changes in Order 53' Public Law 250

Case law and legislation

- Barnard v National Dock Labour Board* [1953] 2 QB 18
- O'Reilly v Mackman* [1982] 3 All ER 680, QB and CA; [1983] 2 AC 237, HL
- R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, ex p Datafin* [1987] 1 All ER 564
- DPP v Head* [1959] AC 83
- Boddington v British Transport Police* [1999] 2 AC 143
- Roy v Kensington and Chelsea and Westminster Family Practitioner Committee* [1992] 1 AC 624
- Wandsworth London Borough Council v Winder* [1985] AC 461
- R v Chief Rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of Great Britain and the Commonwealth, ex p Wachmann* [1993] 2 All ER 249

Chapter 17

Locus Standi

One obvious question arising from any discussion of the public/private divide that informed the procedural element of administrative law prior to 1977 is: ‘Why would any applicant ever have chosen to challenge government action through one of the prerogative remedies rather than seek a declaration or injunction via a writ or originating summons?’ Pursuing a public law remedy would not seem a rational choice for an applicant to make, since she would be handicapped by short time limits, by quite restrictive rules as to discovery of documents and cross-examination of witnesses, and by the non-availability of damages.

The answer is in part offered by the historical intricacies of the ways in which the various remedies developed. Among the more significant of these esoterica was the rule—which survived until Factortame—that injunctions could not (generally) be issued against the Crown.¹ Declarations were available against the Crown, but as indicated by Dyson v A-G in 1911²—there remained some uncertainty as to their exact scope. As noted in chapter sixteen, the reach of the various administrative law remedies has never been fixed,³ and the possibility always existed that an applicant might persuade a court to step in hitherto untrodden directions. But notwithstanding such intricacies concerning the reach of the remedies, an important influence on the form of remedy an applicant sought was provided by the law of locus standi (standing).

As chapter sixteen suggested, the division between public law and private remedies raises rule of law questions at a fairly sophisticated level. We saw in chapter three that one of the most obvious challenges to orthodox understandings of the rule of law is posed by Parliament’s use of ouster clauses, which—unless imaginatively construed by the courts as in Gilmore and Anisminic—preclude any applicant from arguing her case in the courts at all. The rule of law issue raised in cases such as O’Reilly is a more subtle one. Mr O’Reilly was not de jure being denied access to the courts to challenge the government body’s decision. Rather he was directed down a procedural route which made it much less likely that he could win his case.⁴ In rule of law terms, locus standi raises, like ouster clauses, the question of whether the applicant can gain access to the courts at all. We might characterise the law on locus standi as asking: ‘Who is allowed to stand before the court to challenge a government action?' If an applicant was not granted standing, she simply could not reach the question of whether the government action she was challenging was unlawful. This might mean that 'unlawful' government actions were not quashed, a consequence with obvious (and presumably adverse) implications for orthodox perceptions both of the rule of law and the sovereignty of Parliament.

¹ See Beatson and Matthews op cit ch 9. For a helpful examination of the exceptions to this general rule see Wade (1988) op cit pp 588–590. ² [1911] 1 KB 410, CA.

³ See ‘Exceptions to the general principle?’, ch 16, p 520 above.

⁴ It might be suggested he was de facto so excluded, both because under the public law route he was out of time and—even if he had been within time—he could not have won his case without being able to have discovery of the Board’s documents and cross-examination of its members.

This topic is intimately connected to the application for judicial review, both because of the present law's roots in Order 53 and the Supreme Court Act 1981, and because of the competing policy issues that it throws up. Those policy concerns are essentially threefold. How does administrative law balance the protection of individual citizens' rights and interests with the desire to ensure that government decision-making remains within legal limits and with the concern to protect government bodies (including the courts) from vexatious litigants? The concept of locus standi is perhaps the most important way in which administrative law deals with this complex question.

For our present purposes, the subject is best studied by a three-part chronological division. The first period addresses the law which existed prior to the introduction of the Order 53 reforms in 1977. The second covers the short period between the introduction of those reforms and the House of Lords' decision in IRC v National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses (IRC).⁵ The third runs from the mid-1980s to the present day.

I. The 'old' case law

The law on locus standi developed in quite distinct ways in respect of the public law (certiorari, mandamus and prohibition) and the private law remedies (declaration or injunction).⁶ At the risk of some oversimplification, one might at this initial stage suggest that the courts applied significantly more stringent standing tests for the declaration and injunction than for the public law remedies. This is the primary explanation for what might on occasion seem the surprising fact that an applicant chose to proceed (assuming the choice were available) by prerogative writ rather than a declaration or injunction. While an action for certiorari or prohibition might offer lesser prospects of succeeding at trial than an action for a declaration, it offered a much better chance of surmounting the standing test and so being able to begin the action at all.

The force of this point is reinforced when one considers that standing was widely perceived as a 'threshold issue'—ie it was an obstacle an applicant had to overcome before she was permitted to argue the merits of her case. If this view was correct, then the ostensible strength of an applicant's legal argument and the political significance of the decision she was contesting would be irrelevant to the standing question, which would presumably have to focus solely on the identity of the applicant and the intimacy of her connection to the decision being challenged. Although this notion of locus standi being a preliminary issue enjoyed widespread judicial and academic approval,⁷ it was something of a legal fiction. As is suggested below, many of the leading standing judgments were clearly influenced by the respective court's views of the merits of the applicant's claim, and in many cases where one might have thought there was considerable doubt as to the applicant's standing, the question was never broached at all.

⁵ [1982] AC 617, [1981] 2 All ER 93, HL.

⁶ Standing is not an issue in private law actions such as tort or breach of contract.

⁷ Cf Cane P (1980) 'The function of standing rules in administrative law' Public Law 303 at 303–304; Harlow and Rawlings (1984) op cit pp 284–285.

A close examination of the many subtleties and complexities thrown up by the 'old' law of standing is best reserved for a specialised administrative law text.⁸ The following pages sketch out the main currents in the orthodox view of standing prior to 1977, and also identify some decisions which might suggest we should regard the orthodoxy with some scepticism.

Declaration and injunction—a restrictive test?

A cursory glance at several leading judgments might lead the reader to assume that the courts have consistently—over a long period—set very high tests for the grant of standing to pursue these two remedies. In the 1858 case of Ware v Regent's Canal Co,⁹ the applicant landowner sought a declaration that the defendant had carried out works on his land which were not authorised by the relevant private Act of Parliament permitting construction of a canal. In the course of his judgment, Lord Chelmsford LC offered what Professor Wade describes as a 'classic statement' of this restrictive perception of standing:

Where there has been an excess of the powers given by an Act of Parliament, but no injury has been occasioned to any individual, or is imminent and of irreparable consequences, I apprehend that no-one but the Attorney-General on behalf of the public has a right to apply to this court to check the exorbitance of the party in the exercise of the powers confided to him.¹⁰

Much attention has also been given to Buckley J's judgment in Boyce v Paddington Borough Council.¹¹ Boyce owned a block of flats adjacent to a churchyard owned by the council. Statutory provisions limited the types of development that could be carried out in the churchyard. To prevent Boyce claiming the arcane right of 'ancient lights', the council erected a billboard in the churchyard pending more permanent development. Boyce subsequently sought a declaration that the billboard was a 'building' of a type prohibited by the statute.

The council argued that individuals could never have standing to seek a declaration against it. Buckley J rejected this argument, and suggested that standing for a declaration could be satisfied on two grounds. The first, more restrictive ground, was that the applicant had a 'private legal right' which was affected by the decision being challenged. The second, less restrictive ground (often referred to as 'special damage') was that the applicant was atypically and intensely affected by the decision's adverse impact on a public right.

One can discern obvious reasons for a restrictive standing test for these two remedies. In formal terms, their origin in the private law field would point to their availability being dependent upon infringement of private law rights. From a functionalist perspective, a difficult standing test offered important protections to the defendants against the lengthy time limits and presumptive entitlement to discovery of documents and cross-examination of witnesses that an action for a declaration/injunction brought with it.

The rule in Ware v Regent's Canal clearly compromises both the sovereignty of Parliament and the rule of law in their purist, orthodox senses, in so far as it hindered a citizen's attempt to prove that a government body has acted unlawfully. But it did not ignore either concept entirely. In particular, as Lord Chelmsford stressed, the court's view was shaped by the fact that the applicant had known about the works in issue for some eighteen months before he began his action. Had he come promptly, the Court's conclusion may have been different. Furthermore, Lord Chelmsford accepted that the applicant had other legal paths open to him, provided for by the Act itself. And it should also be noted that while the Court denied the applicant standing, it nonetheless examined the merits of his claim—and found it unproven.

⁸ On which see successive editions of Craig's Administrative Law. ⁹ (1858) 3 De G & J 212.

¹⁰ Ibid, at 228; quoted in Wade (1988) op cit p 690, fn 7. On the role of the Attorney General in this respect see the discussion of Gouriet at 'Gouriet (1978)—a division of judicial opinion', ch 4, pp 103–104 above.

¹¹ [1903] 1 Ch 109.

A skilled lawyer would have little difficulty in constructing a plausible argument to the effect that Ware offered a rule of narrow rather than general application. And even if Ware was construed broadly, the judgment in Boyce would suggest that its scope had been somewhat attenuated by the 'public right' limb of Buckley J's two-part formula.

It must also be remembered that Parliament could at any time have introduced a more relaxed standing test through statute had it wished to do so. That Parliament did not take such an initiative is an indication that legislators were content with the common law position, even if this might mean that some unlawful government actions would never be corrected.

Case law of more recent vintage was markedly ambiguous in its approach to this issue. Some of the seminal cases discussed in earlier chapters which were initiated as actions for a declaration clearly fell within even the Ware test of locus standi. The applicant's interest in *Anisminic*¹² was money; in Barnard and *Ridge v Baldwin*¹³ it was continuance in employment. Standing was not an issue in those cases. Yet the applicant in *Prescott v Birmingham Corp*¹⁴ also sought—and was granted—a declaration. Prescott successfully challenged the legality of the council's policy to offer concessionary bus fares to old age pensioners. His interest (as a ratepayer) did not fall within either Ware or Boyce, but the standing issue was not even argued in that case, still less addressed by the court at first instance or on appeal.

The suspicion that the grant or refusal of standing for a declaration or injunction was determined in large part by the courts' views of the merits of applicants' claims rather than the nature of the applicants' interests is reinforced by examination of several leading cases from the 1960s and 1970s. The issue raised in *Gregory v Camden London Borough Council*¹⁵ was the grant of planning permission to open a school on the site of a former convent. There was allegedly a procedural flaw in the grant of permission. But before reaching that question, the Court had to decide if Gregory, who lived next door to the site in question and was concerned by the additional noise and traffic that the school would generate, had standing? The Court concluded that he did not:

One has to consider the legal rights of someone.... I may be very much affected by the noise of the children coming out to play, by the shouts, by the laughter and everything else. But unless I can establish it is a nuisance then I have lost no legal right... The next point is this. In this case no question of public rights is involved, as where there is interference with the highway....¹⁶

The Court was obviously influenced in reaching this decision however by its view that to grant a declaration would be a useless remedy in the circumstances. Paul J indicated that had the applicant sought an injunction, which might have had some practical effect, the Court might have taken a different view on the standing point.

¹² See Anisminic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission (1969), ch 3, pp 76–77 above.

¹³ See pp 'The re-emergence of the principle? Ridge v Baldwin', ch 15, pp 482–483 and 'The turning point? Barnard v National Dock Labour Board', ch 16, pp 513–514 respectively.

¹⁴ [1955] Ch 210, CA; 'Excess of Powers', ch 14, p 446 above. ¹⁵ [1966] 1 WLR 899.

¹⁶ Ibid at 907, per Paul J. On this second test see for example Brownsea Haven Properties Ltd v Poole Corp [1958] Ch 574. The plaintiff owned a hotel in a road which he claimed had been unlawfully designated as a one-way street. The standing issue was not even broached in this case.

The paradigmatic 'hopeless case' is perhaps Thorne v BBC.¹⁷ Thorne was seeking an injunction to prevent the BBC broadcasting what he regarded as anti-German propaganda. He claimed that the programmes breached s 6 of the Race Relations Act 1965, which created a criminal offence of incitement to racial hatred. The applicant's bizarre statement of claim¹⁸ would suggest he was mentally disturbed, but the Court of Appeal saw no need to address this matter. In this case, standing was treated as a threshold issue. As Lord Denning put it:

It is a fundamental rule that the court will only grant an injunction at the suit of a private individual to support a legal right. ... [The applicant] does not allege, and indeed he does not have, any legal right in himself personally in this matter.¹⁹

The Court²⁰ observed that the very high standing test set for a declaration served an important political purpose in situations such as this; namely to prevent individual citizens invoking civil law remedies as a means to pre-empt or second guess governmental decisions as to whether or not to initiate criminal law proceedings.

Some exceptions to the general rule?

Gregory and Thorne appear difficult to reconcile with the Court of Appeal's decision in Blackburn v A-G.²¹ The merits of Blackburn's challenge to the UK's ratification of the Treaty of Rome were discussed in chapter eleven.²² What is pertinent here is that the application was for a declaration and that the applicant's substantive claim was quite outlandish. Blackburn manifestly had no 'private legal right' in issue here; nor could he plausibly maintain that he would be atypically affected by the public law consequences of the UK's accession to the Community. Yet Lord Denning MR's leading judgment certainly did not treat the locus standi question as a preliminary issue. He did not reach it until the end of his judgment, and dealt with it in the following way:

[Standing] is not a matter which we need rule on today. [Mr Blackburn] says that he feels very strongly and that it is a matter in which many persons in this country are concerned. I myself would not rule him out on the ground that he has no standing.²³

Whether the Court would have 'ruled Mr Blackburn out' on that ground if the merits of his case indicated that he might have won his action is a matter for speculation.

There is some further indication that Lord Denning's Court of Appeal was willing to allow the declaration and injunction to be invoked by citizens with no particular link to the government decision being challenged if they had (in the Court's view) a strong case on the merits. *A-G (ex rel McWhirter) v Independent Broadcasting Authority*²⁴ is a good example. McWhirter sought an injunction against the Independent Broadcasting Authority. His specific concern was to prevent the television broadcast of a documentary about Andy Warhol, which he considered to be obscene.²⁵ The point of law on which he relied arose under s 3(1) of the Television Act 1964, which required members of the ¹⁸ Reproduced in full at ibid, 1106–1107.

¹⁷ [1967] 1 WLR 1104, CA.

¹⁹ Ibid, at 1109.

²⁰ Danckwerts and Winn LJ concurred with Lord Denning.

²¹ [1971] 1 WLR 1037.

²² At 'Parliamentary sovereignty: a non-justiciable concept?', ch 11, p 370 above.

²³ [1971] 1 WLR 1037 at 1041.

²⁴ [1973] QB 629, CA.

²⁵ The case is a mark of how far notions of obscenity have relaxed since 1973. Much press indignation (papers had been given a pre-broadcast screening of the film) was engendered by scenes which might appear only comical today. Thus, per the Sunday Mirror, the film was: 'the most permissive shocker to be shown on British screens.... It includes: A FAT GIRL, stripping to the waist, daubing her breasts with paint and then painting a canvas with them. She also throws paint down a lavatory pan to form weird patterns. This one she calls Flush Art': ibid, at 633.

IBA Board to ‘satisfy themselves’ that broadcast programmes did not offend against good taste. On the facts, it appeared that the Board’s members had unlawfully delegated that responsibility to their officials. While McWhirter seemed to have a strong case on the merits, the suggestion that he fell within either of the categories identified in Boyce is risible. But the Court did not rule out the possibility that an applicant in such circumstances could have standing. Lord Denning expressed this point in grandiloquent language:

I regard it as a matter of high constitutional principle that if there is good ground for supposing that a government department or a public authority is transgressing the law... in a way which offends or injures thousands of Her Majesty’s subjects, then in the last resort any one of those injured or offended can draw it to the attention of the courts and seek to have the law enforced.²⁶

This conclusion is readily defensible if we assume that the primary purpose of an injunction is to prevent what seems prima facie to be unlawful government²⁷ activity. If its purpose is however to protect private rights, the majority’s conclusion is absurd. Lord Denning was aware of the shaky doctrinal foundations of his conclusion, observing that: ‘in these days we have to mould procedural requirements so as to see that the duty which the statute ordains is fulfilled’.²⁸ ‘Moulding’ is perhaps a polite way of describing what the Court did to traditional doctrine. A more satisfactory approach would have been for the Court explicitly to break with past practice and to suggest that in cases of what appeared to be manifestly unlawful government behaviour, any citizen would be competent to bring an action for an injunction or a declaration.²⁹

We have seen in earlier chapters that Lord Denning’s time in the Court of Appeal was marked by occasional disagreement on matters of constitutional principle with the House of Lords; Magor and St Mellons RDC and Rosminster being primary examples.³⁰ A similar tension was evident in Gouriet v Union of Post Office Workers.³¹ The background to this case was outlined in chapter four, which addressed the question of whether the Attorney-General’s power to initiate relator proceedings was susceptible to full review. Gouriet had also sought to proceed in his own right, seeking a declaration that the proposed mail boycott was illegal and an injunction to prevent it taking place. The Court of Appeal had unanimously concluded that Gouriet had standing to seek a declaration. Since he had unsuccessfully sought a relator, the declaration was presumably (per McWhirter) his remedy of ‘last resort’.

The House of Lords rejected this conclusion. Lord Wilberforce forcefully restated the rule in Boyce: ‘where there is no interference with a private right and no personal damage, declaratory relief cannot be sought without joining the Attorney-General as a party (sc as relator)’.³² (As noted in chapter four, the House of Lords also concluded that the High Court had no jurisdiction to examine the merits of the Attorney-General’s refusal to begin relator proceedings.) One might argue that Mr Gouriet would have fared better

²⁶ Ibid, at 649.

²⁷ ‘Government’ in the context of an injunction at this time did not, of course, include the Crown.

²⁸ [1973] QB 629 at 635, CA.

²⁹ In the event, McWhirter was not given standing. His own action was not ‘the last resort’, as he could have attempted to persuade the Attorney-General to initiate relator proceedings.

³⁰ See ‘Purposive (or ‘teleological’) interpretation’, ch 3, pp 68–69 and ‘R v IRC, ex p Rosminster Ltd (1980)’, ch 3, pp 71–72 respectively.

³¹ [1978] AC 435, HL.

³² Ibid, at 484. Cf also Viscount Dilhorne at 494: ‘In my opinion the cases establish that the courts have no jurisdiction to entertain such claims by a private individual who has not suffered and will not suffer damage’. These comments presumably mean that Prescott, Blackburn and McWhirter should not be regarded as ‘authorities’ on the locus standi issue.

on the standing question had he been able to present himself to the court as the owner of a business that communicated frequently with South African customers, or if he had friends in South Africa with whom he regularly corresponded.³³ It is conceivable that he might then, particularly on the first ground, have fallen within Lord Wilberforce's rule. This would however demand that we ignored the political context in which the judgment was issued, which would perhaps be unwise. Lord Wilberforce had indicated that a grant of standing would be futile, since Gouriet was challenging a decision that was so intensely political in nature that it was effectively non-justiciable.

In discussing the House of Lords' judgment, Craig suggested that: 'The decision illustrates a conception of standing which in itself reflects a view of administrative law: the vindication of private rights'.³⁴ Craig's comment is readily defensible. But their Lordships' decision in Gouriet offered just one conception of locus standi. As this relatively cursory discussion of the early case law has suggested, other conceptions could readily be found, some of which intimated that in certain circumstances the declaration and injunction could be available to litigants with only the most remote of personal connections to the substantive question in issue. As Craig noted a few pages after the comment quoted above: 'To describe the common law as unnecessarily confused would be to pay it a compliment'.³⁵ That view applied as readily to the prerogative orders as to the declaration and injunction.

Certiorari and prohibition—an expansive test?

Since the prerogative remedies initially developed as mechanisms to control the activities of government bodies, one might expect that they would incorporate a broader test of standing than the declaration and injunction. Their original purpose was, after all, not to protect private rights but to ensure that government bodies did not exceed their jurisdiction.³⁶ The dominant view appeared to be that standing for certiorari could be satisfied on either of two grounds. These are perhaps best illustrated by the Court of Appeal's judgment in R v Thames Magistrates' Court, ex p Greenbaum.³⁷

The case concerned the allocation of licences for market pitches. Greenbaum, a licensee, complained that the magistrate's court had exceeded its statutory jurisdiction in ordering that a rival trader be given a specific pitch which had previously been allocated to him. Greenbaum clearly had a pecuniary interest in this decision, and it seems plausible that he would have had standing for a declaration had he sought one. He undoubtedly met the first of the two standing tests for certiorari; namely was he 'a person aggrieved'? This test bears some resemblance to the second limb of the Boyce test for a declaration. As Lord Ellenborough put it in R v Taunton St Mary Inhabitants:

Certainly a person does not answer to the character of a person aggrieved who is only in common with the rest of the subjects inconvenienced by the nuisance; but here it appears that persons have by reason of their local situation, a grievance of their own.³⁸

Greenbaum confirmed the proposition that a person aggrieved would be given standing ex debito iustitiae, that is as a matter of right. Lord Denning also confirmed that standing ³³ Cf Cane P (3rd edn, 1996) An Introduction to Administrative Law pp 43–44.

³⁴ (1989) op cit p 354. Cf Beatson and Matthews: 'A survey for locus standi prior to Gouriet would have revealed that consistency was also lacking in respect of that remedy'; op cit p 482.

³⁵ Craig (1989) op cit p 358.

³⁶ Cf Wade (1988) op cit p 625: 'Nominally [prohibition and certiorari] are granted to the Crown and the Crown always has sufficient interest to call upon public bodies to act lawfully'.

³⁷ (1957) 55 LGR 129.

³⁸ (1815) 3 M & S 465 at 472.

for certiorari could be granted to a 'stranger' to the challenged decision. In these circumstances, standing would be granted if the court considered it in the public interest for the action to proceed. Lord Denning was not explicit as to which factors would be weighed in the balance to determine this issue. He referred to the 1870 decision of *R v Surrey Justices*³⁹ to illustrate this point, but all that this case tells us is that standing is unlikely to be granted to a stranger if 'no good would be done to the public' by the applicant succeeding in the action.⁴⁰ One would assume that 'the public good/interest' embraced matters relating to the merits of the case, and in particular the apparent strength of the applicant's legal argument and the political significance of the decision being challenged. If those factors were indeed to be taken into account, one cannot plausibly maintain that locus standi was a threshold question.

A 'citizen's action' test for standing for certiorari?

That 'strangers' could seek certiorari is a strong indication that the court was willing to accept what is sometimes referred to as a 'citizen's action' or 'acto popularis' basis for standing for this remedy. Private rights are an irrelevance under this conception of standing, which regards the purpose of the remedy as a means to control unlawful government decision-making.

The Court of Appeal seemed to step further in this direction in R v Paddington Valuation Officer, ex p Peachey Property Corp Ltd,⁴¹ in which Lord Denning suggested that one could be a 'person aggrieved' (and so entitled to standing as of right) even if one had no financial interest affected by the challenged decision. Peachey Property was a landlord whose purpose built flats had been given a higher rateable value than similar converted flats. It sought to have the rating list quashed on the grounds that the valuation was unlawful. The company clearly had a financial interest in the rateable value of its property, but Lord Denning indicated that this was not necessary for it to be a 'person aggrieved':

I do not think grievances are to be measured in £.s.d. If a ratepayer or other person finds his name included in a valuation list which is invalid, he is entitled to come to the court and apply to have it quashed. He is not to be put off by the plea that he has suffered no damage.⁴²

The judgment thus seemed to widen the category of individuals who could expect to be granted standing ex debito justitiae to seek certiorari. Lord Denning also held that the courts should construe the notion of a 'stranger' broadly, suggesting that the only type of litigant who would not satisfy this test was 'a mere busybody who was interfering in things which did not concern him'.⁴³

The 'busybody' seemed to be a rather narrow residual category. Mr Blackburn appeared again as the applicant in R v Greater London Council, ex p Blackburn.⁴⁴ His complaint was that the Greater London Council had unlawfully delegated its film censorship functions to the British Board of Film Censors by automatically accepting the Board's classification of particular pornographic films rather than evaluating the films itself. He sought an order of prohibition forbidding the GLC from acting in this way. Lord Denning's judgment is of interest because (rather like his treatment of locus standi for an injunction in McWhirter) it manifestly views standing for prohibition as being concerned almost ³⁹ (1870) LR 5 QB 466.

⁴⁰ Ibid., at 473, per Blackburn J. The case is in fact not about standing at all, but rather about the analytically distinct issue of whether the court should withhold a remedy from an applicant who has standing and succeeds on the merits.

⁴¹ [1966] 1 QB 380, CA.

⁴² Ibid., at 401, CA.

⁴³ Ibid.

⁴⁴ [1976] 1 WLR 550, CA.

exclusively with ensuring that public bodies do not act unlawfully, regardless of whether the impugned decision affects individual rights:

I regard it a matter of high constitutional principle [that] if the government transgresses the law... in a way which offends thousands... anyone offended can draw it to the attention of the courts.⁴⁵

The standing test to be adopted was therefore a (very) loose one:

Mr Blackburn is a citizen of London. His wife is a ratepayer. He has children who may be harmed by the exhibition of pornographic films. If he has no sufficient interest, no other citizen has.⁴⁶

Lord Denning's test is apparently even more expansive than the one deployed in McWhirter, since he has here dropped any reference to an individual's action being admissible only as a matter of last resort.

But, unlike in McWhirter, there is an obvious flaw in Lord Denning's reasoning on the matter of 'high constitutional principle' here. One could not know if a government body had 'transgressed the law' until the court issued judgment. Mr Blackburn could at most 'draw the attention of the courts' to a strong prima facie argument that an unlawful act had occurred.⁴⁷ Denning's text rather suggests that he did not turn his attention to the standing question until after he had reached a conclusion on the merits; which in turn raises the inference that he allowed his answer on locus standi to be determined by his view on the substantive law. One might be forgiven for concluding that all that was required to gain standing for certiorari and prohibition was that an applicant present a prima facie convincing legal argument in respect of a decision which the court regarded as touching upon a matter of some political or moral importance.

Mandamus—a broad or narrow test?

Case law on the standing requirements for mandamus offers support for the conflicting views that the remedy demanded an applicant have something approximating the Boyce 'special damage' interest and that he/she need only be a concerned citizen.⁴⁸ The first line of case law is best illustrated by R v Hereford Corpn, ex p Harrower;⁴⁹ the second by R v Metropolitan Police Comr, ex p Blackburn.⁵⁰

Harrower was a building and electrical contractor who had tendered unsuccessfully for a contract with the council. The applicants alleged that the council had failed to comply with its own standing orders in allocating the contract, and that its decision was therefore ultra vires on the grounds of procedural irregularity. Harrower applied for an order of mandamus to make the council go through the tendering process again.

The Court considered the issue of the merits—finding in the applicant's favour—before broaching the standing issue. Lord Parker CJ felt that the test set was a high one:

It has always been recognised that there is a quite different criterion of interest which would justify an application for certiorari and one which would justify an application for mandamus. It is said that a far more stringent test applies in the case of mandamus, and that the applicant must have, as it is put, a specific legal right.⁵¹

⁴⁵ Ibid, at 559.

⁴⁶ Ibid. ⁴⁷ This is the point Lord Denning made in McWhirter.

⁴⁸ Compare for example R v Lewisham Union Guardians [1897] 1 QB 498, requiring a 'specific legal right', with R v Cotham [1898] 1 QB 802, demanding only a 'substantial interest'. ⁴⁹ [1970] 1 WLR 1424.

⁵⁰ [1968] 2 QB 118.

⁵¹ [1970] 1 WLR 1424 at 1428.

This ‘right’ was not satisfied by the mere fact that the applicants had an economic interest qua potential contractor in the outcome of the tendering process; nor by the fact that the company was a ratepayer in the council’s area. However Lord Parker CJ held that the combined effect of these two rather dilute economic interests was sufficient to give the applicant standing on these facts. The judgment implies that the applicant would have to show a specific pecuniary interest in the decision made by the council. The case is certainly not authority for the proposition that being a ratepayer was per se sufficient to give standing for mandamus.

However, the Court of Appeal took a rather different view in R v Metropolitan Police Comr, ex p Blackburn.⁵² Blackburn alleged that the Metropolitan Police Commissioner had taken a policy decision not to enforce the anti-gambling laws since he considered such enforcement an inefficient use of manpower. Blackburn sought mandamus to compel the Commissioner to reverse this policy. As in R v GLC, ex p Blackburn, Lord Denning approached the case from an explicitly constitutional perspective. He seemed to doubt that Mr Blackburn had standing:

it is I think an open question whether Mr Blackburn has a sufficient interest to be protected. No doubt any person who was adversely affected by the action of the commissioner in making a mistaken policy would have such an interest. The difficulty is to see how Mr Blackburn himself has been affected.⁵³

Lord Denning saw no need to decide this issue however. Instead he moved straight away to considering whether the policy was unlawful. Observing that ‘The rule of law must prevail’, Lord Denning characterised the non-enforcement of the gambling laws as ‘a deplorable state of affairs’.⁵⁴ The Commissioner’s policy was undoubtedly unlawful.

The judgment suggests that the Court’s concern was primarily with the legality of police policy, irrespective of the policy’s impact on Blackburn himself. The case certainly indicates that the merits of the case and the applicant’s standing were intertwined issues. In the event, the commissioner had reversed his policy before judgment was issued, so no remedy was granted.

II. Section 31(3) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 and the Inland Revenue Commissioners case

It is apparent that prior to 1977 the law on standing varied markedly not just between remedies but also within them.⁵⁵ This is not necessarily an undesirable state of affairs. If one sees the purposes of standing ‘rules’ as ensuring that the courts have a wide discretion to ration access to judicial review, the diversity in the case law would be quite satisfactory. From an applicant’s perspective however, the uncertainty could be problematic. There would for example be little reason for an applicant to seek prohibition or certiorari rather than a declaration or injunction if the court adopted the very relaxed test of standing for the declaration favoured in Blackburn v A-G, or ignored the standing question altogether as in Prescott v Birmingham. But it would have been foolhardy for counsel to affirm with any certainty whether a court would take that line in an individual case. From that perspective, the law was ripe for reform.

⁵² [1968] 2 QB 118, CA.

⁵³ Ibid, at 137. ⁵⁴ Ibid, at 138.

⁵⁵ But see Cane P (1981) ‘Standing, legality and the limits of public law’ Public Law 322 at p 335: ‘The “old” law of standing was, it is true, couched in terms of greater or lesser vagueness—legal rights, special damage, genuine grievance. But the content of these vague concepts was in principle and in practice capable of being rendered relatively concrete and certain. . . . Rules of standing could be stated in terms of classes of plaintiffs—ratepayers, commercial competitors, neighbours, taxpayers’.

The same policy issues that underlay the amended application for judicial review informed the changes that Order 53, and subsequently the Supreme Court Act 1981, s 31(3), promised to bring with respect to standing. Section 31(3) provided that—at the leave stage—standing would be granted to an applicant who had a ‘sufficient interest in the matter to which the application relates’. The text of s 31 did not differentiate between the five remedies in this respect. But while the standing test was now nominally a statutory rather than common law issue, s 31(3) was cast in very loose terms. The notion of ‘sufficient interest’ is itself a flexible concept.⁵⁶ When one adds to this the ‘in the matter to which the application relates’ limb of the formula, the legitimate scope for judicial discretion in deciding whether a given applicant meets the test seems virtually boundless.⁵⁷ It was also unclear if s 31(3)’s explicit reference to the leave stage meant that locus standi was not to be considered at the full hearing stage; or, if it was to be considered, whether the ‘sufficient interest . . .’ formula was the test to be applied. Two further issues in particular remained to be resolved by subsequent case law. The first was whether s 31(3) introduced a uniform locus standi test for all five remedies? The second was whether, irrespective of the answer to the first question, s 31(3) should be taken as indicating a parliamentary preference for the relaxation or the restriction of standing requirements?

The House of Lords offered answers to these questions shortly afterwards, in IRC v National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses.⁵⁸ The IRC had given a tax ‘amnesty’ to casual workers in the newspaper industry who had previously evaded taxes in return for accurate returns in future. The National Federation subsequently sought a declaration to have the amnesty declared illegal and mandamus to force the IRC to assess and collect the tax.

All five judges hearing the case issued judgments. Although there were many points of agreement between the opinions, there were also some significant differences, which makes it very difficult to identify the clear ratio of the case. It would perhaps be more accurate to suggest that the various judgments laid out a series of principles which might be expected to exert a strong influence on the development of the law on locus standi in future.

The judges differed on the question of whether s 31 had created a uniform standing test. Lord Diplock clearly felt that a uniform test was now in place. Lords Scarman and Roskill appeared to support this view. Lord Wilberforce, in contrast, firmly rejected the idea of a uniform test. Lord Fraser was more equivocal, suggesting that not all of the old law had been swept away.

Should standing be a threshold issue?

With the exception of Lord Fraser,⁵⁹ the Court took the view that standing should no longer be seen as a preliminary or threshold issue. There might on occasion be situations where an applicant’s interest in the matter was so tenuous that she could be denied standing at ⁵⁶ Cf Cane (1980) op cit pp 325–326.

⁵⁷ On the background to the new test see Harlow and Rawlings (1984) op cit pp 299–301; Craig (1989) op cit pp 358–359.

⁵⁸ [1982] AC 617, HL. Despite the styling of the case (ie NFSESB v IRC), it was argued before the House of Lords as an AJR, not as a private law stream case. The significance of this point is returned to below.

⁵⁹ ‘[W]hether the respondents have a sufficient interest to make the application at all is a separate, and logically prior, question which has to be answered affirmatively before any question on the merits arises’: ibid, at 645.

the leave stage. In most cases however, the questions of standing and the merits of a claim would be explicitly fused. This fusion implied that if an applicant approached the court with an ostensibly convincing legal argument in respect of a gross illegality committed by a government body, she could expect to be granted leave even if she herself had only a remote, personal interest in the matter.⁶⁰ This reasoning indicated that the court was rejecting a pre-occupation with formal rules of standing, and embracing instead a functionalist approach; that function being not so much the protection of private rights, but ensuring that potentially unlawful government action did not escape judicial scrutiny. In Lord Diplock's opinion:

It would in my view be a grave lacuna in our system of public law if a pressure group, like the federation, or even a single public spirited taxpayer, were prevented by outdated technical rules of locus standi from bringing the matter to the attention of the court to vindicate the rule of law and get the unlawful action stopped.⁶¹

On the facts of the case, all five law lords concluded that the Federation did not have standing. This was in (small) part because the relationship between the IRC and taxpayers was regarded as confidential, and should not be open to breach by third parties. The primary reason for denying standing however lay in the fusion of locus with the merits. Simply put, the Court considered that the IRCs' actions had been well within the limits of their statutory discretion:

[T]he Inland Revenue were acting in this matter genuinely in the care and management of the taxes, under the powers entrusted to them. This has no resemblance to any kind of case where the court, at the instance of a taxpayer, ought to intervene.⁶²

The judges nonetheless did not rule out the possibility that there might be some types of allegedly unlawful IRC behaviour in respect of which any taxpayer would be granted standing; a conclusion which certainly countenances the possibility of an acto popularis basis to the locus standi issue.⁶³

Lord Wilberforce rooted the explicit fusion of standing and merits in the wording of s 31(3); ie that the applicant show 'sufficient interest in the matter to which the application relates'. Lord Diplock, in contrast, indicated that this step was a natural progression in the evolution of common law understandings of the courts' role in regulating the relationship between citizens and government bodies. Whether we see the source of the IRC principle in statute or common law, its policy implications are clear. Craig characterised the judgment as confirming that: 'archaic limitations on standing should be discarded in order that public law can meet the new challenges of a developing society'.⁶⁴

Yet it would be a mistake to assume that the IRC case is the starting point for the current law of standing. It is perhaps more instructive to view it as a turning point. Its constitutional significance can only properly be understood if the judgments are set in the contexts of both the previous case law and the competing policy objectives that case law

⁶⁰ Cf Lord Diplock: 'If on a quick perusal of the material then available, the court thinks that it discloses what might on further consideration turn out to be an arguable case in favour of granting to the applicant the relief claimed, it ought, in the exercise of a judicial discretion, to give him leave to apply for that relief': ibid, at 644.

⁶¹ Ibid, at 618–619.

⁶² Ibid, at 635; per Lord Wilberforce.

⁶³ There is obviously another side to the 'fusion' coin. An applicant who had a close connection to the matter in dispute, but who came to court with an apparently weak legal argument in relation to a trivial matter, could be denied standing.

⁶⁴ (1983) op cit p 362.

was attempting to address. Professor Wade suggested in the sixth edition of his influential Administrative law textbook that in the IRC case:

The House of Lords gave a new and liberal but somewhat uncertain character to the law of standing.... In general [the decision] may be said to crystallise the elements of a generous and public-oriented doctrine of standing which had previously been sporadic and uncoordinated.⁶⁵

Standing in the private law stream

The extent to which the 'new' law of standing has lent that liberality a more coherent form is the subject we address in the remainder of this chapter.⁶⁶ Before doing so, however, it is important to note that whatever liberalisation of locus standi the IRC decision produced, it was a liberalisation that operated only in the public law stream of remedies. The judgment was concerned only with locus standi for the AJR: it had no obvious bearing on the standing test for a declaration or injunction sought via a writ or originating summons. O'Reilly v Mackman was to be decided shortly after IRC. After that judgment was issued, it was apparent that a relaxation of the standing test for a declaration or injunction through Order 53 might not in fact make it any easier at all for an applicant to gain access to the long time limits and entitlement to cross-examination and discovery associated with the private law stream. A grant of standing might therefore prove of limited utility to some (or perhaps many) applicants.

In Steeles v Derbyshire County Council,⁶⁷ decided in 1981, Webster J had concluded that the standing test for both the public law and private law routes to a declaration should be the same. To hold otherwise 'would seem to me to make an ass of the law'.⁶⁸ However, this view was not widely shared.

Thus in Barrs v Bethell,⁶⁹ decided shortly after IRC, the High Court refused to grant standing for a private law route declaration to a ratepayer who alleged that Camden council had unlawfully mismanaged its finances. Warner J indicated that he felt standing should not have been granted in Prescott, and doubted that some of Lord Denning's more extravagant locus standi claims were supported by authority. In Warner J's view, the fact that that an applicant might satisfy the s 31(3) test did not mean she had standing for a declaration in the private law stream. The Boyce test would still apply in these circumstances. And it would apply in order to ensure that the protections (by way of leave and short time limits) offered to public bodies by Order 53 could not be circumvented by applicants who lacked an intimate interest in the matter in issue.⁷⁰

Similarly, in Ashby v Ebdon,⁷¹ Warner J held that s 31(3) and IRC made no difference to the Gouriet rationale.⁷² An applicant could not seek a declaration through a writ if the effect of so doing would be to sidestep the need to gain the Attorney-General's consent to a relator action in circumstances where the civil law was to be used as an indirect means of pursuing criminal proceedings, unless the applicant could demonstrate that she fell within the Boyce test. This view was upheld by the House of Lords in Stoke-on-Trent City

⁶⁵ (1988) op cit p 701.

⁶⁶ Cf Cane's suggestion that IRC would create 'a large degree of uncertainty and unpredictability' (1981) op cit p 339.

⁶⁸ Ibid, at 500. ⁶⁹ [1982] Ch 294, [1982] 1 All ER 106.

⁷⁰ Warner J placed considerable reliance on Heywood (see pp 516–517 above) in support of this point.

⁷¹ [1985] Ch 394, [1984] 3 All ER 869.

⁷² See 'Some exceptions to the general rule?', pp 539–540 above.

*Council v B & Q (Retail) Ltd.*⁷³ The Court held that the council had no standing to seek an injunction through a writ against B&Q (a home improvement retailer) in an attempt to stop the store breaching the provisions of the Sunday Trading Act 1950, that breach being a criminal offence.

III. Post-IRC developments

Notwithstanding the court's evident unwillingness to allow the supposedly more relaxed locus standi regime identified in IRC to cross over into the private law stream, several cases decided shortly after IRC indicated that Lord Diplock's preference for more liberal standing rules within the AJR was well supported in the lower courts. The applicant in *R v HM Treasury, ex p Smedley*⁷⁴ approached the court 'in his capacity of British taxpayer and elector'. Mr Smedley's complaint was that the government was about to make a payment of some £120 million to the EC in an unlawful manner. The Court of Appeal concluded that his claim was ill-founded on the merits. Lord Donaldson MR did not expressly decide the standing issue, but indicated he would be 'extremely surprised'⁷⁵ if he found himself upholding the government's submission that Mr Smedley did not have sufficient interest in this matter. Slade LJ was more explicit: 'I do not feel much doubt that Mr Smedley, if only in his capacity as a taxpayer, has sufficient locus standi to raise this question...'.⁷⁶

A 'citizen's action' test for standing under s 31(3)?

Smedley is perhaps a good indication that the 'matter' identified in s 31(3) could include the scale of the practical consequences of the decision under challenge as well as the prima facie flagrancy of its breach of legal norms. Mr Smedley's argument appeared to be weak on its merits, but since £120 million was in issue the 'matter' he raised was a serious one. Slade LJ's grant of locus to Mr Smedley qua taxpayer does not contradict IRC, since the applicant was not seeking confidential information about another individual.

The Smedley decision is not without pre-IRC precedent. It may be recalled that the Court of Appeal in Blackburn v A-G had permitted a 'concerned citizen' to seek a declaration, on quite hopeless grounds, concerning the legality of the government's ratification of the Treaty of Accession. Smedley may help us to explain that decision as prompted by the court's concern about the consequences (enormous) of accession. Given that the UK's accession to the EC has prompted radical alteration to the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty,⁷⁷ it would be unsurprising if it has also prompted the courts effectively to abandon any concern with the status of the applicant in cases raising important, EC-related constitutional questions. Lord Rees-Mogg's challenge to the government's ratification of the Maastricht Treaty reinforces that hypothesis.⁷⁸ He was granted standing—in respect of an argument as legally feeble as that deployed by Mr Blackburn thirty-five years earlier—because of his 'sincere concern for constitutional issues'.

There is however reason for believing that a locus standi test of this breadth is not confined to EC matters, but may extend to other 'constitutional issues'. The applicant in ⁷³ [1984] AC 754, [1984] 2 All ER 332, HL.

⁷⁴ [1985] QB 657, CA. ⁷⁵ Ibid, at 667.

⁷⁶ Ibid, at 670.

⁷⁷ See 'IV. The end of parliamentary sovereignty? Or its reappearance?', ch 12, pp 399–407 above.

⁷⁸ R v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, ex p Rees-Mogg [1994] QB 552, [1994] 1 All ER 457; see 'The ratification and incorporation of the Maastricht Treaty', ch 12, p 415 above.

*R v Felixstowe Justices, ex p Leigh*⁷⁹ was a journalist who sought—inter alia—a declaration that a policy adopted by the Felixstowe magistrates' courts of concealing the identity of magistrates in certain types of case was unlawful. Having concluded that Mr Leigh's argument succeeded on the merits, the Court then accepted that he met the s 31(3) test, characterising him as 'the guardian of the public interest in the maintenance and preservation of open justice in the magistrates' courts, a matter of vital concern in the administration of justice'.⁸⁰

Watkins LJ then went rather further, and held that any 'public spirited citizen' would have standing in this matter. This raises the inference that, as in Smedley, it was the political significance of the impugned government action, rather than the ostensible strength of the applicant's legal argument, that drove the decision on locus.

The argument that IRC was de facto if not de jure pushing the courts towards accepting a citizen's action test is buttressed by R v Independent Broadcasting Authority, ex p Whitehouse.⁸¹ The case concerned the IBA's decision to broadcast a controversial movie, Scum, about life in a gaol for young offenders. Whitehouse sought a declaration that the IBA's members had acted unlawfully by delegating the decision about whether to screen the film to its Director General. The Court held that she had sufficient interest in the matter. Watkins LJ indicated that every television licence holder would have standing in litigation relating to the broadcast of television programmes likely to give offence to children or adults. That the applicant identified herself as a licence-holder, rather than simply a citizen or viewer, or—as Whitehouse was—the leader of a long-established pressure group concerned with broadcasting standards—suggests that the courts were still looking for a pecuniary interest as a justification for granting standing. But that interest is so remote in this case that the licence-holder point seems little more than a fig leaf to conceal a locus decision driven wholly by the merits of the case.

The Court of Appeal's judgment in *R v Monopolies and Mergers Commission, ex p Argyll Group plc*⁸² lent a somewhat more complicated gloss to the position by suggesting (building on the intimations given in IRC) that standing was to be regarded both as a threshold issue at the leave stage and as an issue fused with the merits of the claim at the full hearing. As Lord Donaldson MR put it:

The first stage test, which is applied on the application for leave, will lead to a refusal if the applicant has no interest whatsoever and is, in truth, no more than a meddlesome busybody. If, however, the application appears to be otherwise arguable and there is no other discretionary bar, such as dilatoriness on the part of the applicant, the applicant may expect to get leave to apply, leaving the test of interest or standing to be re-applied as a matter of discretion on the hearing of the substantive application. At this second stage, the strength of the applicant's interest is one of the factors to be weighed in the balance.⁸³

It would of course make little sense for the court to make precisely the same inquiry at both the leave and full hearing stages. In practical terms, a distinction between a 'quick glance' and a 'close scrutiny' test for locus standi at the leave and full hearing stages has much to commend it. Lord Donaldson's test is however rather difficult to square with the wording of s 31(3); it requires something of a feat of the interpretive imagination to construe 'sufficient interest in the matter to which the application relates' as 'so long as she is not a busybody'. The case perhaps confirms the point that in this particular field, the text of the relevant statutory provisions has had little substantive impact on how the courts are developing the law.

⁷⁹ [1987] QB 582.

⁸⁰ Ibid, at 598.

⁸¹ (1984) Times, 14 April.

⁸² [1986] 2 All ER 257, CA.

⁸³ Ibid, at 265.

'Representative standing'

The cases discussed in the previous section would suggest that IRC had triggered a pervasive shift towards a more expansive notion of standing. All of them had however involved actions brought by an individual citizen. In a sense, each applicant was 'representing' a broader constituency. This is most evident in respect of Mrs Whitehouse, who provided a legal mouthpiece for her pressure group. Smedley and Rees-Mogg were in effect acting as representatives of that swathe of political opinion which is hostile to the UK's membership of the EC. Mr Leigh, more broadly, represented the public at large, albeit not in any formal, organisational capacity.

The courts are presented with rather different standing issues when the prospective applicant is a formal, organised group, created for the purpose of pursuing a particular political agenda.⁸⁴ The applicant itself may very well not have an interest in any sense comparable with the private right/special damage test of standing.⁸⁵ It would however seem evident that granting standing to representative bodies increases the prospect that an unlawful government action will be challenged. An interest group is likely to have greater financial resources than an individual and is less likely to be intimidated by the potentially adverse personal consequences of beginning an action. It is also probable that an expert pressure group will have the knowledge and experience to present a case to the court in the most pertinent and effective way. These considerations would of course also offer government defendants an incentive to argue that standing should not be granted; that is if we adopt the essentially cynical position of assuming that government bodies are invariably predisposed to exceed the limits of their powers and to resist being called to legal account for doing so. Furthermore, the ready grant of standing to such applicants raises the potential problem that the courts would find themselves being used as a surrogate or alternative political process by interest groups which had failed to convince the government of the merits of adopting its particular view on a given political issue.⁸⁶

The High Court had shown a willingness to permit such representative actions shortly after IRC in Covent Garden Community Association Ltd v Greater London Council.⁸⁷ The applicant company had been formed by residents and traders living in the Covent Garden neighbourhood of central London, with the specific purpose of promoting their particular view of how the area should be developed. The litigation concerned a GLC decision to grant planning permission for an office development on a site previously allocated for residential use. The Association alleged that there had been a breach of natural justice in the decision-making process. It was unable to convince the Court on this point. Woolf J was nonetheless prepared to accept that the Association had standing. His reasoning seemed to rest primarily on the fact that the Association was an aggregation of the interests of many individuals each of whom, because they had been consulted about and participated in the planning process, had an individual entitlement to locus standi.

It is perhaps neither conceptually nor empirically problematic to grant standing to a representative group when many or all of the members of the group would have been ⁸⁴ 'Political' is used in a broad sense here, to encompass cross-party or non-party political concerns such as health or environmental issues, social policy matters and so on.

⁸⁵ Although of course it could have such an interest, for example in respect of planning permission decisions affecting its own land and premises.

⁸⁶ For an illuminating discussion of the issue in both the English and American contexts see Cane P (1995) 'Standing, representation and the environment', in Loveland (1995a) op cit; and more succinctly Cane P (1995) 'Standing up for the public' Public Law 276. The 'surrogate political process' label is taken from Stewart R (1975) 'The reformation of American administrative law' Harvard LR 1667 at 1670; see the discussion in Harlow and Rawlings (1984) op cit pp 307–309.

⁸⁷ [1981] JPL 183.

entitled to standing qua individuals. Indeed, it may not even be appropriate to regard such bodies as 'representative' at all, but rather to see them as 'associational' bodies.⁸⁸ A slightly different issue is thrown up when the court is dealing with an interest group whose members would not obviously be granted standing in an individual capacity. This question arose in R v Secretary of State for Social Services, ex p Child Poverty Action Group.⁸⁹ The case concerned a challenge by the CPAG to a government decision which had occasioned substantial delays in the payment of welfare benefits. The Court of Appeal did not explicitly decide the locus standi issue, but indicated that it would have been prepared to grant standing to the CPAG on the grounds that:

the issues raised are agreed to be important in the field of social welfare and not ones which individual claimants for supplementary benefit could be expected to raise. Furthermore, the CPAG... play a prominent role in giving guidance, advice and assistance to such claimants.⁹⁰

The presumption that the courts would invariably welcome representative actions from responsible and expert bodies was however rebutted by Schieman J's judgment in R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Rose Theatre Trust.⁹¹ The case concerned the site of the sixteenth-century Rose Theatre in London, which was newly rediscovered in the 1980s. Property developers wished to build on the site. The Rose Theatre Trust was formed specifically to lobby to save the site from development. The Trust comprised archaeologists, actors and writers, and other members interested in preserving the country's cultural heritage. The Trust wished to have the theatre site 'listed' under the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979. The Secretary of State refused to list the building, reasoning that the developers had agreed to delay their works to facilitate archaeological digs and that economic development was more important than preserving the site.

Schieman J denied standing to the Trust.⁹² His judgment was driven by explicit policy considerations. He did not accept that standing rules should invariably be interpreted to facilitate challenges to government decisions, even if those challenges were brought by informed, well-intentioned and non-partisan applicants. But neither did he assume that standing would invariably be granted even to an applicant who possessed a legal right in the matter in dispute. As Schieman J put it, the fact that a government body may have acted unlawfully did not in itself mean anyone at all had the right to challenge the decision:

the law does not see it as a function of the courts to be there for every individual who is interested in having the legality of an administrative action litigated... We are not all given by Parliament the right to apply for judicial review.⁹³

According to Schieman J, the reason for standing rules was 'to avoid chaos'. By this he seemed to mean in part that locus standi was a mechanism to protect the courts from being overloaded with litigation, and, more important, to lend a degree of certainty to government decisions by safeguarding them from legal challenge.⁹⁴ As Cane has suggested, this perspective has little to commend it.⁹⁵ If the avoidance of 'chaos' in respect of a particular area of government activity is of paramount importance, Parliament could ⁸⁸ Cane (1995) op cit.

⁸⁹ [1990] 2 QB 540, CA.

⁹⁰ Ibid, at 546

⁹¹ [1990] 1 QB 504, [1990] 1 All ER 754.

⁹² Schieman J devoted most of his judgment to the merits, and concluded the SOSE's action was lawful. He only turned to the issue of standing at the end of his opinion.

⁹³ [1990] 1 QB 504, [1990] 1 All ER 754.

⁹⁴ For a fuller exposition of the judge's views see Schiemann K (1990) 'Locus standi' Public Law 342.

⁹⁵ (1990) 'Statutes, standing and representation' Public Law 307.

make that clear by using an ouster clause. Similarly, the imposition of a three-month maximum time limit for initiating litigation under Order 53/Part 54 protects government bodies against the possibility of having to undo major works should they turn out to be premised on unlawful actions. Furthermore, it is always open to the court to find in an applicant's favour and yet avoid 'chaos' by either denying a remedy or tailoring that remedy in a fashion sensitive to the facts of a particular case.⁹⁶

There would seem to be good reasons for thinking that the Trust should have been granted standing for its challenge. The site was arguably of great importance to the country's cultural heritage. The Trust represented a collectivity rather than just an individual, and thus increased the likelihood that the application was motivated by 'serious' and 'non-partisan' considerations. Schieman J was unconvinced by any of these points. Even though the Trust was not a 'busybody', it had no locus standi. He laid considerable stress on the point that mere 'weight of numbers' could not produce standing: if the members of the Trust qua individuals lacked standing, they could not gain it by banding together into an association.⁹⁷ Rose Theatre was not taken to appeal. Had that happened, it seems probable that Schieman J's decision would have been reversed. That the judgment was something of a restrictive aberration within a generally facilitative trend is suggested by several subsequent cases.

In 1993, British Nuclear Fuels wished to begin to test a new method of treating radioactive waste, involving the discharge of waste into the sea at the Sellafield nuclear reactor. In order to do so, BNF needed a licence from the Inspectorate of Pollution under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960. The inspectorate issued the licence. In R v HM Inspectorate of Pollution, ex p Greenpeace Ltd (No 2),⁹⁸ Greenpeace contended that the method was not safe, and sought certiorari to quash the Inspectorate's decision plus an injunction to prevent BNFL discharging any more waste.

As in Rose Theatre, the Court examined the merits first. Again as in Rose Theatre, the Court concluded that the impugned action was lawful. But it took a different view on standing. In holding that Greenpeace did satisfy s 31(3), the Court emphasised the following factors. Greenpeace had 5,000,000 members worldwide, 400,000 in the UK and (of especial importance) 2,500 living close to Sellafield. This might be seen as rejecting the Rose Theatre presumption that individuals who all lacked standing qua individuals could gain it by acting as a group. It should however be noted that each of the 2,500 local members might have been granted standing in an individual capacity. It may be that what most strongly influenced the Court were the considerations that: firstly, Greenpeace was a long-established and widely respected body (the Court noted that the United Nations has given Greenpeace consultant status on pollution issues); and secondly, Greenpeace had far more expertise on this question than an individual living near Sellafield would have and could thus assist the Court in evaluating the issues. Otton J indicated that this conclusion was not compatible with Rose Theatre, but stressed that his judgment should not be seen as de facto abolishing standing tests in representative actions; 'it must not be assumed that Greenpeace (or any other interest group) will automatically be afforded standing for judicial review in whatever field it and its members may have an interest'.⁹⁹

⁹⁶ Schieman J's judgment on this point might be contrasted with Lord Denning's 1968 decision in Bradbury v Enfield London Borough Council ([1967] 1 WLR 1311 at 1319).

⁹⁷ Cf Lord Wilberforce in IRC [1982] AC 617 at 633: 'an aggregate of individuals each of whom has no interest cannot of itself have an interest'. It would however seem plausible that Lord Wilberforce was here alluding to the specific issue of the relationship between taxpayers and the Inland Revenue, rather than advancing a rule of general application.

⁹⁸ [1994] 4 All ER 329.

That there is now a strong, if not 'automatic' presumption that 'respectable' pressure groups will be granted standing in representative actions was underlined in *R v Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, ex p World Development Movement Ltd.*¹⁰⁰ The merits of the applicant's case were considered in chapter fourteen.¹⁰¹ At this point, we might ask on what basis did the WDM have standing? It had no personal financial interest in the outcome. Nor did its members have a direct financial interest. It might perhaps have been argued that all citizens had a remote financial interest in the project, in so far as the tax we pay goes in part towards this activity. However the Court did not follow this line: rather, it dwelt on two different issues.

The first concerned the 'expertise' and 'respectability' of the WDM. Rose LJ stressed the WDM attracted members from all political parties and none; ie it was not a partisan troublemaker. It had 13,000 members in the UK, with 200 local branches, so could not be dismissed as part of a lunatic fringe. It also enjoyed official consultative status with UNESCO and the OECD; ie it was recognised by powerful bodies as a source of useful advice and so would not be wasting the court's time with spurious argument. All these factors pointed toward the grant of standing. The second issue was a more familiar one. Rose LJ observed that if the WDM did not have standing, no-one else would have it either. This would mean that the legality of the decision would be left unquestioned, a state of affairs compatible neither with (at a theoretical level) a rigorous understanding of the rule of law nor with (in more prosaic terms) the satisfactory stewardship of large amounts of taxpayers' money. In combination, these considerations brought the WDM comfortably within what Rose LJ referred to as 'an increasingly liberal approach to standing'.¹⁰²

Conclusion

It would be a rash commentator who suggested that trends in this area of the law had now been set with cast iron certainty. The Greenpeace and Pergau Dam cases did suggest that there is now a strong body of case law indicating that the courts' key concern when interpreting s 31(3) is with establishing the legality of government action. That the issue remains riven by ambiguity was however forcefully illustrated by two contrasting 1997 High Court decisions, in respect of similar facts, in *R v North Somerset District Council and Pioneer Aggregates (UK) Ltd, ex p Garnett*¹⁰³ and R v Somerset County Council and ARC Southern Ltd, ex p Dixon.¹⁰⁴ In each case, the objectors were local residents who contended that the challenged decisions, which granted quarrying rights on publicly owned land, would have substantial adverse effects on their use and enjoyment of the land. Neither applicant could plausibly be regarded as a 'busybody'. In each case, the Court (Popplewell J in Garnett and Sedley J in Dixon) concluded that the applications failed on the merits. In Garnett, the applicant was denied standing. Popplewell J did not explain his reasoning on this point, although his suggestion that the applicant had not acted promptly might suggest he was endorsing Schieman's locus standi version of 'chaos ⁹⁹ Ibid, at 351. ¹⁰⁰ [1995] 1 WLR 386.

¹⁰¹ See 'Excess of powers', ch 14, pp 446–455 above.

¹⁰² [1995] 1 WLR 386 at 395. As noted in ch 16, success on the standing point did not mean that the WDM received discovery of the government documentation that it considered necessary to support its case; see 'III. Retreating from O'Reilly? The Roy case', ch 16, p 528–529 above.

¹⁰⁴ [1997] JPL 1030.

¹⁰³ [1997] JPL 1015.

theory'. In Dixon, in contrast, Sedley J did grant standing, and did so on the basis of a carefully reasoned and explicitly constitutional law rationale:

Public law is not at base about rights, even though abuses of power may and often do invade private rights; it is about wrongs—that is to say misuses of public power; and the courts have always been alive to the fact that a person or organisation with no particular stake in the issue or the outcome may, without in any sense being a meddler, wish and be well placed to call the attention of the court to an apparent misuse of public power.¹⁰⁵

In this particular case, the applicant was:

neither a busybody nor a mere troublemaker. ... He is, on the evidence before me perfectly entitled as a citizen to draw the attention of the court to, what he contends is an illegality in the grant of a planning consent which is bound to have an impact on our natural environment.¹⁰⁶

The decision thus appears to recognise a citizen's action basis to standing when major planning applications are in issue. Indeed, by alluding only to the applicant's 'contention' of illegality, Sedley J seems almost to be 'defusing' the question of standing and the merits, and recasting locus as a preliminary question to be answered on the basis not of the identity of the plaintiff and her relationship to the issue in question, but of the substantive content of the issue itself. That Sedley J's judgment is flatly irreconcilable with Garnett is perhaps of little significance, given the patent inadequacy of Popplewell J's reasoning in that case. That Dixon goes rather further towards the acto popularis may be attributable to its particular facts, or it may herald a further extension of the principles articulated by the House of Lords in IRC.¹⁰⁷

The relaxation of locus standi rules, together with the House of Lords' subsequent retreat from the strict public/private dichotomy propounded in O'Reilly v Mackman, gives a clear indication that the procedural obstacles to the enforcement of a rigorous notion of the rule of law in respect of government action have become less substantial in recent years. More citizens are now able to question the legality of government action in court, and more are able to do so under a procedural regime which enhances their prospects of ultimate success.¹⁰⁸ It is appropriate at this juncture to recall the GCHQ case. In chapter four, the House of Lords' judgment in GCHQ was presented as a radical break with past orthodoxies on an important matter of the courts' jurisdiction.¹⁰⁹ But it occurred at much the same time—the mid-1980s—as the courts were also reforming the key procedural elements of administrative law. As such, it should be seen as part of a wider, judicially-led rebalancing of the separation of powers between Parliament, the executive, the courts and the citizenry.

It might sensibly be suggested that any attempt to assess the extent to which administrative law principles subject governmental behaviour to a rigorous¹¹⁰ understanding of the rule of law must address five inter-related questions: what do we mean by the notion ¹⁰⁵ Ibid., at 1037.

¹⁰⁶ Ibid.

¹⁰⁷ For an illustration of the limits to this trend see R (Bulger) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2001] EWHC Admin 119; [2001] 3 All ER 449.

¹⁰⁸ Cf Harlow and Rawlings (1984) op cit at p 299 presciently offered the following comment from an even more prescient (but unpublished) paper by David Feldman, written in 1981: 'Arguments which concentrate on the position of the individual applicant, to the extent of excluding the social interest in maintaining the rule of law, are not properly admissible in a public law context. Others may benefit more than the applicant. In particular, society may benefit as a whole when the courts impress on government agencies the need to act strictly within their legal powers'.

¹⁰⁹ 'III. Full reviewability—the GCHQ case (1983)', ch 4, pp 105–106 above.

¹¹⁰ Or 'Diceyan' or 'red light'.

of a ‘government’ body; what types of government action are amenable to review; on what grounds can review be sought; who is entitled to seek such a review; and through what legal process must that review be conducted? As we have now begun to see in some detail, the answers to those questions might simultaneously point in rather different directions.

In the next two chapters we continue to explore this rebalancing by focusing not on matters of process, nor on questions of jurisdiction, but on the grounds for review of administrative action. Chapters fourteen and fifteen dealt in the main with traditional grounds of review. Some cases discussed there had what we might now regard as ‘human rights’ or ‘civil liberties’ implications, in so far as the government actions in issue touched upon the political values which the Americans had so long ago identified in their Bill of Rights. The lack of entrenched values in the UK’s constitution presented an obvious obstacle to the construction of a systematic body of ‘human rights’ jurisprudence within our constitutional and administrative law.¹¹¹ But the concern has, in a somewhat erratic and eclectic form, frequently been visible either on or just below the surface of judicial decisions. As noted in chapter fourteen, the courts have long recognised the (admittedly patchy and elusive) principle that certain ‘basic rights’ are recognised at common law and may be invoked as yardsticks to measure the lawfulness of government action.¹¹² Chapters eighteen to twenty-three trace the way in which that episodic presence has latterly—as a result of judicial, governmental and finally parliamentary intervention—been lent a far more expansive and coherent form.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Cane P (1995) ‘Standing up for the public’ Public Law 276

Stone C (1972) ‘Should trees have standing? Towards legal rights for natural objects’ Southern California LR 450

Cane P (1980) ‘The function of standing rules in administrative law’ Public Law 303

Cane P (1981) ‘Standing, legality and the limits of public law’ Public Law 322

Schiemann K (1990) ‘Locus standi’ Public Law 342

Case law and legislation

IRC v National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses [1982] AC 617

Boyce v Paddington Borough Council [1903] 1 Ch 109

A-G (ex rel McWhirter) v Independent Broadcasting Authority [1973] QB 629

R v Thames Magistrates’ Court, ex p Greenbaum (1957) 55 LGR 129

R v Greater London Council, ex p Blackburn [1976] 1 WLR 550

R v HM Inspectorate of Pollution, ex p Greenpeace Ltd (No 2) [1994] 4 All ER 329

R v Somerset County Council and ARC Southern Ltd, ex p Dixon [1997] JPL 1030

R v Secretary of State for the Environment, ex p Rose Theatre Trust [1990] 1 QB 504

¹¹¹ Any such ‘rights’ would of course be enforceable only against government bodies, and not (as in the USA) against the legislature.

¹¹² See “The presumption of non-interference with “basic rights””, ch 14, pp 453–454 above.

This page intentionally left blank

Part Five

Human Rights

Chapter 18 Human Rights I: Traditional Perspectives

Chapter 19 Human Rights II: Emergent Principles

Chapter 20 Human Rights III: New Substantive Grounds of Review

Chapter 21 Human Rights IV: The Human Rights Act 1998

Chapter 22 Human Rights V: The Impact of the Human Rights Act 1998

Chapter 23 Human Rights VI: Governmental Powers of Arrest and Detention

This page intentionally left blank

Chapter 18

Human Rights I: Traditional Perspectives

As chapter one suggested, the Framers of the US Constitution reached a broad consensus concerning the moral values which should not be left at the mercy of the federal legislature or executive. Madison's assumption that 'the people' could not always rely on the integrity and competence of government institutions was expressed in part by imposing a rigid separation of powers on the national government, and by constituting America as a federal country where States retained extensive law-making authority.

America's third anti-majoritarian/minoritarian safeguard was that the Constitution should provide deeply entrenched legal protection for the various civil liberties identified in the Bill of Rights. The Bill of Rights amendments outlined broad principles, based on ideas which several States had already accepted as fundamental tenets of their own constitutional orders. The Bill of Rights was in no sense a detailed code, but its constitutional purpose was, and remains, clear. One hundred and fifty years after it was framed, the moral values underpinning Madison's creation were powerfully restated by the US Supreme Court:

The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections.¹

Within the British constitution, it has traditionally been presumed that every social value is constantly prey to 'the vicissitudes of political controversy'; that no moral principles were 'beyond the reach of majorities'; and that no constituent concepts enjoyed protection from the 'outcome of parliamentary elections'. The UK's EC membership has perhaps imbued EC law with constituent, 'fundamental' status. That proposition has yet however to be put to a determinative test. (Nor, at least on its face, does the EC Treaty reach, in respect of all the Member States,² the 'political' or 'moral' principles safeguarded in the

¹ West Virginia State Board of Education v Barnette 319 US 624 (1943) per Jackson J.

² The reluctance of successive British governments to accept the EU Charter of Rights as a universally applicable element of EU law being the obvious example of this.

US Bill of Rights.³) Leaving this question aside for the moment, the organising principle in respect of civil liberties in Britain is that individuals (including government officials) may engage in any activity not prohibited by statute or common law. Relatedly, neither other individuals nor government officials may interfere with an individual's legal entitlements unless they can identify a statutory or common law justification for so doing.

The principle is very clear. Civil liberties or human rights in United Kingdom law are 'residual' concepts. People may do anything which is not legally forbidden. The principle is also, as a practical long-term guide to the substance of citizen–state relations, quite meaningless. This relates in part to the discretion exercised by the courts when interpreting statutes or developing the common law. As we saw in cases such as Liversidge v Anderson and Aninismic, judges sometimes produce unexpected decisions. More significantly, the principle accommodates the blunt political reality that Parliament can at any time forbid activities hitherto permitted, or conversely, permit activities previously forbidden. Civil liberties in Britain are extremely precarious legal concepts.⁴ They may enjoy a more assured conventional status, in so far as the courts, the executive and the legislature may fear the political or moral consequences of undermining them; but, as we saw in chapters nine and ten conventional understandings about constitutional morality may themselves be nebulous creatures.

This chapter does not offer a substantial survey of either the history or current status of civil liberties in Britain; so large a task is quite beyond its scope.⁵ Instead, more modestly, it focuses on several discrete issues raising principles of general applicability. Sections I–III address the traditional approach taken by Parliament and the courts to the regulation of public protest, the protection of personal privacy, and to certain aspects of freedom of expression.

I. Public protest and public order

Earlier chapters have discussed several instances in which citizens engaged in formally unlawful behaviour to protest against, and seek to change, legal principles to which they felt unable to consent. The American revolutionaries fought their revolution against laws which formally denied them legal rights to which they considered themselves morally entitled. It is not difficult to defend such actions in terms of 'democratic' principle, since the American colonists were excluded from the electoral process.

We have also encountered more recent episodes of unlawful protest, when, clearly, the justification of disenfranchisement could not be invoked.⁶ It may however be too simplistic to assume that such protests are necessarily 'unconstitutional' simply because they are unlawful. That conclusion would demand that we draw no distinction between the

³ It now seems to be doing so indirectly however, albeit only in respect of a limited range of issues. See Phelan D (1992) 'Right to life of the unborn v promotion of trade in services' MLR 670; Coppell J and O'Neill A (1994) 'The European Court of Justice: taking rights seriously' Legal Studies 227.

⁴ One might respond to this by saying that any values contained in the US Constitution are also 'precarious'—the Constitution's text may be changed via the Art 5 amendment process. But this mechanism is very cumbersome, very time-consuming and also extremely visible. Amendment is difficult to achieve. In contrast, any aspect of the UK constitution could be changed in a day by a government enjoying majority support in the Commons and Lords.

⁵ It has however been admirably undertaken recently by several authors. See particularly Feldman (1993) op cit; and successive editions of Bailey S, Harris D and Jones B Civil liberties.

⁶ Mr Cheney's refusal to pay his income taxes, the Clay Cross episode and the some of the activities of the Anti-Poll Tax Federation being obvious examples; see 'Inconsistency with international law', ch 2, pp 33–34; 'The Housing Finance Act 1972', ch 10, p 315; and 'A step too far? The demise of the poll tax', ch 10, pp 328–329 above.

legality and legitimacy of the laws promulgated by Parliament and the courts, and relatedly, that we ascribe to the formalist notion that whatever laws a governing party persuades Parliament to enact are invariably 'democratic' simply because that party holds a majority of seats in the Commons. It may therefore also be similarly simplistic to assume that a universal franchise in itself adequately guarantees what many people might regard as fundamental civil liberties.

The classic dilemma—Beatty v Gillbanks (1882)

Public meetings or processions may be an extremely effective way for citizens to draw the attention both of law-makers and the wider public to particular causes, and thereby, in the longer term, promote legal reform. The size of a march or meeting can itself be a forceful indicator of an idea's popularity; a crowd of thousands rather than a few dozen may suggest to observers that the protestors' sentiments merit further consideration. Timing and location may also substantially affect a protest's impact on public and political opinion; a protest against a planned school closure is likely to prove more effective in stimulating discussion if held outside the town hall while councillors are discussing their policy than if conducted in a distant park weeks after the closure decision has been taken.

It seems plausible to conclude that citizens must enjoy extensive rights to engage in public, collective displays of their feelings over political or moral questions if the consent of the people to the laws under which they live is to be informed in any expansive sense. It is equally clear that extensive protection of that value will impose certain burdens on other individuals or groups within the community. At a trivial level, marches, processions and rallies entail a degree of noise and obstruction to local highways and other public places. But in a 'democratic' society, such factors will presumably weigh only lightly in the scales when counterbalanced against the principle of free expression. However, there perhaps comes a point when they assume sufficient weight to pose law-makers, be they legislators or judges, a rather more evenly balanced question.

*Beatty v Gillbanks*⁷ was triggered by the Salvation Army's plans to hold a march in Weston-super-Mare in 1882.⁸ An earlier march had been abandoned when the Salvation Army was attacked by a violent mob, calling itself the 'Skeleton Army'. Local magistrates, fearing further violence and disorder, which had obviously alarmed and disturbed local residents, issued a notice forbidding any public assemblies in the town. The Salvation Army ignored the notice, and planned another march, led by Mr Beatty. When the march began, members of the Skeleton Army also appeared. On being asked to stop the march by a constable, Mr Beatty refused to do so and was arrested and subsequently convicted of causing a breach of the peace.

The High Court subsequently concluded that the magistrates' notice was unlawful. Field J observed that there was nothing intrinsically illegal about Beatty's behaviour. Nor would it be correct to suggest that he had 'caused' any breach of the peace. That responsibility lay squarely on the Skeleton Army. The magistrates' reasoning was therefore fundamentally flawed, for it meant in effect that 'a man may be convicted for doing a lawful act if he knows that his doing it may cause another to do an unlawful act. There is no authority for such a proposition...'.⁹

The magistrates' decision amounted to approval for what has subsequently been termed the 'heckler's veto': that citizens opposing a particular viewpoint could hinder its dissemination by suggesting that they would be provoked to violence if it was advocated at a public meeting or procession. Field J's judgment implies that the correct response for the government to make in such circumstances was not to ban the Salvation Army's intrinsically lawful march, but to arrest and prosecute any member of the Skeleton Army who violently tried to disrupt it. That might prove an expensive and difficult task; but Field J is presumably suggesting that it is a price society must pay if it is to respect the freedom to protest in public.

⁷ (1882) 9 QBD 308.

⁸ For discussion of and the background to the case see Bailey, Harris and Jones (1992) op cit pp 217–221.

⁹ (1882) 9 QBD 308 at 314.

Even at that time however, the extent of residual liberty citizens possessed at common law was unclear. The appellant in the 1864 Irish case of *Humphries v Connor*¹⁰ was a Protestant extremist living in Ireland. Humphries had entered a predominantly Catholic area wearing an orange lily, a symbol then grossly offensive to Catholics. Connor, a constable who feared that some Catholic citizens might be provoked to violence by the display, asked Humphries to remove the lily. When Humphries refused to do so, Connor, using only minimal force, removed it himself. Humphries subsequently sued Connor for assault. Connor contended that his action could not be construed as an assault, since qua constable he was subject to an overriding duty to take whatever steps were 'necessary' to preserve the Queen's peace. The Court accepted this conclusion as a matter of law. Whether a constable's action in particular circumstances was indeed necessary was a question of fact to be left to the jury. There would seem little doubt that in circumstances such as these, so minimal an intrusion would be considered necessary. One is then left with the difficult question of whether Humphries has been denied freedom of expression by a potentially violent mob, or whether she has merely been prevented from engaging in a course of conduct designed to provoke a riot?

Similarly, in O'Kelly v Harvey, decided the year after Beatty, the Court appeared to proceed on altogether different principles: 'I have always understood the law to be that any needless assemblage of persons in such numbers and manner and under such circumstances as are likely to provoke a breach of the peace, was itself unlawful'.¹¹ This rather begs the question of what is meant by 'needless'. Narrowly construed, the concept might encompass only actions required to save life or limb. A wide construction, in contrast, might maintain that a democratic society always 'needs' to protect citizens who wish to express their opinion on matters of political controversy against violent opponents.

Beatty and O'Kelly seemingly occupy very different points on that interpretative spectrum. One might reasonably assume that the common law was sufficiently ambiguous to require legislative clarification. Yet while a statute might clarify the legal position, it may leave rather broader political questions unresolved. At present, there are many Acts which conceivably regulate public protests.¹² A systematic survey cannot be undertaken here; the following pages focus on just two such measures—the Public Order Acts of 1936 and 1986.

The Public Order Act 1936

The 1936 legislation was enacted as a direct response to the public disorder created by Oswald Moseley's fascist party in the 1930s.¹³ Its contents were however phrased in gen-

¹⁰ (1864) 17 ICLR 1.

¹¹ (1883) 15 Cox CC 435.

¹² See for example Duncan v Jones [1936] 1 KB 218; Arrowsmith v Jenkins [1963] 2 QB 561, [1963] 2 All ER 210; Papworth v Coventry [1967] 1 WLR 663. For a radical critique see Ewing K and Gearty C (1990) Civil liberties under Thatcher ch 5.

¹³ On the background see Cross C (1961) The fascists in Britain ch 8; Skidelsky R (1968) 'Great Britain', in Woolf S (ed) European fascism.

eral terms, rather than being targeted solely at fascists. Nor was the Act repealed after World War II, by which time Moseley's influence had waned to vanishing point.

Section 3(1) empowered the chief officer of police in a particular area to 'impose such conditions as appear to him necessary to maintain public order' on any public procession which he had reasonable grounds to believe might cause serious public disorder. If the chief officer concluded that a breach of the peace would inevitably occur, s 3(3) empowered her, with the Home Secretary's consent, to ban all marches in her area for up to three months.¹⁴

Section 5 provided that:

Any person who in any public place or at any public meeting—(a) uses threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour... with intent to provoke a breach of the peace or whereby a breach of the peace is likely to be occasioned, shall be guilty of an offence.¹⁵

On its face, s 5 appeared to subject abusive or insulting language to a heckler's veto. This could be construed as a significant intrusion into freedom of expression, since there may be occasions on which an idea's force would be much reduced if it had to be delivered in a polite, respectful manner. An audience which would be provoked to violence by abuse or insults, irrespective of the reasonableness of the views expressed or the intolerance of the audience itself, could seemingly prevent a hitherto lawful protest being made. Similarly, s 3 raised the prospect that the force that an idea might gain by being visibly advocated by large numbers of marchers could be undermined if its opponents threatened violent disruption of the procession. There would of course be no legal obstacle to Parliament choosing to achieve either result, but the political legitimacy of such a departure from 'traditional' (if ambiguous) common law principles would be open to question.

Many difficulties which surround legislative provisions such as s 3 or s 5 arise from the fact that the right to free expression is often claimed by speakers in whose ideas it is difficult to see any substantive merit. This is not to say simply that one views the ideas as odd or ill-advised, as no doubt would many observers of the Salvation Army's evangelism. Nor is it because the speaker is advocating a mainstream political ideology with which one happens to disagree. Rather it assumes that the ideas are so vile and extreme in content, and/or delivered in such a reprehensible fashion, that society could not possibly derive any benefit from their expression.

The obvious problem with this argument is that vileness and extremism are not concepts with an ahistorical, objective meaning. Ideas once broadly perceived as entirely subversive of orthodox constitutional morality may after the passage of (even a relatively short) time be seen as no more than imprudent or as quite acceptable. A further difficulty arises if the legal principles which regulate such speech or behaviour are cast in loose, potentially expansive terms. This is what has been referred to as 'the slippery slope' argument.¹⁶ The argument suggests (in a manner recalling Dicey's cynical view of governmental predispositions) that the executive is always likely to be tempted to use its power to constrain speech or expression which it finds unpalatable, but which is by no means comparable to the initially egregious problem which prompted Parliament to legislate. In such circumstances, respect for parliamentary sovereignty and a Diceyan perception of the rule of law would require either that a subsequent government did not seek ¹⁴ For a helpful collection of instances when the power has been invoked see Bailey, Harris and Jones (1992) op cit pp 182–184.

¹⁵ For a survey of and comment on prosecutions under s 5 see Bailey, Harris and Jones (1992) op cit pp 202–214.

¹⁶ For an account, and rebuttal of the argument see Barendt E (1987) Freedom of speech ch 3.

to invoke the statute for purposes that the enacting Parliament had not envisaged, or, if the government sought to do so, that the courts would find its actions unlawful as being beyond the powers the Act conferred. The following cases offer some insight into the way such conventional understandings might influence the application and interpretation of legal powers.

Jordan v Burgoyne (1963)

Jordan was a senior figure in a fascist political party which had organised a rally in Trafalgar Square. Many communists, and members of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CND) and Jewish organisations were attending the meeting to barrack the fascist speakers. When Jordan heaped fulsome praise on Nazi Germany,¹⁷ his opponents stormed the speakers' platform and a violent struggle ensued.

Jordan was subsequently prosecuted under s 5.¹⁸ His first defence, that s 5 per se was 'unconstitutional' because it curtailed the ancient liberty of free expression, was in effect an attack on the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty. Unsurprisingly, it failed. A second defence seemed to have rather more legal merit. Jordan argued that s 5 applied only to language or behaviour which would provoke 'a reasonable man' to breach the peace; the communists and CND supporters who stormed his platform had attended the rally intending to engage in violent opposition to his speech; hence they were not 'reasonable men' and so he had not breached s 5. In effect, he was urging the Court to construe s 5 in a teleological fashion, with the relevant telos being a strong moral presumption in favour of freedom of (even offensive) speech.

In an abstract sense, one can discern some force in this argument, in so far as it draws on the heckler's veto concept. However, the Court saw no reason to assume that Parliament had impliedly accommodated this reasoning in the 1936 Act. Lord Parker CJ concluded that s 5 was intended to preserve public order, an issue not affected by the 'reasonableness' or otherwise of the audience:

if words are used which threaten, abuse or insult... then that person must take his audience as he finds them, and if those words to that audience... are likely to provoke a breach of the peace, then the speaker is guilty of an offence.¹⁹

Lord Parker CJ continued by suggesting that s 5 did not restrict free speech in any sense. This is a bizarre contention, for the Act, as interpreted by the Court, clearly did punish certain types of speech. Whether Parliament's intrusion into the realm of free expression was legitimate is a difficult (and essentially political) question, with which Lord Parker CJ evidently saw no need to grapple.

Brutus v Cozens (1972)

The subsequent decision in Brutus nevertheless suggested that the courts could interpret s 5 quite narrowly by taking such 'political' questions into account. Brutus, an anti-apartheid campaigner, disrupted a tennis match at Wimbledon in which a South African was playing. Brutus' action enraged many spectators—some assaulted him as he was escorted away. A breach of the peace had certainly occurred. However, the House of Lords concluded that Brutus had not 'insulted, abused or threatened' the spectators. Lord

¹⁷ For an account of the application of public order legislation to explicitly fascist and racist speech and behaviour see Wolfe W (1987) 'Values in conflict: incitement to racial hatred and the Public Order Act 1986' Public Law 85; Loveland I (1995a) 'The criminalisation of racist violence', in Loveland (1995) op cit.

¹⁸ [1963] 2 QB 744.

¹⁹ Ibid, at 749.

Reid's leading judgment approached the task of interpreting s 5 within a paradigm which afforded considerable importance to the principle of preserving free expression:

Parliament had to solve the difficult question how far freedom of speech or behaviour must be limited in the general public interest. It would have been going much too far to prohibit all speech or conduct likely to occasion a breach of the peace because determined opponents may not shrink from organising or at least threatening a breach of the peace in order to silence a speaker whose view they detest.²⁰

Lord Reid's opinion suggested that an 'insult' had to be targeted directly at the spectators. Brutus, in contrast, had merely displayed contempt of, or indifference to, the spectators' right to watch tennis without interference. That might amount to an annoyance or an irritation, but it was not an insult. If Parliament wished to make annoying behaviour a criminal offence, it would have to enact more sweeping legislation.²¹

Kent v Metropolitan Police Commissioner (1981)

CND attracted considerable public support in the late 1970s and early 1980s. In 1980, some 70,000 people attended a CND rally in central London. CND subsequently proposed to hold a major march through London in 1981, to protest against the government's decision to allow the American air force to keep cruise missiles on its British bases. These plans were disrupted when the Metropolitan Police Commissioner (per s 3) sought and received the Home Secretary's approval to ban all processions in London for a four-week period. There had been several outbreaks of rioting in Britain in 1980 and 1981 in inner-city areas, notably the Brixton district of London and St Pauls in Bristol. The Commissioner had apparently formed the view that any political protest march in London at that time might lead to further outbreaks of violence.

Bruce Kent, a senior figure in CND, challenged the legality of the ban.²² Lord Denning's judgment contained some stirring rhetoric about the importance of public protest:

it was in the public interest that individuals should possess and exercise a right to protest and demonstrate on issues of public concern... it was often the only way by which grievances could be brought to the knowledge of those in authority.²³

Lord Denning also accepted that there was no suggestion that CND itself sought to instigate violence. But his conclusion rather belied his earlier sentiments. Adopting an interpretative technique which is difficult to reconcile with the one he had used in Rossminster,²⁴ Lord Denning assumed that Parliament had granted the Commissioner a very wide discretion under s 3 in deciding what measures were necessary to preserve public order. Given the prevalence of serious disorder on the streets in recent months, a temporary moratorium on public marches could not be thought to exceed that discretion. Ackner LJ, concurring, seemed to suggest that the ban was for the benefit of CND members, as it protected them from likely violence, observing that 'it was hooligans the police were trying to control, not members of peaceful marches'.²⁵

²⁰ [1973] AC 854 at 862.

²¹ Reid's judgment poses an interesting question as to the interpretive technique he was using. His phraseology suggests that he was indulging in strict literalism—what did 'insulting' mean? Yet one might plausibly suggest his reasoning indicated he was applying either the mischief rule, or even the (then still heretical) teleological approach advocated by Denning in Magor. Whichever technique he was using, he appeared to be proceeding on the premise that legislative interference with freedom of expression should be narrowly construed.

²² (1981) Times, 15 May, CA.

²³ Ibid.

²⁴ See 'R v IRC, ex p Rossminster Ltd (1980)', ch 3, pp 71–72 above.

²⁵ (1981) Times, 15 May, CA.

This might lead one to ask why the Court did not require the police to direct their energies towards curbing the obviously illegal actions of the alleged ‘hooligans’ rather than the apparently lawful activities planned by CND and other marchers. The Court may be regarded as having been unduly deferential to the Commissioner’s evaluation. It certainly appeared to reject the assumption that s 3 should be interpreted in accordance with the principle articulated in Beatty v Gillbanks.

The Public Order Act 1986

Writing in the 1880s, Dicey concluded his survey of the common law’s regulation of public meetings and processions by noting that:

the government has little or no power of preventing meetings which to all appearances are lawful, even though they may turn out when actually convened to be unlawful because of the mode in which they are conducted. This is certainly a singular instance of the way in which adherence to the principle that the proper function of the state is the punishment, not the prevention, of crimes, deprives the executive of discretionary authority.²⁶

What Dicey neglected to add at that juncture however was the equally authoritative constitutional principle that a government that wished to enjoy such discretionary authority need only convince Parliament to pass legislation to that effect. As we have seen, modern governments experience little difficulty in persuading Parliament to enact their preferred policies. The Public Order Act 1936 revealed the impermanence of the common law presumptions to which Dicey referred. The Public Order Act passed some fifty years later impinged more severely on traditional understandings of constitutional morality.²⁷

Section 11 of the 1986 Act requires organisers of most public processions to give advance notice of their plans to the police at least six days prior to the march. The notice must specify the time and route of the procession, and identify the organisers. Section 11 operates in conjunction with s 12, which empowers the police to impose on the procession whatever conditions they think necessary to preserve public order, or prevent serious damage to property, or avoid ‘serious disruption to the life of the community’. Section 12 seems to extend the powers the police exercised under s 3 of the 1936 Act; ‘serious disruption’ presumably encompasses obstruction of the highway or other public places, and loud noise—inconveniences which do not in themselves amount to a breach of the peace. Section 14 also enhances the police’s powers to control public assemblies which are confined to one location; conditions may be attached to such meetings on the same basis as under s 12. In contrast, the police’s power to ban marches altogether continues to be triggered only if the chief police officer in a given area fears that ‘serious public disorder’ would inevitably result if a march took place.

The 1986 Act also created a new offence of ‘criminal trespass’ under s 39. The new provision was seemingly introduced to deal with the problem posed by ‘new age travellers’, who periodically gathered en masse on privately owned land (especially Stonehenge in mid-summer).²⁸ Section 5 introduced another new offence, by extending the reach of s 5 of the 1936 Act to include insulting, abusive or threatening behaviour which is likely to cause ‘harassment, alarm or distress’ to anyone nearby. The government suggested that it expected s 5 to be used only to control rowdy, anti-social behaviour, which served no worthwhile political purpose. Yet it seems s 5 has been invoked against clearly political activities, such as wearing a tee-shirt satirising Margaret Thatcher and producing a poster criticising government policy towards Northern Ireland.²⁹ It thus seems to offer a potent example of the ‘slippery slope’ problem.

²⁶ Dicey op cit p 282.

²⁷ For a caustic critique of the 1986 Act see Scraton P (1985) ‘“If you want a riot, change the law”: the implications of the 1985 White Paper on public order’ Journal of Law and Society 385; Bonner D and Stone R (1987) ‘The Public Order Act 1986: steps in the wrong direction?’ Public Law 202.

²⁸ See Vincent-Jones P (1986) ‘The hippie convoy and criminal trespass’ Journal of Law and Society 343–370; Ewing and Gearty op cit pp 125.

Notwithstanding such use of s 5, it would be an exaggeration to claim that the implementation of the 1986 Act per se has thus far amounted to gross interference with the citizenry’s entitlement to engage in political protest and argument. It is however equally clear that the Act does facilitate greater governmental control of free expression. As such it exacerbates rather than counterbalances recent anti-pluralist trends in other areas of the constitutional structure—primarily the increasing limitations of the House of Commons as a forum for meaningful political debate, and the significant constraints imposed on local government’s capacity to express and indulge political sentiments with which central government disagrees. The Act’s true significance perhaps lies therefore in its addition of several further threads to an increasingly smothering tapestry of political orthodoxy with which the Thatcher and Major governments cloaked the conventionally more pluralist features of the constitution.

II. Privacy

The actions of the government officials in Entick v Carrington clearly amounted to a tortious intrusion against both Mr Entick’s home and his possessions. His home was physically invaded, and his belongings were physically removed from his control. The tort in issue was however trespass. As we saw in our discussion of Rossminster,³⁰ Parliament has in recent times explicitly authorised government bodies to engage in activities for law enforcement purposes which would otherwise amount to trespass in the most obvious of senses: the ‘invasion’ of Rossminster’s premises at issue in that case had a ‘clear’ statutory base.³¹ But it would be a mistake to assume that such authorisation is needed to lend a lawful character to governmental attempts to investigate even the most intimate elements of a citizen’s life. The ‘invasion’ suffered by Mr Malone in the late 1970s took a much less tangible form.

Speech and communication

The Metropolitan Police Commissioner, suspecting Mr Malone was involved in criminal activities, arranged with the Post Office for a tap to be made on Mr Malone’s phone calls. This was done by Post Office engineers in Post Office premises recording Mr Malone’s phone calls and passing tapes to the police. The tap therefore did not involve physical interference with Malone’s home or property, and so was not a trespass in any traditional sense. The tap was thus not obviously unlawful. However, the Commissioner could not point to any statutory or common law power expressly permitting taps to be made.

Malone v Metropolitan Police Commissioner (1979)

Mr Malone subsequently challenged the legality of the Commissioner’s action by seeking a declaration (through a writ rather than the AJR) that the tapping was unlawful. His ²⁹ Ewing and Gearty op cit pp 122–124.

³⁰ See ‘R v IRC, ex p Rossminster Ltd (1980)’, ch 3, pp 71–72 above.

³¹ To the House of Lords, if not in the view of the Court of Appeal; see ‘R v IRC, ex p Rossminster Ltd (1980)’, ch 3, pp 71–72 above.

argument rested in part on provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights, which we consider in chapter nineteen. But he also made contentions based purely on domestic law. In effect, Mr Malone was asking the court to recognise that the common law had (by 1979) developed sufficiently to treat telephone tapping by government bodies with the same opprobrium that Lord Camden had regarded a physical trespass in Entick 200 years earlier: to restrict the concept of trespass to tangible interference with a person's body or possessions would be to adopt an unduly formalist interpretation of the law. In the modern era, he argued, listening-in to a person's phone conversations should be seen as just as much of a trespass as confiscating her books or letters. To frame the matter somewhat differently, Malone was contending that the common law should now recognise an individual right to privacy which could be protected through legal action in the courts against interferences which were not authorised by common law or statute.³²

In considering, and rejecting, Malone's argument, Megarry VC offered a cogent analysis of the common law's innovatory power:

I am not unduly troubled by the absence of English authority: there has to be a first time for everything, and if the principles of English law... together with the requirements of justice and common sense, pointed firmly to such a right existing, then I think the court should not be deterred from recognising the right.³³

However, Megarry VC's perception of 'justice and common sense' did not lead him to accept that the common law now recognised a right to 'privacy' which could be compromised by phone taps only if the listener had explicit legal authority for her intrusion. Since neither Parliament nor the common law had prohibited phone tapping, the practice was not unlawful, irrespective of who conducted it. And since it was not unlawful, it could not infringe Mr Malone's legal rights.

Megarry VC's opinion was it seems heavily influenced by questions of justiciability. He suggested that the whole question of privacy in telecommunications was so complex that it could only be settled by legislation. No such package of rights could properly 'spring from the head of a judge'.

Megarry's judgment is open to several criticisms.³⁴ His reasoning on the privacy argument is wholly circular. The Commissioner's action was not unlawful because it did not affect Mr Malone's legal entitlements:³⁵ and Mr Malone's legal entitlements were not affected because the Commissioner's action was not unlawful. Admittedly, a decision in Mr Malone's favour would have been similarly tautological in conceptual terms. The question which then arises however is, in the event of uncertainty, should the courts construe the common law in a manner that facilitates or impedes governmental interference with a citizen's privacy? That Megarry VC chose the former course is perfectly defensible as a matter of narrow legalism; whether his choice shares that characteristic in respect of its political legitimacy is a rather different question.

³² Mr Malone placed great reliance on an academic article, published in the Harvard Law Review in the 1890s, which suggested that such a right was already discernible in English law at that time. The article had subsequently exercised much influence on the development of American law—and virtually none on English law; Warren S and Brandeis L (1890) 'The right to privacy' Harvard LR 193.

³³ [1979] Ch 344 at 372.

³⁴ See Bevan V (1981) 'Is anybody there?' Public Law 431; Ewing and Gearty op cit pp 56–61.

³⁵ The court nonetheless seemed to accept without argument that Mr Malone had locus standi to seek a declaration through private law procedures; ie Malone had either suffered interference with a private legal right or had suffered 'special damage'; see 'I. The 'old' case law' ff, ch 17, pp 536–540 above.

The justiciability point is also quite specious. Mr Malone was not asking the court to create an elaborate scheme to regulate all interceptions of telecommunications.³⁶ He sought merely to establish that the tap made in his case was unlawful. It seems plausible that had he succeeded on this point, the government would have found space in its legislative timetable to introduce the comprehensive statutory scheme which Megarry VC evidently thought desirable. If we (cynically) accept that governments are happiest when their actions escape legal control, it makes little sense merely to invite them to promote legislation subjecting unregulated powers to judicial supervision. If the court's purpose was to seek legislative clarification of ambiguous common law principles, it would be more likely to achieve that purpose if it resolved ambiguities in a manner which inconvenienced central government. It is not surprising that the first Thatcher government declined Megarry VC's invitation.

The existence of statutory authority does not settle the question of the legitimacy of intrusive governmental action, even if it does—following judicial interpretation—settle the question of its legality. Whether or not the substance of the MPC's activities at issue in Malone was defensible in political or moral terms is an obviously debatable issue. A more recent case, however, throws up a 'privacy' issue in which even the question of the legality of government behaviour—when measured against traditional, domestic yardsticks—seems to prompt quite different answers.

Sado-masochistic sexual behaviour

The United Kingdom's domestic law had maintained several sharp distinctions prior to the late-1960s in the way it treated private, consensual sexual activity between adults, depending upon whether the participants were engaging in heterosexual or homosexual behaviour. Until the passage of s 1 of the Sexual Offences Act 1967, consensual sexual relations between adult men were a crime. Section 1(1) decriminalised the activity when it involved only two participants, although retained a much higher age of consent (twenty-one years old) for homosexual activities than for heterosexual ones (sixteen years old). The discrimination between heterosexual and homosexual private consensual acts was not wholly eliminated, however, as homosexual activities involving more than two persons remained a crime, whereas group sex among heterosexuals was not illegal.

The law did not evidently draw any further distinction between homosexual and heterosexual behaviour when the acts concerned involved physical violence. English law on assault had been (somewhat imprecisely) codified in the 1861 Offences Against the Person Act. The Act recognised, inter alia, an offence of assault occasioning actual bodily harm (s 47) and the more serious offence of assault resulting in wounding or grievous bodily harm (s 20). The common law offence of assault did not require that any bodily harm be inflicted. It had long been accepted that a common law assault did not arise if the 'victim' had consented to the physical contact concerned. It also appeared to be accepted—conversely—that it was not possible for a victim of 'wounding or grievous bodily harm' per s 20 to consent to such injury, in the sense that his/her consent was irrelevant to the question of the assailant's guilt. It was rather less clear if consent was a relevant issue in respect of the infliction of actual bodily harm.³⁷ The courts had accepted that the infliction of actual or grievous bodily harm, or wounding, would not be an offence if the injury was the incidental result of the victim's consensual participation in certain types of lawful activity—surgery, cosmetic procedures such as tattooing or body piercing, and contact sports such as boxing or rugby, being obvious examples. The previously unresolved question presented to the Court of Appeal in *R v Donovan*³⁸ was whether the victim's consent was a relevant issue in respect of a s 20 injury inflicted upon her by a man for the purpose of sexual gratification.³⁹ The Court concluded that:

³⁶ One might recall here the ECJ's reasoning in Defrenne, namely that a court should not tolerate a 'direct and overt' interference with a loosely defined individual entitlement simply because it can also conceive of many other 'indirect and disguised' infringements which could only become justiciable when defined by a legislature; see 'The justiciability test and the horizontal direct effect principle reaffirmed and expanded—Defrenne v Sabena (1976)', ch 11, p 375 above.

As a general rule, although it is a rule to which there are well-established exceptions, it is an unlawful act to beat another person with such a degree of violence that the infliction of bodily harm is a probable consequence, and where such an act is proved, consent is immaterial.⁴⁰

The Court also held that it would be 'absurd' and 'repellent to the ordinary intelligence' to classify this kind of nominally deviant sexual activity as one of the exceptions to the rule.

R v Brown* (1994)

Some sixty years later, the defendants in *R v Brown*⁴¹ found themselves facing prosecution under s 20 and s 47. The defendants were all homosexual men, who had over a period of some years engaged in a range of consensual sado-masochistic activities, involving burning, beating and wounding each other's bodies, and sometimes carried out under the influence of drugs and alcohol. They were convicted at trial. On appeal before the House of Lords, the gist of their defence was to argue that Donovan should no longer be regarded as good law, and that infliction of injury in the course of private, consensual sexual activities should not be regarded as an offence unless the injury was sufficiently severe to impose costs upon the public at large, either because the 'victim' required hospital treatment or became eligible as a result of the injury for some kind of social security benefit. The House of Lords rejected this argument. The texts of the majority judgments⁴² indicate that their authors' conclusions were driven in part by policy considerations, and in part by the way in which the judges organised their analyses.

The majority judges appeared to take as their analytical starting point the presumption that, prima facie, a crime of violence had been committed by the accused. The secondary question was then whether the circumstances of the particular activities in question fell within an exception to the presumption. The secondary question raised matters of public policy. While the majority could see a policy argument in favour of permitting an exception for such activities as boxing, they could see little to invoke in favour of granting an exemption for sado-masochistic sex. They could in contrast see many good policy reasons for not exempting such activities from the general rule: for example that being in a state of sexual arousal would compromise the 'sadist's' capacity to notice a 'masochist's' withdrawal of consent; that the use of alcohol and drugs undermined the certainty that consent was properly informed; that wounding might lead to infections; and that the drawing of blood raised the possibility of the transmission of disease, particularly HIV. If consent was to be a relevant factor in such circumstances, the legal initiative should ³⁷ See the variously phrased judgments in R v Coney (1882) 8 QBD 534.

³⁸ [1934] 2 KB 498, [1934] All ER Rep 207, CCA.

³⁹ The conduct in question being the whipping of the victim's backside with a cane.

⁴⁰ [1934] All ER Rep 207 at 210, per Swift J.

⁴¹ [1994] 1 AC 212, HL.

⁴² Lords Jauncey, Lowry and Templeman.

come from Parliament through new legislation rather than from the courts through a re-interpretation of the 1861 Act. Lord Jauncey appeared neatly to sum up the majority's rationale in the following passage:

If it is to be decided that such activities as the nailing by A of B's foreskin or scrotum to a board or the insertion of hot wax into C's urethra followed by the burning of his penis with a candle or the incising of D's scrotum with a scalpel to the effusion of blood are injurious neither to B, C and D nor to the public interest then it is for Parliament with its accumulated wisdom and sources of information to declare them to be lawful.⁴³

The convictions were upheld by a three-to-two majority. The two dissenting judgments (by Lords Slynn and Mustill) approached the analytical task before the Court in a quite different way, and—presumably as a result of this divergence in approach—viewed the policy considerations informing their reasoning in a very different light. The point is best put by the opening words of Lord Mustill's judgment: 'My Lords, this is a case about the criminal law of violence. In my opinion it should be a case about the criminal law of private sexual relations, if about anything at all.'⁴⁴ Lord Mustill's analytical starting point appeared to be a presumption that an interference with the accused's entitlement to engage in consensual sexual activities had been committed by the government. The secondary question was then whether the circumstances of the particular interference in question fell within the limits on individual autonomy contained in ss 20 and 47:

The point from which I ask your Lordships to depart is simply this, that the state should interfere with the right of the individual to live his or her life as he or she may choose no more than is necessary to ensure a proper balance between the interests of the individual and the general interests of the individuals who together comprise the populace at large.⁴⁵

Lord Mustill could discern no overriding force in the public policy arguments advanced by the majority to justify conviction. In consequence, he could not accept that any crime had been committed.

III. Freedom of speech

One can identify many celebrated judicial pronouncements by American judges concerning the centrality of the First Amendment's protection of freedom of speech and freedom of the press to the American constitutional tradition. In the landmark case of Palko v Connecticut, Cardozo J characterised freedom of speech as 'the matrix, the indispensable condition of nearly every other form of freedom'.⁴⁶ Brandeis J's judgment in Whitney v California enjoys a similarly oft-quoted status. In his view the First Amendment existed to protect the principle that:

freedom to think as you will and to speak as you think are indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth; that without free speech and assembly discussion would be futile;... that public discussion is a political duty; and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American government.⁴⁷

⁴³ [1994] 1 AC 212 at 247.

⁴⁶ 302 US 319 at 327 (1937).

⁴⁴ Ibid, at 257 (emphasis added).

⁴⁷ 274 US 357 (1927).

⁴⁵ Ibid, at 273.

Judge Learned Hand advanced a similarly expansive view in United States v Associated Press in 1943:

The First Amendment presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues, than through any kind of authoritative selection. To many, this is, and always will be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all.⁴⁸

William Brennan's celebrated judgment in *New York Times v Sullivan*⁴⁹ formulated a legal rule which rested on the broadest of political foundations: '[W]e consider this case against the background of a profound national commitment that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open'.⁵⁰

The functional core at the heart of this presumption is that whenever freedom of speech questions arise before a court, the starting point for analysis of the issues involved is the principle that the citizenry has an entitlement to disseminate and receive all kinds of information, and that any attempt by a governmental agency—be it legislative, executive or judicial—to erode that entitlement should be regarded with the most intense suspicion. Brennan characterised this ethos as 'a fundamental departure from the English and other forms of government... [it] was this country's great contribution to the science of government'.⁵¹ Quite how wide a departure the Americans made from the English tradition is the question addressed—albeit in a limited fashion—in the following pages.⁵²

Official secrecy

The Official Secrets Act 1911 was enacted at the instigation of Asquith's Liberal government. The legislation was prompted by a public panic about the supposed presence of German spies and saboteurs, at a time when war with Germany no longer seemed a distant prospect.⁵³ The Act passed all of its Commons' stages in one hour. This might suggest that it was not subject to searching scrutiny and consideration, an omission which is perhaps all the more surprising when one notes the very wide terms in which it was framed.

As we saw in our earlier discussion of Chandler v DPP,⁵⁴ s 1 of the 1911 Act forbade entry to any 'prohibited place' for 'any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State'. Section 1 also criminalised the making of any 'note, sketch or plan' for such purposes, or the communication to any other person of any information 'which is calculated to be or might be or is intended to be directly or indirectly useful to an enemy'. Section 2 was drafted in even broader terms; it penalised the passing of any official information (irrespective of whether the information compromised national security) to anybody 'other than a person to whom he is authorised to communicate it, or a person to whom it is in the interest of the State his duty to communicate it'. The potential reach of s 2 was subject to frequent criticism; the most oft-quoted being that of Sir Lionel Heald that the Act: 'makes it a crime... to report the number of cups of tea consumed per week in a government department'.⁵⁵

Legal rules which punish or otherwise restrict the publication of information which arguably compromises the security of the state invariably raise difficult questions.⁵⁶ The ⁴⁸ 52 F Supp 362 at 372 (1943).

⁴⁹ 376 US 254 (1964).

⁵⁰ 376 US 254 at 270 (1964).

⁵¹ Op cit at 11.

⁵² For a more detailed treatment see the essays in Loveland I (ed) (1998) Importing the First Amendment?

⁵³ French D (1978) 'Spy fever in Britain 1900–1915' Historical Journal 355.

⁵⁴ See 'V. "Justiciability" revisited—are all statutory powers subject to full review?', ch 4, pp 111–112 above.

⁵⁵ See Bailey, Harris and Jones (1992) op cit pp 421–422.

⁵⁶ For a helpful discussion see Marshall G (1986) 'Ministers, civil servants and open government', in Harlow C (ed) Public law and politics.

evident flaw of s 2 however was that it was not restricted to national security questions. Nor did it appear to offer the discloser any opportunity to defend his/her actions on the basis that disclosure was in the public interest.⁵⁷ It is not difficult to envisage circumstances in which such disclosure might be desirable; when for example it exposed corruption in the award of arms contracts, or revealed that government officials were misleading Ministers, or that Ministers were misleading the Commons. On its face, s 2 could, as the following cases suggest, be invoked simply to punish the disclosure of information which the government for reasons of either administrative expediency or party political convenience preferred to keep secret.

The Tisdall (1984 and 1985) and Ponting (1985) cases

In the early-1980s considerable controversy arose over the Thatcher government's decision to allow the United States to keep cruise missiles at its air force bases in Britain. The government had apparently decided to announce the missiles' arrival at the very end of Commons questions to the Defence Secretary, Michael Heseltine. Heseltine would then leave the chamber without giving MPs the chance to question him immediately. A civil servant, Sarah Tisdall, subsequently leaked a memo disclosing this plan to The Guardian newspaper. Tisdall evidently believed that Heseltine's planned behaviour was 'immoral', in so far as it denied the Commons the opportunity to question the government on a policy question of major significance.⁵⁸

The government demanded the return of the memo, seemingly because markings on the text would enable the leak's source to be identified. The Guardian claimed it was not obliged to return the documents. The Contempt of Court Act 1981, s 10 empowered the courts to order disclosure of the media's sources only if 'necessary in the interests of justice or national security'.⁵⁹ The government contended that national security questions did make such disclosure necessary in this case. The information itself posed no such threat, but the government contended that the mere presence of a leaker within the Defence Ministry would so undermine our allies' confidence in the government's defence capabilities that it was vital that she/he be identified.

The High Court and the Court of Appeal accepted the government's argument, and ordered The Guardian to return the documents.⁶⁰ Tisdall was subsequently identified as the leaker, convicted under s 2 and imprisoned for six months. The House of Lords (by a three-to-two majority) later upheld the Court of Appeal's interpretation of s 10 and its application of s 10 to these facts.⁶¹ On the next occasion that the government resorted to a prosecution under s 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911, however, the outcome was perhaps not what it had expected.

Clive Ponting was, in the early 1980s, an apparently high-flying civil servant in the Ministry of Defence, who had been singled out for praise by the Prime Minister. However, after the Falklands War, Ponting formed the conclusion that his Secretary of State, Michael Heseltine, was systematically misleading the Commons over the circumstances surrounding the sinking of the Argentine battleship, the Belgrano. Ponting subsequently leaked information which he regarded as accurate to Tam Dalyell, a backbench Labour ⁵⁷ See R v Fell [1963] Crim LR 207, CCA; R v Berry [1979] Crim LR 284.

⁵⁸ See Ewing and Gearty op cit pp 137–142; Barker R (1986) 'Obedience, legitimacy and the state', in Harlow (ed) op cit. ⁵⁹ On the origins of this legislation see ch 20 below.

⁶⁰ Secretary of State for Defence v Guardian Newspapers Ltd [1984] Ch 156, CA.

⁶¹ [1985] AC 339, HL. Lord Scarman and Lord Fraser dissented. Neither felt a threat to national security had been established. Lord Scarman, describing the leaked memorandum as 'innocuous' in national security terms, seemingly thought that the government's main motive was to spare itself party political embarrassment; ibid, at 364.

MP who had been harrying the government on this question. Dalyell passed the information to the Chair of the Commons Foreign Affairs Select Committee, who (in an act exemplifying the Committee's deference to the executive) returned it to Heseltine.⁶²

Ponting was subsequently prosecuted under s 2.⁶³ The government accepted that the information released did not compromise national security. The issue was simply one of enforcing the civil servant's supposed duty of confidentiality to the Crown. Ponting did not deny leaking the information. He claimed however that Mr Dalyell was a person 'to whom it was in the interest of the State' that the information be passed. The nub of Ponting's argument was that Heseltine was deliberately misleading the House of Commons, and thereby subverting the doctrine of ministerial responsibility.⁶⁴ It could not be in 'the interests of the state' that the Commons (and thence the public) formed conclusions about government behaviour based on information which the government knew was false. Since Mr Dalyell would raise the matter in the house, giving him the information would in fact advance the public interest.

However at Ponting's trial, McCowan J instructed the jury that this argument had no legal basis. Section 2, he maintained, adopted a highly factionalised interpretation of 'the interests of the state'. This was not a matter that concerned 'the people', nor even the House of Commons. Rather:

The policies of the State mean the policies laid down by the those recognised organs of government and authority... The government and its policies are for the time being the policies of the State.⁶⁵

In formal terms, therefore, Ponting was guilty. The jury nevertheless declined to convict him. British juries are not permitted to disclose their reasoning, but it seems plausible to assume that the jurors hearing Ponting's case concluded that the government was invoking narrowly legal means to justify broadly immoral ends, and decided it should not be permitted to do so. The jury nevertheless remains a somewhat unreliable defender of 'just' solutions when faced with clear legal arguments: Tisdall's jurors seemingly took a less robust view of constitutional morality than their counterparts in Ponting.

The Spycatcher saga (1987–1991)

The Thatcher government was obviously not unique in invoking legal proceedings to restrain publication of information which would enable the Commons and the electorate to make more informed choices about the adequacy of government behaviour. The Crossman Diaries case,⁶⁶ instigated by a Labour government, served in effect the same purpose as the Tisdall and Ponting trials—namely to deter people with access to sensitive information about government behaviour from making their knowledge available to the general public. But the Thatcher government was perhaps atypical in respect of the patently absurd lengths to which it was prepared to go in order to deter civil servants and the media from revealing 'secret' information.

Peter Wright had been employed in the 1960s and 1970s by MI5, one of the security services.⁶⁷ Just exactly what Wright did in that capacity remains unclear. He was however ⁶² See Drewry G (1985b) 'Leaking in the public interest' Public Law 203; Thomas R (1987) 'The British Official Secrets Act 1911–1939 and the Ponting case', in Chapman R and Hunt M (eds) Open government.

⁶³ R v Ponting [1985] Crim LR 318.

⁶⁴ For a less benevolent view of Ponting's motives and behaviour see Marshall (1986) op cit. [1985] Crim LR 318.

⁶⁵ See 'Can conventions become laws? 1: The Crossman Diaries case', ch 9, pp 268–269 above.

⁶⁷ The exact nature of the security services, their effective powers, and the extent to which they are meaningfully controlled by elected politicians is, as one might expect, a mystery. For an overview see Lustgarten L and Leigh I (1994) In from the cold: national security and parliamentary democracy.

disgruntled with the financial benefits the work provided, and some years after retiring published a book, Spycatcher, in which he alleged that MI5 agents had plotted to destabilise Harold Wilson's Labour governments.⁶⁸ Rather than ensure that such extraordinary accusations (which amounted, if proven, to treason) were thoroughly and publicly investigated, the Thatcher government devoted its energies to trying to prevent Wright's story being made available to the British public.

The facts of the case raise several rather different issues. One might readily suggest that Mr Wright should not have been permitted to profit financially from any disclosures he made, irrespective of their content. However that presumption is quite separate from the question of whether or not his allegations should have been discussed in the press. If the allegations posed a present threat to national security, one could see strong arguments for prohibiting disclosure. Yet if they exposed illegal or treasonable behaviour, one would presumably favour disclosure in the expectation that public discussion and criticism might lead both to the prosecution and conviction of those engaged in such treasonable plots and prevent a recurrence of such activities in future. The practical difficulty attending either viewpoint is of course that citizens could not form a view on whether the allegations threatened national security or revealed subversive behaviour until they had been made public. Essentially therefore, the issue is reduced to a question of whether one can (or should) trust government to identify and remedy any wrongdoing among agents of the security services. Diceyan or Madisonian orthodoxies might suggest that would be a dangerous assumption to make; especially when the allegations apparently have a party political dimension, and the government is composed solely of members of one political party.

As noted in earlier chapters, the British courts have tended to adopt a very deferential stance towards government claims that litigation raised 'national security' questions. One can trace an unbroken thread of judicial acquiescence from Ship Money, through to The Zamora, to Liversidge v Anderson, to Chandler v DPP and on to GCHQ.⁶⁹ The Spycatcher litigation suggested that this tradition still enjoyed appreciable judicial support in the late-1980s.⁷⁰

Mr Wright had taken the precaution of going to live in Tasmania before publishing his book. He could thus not be prosecuted under s 2. The government therefore resorted to the civil law to stop publication and discussion of the book. As we saw in the Crossman Diaries case, the common law principle of confidentiality was an elastic concept. In the Spycatcher litigation, the government suggested that Wright owed his employer (the Crown) a lifelong duty of confidentiality in respect of any official information he acquired during his employment. The government argued that this duty prevented Wright from publishing any such material, and that if he did so, any profits made would belong to the Crown. But the government further contended that its interest in maintaining confidentiality also prevented the media from reporting Wright's allegations.

In 1986, both The Observer and The Guardian ran stories commenting on Wright's claims. The government immediately sought a temporary injunction prohibiting such stories, pending a full trial to determine if such publication could be prevented permanently. This was granted by Millet J. It remained in place for a year, until the newspapers ⁶⁸ Wilson had long held the view that such plots had been hatched against him; Pimlott op cit pp 697–715.

⁶⁹ At 'The Zamora (1915)', ch 4, p 94; 'Liversidge v Anderson (1942)', ch 3, pp 69–71; 'V. "Justiciability" revisited—are all statutory powers subject to full review?', ch 4, pp 111–112; 'III. Full reviewability—the GCHQ case (1983)', ch 4, p 105; respectively.

⁷⁰ For an overview see Barendt E (1989) 'Spycatcher and freedom of speech' Public Law 204–212; Ewing and Gearty op cit pp 152–174.

persuaded the High Court to lift it. The judge, Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson, saw no point in retaining the injunction, given that the book had by then been published in the USA and its contents were widely known to British citizens who had access to foreign newspapers or had imported copies from foreign sellers.⁷¹ However both the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords reinstated the constraint on publication.⁷²

The Lords' decision in Spycatcher (No 1) upheld the injunctions, albeit only by a three-to-two majority. The majority were strongly influenced by the government's claim that publication would damage the public interest in maintaining efficient security services, because it would undermine officers' morale. Lord Bridge's dissent took a different view of the 'public interest', employing grandiloquent language reminiscent of Lord Atkin's speech in Liversidge:

Freedom of speech is always the first casualty under a totalitarian regime....The present attempt to insulate the public from information which is freely available elsewhere is a significant step down that very dangerous road....[The government's] wafer thin victory in this litigation has been gained at a price which no government committed to upholding the values of a free society can afford to pay.⁷³

The Thatcher administration seemed however quite ready to pay this price. In Spycatcher (No 2), the government sought permanent injunctions against The Guardian and The Observer, and against The Sunday Times which intended to publish Wright's book in serial form. At first instance, Scott J discharged the temporary injunction and refused to grant permanent restraints.⁷⁴ His decision was upheld by a two-to-one majority in the Court of Appeal, and by a four-to-one majority in the House of Lords.⁷⁵ However Lord Keith's leading judgment in the Lords seemingly did not wish to be drawn into consideration of the large constitutional issues which the government's conduct appeared to raise:

I do not base this upon any balancing of public interests nor upon any considerations of freedom of the press, nor upon any possible defences of...just cause or excuse, but simply upon the view that all possible damage to the interest of the Crown has already been done by the publication of Spycatcher abroad and the ready availability of copies in this country.⁷⁶

It would thus be misleading to characterise the decision as a forceful judicial assertion of the constitutional right of the British people to be informed of their government's alleged inadequacies. The protection afforded by Spycatcher (No 2) to free expression seems at best oblique, premised on the fact that the laws of other countries had permitted both the publication and export of Wright's allegations.

In the interim, the government had also trailed around the courts of the world in an effort to prevent publication of Spycatcher in foreign jurisdictions. The government suffered defeats in Australia and New Zealand, before obtaining the dubious benefit of a victory in Hong Kong—a British colony which then had no elected legislative assembly. There was no point in pursuing such an action in the USA, where publication would clearly have been protected by the First Amendment. It is instructive to compare the House of Lords' judgments in Spycatcher (No 1) and (No 2) with the decision of the US Supreme Court in New York Times v United States, the famous 'Pentagon Papers' case.⁷⁷ The Pentagon Papers were a comprehensive (and secret) analysis of the US involvement

⁷¹ A-G v Guardian Newspapers Ltd [1987] 1 WLR 1248.

⁷² Ibid.

⁷³ Ibid., at 1286.

⁷⁴ A-G v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109.

⁷⁵ Ibid.

⁷⁶ Ibid., at 260.

⁷⁷ 403 US 713 (1971).

in Vietnam. The papers were leaked to The New York Times, which planned to publish them. The court rejected the government's efforts to prevent publication. Its rationale for so doing was best expressed by Black J:

In the First Amendment the Founding Fathers gave the free press the protection it must have to fulfil its essential role in our democracy. The press was to serve the governed, not the governors. The government's power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the government. The press was protected so that it could bare the secrets of government and inform the people. Only a free and unrestrained press can effectively expose deception in government.⁷⁸

The Official Secrets Act 1989

These were not sentiments for which the Thatcher government showed any greater enthusiasm than had the majority of the House of Lords in the Spycatcher litigation. The combined impact of the Ponting and Spycatcher embarrassments prompted the third Thatcher government to reform the 1911 Official Secrets Act.⁷⁹ The 1989 Act did remove the catch-all provisions of s 2 of its 1911 predecessor, but it is difficult to portray the new legislation as an exercise in enhancing the transparency and accountability of the government to its citizens. One commentator has suggested that the Act's:

stated purpose... is to reduce the amount of information protected by criminal sanctions to areas where disclosure would be harmful to the public interest. Yet it is tempting to conclude that the primary rationale behind this reform is to tighten the criminal law of secrecy, with the aim of making convictions more likely.⁸⁰

Section 1 imposes an absolute and permanent duty of confidentiality on all members and ex-members of the security services. Any disclosure of any official information by any such person under any circumstances is now a crime. Thus, to take an extreme example, it would apparently be illegal for an MI5 or MI6 agent to reveal that her superior officers were planning to assassinate the Prime Minister. At the other extreme, even the most trivial of information may not be disclosed by security service officers. There is no requirement that the prosecution prove the disclosure to have damaged the national interest. Nor may officers argue that their action was designed to defend the public interest. Furthermore, under s 1(1)(b) the government may extend this absolute obligation to any person it wishes.

Other civil servants and government contractors are caught by widely-framed provisions which criminalise the disclosure of 'damaging' information in the specific areas of defence (s 2), international relations (s 3) or the investigation of crime (s 4). This is clearly a less expansive prohibition than the one contained in the former s 2. Additionally, accused persons have a defence if they can establish that disclosure would not be 'damaging'. However, the Act does not permit a 'public interest defence'—it is a crime to reveal 'damaging' information even if one believes one thereby exposes government behaviour that would be even more 'damaging'.

⁷⁸ Ibid, at 739.

⁷⁹ For a helpful summary and critique see Palmer S (1988) 'In the interests of the state' Public Law 523; (1990) 'Tightening secrecy law: the Official Secrets Act 1989' Public Law 243.

⁸⁰ Palmer (1990) op cit p 243. For similarly critical comment see Ewing and Gearty op cit pp 189–208.

Palmer rather overstates the case in suggesting that Lord Keith's judgment in Spycatcher (No 2) approved the principle that:

It is unacceptable in our democratic society that there should be a restraint on the publication of information relating to government when the only vice of that information is that it enables the public to discuss, review and criticise government action'.⁸¹

It would be more accurate to suggest that Lord Keith's judgment piggybacked on the judgment of the US Supreme Court in the Pentagon Papers case—a judgment expressing moral values subsequently adopted by the constitutions of other western democracies—which ensured that Peter Wright's book was published and subjected to extensive press analysis in many other parts of the world. Palmer is however surely correct in observing that the Thatcher government seemed wholly unpersuaded by this principle. The thrust of the 1989 Act appears to be a rejection of the idea that government employees' duty of loyalty lies anywhere other than to the government of the day. That a government should make such an assumption is an entirely logical consequence of the supposed 'ultimate political fact' of the contemporary constitution—namely that having a Commons majority generally enables a government to do whatever it wishes. This is, as suggested in earlier chapters, a theme which pervades every aspect (except perhaps issues involving EC law) of our current constitutional arrangements. We turn to the broad question of whether and how this ultimate political fact might be reformed in the final chapter of this book. Yet while litigation involving freedom of expression often arises as a result of governmental attempts to curb public access to information that allegedly has a 'national security' dimension, official secrecy is by no means its only trigger.

Blasphemy

In addition to providing safeguards for freedom of speech and the press, the First Amendment provides in specific terms that 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, nor prohibiting the free exercise thereof'. The Supreme Court concluded in Watson v Jones in 1872 that 'the law knows no heresy, and is committed to the support of no dogma, the establishment of no sect'.⁸² It was thus impossible for blasphemy to be made an offence either by Congressional statute or federal common law. Despite its trenchant rhetoric, Watson provided little practical protection for speech attacking religious beliefs, since at that time it was assumed that the First Amendment did not control the activities of state governments.⁸³ By the early-1950s however, the Court had concluded that a criminal offence of blasphemous libel—whether fashioned by an organ of federal or state government—was wholly incompatible with First Amendment principles. This conclusion was powerfully laid out in Joseph Burstyn Inc v Wilson:

[F]rom the standpoint of freedom of speech and the press, it is enough to point out that the state has no legitimate interest in protecting any or all religions from views distasteful to them.... It is not the business of government in our nation to suppress real or imagined

⁸¹ (1990) op cit p 247, citing Lord Keith's approval of the quote by Mason J of the Australian High Court in Commonwealth of Australia v John Fairfax & Sons Ltd (1980) 147 CLR 39 at 51–52.

⁸² 20 L Ed 66 at 676 (1872)—quoted in Feldman op cit, p 690.

⁸³ The Court began to apply aspects of the First Amendment to the States in Gitlow v New York 45 S Ct 625 (1925).

attacks upon a particular religious doctrine, whether they appear in publications, speeches or motion pictures.⁸⁴

The Wilson decision stands in stark contrast to the British constitutional tradition, within which the common law offence of blasphemous libel imposed an acute restraint on freedom of speech.

Blasphemy at English common law in the 'modern' era: R v Lemon (1979)

Prior to the litigation in *R v Lemon*⁸⁵ in the mid-1970s, a prosecution for blasphemy had not been brought in England for over fifty years. The offence emerged within the common law in the seventeenth century. It was closely linked to the crime of sedition. Sedition dealt with attacks on the integrity and adequacy of the government; blasphemy addressed attacks on the integrity and adequacy of the established church and the Christian religion. In its initial form, the offence did not concern itself with the style of the attack.⁸⁶ A calm and measured assault upon Christian doctrine was as much blasphemy as the most abusive or offensively presented criticism. This principle was relaxed in the mid-nineteenth century, so that religious criticism expressed in temperate terms unlikely to insult or ridicule believers in Christianity would not be blasphemous.⁸⁷

Lemon was the publisher of Gay News, a magazine intended primarily for a non-heterosexual readership. The June 1976 edition contained an illustrated poem, entitled 'The love that dares to speak its name'. The poem drew on the imagery of Jesus Christ being executed, and alluded to a homosexual relationship between him and John the Baptist. This poem apparently outraged the delicate religious sensibilities of Mrs Mary Whitehouse, who having failed to persuade the Attorney-General to initiate a prosecution, did so herself.⁸⁸

It is perhaps indicative of the very primitive understanding of freedom of expression principles that then informed English law that the Lemon case was not argued on the grounds of the basic, substantive point that the common law in a modern, multi-faith and largely secular democratic society should find no place for an offence such as blasphemy to restrict debate about religious matters. Judgment turned instead on a narrow question of law, relating to the mens rea element of the offence. The first possibility was that the prosecution need only prove that the defendant intended to publish a blasphemous article. The second possibility was that the prosecution also has to prove that the defendant intended to offend, shock and arouse resentment among adherents to the Christian faith. It is evident that had the House of Lords accepted that the more expansive version of mens rea was the correct one, the reach of the offence would have been reduced, if not necessarily substantially.

However, by a three-to-two majority, the House of Lords held that the prosecution need only prove an intention to publish. It appeared to be common ground among the Court that, as Lord Russell put it: 'The authorities embrace an abundance of apparently contradictory or ambivalent comments. There is no authority of your Lordships' House on the point. The question is open for decision.'⁸⁹ The question was answered without any systematic consideration being given to the way in which blasphemy laws, however ⁸⁴ 343 US 495 at 505 (1952). This did not preclude the possibility that blasphemous material could be the subject of criminal or civil regulation if it was also obscene.

⁸⁵ [1979] QB 10, CA; affd [1979] AC 617, HL.

⁸⁶ See generally Kenny C (1922) 'The evolution of the law of blasphemy' Cambridge LJ 127; Feldman (1993) op cit pp 684–695.

⁸⁷ R v Hetherington (1841) 4 State Tr NS 563.

⁸⁸ On Whitehouse see p 549 above. For a fascinating account of the background to and conduct of the prosecution see Robertson G (1999) The justice game ch. 6.

⁸⁹ [1979] AC 617 at 657, HL.

construed in terms of mens rea, interfered with the freedom of expression of publishers and readers on religious matters. Neither Lord Diplock (dissenting) nor Lord Russell and Viscount Dilhorne made any mention at all of freedom of expression in their judgments. Lord Scarman, the third member of the majority, briefly addressed the free expression issue only to note that the common law did not permit people to publish offensive criticisms of Christianity. Indeed, in Lord Scarman's view, the real vice of the blasphemy law was that it covered only Christianity, and did not also restrict freedom of expression in respect of other religions as well. The only judge to accept that promoting freedom of expression on religious matters was a factor that should push the court towards accepting the more expansive mens rea test was Lord Edmund-Davies,⁹⁰ the second dissident. It might also be noted that the arguments offered by Lemon's counsel were equally silent on the significance of free expression principles to the decision before the court.

That the principle of freedom of expression was either (for three judges) wholly irrelevant or (for two) of marginal significance to the content of the law of blasphemy is indicative of a broader ambivalence within the judiciary in this era. Lemon is a startling illustration of the potential illiberality of the common law. Even if we accept—and this is a dubious premise—that a majority of the population in the 1970s adhered sincerely to the Christian faith, the existence of blasphemy as a discrete offence was a blatant example of the common law pandering to majoritarian intolerance. Neither Mrs Whitehouse, nor any other Christian of delicate sensibilities was in any sense compelled to read the poem. Nor were they likely to encounter it by chance. In essence the crime permitted self-righteous proponents of the Christian faith to rest secure in the knowledge that anyone who had the temerity to cause them offence on a matter of religious doctrine or practice faced the prospect of a substantial fine or a prison sentence.⁹¹ Lord Scarman's professed wish to extend the reach of the offence is even more unpalatable, in so far as it would grant the same repressive entitlement to a still larger proportion of the population.

But as the following case suggests, it would be quite misleading to conclude that the public's interest in being able to read and evaluate certain types of information—as opposed to the publisher's interest in being able to disseminate it—was never accorded importance by the courts. Yet the principle was undoubtedly invoked inconsistently, and certainly did not enjoy the status of being deployed as the starting point for judicial analysis.

Contempt of court

*A-G v Times Newspapers Ltd*⁹² was triggered by two newspaper articles scheduled for publication in The Sunday Times. Both articles dealt with the on-going controversy caused by the drug thalidomide. The drug had been marketed by a multi-national drug company, Distillers, in the 1960s as a remedy for morning sickness suffered by pregnant woman. The drug caused severe birth defects in thousands of children throughout the world. Litigation against Distillers was initiated in the UK by several hundred parents of the affected children. The key issue to be decided was whether Distillers had been negligent in testing the drug before its release. The litigation had not been concluded by the early-1970s, as Distillers and some of the plaintiffs were conducting protracted negotiations about the terms of a possible settlement.

⁹⁰ Ibid, at 652–653; quoting a sentiment expressed in a textbook as to 'the splendid advantages which result to religion and truth from the exertion of free and unfettered minds'.

⁹¹ Of perhaps greater significance was the likelihood that fear of prosecution would deter people from even expressing such criticism in the first place.

⁹² [1974] AC 273, [1973] 3 All ER 54, HL. For a more detailed treatment of the litigation than is possible here see Miller C (1976) Contempt of court pp 126–134; Duffy P (1980) 'The Sunday Times case: freedom of expression, contempt of court and the ECHR' Human Rights Review 17.

In September 1972, The Sunday Times published a long article which urged Distillers not to stand on whatever legal defences it might muster, but rather to make a generous settlement to ensure that justice—in a broad, moral sense—was done. Distillers claimed that the article amounted to a contempt of court, but the Attorney-General did not accept that view and declined to begin proceedings. The Sunday Times then prepared a second article, which examined the evidence that might be put before a trial court on the negligence issue. The paper sent the article to the Attorney-General prior to publication. The Attorney-General concluded that this article would amount to contempt. His assumption was that the article would prejudice the fairness of any subsequent trial, by creating a climate of opinion in which Distillers would already stand condemned. This would compromise the overwhelming public interest in ensuring that litigation was conducted free from inappropriate external pressure. The Attorney-General thus sought an injunction preventing publication of the article. The injunction was granted in the High Court.

The injunction was promptly discharged by the Court of Appeal. All three members of the Court were clearly influenced by what they regarded as a legitimate public interest in citizens knowing what progress was being made in settling the thalidomide controversy. This was never, it seems, to be regarded as a dominant interest, but in some circumstances could be a powerful one. Lord Denning MR expressed the point in the following way:

It must always be remembered that besides the interests of the parties in a fair trial or a fair settlement of the case there is another important interest to be considered. It is the interest of the public in matters of national concern, and the freedom of press to make fair comment on such matters. The one interest must be balanced against the other.⁹³

When set in the context of his opinion as a whole, however, Lord Denning's above-quoted characterisation of the problem before the Court is somewhat misleading. The key factor in his decision seems to have been that the litigation against Distillers was dormant, and that there was no likelihood of any hearings actually beginning in the foreseeable future. Since there was no trial in prospect, there was no possibility that its fair conduct could be jeopardised.

Readers of Lord Denning's judgment could be forgiven for concluding that the purpose of contempt of court in such circumstances was to protect one or other of the parties to the litigation. As was made abundantly clear in the House of Lords, its actual purpose is to protect the public's interest in the proper administration of justice.⁹⁴ Nonetheless, the House of Lords framed the question raised in much the same way as the Court of Appeal. In Lord Reid's view, the Court was faced with responsibility of balancing 'the public interest in freedom of speech and the public interest in protecting the administration of justice from interference'.⁹⁵ Lord Reid and his colleagues reached however a different conclusion from that adopted in the Court of Appeal.

The Court saw no scope for accepting that the first Sunday Times article could amount to contempt. For a newspaper or broadcaster to urge a powerful litigant such as Distillers to accept a moral obligation not to stand on its legal rights was quite legitimate as long as the persuasion was delivered in 'a fair and temperate way and without any oblique ⁹³ [1973] QB 710 at 739.

⁹⁴ This point is conveyed with great clarity in the opening paragraph's of Lord Diplock's opinion. See also Lord Reid, [1974] AC 273 at 294: 'The law on this subject is and must be founded entirely on public policy. It is not there to protect the private rights of the parties. It is there to prevent interference with the administration of justice'.

⁹⁵ Ibid., at 301.

motive'.⁹⁶ The second article, however, was seen as much more problematic. Lord Reid considered that The Sunday Times' analysis of the negligence issue raised a real risk of pre-judging the issue that would be of vital importance at any trial. He observed that: 'There has long been and there still is in this country a strong and generally held belief that trial by newspaper is wrong and should be prevented'.⁹⁷ In Lord Reid's view, The Sunday Times' second article would have that effect; it was thus quite proper for the court to suppress its publication.⁹⁸

Judicial law-making by the invocation of slogans—in this case 'trial by newspaper'—might immediately raise suspicions that the decision produced may lack a rigorous logical basis. Lord Reid's judgment explicitly acknowledged this point by suggesting it was much driven by intuitive feelings which defied written elucidation.⁹⁹

Those feelings led Lord Reid to offer the following principle as a guide to the way in which such issues should be resolved:

Responsible 'mass media' will do their best to be fair, but there will also be ill-informed, slapdash or prejudiced attempts to influence the public. If people are led to think that it is easy to find the truth disrespect for the processes of the law could follow and, if mass media are allowed to judge, unpopular people and unpopular causes will fare very badly.... I do not think that the freedom of the press would suffer, and I think that the law would be clearer and easier to apply in practice if it is made a general rule that it is not permissible to prejudice issues in pending cases....¹⁰⁰

This principle was to apply only to litigation at first instance. In Lord Reid's opinion, it was evidently 'scarcely imaginable' that law lords or Lord Justices of Appeal could ever be swayed in discharging their judicial functions by any stories in the press. This comment makes explicit an assumption on Lord Reid's part that seems to permeate the court's reasoning. The result produced takes a very condescending view of the citizenry's capacity to draw a meaningful distinction between a newspaper's view of a legal issue and the way that issue should be dealt with in a court. The crux of the conclusion is that citizens cannot be trusted with such material.

As one might expect, the informed consent philosophy underpinning the First Amendment had led the US Supreme Court to adopt a far more robust approach to the analytical capacity of American citizens than that favoured in respect of their British counterparts even by the Court of Appeal in the Sunday Times case. In Nebraska Press Association v Stuart,¹⁰¹ decided in 1976, the Supreme Court affirmed a line of case law that indicated there were virtually no conceivable circumstances in which an injunction could be granted to restrain publication of press stories analysing either the moral or legal merits even of ongoing, still less pending litigation.¹⁰² A similarly profound distinction ⁹⁶ Ibid, at 299. ⁹⁷ Ibid, at 300.

⁹⁸ The House of Lords also took the view that the litigation was not dormant, but was simply in something of a negotiatory lull.

⁹⁹ For example the following passage at [1974] AC 273 at 300: 'If we were to ask the ordinary man or even a lawyer in his leisure moments why he has that feeling, I suspect that the first reply would be—well look at what happens in some other countries where that is permitted. As in so many other matters, strong feelings are based on one's general experience rather than on specific reasons, and it often requires an effort to marshal one's reasons. But public policy is generally the result of strong feelings, commonly held, rather than of cold argument. If the law is to be developed in accord with public policy we must not be too legalistic in our general approach. No doubt public policy is an unruly horse to ride but in a chapter of the law so intimately associated with public policy as contempt of court we must not be too pedestrian....' ¹⁰⁰ Ibid.

¹⁰¹ 427 US 539 (1976).

¹⁰² For a concise analysis of the leading cases see Lockhart W, Kamisat Y, Choper J and Shiffrin S (6th edn, 1986) Constitutional law pp 830–836.

between 'traditional' American and English law is also evident in respect of the final topic we consider in this chapter—the issue of political libels.

Political libels

The tort of libel is something of a curiosity within the field of tort law as a whole. In general, a plaintiff in a tort action has to prove that the defendant's actions have caused her a quantifiable loss. She usually also has to demonstrate that the loss was caused by some level of fault (usually negligence) on the defendant's part. The damage at issue in a libel action is to the plaintiff's reputation, which has allegedly been undermined by a book or article published by the defendant. In a libel action, damage is presumed to flow automatically from the publication of libellous material; ie material that damages the reputation of the victim in the eyes of fair-minded observers. That the material is true is a defence, but it is for the defendant to prove truth. In general, under English law, the publisher has no defence if she did not know the material was false even if she had taken reasonable care to establish its accuracy.

The USA—a constitutional law perspective

In the United States, the English law of libel has come to be seen as imposing an unacceptable restriction on freedom of speech in relation to political issues. This is because it is feared that politicians and government bodies would be able to suppress media criticism of their activities by threatening a libel action. If the publisher was not wholly confident she/he could prove truth—which might be difficult in respect of many political stories—she might be deterred by the prospect of a large damages award against her from running stories which might well prove to be true. Consequently, by the early twentieth century, many American states had accepted the principle that a government body should not be able to initiate any form of legal action at all to suppress criticism of its activities—unless the speech concerned threatened an imminent breach of the peace. The leading case is *City of Chicago v Tribune Co.*¹⁰³

The press stories which provoked the litigation had accused the Mayor and the city council of Chicago of being so corrupt and incompetent that the city itself was bankrupt. Such stories could obviously undermine the city's reputation, both as an institution of government and as a commercial actor. Yet the Illinois Supreme Court, its unanimous opinion delivered by Thompson CJ, held that the city could do nothing at all to suppress the dissemination of such stories.

The judgment was formally rooted in Art 2, s 4 of the Illinois Constitution: 'Every person may freely speak, write and publish on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty', but the reasoning the Court deployed had an overtly functionalist base. Thompson CJ observed that State and federal government in the USA were 'founded upon the fundamental principle that the citizen is the fountain of all authority'.¹⁰⁴ Such powers as government bodies possessed were granted on trust by the relevant electorate. Informed electoral choices demanded that citizens be afforded absolute protection against prosecution for criticising government bodies, except in the narrow instance of criticism likely to promote violent disorder.

Having thus limited the legitimate scope of criminal libel, Thompson CJ drew an analogy between criminal and civil actions. He suggested that civil actions could be ¹⁰³ 139 NE 86 (1923). For a detailed discussion and analysis of the case see Loveland I (1998) 'City of Chicago v Tribune Co—in contexts', in Loveland I (ed) Importing the First Amendment.

¹⁰⁴ 139 NE 86 at 90 (1923).

substantially more effective prohibitors of speech than criminal prosecutions: civil libel actions, unlike criminal prosecutions, did not grant the defendant the presumption of innocence; they imposed a lesser standard of proof on the plaintiff; and there was no ceiling to the damages that might be awarded.

Thompson CJ stressed that the protection against civil liability for criticising a government body was absolute; no action of any sort would be permissible. There was no question of the Court trying to strike a 'balance' between freedom of political speech and the government's reputation; the government body had no corporate or public interest in its reputation to weigh in the scales.

Thompson CJ accepted that the rule the court had propounded would sometimes lead to unfounded and malevolent criticism being aired. This however was a price worth paying:

[I]t is better that an occasional individual or newspaper that is so perverted in its judgment and so misguided in his or its civic duty should go free than that all of the citizens should be put in jeopardy of imprisonment or economic subjugation if they venture to criticise an inefficient or corrupt government.¹⁰⁵

American states which adopted this principle recognised that there would be little point in preventing government bodies launching libel actions if such bodies could indirectly achieve the same deterrent effect on freedom of political speech through actions initiated by individual politicians under the ordinary libel laws. Thus, importantly, these states also accepted that individual politicians or government officials could only succeed in a libel action in relation to their political beliefs and behaviour if they could prove that the defendant had knowingly or recklessly published false information.¹⁰⁶ The device used to achieve this objective was the long recognised English law defence of 'qualified privilege', which in English law had only ever been applied to a narrow range of types of information, such as commercial or familial matters, in which it was assumed that both the disseminator and the recipient of the libellous information were under a duty to exchange it.¹⁰⁷ The American rationale, not embraced in England, was that in a representative democracy all citizens (and all media organisations) were under a reciprocal duty to disseminate, analyse and discuss political information in so far as it related to the fitness for office of elected politicians, candidates for such office, and senior appointed government officials. By the 1960s, these principles had been embraced by the US Supreme Court in the landmark case of New York Times v Sullivan,¹⁰⁸ and applied through the First Amendment to all of the American States.

Britain—a tort law perspective

English law had, in contrast, adopted a very limited understanding of the extent to which individuals and the press should be protected from the ordinary law of libel

¹⁰⁵ Ibid, at 91. The passage echoes Madison's celebrated observation, which Thompson CJ. had earlier quoted (at 89), that: 'Some degree of abuse is inseparable from the proper use of everything, and in no instance is this more true than in that of the press. It has accordingly been decided by the practice of the states that it is better to leave a few of the noxious branches to their luxuriant growth than by pruning them away to injure the vigour of those yielding the proper fruits'.

¹⁰⁶ See especially Coleman v McClellan 98 PAC 201 (1908) (Kansas); Ambrosious v O'Farrell 199 Ill App 265 (1905) (Illinois); Briggs v Garrett 11 Pa 406 (1886) (Pennsylvania); Salinger v Cowles 191 NW 167 (1922). For a detailed discussion of these cases see Loveland (1998) op cit.

¹⁰⁷ See Loveland I (2000) Political libels ch 1.

¹⁰⁸ 376 US 254 (1964). The case is discussed in some detail in Loveland (2000) op cit ch 5; and in great detail in Lewis A (1991) Make no law.

when publishing political information. In the 1868 case of Wason v Walter,¹⁰⁹ the Court accepted that newspapers which offered verbatim accounts of parliamentary proceedings should enjoy a common law protection analogous to that bestowed upon proceedings in Parliament by Art 9 of the Bill of Rights. The Court's reasoning in Wason—unusually in the English context—framed the issue as one essentially of constitutional law and political morality. Common law libel rules should not be allowed to prevent voters reaching informed conclusions about what was happening in the Houses of Parliament. The task of the common law was to give expression to the public interest; and, as Cockburn CJ saw the matter: 'There is perhaps no subject matter in which the public have a deeper interest than in all that relates to the conduct of public servants of the state'.¹¹⁰

Perhaps ironically, it was the reasoning in this case which provided the inspiration which led American courts in the next fifty years to extend protection for political libels to a much wider range of political information, on the grounds that coverage of legislative proceedings was by no means sufficient to enable citizens to acquire the knowledge they would need in order to offer their informed consent to the government process.¹¹¹ Such developments were as often rooted in common law as in interpretation of the texts of state constitutions. These courts took Cockburn's CJ's reference in Wason to 'all' political information quite literally.

Notwithstanding English law's evident fondness for literalism as a jurisprudential technique, this American development was not systematically mirrored either by Parliament or the courts in the United Kingdom,¹¹² with the result that even by the 1980s English law drew no obvious distinction between libels dealing with political issues and those affecting purely private matters. Two cases illustrate this point with great clarity.

The defendant in *Bognor Regis UDC v Champion*¹¹³ had waged a campaign against what he claimed was corruption in his local authority. The suit was triggered by a pamphlet authored by Champion which contained an hysterical polemic accusing the ruling group on the council of ineptitude and dishonesty. Rather than ignore the pamphlet, the council's ruling group resolved that the council itself should sue Mr Champion in libel.

The issue before Browne J in the High Court was whether the authority could maintain such an action. He saw no difficulty in concluding that it could. A council was simply an individual for these purposes:

Just as a trading company has a trading reputation which it is entitled to protect by bringing an action for defamation, so in my view the plaintiffs as a local government corporation have a 'governing reputation' which they are equally entitled to protect in the same way...¹¹⁴

Judgment was eventually delivered against Mr Champion. The award of damages was only £2,000, but this was accompanied by an order to pay the council's costs, which amounted to some £30,000.¹¹⁵ A bill of £32,000 (at 1972 prices) might be thought to have a decidedly deterrent effect on citizens or newspapers wishing to criticise a local authority's behaviour. But there is nothing in Browne J's judgment to indicate that he perceived the case to have any 'political' or constitutional dimension at all. The action was characterised simply as a matter of tort law.

Some ten years later, in Blackshaw v Lord,¹¹⁶ the Court of Appeal did acknowledge the argument that political libels might raise a 'constitutional law' issue; but having ¹⁰⁹ (1868) LR 4 QB 73. ¹¹⁰ Ibid, at 89.

¹¹¹ Loveland (2000) op cit ch 3.

¹¹² For an account of some exceptions to this general trend see ibid, chs 4 and 6.

¹¹³ [1972] 2 QB 169. ¹¹⁴ Ibid, at 175.

¹¹⁵ Weir A (1972) 'Local authority v critical ratepayer—a suit in defamation' Cambridge LJ 238.

¹¹⁶ [1984] QB 1, CA.

acknowledged the argument, the judges accorded it no weight. The litigation concerned a Daily Telegraph story written by Lord which alleged that the Department of Energy had apparently breached Treasury guidelines and overpaid some £52m in grants to various oil companies. Several civil servants were reprimanded following internal disciplinary proceedings. The Commons Public Accounts Committee investigated the affair, and issued a report. The article linked the report to the resignation of a senior civil servant, Blackshaw, who held the rank of Under-Secretary. The Permanent Secretary at the Department of Energy had told the PAC that an Under-Secretary had been reprimanded. Just after Lord's story ran, the Permanent Secretary informed the PAC that this was false; no Under-Secretary had been reprimanded. Blackshaw claimed that the story libelled him, in that it implied that his professional incompetence had cost the taxpayer £52m.

At trial, Lord claimed that a story dealing with so obviously political a matter should attract qualified privilege. This argument was accepted by the trial judge. His conclusion was however overturned in the Court of Appeal, which held that the press had no duty to publish stories of this type to the public at large. Fox LJ doubted that the general public had any 'audience interest' in this sort of story. He concluded simply that 'an allegation of improper or negligent conduct against a public servant may be privileged if made to persons having a proper interest to receive it—such as the police or senior officials'.¹¹⁷ The electorate had no legitimate interest in such information.

Conclusion

Fox LJ's suggestion that the electorate had 'no proper interest' in being provided with press analysis (which was neither deliberately dishonest nor reckless as to truth) of important political issues offers a most compelling illustration of the antediluvian state of the common law's human rights jurisprudence in the mid-1980s. It is no answer to this criticism to explain it away as a necessary consequence of the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty; that, in the absence of a codified statement of entrenched, fundamental civil liberties such as those in the USA's Bill of Rights, the courts simply had no legitimate scope to fashion a systematic approach to the issue of human rights protection. Even within the constitutional constraints imposed on the judiciary by the existence of a sovereign legislature, there was scope for such principles to have emerged and hardened as moral yardsticks against which to measure responses to purely common law problems or to structure the task of statutory interpretation. As we have seen in this, and previous chapters, there were undoubtedly exceptions to this general proposition. But English law could not lay any plausible claim at this time even to have addressed, still less embraced, any systematic methodology for the identification and protection of human rights issues. The lacuna is perhaps all the more surprising because by the mid-1980s the United Kingdom had been for almost forty years a signatory to an extensive body of international law dealing with civil liberties questions—the European Convention on Human Rights.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

Coppell J and O'Neill A (1994) 'The European Court of Justice: taking rights seriously' Legal Studies 227

¹¹⁷ Ibid, per Fox LJ at 41.

Warren S and Brandeis L (1890) 'The right to privacy' Harvard LR 193

Barendt E (1987) Freedom of speech ch 3

Robertson G (1999) The justice game ch 6

Drewry G (1985b) 'Leaking in the public interest' Public Law 203

Palmer S (1990) 'Tightening secrecy law: the Official Secrets Act 1989' Public Law 243

Bonner D and Stone R (1987) 'The Public Order Act 1986: steps in the wrong direction?' Public Law 202

Case law and legislation

Malone v Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1979] Ch 344

Jordan v Burgoyne [1963] 2 QB 744

R v Lemon [1979] AC 617

City of Chicago v Tribune Co. (1923) 139 NE 86

Bognor Regis UDC v Champion [1972] 2 QB 169

Attorney-General v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No. 2) [1990] 1 AC 109

Secretary of State for Defence v Guardian Newspapers Ltd [1985] AC 339

Chapter 19

Human Rights II: Emergent Principles

This chapter offers a limited and partial introduction to the European Convention on Human Rights. It now seems increasingly likely that the Convention will begin to be treated as a topic in its own right in many British law schools. It is certainly the case that the breadth and complexities of its provisions cannot be addressed in a properly detailed fashion within a year or semester-long course on constitutional and administrative law. An initial familiarity with the Convention is however of some appreciable importance in the areas both of constitutional and administrative law. The following pages consequently have two objectives. Section I discusses the main procedural and substantive features of the Convention itself. Section II assesses the status and use of the Convention in English law up until (approximately) the early-1990s. And sections III and IV examine the leading judgments of the European Court on Human Rights in the areas of privacy and freedom of expression which were addressed in chapter eighteen.

I. The European Convention on Human Rights—introductory principles

The European Convention on Human Rights is an international treaty, whose origins lie, like those of the EC, in the reconstruction of Europe's political order following World War II. In 1949, twenty-five European states formed a body known as the Council of Europe.¹ The Council's broad concern was to foster the growth and entrenchment of democratic government within western Europe. One means of doing so was to persuade its members to become signatories to the Convention.

The Convention's terms cover a wide sweep of political issues, broadly comparable to those outlined in the USA's Bill of Rights. Art 2 safeguards the right to life. Art 3 prohibits the use of torture, and the infliction of degrading or inhuman treatment and/or punishment. Arts 5 and 6 are aimed primarily at the conduct of criminal proceedings. Art 7 places strict limits on retrospective criminal laws. Art 8 addresses the right to privacy and family life, while Art 12 concerns the right of adults to marry and found a family. Arts 9 and 10 focus on freedom of thought, conscience, religious belief and expression,² and Art 11 addresses the right to freedom of assembly and association, including the right to join a trade union.

¹ Which, despite the similarity of its name, should not be confused either with the EC's Council of Ministers or the EU's European Council. On the background to the Council of Europe's formation, and the subsequent production of the Convention, see Robertson A and Merrill J (3rd edn, 1994) Human rights in Europe ch 1.

Institutional and jurisdictional issues

The Council of Europe also established several institutions to enforce and monitor the Convention's provisions. The European Commission of Human Rights (EComHR) was established to perform both an investigatory and conciliatory role. Its members were distinguished lawyers, their number being equal to the number of states which have ratified the Convention; no state could have more than one of its nationals sitting on the Commission.³ The Commission was the body to which complaints of a breach of the Convention were initially notified. The Commission was also empowered to determine if the complaint was admissible. The Commission would not admit complaints which it considered 'manifestly ill-founded'. Furthermore, per Art 26, the applicant must have exhausted all effective domestic remedies before the Commission would intervene. Nor could the Commission act if the applicant was raising a question which was 'substantially the same' as one with which the Commission or Court had already dealt. Admissibility proved a formidable hurdle for applicants to surmount. By 1990, the Commission had entertained over 17,000 applications; fewer than 700 were admitted.⁴ It would thus be quite inaccurate to portray the Commission as a body which was constantly interfering with internal affairs of the Convention's signatory states.

Should the Commission have concluded that the complaint was justified, it attempted to negotiate a 'friendly settlement' between the parties. If no settlement could be reached, the Commission drafted an 'opinion' detailing its view of the breach, which was sent to the Committee of Ministers (comprising the foreign ministers of each signatory state). The Committee could either (by a two-thirds majority) produce its own 'judgment', or could refer the case to the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR). The term 'judgment' is used guardedly. The Convention does not require the Committee to adopt court-style procedures. Its decision-making process is conducted in secret, and the impugned Member State can vote on the outcome. This process is obviously unsatisfactory from a narrowly legalistic perspective, but it does alert observers to the important fact that the Convention was designed to retain a substantial 'inter-national' element.

Approximately 25% of the Commission's opinions have been dealt with in this way. The great majority have in contrast been referred to the European Court on Human Rights (ECtHR). The Court's members were selected by the Committee of Ministers, generally for a nine-year term; the Court's total membership could not exceed the number of Signatory States, and no state could have more than one of its nationals sitting on the bench. The applicant was not formally a party to the ECtHR proceedings, although she could appear and be legally represented. Her case was presented on her behalf by the Commission, although the Commission's role in such proceedings was technically to act as the 'defender of the public interest', rather than as the applicant's advocate.

The Convention provides that the ECtHR's judgments 'bind' the Signatory States. Responsibility for ensuring compliance is entrusted to the Committee of Ministers. Compliance generally requires the offending state to alter its domestic law in a manner which satisfies the ECtHR's judgment. Thus far, such amendments have almost always been forthcoming. The Convention has therefore to some extent 'federalised' the constitutional orders of some of its signatory nations. Its provisions are the supreme source of legal authority in some states. For those countries whose constitutions provide that treaty obligations automatically become part of domestic law, or have made specific arrangements to accord the Convention that status, it is also (to borrow familiar terminology) 'directly effective'; their own courts must apply the ECtHR's case law, a situation which greatly speeds their citizens' access to their Convention entitlements. Yet there is no requirement in the Convention itself that Signatory States make its provisions directly effective at all in domestic law. The Convention does not demand that its terms can be enforced by national courts. In many states, citizens were instead required to exhaust all their domestic remedies before invoking a right of direct complaint to the Commission itself. However, the Convention does not even insist that Signatory States grant individuals this right of petition to the EComHR. In those countries, the Convention operates more as a source of diplomatic rather than legal obligation; it exists in the realm of international law rather than constitutional law. The conformity of such states' laws with the Convention can be challenged only at the instigation of another Signatory State.⁵

² The scope of the initial Convention has subsequently been expanded by various protocols, although not all of the original Signatory States have acceded to all of these.

³ See Robertson and Merrill op cit ch 7.

⁴ Bailey, Harris and Jones (1992) op cit p 757.

The absence of a direct effect requirement within the Convention has meant that citizens of states which granted the right of petition might find that pursuing a complaint all the way to the Court proved a very time-consuming process. Suits are rarely concluded in under two years, and time spans of five years between the first action in a domestic court and the eventual ECtHR judgment were not uncommon.

In 1999, in a significant procedural reform, the Commission and the Court merged into a single body, styled as the ECtHR.⁶ It was hoped that the reform would make the ECtHR more accessible to citizens, speed up the process of litigation and also reduce its costs. The merged Court is substantially larger than its predecessor, and will do much of its work in 'Chambers' of a few members, rather than in a plenary session in which all judges will sit.⁷

The jurisprudential methodology of the Convention

In one important sense, albeit not necessarily a supra-legislative legal sense, the Convention articulates a series of 'higher law' moral principles ostensibly embedded within the political cultures of its Signatory States. It might readily be thought that in some of those states, where democratic traditions enjoy only a precarious foothold in political culture, accession to the Convention was intended more as a sop to international opinion rather than a sincere attempt to restrain the potential abuse of governmental power.⁸ Yet one should not equate the Convention's embrace of supposedly fundamental moral principles with ⁵ It is the equivalent of an Art 170 action under the Treaty of Rome: see 'The roles of the European Court of Justice (ECJ)', ch 11, pp 344–345 above. There have been very few such actions under the Convention: see Bailey, Harris and Jones (1992) op cit pp 756–757.

⁶ For the background to the reform, and an indication of its details, see Schermers H (1993) 'The European Court of Human Rights after the merger' European Law Review 493.

⁷ On the final shape of the reforms see Mowbray A (1999) 'The composition and operation of the new European Court of Human Rights' Public Law 219.

⁸ In 2000, for example, the countries adhering to the Convention included Romania, Bulgaria and the Ukraine, in respect of which it was then absurd to suggest that the governmental system was in any meaningful sense democratic. It might of course be argued that such countries should ratify the ECHR, in the hope that so doing might make a contribution to the consolidation of democratic governance within their constitutional orders.

the imposition of a rigid constitutional orthodoxy on those Signatory States which have committed themselves bona fide to respect its terms.

Contingent rather than absolute entitlements

The Convention does not impose a uniform coda of detailed legal rules. Its text is itself liberally sprinkled with provisions allowing states to derogate from its formal provisions. Art 15, for example, is a derogation clause of wide application in respect of many Convention entitlements, through which a state can seek permission de jure to ‘opt out’ of Convention obligations for limited periods. Similarly, the ‘rights’ protected in specific articles of the Convention are often immediately qualified by provisions permitting state interference. For example, the ‘right to life’ protected in Art 2 contains an exception for ‘the execution of a sentence of a court following... conviction for a crime for which this penalty is provided by law’. Similarly, while Art 10(1) announces the ‘right to freedom of expression’—and expressly provides that this includes the entitlement to receive as well as disseminate information⁹—Art 10(2) provides that the right:

may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputations or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.

This constitutional methodology pervades the Convention. In the main, the Convention’s articles identify and afford protection to a broadly defined civil right (what we might call ‘the presumptive entitlement’); the text then permits Signatory States to interfere with the presumptive entitlement in defence of certain specified objectives (what we might call ‘legitimate interference’); but it then in turn requires that intrusion to comply with certain safeguards; ie that it be ‘prescribed by law’ and ‘necessary in a democratic society’.

The same scheme of reasoning can be seen in the text of Art 8, which protects ‘privacy and family life’:

1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

A four stage inquiry

The way in which this textual methodology has been applied by the ECtHR is perhaps best illustrated by examining the Court’s decision-making process in Art 10 cases. Its technique can be broken down into four stages. Firstly, the Court will ask if a governmental body has in some way interfered with the applicant’s presumptive entitlement to free expression?

⁹ Art 10.1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.

Secondly, if the first answer is ‘Yes’, the ECtHR will ask if the government body has interfered with the entitlement in pursuit of a legitimate objective arising from one or more of the factors identified in Art 10(2); ie national security, territorial integrity etc. This test is generally unproblematic from a state’s perspective.

If the answer is again ‘Yes’, the Court moves to stage three, in which it considers if the restriction is ‘prescribed by law’; ie its content accurately identified in the domestic legal system?¹⁰ The primary point of reference for the meaning of this concept is now provided by the ECtHR in its 1979 judgment in Sunday Times v United Kingdom:

a norm cannot be regarded as a ‘law’ unless it is formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct; he must be able, if need be with appropriate advice—to foresee to a degree that is reasonable in all the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail.¹¹

The ECtHR has not accepted that a measure can only be ‘prescribed by/according to law’ if it has a legislative base. The Court has recognised that a body of judge-made rules such as the common law may pass that test, even if—as is the case with common law—the state’s indigenous legal principles permit the substance of that law to change in response to altered social and economic circumstances or moral perceptions. Thus, in The Sunday Times case, the ECtHR continued after the above quotation in the following way:

Those consequences need not be attainable with absolute certainty: experience shows this to be unattainable. Again, whilst certainty is highly desirable, it may bring in its train excessive rigidity and the law must be able to keep pace with changing circumstances. Accordingly many laws are inevitably couched in terms which, to a greater or lesser extent, are vague and whose interpretation and application are questions of practice.¹²

Should the government’s interference fail that test, a breach of Art 10 is established. The ‘prescribed by law’ test speaks to what was earlier described as the ‘How?’ element of the rule of law.¹³ Its concern is—to put the matter somewhat simplistically—with the proce-

¹⁰ The text sometimes uses the formula ‘according to law’. There do not appear to be any differences of meaning between the two formulae.

¹¹ (1979) 2 EHRR 245 at para 49. The case, which dealt with the A-G v Times Newspapers litigation (see ‘Contempt of court’, ch 18, pp 580–582 above) is discussed in detail below.

¹² Ibid. The ECtHR has shown itself to be quite accommodating to this common law tradition. The best illustration of the point is perhaps provided by the Court’s eventual decision in the R v R (marital rape exemption) case: [1992] 1 AC 599, HL: see ‘Retrospectivity at common law? Rape within marriage’, ch 3, pp 79–83 above. The ECtHR’s judgment is given in SW v United Kingdom; CR v United Kingdom (1995) 21 EHRR 363. R challenged his conviction on the basis that the House of Lords’ judgment had breached the Art 7 prohibition on retrospective criminal laws. The ECtHR saw no merit in this argument. The Court held that the orderly evolution of the common law did not per se amount to retrospectivity. On this particular issue, the Court considered that it was perfectly clear by the time R ‘raped’ his wife that the scope of the marital consent defence was diminishing and that it was plausible to assume that it might at any point be narrowed further or be removed altogether. This might suggest that retrospective legislation would have breached Art 7 or (possibly) that a sudden and complete judicial reversal of a long-established common law rule would have done so. However it should also be noted that the ECtHR laid some stress in its judgment on the grossly reprehensible moral nature of R’s activities: ‘What is more, the abandonment of the unacceptable idea of a husband being immune against prosecution for rape of his wife was in conformity not only with a civilised concept of marriage but also, and above all, with the fundamental objectives of the Convention, the very essence of which is respect for human dignity and human freedom’: ibid., at para 44/42. This may indicate that ‘orderly evolution’ at common law could breach Art 7 in respect of morally anodyne offences.

¹³ See ‘The rule of law and the separation of powers’, ch 3, p 50 above.

dural rather than the substantive dimension of the relationship between government and citizens.¹⁴

If the interference in issue is considered to be ‘prescribed by law’, the ECtHR then moves to the fourth and final stage of its analysis: is the measure taken ‘necessary in a democratic society’? This is the most complex and controversial area of the ECtHR’s jurisprudence. Its concern is explicitly with the ‘What?’ element of the rule of law; namely what substantive restraints may a Signatory State legitimately impose upon its citizens?

In interpreting this aspect of the Convention, the ECtHR has developed a principle known as ‘the margin of appreciation’. In formulating its approach to the ‘necessary in a democratic society’ provision, the ECtHR has repeatedly stressed that it does not see the Convention’s role as imposing a series of common, detailed legal rules on all of the Signatory States. The Court’s jurisdiction is not de jure appellate, nor—in most situations—could its jurisdiction be so classified in a de facto sense. In much of its activity, the Court’s task could be seen—if one were searching for an indigenous British comparator—as supervisory in a rather loose, almost Wednesbury irrationality sense. Neither does the Court quash or invalidate national laws. Its remedial role is essentially declaratory in nature, although it also has the power under Art 41 to order a state to pay ‘damages’ (the term used in the text is ‘just satisfaction’) to successful applicants. Subsequent compliance with the Court’s judgments is a matter for the Signatory State concerned.

This point is well conveyed by the ECtHR’s judgment in Handyside v United Kingdom.¹⁵ The applicant, a book publisher, had been convicted under English obscenity laws for distributing a publication called The Little Red Schoolbook.¹⁶ Before the ECtHR, the UK government argued that this interference with freedom of expression was justified ‘for the protection of morals’. Having accepted this argument, and having agreed that the UK’s obscenity laws met the ‘prescribed by law’ test, the Court then turned to consider whether the laws were ‘necessary in a democratic society’. The Court stressed that when questions of ‘the protection of morals’ were in issue, it would be reluctant to conclude that state measures were not necessary:

By reason of their direct and continuous contact with the vital forces of their countries, state authorities are in principle in a better position than the international judge to give an opinion... on the necessity of a ‘restriction’ or ‘penalty’.¹⁷

This did not mean that the ECtHR had no role to play in such circumstances; but rather that its jurisdiction would be secondary, almost residual, in nature:

Nevertheless, Art 10(2) does not give the contracting states an unlimited power of appreciation. The Court is empowered to give the final ruling on whether a ‘restriction’ or ‘penalty’ is reconcilable with freedom of expression as protected by Art 10.¹⁸

¹⁴ The term ‘citizen’ is used here in a loose sense, simply to denote any individual who happens to fall within the state’s jurisdiction at any given time.

¹⁵ [1976] 1 EHRR 737.

¹⁶ Hansen S and Jensen J (1969). The original version of the book (published in 1969) was in Danish, authored by two rather politically radical Danish teachers. The book—aimed at teenagers—urged them to question the authority of their parents and teachers, especially in relation to matters of sexuality and drug use. A copy can easily be accessed at <<http://www.nla.gov.au/apps/cdview?pi=nla.aus-vn4512714-s2-v>>. For further background see Fiengold C (1978) ‘The Little Red Schoolbook and the ECHR’ Human Rights Review 21. For an interesting retrospective on the book (and the mores of the era) listen to Jenkins J (2008) ‘The little red schoolbook’ (BBC Radio 4 series ‘In living memory’ available at: <<http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio4/inlivingmemory/pip/62r6s/>>.

¹⁷ (1976) 1 EHRR 737 at para 48.

¹⁸ Ibid., at para 49.

This principle speaks to a limited notion of justiciability in both a substantive and transnational sense. The Court accepts that the classification and regulation of ‘obscene’ material is an intensely ‘moral’ question. This does not per se render the matter non-justiciable, since prosecutions for obscenity are necessarily judged on their detailed merits by national courts. However, moral questions evidently acquire a much less justiciable status when they are exported beyond their indigenous national boundaries. In describing itself as an ‘international’ rather than ‘constitutional’ court, the ECtHR seems to suggest that it lacks the cultural competence to conduct a close examination of the merits of a state’s laws. Thus, while the Court would insist that a measure was only ‘necessary’ if it met what the Court termed ‘a pressing social need’ and was ‘proportionate’ in the sense of not interfering unduly with the presumptive entitlement, it would not subject the state’s own conclusions on these points to rigorous scrutiny.

The consequences of this relaxed standard of review could be spun in either a positive or negative light. It could be seen as having the desirable outcome of respecting the autonomy of Signatory States on moral matters. Alternatively, it might be viewed as abandoning the liberties of individuals or small minorities to the intolerance of national majorities.¹⁹

It is however clear that as a matter of general principle—we explore the point in a more detailed context below—the breadth of the margin of appreciation afforded to Signatory States (and thence the practical nature of the EComHR’s and the Court’s jurisdiction) is not uniform in respect of all the Convention’s provisions; rather it varies according to the particular presumptive entitlements and/or legitimate interferences in issue. In many situations, the ECtHR will seem to function more as a ‘constitutional’ than ‘international’ court; it will look closely at the merits of the legitimate interference, and will accept that it is ‘necessary’ only if the Court itself is convinced that, given the detailed circumstances of the case, the measure has indeed been undertaken to satisfy a ‘pressing social need’ and if the means chosen to achieve the desired end are ‘proportionate’ in the sense of interfering as little as possible with the presumptive entitlement. An examination of the intricacies of the way in which the Court has pursued this approach across the whole spectrum of Convention entitlements is beyond the scope of this book.²⁰ We return to the issue below, but at this point we might just note that the Court subjects state laws to quite varying standards of scrutiny depending on the issue at stake.

II. The initial status of the ECHR in domestic law

It is perhaps worth repeating the point that, in contrast to the status of EC law, the Convention does not require that its terms be given ‘direct effect’ in the legal systems of its Signatory States. Nor did the Convention even require that states grant their citizens direct access to the Commission and the ECtHR. In countries where the Convention is neither directly effective, nor actionable by individuals before the ECtHR itself, compliance with its terms would be a matter to be resolved through the political rather than the legal process.

Although Attlee’s 1945–1950 Labour government was closely involved in drafting and promoting the Convention, his Cabinet was bitterly divided on the question of whether ¹⁹ For a powerful critique from this perspective see Jones T (1996) ‘The devaluation of human rights under the European Convention’ Public Law 430. See also Warbrick C (1998) ‘Federalism and free speech’, in Loveland I (ed) Importing the First Amendment?

²⁰ Both Janis, Bradley and Kay op cit and Harris, O’Boyle and Warbrick op cit undertake the task admirably.

this country should even be a signatory.²¹ Atlee's government did eventually accede to the Convention. However, it was not until the mid-1960s that a UK government (Harold Wilson's first Labour administration) allowed UK citizens the right of direct access to the ECtHR. And, prior to 1997, no post-war government ever introduced a Bill to give any domestic legal effect to the Convention before United Kingdom courts.²² United Kingdom citizens were thus apparently unable to enforce its terms before their courts.

Political responses—why did Parliament not 'incorporate' the ECHR?

Parliament's failure to give any provisions of the ECHR any degree of enforceability before the domestic courts cannot be explained on simple party political grounds. Both Labour and Conservative governments consistently refused to promote the necessary legislation. It is also misleading to suggest that this reluctance stemmed from an objectively defensible concern to ensure that the wishes of a democratically elected legislature are not frustrated by the unelected judiciary. That argument fails on several counts. The shortcomings in 'Parliament's' democratic credentials have already been alluded to; the Commons' electoral system was (and remains) crudely minoritarian, and the Lords' composition was until 1999 entirely indefensible.²³ Moreover, if the ECHR were to be incorporated (on terms analogous to those used in the ECA 1972), the government and Parliament's subordination would not be to the domestic courts, but to the ECtHR, on whose behalf the British courts would act as an agent. Rather, the Convention's formal constitutional status as merely international law seems to derive from the traditional unwillingness of either the Labour or Conservative parties to accept the moral premise that they are not each entitled to make whatever use they wish of Parliament's sovereignty whenever their electoral fortunes afford them a Commons majority.

The legal education of many law students in Britain in the past thirty years has included exposure to successive editions of Professor John Griffith's celebrated work on The Politics of the judiciary. Griffith promoted considerable controversy in suggesting that the judiciary's social and educational background predisposed most judges to adopt a highly conservative attitude when faced with contentious political questions. Griffith was not accusing judges of acting in a crudely party political sense:

But it is demonstrable that on every major social issue which has come before the courts during the last 30 years—concerning industrial relations, political protest, race relations, governmental secrecy, police powers, moral behaviour—the judges have supported the conventional, established and settled interests. And they have reacted strongly against challenges to those interests.²⁴

Griffith suggested that such judicial bias may explain the Labour Party's historic reluctance to embrace the idea of a supra-legislative constitution. The Griffith thesis—which enjoyed

²¹ On the Atlee government's views see Lester A (1984) 'Fundamental rights: the United Kingdom isolated' Public Law 46. Much the most informative guide to and analysis of the creation of the ECHR is provided by Simpson A (2001) Human rights and the end of empire.

²² Simple use of the term 'incorporate' to refer to Parliament's use of statute to give domestic legal force to provisions of internal law. As was suggested in ch 2 and ch 11, the question of the domestic status which Parliament accords to international law has several discrete dimensions; relating to matters of accessibility, hierarchy and interpretive competence respectively. See 'Inconsistency with international law', ch 2, pp 32–33 and 'The status of EC law within the legal systems of the Member States', ch 11, pp 345–349 above.

²³ Quite how defensible it is now is obviously a matter of some controversy: see 'The "reformed" House of Lords', ch 6, p 182 above.

²⁴ Op cit pp 239–240. The 30 years in question being from the mid-1940s to the mid-1970s.

considerable influence on the political left despite its rather simplistic arguments—draws much of its force from its attachment to such a crude notion of ‘democracy’. The unelected judiciary’s ‘conservatism’ was undesirable because it obstructed the policies preferred by the ‘democratically elected’ government of the day. Such assumptions are themselves vulnerable to criticism on the ground that they leave a rather more important question unasked—namely whether it is ‘democratic’ for a constitution to permit barely majoritarian or even minoritarian ideologies to exercise ultimate control of the law-making process? In a democracy which had placed its basic moral principles beyond the reach of bare majorities, one would of course expect the judiciary to adopt a conservative stance in defence of constituent moral values. By doing so, they evince loyalty to a rather broader conception of ‘the people’ than one is likely to find in a transient electoral majority. This might suggest that in so far as judicial conservatism reveals a ‘problem’ within the constitution, it is a problem that stems from the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty rather than from the courts.

Nonetheless, the notion that it was ‘undemocratic’ to place supra-legislative authority in the hands of the judges—both domestic and European—exercised a sufficiently strong grip on both the Labour and Conservative Party leaderships to make legislative incorporation of the Convention a non-issue in British political circles until the late-1990s. The notion that the Convention should restrain the power of Parliament itself was regarded as absurd, and even the more modest proposition that the Convention should operate as a de jure check on government power in the field of administrative law attracted minimal political support.

The suggestion that this opposition to incorporation rested on an implacable hostility to the possibility of the imposition of ‘foreign’ legal solutions to domestic political problems is not easy to sustain. The UK’s record in complying with adverse ECtHR judgments through the eventual enactment of legislation was almost flawless. As noted in section I of this chapter, it is also generally misleading to suggest that the Convention imposes rules on Signatory States. Defeat before the Court usually means no more than that the Signatory State must accept that its discretion in respect of certain matters is not quite as broad as it would like. And, as is indicated by the cases discussed in the final sections of this chapter, it has often been the case that the EComHR and the Court have found governmental decisions which generated acute political controversy in the UK to be perfectly compatible with the demands of the Convention. Before reaching that question however, it is helpful to spend some time exploring the way in which the Convention was deployed in domestic law by the courts.

Legal responses—the ECHR as a source of principle at common law

Murray Hunt’s influential analysis of the Convention’s role in domestic law records that for the first twenty years of its existence—between 1953 and 1973—the Convention was cited only once in domestic law reports, and that was in a case involving the institutional status of the EComHR.²⁵ The first allusions made to it (Hunt describes the allusions as ‘fleeting’ and ‘passing’ references)²⁶ as a potential influence on individual rights under English law appeared in Cassell & Co Ltd v Broome,²⁷ a House of Lords’ judgment on ²⁵ (1997) Using human rights law in English courts p 131. I am much indebted to this book in the following pages. ²⁶ Ibid.

²⁷ [1972] AC 1027. See Loveland I (2000) Political libels pp 90–91.

damages in libel cases, and Waddington v Miah,²⁸ an immigration case which addressed whether a particular statutory provision imposed retrospective criminal liability.²⁹

The virtual invisibility of the Convention in domestic law in this period is something of a puzzle. As was made clear in the discussion in chapters two and eleven of the relationship between statute and international law,³⁰ English courts had long accepted that while the terms of an unincorporated treaty could not override the clear meaning of an Act of Parliament, they could be invoked as an aid to the interpretation of ambiguous statutory provisions. Thus the fact that the Convention had not been incorporated into domestic law by Parliament did not mean that it was invariably irrelevant in domestic proceedings. This principle as to the general status of international law had been clearly recognised in Mortensen v Peters.³¹ As Lord Kylloch put it—in somewhat equivocal terms:

[I]t may probably be conceded that there is always a certain presumption against the legislature of any country asserting or assuming the existence of a territorial jurisdiction going beyond limits established by the common consent on nations—that is to say by International law.³²

The principle was reiterated in a much more forceful and expansive form sixty years later by Diplock LJ in Salomon v Customs and Excise Comrs:

If the terms of the legislation are clear and unambiguous they must be given effect to whether or not they carry out Her Majesty's treaty obligations.... If the terms of the legislation are not clear, however, but are reasonably capable of more than one meaning, the treaty itself becomes relevant, for there is a prima facie presumption that Parliament does not intend to act in breach of international law...; and if one of the meanings that can reasonably be ascribed to the legislation is consonant with the treaty obligations and another or others are not, the meaning which is consonant is to be preferred.³³

That neither counsel nor the judges made any resort to the Convention as an interpretive aid when faced with ambiguous legislation or common law rules impacting upon civil liberties may perhaps be explained by a complacent assumption that UK law—being the product of a 'democratic' legislature and an independent judiciary—was invariably as protective of human rights as the Convention itself. Jordan v Burgoyne,³⁴ for example, in 1963 and *Brutus v Cozens*³⁵ ten years later, were both cases affecting freedom of expression and assembly (protected by Arts 10 and 11 ECHR) which turned on issues of statutory interpretation. Neither case made any reference to the Convention.

A sudden—short-lived—legal shift?

Yet in 1975—if only initially for a brief period—the Convention seemed suddenly to have acquired prominent (even perhaps dominant status) in domestic law. As Hunt notes, this may be attributable to the fact that the first few cases against the UK had by then made their way to the ECtHR.³⁶ It may also stem from the fact that as a result of applying (directly effective) EC law, domestic judges had become much more aware of other 'European' treaty provisions.

Whatever the explanation, Lord Denning was among the first to recognise that—at the very least—the normal status of international law attached to the ECtHR. In Birdi v

²⁸ [1974] 1 WLR 683.

²⁹ Which is forbidden by Art 7 ECHR.

³⁰ See 'Inconsistency with international law', ch 2, pp 32–33 and 'II. United Kingdom accession' ff, ch 11, pp 365–372.

³¹ (1906) 14 SLT 227; see 'Inconsistency with international law', ch 2, pp 32–33 above.

³² (1906) 14 SLT 227 at 232.

³³ [1967] 2 QB 116 at 143, per Diplock LJ, CA.

³⁴ [1963] 2 QB 744; see 'Jordan v Burgoyne (1963)', ch 18, p 564 above.

³⁵ [1973] AC 854, HL; see 'Brutus v Cozens (1972)' ch 18, pp 564–565 above.

³⁶ Op cit pp 135–136.

Secretary of State for Home Affairs, he indicated that the imaginative rules of statutory interpretation he was later to apply in respect of EC law in Macarthy v Smith should also apply to the Convention: '[judges]—could and should take the Convention into account in interpreting a statute. An Act of Parliament should be construed so as to conform with the Convention'.³⁷

Lord Denning does not require ambiguity in statutory provisions as a trigger for considering the ECtHR: his assumption seems rather to be that the Convention would always be a relevant factor. In the same case, Lord Denning also made the claim (which Hunt, with admirable understatement describes as 'surprising')³⁸ that the ECtHR might be viewed as a higher form of law than statute: '[I]f an Act of Parliament did not conform to the Convention, I might be inclined to hold it invalid'.³⁹

If acted upon, this would have been a quite 'revolutionary' proposition. It would entail the denial of parliamentary sovereignty, not by virtue as subsequently seems to have been the case in respect of EC law of an entrenching statute passed by Parliament itself,⁴⁰ but as result of a judicial assertion (triggered by successive government's continuing affirmation of the Convention treaties) of the supreme legal status of the moral values laid out in the ECHR's text.

A prompt return to orthodoxy

It thus came as no surprise that Lord Denning promptly stepped back from his position in Birdi. In R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Bhajan Singh,⁴¹ Lord Denning dropped any suggestion that the Convention could be used to 'invalidate' legislation. He retained, however, his presumption that it could be used as an aid to statutory interpretation even if there was no apparent ambiguity in the relevant statutory text.⁴²

For no obviously discernible reason however, the courts (led by Lord Denning) then discarded this more radical interpretive principle and reasserted the orthodox understanding of the use that might be made of international law. Thus, in R v Chief Immigration Officer, Heathrow Airport, ex p Salamat Bibi,⁴³ a case turning on the meaning of provisions of the Immigration Act 1971, Lord Denning made the following statement:

The position, as I understand it, is that if there is any ambiguity in our statutes or uncertainty in our law, then these courts can look to the convention as an aid to clear up the ambiguity and uncertainty. But I would dispute altogether that the convention is part of our law. Treaties and declarations do not become part of our law until they are made law by Parliament.⁴⁴

The courts were still holding firmly to this proposition in the early-1990s. There was nothing 'special' about the ECHR which required that its status in domestic law could be any different from any other unincorporated treaty. Thus, for example, in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Brind, Lord Ackner observed that: 'It is well settled that the convention may be deployed for the purpose of the resolution of an ambiguity in English ³⁷ (1975) 119 Sol Jo 322, CA.

³⁸ Op cit at p 134.

³⁹ (1975) 119 Sol Jo 322, CA.

⁴⁰ See the discussion of Factortame at 'The demise of the legal doctrine? Factortame', ch 12, pp 400–406 above.

⁴¹ [1976] QB 198, CA.

⁴² A similar presumption seemed to have been embraced at this time in respect of purely common law rules; see Hunt op cit pp 139–140.

⁴³ [1976] 1 WLR 979, CA.

⁴⁴ [1976] 1 WLR 979 at 984. Cf also Geoffrey Lane LJ at 988: 'It is perfectly true that the convention was ratified by this country. Nevertheless the convention, not having been enacted by Parliament as an Act, does not have the effect of law in this country. Whatever persuasive force it may have in resolving ambiguities it certainly cannot have the effect of overriding the plain provisions of the 1971 Act and the rules made thereunder'.

primary or subordinate legislation'.⁴⁵ In the absence of such an ambiguity however—and Lord Ackner felt that s 29 of the Broadcasting Act 1981 was unambiguous in bestowing an extremely wide discretion on the Home Secretary—the Convention was not a relevant factor for the Court to consider.⁴⁶ Nor did Lord Ackner discern any merit in Mr Brind's suggestion that, as matter of domestic law, the Court should at least insist that the Home Secretary considered whether or not the ban was consistent with Art 10. Lord Ackner suggested that accepting this argument: 'inevitably would result in incorporating the convention into English law by the back door'.⁴⁷ That contention is poorly founded. Requiring Ministers to pay attention to the Convention as part of the government's decision-making process does not in itself bind them to follow the ECtHR's judgments.

We will revisit the question of the Convention's changing status at common law at the beginning of chapter twenty. Before doing so however, we consider the judgments that the ECtHR eventually reached in respect of the controversial English 'human rights' cases discussed in the previous chapter in an attempt to form a preliminary conclusion on the question of how much difference the ECtHR actually makes to the substance of civil liberties and human rights protection in the UK's constitutional order.

III. The impact of the ECHR on domestic law 1: privacy

The United Kingdom's record before the Court has not been an entirely happy one, although it is overly simplistic to suggest that British law has been found wanting significantly more often than that of the Convention's other signatories.⁴⁸ Successive governments have generally responded to defeats before the ECtHR by introducing Bills to amend domestic law,⁴⁹ although if one adds the time needed to pass legislation to the lengthy time period required to bring a claim before the ECtHR, it is clear that British citizens did not enjoy speedy access to the Convention's protection. Mr Malone, for example, found himself having to wait some five years before his challenge to Megarry VC's High Court judgment was heard.

Speech and communication

In the course of his judgment in Malone v Metropolitan Police Comr, Megarry VC had paid much attention to the requirements of the ECtHR. He had in particular examined the ECtHR's decision in *Klass v Germany*⁵⁰ in some detail. Klass addressed the compatibility with Art 8 ECtHR of Germany's legislation authorising the interception of mail and the tapping of phone conversations. German law constrained such powers very tightly, and established an elaborate series of legal and political controls which had to be complied with before the powers could be used. In the light of these extensive controls, the ECtHR ⁴⁵ [1991] 1 AC 696, sub nom Brind v Secretary of State for the Home Department HL. On the background to the case, see 'A "better" application of the test', ch 14, pp 467–468 above.

⁴⁶ 'Ambiguity' is of course itself an ambiguous concept. What might seem tolerably clear or even perfectly straightforward to one court might seem to be pervaded by doubt and uncertainty to another. This is a point returned to below.

⁴⁷ [1991] 1 AC 696 at 76–762.

⁴⁸ For a helpful analysis of the statistics see Bradley A (1991) 'The UK before the Strasbourg court', in Finnie W, Himsworth C and Walker N (eds) Edinburgh essays in public law. For a listing of the cases involving the UK up until 1993 see HCD, 17 December 1993 c 964. See also Farran S (1996) The UK before the European Court of Human Rights.

⁴⁹ See Bradley (1991) op cit.

⁵⁰ (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

concluded that the German rules were both ‘in accordance with the law’ and ‘necessary in a democratic society’.

Malone had been argued shortly after Salamat Bibi had been decided, and Megarry VC intimated that he was not certain to what extent this judgment had modified the principle expressed in Birdi. He thus concluded that: ‘I take note of the Convention, as construed in the Klass case, and I shall give it due consideration in discussing English law on the point’.⁵¹ That consideration led Megarry VC to suggest that the wholly unregulated nature of domestic law on telephone tapping certainly breached Art 8:

[I]t is impossible to read the judgment in the Klass case without its becoming abundantly clear that a system which has no legal safeguards whatever has small chance of satisfying the requirements of [the ECtHR].⁵²

This proved of no help to Mr Malone in the High Court however. Megarry VC observed that had he been faced with an ambiguity in domestic law, he would have resolved that ambiguity in accordance with the Klass formula. But here there was no ambiguity in the law; there simply was no law at all. The Court was faced with a legal void. In such circumstances, Megarry VC suggested, the court would be compromising traditional understandings of the separation of powers if it granted Mr Malone a remedy:

It seems to me that where Parliament has abstained from legislating on a point that is plainly suitable for legislation, it is indeed difficult for the court to lay down new rules of common law...that will carry out the Crown’s treaty obligations, or to discover for the first time that such rules have always existed.⁵³

When Mr Malone’s case finally reached the ECtHR,⁵⁴ the Court saw no difficulty in concluding that telephone conversations were within Art 8’s concepts of ‘private life’ and ‘correspondence’. Accepting also that the MPC’s interference had been in pursuit of a legitimate Art 8(2) objective—namely the prevention of crime—the question which then arose was whether the Commissioner’s interference with this right had been exercised ‘according to law’. The meaning afforded to the concept in Malone was broadly in line with the test laid out in The Sunday Times case:

law must be sufficiently clear in this terms to give citizens an adequate indication as to the circumstances in which and the conditions on which public authorities are empowered to resort to this secret and potentially dangerous interference with the right to respect for private life...⁵⁵

No such clarity could be found in British law. The Post Office Act 1969 s 80 required the Post Office to pass information to the police when requested to do so. However the Act itself did not specify the circumstances under which such a requirement arose. Furthermore, William Whitelaw (when Home Secretary) had explained to the Commons in 1980 that he considered such guidance as existed regarding use of s 80 unsuited to enactment.⁵⁶ These factors led the Court to conclude that the tapping power had not been exercised ‘according to law’. The Court answered the question before it in terms evocative of Diceyan principle: ‘it would be contrary to the rule of law for the legal discretion granted to the executive to be expressed in terms of an unfettered power’.⁵⁷

⁵¹ [1979] Ch 344 at 366.

⁵² Ibid., at 379.

⁵³ Ibid.

⁵⁴ Malone v United Kingdom (1984) 7 EHRR 14.

⁵⁵ Ibid., at para 67.

⁵⁶ The ECtHR it seems did not feel compelled to respect restrictive interpretations of parliamentary privilege or Art 9 of the Bill of Rights concerning the justiciability of proceedings in either house. This case was of course decided before Pepper v Hart: see ‘Redefining parliament’—Pepper v Hart (1993), ch 8, pp 244–248 above.

⁵⁷ (1984) 7 EHRR 14 at para 68.

On this occasion, the government appeared willing to amend domestic law accordingly. The Interception of Communications Act 1985 (ICA 1985) introduced a statutory framework to regulate phone tapping. Unauthorised tapping was made a criminal offence, although the Act granted government bodies extensive discretion to authorise taps in a wide range of circumstances.⁵⁸

Sado-masochistic sexual behaviour

The three-to-two basis of the House of Lords' decision in R v Brown indicated that the criminal nature of sado-masochistic sexual behaviour was a precarious concept in domestic law. Brown subsequently came before the ECtHR as Laskey, Jaggard and Brown v United Kingdom.⁵⁹ Unlike the House of Lords, the Court was unanimous in its judgment: Brown's prosecution and conviction did not breach Art 8. The ECtHR observed (obiter) that it rather doubted that there had been any interference with private life at all in this case, on the rather curious basis that the group nature of Brown's activities implied that they could not be regarded as private.⁶⁰ Nonetheless, accepting that there had been such interference, it was also accepted by all parties that the interference was undertaken in pursuit of a legitimate objective (the protection of health or morals) and was imposed according to law. The Court confined its observations to the protection of health, and offered no clear indication of the breadth of the margin of appreciation that the UK would have been granted if its objective had been limited solely to protecting morals.⁶¹ The breadth accorded on health grounds, however, was sufficient for the Court to conclude that Brown's conviction had been 'necessary in a democratic society'. Rejecting any assertion that the prosecution or conviction had been prompted by the fact that the defendants had been engaging in homosexual rather than heterosexual practices, the Court noted both that the 'extreme' activities undertaken had caused serious injuries in practice and had the potential to cause even more serious damage. It thus endorsed the Commission's view that: 'The state authorities therefore acted within their margin of appreciation in order to protect its citizens from real risk of serious physical harm or injury'.⁶²

IV. The impact of the ECHR on domestic law 2: freedom of expression

The contrasting outcomes (from the government's perspective) of Malone and Brown/Laskey indicate the varying impact that the Convention would be likely to have on domestic treatment of civil liberties issues. The following section continues to explore that question by focusing on a series of Commission and Court judgments in the area of freedom of expression.

⁵⁸ See Ewing and Gearty op cit pp 66–81; Leigh I (1986) 'A tapper's charter' Public Law 8.

⁵⁹ (1997) 24 EHRR 39.

⁶⁰ Ibid, at para 36. Cf the concurring judgment of Judge Pettiti: 'in my view... [Art 8] was not even applicable in the instant case. The concept of private life cannot be stretched indefinitely... The protection of private life means the protection of a person's intimacy and dignity, not the protection of his baseness or the promotion of criminal immorality': ibid, at 61.

⁶¹ Cf para 42: 'The scope of this margin of appreciation is not identical in each case but will vary according to the context. Relevant factors include the nature of the Convention right in issue, its importance for the individual and the nature of the activities concerned'.

⁶² Ibid, at para 41.

Official secrecy

That the ICA 1985 affords the government wide discretion is itself a powerful reminder that compliance with the Convention does not impose detailed or uniform standards on its Signatory States. That point is reinforced when one considers the reasoning and conclusions of the ECtHR when the Spycatcher litigation eventually came before it.

The litigation concerned both the temporary and continuing injunctions granted against The Guardian and The Observer in Spycatcher (No 1) by Millet J and the House of Lords respectively. The ECtHR's judgment in *Observer and Guardian v United Kingdom*⁶³ began by articulating two general principles which might initially seem redolent of the ethos which has informed the US Supreme Court's interpretation of the First Amendment:

(a) Freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society; subject to para (2) of Art 10, it is applicable not only to 'information' or 'ideas' that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb. Freedom of expression, as enshrined in Art 10, is subject to a number of exceptions which must be narrowly interpreted and the necessity for any restrictions must be convincingly established.

(b) These principles are of particular importance as far as the press is concerned. While it must not overstep the bounds set, inter alia, 'in the interests of national security'... it is nevertheless incumbent upon it to impart information and ideas on matters of public interest. Not only does the press have the task of imparting such information: the public also has a right to receive them. Were it otherwise, the press would be unable to play its vital role of public watchdog.⁶⁴

On a closer reading, this statement seems to attach very great significance to the Art 10(2) exceptions, a significance only partly reduced by the subsequent assertion that the scope for legitimate interference with freedom of expression should be narrowly constrained. It is clear that the Court's application of these principles in Spycatcher did not amount to an expansive protection of freedom of expression. Despite the intensely political content of the information contained in Wright's book, the Court concluded that the initial injunction did not contravene Art 10: it was entirely reasonable for Millet J to have assumed that the book may have contained information that jeopardised national security; in such circumstances, pending a full trial, a temporary restraint could be regarded as 'necessary in a democratic society'. However, the Court also held that the House of Lords' continuation of the injunction did breach Art 10. Since the book had by then been published in the USA, its contents were common knowledge; the ban on media discussion therefore served no useful purpose.

For advocates of an expansive notion of 'informed consent', the ECtHR's judgment is rather unsatisfactory, in that it seemed to hinge (as did the House of Lords' decision in Spycatcher (No 2)), on the fact that the book had been published in the USA. As Ian Leigh has suggested,⁶⁵ one might therefore wonder if the Convention per se would have permitted the newspapers to discuss Spycatcher if not for the more extensive protection of free expression afforded to the book in America under the First Amendment.

Political libels

There would however appear to have been a divergence between domestic law and the requirements of the Convention in respect of libel actions initiated by politicians. By the ⁶³ (1991) 14 EHRR 153.

⁶⁴ Ibid., at para 59.

⁶⁵ Leigh I (1992) 'Spycatcher in Strasbourg' Public Law 200.

early-1990s, the ECtHR had yet to be faced with a civil law libel action initiated either by a politician or a government body. It had however delivered several judgments declaring convictions for criminal libel against journalists disseminating political information to be in breach of Art 10.

The Lingens (1986) judgment of the ECtHR

The Court's decision in *Lingens v Austria*⁶⁶ seemed to rest on an organising principle concerned with the effect rather than the form of restraints on freedom of expression. The Lingens litigation arose following Lingens' publication of two articles in a political magazine which suggested that Austria's then Chancellor, Kreisky, had shielded the leader of a minor political party from investigations into that person's alleged role in Nazi atrocities in order to secure the smaller party's participation in a coalition government. Kreisky issued private criminal proceedings against Lingens under Art 111 of the Austrian Criminal Code. This provided that the publisher of material which accuses any person of 'possessing a contemptible character or attitude or of behaviour contrary to honour or morality and of such a nature ... to lower him in public esteem' could be fined or imprisoned for up to a year. The disseminator had a defence if he proved truth, or that he had a reasonable belief that the material was true. Lingens was convicted by the Austrian courts.

The ECtHR began its judgment with a broad evaluation of the functions to be performed by Art 10. In the Court's view, the Convention recognised freedom of speech as 'one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and for each individual's self-fulfilment'.⁶⁷ Freedom of speech on political questions enjoyed an elevated status: 'freedom of political debate is at the very core of the concept of a democratic society which prevails throughout the Convention'.⁶⁸

That the Austrian law in issue did not impose a restraint on political debate by preventing publication of the article at all was regarded as irrelevant by the ECtHR. Fines or gaol sentences imposed after publication could still deter journalists from voicing useful political information and opinions in future, thereby depriving the public of access to political discussion and undermining the press' role as a watchdog on governmental behaviour.

The ECtHR held that the 'core' status of political speech had significant implications for the extent to which states could restrict its dissemination in order to protect the reputation of individuals. Politicians did not forfeit all entitlement to have their reputations protected by defamation laws, but nor could they expect to be treated as 'private citizens'. In respect of attacks on a politician's political beliefs and behaviour: 'the requirements of such protection have to be weighed in relation to the interests of the open discussion of political issues'.⁶⁹ In the Court's view, that weighing demanded that: 'The limits of acceptable criticism are accordingly wider as regards a politician as such than as regards a private individual'.⁷⁰ The unavoidable inference to be drawn from this conclusion was that the ECHR required that the obstacles presented by domestic libel law to a politician plaintiff in respect of stories concerning her political beliefs or behaviour had to be appreciably more onerous than those facing a private plaintiff suing over a non-political story.

Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers* (1992) in the Court of Appeal

This point seemed however to elude the Court of Appeal, which invoked Lingens as a persuasive authority in Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers Ltd, a case triggered by a Sunday Times' story alleging that Derbyshire had been improperly using its pension

⁶⁶ (1986) 8 EHHR 407.

⁶⁷ Ibid, at para 41.

⁶⁸ Ibid, at para 42.

⁶⁹ Ibid, at para 42.

⁷⁰ Ibid.

funds. When sued for libel by the council, the Sunday Times argued that local authorities lacked the legal capacity to bring a libel action over criticism of their ‘governing reputations’. This contention was initially rejected by Morland J, who followed the lead given some twenty years earlier by Browne J in Bognor Regis UDC v Champion.⁷¹ A unanimous Court of Appeal reversed Morland J’s decision.⁷² All three judges (Balcombe, Ralph Gibson, and Butler Sloss LJ) thought that the common law position on this question was ambiguous. Consequently, the Court felt that it was appropriate to examine the provisions of the Convention to assist it in finding the ‘correct’ solution to the problem before it. Indeed, both Balcombe LJ and Butler Sloss LJ, while observing that the Convention was not formally part of domestic law, went so far as to say they considered it appropriate to ‘apply’ the case law of the ECtHR in this instance. On examining the ECtHR’s case law, the Court of Appeal concluded that allowing a local council to launch a libel action was an ‘unnecessary’ restriction on free expression.

This conclusion was reached in large part because the court considered that the council could deploy other legal remedies to defend its reputation. It would be possible, for example, for the council to initiate a criminal prosecution for libel. It might also begin an action in malicious falsehood. This tort is less helpful to plaintiffs than libel, as they must prove the falsity of the material published and that the publisher was motivated by ‘malice’ in disseminating it. Thirdly, the council’s reputation could be indirectly protected through a libel action begun by a councillor or officer libelled in the relevant story, who could evidently proceed on the same basis as a private individual.

The Court of Appeal had apparently misunderstood the implications of Art 10 by failing to draw a distinction between elected politicians and private individuals for libel law purposes. Its failure to do so was technically obiter rather than part of the ratio of the judgment, but the substance of the point was perfectly clear. The presumption that the Court had misconstrued Art 10 was strengthened by the ECtHR’s decision in Castells v Spain, delivered shortly after the Court of Appeal’s judgment in Derbyshire.

Developing the Lingens doctrine in the ECtHR: Castells v Spain (1992)

The applicant in *Castells v Spain*⁷³ was a member of the Spanish Senate. He had published articles in a Basque newspaper which accused ‘the government’ of complicity in violence against the Basque people. He was convicted under Art 162 of Spain’s criminal code, which made it a crime to ‘insult, falsely accuse or threaten the government’. Art 162 did not permit a defence of truth.

The Court accepted that the government had brought this action not to protect any person’s reputation, but to preserve public order—the Basque area was in considerable turmoil when the articles were published in 1979. The restraints ‘necessary’ to achieve this objective were more severe than those justified by the protection of reputation: criminal law sanctions could be imposed against untruths or accusations ‘formulated in bad faith’. However, if such sanctions were to comply with Art 10, the defendant had to have the chance (denied to Castells) to prove the truth of his claims and his good faith.

Like Lingens, Castells has no direct bearing on civil defamation law. But the conceptual framework surrounding the Court’s narrow holding was broadly framed. Thus the Court observed that:

[T]he pre-eminent role of the press in a State governed by the rule of law must not be forgotten...[F]reedom of the press affords the public one of the best means of discovering and forming an opinion on the ideas and attitudes of their political leaders.⁷⁴

⁷¹ See ‘Britain—a tort law perspective’, ch 18, pp 584–585 above.

⁷² [1992] QB 770, [1992] 3 All ER 65, CA.

⁷³ (1992) 14 EHRR 445. ⁷⁴ At para 43.

Building from this political presumption, the Court suggested that domestic legal systems had to recognise a tri-partite division within their defamation laws. The Court observed that ‘the limits of political criticism are wider with regard to government than in relation to a private citizen, or even a politician’.⁷⁵ This clearly implies that the ‘government’ qua corporate body must endure more criticism than a ‘politician’, who in turn must endure more than a private citizen. The Court of Appeal in Derbyshire correctly predicted the first part of the Castells formula, but seemed to neglect the second.

As will be suggested in chapter twenty, the common law has subsequently been amended in a manner which would seem to satisfy Art 10. For the present, however, we return to litigation in which the ECtHR held that English law on freedom of expression fell far short of the Convention’s requirements.

Contempt of court

The ECtHR’s judgment in *Sunday Times v United Kingdom*⁷⁶ case was eventually delivered in April 1979, almost six years after the House of Lords had upheld the injunction forbidding publication of the paper’s article on the thalidomide controversy.⁷⁷ The EComHR had concluded—albeit not unanimously—that the injunction had breached Art 10. The Court subsequently reached the same conclusion. There could be no doubt that the injunction had amounted to an interference with freedom of expression. The ECtHR also accepted without difficulty that the purposes served by the contempt jurisdiction were intended to promote one of the legitimate objectives identified in Art 10(2) to justify such interference—namely to protect ‘the authority and impartiality of the judiciary’.⁷⁸ The Court further accepted that the interference with free expression imposed by contempt of court met the ‘prescribed by law’ criterion of Art 10(2). As noted above, the Court’s formulation of that principle in this case now serves as the standard point of reference for its meaning. The outcome of the case turned on whether the grant of the injunction had been ‘necessary in a democratic society’.

In addressing this issue, the Court stressed that the nature of its jurisdiction in respect of Art 10 would vary according to which of the legitimate objectives identified in Art 10(2) was in issue. The approach to the margin of appreciation doctrine laid out in Handyside (ie that ‘State authorities are in principle in a better position than the international judge to give an opinion on the exact content of these requirements’)—was not appropriate in this case. The governmental interference with free expression under consideration in Handyside—a case involving obscenity—was pursued ‘for the protection of morals’. ‘Moral’ principles might legitimately vary substantially among the Signatory States. The ECtHR’s jurisdiction in such matters would be of a loosely supervisory kind. However, the Court reasoned that:

[T]he same cannot be said of the far more objective notion of the ‘authority’ of the judiciary. The domestic law and practice of the Contracting States reveal a fairly substantial measure of common ground in this area.... Accordingly, here a more extensive European supervision corresponds to a less discretionary power of appreciation.⁷⁹

⁷⁵ Ibid, para 46.

⁷⁶ (1979) 2 EHRR 245.

⁷⁷ See ‘Contempt of court’, ch 18, pp 580–583 above. The House of Lords had issued judgment on 25 July 1973.

⁷⁸ On this point, the ECtHR concluded that it was not relevant to ask if the litigation was dormant: ‘preventing interference with negotiations towards the settlement of a pending suit is no less legitimate an aim under Art 10(2) than preventing interference with a procedural situation in the strictly forensic sense’ (1979) 2 EHRR 245 at para 64.

⁷⁹ Ibid, at para 59.

To frame the matter rather differently, one might suggest that evaluating interferences with judicial authority was a far more ‘justiciable’ task than gauging moral standards.⁸⁰ In consequence, the Court could legitimately exercise a jurisdiction which came very close to being appellate rather than just supervisory in character. The ECtHR thus went on to make its own evaluation of the facts at issue in the litigation. The Court laid particular stress on what it regarded as the even-handed substance of the censored article, and doubted that so balanced a piece could in any meaningful sense prejudge the result of any trial.⁸¹ Perhaps more broadly, the Court observed that stories addressing important matters of public controversy ‘did not cease to be a matter of public interest merely because they formed the background to pending litigation’.⁸² Indeed, it was suggested that publication of The Sunday Times article could actually enhance rather than prejudice the conduct of any subsequent trial: ‘By bringing to light certain facts, the article might have served as a brake on speculative and unenlightened discussion’.⁸³

It is tempting to assume that the ECtHR reached a different conclusion from the House of Lords largely because the two courts adopted different analytical starting points. In the House of Lords, preserving the impartial administration of justice was the initial consideration. In the ECtHR, that value was assigned only secondary status, as a potential justification for an interference with the dominant value of freedom of expression.⁸⁴ It should however be noted that the Court’s judgment was an 11–9 majority verdict. This rather precludes the conclusion that the English law of contempt was ‘clearly’ incompatible with Art 10, and also emphasises the point that there is a certain contingency about the substance of the ECtHR’s jurisprudence. It would seem quite plausible to expect that the same issue could be decided quite differently within a few years simply as result of a change of personnel on the Strasbourg bench.

The judgment was accorded a mixed reception from British commentators. In a splendidly melodramatic critique, Mann condemned the majority’s reasoning as ‘diffuse and imprecise’,⁸⁵ and castigated the decision as: ‘[T]he gravest blow to the fabric of English law that has ever occurred’.⁸⁶ In Mann’s view, the judgment evidently posed an immediate threat to the integrity of the British legal system. One might note that Mann’s critique afforded no explicit significance to the public’s interest in reaching informed conclusions about the thalidomide saga, and offered the extraordinary suggestion that the House of Lords decision was perfectly consistent with the First Amendment.⁸⁷ Other commentators offered a more measured response.⁸⁸

⁸⁰ It might be suggested that this raises a ‘political’ question—not in the GCHQ sense of being non-justiciable—but in the sense which the ECtHR later emphasised in Lingens and Castells that freedom of expression on political/governmental issues (which would include judicial law-making) lies at the ‘core’ of Art 10, and thus any interference with it must be subject to exacting standards of review.

⁸¹ ‘The proposed Sunday Times article was couched in moderate terms and did not present just one side of the evidence or claim that there was only one result at which a court could arrive’: (1979) 2 EHR 245 at para 63.

⁸² Ibid., at para 66.

⁸³ Ibid.

⁸⁴ For a very detailed critique of the judgment see Duffy P (1980) ‘The Sunday Times case: freedom of expression, contempt of court and the European Convention on Human rights’ Human Rights Review 17.

⁸⁵ Mann F (1979) ‘Contempt of Court in the House of Lords and the European Court of Human Rights’ LQR 348.

⁸⁶ Ibid., at p 349.

⁸⁷ For a rather more sensible (and expert) view on that point see Nathanson N (1979/1980) ‘The Sunday Times case: freedom of the press and contempt of court under English law and the European Convention on Human Rights’ Kentucky Law Journal 972; noting at p 972: ‘the gulf between constitutional law of freedom of the press and the British common law on the same subject’.

⁸⁸ Cf Gray C (1979) ‘European Convention on Human Rights—freedom of expression and the thalidomide case’ Cambridge LJ 242 at p 245: ‘Perhaps this case will remind English courts of the potentially

The Contempt of Court Act 1981

Notwithstanding the potential ephemerality of the ECtHR's judgment—and the criticism it had attracted—the first Thatcher government moved promptly to bring domestic law into line with the ruling by promoting a Contempt of Court Bill in the Commons, which was enacted in 1981. The Bill was not wholly a response to the ECtHR's judgment; it was also intended to implement some of the recommendations of a Report on contempt of court, chaired by Phillimore LJ, which had conducted a general review of the contempt jurisdiction.⁸⁹

Section 2(2) of the Act addressed The Sunday Times judgment. It provided that contempt in respect of pressurising litigants or prejudging issues would only arise if a particular story created 'a substantial risk that the course of justice in the proceedings in question will be seriously impeded or prejudiced'. The Act also made it clear (in schedule 1) that in a civil action 'proceedings' were only occurring if a date had been set down for trial; if no date was set, proceedings would be 'dormant' and so no possibility of contempt could arise. A contemporary commentator suggested that s 2 did enhance press freedom in respect of issues such as the thalidomide controversy: '[T]he fact that the matter under discussion is one of legitimate public interest and concern and that the issues are addressed in a fair and balanced way will now weigh more strongly in favour of allowing publication, where previously these factors would have been discounted'.⁹⁰ Others were more sceptical. Lowe commented that, notwithstanding s 2(2): 'The Act nevertheless maintains the basic stance of the ultimate supremacy of the administration of justice over free speech, although it does attempt to shift the balance a little further in favour of the latter'.⁹¹ Lowe doubted that s 2(2) actually met the ECtHR's requirements. Given that the margin of appreciation doctrine—even when narrowly construed—grants states some appreciable discretion, that claim was perhaps overstated. But as we shall see below, the Act—or at least its interpretation by the House of Lords—was subsequently to prove an inadequate response to the ECtHR's interpretation of the Convention.

Blasphemy

Observers who assumed that Art 10 might protect freedom of expression to an extent closely comparable to that provided by the First Amendment in the USA would also have been dismayed by the outcome of the Lemon v United Kingdom litigation. Lemon's challenge to the House of Lords' judgment did not even reach the ECtHR: the Commission dismissed it as manifestly 'ill-founded'.⁹²

Lemon v United Kingdom (1982)

The Commission recognised that Lemon's conviction⁹³ interfered with the entitlement to freedom of expression, but it found little merit in the rest of his contentions. The EComHR embarrassing consequences of ignoring the existence of the ECHR and encourage in them a more constructive approach to its application'.

⁸⁹ (1974, Cmnd 5794). Phillimore LJ had sat in the Court of Appeal in A-G v Times Newspapers. For contemporaneous critiques of the Act see Lowe N (1981) 'Contempt of Court Act' Public Law 20; Boyle A (1981) 'The Contempt of Court Act 1981' Human Rights Review 148; Bailey S (1982) 'The Contempt of Court Act 1981' MLR 301.

⁹⁰ Boyle (1981) op cit p 148.

⁹¹ Lowe op cit p 28.

⁹² (1982) 5 EHRR 123.

⁹³ See 'Blasphemy' ff, ch 18, pp 578–580 above.

considered that blasphemy laws did pursue a legitimate Art 10(2) objective, namely the ‘protection of the rights of others’:

The Commission considers that the offence of blasphemous libel as it is construed under the applicable common law in fact has the main purpose to protect the right of citizens not to be offended in their religious feelings by publications.⁹⁴

This is an extremely expansive proposition, which simply endorses without question the common law presumption that Christians in the UK—unlike adherents to other religious faiths or atheists—need not endure scathing criticism of their beliefs, even if that criticism is published in a forum which it is unlikely that any of them will ever encounter in their day to day lives. This constitutes a markedly illiberal approach to the question of freedom of expression.

Lemon’s argument under Art 10 rested in part on the contention that the crime of blasphemy was too imprecisely defined to be ‘prescribed by law’. The Commission rejected this argument. While the fact that the House of Lords’ judgment had been divided three-to-two indicated that the law was somewhat uncertain, the Commission concluded that the majority judgment: ‘did not go beyond the limits of a reasonable interpretation of the existing law’—the decision was: ‘reasonably foreseeable with the assistance of appropriate legal advice’.⁹⁵ That would seem a largely uncontentious conclusion. Much more problematic, in contrast, was the Commission’s conclusion on the final stage of its inquiry—was the law of blasphemy ‘necessary in a democratic society’?

The EComHR’s views on this point were evidently determined by its earlier conclusion that the law pursued a legitimate objective:

If it is accepted that the religious feelings of the citizen may deserve protection against indecent attacks on the matters held sacred by him, then it can also be considered as necessary in a democratic society to stipulate that such attacks, if they attain a certain level of severity, shall constitute a criminal offence at the request of the offended person.⁹⁶

There is little independent logical force to the Commission’s argument on this point. It seemed to rest wholly on the twin propositions that because Mary Whitehouse was so offended by the poem, and because the judges considered the poem blasphemous, the law was necessary. That Whitehouse may have been unduly sensitive, or ideologically intolerant, or a religious zealot, were not matters that the Commission addressed. Nor did it entertain the point that the absence of blasphemy prosecutions in the fifty years prior to Lemon indicated that the law was obsolescent. In effect, the Commission was extending an extremely wide margin of appreciation to the UK on this point, with the result that its own jurisdiction was clearly perceived as supervisory in the most relaxed (perhaps comatose) of forms, and could in no sense be seen as involving quasi-appellate functions.

It might readily be thought that the legitimate objective which the Commission upheld in Lemon—namely that Christian sensibilities should not be offended—is very difficult to reconcile with the principle subsequently outlined by the ECtHR in Spycatcher; namely that freedom of expression extends ‘not only to “information” or “ideas” that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb’.⁹⁷ The reasoning deployed in Lemon would suggest that the Art 10(1) entitlement to publish and receive information and ideas which ‘offend’ others is trumped by those others’ Art 10(2) entitlement not to be offended. One cannot of ⁹⁴ Ibid, at para 11.

⁹⁵ Ibid, at para 10.

⁹⁶ Ibid, at para 12.

⁹⁷ Observer and Guardian v United Kingdom (1991) 14 EHRR 153 at para 59.

course—unless one adheres to a ludicrously formalistic notion of law—publish ‘offensive’ material if nobody is offended by it.

A further point that was not specifically addressed by the Commission in Lemon was whether blasphemy should be seen as ‘political/public interest’ speech in the sense to which the ECtHR subsequently alluded in Lingens. The irresistible inference to be drawn from this omission is that the Commission did not consider that blasphemy raised political questions at all, but simply moral ones. Quite how one draws the line between ‘political’ and ‘moral’ is unclear, but one might have thought the divide was particularly obscure in the British context, given the privileged legal status enjoyed by the Church of England.⁹⁸

Otto-Preminger Institute v Austria (1994) and Wingrove v United Kingdom (1996)

Twelve years later, in Otto-Preminger Institute v Austria,⁹⁹ the ECtHR confirmed both that religious speech was not ‘political’ speech in the Lingens sense, and that the entitlements of citizens who wished to publish or consume religiously offensive material could indeed be subordinated to the interest of adherents to the particular religion not being offended.

The applicant was an arts organisation located in Innsbruck, Austria. The Institute had arranged to exhibit a movie, Das Liebeskonzil, which presented a forceful attack on the Catholic church. A very substantial majority of citizens in the Institute’s area were practising Catholics, and the state authorities took the view that showing the movie would both cause grave offence to such people and raise the possibility of public order offences. The film was therefore banned under Austria’s blasphemy laws, and the Institute’s copy of it was seized and destroyed.

The ECtHR found no breach of Art 10 on these facts. At the core of its judgment lay the proposition that Art 10’s protection would not extend to expression that did ‘not contribute to any form of public debate capable of furthering progress in human affairs’.¹⁰⁰ Das Liebeskonzil evidently fell into this pariah category of expression, and could thus be banned entirely. The Court drew a distinction between offensive attacks on political issues (presumptively of some value) and those addressing religious questions (presumptively worthless):

Whereas there is little scope for restrictions on political speech or on debate of questions of public interest... a wider margin of appreciation is generally available to the Contracting States when regulating freedom of expression in relation to matters liable to offend intimate personal convictions within the field of morals or, especially, religion.¹⁰¹

The Court’s insistence on ‘depoliticising’ religious belief seems rather myopic in this situation, given that such beliefs are likely to exercise a considerable influence on political issues. It is a formalistic rather than functionally-based differentiation. The judgment has been subjected to a compelling critique by Warbrick, who suggests that it ‘makes an unfortunate collapse of the nature of the expression in issue and the justification for interfering with it’.¹⁰² In particular, Warbrick observes that the Court has been less than astute in appreciating the ‘political’ or ‘public interest’ dimension of ideological attacks on the supposed sanctity of (some) religious sentiment.

⁹⁸ For a happily unsuccessful attempt to extend the intolerance of the blasphemy laws to non-Christian religions in the wake of the publication of Salman Rushdie’s satirical novel, The Satanic Verses, see Modood T (1990) ‘British Asian muslims and the Rushdie affair’ Political Quarterly 143; R v Chief Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Choudhury [1991] 1 QB 429, [1991] 1 All ER 306; Choudhury v United Kingdom (1991) 12 Human Rights LJ 74.

¹⁰⁰ Ibid., para 49.

¹⁰¹ Ibid., at para 58.

¹⁰² (1998) op cit p 189.

⁹⁹ (1994) 19 EHRR 34.

The Court's decision was by a six-to-three majority. The three dissentients took particular issue with the majority's suggestion that some ideas were per se incapable 'of furthering progress in human affairs'. To allow a state to impose that opinion: 'could be detrimental to that tolerance on which pluralist democracy depends'.¹⁰³ The ratio of the dissent was however rather timid, resting primarily on the fact that the Institute had taken steps to ensure that the film was not seen by young people or those with strongly held Catholic beliefs.

The Court endorsed its decision in Otto-Preminger in its 1996 judgment in Wingrove v United Kingdom.¹⁰⁴ Wingrove was a movie director, who had made a short video entitled Visions of Ecstasy. The film was either—depending upon your moral sensibilities—a bravely satirical attempt to challenge the misogyny of the Catholic church or a piece of soft pornography. Its main image was of a young woman having sex with Jesus Christ during his crucifixion, interspersed with scenes in which the same woman was undressed and caressed by another female character. Mr Wingrove was not subjected to a prosecution for blasphemy, but the government body responsible for licensing videos for sale (the Video Appeals Committee) refused to grant a certificate for Visions of Ecstasy, on the grounds that it was blasphemous. The Committee relied on R v Lemon as its guide to the law on this issue.

By a 10–2 majority, the EComHR held that Mr Wingrove's challenge to the VAC's refusal was admissible. The Commission concluded that the complete ban on sale of the movie was not 'necessary in a democratic society'. Its primary reason for reaching this decision was that the video could have been licensed for sale solely in specialised outlets, selling only 'adult' films. In such circumstances, the film was unlikely to be seen by children or members of the public generally. This would evidently distinguish the case from Lemon, since Gay News was on sale in all kinds of non-specialist outlets.

Only two members of the Court supported the Commission's conclusion. The majority, having stressed that states retained a substantial margin of appreciation in such cases, felt there was nothing 'arbitrary or excessive' about the VAC's refusal to licence the film. It was unimpressed by the EComHR's suggestion that the video could have been restricted for sale in specialist shops, noting that the film could subsequently have been resold into general circulation.

Lemon, Otto-Preminger and Wingrove offer a line of authority which graphically illustrates the limits of the Convention as a guarantor of effective human rights protection.¹⁰⁵ The cases make a nonsense of the evidently robust principle articulated by the Court in Spycatcher. The jurisprudential sentiment they embody is best expressed by the following passage from Wingrove, in which the Court outlined the principle that would inform its reasoning on whether the UK's blasphemy laws were 'necessary in a democratic society':

The Court recalls that freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society. As para 2 of Art 10 expressly recognises, however, the exercise of that freedom carries with it duties and responsibilities. Amongst them, in the context of religious beliefs, may legitimately be included a duty to avoid as far as possible an expression that is, in regard to objects of veneration, gratuitously offensive to others and profanatory.¹⁰⁶

The poverty of the ECtHR's ambition in this respect, and the consequent feebleness of its jurisprudence, provide perhaps the most compelling of rebuttals to any of those opponents of incorporating the Convention into UK law whose case rested on the argument

¹⁰³ (1994) 19 EHRR 34 at 61.

¹⁰⁴ (1996) 24 EHRR 1.

¹⁰⁵ See Warbrick (1998) op cit: Ghandi S and James J (1998) 'The English law of blasphemy and the European Convention on Human Rights' European Human Rights LR 430.

¹⁰⁶ Ibid, at para 52.

that the ECtHR would impose alien cultural values on our domestic law. Indeed, in respect of blasphemy the domestic courts and Parliament showed themselves to be a better protector of freedom of expression than the ECtHR. The offence was abolished by s 79 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008.¹⁰⁷ The rationale adopted by the House of Lords in Lemon had been substantially undermined by the High Court's judgment in R (on the application of Green) v City of Westminster Magistrates' Court.¹⁰⁸ The applicant, a Mr Stephen Green, was the director of a pressure group called Christian Voice. He took exception to the BBC's decision to transmit a broadcast of a scurrilous musical, Jerry Springer; the Opera, which had been running in a London theatre for a couple of years. The show was notably more offensive in its tone and content than the poem at issue in Lemon. The High Court however concluded it was not blasphemous by focusing on an element of the offence which had been rather overlooked in Lemon in the House of Lords:

5 This development of the law of criminal blasphemous libel was carefully traced by Roskill L.J. when R. v Lemon was in the Court of Appeal, [1979] Q.B. 10, in an analysis which received clear endorsement when the case reached the House of Lords. Roskill L.J. observed (at 18G): 'The state only became interested in the offence if the actions of the alleged offender affected the safety of the state...'

16 There is therefore ample basis for the common ground before us that the gist of the crime of blasphemous libel is material relating to the Christian religion, or its figures or formularies, so scurrilous and offensive in manner that it undermines society generally, by endangering the peace, depraving public morality, shaking the fabric of society or tending to be a cause of civil strife...'. What is necessary to make such material a crime is that the community (or society) generally should be threatened. This element will not be shown merely because some people of particular sensibility are, because deeply offended, moved to protest.

The Court took the view that the fabric of British society was sufficiently robust not to be 'shaken' by a rude play and so no offence had been committed, notwithstanding the damage to Mr Green's sensibilities. Gordon Brown's Labour government subsequently considered that the judgment effectively made the offence entirely obsolete, and promoted the s 79 provision shortly thereafter.¹⁰⁹

Conclusion

Despite the UK's evidently mixed record before the ECtHR on freedom of expression issues, it was not uncommon in the early-1990s to encounter judicial pronouncements that the common law and the Convention bestowed identical levels of civil liberties protection on British citizens. A typical example is Lord Goff's comment in A-G v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (Spycatcher) (No 2):

I can see no inconsistency between English law on this subject and art 10... This is scarcely surprising, since we pride ourselves on the fact that freedom of speech has existed in this country perhaps as long as, if not longer than, it has existed in any other country in the world.¹¹⁰

¹⁰⁷ The provision is admirably succinct:

79 Abolition of common law offences of blasphemy and blasphemous libel

(1) The offences of blasphemy and blasphemous libel under the common law of England and Wales are abolished.

¹⁰⁸ [2007] EWHC 2785 (Admin), [2008] EMLR 15.

¹⁰⁹ See Sandberg R and Doe N (2008) 'The strange death of blasphemy' Modern LR 971–986.

¹¹⁰ [1990] 1 AC 109 at 283, HL.

Such protestations would seem poorly based. Spycatcher was decided in the same way both in the House of Lords and the ECtHR, as was Wingrove, but there is little doubt that the Court of Appeal's judgment in Derbyshire was irreconcilable with Lingens. This spasmodic rather than pervasive consistency between domestic law and Art 10 is reinforced if one contrasts Brind with the Morgan Grampian/Goodwin litigation.

Mr Brind's efforts to raise his case before the ECtHR did not even win the approval of the Commission. In July 1994, the Commission concluded that Brind's application was ill-founded. Even if—and the Commission seemed to have doubts on this point—the government's policy amounted to an interference with freedom of expression, that interference was undoubtedly in pursuit of a legitimate objective, it was prescribed by law, and it was necessary in a democratic society. That the policy was just plain silly did not seem to found an Art 10 claim.¹¹¹ The Commission's conclusion was perhaps surprising, but it did perform the useful function of suggesting that advocates of incorporating the Convention overestimated its capacity to forbid government behaviour which impinged upon freedom of expression, while opponents of incorporation had a similarly exaggerated view of the extent to which it would impinge upon the sovereignty of Parliament and the autonomy of the government.

The Goodwin case, in contrast, revealed a substantial (if not obviously predictable) divergence between UK law and Art 10.¹¹² Mr Goodwin was a journalist, working for The Engineer, a specialist trade magazine. Goodwin was provided with some sensitive financial information about a firm Tetra (the 'X' in the case name) by a source who must have been either a disloyal Tetra employee or a thief who had stolen the information. Goodwin then wrote an article about the firm, drawing on the leaked information. Before The Engineer published any story, Tetra successfully applied to the High Court for an injunction preventing publication. Tetra also sought a court order requiring the publishers and Mr Goodwin to identify their source.

Prior to 1981, the question of whether a court could order a journalist to reveal her sources had been a matter of common law. The courts accepted that competing interests might be at stake in such circumstances. An order to disclose could have a 'chilling effect'—much like the threat of a libel action—on press freedom, in so far as sources might not come forward in future and so potentially valuable stories might not be written. That interest would of course be particularly strong in respect of leaked information revealing criminal behaviour, or unethical or incompetent activities by government bodies. On the other hand, allowing the press to keep their sources secret could mean that a firm like Tetra (X) would have to continue to operate knowing that it may be employing a disloyal employee, and that none of its operations (which may be wholly legal and ethical) could be kept secret from commercial rivals.

In British Steel Corpn v Granada Television Ltd, decided in 1980,¹¹³ the House of Lords ordered Granada to identify the source who had provided it with 250 confidential BSC documents. BSC, then a state-owned industry, was in the throes of major industrial action by its workers. It had for many years been making vast operating losses. The leaked documents charted major incompetence within the firm, and revealed that the Thatcher government—contrary to its public protestations—was taking covert steps to assist BSC to break the strike. Granada argued that the documents concerned a matter of acute public interest, and that an order to disclose its source would have the effect of deterring comparable leaks in future, with the result that the public would be denied access to important political information.

¹¹¹ For a critical comment see Pannick D 'No logic behind gagging terrorists' empty rhetoric' The Times, 2 August 1994.

¹¹² X Ltd v Morgan-Grampian (Publishers) Ltd [1991] 1 AC 1, [1990] 2 All ER 1, HL.

¹¹³ [1981] AC 1096.

The High Court, Court of Appeal and four members of the House of Lords rejected this argument.¹¹⁴ In a manner that foreshadowed the Court of Appeal's decision in Blackshaw v Lord a few years later,¹¹⁵ the majority in the House of Lords failed to see any 'political' or 'constitutional' issue at stake in the case. As Lord Wilberforce put it: 'this case does not touch on freedom of the press even at its periphery'.¹¹⁶ His sentiment was echoed by Lord Russell: 'this case has not even marginal connection with any concept of "the freedom of the press"'.¹¹⁷

The principle on which the majority decided the case was framed in the following way. Newspapers, television stations and journalists 'have no immunity based on public interest which protects them from the obligation to disclose in a court of law their sources of information, when such disclosure is necessary in the interest of justice'.¹¹⁸ While such a public interest might arise in respect of information exposing criminality or wrongdoing, no such activities were in issue here. All that was at stake was the continued confidentiality of commercially sensitive information. The 'interest of justice'—namely that BSC not be subjected to breaches of confidentiality or thefts—therefore demanded that the source be revealed.

Lord Salmon issued a powerful and wholly convincing dissent. He started from the premise that this case was primarily about the freedom of the press, and especially about the public's interest in knowing about huge mismanagement of public funds by a state-owned industry. BSC was as much a governmental body as a commercial enterprise. He thus had no difficulty in concluding that Granada need not disclose its source:

The freedom of the press depends on this immunity. Were it to disappear, so would the sources from which [press] information is obtained; and the public would be deprived of much of the information to which the public of a free nation is entitled.¹¹⁹

Section 10 of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 ostensibly attempted to strengthen press protection in such circumstances by replacing the common law rule with a new statutory formula. The presumption would be against disclosure unless disclosure was 'necessary in the interests of justice or national security or for the prevention of disorder or crime'. Whether s 10 actually modified the BSC decision is debatable;¹²⁰ much would obviously depend on the way the new provision was interpreted. As noted in the previous discussion of the Tisdall case, s 10 was not being lent an expansive definition in the mid-1980s.¹²¹

The X v Morgan-Grampian case seemed to lack the 'political' or 'constitutional' overtones of either BSC or the Tisdall episode. In contrast to its decision in BSC, the House of Lords clearly recognised that the case did raise freedom of expression questions, even if no 'political' information was in issue. It also indicated—the point is put most clearly by ¹¹⁴ The cases are reported together at [1981] AC 1096.

¹¹⁵ See 'Britain—a tort law perspective', ch 18, p 584 above. ¹¹⁶ [1981] AC 1096] at 1168.

¹¹⁷ Ibid., at 1203. ¹¹⁸ Ibid., at 1169; per Lord Wilberforce.

¹¹⁹ Ibid., at 475.

¹²⁰ Cf Boyle (1981) op cit p 149: 'the section appears to do no more than adopt the very test employed by the majority judgments in [BSC]'.
¹²¹ See 'The Tisdall (1984 and 1985) and Ponting (1985) cases', ch 18, pp 573–574 above.

Lord Bridge—that it accepted that s 10 had tipped the balance in favour of maintaining the confidentiality of press sources:

In this balancing exercise it is only if the judge is satisfied that disclosure in the interests of justice is of such preponderating importance as to override the statutory privilege against disclosure that the necessity will be reached.¹²²

On these facts, there was no obvious public interest in disclosure of the relevant information, while the continued presence of a potential leaker within Tetra posed an acute and serious problem for the company. It thus seems unobjectionable from a human rights perspective that Morgan-Grampian and Mr Goodwin were ordered to disclose their source. Mr Goodwin—who had not revealed the source to his employers—chose not to comply with the court order. He was thus fined £5,000 for contempt. While this was an unfortunate consequence for Mr Goodwin—and while one might admire his (in the Court's view misguided) determination to respect his source's confidentiality¹²³—the judgment need not have any 'chilling effect' on sources providing political or public interest information; it can be seen as limited solely to cases involving purely 'private' information.

Lord Bridge's methodology in X v Morgan-Grampian has obvious similarities to the ECtHR's approach to Art 10 claims. It was perhaps therefore something of a surprise that Mr Goodwin's subsequent Art 10 action before the ECtHR was successful.¹²⁴ The Court adopted an essentially appellate role in remaking the balancing equation that the House of Lords had conducted. On the Court's view of the facts, Tetra's interest in uncovering the identity of the leaker/thief did not outweigh 'the vital public interest in the protection of the applicant's journalist's source'.¹²⁵ The House of Lords' order—and Mr Goodwin's subsequent committal for contempt—therefore breached Art 10.

Goodwin is a manifestly unsatisfactory decision, marred by the ECtHR's peculiar failure—given the position it had staked out in Lingens and Castells—to draw any distinction between different types of information. Had it respected the 'core status' of political speech identified in those two cases, its judgment would presumably have approved the House of Lords' decision since there was no 'political' element to Tetra's internal financial secrets. One could hardly cast any blame on the English courts for failing to conform with Art 10 on this point, since the ECtHR seemed to go markedly further than its previous case law would suggest was possible.

Even if one were to accept that proposition that domestic law on freedom of expression issues was generally in conformity with the Convention in the early-1990s, it was certainly arguable that the protection thereby obtained often fell far short of that provided in the USA by the First Amendment. On this issue at least, the Convention did not set particularly exacting civil liberties standards. It was nonetheless the case that by this time the Convention had become a quite 'normal' ingredient of domestic administrative law—albeit in a context in which 'normalcy' meant it enjoyed only a limited effect. In chapter twenty, our attention turns to the way in which the constitution's approach to the issue of civil liberties and human rights has altered in the past fifteen to twenty years; an alteration which while falling some way short of a 'revolution', has nonetheless involved evolution at an unusually rapid pace and lent that 'normalcy' a rather different—and initially constitutionally problematic—character.

¹²² [1991] 1 AC 1 at 44, HL.

¹²³ Cf Lord Bridge, ibid, at 49: 'To contend that the individual litigant, be he a journalist or anyone else, has a right of "conscientious objection" which entitles him to set himself above the law if he does not agree with the court's decision, is a doctrine which undermines the rule of law and is wholly unacceptable in a democratic society'.

¹²⁵ Ibid, at para 45.

¹²⁴ (1996) 22 EHRR 123.

Suggested further reading

Academic and political commentary

- Hunt M (1997) Using human rights law in English courts chs 1 and 4
- Duffy P (1980) 'The Sunday Times case: freedom of expression, contempt of court and the ECHR' Human Rights Review 17
- Jones T (1996) 'The devaluation of human rights under the European Convention' Public Law 430
- Sandberg R and Doe N (2008) 'The strange death of blasphemy' Modern LR 971–986
- Warbrick C (1998) 'Federalism and free speech', in Loveland I (ed) Importing the First Amendment
- Ghandi S and James J (1998) 'The English law of blasphemy and the European Convention on Human Rights' European Human Rights LR 430
- Leigh I (1992) 'Spycatcher in Strasbourg' Public Law 200

Case law and legislation

- Mortensen v Peters* (1906) 14 SLT 227
- Birdi v Secretary of State for Home Affairs* (1975) 119 Sol Jo 322
- Malone v United Kingdom* (1984) 7 EHRR 14
- Laskey, Jaggard and Brown v United Kingdom* (1997) 24 EHRR 39
- Observer and Guardian v United Kingdom* (1991) 14 EHRR 153
- Handyside v United Kingdom* (1976) 1 EHRR 737
- Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers* [1992] QB 700; (CA)
- Lingens v Austria* (1986) 8 EHRR 407
- Lemon v United Kingdom* (1982) 5 EHRR 123

Chapter 20

Human Rights III: New Substantive Grounds of Review

That United Kingdom law was so frequently found to have breached the Convention by the ECtHR is explained in large part by the fact that the Convention could not be applied directly by domestic courts; it became a relevant factor only in circumstances where statutory provisions or common law rules were ambiguous. If Parliament had enacted a statute which gave the provisions of the Convention a superior status to common law rules, and/or to delegated legislation, and/or to previously enacted statutes, many cases which eventually reached the ECtHR would have been resolved within the UK. It is entirely likely that some national law would have been held to have breached the Convention; but those outcomes would have been produced by judgments of domestic courts, not the ECtHR.

Such judgments would not have been enforcing the Convention directly, but would rather have been applying the statute through which the Convention had been given domestic legal effect. An ‘incorporation’ statute of that sort would not of course have challenged the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty. The courts would still have been required to apply the terms of any subsequently enacted legislation which was inconsistent with any of the ‘incorporated’ provisions of the Convention.

Members of the House of Lords frequently promoted private members’ Bills from 1970 onwards which were intended to give (varying types of) domestic legal effect to the ECHR. Some Bills proposed unambiguously supra-legislative, entrenched status for the Convention. That would obviously be, from an orthodox perspective, a futile exercise. An alternative scenario was that an incorporating statute should seek to protect Convention rights from implied, but not express repeal. This too would not seem to have been possible in a legal sense at that time. The most modest proposals envisaged only that some of the provisions of the Convention should be used as additional grounds of review in administrative law, which would have been an achievable objective in an abstract doctrinal sense, with no binding effect on Parliament. These initiatives invariably triggered brief media interest in the question of fundamental rights, and as such exemplify the House of Lords’ (qua legislative chamber) useful role as a forum for debate on issues of public concern. No such Bill, however, even came close to being enacted.¹ In the early-1990s, several senior judges in their academic writings also suggested that Parliament should enact legislation which would give some elements of the Convention the status of statutory grounds of review.² The Liberal Party had long been committed to incorporation in this sense, and by the mid-1990s the Labour Party (under the leadership of John Smith and then Tony Blair) also accepted this position.

¹ See Bailey, Harris and Jones (1992) op cit pp 19–20.

I. Judicial incorporation of the Convention?

Advocates of giving domestic legal effect to the ECHR had consistently assumed that it could only be achieved through legislation, whether as an isolated instance of constitutional reform or as part of a broader process of political restructuring. As a matter of strict legal theory however, there was never any impediment to the House of Lords (qua final court of appeal) concluding (as Lord Denning had hinted at in Birdi)³ that the Convention should be construed, de jure, as an authoritative source of law, binding on all executive bodies and directly effective in British courts. Nor, in terms of legal theory, was it beyond the power of the courts to conclude that the common law (including principles of statutory interpretation) had evolved in a way which made its substantive content compatible with some or all of the Convention's provisions.

The Convention in domestic law

As suggested in chapters two and four, the formal rule that treaties have no binding force in domestic law until incorporated by legislation had an obvious functional basis in 1688. In the absence of such a rule, the Crown could have overridden legislation by using its prerogative powers to undertake international obligations. Affording treaties binding legal status would have subverted a revolutionary settlement which supposedly established the supremacy of Parliament vis-à-vis the Crown. That functional basis does not exist in the modern era. The fusion of the executive and legislative branches, coupled with the consolidation of the party system, has meant that in general the government effectively controls the legislature. 'Parliament' thus has no need of judicial protection against executive law-making in the international law arena in the way that it had in the immediate post-revolutionary era.

There is a subsidiary justification for the rule. This derives from the courts' historical deference to the personal prerogatives of the Monarch. The point was clearly expressed in the 1876 case of Rustomjee v R, by Lord Coleridge CJ, who observed that 'as in making the treaty, so in performing the treaty, [the Queen] is beyond the control of municipal law, and her acts are not to be examined in her own courts'.⁴ Rustomjee was quoted approvingly by Lord Denning in Blackburn v A-G,⁵ and identified as the source of the traditional rule.

However, there were obvious flaws, both intrinsic and contextual, in adhering to this reasoning in the 1990s. In 1876, given Queen Victoria's manifest reluctance to acknowledge the process of democratisation which the constitution was undergoing,⁶ it was conceivable to assume that the Monarch played a significant role in influencing the Treaty terms to which her government adhered. To suggest that the present Monarch does so is a non-

² Scarman L (1987) 'Human rights in an unwritten constitution' Denning LJ 129; Bingham T (1993) 'The European Convention on Human Rights: time to incorporate' LQR 393.

³ See 'A sudden—short-lived—legal shift?', ch 19, p 597 above.

⁴ (1876) 2 QBD 69 at 74, CA.

⁵ See 'Parliamentary sovereignty: a non-justiciable concept?', ch 11, p 370 above.

⁶ See "'On the advice of her Ministers'?" The conventional "democratization" of the personal prerogatives', ch 9, p 269 above.

sense; as Lord Roskill observed in GCHQ in response to the argument that the Monarch personally had abrogated her civil servants' rights of trade union membership: 'To talk of that act as the act of the sovereign savours of the archaism of past centuries.'⁷ Archaism has no greater validity in respect of foreign policy than of employment conditions.

The intrinsic flaw lies in the fact that the Rustomjee rationale conflates the two quite distinct issues of the government's power to conclude a treaty and that treaty's subsequent impact in domestic law. The first issue is essentially non-justiciable in nature. Whether it is advantageous for this country to accept a particular set of obligations vis-à-vis other countries is a political question in the broadest sense; it is not an issue for judicial determination. However, where those obligations are expressed in terms of legal rules, and are purportedly intended to bestow legal rights on individual citizens, they are manifestly justiciable in character.

This elision of discrete phenomena was nevertheless restated by Lord Oliver in 1989 in Maclaine Watson & Co Ltd v Department of Trade and Industry:

A treaty is not part of English law until it has been incorporated into the law by legislation... [I]t is outside the purview of the court [ie unenforceable] not only because it is made in the conduct of foreign relations, which are a prerogative of the crown, but also because as a source of rights and obligations, it is irrelevant.⁸

The reasoning in the final clauses of Lord Oliver's quotation is completely tautological; the court cannot enforce a treaty because it is irrelevant to the domestic legal issue before it, and it is irrelevant because the court will not enforce it. Irrelevance and unenforceability are just different names for the same concept. The pertinent question is to ask why treaties are irrelevant/unenforceable? Lord Oliver's evident answer—namely that a treaty is an exercise of the 'foreign relations' prerogative—is not convincing in the post-GCHQ era. As suggested in Everrett,⁹ 'foreign relations' is a blanket term which covers a wide range of both justiciable and non-justiciable issues. The question of whether a government body has contravened the Convention in its dealings with a citizen is no less justiciable than the question of whether a passport has been withheld on unlawful grounds.

The traditional rule is thus reduced to one based on pure formalism. The Convention (or any other treaty) is not enforceable in domestic courts because its source lies in an exercise of the prerogative rather than statute. There is no doubt that the nature of the Convention (in contrast perhaps to the contents of many other treaties) is eminently justiciable: its meaning is found in the judgments of the ECtHR. If the traditional rule was no more than a common law presumption, the House of Lords would have been competent to reverse it, and to have concluded that courts should now presume that a treaty whose terms are justiciable and intended to bestow rights and obligations upon individual citizens would be part of domestic law once ratified by the government until such time as Parliament says it is not.

In conceptual terms, that conclusion would be no more radical than the ones taken in GCHQ or Pepper v Hart. In all three cases the court is simply giving legal expression to the obvious political fact that the government is generally the dominant actor on the constitutional stage, and as such should expect all its justiciable actions to be subject to the High Court's supervisory jurisdiction unless Parliament ousts that jurisdiction in the most explicit of terms. Nor would judicial incorporation infringe upon Parliament's legal sovereignty. That challenge would only arise if a government subsequently convinced

⁷ [1985] AC 374 at 418, HL.

⁸ Popularly known as The International Tin Council case [1990] 2 AC 418 at 500, HL.

⁹ See 'Foreign affairs?', ch 4, pp 109–110 above.

Parliament to enact legislation which explicitly forbade the domestic courts from applying the Convention and the courts refused to obey it: in that event, we would indeed be in a 'revolutionary' situation. Judicial incorporation de jure of the Convention would have been unexpected, unorthodox, and even perhaps so unconventional that many observers would have considered it unconstitutional. But it is difficult to sustain the argument that it would have been illegal.

It would however seem that a domestic court determined to allow its judgments to be shaped by the law of the Convention could often achieve that result, if only episodically, in rather less speculative ways. As noted in chapter twelve, the ECJ has embraced the idea that the provisions of the Convention are analogous to the 'fundamental human rights' contained in the EC's 'general principles of law'.¹⁰ The Member States declined to incorporate the Convention into Community law de jure at either Maastricht or Amsterdam. Nevertheless, the TEU's preamble offers explicit support for the ECJ's more circuitous approach to the same end:

The Union shall respect fundamental rights, as guaranteed by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights... and as they result from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, as general principles of Community law.¹¹

This has significant implications for British courts, in so far as it would seem to oblige them (post-Factortame) to disapply any domestic statutory or common law provision (in an area within the EC's competence) which could not be construed to comply with the Convention.¹² This development does not of course answer the methodological question of how any EC law obligation has assumed such 'special' constitutional status within the UK, but its substantive impact seems uncontentious.¹³ A question of greater interest arises when one wonders whether the alleged 'ripple effect' of EC law would carry with it into matters purely of domestic law some or all of the Convention's legal principles, or indeed, if the ECtHR's jurisprudence possesses its own 'ripple effect'. If this were to have happened, it would have entailed at the least a radical alteration of accepted common law principles and thence of techniques of statutory interpretation, and could, if enthusiastically embraced by the courts, have provided a moral launch pad for more far-reaching redefinition of orthodox constitutional understandings.

II. The (re-)emergence and consolidation of fundamental human rights as an indigenous principle of common law

Constraints of space preclude any systematic analysis in this book of judicial use of human rights principles in the area of administrative law since 1990.¹⁴ The following section focuses instead on several leading decisions in which the courts appeared to recognise that the common law contained a significant and as yet under-explored capacity to mirror the moral principles contained in the Convention.

¹⁰ 'An analytical overview: 'normative' and 'decisional' supra-nationalism' ch 11, pp 384–385 above.

¹¹ TEU, Art F(2) TEU.

¹² See the development of this argument by Grief N (1991) 'The domestic impact of the ECHR as mediated through Community law' Public Law 555; and Lord Browne-Wilkinson (1992) 'The infiltration of a Bill of Rights' Public Law 397.

¹³ See Grief op cit; Browne-Wilkinson op cit.

¹⁴ See on that issue Hunt M (1997) Using human rights law in English courts.

Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers Ltd in the House of Lords

Lord Keith delivered the leading judgment in the Lords. Unlike the judges in the Court of Appeal,¹⁵ he did not either ‘apply’ the Convention, nor resort to judgments of the ECtHR to resolve a common law ‘ambiguity’. Lord Keith considered the common law quite clear. There was no ambiguity: Bognor Regis UDC v Champion had simply been wrongly decided:

[N]ot only is there no public interest favouring the right of organs of government, whether central or local, to sue for libel, but it is contrary to the public interest that they should have it... because to admit such actions would place an undesirable fetter on freedom of speech.¹⁶

In reaching this conclusion, Lord Keith had focused on the function served by criticism of government in a modern democratic society. He thought this purpose was best described by Lord Bridge in Hector v A-G of Antigua and Barbuda:

[T]hose... responsible for public administration must always be open to criticism. Any attempt to stifle or fetter such criticism amounts to political censorship of the most insidious and objectionable kind... [T]he very purpose of criticism... is to undermine public confidence in their stewardship and to persuade the electorate that the opponents would make a better job of it than those presently holding office.¹⁷

Lord Keith found further support for his perception of the requisite ‘public policy’ concerns in several United States’ decisions, primarily *City of Chicago v Tribune Co*¹⁸ and New York Times v Sullivan.¹⁹

Lord Keith’s concern was obviously to remove an undesirable fetter on free speech. As such, his judgment can readily be seen as enhancing the protection afforded to freedom of expression.²⁰ However, on closer reading, both the substance of the judgment and the methodology that underpinned it are flawed. The substantive problems are twofold. Firstly, like the Court of Appeal, Lord Keith placed no additional barriers in the path of libel actions brought by elected politicians. This omission provided an obvious route to sidestep the ratio of the judgment. Secondly, the ratio itself is problematic, as indeed is that of the Chicago judgment on which Lord Keith relied. A complete ban on libel actions initiated by government bodies provides the press and political parties with a perverse incentive to tell deliberate lies on political matters; that is knowingly and wilfully to mislead voters. If one’s primary concern when addressing freedom of expression issues concerning political matters is to promote informed consent, such an incentive may well prove counter-productive.

The methodological flaw lies in the House of Lords’ evident failure to appreciate the subtle question of balance between encouraging the circulation of information and restricting the circulation of misinformation that the US Supreme Court struck in Sullivan. The judgment seems to have been read rather simplistically, and used to underpin propositions which it did not really support. This raises a danger of general application when civil liberties questions are in issue in domestic law; namely that courts may invoke authorities

¹⁵ See ‘Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers (1992) in the Court of Appeal’, ch 19, pp 603–604 above.

¹⁶ [1993] AC 534 at 549.
¹⁷ [1990] 2 AC 312 at 318, PC. The case is incisively analysed in Bradley A (1990) ‘Press freedom, governmental constraints and the Privy Council’ Public Law 453.

¹⁸ 139 NE 86 (1923); ‘The USA—a constitutional law perspective’, ch 18, pp 583–585 above.

¹⁹ 376 US 254 (1964); ‘Political libels’, ch 18, pp 583–584 above.

²⁰ For so long, of course, as Parliament chose not to overrule the judgment through legislation.

from other jurisdictions to buttress innovative common law developments without properly appreciating the reasons for and implications of the judgments concerned.²¹

R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Leech (no 2)

The expansion of the notion of fundamental rights at common law in respect of freedom of expression issues continued—this time rooted in wholly indigenous principles—in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Leech (No 2).²² As noted in the previous discussion of Raymond v Honey,²³ the common law has long accepted that ‘access to the courts’ should be regarded as a ‘basic right’, in the sense that it could only be abridged by legislation either explicitly or by necessary implication. Raymond concerned a prison Governor’s attempts to prevent a prisoner initiating legal action, a power which the court held had not been given to him by the loosely framed powers created under s 47 of the Prison Act 1952. The applicant in Leech was seeking to extend that principle.

Mr Leech, a prisoner, was an inveterate litigator on matters of prison discipline. His action was aimed at preventing the prison authorities from intercepting or stopping his letters to his solicitor. The relevant prison rules which the prison governor invoked to justify this activity were said to be authorised by s 47. The case was concerned simply with deciding whether those rules were ultra vires s 47.

Two rules were in issue. Rule 33(3) provided that:

Except as provided by these Rules, every letter or communication to or from a prisoner may be read or examined by the governor ... and the governor may at his discretion, stop any letter or communication on the grounds that its contents are objectionable or that it is of inordinate length.

Rule 37A removed this limit in respect of correspondence between an inmate and his/her solicitor in respect of ongoing litigation.²⁴ It did not however apply to letters preparatory to actual or potential litigation. It was correspondence of this sort with which Mr Leech was concerned. His action failed in the High Court, but that judgment was then reversed by a unanimous Court of Appeal, for which Steyn LJ delivered the sole judgment.²⁵

The opinion was framed in terms which bore an obvious resemblance to the jurisprudence of the ECtHR. Steyn LJ accepted that a ‘presumptive entitlement’ was in issue; ‘It is a principle of our law that every citizen has a right of unimpeded access to a court ... Even in our unwritten constitution it must rank as a constitutional right’.²⁶ The significance of the ‘constitutional right’ designation was that the entitlement could be removed or abridged only by explicit legislation or as a matter of necessary implication from the relevant statutory text. Steyn LJ made it clear that courts should be reluctant to accept implied statutory interferences with such rights:

... in relation to rule-making powers alleged to arise by necessary implication, it can fairly be said that the more fundamental the right interfered with, and the more drastic the interference, the more difficult becomes the implication.²⁷

²¹ See generally on this point Loveland I (1995) ‘Introduction: should we take lessons from America?’ in Loveland I (ed) A special relationship? Derbyshire itself attracted a considerable amount of academic attention. For a variety of perspectives see Tomkins A and Bix B (1993) ‘Local authorities and libel again’ Modern LR 738; Barendt E (1993) ‘Libel and freedom of speech in English law’ Public Law 449; Loveland I (1994) ‘Defamation of government: taking lessons from America’ Legal Studies 206. ²² [1994] QB 198, CA.

²³ [1983] 1 AC 1, HL: ‘The presumption of non-interference with “basic rights”, ch 14, p 453 above.

²⁴ This amendment had been introduced in response to an ECtHR judgment which had found r 33(3) standing alone to breach Art 6 of the Convention: see Golder v United Kingdom (1975) 1 EHRR 524.

²⁵ [1994] QB 198.

²⁶ Ibid, at 210.

²⁷ Ibid, at 209.

While one might welcome this conclusion, the methodology is open to criticism on two obvious grounds. The first is the absence of any supra-judicial catalogue of 'constitutional rights'. They are purely common law creations, susceptible to change at any time. The second is Lord Steyn's suggestion that the common law recognises a hierarchy of constitutional rights, some 'more fundamental' than others. If the rights themselves are elusive, their respective positions on the constitutional ladder are even more so. What Steyn LJ did de facto here was to construe the Prison Act 1952 and the rules made under it in a way that rendered them compatible with the requirements of Arts 6 and 10 ECHR but, presumably for the reasons discussed above, he was unable to acknowledge this explicitly.

Having established its methodology, the Court defined the notion of 'access to a court' quite broadly. Steyn LJ argued that the common law clearly recognised that:

a prisoner's unimpeded right of access to a solicitor for the purpose of receiving advice and assistance in connection with the possible institution of civil proceedings in the courts forms an inseparable part of the right of access to the courts themselves.²⁸

Steyn LJ's reasoning on the latter point is somewhat disingenuous. That the reach of that proposition extended to a prisoner in Leech's situation was made entirely clear only by Steyn LJ's own judgment. His purpose perhaps was to suggest that the Court of Appeal was merely declaring existing law rather than creating new law. That is an unconvincing distinction. The conclusion is obviously teleological in its source, resting on the premise that a prisoner is likely to be deterred from initiating legal actions at all if he/she knows that she cannot discuss the pros and cons of such action with her/his legal advisers on a confidential basis.

While the court accepted that s 47—as a matter of necessary implication—authorised some interference with prisoner's mail, the question to be answered was whether r 33(3) was drawn too widely. In addressing this issue, Steyn LJ effectively adopted a proportionality test:

The question is whether there is a self-evident and pressing need for an unrestricted power to read letters between a prisoner and a solicitor and a power to stop such letters on the ground of prolixity and objectionality.²⁹

In applying the test, the Court looked unusually closely—given that this was an AJR action—at the merits of the policy issues involved. It considered the Home Office's arguments on this point to be unconvincing. Drawing on a recent Canadian authority,³⁰ Steyn LJ offered a series of 'illustrative' safeguards which might be attached to such a governmental power in order to make it compatible with the prisoner's right of access to the courts. Since the Prison Rules contained no such safeguards, rule 33(3) was ultra vires s 47 of the 1952 Act.³¹

²⁸ Ibid, at 210.

²⁹ Ibid, at 209. He framed the test in somewhat different terms, even more redolent of the proportionality principle, at 555; 'The authorised intrusion must, however, be the minimum necessary to ensure that the correspondence is in truth bona fide legal correspondence'.

³⁰ Solosky v R (1979) 105 DLR (3d) 745.

³¹ This technique invites comparison with Megarry VC's much less assertive strategy in Malone: see 'Malone v Metropolitan Police Commissioner (1979)', ch 18, pp 567–569 above.

R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants

In February 1996, Peter Lilley (then Secretary of State for Social Security) introduced delegated legislation³² denying welfare benefits to any asylum seekers who did not declare themselves as such immediately upon entering the UK and to those who chose to appeal (as they were entitled by statute to do) against an initial refusal of their application. Such people would have to rely on charitable support. The measure attracted much criticism, on the basis that many asylum seekers were likely to be too afraid or disorientated to approach the Home Office straight away and that, de facto, the change would abrogate rights of appeal. In June 1996, the Court of Appeal held the policy unlawful.³³ The Court reached this conclusion by in effect applying the 'fundamental human rights' rationale: indeed, the argument deployed had undertones of a 'natural law' philosophy. Simon Brown LJ expressed his conclusion in very forceful terms:

[T]he 1996 regulations necessarily contemplate for some a life so destitute that, to my mind, no civilised nation can tolerate it. So basic are the human rights here at issue, that it cannot be necessary to resort to the [ECHR]... Nearly 200 years ago Lord Ellenborough CJ in R v Eastbourne (inhabitants) ((1803) 102 ER 769 at 779) said: 'As to there being no obligation for maintaining poor foreigners... the law of humanity, which is anterior to all positive laws, obliges us to afford them relief, to save them from starving.'³⁴

The Court considered that when Parliament had passed the relevant 'parent Act', it had not given the government any power to negate this common law principle. Simon Brown LJ concluded by observing that:

Parliament cannot have intended a significant number of genuine asylum seekers to be impaled upon the horns of so intolerable a dilemma—the need either to abandon their claims to refugee status or alternatively to maintain themselves as best they can but in an utter state of destitution. Primary legislation alone could in my judgement achieve that sorry state of affairs.³⁵

III. The 'judicial supremacism' controversy

The increasing assertiveness of the domestic courts, coupled with a series of forceful judgments by the ECJ and the ECtHR in the mid-1990s, triggered something of a political controversy in the early- to mid-1990s. The controversy was kindled and stoked by a mix of government Ministers (the second Major government then being in power), backbench MPs and right-wing newspapers. It was cast in terms of a need to defend 'sovereignty' and 'democracy', which were apparently both being undermined by a judicial conspiracy embracing domestic judges and the 'foreigners' sitting on the two European courts, all of whom were supposedly intent on giving themselves a more powerful, essentially illegitimate constitutional role within the United Kingdom.

³² The Social Security (Persons From Abroad) Miscellaneous Amendments Regulations 1996, SI 1996/30.

³³ R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants [1997] 1 WLR 4 All ER 385, CA.

³⁵ Ibid, at 293.

³⁴ Ibid, at 292.

Judgments of the ECJ and the ECtHR

In November 1995, the ECJ delivered its judgment in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Gallagher.³⁶ Gallagher was an Irish citizen, who had been convicted in Ireland some years previously of firearms offences. The then Home Secretary, Michael Howard, invoked powers under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 to exclude Gallagher from the UK. Gallagher challenged his exclusion before the English courts on the basis that it breached his EC-derived right of free movement as a worker. Like Ms Van Duyn,³⁷ Gallagher relied specifically on Directive 64/221, Art 9 of which required that an individual be able to challenge any exclusion decision before a 'competent authority'. Following a reference from the Court of Appeal, the ECJ indicated that the UK's procedures on this point were incompatible with EC law. The judgment was hardly surprising, being well-rooted in existing ECJ judgments.³⁸ Nor was it as far reaching as it might have been. The ECJ did not require, for example, that prospective deportees be provided with reasons for the government's actions. The effect and legitimacy of the ECJ's conclusion were nonetheless derided by Conservative Ministers and backbench MPs,³⁹ who were it seems distinctly disturbed to see how the nominally 'economic' basis of Community law could cut across into 'human rights issues'.⁴⁰

Their indignation was rather more forceful in response to the ECJ's judgment in Factortame (No 3)/Brasserie du Pêcheur,⁴¹ handed down on 5 March 1996. The judgment extended the Francovich damages remedy to breach of any provision of EC law, not simply failure to implement directives, and so raised the possibility that an English court might soon award Factortame substantial damages for losses caused by the Merchant Shipping Act 1988. The notion that—in effect—Parliament could be liable in damages was not welcomed by the Major government and Conservative MPs. The then Fisheries Minister, Tony Baldry, described the judgment as: 'a crazy law'.⁴² A backbench MP, Iain Duncan Smith, proposed drastic action to prevent any damages being awarded:

The government should therefore act now to stop these cases going ahead until it had resolved the matter. It should pass a simple act of Parliament amending the European Communities Act 1972 to stop the ruling applying in English courts.⁴³

Duncan Smith's presumption that the government could pass an Act is itself a telling indictment of the extent to which Conservative MPs had discarded orthodox understandings of the separation of powers. It is perhaps unfortunate that Parliament did not enact such a Bill. Factortame would no doubt have sought to have the resultant statute disapplied. The ensuing litigation would have provided a marvellous opportunity for the courts to confirm just how significantly the UK's accession to the Community had compromised traditional understandings of the sovereignty of Parliament.

³⁶ Case C-175/94: [1995] ECR I-4253, [1996] 1 CMLR 557. See the comment by O'Leary S (1996) 'R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Gallagher' Common Market LR 777.

³⁷ See 'Van Duyn v Home Office' (1974), ch 11, pp 372–373 above.

³⁸ See the discussion in O'Leary op cit. ³⁹ See The Times and The Guardian 1 December 1995.

⁴⁰ Cf O'Leary op cit at 787: 'indeed it is surprising that the PTA was adopted and successively renewed in the form it was, given the clear rulings of the Court of Justice... Perhaps it was thought that national anti-terrorist legislation did not come within the scope of Community law'.

⁴¹ Cases C-46/93 and C-48/93: [1996] 1 CMLR 889: see 'A principle of broad or limited scope?', ch 12, p 412 above.

⁴² The Guardian 6 March 1996.

⁴³ 'This writ should not run over us' The Times 12 March 1996. Duncan Smith was elected as leader of the Conservative Party in 2001. He proved remarkably inept in that role.

Factortame (No 3) was immediately followed by the judgment in the 'Working Time Directive' case.⁴⁴ The litigation—which turned on a 'legal base' question⁴⁵—threatened the government with a possible erosion of the UK's 'opt-out' from the EC Social Charter.⁴⁶ The Council had enacted Directive 93/104 to place maximum limits on the hours that employees could be required to work. The Council claimed it had the power to do so under Art 118a of the Treaty of Rome; which provided, inter alia, that: 'Member States shall pay particular attention to encouraging improvements, especially in the working environment, as regards the health and safety of workers...'. Limiting working hours (to a maximum of forty-eight per week) would seem obviously to be a 'health and safety' matter. The Major government, which opposed the substance of the measure, was unable to veto it in Council, because Art 118(a) allowed secondary legislation to be adopted by a qualified majority. It thus argued that the measures of this sort were properly regarded as parts of the 'internal market' strategy,⁴⁷ and should thus be enacted under Art 100a. Since Art 100a required unanimity in the Council, success on this point would enable the government to veto the measure altogether. The Advocate-General's preliminary opinion found against the UK, and was met with the comment from the Prime Minister that: 'It is precisely because of legislation like this and stupidities like this that the EU is becoming uncompetitive and losing jobs to other parts of the world'.⁴⁸ When the ECJ subsequently upheld the Advocate-General's opinion, the most splenetic reaction came from John Redwood, one of the Prime Minister's Cabinet colleagues: 'The court is off the leash and on the loose, overturning Acts of Parliament, destroying our fishing industry, and changing our employment laws. Parliament should immediately assert its rights'.⁴⁹

Shortly afterwards, in P v S and Cornwall County Council,⁵⁰ the ECJ held that the notion of 'gender' within the Equal Treatment Directive⁵¹ included trans-sexualism. Thus a person who was dismissed from his job because he had undergone surgical and hormonal treatments to change his sex from male to female had been unlawfully discriminated against under EC law. No such protection (of course) existed under domestic law. The gist of the political reaction within the Conservative Party on this issue was nicely characterised by a hysterical leading article in the right-wing newspaper The Daily Mail, on 2 May 1996:

Until and unless we have a government prepared to mount a fundamental and unyielding challenge to the supremacy of this alien jurisdiction, then Britain will continue to face nothing less than the death of its nationhood by a thousand cuts of the Euro-scalpel.

The government received a number of similarly unwelcome setbacks before the ECtHR in this period. In June 1996, the Court's judgment in *Benham v United Kingdom*⁵² found the UK in breach of Art 6 ECHR.⁵³ Benham had refused to pay his poll tax, and was eventually gaoled for thirty days for continuing to withhold payment. He had not been able to afford to employ counsel at his trial, and no legal aid was available to pay for legal ⁴⁴ United Kingdom v EU Council: C-84/94 [1996] ECR I-5755.

⁴⁵ See 'Reducing the democratic deficit: judicial initiatives', ch 12, pp 394–395 above.

⁴⁶ See 'Domestic disquiet: Margaret Thatcher's Bruges speech', ch 12, pp 392–393 above.

⁴⁷ See 'I. The Single European Act—the terms', ch 12, pp 388–390 above.

⁴⁸ The Guardian 13 March 1996. ⁴⁹ The Times 13 March 1996.

⁵⁰ Case C-13/94: [1996] ECR I-2143. Judgment was given on 1 May 1996.

⁵¹ Directive 76/207: see 'Making sense of Marshall? The emergence of "indirect effect"', ch 11, pp 382–383 above.

⁵² (1996) 22 EHRR 293.

⁵³ Art 6 (1): 'In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law...'

representation at such hearings. In the light of the severity of the punishment he faced (ie a gaol sentence), and the complexity of the legal issues that the trial raised, the ECtHR considered that the government's failure to provide legal representation had denied Mr Benham a fair hearing.⁵⁴

Benham followed the judgment in Hussain v United Kingdom.⁵⁵ Hussain had been convicted of murder while a juvenile, and had been sentenced to be detained 'at her Majesty's pleasure'. Under domestic law, the question of his release was a matter for the Home Secretary. The applicant argued that this amounted to a breach of Art 5(4) ECHR.⁵⁶ The Court accepted this submission, thereby in effect requiring a transfer of particular sentencing powers from the government to the courts.

To Conservative MPs, however, the ECtHR's most controversial judgment was McCann v United Kingdom.⁵⁷ McCann was an Art 2 case.⁵⁸ The applicants were relatives of several IRA terrorists, who, while plotting to explode a bomb in Gibraltar, had been shot dead by British soldiers. In a judgment which involved an extremely detailed examination of the facts of the episode,⁵⁹ the Court concluded by a 10–9 majority that the killings could not be justified under Art 2(2).

In response to these decisions, the Major government evidently gave serious consideration to withdrawing UK citizens' right of individual petition to the Commission. It decided instead to try to pressurise the Council of Europe to curb the ECtHR's jurisdiction and to set much wider limits to the 'margin of appreciation' doctrine. A Foreign Office memorandum to the Council (leaked to the British press) contained the extraordinary proposal that the Court be required to respect 'long-standing laws and practices' within Member States even if they were 'manifestly contrary to the Convention'.⁶⁰ The Council of Europe was apparently unimpressed by these suggestions. This is hardly surprising, for by then it was wholly clear that the Major government's penchant for making unlawful decisions arose as often in respect of matters of domestic law as it did in respect of the law of the EC and the ECHR.

Judgments in domestic courts on immigration policies

Two of the more important judgments which figured in the judicial supremacism controversy have already been discussed in previous chapters. The Pergau Dam case proved a substantial embarrassment to the Major government, as did the House of Lords' decision in the Fire Brigades Union litigation. Neither judgment could be regarded as particularly radical in nature. Pergau Dam turned on a long-rooted principle of statutory ⁵⁴ The judgment goes substantially further than domestic administrative law rules concerning the 'right' to legal representation: see 'The content of procedural fairness—legal representation and an obligation to give reasons for decisions', ch 15, pp 499–500 above. ⁵⁵ (1996) 22 EHRR 1.

⁵⁶ Article 5 (4): 'Everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court...'

⁵⁷ (1995) 21 EHRR 97.

⁵⁸ ¹ 'Everybody's right to life shall be protected by law. No-one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.

² Deprivation of life shall not be regarded as inflicted in contravention of this Article when it results from use of force which is no more than is absolutely necessary:

- (a) in defence of any person from unlawful violence;
- (b) in order to effect a lawful arrest or to prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained;
- (a) in action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection.'

⁵⁹ Ie the ECtHR was in effect exercising an appellate jurisdiction.

⁶⁰ See The Guardian, 2 April 1996.

interpretation,⁶¹ while Fire Brigades Union was concerned with safeguarding the sovereignty of Parliament from governmental misuse of the royal prerogative.⁶² The government's most acute and consistent cause for concern however lay in a series of judgments dealing with its immigration policies, especially in relation to the treatment of people who had come to the UK to escape from what they claimed was political persecution in their home countries.

Michael Howard's legal difficulties as Home Secretary prompted much of the Conservative MPs' anti-judicial ire in this period. However his predecessor, Kenneth Baker, had set the scene for this supposed conflict between the Home Office and the courts through a course of action which ultimately led to the House of Lords' judgment in Re M.⁶³

Re M

M was a teacher from Zaire who sought political asylum in Britain, claiming that he would be subject to political persecution if he returned to his homeland. The Home Secretary⁶⁴ decided that M did not qualify for asylum under the relevant legislation, and ordered his deportation. M's counsel then presented new evidence to the Court. By this time, M was on his way to Heathrow airport. The judge, Garland J, considered that the Home Office's counsel had given the Court an undertaking that M would not be deported until the new evidence was heard, and made an order (which was in effect an interim injunction) in those terms. However, M was then flown to Paris and placed on a flight to Zaire. M's solicitor then woke up Garland J in the middle of the night, and the judge immediately (by phone) ordered the Home Secretary to return M to Britain. The Home Secretary was then informed by his legal advisers that Garland J had no power to make such an order, and the Home Secretary decided to ignore it. The case raised several important issues. Much of the argument centred on complex questions of administrative law, which need not concern us here.⁶⁵ There are however, two points of constitutional significance which we need to address. Firstly, did the High Court have the power to issue an injunction against the Crown, represented here by the Home Office? And if so, was Kenneth Baker, the Home Secretary, in either his personal or ministerial capacity, in contempt of court for ignoring it?

If we recall Entick and Liversidge, we see that the citizen's legal actions were not against the 'government' (or the Crown), but against individual government officials. In both instances, the government official was being sued for allegedly committing a tortious action; trespass in Entick and false imprisonment in Liversidge. In neither 1765 nor 1942 was it possible for those actions to be commenced against the Crown per se. As previously noted, while the 1688 revolution had established the supremacy of statute over common law, it did not in itself alter common law principles in any systematic way. One such principle, encapsulated in the aphorism that 'the King could do no wrong', was that the courts had no jurisdiction to entertain suits in tort or contract against the Crown. Citizens could pursue such actions only via 'the petition of right' device. Relatedly, it had always been thought that an injunction could not lie against the Crown per se.⁶⁶ Similarly, while an individual government official who deliberately defied an injunction against her would ⁶¹ See 'Excess of powers', ch 14, pp 446–450 above.

⁶² See 'Extending Laker: R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Fire Brigades Union (1995)', ch 4, pp 99–100 above.

⁶³ [1994] 1 AC 377, sub nom M v Home Office.
⁶⁴ It appears that the decision was actually made by a junior Minister, and that the Home Secretary himself, Kenneth Baker, was not familiar with the case.

⁶⁵ See Gould M (1993) 'M v Home Office: government and the judges' Public Law 568.

⁶⁶ See further 'Challenging Governmental Decisions: the Process', ch 16, pp 510–511 above.

be in contempt of court, the non-availability of such a remedy against the Crown would logically imply that there could be nothing in respect of which the Crown per se could be in contempt.

It was not until the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 that Parliament exercised its sovereign legal power to abolish the petition of right device. The Act made it clear that the Crown itself could now be sued in contract or tort. However the Act did not explicitly confirm that injunctions and the contempt jurisdiction could also issue against the Crown per se, rather than just against individual officials. Prior to the M case, the weight of judicial authority in matters purely of domestic law suggested such remedies were not available. In effect, this case law seemingly suggested that remedies which citizens might enforce against other citizens were only available against the Crown when Parliament had explicitly legislated to that effect.

This left something of a gap in the legal regulation of government activity. On the facts of M, for example, an interim injunction against Mr Baker in person would not have prevented other Home Office Ministers or employees from placing M on the plane to Zaire. Had Mr Baker wilfully defied the courts and breached such an order, he personally would have been in contempt, but that consequence would neither be of assistance to M nor underline the principle that the government as a corporate body must respect court orders. Thus, if the 'rule of law' was not to be undermined in practice, we would have to rely on the integrity of government in never doing anything that might be the subject of an injunction or a contempt order, a reliance that fits uneasily with the Diceyan principle that the rule of law demands that we should always be suspicious of government's bona fides. In the context of EC law, that position had been changed by the Factortame judgments,⁶⁷ but it did not necessarily follow that this principle would spill over into domestic law.

The leading judgment in M was given by Lord Woolf. The Court concluded that the High Court had the power to issue an interim injunction against the Crown, that the Crown was in theory amenable to the contempt jurisdiction, and that, on the facts of this case, such a contempt had been committed. Lord Woolf's judgment is much concerned with technical questions of administrative law. For our purposes, perhaps the key passage in the decision comes from Lord Templeman's speech:

[T]he argument that there is no power to enforce the law by injunction ... against a Minister in his official capacity would, if upheld, establish the proposition that the executive obey the law as a matter of grace and not as a matter of necessity, a proposition which would reverse the result of the civil war.⁶⁸

The logic of his contention seems unassailable; namely that the revolution had created a situation in which the Crown's legal status was equivalent to that of an ordinary legal person; thus all legal remedies which are available against individuals should be available against the Crown, unless Parliament has clearly provided to the contrary.

Lord Woolf drew on similarly expansive principles in confirming the availability of the contempt jurisdiction. The Home Secretary, in either his personal or official capacity, could be in contempt for disregarding the terms of such an injunction. The only bodies capable of overturning the order of a High Court judge would be the Court of Appeal and House of Lords; if Ministers could ignore the courts on the basis of the advice of their lawyers, the rule of law would clearly be being subverted. As Lord Woolf explained:

[T]he ability of the court to make a finding of contempt is of great importance. It would demonstrate that a government department has interfered with the administration of justice. It will then be for Parliament to determine what should be the consequences of that finding.⁶⁹

⁶⁷ See 'The demise of the legal doctrine? Factortame', ch 12, p 400 above.

⁶⁸ [1994] 1 AC 377 at 395.

⁶⁹ [1994] 1 AC 377 at 425.

M should thus be seen as a long overdue embrace of traditional principle. The judgment plugged an unfortunate gap in the coverage of the rule of law principle in modern society, while making it perfectly clear that if Parliament took the view that it was appropriate for government Ministers to enjoy this immunity (in non-EC matters) it could create it for them in statute.

R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Moon

Kenneth Baker's successor as Home Secretary, Michael Howard, threw further fuel onto the political fire by making a series of patently unlawful decisions which were subsequently invalidated in the courts. In R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Moon,⁷⁰ Sedley J quashed Howard's attempt to exclude the Revd Sun Il Moon—the leader of the 'Moonie' religious cult—from the UK under powers granted by the Immigration Acts. The decision promoted an outcry among Conservative MPs and the tabloid and broadsheet press, who felt Moon was so unpleasant a character that he should never be allowed into the country. This response was wholly ill-informed about both the nature of the decision and the basic features of the judicial review jurisdiction. Sedley J had not held that Howard could not exclude Moon. His decision was based on a procedural irregularity in the Home Secretary's decision-making process. The judgment held simply that Howard could exclude Moon only after giving him an opportunity to argue that he should be admitted: ie it was a straightforward application of the procedural fairness doctrine. Having heard such arguments, the Home Secretary could admit or exclude Moon as he thought fit, subject only to Wednesbury irrationality constraints.

One might expect tabloid papers to misrepresent or misunderstand such principles. But it was more surprising to find The Times displaying similar ignorance. In a leader engagingly entitled 'Judicial Moonshine', The Times castigated Sedley's judgment on the grounds that Moon was a thoroughly undesirable alien who should never be allowed into Britain. That substantive conclusion may have much to commend it; but it has nothing to do with Sedley J's judgment, which concerned only the procedures through which the Home Secretary acted. The Times was either misinformed or mendacious in suggesting the judgment overturned established legal understandings.

The al-Mas'ari case

Professor al-Mas'ari's legal action against the Home Secretary had rather graver implications. Saudi Arabia, while an important economic and political ally for the UK, could hardly be described as having a constitutional system which operated as a model of enlightened and humane government. The regime is intolerant of internal political opposition, and dissidents who escape imprisonment tend to conduct their political campaigns from abroad. Professor al-Mas'ari was one such dissident who had sought political asylum in the UK. The Home Secretary, again exercising statutory powers, declined to grant asylum. His reason for so doing was a fear that Saudi Arabia's government would be less inclined to buy British arms and other goods if the UK sheltered one of its critics.

Al-Mas'ari's legal challenge to this refusal was unsurprisingly successful. The case turned on a simple and long-established administrative law point: were calculations as to arms' sales a 'relevant consideration' in the exercise of statutory powers concerning asylum decisions? In this case, Judge Pearl had little difficulty in concluding that considerations of commercial advantage were not relevant factors. On relevant grounds—such as the asylum seeker's personal characteristics, the regime from which she or he fled, the likelihood that she or he would suffer harm if returned there—al-Mas'ari presented a strong case. For the Home Secretary to allow such factors to be trumped by the prospect of losing arms' sales was an abuse of the powers Parliament had granted him. The government did not appeal against this judgment, which indicates it realised that its legal position was untenable.

⁷⁰ (1995) 8 Admin LR 477.

However, the government did not let the matter rest. Rather than challenge the judgment in court, the government attacked it in the media. On Radio 4's Today programme on 14 March 1996, John Major elided the al-Mas'ari judgment with recent terrorist outrages in Israel and suggested that Parliament might reconsider whether Britain should shelter critics of 'friendly' regimes. His government could have asked Parliament to enact legislation achieving such an outcome; or providing specifically for al-Mas'ari's deportation; or expressly permitting the Home Secretary to take into account the beneficial impact on arms' sales that deporting political dissidents might have. Should Parliament have enacted such laws, a future Home Secretary could follow Howard's lead without fear of court intervention. That the Major government did not choose to pursue any of these options might suggest it knew the ends it sought might be regarded as immoral by both the Commons and the Lords.

The Court's decision can therefore be seen as protecting not just Professor al-Mas'ari, but also the principle of parliamentary sovereignty, against government whims. Both the Moon and the al-Mas'ari cases, as well as the Fire Brigades Union and Pergau Dam judgments, underline this basic constitutional truth. Ministers may do only what Parliament permits. The limits of parliamentary intent are, and always have been, policed by the High Court. If Ministers find these limits uncongenial, they must ask Parliament to change them.

R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants

Perhaps the most graphic example of Conservative MPs either denying or not understanding this principle was provided in the aftermath of the R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants judgment.⁷¹ As noted above, the Court of Appeal had concluded in that case that only primary legislation could achieve 'the sorry state of affairs' of removing all benefit entitlements from certain categories of asylum seekers. Spectators in the Commons' public gallery the week after judgment was issued saw Peter Lilley announce that the government would seek to persuade Parliament to enact new legislation to achieve that objective.⁷² The Minister did not enter debates about judicial supremacism. His backbench colleagues showed no such restraint, and coupled their copious indignation with magnificent ignorance.

Tony Marlow MP simply failed to grasp the essential distinction between primary and delegated legislation. His contribution to the debate was to ask: 'Have I missed something? Do the judiciary now have a democratic mandate to decide which laws are acceptable?'⁷³ His colleague Toby Jessell apparently found the distinction between politics and law too confusing to grasp: 'My constituents [do not] expect the Court of Appeal to do other than uphold public policy. [They] do not expect the Court of Appeal to make up the law as it goes along'.⁷⁴

The answer to both of Marlow's questions is manifestly: 'Yes'. Mr Marlow had apparently 'missed' the Glorious Revolution, the structure of constitutional law built upon its foundations, and the long-established principle that the courts do indeed have a 'democratic mandate': namely, to ensure that the executive in making delegated legislation does not exceed the limits of powers delegated by the parent Act. What Marlow and his ilk

⁷¹ [1997] 1 WLR 275..

⁷² HCD 24 June 1996 cc 37–38.

⁷³ Ibid, at c 42.

⁷⁴ Ibid, at c 44.

on the Tory backbenches did not understand was that what the Court invalidated in the JCWI case was not 'a law' at all, but government abuse of the law.

There is a certain comedy in listening to MPs' politically closed minds rattling around in their legally empty heads, but the comedy is underpinned by a serious constitutional point. The MPs' substantively illiterate criticism of the Court was echoed in much of the press, which accused Simon Brown LJ in particular of overstepping the limits of his powers. It might be argued that the style of Simon Brown LJ's judgment was atypically trenchant. It might even be suggested that his recognition of what was in essence a 'fundamental human right' to subsistence, abrogable only by explicit statutory language, somewhat extended the reach of the courts' resurgent fundamental rights jurisprudence.⁷⁵ But the judgment can hardly be seen as an example of judicial supremacy. It would be much more accurate to categorise it as removing an element of 'executive supremacy'.

'Executive supremacy' is of course not a concept which sits happily in a constitution where, in theory, sovereign authority lies with Parliament rather than the government. However, as has been suggested repeatedly in earlier chapters of this book, 'executive supremacy' would seem an accurate description of the way the constitution works in practice, in so far as a government is generally able to 'persuade' both Houses of Parliament to enact whatever legislation it wishes. The defining feature of the judicial supremacy episode was that Ministers, Conservative MPs and much of the press seemed either to ignore or forget that point. Their argument was, in effect, that as long as a Commons majority approves of what a Minister does, nothing more need be said about the legality of her or his behaviour. A governing party which had for over fifteen years possessed a substantial and generally loyal majority in both houses may well have forgotten that the constitution requires the house's majority views to be placed on a statutory basis before the courts accord them legal significance. It is no more the task of backbench MPs, individually or en masse, to determine if a Minister's action is lawful than it is for a Minister to do so.

A judicial response

Michael Howard's criminal justice policies also brought him into public confrontation within the political arena with several senior judges and ex-judges. In December 1995, Lord Donaldson, the former Master of the Rolls, suggested in a Guardian article that the government and its media supporters were mounting 'a campaign of abuse and criticism of the judiciary as a whole'.⁷⁶ In so doing, the government was attacking orthodox understandings of the rule of law and thereby opening a path towards despotic government. As Lord Donaldson acknowledged, Parliament could enact any policy which the government wanted to pursue. But he argued that it was wholly unacceptable that Ministers should, by constantly vilifying judicial decisions, seek to intimidate the courts into toeing the government line.

The former Lord Chief Justice, Lord Taylor, also joined the fray, arguing in a speech at King's College London in March 1996 that Howard's plans to impose mandatory sentences for particular kinds of criminal offence were dictated by 'the vagaries of fashion'. The Home Secretary responded to the Lord Chief Justice's speech on the Today programme the following morning, suggesting that Lord Taylor was 'soft on crime'. One particular line of Howard's diatribe was reprinted as the front-page headline of the same day's London Evening Standard in the form of a question to Lord Taylor: 'DO YOU WANT ⁷⁵ Cf his own acknowledgment of the relevance of Leech to his judgment: [1997] 1 WLR 275 at 282.

⁷⁶ The Guardian 11 December 1995. Lord Donaldson was not regarded as a particularly liberal judge.

RAPISTS TO GO FREE?’ The question is absurd—a gratuitous insult, which could not be taken seriously by any rational observer. But that does not mean it was ineffective. Rather, it suggested that if judges offered reasoned criticism of any aspect of the Major government’s policy agenda, they would face a ministerial reply designed only to foster prejudice and intolerance among the public.

Any thought that Lord Donaldson’s claim that the judiciary was being subjected to an orchestrated government campaign was the result of paranoia was dispelled in December 1995 by the curious episode of Lord Mackay’s non-existent speech. The Daily Telegraph ran a story on 7 December headed ‘Judges Warned to Keep in Line’, explaining that the Lord Chancellor, the formal head of the judiciary, would deliver a speech that evening warning the judges not to exceed their powers. That day’s Times predicted that Lord Mackay would tell judges to ‘refrain from using their judicial powers to challenge ministerial decisions’. Lord Mackay evidently intended no such thing. He had circulated a paper on recent judicial decisions for internal Cabinet discussion; in it he defended traditional understandings of the courts’ powers. He had no wish to make his views public. However, the then Conservative Party Chairman, Brian Mawhinney, evidently thinking that such comment from the head of the judiciary would undermine the position of ‘liberal’ judges, arranged (without Lord Mackay’s approval) to leak the paper to the Telegraph. Mawhinney’s initiative reinforced what The Times had already identified on 3 November 1995 as an acute judicial concern: that the government was fanning, in one judge’s words, ‘a hate campaign coming through sections of the media, to pour poison on the views of the judiciary’. A judge quoted in The Times felt the campaign was a pre-emptive strike, designed to discredit the conclusions of the Scott and Nolan reports prior to their publication.⁷⁷ If that view is correct, the government would seem to have been deliberately undermining accepted constitutional principles to garner a brief party political advantage. Another judge who was quoted felt, more charitably, that the government’s behaviour resulted not from mendacity, but from ignorance: Ministers and backbench MPs simply did not understand the basic constitutional principles underpinning the role of judicial review, had no grasp of the legitimacy of the common law as a dynamic source of legal authority, and did not appreciate the distinction between parliamentary majorities and Parliament itself.⁷⁸

These points are axiomatic as to the way the constitution has been structured since 1688. That structure also makes it clear that the only way Ministers can ultimately be rendered answerable to Parliament is through judges in the courts ensuring that Ministers do not deploy powers that Parliament has not given them. Of course, members of the judiciary may misconstrue Parliament’s intentions in their interpretation of statutes. If Parliament considers a court has misconstrued its intention, it may pass legislation amending the court’s decision. A Commons majority plays a vital part in that process—but only a part.

Lord Mustill’s analysis

Perhaps the most coherent and revealing exposition of the relationship between the courts and the Thatcher and Major governments is offered by a lengthy passage in Lord ⁷⁷ See ‘VI. From ministerial responsibility to ministerial accountability? The Matrix-Churchill controversy’, ch 9, pp 291–292 and “Cash for questions” and the report of the Nolan Commission’, ch 8, pp 252–255 above.

⁷⁸ For a more detailed treatment of this issue see Loveland I (1997) ‘The war against the judges’ Political Quarterly 162.

Mustill's (dissenting) judgment in the Fire Brigades Union case.⁷⁹ The passage merits substantial reproduction here, as it raises important and controversial questions as to the inter-relationship of the sovereignty of Parliament, the rule of law and the separation of powers in late twentieth century British society:

The courts interpret the laws, and see that they are obeyed. This requires the courts on occasion to step into the territory which belongs to the executive, to verify... that the powers asserted accord with the substantive law created by Parliament...

Concurrently with this judicial function Parliament has its own special means of ensuring that the executive, in the exercise of delegated functions, performs in a way which Parliament finds appropriate. Ideally, it is these latter methods which should be used to check executive errors and excesses; for it is the task of Parliament and the executive in tandem, not of the courts, to govern the country. In recent years, however, the employment in practice of these specifically Parliamentary remedies has on occasion been perceived as falling short, and sometimes well short, of what was needed to bring the performance of the executive into line with the law... To avoid a vacuum in which the citizen would be left without protection against a misuse of executive powers the courts have had no option but to occupy the dead ground in a manner, and in areas of public life, which could not have been foreseen 30 years ago. For myself, I am quite satisfied that this unprecedented judicial role has been greatly to the public benefit. Nevertheless, it has its risks, of which the courts are well aware. As the judges themselves constantly remark, it is not they who are appointed to administer the country. Absent a written constitution much sensitivity is required of the parliamentarian, administrator and judge if the delicate balance of the unwritten rules evolved (I believe successfully) in recent years is not to be disturbed...⁸⁰

In a fascinating critique of judicial politics during the Thatcher and Major eras, Simon Lee argued that the courts effectively donned the mantle of 'the opposition' to the minoritarian preferences of the elected central government.⁸¹ But this was not 'opposition' in a party political sense; the judiciary was not simply plugging the constitutional holes left by the feebleness of the Labour Party during the 1980s, or more systemically, by the Commons' pervasive inadequacy as a monitor of and restraint on governmental extremism. Lee is not suggesting that the courts' allegedly more interventionist ideas were intended to compete on equal terms with those of politicians, but rather that they existed above party political dispute, in a kind of constitutional moral stratosphere.

Lee's thesis receives some support from essays and articles written by members of the judiciary in addition to Lord Mustill's critique in Fire Brigades Union. In a series of academic articles, Sir John Laws characterised the judiciary's more interventionist stance in administrative law as an attempt to give legal expression to a series of moral principles; 'about whose desirability there can be no serious argument'.⁸² Sir John Laws suggests that much of the impetus for this development has come from the judiciary's increasing exposure to the constitutional orders of the EC, the European Convention, and the domestic legal systems of the EC's and the Convention's member states.

A perhaps more significant analysis, given its author's then status as a law lord, was offered by Lord Browne-Wilkinson.⁸³ Lord Browne-Wilkinson also acknowledged that the ECHR and the ECJ had had a significant influence on the judicial consciousness.

⁷⁹ R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Fire Brigades Union [1995] 2 AC 513, HL.

⁸⁰ Ibid., at 567.

⁸¹ Lee S (1994) 'Law and the constitution', in Kavanagh D and Seldon A (eds) The Major effect.

⁸² Sir John Laws (1993) 'Is the High Court the guardian of fundamental constitutional rights?' Public Law 59. See also (1995) 'Law and democracy' Public Law 72; (1998) 'The limitations of human rights' Public Law 254.

⁸³ Browne-Wilkinson op cit.

However he also suggested that British courts have increasingly been returning to a more rigorous (and often overlooked) schemata of statutory interpretation, in which judges should assume that; ‘a presumption in favour of individual freedom almost certainly reflects the true intention of Parliament’.⁸⁴

Conclusion

It would however be rash to assume that such sentiments pointed towards an inviolable truth in recent judicial decisions. The common law has always been, and remains, a pluralistic source of legal authority. Its balance may shift, but it is implausible to expect either that the new balance will be set in stone, or that even firmly established trends could not be reversed. More significantly, notwithstanding the force of Lord Mustill’s speech in Fire Brigades Union, there will always be doubts raised as to the legitimacy of judges determining the meaning of ‘human rights’ or ‘individual liberties’ without the benefit of guidance from a supra-parliamentary constitution. With such an instrument to hand, courts may plausibly claim not to be imposing their own values on governmental bodies, but to be demonstrating instead a loyalty to ‘the people’ who decided upon the values to be placed beyond governmental reach. In the 1990s, the domestic courts were—with the limited exception of EC law—denied such luxuries. Every innovative principle—even any traditional principle—invoked to defend individual rights could be expected to serve as a trigger for political controversy should it inconvenience a government not prepared to accept orthodox constitutional principles.

The Labour Party evidently harboured few such fears in the mid-1990s. Its attraction to the idea of incorporating the Convention in some fashion into domestic law was evidently growing stronger, for it committed itself to do so while in opposition. That commitment was reiterated in the party’s 1997 election manifesto. In little more than a year after coming to power in May 1997, the Blair government had successfully piloted the Human Rights Act 1998 through Parliament. In chapters twenty-one and twenty-two, we consider both the terms of the Act and its initial impact on the status of human rights principles in the United Kingdom’s constitutional law.

Suggested further reading

Academic commentary

Browne-Wilkinson, Lord (1992) ‘The infiltration of a Bill of Rights’ Public Law 397

Laws J (1993) ‘Is the High Court the guardian of fundamental constitutional rights?’ Public Law 59

Grief N (1991) ‘The domestic impact of the ECHR as mediated through Community law’ Public Law 555

Scarman L (1987) ‘Human rights in an unwritten constitution’ Denning LJ 129

Bingham T (1993) ‘The European Convention on Human Rights: time to incorporate’ LQR 393

Gould M (1993) ‘M v Home Office: government and the judges’ Public Law 568

⁸⁴ Ibid, at p 408. Lord Browne-Wilkinson suggests R & W Paul Ltd v Wheat Commission [1937] AC 139, HL; National Assistance Board v Wilkinson [1952] 2 QB 648; and Raymond v Honey [1983] 1 AC 1, HL, as examples.

Case law and legislation

Re M [1994] 1 AC 377

R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants [1996]
4 All ER 385 (CA)

R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Leech (No 2) [1994] QB (CA)

Chapter 21

Human Rights IV: The Human Rights Act 1998

The Labour Party's 1997 election manifesto commitment to redefine the status of the ECHR in domestic law¹ was overseen by Lord Irvine, the Lord Chancellor, following the formation of the first Blair administration. In a speech made shortly after the election, Lord Irvine outlined the government's intentions;

The government's position is that we should be leading in the development of human rights in Europe, not grudgingly driven to swallow the medicine prescribed for us by the Court in Strasbourg when we are found in breach of the Convention. Our citizens should be able to secure their human rights not only from a court in Strasbourg but from our own judges.²

The detailed contents of the proposed Act were signalled in a Labour government white paper—*Rights Brought Home: the Human Rights Bill*³—which proposed that the moral values articulated in the Convention should be given substantially enhanced status in domestic law. The white paper identified several cogent reasons for dissatisfaction with the current position:

1.14... It takes on average five years to get an action into the ECtHR...; and it costs an average of £30,000. Bringing these rights home will mean that the British people will be able to argue for their rights in the British courts—without this inordinate delay and cost. It will also mean that the rights will be brought much more fully into the jurisprudence of the courts throughout the United Kingdom and their interpretation will thus be far more subtly and powerfully woven into our law....

1.15. Moreover, in the government's view, the approach which the United Kingdom has so far adopted towards the Convention does not sufficiently reflect its importance...⁴

¹ Real rights for citizens

Citizens should have statutory rights to enforce their human rights in the UK courts. We will by statute incorporate the European Convention on Human Rights into UK law to bring these rights home and allow our people access to them in their national courts. The incorporation of the European Convention will establish a floor, not a ceiling, for human rights. Parliament will remain free to enhance these rights, for example by a Freedom of Information Act.

² Lord Irvine (1997) 'Constitutional reform and a Bill of Rights' European Human Rights LR 483 at 485.

³ (1997) (Cm 3782).

⁴ Ibid. Publication of the white paper coincided with the ECtHR concluding that—for the fiftieth time, United Kingdom law breached the Convention; see Johnson v United Kingdom [1997] 27 EHRR 296. Mr Johnson's case had taken four years to reach the ECtHR.

The white paper's main proposals were reflected in a Bill published in October 1997, the contents of which were in broad terms subsequently enacted in the 1998 legislation.

The Act was widely portrayed in the popular press as tantamount to a 'Bill of Rights'—an analogy presumably intended to suggest that Parliament has succeeded by embracing European jurisprudence in Americanising the United Kingdom's constitutional order. Campaigners for constitutional reform afforded the Bill a warm welcome. The then chairperson of the pressure group Charter 88 hailed the Bill as a measure which would; 'tip the balance of power from politicians to the people'.⁵ The director of the human rights group Liberty announced that; 'We're absolutely delighted'.⁶

I. The terms of the Act

The analysis of the Act offered here makes no attempt to be comprehensive.⁷ Such a task is more appropriately undertaken in a text dealing specifically with human rights issues. This chapter simply discusses the main provisions of the Act itself, and identifies some of the Act's obvious—and less obvious—implications for the understandings we attach to the core constitutional principles of parliamentary sovereignty, the rule of law and the separation of powers.

An 'incorporation' of 'fundamental' rights?

The device of 'entrenching' basic human rights by requiring super-majoritarian legislative procedures to alter their content is now a widely established feature within the constitutions of western democratic nations. There is substantial variation on the types of entrenching techniques deployed in different countries, as well as in the depth of the entrenchment thereby achieved. The various methods however all share a common rationale—namely that those moral principles considered fundamental to societal ordering must not be left at the mercy of transient political majorities which might temporarily control a national legislature.

The European Convention articulates just such a set of fundamental moral and political principles. And in many of the Convention's Signatory States, its terms have been afforded supra-legislative constitutional status. That status enables those countries' courts to invoke the Convention terms as a moral yardstick against which to measure national legislation, and thereafter to strike down or disapply such legislation if it falls short of the necessary standards.

Rejecting entrenchment

The Human Rights Act makes no attempt to achieve similar results in the United Kingdom; it does not seek to endow the moral values in the Convention with an 'entrenched', supra-legislative legal status which would override any future legislation that breached its terms. Nor does the Human Rights Act 'incorporate' the Convention in ⁵ The Guardian, 25 October 1997.

⁶ Ibid.

⁷ For various perspectives see Lord Irvine (1997) 'Constitutional reform and a Bill of Rights' European Human Rights LR 483; Boateng P and Straw J (1996) Bringing Rights Home; (1997) 'Bringing rights home: Labour plans to incorporate the ECHR into UK Law' European Human Rights LR 71; Tierney S (1998) 'The Human Rights Bill' European Public Law 299; Ewing K (1999) 'The Human Rights Act and parliamentary democracy' MLR 79; Bamforth N (1998) 'Parliamentary sovereignty and the Human Rights Act 1998' Public Law 572; Loveland I (1999) 'Constitutional law or administrative law? The Human Rights Act 1998' Contemporary Issues in Law 124.

the much more limited sense of permitting the courts to invoke the Convention to invalidate pre-existing legislation.⁸ The preamble identifies a more modest purpose; ‘An Act to give further effect to rights and freedoms guaranteed under the European Convention on Human Rights’.⁹

The white paper reiterated the orthodox proposition that Parliament lacks the legal capacity to entrench an Act against repeal by a future Parliament through the simple majority plus royal assent formula; even if the (then) present Parliament and the government—wished to do so. Almost a decade after Factortame (No 2) had been decided, that seemed an odd view to adopt.¹⁰ By quite what constitutional mechanism directly effective EC law has achieved a minimal degree of entrenchment in United Kingdom law remains conceptually unclear,¹¹ but the principle does seem to have become embedded (‘entrenched’ being perhaps too loaded a word) in contemporary understandings of constitutional propriety. Unless we accept the contention that EC law is a unique jurisprudential creature, the political fact that it has achieved embedded status in United Kingdom law would indicate that other moral values might also—in similarly mysterious fashion—acquire that characteristic.

That the Blair administration did not think it appropriate to invite Parliament to try to entrench the Human Rights Act indicates that for the New Labour government the old constitutional orthodoxies retained a potent force. The government’s unwillingness to try to tackle the entrenchment issue would suggest that the Human Rights Act is, in formal legal terms, a statute just like any other. Its provisions may be amended or repealed by any future legislation.

Advocates of incorporation who accept that the Convention cannot be entrenched in the legal sense, have suggested that a measure such as the Human Rights Act might gain a degree of ‘moral entrenchment’, in that its hold on the political consciousness of politicians of all mainstream parties might quickly become so firmly established that no government would promote a Bill seeking to dilute its effect. But one might readily doubt if a future right-wing Conservative government which re-embraced the rigours of Thatcherite authoritarianism would feel morally constrained not to introduce a Bill substantially amending or wholly repealing the Human Rights Act.

The Blair government’s evident reluctance to seek to achieve such unconventional constitutional objectives as entrenching a panoply of fundamental moral principles can perhaps be explained by its members’ intrinsic attachment to Diceyan orthodoxies. More cynically, one might suggest, the government had no wish to limit the law-making autonomy it derived from its de facto control of Parliament’s unlimited legislative powers. What is more difficult to understand is why the Blair government set its face against the principle that the Human Rights Act should empower courts to invalidate previously enacted statutory provisions incompatible with the ECHR. The white paper portrayed this scenario as politically undesirable:

To make provision in the Bill for the courts to set aside Acts of Parliament would confer on the judiciary a general power over the decisions of Parliament which under our present

⁸ I.e. a statutory provision which simply stated that ‘The terms of the European Convention on Human Rights shall henceforth be enforceable by all domestic courts and tribunals in all legal proceedings’ would by virtue of the doctrine of implied repeal render any previously enacted statutory provisions ineffective if they were inconsistent with a Convention article. ⁹ Emphasis added.

¹⁰ In so far as the Factortame principle is limited to matters within the EC’s competence, it is admittedly not a ‘general’ power in the sense that the white paper may be using that term. But given the very wide competence that the EC by then enjoyed (i.e. after the Amsterdam treaty), it was hardly credible to suggest that the Factortame rationale was not applicable to broad swathes of legislative activity.

¹¹ See ‘The demise of the legal doctrine? Factortame’, ch 12, pp 400–402 above.

constitutional arrangements they [sic] do not possess, and would be likely on occasions to draw the judiciary into serious conflict with Parliament.¹²

The Blair government was vigorously opposed to the proposal floated at the Nice Summit that the EC treaties should be amended to include a fundamental human rights element. Such an amendment to EC law would—post-Factortame—have empowered domestic courts and tribunals to disapply both existing and future legislation which was inconsistent with the requirements of EC human rights jurisprudence.¹³ Having set its face so firmly against such innovations as an element of EC law, there was little likelihood that the Blair administration would attempt to produce a similar effect through engineering a ‘revolutionary’ change to domestic law. It is this lack of will or ambition in the Act’s reach which perhaps most clearly points to its status as an innovation in administrative rather than constitutional law. The point was put with perfect clarity in political terms by the then Home Secretary, Jack Straw, at the Bill’s second reading in the Commons:

What the [HRA] makes clear is that Parliament is supreme, and that if Parliament wishes to maintain the position enshrined in an Act that it has passed, but which is incompatible with the Convention in the eyes of a British court, it is that Act which will remain in force.¹⁴

Sections 1 and 2: ‘Convention Rights’ under the HRA and Convention articles under the ECHR

The point has already been made that when Parliament ‘incorporates’ an international law into the domestic legal system, domestic courts are not being ordered to give effect to the international law per se but to the relevant statutory provisions.¹⁵ Parliament might require in the incorporating statute that the substantive content of those statutory provisions should be identical to the international law norms concerned, which might in turn entail domestic courts being bound to adjust the meaning of the statutory provisions in accordance with the meaning lent to the international law instrument by the international court competent under the particular treaty regime to perform that role.¹⁶ To put the matter crudely, according to an orthodox understanding of our existing constitutional arrangements, international law cannot be ‘directly effective’ within the domestic legal system.¹⁷

In respect of the treatment accorded to the Convention by the HRA, this principle was starkly stated by Lord Irvine at the report stage of the Bill in the House of Lords: ‘I have to make this point absolutely plain. The ECHR under [the HRA] is not made part of our law... it does not make the Convention directly justiciable’.¹⁸

The scheme of the HRA is to create a set of statutory human rights principles (in s 1) which are labelled ‘Convention Rights’. The Convention Rights are identified in Schedule

¹² Ibid, at para 2.13. One should also note that the Act contains a broad definition of ‘legislation’, to include not just statutes but also certain elements of the prerogative: s 21.

¹³ Craig P and DeBurca B (2002, 3rd edn) EU law pp 358–369. See also Rogers I (2002) ‘From the Human Rights Act to the Charter...’ European Human Rights LR 343. ¹⁴ HCD 16 February 1998 c 773.

¹⁵ See ‘Inconsistency with international law, ch 2, pp 32–33 above.

¹⁶ For so long of course as the ‘incorporating statute’ was not expressly or impliedly overridden by later legislation.

¹⁷ As noted in ch 12, Parliament also asserted in the European Union Act 2011 that even EU law is dependent for its status in domestic law on its incorporation via the ECA 1972.

¹⁸ HLD January 29 1998 c 421.

1 of the HRA. In textual terms, the Convention Rights are identical to the analogous articles of the Convention; the schedule simply recites the words of the relevant articles.¹⁹

However, a Convention Right need not have the same substantive meaning as the textually identical Convention article. The Act does not grant the ECtHR any kind of appellate status within the domestic legal system. That court's determinations as to the meaning of a Convention article do not have binding effect on domestic courts' construction of the meaning of a textually identical Convention Right.

Rather, s 2 imposes a duty on any court or tribunal hearing litigation involving a Convention Right to 'take into account' any judgment of the ECtHR, opinion of the EComHR or decision of the Committee of Ministers when considering the case before it. Section 2(1) makes it clear that it is for the domestic court or tribunal to decide if any such judgment, opinion or decision is indeed relevant. But even if such a judgment is considered relevant and is 'taken into account' by the domestic court, the domestic court is not obliged to follow it. Parliament has it seems envisaged the possibility that Convention Rights and their Convention article counterparts will bear different meanings. The meaning of Convention Rights is a matter for domestic courts within the sphere of domestic law; the meaning of Convention articles is a matter for the ECtHR within the sphere of international law. Presumably, a Convention Right could afford more, less or the same degree of legal protection as its Convention article counterpart.

The Act itself gives no indication of the degree of divergence which is permissible between the meaning of a Convention Right and that of the textually equivalent Convention article. Nor did the Act offer any guidance as to the circumstances in which such divergence would be appropriate or inappropriate.

Section 3—new rules of statutory interpretation?

At an abstract, theoretical level, s 3 of the Act marks a clear departure from orthodox understandings of the separation of powers.²⁰ Parliament has traditionally regarded the question of the principles which courts should apply when interpreting legislation as a matter of common law as an issue determined by the courts. Legislation rarely instructs the courts as to the principles of statutory interpretation which they should deploy. An exception is provided by ss 2–3 of the European Communities Act 1972;²¹ but as we have seen, the issue of EC membership occupies an apparently distinct position within the United Kingdom's constitutional law.

Section 3 of the Human Rights Act contains the following instruction to courts and tribunals:

- (1) So far as it is possible to do so, primary legislation and subordinate legislation must be read and given effect to in a way which is compatible with Convention rights.
- (2) This section—
 - (a) applies to primary legislation and subordinate legislation whenever enacted;
 - (b) does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of any incompatible primary legislation.

Section 3 would manifestly affect both criminal and civil law matters. The Human Rights Act cannot be invoked as a defence by defendants accused of statutory crimes defined in a manner that does not permit of Convention-compliant interpretation, as it does not empower the courts to invalidate legislation. That scenario seems unlikely to arise with any frequency. But many statutory offences are not cast in rule bound terms. Public order legislation—involving for example picketing, demonstrations, or public marches and speeches—provides an obvious example of this. Such statutes would have to be interpreted, if it were ‘possible’ to do so, in a fashion that conforms to the Act’s protection of freedom of expression and association in Arts 10 and 11 ECHR of Schedule. The same consideration would also apply to the construction of statutes in the civil law area; concerning for example the government’s regulation of the media or the refusal of permission for public marches and demonstrations.²²

¹⁹ Not all parts of the Convention appear in Sch 1 of the Act. Those parts of the Convention which are not identified as 'Convention Rights' have effect in domestic law only to the extent that orthodox common law principles permit.

²⁰ See 'IV. Principles of statutory interpretation', ch 3, p 62 above.

²¹ See "The European Communities Act 1972—the terms", ch 11, pp 369–370 above.

The constitutional significance of s 3 depends in large part on the meaning which courts attach to the notion of ‘possible’.²³ This is a term which might plausibly be thought to bear several meanings. Narrowly construed, s 3 requires courts to reject literalist approaches to statutory interpretation if such approaches would produce results incompatible with Convention Rights, and to adopt instead other indigenous, established techniques (viz the golden rule or the mischief rule) if those techniques would produce a Convention Right compatible outcome. More broadly construed, s 3 might require courts to embrace a teleological or purposive approach to interpretation in the sense advocated by Lord Denning in *Magor and St Mellens RDC*²⁴ if established techniques would not render a statutory term consistent with the requirements of Convention Rights; (the purpose being of course to respect Convention Rights). If lent a very broad meaning, s 3 might authorise domestic courts to adopt the type of interpretive techniques proposed by the ECJ in Marleasing.²⁵ The phrase ‘so far as it is possible to do so’ in HRA, s 3 is an almost verbatim repetition of the ECJ formula concerning the scope of domestic courts’ interpretive autonomy in Marleasing. As noted in chapter twelve, Marleasing has been viewed by the House of Lords as justifying the de facto insertion of additional clauses into legislation by the courts; a technique very hard to reconcile with traditional understandings of the courts’ interpretive role.

Varying views were expressed in political, judicial and academic fora as to how s 3 itself should be interpreted. The paper suggested that the instruction given to the courts by s 3 goes ‘far beyond the present rule which enables the courts to take the Convention into account in resolving any ambiguity in legislative provisions’.²⁶ At the Bill’s committee stage in the Commons, the Home Secretary appeared to favour giving s 3 a narrow meaning: ‘[I]t is not our intention that the courts, in applying [s 3] should contort the meaning of words to produce implausible or incredible results’.²⁷ He then went on to offer a magnificently tautological construction of the term ‘possible’ in s 3: ‘It means, “What is the possible interpretation?” Let us [ie the courts] look at this set of words and the possible interpretations’.²⁸ Lord Irvine, in a public lecture, indicated that he anticipated that s 3 would empower the courts to adopt a Marleasing-type approach to the construction of ²² Section 21(1) extends the notion of ‘primary legislation’ to Orders in Council made under the prerogative.

²³ The s 3 obligation is a secondary or consequential jurisdiction. Before a court can assess if a particular statutory provision is incompatible with a Convention Right, it must form a view on the content of that Convention Right. If domestic courts held that the meaning of a Convention Right could diverge significantly from the meaning of the analogous Convention article in the sense of providing less human rights protection, there might be little need for s 3 to be invoked at all.

²⁴ See ‘Purposive (or “teleological”) interpretation’, ch 3, pp 68–69 above.

²⁵ See ‘The ‘indirect effect’ of directives—continued’, ch 12, pp 393–394 above.

²⁶ At para 2.7.

²⁷ HCD 3 June 1998 c 421.

²⁸ Ibid, at c 423.

legislation: it would be acceptable for the courts to ‘strain the meaning of words or read in words which are not there’.²⁹

Quite what the government and Parliament intended s 3 to do—and quite what the courts would make of it—prompted considerable debate among academic commentators. Geoffrey Marshall suggested that s 3 was ‘a deeply mysterious provision’.³⁰ Bennion’s view that; ‘There was much vagueness and confusion in the minds of the Act’s promoters about the intended meaning of the rule’³¹ seems eminently defensible.³² Some hint as to the judiciary’s view of the effect of s 3 was offered by Lord Cooke (a former President of the New Zealand Court of Appeal, and then sitting as a law lord), during the Bill’s Committee Stage in the Lords. Lord Cooke suggested that s 3 ‘enjoins a search for possible meanings as distinct from the true meaning which has been the traditional approach’; it would require courts and tribunals to adopt not ‘a strained interpretation, but one that is fairly possible’.³³

Notwithstanding such divergences of opinion, it would seem safe to conclude that the real question raised by s 3 would not be whether it required the courts to make a radical break with orthodox interpretive principles—but rather to what extent it required them to do so. One can readily identify individual judgments decided before 1998 in which British courts pursued unorthodox interpretive strategies in order to safeguard human rights values.³⁴ But s 3 could sensibly be construed as requiring all domestic courts in all cases to match the most imaginative and expansive use of the Convention occasionally made by some courts prior to 1998.³⁵

Section 3 of the HRA 1998 was modeled on the approach taken by the New Zealand Parliament when it enacted a Bill of Rights.³⁶ The thinking behind both countries’ adoption of this technique is rooted in a concern to preclude the courts from straying into the legislative arena; by explicitly identifying the judiciary’s competence as one of ‘interpretation’, it might be thought possible to present the Act as an initiative which does not impinge upon traditional understandings of the separation of powers and therefore does not compromise the sovereignty of Parliament.

This is perhaps a naive assumption, and one which rests on a rather limited understanding of the relationship between Parliament and the courts. If we are to accept that ²⁹ Cited in Klug F (1999) ‘The Human Rights Act 1998, Pepper v Hart and all that’ Public Law 246 at p 254.

³⁰ Marshall G (1998) ‘Interpreting interpretation in the Human Rights Bill’ Public Law 167 at 167.

³¹ Bennion F (2000) ‘What interpretation is “possible” under s 3(1) of the Human Rights Act?’ Public Law 77 at 88.

³² See also Pannick D (1998) ‘Principles of interpretation of Convention Rights...’ Public Law 545; Klug F (1998) op cit: Lester A (1998) ‘The Act of the possible...’ European Human Rights LR 665.

³³ Lord Cooke’s views might be thought particularly persuasive here, given his status as a senior Law Lord and his previous role as President of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand, where he heard many cases involving the New Zealand Bill of Rights, a measure which strongly influenced the design of the HRA 1998 itself.

³⁴ The Court of Appeal’s judgment in Ex p Leech [1994] QB 198 being a clear example of this: see ‘R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Leech (no 2)’, ch 20, pp 621–622 above. See also the Court of Appeal’s judgment in Rantzen v Mirror Group Newspapers (1986) Ltd [1994] QB 670; discussed in Loveland (2000) op cit pp 129–132.

³⁵ It might also be thought that the term ‘possible’ encompasses domestic presumptions as to matters of precedent and judicial hierarchy; ie it would not be ‘possible’ for a court to lend a statutory provision a meaning that was inconsistent with a meaning already arrived at by a higher court, even if the lower court considered that the original meaning was not compatible with a Convention Right. By analogy we might also assume that the Act does not empower or require a lower court to depart from the view of a higher court as to the content of a Convention Right.

³⁶ Lord Cooke (1997) ‘Mechanisms for entrenchment and protection of a Bill of Rights: the New Zealand experience’ European Human Rights LR 490.

orthodox perceptions of parliamentary sovereignty hinge upon the presumption that courts adopt a literalist approach to statutory interpretation, s 3 does impact upon—at least in de facto terms—the sovereignty of Parliament. The UK’s experience with EC law indicates that judges may on occasion be tempted to apply ‘interpretive’ techniques so outlandish in the meaning they attach to statutory texts that they do not in any but the most formalistic of senses appear to be ‘interpretation’ at all.³⁷ It was after all judgments, both of domestic courts and the ECJ and ECtHR, couched in the language of interpretation which so enraged many backbench Conservative MPs during the judicial supremacism controversy.³⁸ Labour Ministers in the Blair governments might be thought less likely than their Conservative predecessors to indulge media and backbench hysteria concerning alleged ‘judicial usurpations of legislative functions’ in respect of innovative ‘interpretations’ of legislative provisions that might in future emerge from the courts, but whether they would wholly resist the temptation to engage in a little cheap political populism at the judiciary’s expense remained to be seen.³⁹

Section 4—the ‘declaration of incompatibility’

While the Act does not empower any court to question the legality of primary legislation, it does offer the superior courts⁴⁰ the opportunity to challenge a statute’s legitimacy. Section 4 introduces a device called the ‘Declaration of Incompatibility’. Section 4 is directed at those statutory provisions which a court cannot interpret in a fashion that is compatible with a Convention Right, even if those provisions are subjected to the unorthodox canons of constructions evidently introduced by s 3. Again, we might note that the notion of ‘primary legislation’ includes Orders in Council made under the prerogative.

The declaration of incompatibility empowers—but does not oblige—a court to identify the way in which a statutory provision breaches a Convention Right. Section 4(6) provides that the declaration does not invalidate the provision concerned: the court is obliged to apply the incompatible parts of the statute. Nor does the Act contain any requirement the government or Parliament take remedial action to repeal or modify the statute. Section 4 is not therefore an entrenching device in the traditional sense.

The purpose of the Declaration of Incompatibility mechanism seems twofold. Firstly, assuming the government’s pro-Convention bona fides, a Declaration will alert the government to unintended breaches of a Convention Right which it might then seek to remedy. Or secondly, should the government wish to condone a breach of the Convention Right, the Declaration will expose Ministers to the pressure of public and/or opposition opinion to take remedial action.

In either case, the Declaration mechanism relieves the courts of the responsibility of having to deploy controversial interpretative strategies which might lead to them being accused of ‘usurping the legislative function’. Section 4 empowers judges openly to express their loyalty to the notion that the HRA identifies moral principles which Parliament cannot legitimately override while simultaneously avoiding any covert undermining of Parliament’s intentions through use of s 3 in an inappropriately expansive way.

³⁷ Cf Pickstone v Freemans plc [1989] AC 66, HL, and Litster v Forth Dry Dock and Engineering Co Ltd [1990] 1 AC 546, HL: see ‘Pickstone v Freemans’, ch 12, pp 397–399 above. It is perhaps odd, given the white paper’s invocation of New Zealand as a model for Britain to follow, that no mention was made, either in the white paper or by Ministers during the parliamentary debate on the bill, of the interpretive strategies that courts in that country have deployed when applying its Bill of Rights: see Lord Cooke op cit.

³⁸ See ‘III. The ‘judicial supremacism’ controversy’, ch 20, pp 622–634 above.

³⁹ On which point see further ‘Judicial supremacism revisited?’, ch 22, pp 700–707 below.

⁴⁰ In England and Wales these are the High Court, the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords: s 4(5).

The mechanism has strong echoes of the tactic adopted by the Canadian Supreme Court in the early 1980s when it found itself faced with a national government attempt to amend the constitution in a way which was constitutional in the narrow legal sense, but which breached established constitutional conventions. The Supreme Court's judgment in *A-G of Manitoba v A-G of Canada*⁴¹ confirmed that there were no legal obstacles in the government's path, but did so in language so condemnatory of the political mores of the government's plans that it became impossible for the government to proceed.⁴²

The Canadian episode was an isolated instance of a court undermining the moral foundation of governmental and parliamentary intentions, and one fashioned by the Supreme Court rather than the national legislature. That the United Kingdom Parliament created a similar device, without knowing with any certainty how often a declaration of incompatibility might be made, may be thought a rather radical innovation. Section 4 does not bind the legislature in a legal sense, but it could be read as inferring that the judiciary need no longer adhere to the traditional administrative law notion that courts should adopt a deferential attitude towards Parliament's clearly expressed intentions.⁴³ A judge may not be empowered by the Act to overturn legislation, but she has it seems been invited, even perhaps instructed, by Parliament to make clear her reasons for assuming it lacks a defensible moral base.

The inter-relationship between s 3 and s 4

The frequency with which the Declaration device would be used would turn in large part on the way in which the courts construed s 3. The more expansively the courts' construed their interpretive jurisdiction, the less likely it would be that a particular statutory provision could not be reconciled with the pertinent Convention Right. One might sensibly suggest that if the courts were to construe s 3 (per the approach taken to Marleasing in Litster)⁴⁴ as requiring the insertion of qualificatory clauses into legislation, then the Declaration of Incompatibility would become a relevant factor only in respect of statutory provisions which were stated in express terms as being intended to breach Convention Rights.⁴⁵ The interplay between s 3 and s 4 of the Act thus promised to pose the courts a complicated question to answer. The Blair government—implicitly endorsing an expansive interpretation of s 3—evidently expected that Declarations would rarely be necessary. As the Home Secretary put it during the Bill's committee stage; 'We want the courts to strive to find an interpretation... that is consistent... and only in the last resort to conclude that legislation is simply inconsistent'.⁴⁶

Convention Rights and the common law

While s 3 obviously contained some uncertainties as to its precise meaning and effect, it does clearly require that the moral underpinnings of all statutory provisions fall to be re-evaluated by the courts in the light of their compatibility with the moral values which the courts consider inherent in Convention Rights. It might seem odd that the Act does not in express terms impose the same obligation on the courts in respect of the common law;

⁴¹ [1981] 1 SCR 753.

⁴² See 'The judgment of the Canadian Supreme Court', ch 9, pp 290–291 above.

⁴³ As will be suggested below, this inference has apparently not commended itself to the judiciary.

⁴⁴ See 'Pickstone and Litster—usurping the legislative function?', ch 12, pp 397–399 above.

⁴⁵ And so would be completely irrelevant to any provision enacted before the HRA came into force.

⁴⁶ HCD 3 June 1998 cc 421–422.

ie that the Act does not contain a provision (modelled on s 3) to the effect that: ‘So far as it is possible to do so, the common law must be developed and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights’.

The omission is odd in two senses. The first oddity derives from a question of policy. While we might accept that most of our contemporary law has a statutory rather than common law base, there are still a great many common law rules and principles, many of which might be thought to have an impact on Convention Rights. Why should that body of law not be subject to re-evaluation? The second oddity is a normative one. Given that statutory provisions are a hierarchically superior form of law to the common law, why would Parliament require re-evaluation of the superior form of law but not of the inferior one?

Those questions might be answered at an abstract theoretical level by suggesting that the common law’s amenability to re-evaluation from a Convention Rights perspective is a necessary implication arising from the subjection of statutory provisions to that new regime. To conclude otherwise would have the perverse effect of affording (in a generic sense) common law rules a superior status to statutory provisions. Had Parliament wished to achieve that odd result, it would have said so expressly. At a more prosaic level, an answer can perhaps be drawn from the interactive effect of ss 2, 3 and 6.

Section 6—the reach of the act: vertical (and horizontal?) effect

Section 6 is a rather opaque provision. Section 6(1) expressly provides that it is unlawful for a ‘public authority’ to act incompatibly with a Convention Right. In essence, this provision makes incompatibility with a Convention Right a new statutory ground of judicial review, best categorised perhaps as a new sub-category of illegality.

Many of the Convention’s provisions require that government action be measured against a rigorous standard: the requirements that interferences with Art 8 or Art 10 rights be ‘necessary in a democratic society’ are obvious examples.⁴⁷ This level of judicial scrutiny of the lawfulness of government action would in many circumstances seem to be akin to what English administrative lawyers would regard as proportionality review. As noted in chapter fourteen,⁴⁸ English courts have traditionally rejected suggestions that the common law should recognise proportionality as a new ground of review. Section 6 might be thought to render such judicial innovation unnecessary when Convention Rights are in issue. If the domestic courts accepted that Convention Rights contained an identical (or similar) proportionality requirement to that recognised by the ECtHR in respect of Convention articles, then administrative law would become a more intensive mechanism through which the courts could police the lawfulness of ‘government’ action.⁴⁹

What is a public authority within s 6?

A major difficulty thrown up by s 6(1) is identifying which decision-makers are caught by this expanded notion of review; ie what is the meaning of ‘public authority’. The issue of how to draw a line between ‘public’ and ‘private’ organisations/individuals has been a vexed question both in domestic administrative law and EC law over the past thirty years.⁵⁰ The white paper had offered a reasonably lengthy list of ‘public authorities’. This included:

⁴⁷ See ‘Contingent rather than absolute entitlements’, ch 19, pp 591–592 above.

⁴⁸ See ‘III. Proportionality—a new ground of review?’, ch 14, pp 470–473 above.

⁴⁹ For a contemporaneous assessment of what this might entail see the essays in Ellis E (ed) (1999) The principle of proportionality in the laws of Europe; and in particular the contrasting views expressed by Lord Hoffman—‘The influence of the European principle of proportionality upon UK law’ and David Feldman—‘Proportionality and the Human Rights Act 1998’.

...central government (including executive agencies); local government; the police; immigration officers; prisons; courts; and, to the extent that they are exercising public functions, companies responsible for areas of activity which were previously within the public sector, such as privatised utilities.⁵¹

The Act, in contrast, makes no attempt to identify all the various bodies which Parliament envisages should be ‘public authorities’. The definition offered in s 6 of the Act includes ‘courts and tribunals’ and—in a disquieting display of imprecision in s 6(3)(b)—‘any person certain of whose functions are of a public nature’.⁵² Section 6(3)(b) offers a limited, negative definition of the public authority concept. The sub-section states that neither house of Parliament is a public authority for these purposes, nor is a person ‘exercising functions in connection with proceedings in parliament’.

Much interpretative work would thus have to be done by the courts to decide whether a particular person or body was a ‘public authority’, or whether she or it was performing functions having ‘a public nature’. This prospect evidently alarmed several Conservative MPs who criticised the vagueness of the ‘public authority’ formula during the Bill’s passage. It remained to be seen whether the courts’ definition of public authorities would borrow wholesale from common law doctrine on this question, or follow the ECJ’s reasoning, or blend common law and EC law, or create a whole new line of ‘Convention Right’ specific ‘public authorities’. It would be most unfortunate if we were to end up with three quite distinct streams of law on this question for domestic, EC and Convention Right purposes.

Lawful breaches of Convention Rights by public authorities

The Act does not designate a specific procedure through which Convention Rights issues may be raised. Section 7 states that such issues can be addressed; ‘in any legal proceedings’. Section 8 then provides that if a public authority has acted unlawfully per s 6(1), the court may; ‘grant such relief or remedy, or make such order, within its powers as it considers just and appropriate’.⁵³

However, s 6(2) provides that a public authority which breaches a Convention Right does not act unlawfully if it is required to adopt the course it has taken by ‘primary legislation’. The bite of s 6(2)—which effectively provides public authorities with a justification for breaching Convention Rights—would be contingent both on the way in which the courts construed s 3 of the Act and the anterior question of deciding what the content of the invoked Convention Right actually is.⁵⁴

Should a court conclude that the statutory provision under which the public authority was proceeding could be construed in a manner compatible with Convention Rights, ⁵⁰ ‘II. The Post-O’Reilly case law, ch 16, pp 521–528 and ‘V. Direct effect—the saga continues’, ch 11, 380–384 above.

⁵¹ At para 2.2.

⁵² Section 6(5) then tells us that: ‘In relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue of subsection (3)(b) above if the nature of the act is private’.

⁵³ Subsequent provisions of s 8 indicate that courts should be slow to award damages against public authorities for breaches of Convention Rights; and if they do so, awards should be set at a low level.

⁵⁴ Assume a public authority wishes to do X. It acts unlawfully per HRA s 6(1) only if the court holds that: (i) X is incompatible with a Convention Right; and (ii) the public authority is not required by ‘primary legislation’ to do X. A court could conclude that the public authority is not acting unlawfully per HRA s 6(1) either by holding (i) X is not incompatible with a Convention Right or (ii) X is incompatible but is nonetheless the result required by ‘primary legislation’.

s 6(2) would not come into play. In these circumstances, a court exercising a judicial review jurisdiction (which does not permit it to substitute its own judgment for that of the initial decision-maker)⁵⁵ would invalidate the initial decision and remit it to be determined afresh in accordance with a Convention Right compliant construction of the relevant statutory provision.⁵⁶ If the Convention Right issue was raised in private law litigation, such as an action in tort or contract, the court's jurisdiction would of course be as the primary decision-maker. If, in contrast—in either a judicial review or private law action context—the court concluded that the public authority's breach of a Convention Right was unavoidable, s 6(2) precludes a finding of unlawfulness. A court empowered to issue a Declaration of Incompatibility would then consider whether its s 4 power should be invoked.⁵⁷

Section 6(2) is obviously another manifestation of the principle that the Human Rights Act does not (at least directly and overtly) limit the sovereignty of Parliament. The provision's impact was characterised above as providing public authorities with a justification for breaching Convention Rights. An alternative characterisation would be to regard s 6(2) as affirming Parliament's capacity to order executive bodies to act in defiance of accepted human rights norms. That conclusion might be regarded as undesirable in moral or political terms. Its legal impact is nonetheless quite clear. On another important question, however, s 6 seemed woefully lacking in clarity.

Convention Rights and the common law ... again ...

The identification of courts as 'public authorities' in s 6(3) provides a further basis for assuming that the Act requires the judiciary to re-evaluate rules of common law to ensure that those rules are compatible with Convention Rights. A court which resolved litigation on the basis of a rule of common law which was incompatible with a Convention Right would presumably itself be acting unlawfully in a s 6(1) sense, but could not be said to be required to do so by primary legislation. Since—subject to principles of precedent and judicial hierarchy—the courts may alter the common law as they think fit, it would seem that a court should take that course to avoid an incompatibility. The assertion is really no more than a restatement of the analysis offered by Lord Keith in R v R (marital rape exemption).⁵⁸ In this instance it would be the HRA itself which provided the 'changing social, economic developments' which would prompt a modification of the common law.⁵⁹ ⁵⁵ See 'III. Judicial regulation of government behaviour: the constitutional rationale', ch 3, pp 59–62 above.

⁵⁶ If the courts accept that the Human Rights Act requires application of proportionality review to some or all interferences with Convention Rights, a judicial review jurisdiction will more closely approach a substitution of judgment power; see the discussion at 'III. Proportionality—a new ground of review?', ch 14, p 470 above.

⁵⁷ Section 6(2) clearly has no bearing on government action taken through a direct exercise of prerogative powers, although per s 21 it would impact upon prerogative powers exercised through Orders in Council.

⁵⁸ See R v R (rape: marital exemption) (1981), ch 3, p 81 above.

⁵⁹ To similar effect see Kleinwort Benson v Lincoln CC [1999] 2 AC 349 per Lord Browne-Wilkinson at p 358: 'The whole of the common law is judge-made and only by judicial change in the law is the common law kept relevant in a changing world'; and per Lord Goff at p 377: 'It is universally recognised that judicial development of the common law is inevitable. If it had never taken place, the common law would be the same now as it was in the reign of King Henry II; it is because of it that the common law is a living system of law, reacting to new events and new ideas, and so capable of providing the citizens of this country with a system of practical justice relevant to the times in which they live'. My thanks to Andrew Arden QC for reminding me of the relevance of this authority in this context.

Do Convention Rights have 'horizontal effect'?

It is an important characteristic of the 'fundamental' nature of many provisions of EU law that the rights and obligations they create are both 'vertically' and 'horizontally' directly effective; that is enforceable against both government bodies (vertically) and private companies or individuals (horizontally).⁶⁰ Similarly, many common law rules are as enforceable against companies or individuals as against government bodies.⁶¹ Whether the Human Rights Act bestows this universalistic character on the Convention rights was not however made clear by the Act's text. Might an individual, for example, invoke Art 8's right to privacy against a newspaper which publishes stories about her sex life?⁶² Could a court apply Art 9 to prevent a plc from refusing to hire Buddhist or Muslim employees? Could a newspaper, qua defendant in a libel action brought by a politician, rely on Lingen and Castells?⁶³

There is no explicit, textual provision in the Act to the effect that individual or private sector organisations are legally required to respect Convention Rights. Had Parliament wished the Act to have horizontal effect, such a term could certainly have been placed in the legislation.⁶⁴ The absence of any such provision can be taken as strong evidence that Parliament intended that Convention Rights operate only in the vertical plane.

That inference can be reinforced in a contextual sense by considering the reach of the Convention itself as an international law instrument. In proceedings before the ECtHR, the 'defendant' is invariably one of the Convention's Signatory States. As already noted, the Convention contains provisions which enable (but do not require) a state to empower its citizens to initiate actions against it before the ECtHR. The ECHR does not make any provision however for individual citizens to litigate against other individuals or private sector organisations before the Strasbourg court. Actions before the ECtHR instigated by individuals are always 'vertical' in nature;⁶⁵ at least in formal terms.⁶⁶

The courts qua public authority as the route to horizontal effect?

Section 6 can however be read as implicitly lending Convention Rights horizontal effect. The starting point for this argument is the fact that Convention Rights are creatures of domestic law, not—as are Convention articles—of international law. A litigant in a 'horizontal' action would not be relying on the ECHR but on the HRA. Secondly, we might note that s 6(3) designates courts as 'public authorities'. Per s 6(1), therefore, it is 'unlawful' for a court to act incompatibly with a Convention Right; (unless of course it is required so to act by legislation which cannot be interpreted in a Convention Right compliant manner). So far, so simple. But the jurisprudential map drawn by s 6 becomes much more difficult to read from this point on.

⁶⁰ See 'The horizontal direct effect of treaty articles—Walrave and Koch (1974)', ch 11, pp 373–374 above.

⁶¹ Obviously a 'private sector body' is not amenable to judicial review in a direct sense. But, and this is a point sometimes overlooked in the modern era, much of what we now regard as administrative law principle was generated by cases involving bodies which we would not class as 'governmental' in nature. There is a fair amount of common law principle regulating the way in which clubs and societies must conduct their relationships with their members. In effect, these cases apply what we now regard as administrative law ideas as implied terms of the contractual relationship between an individual and a club or society of which she is a member. Dawkins v Antrobus (1881) LR 17 Ch D 615, Lee v Showman's Guild of Great Britain [1952] 2 QB 329 and McInnes v Onslow-Fane [1978] 1 WLR 1520 provide good examples.

⁶² See for example Markesinis B (1986) 'The right to be let alone versus freedom of speech' Public Law 671; (1990) 'Our patchy law of privacy' MLR 802.

⁶³ See 'Political libels', ch 19, pp 602–604 above.

⁶⁴ Ie s 6(1) might read; 'It is unlawful for a public authority or any natural or legal person ...'.

⁶⁵ Although one might suggest—semantically—that actions initiated by one state against another are 'horizontal' in one sense.

⁶⁶ The reason for this caveat is outlined below.

A problem arises because one might take rather different points of view as to who—or what—is really ‘the defendant’ in HRA litigation. This in turn has profound consequences for the effective horizontality of the Act’s effect. The uncertainties can be illustrated by considering several mundane hypothetical scenarios.

Scenario 1: A judicial review action brought by citizen A against the Home Secretary’s use of a prerogative power. Since no statutory power is in issue, neither s 3 nor s 6(2) are relevant. In this scenario, the action is vertical. The Home Secretary is obviously a ‘public authority’. If the High Court concludes that the Home Secretary’s action does not breach a Convention Right, we might assume that in any subsequent appeal the Home Secretary would still be the defendant. However, it could also be suggested that the breach of the Convention Right is triggered here by the High Court’s first instance judgment; that the High Court qua public authority is breaching s 6(1); and that the ‘real’ defendant on appeal is the High Court. The identity of the defendant is of no obvious significance in this scenario—all of the candidates are ‘vertical’ entities.

Scenario 2: We might reach a similar conclusion in scenario 2. Here, a judicial review action is brought by citizen A against the Home Secretary’s use of a statutory power. The Home Secretary is a public authority. The High Court is also a public authority, and is additionally obliged by s 3 to interpret the relevant statutory provision in a manner consistent with the Convention Right. Again, it could be suggested that if the first instance judgment is in the Home Secretary’s favour, either she or the High Court could be seen as the ‘real’ defendant on appeal. Again, the identity of the defendant is of no obvious significance in this scenario as all of the candidates are ‘vertical’ entities.

Scenario 3: An action brought by citizen A against company B, the solution to which turns on the conclusion reached by the court as to the meaning of a particular statutory provision. An action of this sort is nominally horizontal. Company B is not a public authority; (and we may assume that s 6(3)(b) is not relevant here). Three questions then arise. Firstly; notwithstanding the lack of a public authority defendant at first instance, is the court nonetheless obliged by s 3 to give the relevant statutory term a Convention Right compliant interpretation? Secondly; alternatively or additionally, does s 6 require the court to construe the term in a manner compatible with the relevant Convention Right; the rationale being that if the court adopted an orthodox, Convention non-compliant meaning of the provision the court itself would be acting unlawfully? Thirdly, assuming that neither of the first two questions are answered affirmatively, would the first instance court nonetheless become de facto the defendant in a subsequent appeal?

Scenario 4: An action brought by citizen A against company B, the solution to which turns on the conclusion reached by the court as to the content of the common law. Section 3 would not bite here, as no statutory term is in issue. But the second and third questions outlined in scenario 3 above would still be pertinent.

The argument made in scenarios 3 and 4 would afford the Human Rights Act at least de facto horizontal effect through the indirect mechanism of placing the courts through either s 3 or s 6 under a duty to ensure that domestic law conforms to Convention Right requirements. This is an imaginative but by no means implausible reading of the Act’s text.

This textual justification for according Convention Rights de facto horizontal impact can be buttressed by contextual considerations. It is clear that the ECtHR has interpreted some elements of the Convention as founding what would seem to be a ‘horizontal’ remedy. This situation can arise in one of two ways.

Firstly, it arises when the action before the Strasbourg court has emerged from what was ostensibly horizontal litigation in the domestic sphere. Goodwin v United *Kingdom*⁶⁷ is a good example. The litigation began as a suit between private parties, but turned on the interpretation of the Contempt of Court Act 1981, s 10. Before the ECtHR, the ‘real’ defendant was s 10 itself as interpreted by the House of Lords in X Ltd v Morgan-Grampian (Publishers).⁶⁸ The ECtHR’s judgment illustrates the proposition that a Signatory State may breach the Convention if its laws allow individuals to invoke legal protections which unacceptably hamper other individuals’ access to rights identified by the Convention.

The second situation is illustrated by cases such as X and Y v The Netherlands.⁶⁹ X was the father of a mentally handicapped teenager (Y) allegedly raped in the residential facility where she lived. The crux of the Court’s judgment was that both the father and child’s Art 8 rights to private and family life were breached because Dutch criminal law made no effective provision for the prosecution of such alleged crimes. The ECtHR concluded that Art 8 imposed a positive obligation on the Netherlands to introduce such a law because; ‘This is a case where fundamental values and essential aspects of private life are at stake. Effective deterrence is indispensable in this area...’⁷⁰ Similarly, in Marckx v Belgium,⁷¹ the ECtHR held that Belgium was in breach of Art 8 because Belgian law did not allow parents and their illegitimate children to enjoy any legally recognised family relationship at all. The Court’s decision in Malone v United Kingdom can be analysed in a similar way. The United Kingdom was in breach of Art 10 because domestic law contained no provisions at all to safeguard Mr Malone’s Art 8 rights against intrusion by government tapping of his phone. In all three cases, the state’s first step in remedying the breach would be to introduce some law dealing with the relevant issues.⁷²

There is an unhappy lack of clarity in the ECtHR’s jurisprudence as to which articles of the Convention—and in what circumstances—can create such a ‘positive obligation’. And of course it is not necessarily the case that domestic courts would accept that such a positive obligation would arise in respect of any Convention Right. But the principle per se lends weight to the argument that the Human Rights Act might impose a comparable responsibility on domestic courts in some instances of ostensibly horizontal litigation.

A division of academic opinion on the horizontal effect issue ?

Prior to the Human Rights Act coming into force, academic and judicial opinion on the horizontal effect issue was sharply divided. The argument against horizontal effect was strongly put by Buxton LJ in the Law Quarterly Review.⁷³ Buxton LJ’s argument rested primarily on the fact that, under the Convention itself, actions are brought only against Signatory States; ie that they are only vertically effective. The argument is supposedly buttressed, as a matter of implication, by the very mention of ‘public authorities’ in s 6; the inference being that had Parliament intended the Act to be horizontally and vertically effective, it would have inserted the clause ‘or any natural or legal person’ into s 6.

The counter argument was raised by Professor Wade and Murray Hunt.⁷⁴ Their central contention is that since a major element of the courts’ role as ‘public authorities’ is to settle disputes between individuals, the Act’s horizontal impact arises as a matter of necessary ⁶⁷ At ‘Conclusion’, ch 19, pp 612–614 above.

⁶⁸ Ibid. ⁶⁹ (1985) 8 EHRR 235.

⁷⁰ Ibid., at para 27 (original emphasis).

⁷¹ (1979) 2 EHRR 330.

⁷² That law would in turn be subject to evaluation against the yardsticks (cf the ‘necessary in a democratic society’ test) applied by the Convention. ⁷³ (2000) ‘The Human Rights Act and private law’ LQR 48.

⁷⁴ Wade HRW (2000) ‘Horizons of horizontality’ LQR 217; Hunt M (1998) ‘The “horizontal effect” of the Human Rights Act’ Public Law 423. See also Bamforth N (1999) ‘The application of the Human Rights Act to public authorities and private bodies’ Cambridge LJ 159; Phillipson G (1999) ‘The Human Rights Act, “horizontal effect” and the common law: a bang or a whimper’ MLR 824.

implication. Wade further makes the point that accepting the horizontality of the Act would much reduce the problem of deciding whether or not a body is a 'public authority' for this purpose.⁷⁵ Hunt also suggests that the Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence of the US Supreme Court on the construction of common law ruled as 'State action' may prove particularly instructive to United Kingdom judges on this issue. The Fourteenth Amendment is notionally directed only at 'State action' which infringes certain human rights principles, notably a freedom from racial discrimination. However the US Supreme Court's 1948 judgment in *Shelley v Kramer*⁷⁶ clearly gave the Fourteenth Amendment an effective horizontal impact. In Shelley, the Supreme Court held that a racist restrictive covenant negotiated between individuals could not be enforced by State courts in an action between private individuals as any judgment issued by a court would be 'state action' within the Fourteenth Amendment.

One might also note that if Buxton LJ's view is correct, an applicant whose 'Convention rights' have been infringed by a 'private body' can still make an application direct to the ECtHR to begin an action against the UK.⁷⁷ If the point of the Act is indeed to 'bring rights home', that consequence would seem rather silly.

Anthony Lester and David Pannick urged the courts to adopt a more subtle technique to give Convention Rights horizontal effect. Their proposition essentially suggested that the court should regard the Human Rights Act as a parliamentary invitation to accelerate innovation at common law to prevent individuals interfering unjustifiably with other people's Convention Rights:

The correct way involves approaching the Convention rights through domestic law rather than round domestic law... The central legislative purpose [of the 1998 Act] is that of bringing the Convention rights home, that is of domesticating them so that they are not regarded as alien rights protected exclusively by a 'foreign' European Court... [I]t is especially important to weave the Convention rights into the principles of the common law and of equity...⁷⁸

The Blair government's intention as to horizontal effect?

Which of these various views would prove the more compelling to the courts remained to be seen. It is however an unhappy indictment of Parliament's approach to this legislation that so important a matter was not clearly settled by the text of the Act itself. Reference to Hansard along the lines permitted by *Pepper v Hart*⁷⁹ will apparently not provide the courts with obvious assistance on this point. Lord Irvine observed at the Bill's second reading in the Lords:

[I]t is right as a matter of principle for the courts to have the duty of acting compatibly with the Convention not only in cases involving other public authorities but also in developing the common law in deciding cases between individuals. Why should they not? In preparing this Bill, we have taken the view that it is the other course, that of excluding Convention considerations altogether from cases between individuals, which would have to be justified.⁸⁰

⁷⁵ (2000) op cit at p 223. The obvious point against this assertion is that the Act expressly recognises in s 6(5) that persons who are 'public authorities' when discharging functions of a 'public nature' are not public authorities when discharging functions of a private nature. This seems implicitly to accept a public/private or vertical/horizontal divide within the Act.

⁷⁶ 334 US 1 (1948).

⁷⁷ Wade cites Young, James and Webster v United Kingdom (1981) 4 EHRR 38 and A v United Kingdom (1998) 27 EHRR 611 to support this point; (2000) op cit at p 219.

⁷⁸ (2000) 'The impact of the Human Rights Act on private law: the knight's move' LQR 380 at 383.

⁷⁹ See 'Opening Pandora's box?', ch 8, pp 245–246 above.

⁸⁰ HLD 24 November 1997 c 783.

While that passage points firmly towards the conclusion that the Act was intended to have horizontal effect, at a later point in his speech Lord Irvine said that; '[The Act] should apply only to public authorities, however defined, and not to individuals'.⁸¹ Lord Irvine's evidently inconsistent views have unsurprisingly been invoked as persuasive authority by both Buxton LJ and Professor Wade to support their respective arguments. One can also find passages in Lord Irvine's speeches on the Bill in the Lords which seem strongly to approve the Lester/Pannick strategy.⁸² The only conclusion we might safely draw from this is that resort to Hansard is by no means a panacea to cure all the interpretative ills caused by textual ambiguities in legislation.

At the point when the Bill was enacted, commentators could do little more than surmise that once the Act came into force, a significant portion of domestic 'administrative law' might have to concern itself with regulating relationships between individuals, rather than between individuals and various state bodies. In effect, the Act could introduce a public law dimension to what have previously been regarded as issues purely of private law.

A special status for churches and the press?

Few substantial amendments were made to the Bill during its passage. The Church of England expressed grave concern—voiced by the bishops in the House of Lords—that its religious freedom would be unacceptably curbed if it were to be subject to the Act. The government was evidently moved by these plaintive representations, although whether from a belief in their intrinsic desirability or a concern to avoid possible obstruction of the Bill in the Lords is not entirely clear. Section 13 of the Act requires that courts pay 'particular regard' to the Convention's protection of religious freedom. The inference would seem to be that should, for example, the Church of England or any other religious body wish to discriminate against its employees on grounds of race, gender or sexual orientation, it might be able to invoke the principle of freedom of religious belief to trump these competing entitlements. The amendment is a substantive obscenity, as are the sentiments of the Church of England which lies behind it—namely that there is no obvious linkage between Christian values and respect for human rights. It is unfortunate that the concession was made, and one might hope that it proves of little substantive value to its progenitors when it comes to be interpreted by the courts.

Some media organisations were evidently also much concerned that the Act would curb media freedom, primarily by stimulating the growth of an indigenous privacy law. The concern seemed hugely overstated, as the European Court on Human Rights has shown little willingness to allow privacy considerations to trump press freedom in respect of news coverage with a political or public interest dimension.⁸³ Lobbying of Ministers, particularly by Lord Wakeham, the Chairman of the Press Complaints Commission, nonetheless led to the insertion of what would seem a wholly superfluous amendment. Mirroring the favoured status afforded to religious groups in s 13, s 12 requires courts to have 'particular regard' to freedom of expression principles when, inter alia, the litigation before it concerns information which it would in the 'public interest' to be published.

⁸¹ Ibid, at cc 1231–1232.

⁸² See for example HLD 24 November 1997 cc 784–785.

⁸³ See Tierney S (1998) 'Press freedom and public interest' European Human Rights LR 419.

Questions of procedure

While the Act undoubtedly expands the substantive scope of administrative law, its procedural implications seem more ambiguous. The Act's locus standi requirements raise a potentially awkward problem for the courts to resolve.⁸⁴ As noted above, s 7 permits Convention Rights issues to be raised in; 'any legal proceedings'. However, s 7 also provides that only a 'victim' of an alleged infringement of the Convention may bring an action under the Act. The concept of 'victim' is borrowed from Art 25 of the Convention itself.⁸⁵ The concept is a narrow one, which requires claimants to be personally affected by the action being impugned. The ECHR test is undoubtedly more expansive than the restrictive notion of a 'private legal right' which used to govern the grant of standing for the declaration and injunction in English law prior to the introduction of the Order 53 reforms in 1977.⁸⁶ Thus, for example, in *Dudgeon v United Kingdom*⁸⁷ and Norris v Ireland,⁸⁸ the gay male applicants would have been regarded as 'victims' of their countries' criminalisation of homosexual practices even though they themselves had not been subject to a prosecution. Conversely, in Leigh, Guardian Newspapers Ltd and Observer Ltd v United Kingdom,⁸⁹ the Commission did not accept that all journalists were 'victims' of a House of Lords' decision upholding a lower court's refusal to disclose documents to journalists even though the documents concerned had been read out in court.

There is an obvious tension in the ECtHR's case law on this point. On the one hand, as the Court made clear in Klass v Germany, that it would not allow procedural questions to frustrate achievement of the Convention's substantive objectives.⁹⁰ This concern points towards a liberal interpretation of Art 25. On the other hand, a more restrictive test would be helpful in ensuring that cranks and busybodies are excluded from the Court, in reducing the likelihood that litigation is used by pressure groups as in effect a surrogate political process, and in preventing the Court being overwhelmed with work.

Domestic courts will now also face this tension. But the Act's importation of Art 25 into domestic law creates a further problem for United Kingdom judges. The Act does not abolish—but rather expressly preserves in s 11—an individual citizen's right to maintain an action for an infringement of an existing common law right as an addition or alternative to an action alleging breach of a Convention Right entitlement.⁹¹

This raises a difficulty from a locus standi perspective, since, as noted in chapter seventeen, the UK courts have latterly made it easier for individuals and pressure groups to challenge the legality of government decisions against a common law yardstick. Recent judgments on standing have taken significant steps towards the point where a reputable claimant with a plausible legal argument can use a judicial review action and the publicity such hearings provide as an alternative or supplement to the political process. But the claimants who feature in these cases are not obviously 'victims' in the sense envisaged by ⁸⁴ See Marriot J and Nicol D (1999) 'The Human Rights Act, representative standing and the victim culture' European Human Rights LR 730.

⁸⁵ For a helpful summary of the European Court's case law on Art 25 see Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick op cit pp 630–638. ⁸⁶ See 'Declaration and injunction—a restrictive test?', ch 17, pp 537–541 above.

⁸⁷ (1981) 4 EHRR 149. ⁸⁸ (1988) 13 EHRR 186.

⁸⁹ (No 10039/82) (1984) 38 DR 74. ⁹⁰ (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

⁹¹ Section 11. Safeguard for existing human rights.

A person's reliance on a Convention right does not restrict—

(a) any other right or freedom conferred on him by or under any law having effect in any part of the United Kingdom; or

(b) his right to make any claim or bring any proceedings which he could make or bring apart from sections 7 to 9.

the Human Rights Act. They are more accurately seen as ‘representatives’ of victims.⁹² They arguably perform a useful public service in bringing potentially unlawful government action into a forum where that action’s lawfulness can be assessed.

That they should not be permitted to do so in respect of alleged breaches of human rights seems most curious. Many individuals who are personally affected by an alleged breach of the Convention may lack the financial resources and the expertise to marshal an effective legal argument, particularly as the Act has been introduced at a time when the legal aid budget is being reduced. It also seems improbable that many lawyers will accept conditional fee arrangements to pursue Convention cases, given that the European Court has traditionally set ‘damages’ for breaches of the Convention at a very low level. Section 8 of the Act explicitly links any awards of damages for a breach of Convention rights to the ECtHR’s ‘just satisfaction’ principles. While it is conceivable that a court might under s 8 depart from these principles or that the courts will recognise breach of human rights as a head of damage at common law—it seems at present most unlikely that the quantum available will be substantial. Some lawyers may expand their provision of pro bono work to pick up Convention litigation, particularly in high profile cases, but this offers no guarantee of effective representation on any systemic scale.

The Act’s attempts to use standing rules to close the Convention door to well-resourced, expert pressure groups might thus be thought appreciably to reduce the efficacy of its substantive provisions. During the Bill’s passage, the government acknowledged in the House of Commons that it was quite likely that groups such as Amnesty and Greenpeace could achieve locus standi de facto by sponsoring and funding any action launched by a ‘real’ victim. If that is indeed the case, the Act’s restrictive position de jure seems unnecessary. Even at its most benevolent, the English law of standing has never opened the doors of the courts to cranks, busybodies and vexatious litigants.

We were thus faced with the unwelcome prospect that our public law procedures could contain two streams of administrative law controls on government running side-by-side. The one a common law stream which offers claimants easy access to the courts but limited grounds against which to measure the acceptability of the impugned government action; the other a Convention Right stream which, while offering significantly more extensive grounds of review, will be more difficult for a claimant to enter.

The government made some attempt to address this problem in what is now s 7(3). This provides that a claimant who raises a Convention Right claim via proceedings for judicial review will only have ‘sufficient interest in the matter to which the application relates’⁹³ if she is a ‘victim’ of the action impugned. This seems an unnecessarily illiberal provision. But it would also seem to be ineffective. This becomes apparent when one considers that our courts have been suggesting with increasing frequency that many Convention Right principles already have precise counterparts in the common law. The non-victim applicant could therefore seek locus standi for an application for judicial review on the basis that a common law right, not a Convention Right, has been infringed. Having been granted standing in accordance with our increasingly liberal domestic law, she might then argue that the common law right she is invoking should now be construed in a way that mirrors the protections offered by the Convention Right. By adopting this strategy, the claimant will by-pass the Human Rights Act’s less accommodating locus standi rules without depriving herself de facto of the substantive protection the Act is intended to provide.

⁹² See the discussion by Cane (1995) op cit.

⁹³ The formula is taken from s 31(3) of the Supreme Court Act 1981.

The courts would seem to have two choices in attempting to resolve this contradiction. The first would be to adopt a more expansive interpretation of ‘victim’ than is favoured by the ECtHR. That would seem undesirable, both because it runs counter to Parliament’s evident intentions and because it would involve an outright rejection by domestic courts of the legal principles developed by the ECtHR itself. The second would be for our domestic law of standing to become more restrictive. There is no legal impediment to the courts reversing the recent trend towards more liberal standing laws, but it would seem unlikely that they would be willing to do so given that the consequences of such a reversal would be to reduce the extent to which government action is subject to judicial scrutiny. Neither option seems particularly attractive, which would suggest that in respect of this part of the Act the unhappy result the courts will have to pursue is to decide which choice amounts to the lesser evil.

This concern is reinforced when one considers the issue of time limits. The rather brief presumptive three-month limit for initiating actions via judicial review has been one of the main reasons for claimants seeking to challenge government action through private law proceedings, in which time limits are considerably more generous. Section 7(5)(a) of the Act imposes a maximum time limit of one year on the commencement of action relying on Convention rights, while s 7(5)(b) provides that this ‘is subject to any rule imposing a stricter time limit in relation to the procedure in question’. This presumably means that any Convention based challenge brought by judicial review will have to be begun at most within three months.⁹⁴

It would seem that if a claimant wishes to raise a Convention argument in an action in tort, contract or restitution, she must begin that action within a year, or run the risk of the Convention points being struck out.⁹⁵ Section 7(5)(b) grants the court a power to disregard the time limit if it considers that would be equitable in the circumstances, but this is a provision which—to put it kindly—is rather vague.

On the separation of powers

There appear to be firm grounds for accepting the argument that the Act gives too much power to the government at the expense of ‘Parliament’. In its original form, cl 10 of the Human Rights Bill proposed to empower the government to respond to a declaration of incompatibility by issuing an Order in Council amending or repealing the relevant statutory provision concerned. Except in ‘urgent’ cases, the Order would not have legal effect unless issued in draft form and subsequently approved by a resolution of both houses within sixty days. In urgent cases however, a draft Order would have immediate effect, and while it would lapse if it were not approved by a resolution of both houses within forty days, the government could have re-issued it (seemingly ad infinitum).

From a separation of powers/parliamentary sovereignty perspective, the objections to these proposals were obvious. In an ‘urgent’ case, cl 10 would empower the government to repeal legislation even if it could not command majority support for its views in both houses. Assessing ‘urgency’, it seemed, was a matter for the subjective discretion of the relevant Secretary of State. In non-urgent cases, cl 10 would have required the government to command majority support for its proposed remedy in each house. What it did not require was that the measure receive the same degree of scrutiny—and hence the same level of publicity—as would attach to a proposed reform effected by new primary legislation.

⁹⁴ See Nicol D (1999) ‘Limitation periods under the Human Rights Act 1998 and judicial review’ LQR 216.

⁹⁵ The stricter limit clearly does not apply in relation to Convention points which are raised as a defence in proceedings initiated by another person or institution, but does apply to counter-claims initiated in response to another action.

The clause clearly proposed a substantial extension of de facto legislative power to the government, a step manifestly incompatible with the constitutional presumption that Parliament is the only legislative body within the United Kingdom. The government's response to such criticisms of cl 10 was rather modest. As enacted, s 10(2) provides that;

If a Minister of the Crown considers that there are compelling reasons for proceeding under this section, he may by order make such amendments to the legislation as he considers necessary to remove the incompatibility.

Professor Ewing has suggested that s 10(2) represented a substantial concession by the government: 'The result is to restore the principle that primary legislation should be amended or repealed only by primary legislation'.⁹⁶ The 'compelling reasons' caveat is seen as a residual power, and one that will in any event be subject to judicial review. This seems a curious conclusion. The initial responsibility for deciding if an issue is 'compelling' will rest with the Minister. While framed in subjective terms, her power under s 10(2) is obviously subject to the limitations imposed by administrative law. But it is arguable that these will be extremely loose constraints. If one takes human rights seriously, it might be thought any breach of a Convention Right provides 'compelling' grounds for immediate remedial action. What is being infringed is, after all, a fundamental human right. At most, judicial control of this particular power is likely to be premised on grounds of Wednesbury unreasonableness. It seems improbable that a court would be pre-disposed to obstruct a ministerial action which is intended to remedy a legal wrong which a superior court had itself identified a short time previously.

It could be suggested that this entire debate on the way the 1998 Act affects the balance of power between 'Parliament' and the executive is a silly indulgence in abstract theorisation, which has minimal relevance to the realities of political power. Governments with reliable Commons majorities have for most practical (ie legislative) purposes been Parliament in the post-war era. This might suggest that the only sensible way to give some worthwhile empirical effect to an idealised understanding of the separation of powers is to break the link between bare Commons majorities and legislative authority when fundamental human rights are in issue. But this is one thing the Human Rights Act makes no attempt to do.

Political entrenchment? A new 'rights' culture within government and parliament

Whether the Act produces a degree of 'moral entrenchment' for Convention rights would be dependent as much on Ministers' and Parliament's ability to avoid taking decisions or enacting statutes which breached Convention Rights as on their readiness to respond to judicial condemnation of measures which already exist. The Act contains several provisions designed to prevent, rather than just cure, contravention of Convention principles.

Section 19 requires a Minister piloting a Bill through either house to certify prior to the second reading either that she is satisfied that the measure is compatible with the Convention, or that she believes it to be incompatible but nevertheless wishes it to proceed. The white paper argued that this obligation; 'will ensure that all ministers, their departments and officials are fully seized of the gravity of the Convention's obligations in respect of human rights'.⁹⁷ The white paper also anticipated that the requirement would lead to the creation of inter-departmental working groups of lawyers and administrators within central government; 'meeting on a regular basis to ensure that a consistent approach is taken and to ensure that developments in case law are well understood'.⁹⁸

⁹⁶ (1999) op cit at p 93.

What actually happens within Parliament in respect of s 19 may also raise contentious legal questions. MPs who fancied themselves—with or without good cause—as legal experts would surely not resist the temptation to challenge the accuracy of the Minister's certification. This would obviously make the Bill's conformity with the Convention a subject of sustained debate during second reading, at the committee and report stages, and again at third reading. The white paper did not seem to anticipate this. The Commons in particular is much pressed for time in discharging its legislative business. Section 19 might well encourage every opponent of a government Bill⁹⁹ to eat up significant amounts of time by questioning the measure's vires vis-à-vis the Convention. While this might have what many observers would consider the welcome consequence that less legislation would be passed, what might alternatively ensue is that the substantive merits of Bills (above and beyond their conformity with the Convention) would receive an even more cursory examination in the Commons than is offered at present.

Nor was it clear what the legal position would be if a Minister fails to make a s 19 certification, or is alleged to have done so in bad faith, or to have come to a wholly unsustainable conclusion as to the Bill's compatibility with the Convention. There would presumably not be any scope for a court subsequently to hold that an Act which has not been certified in accordance with s 19 is invalid, since that would entail a rejection of parliamentary sovereignty.

Conclusion

The Blair government's rapid and determined efforts to convince Parliament to pass the Human Rights Act offers clear confirmation that members of the first New Labour administration did not share the simplistic view of 'democracy' embraced by the Conservative Party during the judicial supremacism episode. The 1998 Act may obviously be criticised on the basis that it transfers a dangerous amount of political power from the government to the judges. But the sentiments evinced by many Conservative MPs on this issue had little to commend them from a constitutional perspective. Properly construed, Convention Rights have no role at all to play within the field occupied by mainstream party politics. Rather, their whole purpose is to try to lift certain basic moral values above the sphere of party politics. The Convention offers an understanding of democracy which has a substantive rather than just a procedural dimension. It is concerned not just with how governmental power is won, but also with how it is subsequently used. It rejects the simple homily that everything a democratically elected government does must be democratic just because the government was elected.

The Convention represents an attempt to fashion a wide-ranging substantive notion of democracy based on broad consensus. It rests on moral principles which are assumed to cut across not just party political boundaries, but also historical and geographical frontiers. It is unarguable that a judgment of a UK court which concludes that the action of a public authority has breached a Convention Right, or a declaration that a statute is incompatible with a Convention Right, does indeed disclose 'undemocratic' behaviour.

⁹⁷ At para 3.4.

⁹⁸ At para 3.5.

⁹⁹ Section 19 seems not to reach to private members Bills or private Bills.

However it is not necessarily the court's behaviour which has that characteristic; rather it may be the behaviour of the government or Parliament. What the Blair government seemed clearly to have understood—and the point that eludes critics of so-called 'judicial supremacism'—is that the Human Rights Act does not subordinate government to the courts, but to the moral principles articulated in the Convention. The courts figure in this new constitutional equation only because Parliament has taken the view that judges are better equipped than politicians to draw the preliminary conclusion as to whether those moral principles have been compromised.

This is however an innovation—albeit a radical one—which operates only in the sphere of administrative law. For it leaves the power to draw the final conclusion in the same hands—namely those of a bare majority of members of the Commons¹⁰⁰ who between them may have garnered the electoral support of barely one third of the voting population. The Human Rights Act thus readily lends itself to characterisation as a repository of legally contingent political values. It provides further mechanisms for preventing the exercise of political power in extremist directions, be they to the left or the right, only for so long as centrist political sentiment commands the support of a majority of members of the House of Commons. What it does not do is provide any long-term legal underpinnings for centrist values if majoritarian sentiment should at some future date lurch violently to the left or right. For this reason, it is regrettable the Blair government seemed to write off any attempt to engineer a new legal settlement premised on legally entrenched fundamental rights. It is not until a government grasps that particular nettle that talk of a constitutional revolution will be well-founded.

While the Act received the Royal Assent in 1998, most of its provisions did not come immediately into effect. Section 22(3) granted the Home Secretary the power to decide at what date(s) the other parts of the legislation would be effective. The government had made it clear that full implementation of the Act could not occur until the many tribunal members, magistrates and judges who would be required to apply its terms had received extensive training with respect both to the Act itself and the relevant provisions of the Convention. This process evidently took longer than the government had initially expected, with the result that the target date for bringing the Act fully into force was set for October 2000. Further delay was apparently caused by the government's dawning realisation that the impact of the Act would touch upon many more areas of domestic law than had hitherto been anticipated.¹⁰¹ In the interim period, however, the status of fundamental rights at common law had not been standing still.

Rather than construe the Act as a legislative 'takeover' of the common law's emergent fundamental human rights jurisprudence, some judges seem to have seen it a spur to continuing innovation. In R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Simms,¹⁰² the House of Lords substantially extended the principle set out by the Court of Appeal in Leech.¹⁰³ In Simms, the Court broadened still further the concept of 'access to the courts' to include a prisoner's entitlement to conduct face to face interviews with journalists who the prisoner was trying to persuade to investigate his claims that he was the victim of a miscarriage of justice. Lord Steyn's leading judgment appeared to proceed on the basis that the common law had by this point absorbed both the substantive values and the methodological requirements of Art 10 ECHR. In a concurring opinion Lord Hoffman underlined the constitutional principle that it was entirely proper for the courts ¹⁰⁰ I assume that the Commons majority could if necessary invoke the Parliament Act 1949 to override a Lords veto.

¹⁰¹ The Times, 5 May 1999.

¹⁰² [2000] 2 AC 115, [1999] 3 All ER 400, HL.

¹⁰³ See 'R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Leech (no 2)', ch 20, pp 621–622 above.

to approach the construction of legislation issues in a way that required Parliament to use absolutely explicit language if it wished to impinge upon human rights entitlements:

Parliamentary sovereignty means that Parliament can, if it chooses, legislate contrary to fundamental principles of human rights. The Human Rights Act 1998 will not detract from this power. The constraints upon its exercise by Parliament are ultimately political, not legal. But the principle of legality means that Parliament must squarely confront what it is doing and accept the political cost. Fundamental rights cannot be overridden by general or ambiguous words. *This is because there is too great a risk that the full implications of their unqualified meaning may have passed unnoticed in the democratic process.*¹⁰⁴

In a similar, if more significant, extension of the common law's protection of freedom of expression, the House of Lords accepted in *Reynolds v Times Newspapers Ltd*¹⁰⁵ that a variant of the qualified privilege defence would frequently be available to defendants who had published libellous stories about elected politicians.¹⁰⁶ This innovation in the content of the common law may have occurred without the prospect of the Human Rights Act coming into force, but it is apparent that the Court considered that the Act legitimised such a development and—filling a gap left by the text of the Act—suggested that the legislation would as a matter of general principle require courts to alter the common law in order to ensure its compatibility with Convention Rights.¹⁰⁷

In Fitzpatrick v Sterling Housing Association Ltd,¹⁰⁸ the House of Lords offered an illustration of the way in which developments of common law principles—here the approach taken to statutory interpretation—could render the vertical/horizontal debate in respect of the Human Rights Act quite redundant. The judgment rested on an innovative use of the 'always speaking' principle¹⁰⁹ to read legislation initially passed in the 1920s to hold that non-heterosexual couples could be regarded as members of the same (ie each other's) family for the purposes of inheriting a tenancy in a flat owned by a private individual.

Such developments indicated that the courts would approach the implementation of the Human Rights with considerable enthusiasm for the project of 'giving better effect'

¹⁰⁴ [2000] 2 AC 115 at 131; emphasis added. This reference to the 'democratic' basis for a rigorous standard of judicial review is more fully developed by Lord Steyn in a subsequently published lecture; (2002) 'Democracy through law' European Human Rights LR 723. The lecture is a powerful corrective to the viewpoint that judicial lawmaking is an 'undemocratic' phenomenon.

¹⁰⁵ [2001] 2 AC 127, [1999] 4 All ER 609.

¹⁰⁶ See Loveland I (2000) 'Reynolds v Times Newspapers in the House of Lords' Public Law 351; Williams K (2000) 'Defaming politicians: the not so common law' Modern LR 748.

¹⁰⁷ See especially Lord Nicholls [2001] 2 AC 127 at 200 (emphasis added):

My starting point is freedom of expression. The high importance of freedom to impart and receive information and ideas has been stated so often and so eloquently that this point calls for no elaboration in this case. At a pragmatic level, freedom to disseminate and receive information on political matters is essential to the proper functioning of the system of parliamentary democracy cherished in this country. This freedom enables those who elect representatives to Parliament to make an informed choice, regarding individuals as well as policies, and those elected to make informed decisions. Freedom of expression will shortly be buttressed by statutory requirements. Under section 12 of the Human Rights Act 1998, expected to come into force in October 2000, the court is required, in relevant cases, to have particular regard to the importance of the right to freedom of expression. The common law is to be developed and applied in a manner consistent with article 10 of the European Convention..., and the court must take into account relevant decisions of the European Court of Human Rights (sections 6 and 2). To be justified, any curtailment of freedom of expression must be convincingly established by a compelling countervailing consideration, and the means employed must be proportionate to the end sought to be achieved'.

¹⁰⁸ [2001] 1 AC 27.

¹⁰⁹ See 'Complicating the literal rule: (most) statutory provisions are "always speaking"', ch 3, pp 64–65 above.

in the domestic legal system to Convention jurisprudence. In the following chapter, we assess whether that prediction was well-founded.

Suggested further reading

Academic commentary

Steyn, Lord (2002) 'Democracy through law' European Human Rights LR 723

Bamforth N (1998) 'Parliamentary sovereignty and the Human Rights Act 1998' Public Law 572

Boateng P and Straw J (1996) Bringing Rights Home

—(1997) 'Bringing rights home: Labour plans to incorporate the ECHR into UK Law' European Human Rights LR 71

Ewing K (1999) 'The Human Rights Act and parliamentary democracy' MLR 79

Hunt M (1998) 'The "horizontal effect" of the Human Rights Act' Public Law 423

Lester A and Pannick D (2000) 'The impact of the Human Rights Act on private law: the knight's move' LQR 380

Wade HRW (2000) 'Horizons of horizontality' LQR 217

Feldman D (1999) 'Proportionality and the Human Rights Act 1998', in Ellis E (ed) The principle of proportionality in the laws of Europe (Oxford: Hart Publishing)

Case law and legislation

R v DPP, ex p Kebilene [2000] 2 AC 326, [1999] 4 All ER 801

R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Simms [2000] 2 AC 115, [1999] 3 All ER 400, HL

Lord Chancellor's Department (1997) Rights Brought Home: the Human Rights Bill

Chapter 22

Human Rights V: The Impact of the Human Rights Act 1998

Twelve years after the Human Rights Act had come into force, a substantial body of case law dealing with its effect has accumulated.¹ This chapter analyses some leading cases in which the courts have addressed different aspects of the Act, and draws out the constitutional implications of the courts' initial conclusions. The matters addressed are: firstly, the interlinked issues of the extent to which the courts have recognised a distinction between Convention articles and Convention Rights, the approach taken to statutory interpretation mandated by s 3 and the use of Declarations of Incompatibility under s 4; secondly, the doctrine of judicial 'deference' to legislative policy decisions; thirdly, the 'horizontal-ity' of the Act and its impact on the development of the common law; and fourthly, the status of proportionality as a ground of review of executive action. The concluding section of the chapter considers to what extent the Act may have triggered a shift in understandings as to the proper scope of the doctrines of the sovereignty of Parliament and the rule of law within the modern constitutional order.

I. Convention Rights and Convention articles under s 2, statutory interpretation under s 3 and the use of declarations of incompatibility under s 4

The interactive effect of ss 2–4 is perhaps the most important issue raised by the Act. To what extent have the courts accepted (through s 2) that the substantive meaning of Convention Rights is the same as that of the textually identical Convention Article and (through s 3) that they should now abandon traditional attachments to literalist approaches to statutory interpretation and adopt instead a teleological technique in which the telos (purpose) is to uphold Convention Rights in a manner consistent with ECHR jurisprudence? An acceptance that Convention Rights and Convention articles are substantively as well as textually identical coupled with a radical divergence from orthodox techniques of statutory interpretation in defence of those Convention Rights would have significant implications in a theoretical sense for the meaning of the principle of the separation of powers. In a more practical sense, any such judicial innovation would entail an appreciable transfer of effective governmental power away from executive bodies and towards the (European and domestic) judiciary.

¹ For an assessment of the immediate impact of the Act see Selgado E and O'Brien C (2001) 'Table of cases under the Human Rights Act' European Human Rights Law Review 376; Arkinstall J and O'Brien C (2002) 'Table of cases under the Human Rights Act' European Human Rights LR 364; and—more analytically—Klug F and Starmer K (2001) 'Incorporation through the "front door": the first year of the Human Rights Act' Public Law 654.

Furthermore, in so far as our perceptions as to the correct nature of the relationship between Parliament and the courts rest in large part on the presumption that judges should take a literalist approach to statutory interpretation, s 3 also opened up the possibility of an adjustment having to be made to longstanding orthodoxies concerning the meaning of the sovereignty of Parliament. It is undoubtedly possible to identify judgments in which the courts have embraced very expansive understandings of s 3. It would however be an exaggeration to suggest that such an approach had become a new dominant paradigm within domestic law.

The initial judicial reaction

One of the most radical departures from orthodox approaches to statutory interpretation is the Marleasing/Litster methodology mandated by EC law. This technique requires courts to add ‘missing’ clauses to domestic legislation in order to secure compatibility with EC law. In R v A (No 2),² the House of Lords indicated that HRA s 3 could have a similar effect in relation to Convention Rights.

R v A (2001): the divergent views of Lord Steyn and Lord Hope

The legislation at issue in R v A (No 2) concerned the admissibility of evidence in a rape trial relating to a complainant’s previous sexual behaviour. Section 41 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 seemed to bar any evidence being adduced during a rape trial which might support the assertion that the defendant had had a consensual sexual relationship with the alleged victim, unless the evidence related to consensual sexual relations which occurred (per s 41(3)(b)); ‘at or about the same time’ as the alleged rape. Section 41 was enacted to prevent defence counsel seeking to discredit alleged rape victims by subjecting them to irrelevant questioning about past sexual behaviour. The difficulty the provision raised from a Convention Right perspective was that it could rule out the admission of evidence relevant to the trial, and thereby breach the ‘fair trial’ requirements of Art 6 of Sch 1 of the HRA.

Lord Steyn’s leading judgment proceeded on the basis that such a rule was inconsistent with Art 6 ECHR and therefore—without discussion—with Art 6 of Sch 1 as well. His primary focus was on s 3. Lord Steyn suggested that domestic courts should not make immediate resort to s 3 in construing other legislation. If it appeared prima facie that a literal construction of a statutory provision would breach a Convention Right, courts should first consider whether; ‘ordinary methods of purposive and contextual interpretation’³ could yield Convention compliant results. Only if ‘ordinary methods’ were inadequate should s 3 be invoked.

In the instant case, Lord Steyn doubted that ‘ordinary methods’ would suffice. He thus turned to s 3:

The interpretive principle under s 3 of the 1998 Act is a strong one. ... [It] goes far beyond the rule which enabled the courts to take the Convention into account in resolving any ambiguity in a legislative provision. ... In accordance with the will of Parliament as reflected in s 3 it will ² [2001] UKHL 25, [2002] 1 AC 45.

³ Ibid, at para 43.

sometimes be necessary to adopt an interpretation which linguistically may appear strained. The techniques to be used will not only involve the reading down of express language in a statute, but also the implication of provisions...⁴

Adopting this approach, Lord Steyn construed the relevant statutory provision in a way compatible with the Convention Right by reading into s 41 an addendum that permitted use of such evidence where it was obviously relevant to the particular case.

Lord Hope also accepted that there was no divergence between the substantive meanings of Art 6 ECHR and Art 6 of Sch 1, although in his view s 41 was compatible with Art 6. However, Lord Hope's judgment indicated that he felt Lord Steyn's approach to s 3 overstepped appropriate constitutional boundaries:

The rule of construction which s 3 lays down is quite unlike any previous rule of statutory interpretation. There is no need to identify an ambiguity or an absurdity. Compatibility with convention rights is the sole guiding principle. That is the paramount objective which the rule seeks to achieve. But the rule is only a rule of interpretation. It does not entitle the judges to act as legislators.⁵

It is not problematic to support the abstract assertion that our constitutional traditions allocate the task of making legislation to Parliament and of interpreting legislation to the courts. It is lending practical meaning to such abstractions that causes difficulty.

In the context of Human Rights Act adjudication, that task is further complicated by the higher courts' s 4 power to issue declarations of incompatibility in respect of statutory provisions which cannot be construed in a way that lends them a Convention compliant character. Lord Steyn's judgment in R v A (No 2) had echoed the Home Secretary's assumption during the passage of the HRA that the courts' s 4 power would not often be invoked: 'A declaration of incompatibility is a measure of last resort... It must be avoided unless it is plainly impossible to do so.'

The frequency with which s 4 is used will depend largely on the way in the courts construe their interpretive powers under s 3. Lord Steyn's 'last resort' approach to s 4 obviously has greater credibility when viewed in conjunction with his readiness to 'strain' or 'add to' the text of ostensibly Convention non-compliant statutory terms. In contrast, the more conservative interpretive technique advocated by Lord Hope in R v A might be thought to lead to more frequent use of declarations of incompatibility.

Wilson v First County Trust (2001) in the Court of Appeal

That Lord Steyn and Lord Hope's respective analyses in A indicated a diversity of views within the judiciary as to the nature of s 3 (and thence the role of s 4) is illustrated by the Court of Appeal's almost contemporaneous treatment of an apparently Convention Right non-compliant statutory provision in Wilson v First County Trust (No 2).⁶ The case concerned s 127 of the Consumer Credit Act 1974—a statute which might not initially be thought to raise Convention Right issues at all. Section 127 of the Act placed an absolute bar on recovery of assets by a creditor from a debtor if certain formalities had not been complied with when the credit agreement between the parties had been concluded. In Wilson, counsel for the creditor succeeded in convincing the trial court and the Court of Appeal that this provision, if literally construed, would breach Art 1 of the First Protocol to the ECHR⁷ (which is concerned with the protection of people's property) and also the fair trial provisions of ECHR Art 6.

⁴ Ibid, at para 44. ⁵ Ibid, at para 108. ⁶ [2001] EWCA Civ 633, [2002] QB 74.

⁷ The Convention Right textual equivalent of which is HRA 1998 Sch 1 Part II para 1.

The references above to the ECHR rather than to Convention Rights are deliberate, and reflect the Court of Appeal's apparent assumption that Convention Rights were merely a device to give domestic effect to the identical Convention articles; ie that there was simply no scope for substantive divergence between the two:

The Convention rights to which the Act gives 'further effect' are not, themselves, new rights introduced by the Act; they are existing rights set out in the Convention and its Protocols, to which the United Kingdom is party: see section 1(1) of the Act. The object of the Act is to incorporate those rights into domestic law and to give an effective domestic remedy.⁸

This analysis seems rather to ignore s 2 of the Act and the clear statement given by Lord Irvine during the Act's passage that the government was not asking Parliament to make the ECHR directly effective in domestic law. Its consequence however is that s 3 would be used to reconcile domestic legislation with the judgments of the ECtHR without the Court going through the anterior stage of asking if the Convention article and Convention Right bore the same meaning.

In addressing that issue, the Court of Appeal construed s 3 in rather opaque terms:

The court is required to go as far as, but not beyond, what is legally possible. The court is not required, or entitled, to give words a meaning which they cannot bear...⁹

The Court reached the conclusion that it could not use s 3 to read words into s 127 which would limit the provision's effect to situations where recovery would work an injustice on the debtor, and thereby render s 127 compatible with the Convention. The immediate consequence of this conclusion was that the Court of Appeal issued a declaration of incompatibility with respect to s 127.¹⁰

A similar rationale was employed in R (on application of H) v London North and East Mental Health Review Tribunal.¹¹ Section 73 of the Mental Health Act 1983 seemed to provide—literally construed—that persons detained in a mental hospital because they had committed serious crimes could not be released unless they proved that they are not a danger to society. The Court of Appeal regarded this as a deprivation of personal liberty and reversal of the burden of proof in a criminal matter, and so incompatible with Art 5 and Art 6 ECHR.¹² As in Wilson, the Court did not consider that s 3 would permit the reading in of a qualification to the 1983 Act. This breach of the Convention could be cured only by new legislation.

Quite what qualitative difference can be drawn in methodological terms between reading in a clause to s 41 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 which made evidence of consensual sexual relationships admissible when it was obviously relevant to the charge before the court, and reading in a saving proviso to s 127 of the Consumer ⁸ Ibid, at 87–88 per Sir Andrew Morritt VC. See also at pp 92–93, where Sir Andrew suggests the test of compatibility is not against a Convention Right but against: 'the right guaranteed by art 6(1) of the convention and Art 1 of the First Protocol of the Convention'.

⁹ Ibid, at para 42.

¹⁰ The judgment was reversed in the House of Lords ([2003] UKHL 40; [2004] 1 AC 816) on the basis that the relevant agreement pre-dated the coming into force of the HRA and that Parliament had not intended the HRA to have a 'retrospective' effect of this sort, and that there was in any event no incompatibility between s 127 and Art 1 of the First Protocol. We return to Wilson on another point below. For present purposes however, perhaps the most interesting part of the House of Lords' judgment is in the speech of Lord Nicholls: '10 As everyone knows, the purpose of the Human Rights Act 1998 was to make the human rights and fundamental freedoms set out in the European Convention on Human Rights directly enforceable in this country as part of its domestic law'. Again the judicial assumption appears to be that there can be no gap between the meanings of ECHR articles and Convention Rights.

¹¹ [2002] QB 1.

¹² Again, the Court proceeded on the basis that it was applying the Convention per se; as indeed did the government in its submissions. See especially [2002] QB 1 at 10–11.

Credit Act which lifted the bar to recovery of assets in situations where non-compliance with legal formalities had not worked any substantive injustice on the debtor, is less than obvious.¹³

A more structured approach to the meaning of 'possible' in s 3? A distinction between 'systemic' and 'individuated' consequences

Subsequently, the Court of Appeal identified a more principled means to determine when innovative judicial construction of a statutory term stops being 'interpretation' and becomes 'legislation'. In Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue, Lord Woolf offered the following suggestion:

If it is necessary in order to obtain compliance [with the Convention] to radically alter the effect of the legislation this will be an indication that more than interpretation is involved.¹⁴

We might instinctively agree that the notion that 'radical' change to a statute's meaning is beyond s 3 is attractive in formal or rhetorical terms. We would presumably also ask what does 'radical' mean here? A helpful indication was offered in R (International Transport GmbH) v Secretary of State for the Home Department.¹⁵ The case was triggered by the government's use of provisions in the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 which empowered the Home Secretary to impose automatic fines on transport companies on whose lorries or trains asylum seekers had hidden to enter the United Kingdom illegally. Nearly 1000 fines had been imposed by 2001. This seemed incompatible with the fair trial provisions of Art 6 ECHR.¹⁶ The Court of Appeal (per Simon Brown LJ) considered s 3 did not assist here:

It appears to me quite impossible to recreate this scheme by any interpretive process as one compatible with Convention rights... To achieve fairness would require a radically different approach... As the authorities clearly dictate, the Court's task is to distinguish between legislation and interpretation and confine itself to the latter. We cannot create a wholly different scheme... so as to provide an acceptable alternative means of immigration control. That must be for Parliament itself.¹⁷

As in Wilson, the Court of Appeal's reasoning on the scope of s 3 led it to issue a declaration of incompatibility in respect of the relevant statutory provisions.

This tentative distinction between 'schematic' and 'isolated' legislative incompatibility with Convention Rights may provide a helpful way of demarcating boundary lines between s 3 and s 4 of the Act. Where a non-literal reading of a specific statutory provision would have the effect of unravelling a wide-ranging regulatory system, it may be that courts will and should be unwilling to construe their s 3 powers broadly. In those circumstances, the HRA does offer the courts a mechanism through the s 4 declaration of incompatibility to pass responsibility for securing compliance with Convention Rights to the government and to Parliament.

¹³ One might suggest that the impact on the individual of the alleged breach of Convention Rights would be far more severe in R v A (No 2) than in Wilson, and that a court's readiness to 'stretch' the notion of interpretation should be greater in cases involving serious criminal charges than issues of civil law. Section 3's text does not expressly support any such distinction. ¹⁴ [2001] EWCA Civ 595, [2002] QB 48 at 73.

¹⁵ [2002] EWCA Civ 158, [2003] QB 728.

¹⁶ Once more the case was argued on the basis of incompatibility with the Convention per se, not the relevant Convention Right. Indeed it seems that the judge at first instance (Sullivan J) made a s 4 order to the effect that the legislation was incompatible with Art 6 of the Convention; see ibid, at para 2. There is no statutory basis for such a remedy. ¹⁷ Ibid, at para 66.

There is obvious scope for the argument to be made that greater judicial resort to s 4—which would be the result of adopting a less expansive understanding of the power arising under s 3—would better fit with traditional understandings of the separation of powers. Lord Steyn's judgment in A was for example criticised as being 'outlandish' and 'far-fetched' by Professor Nicol, on the basis that Lord Steyn's method could not convincingly be categorised as 'interpretation' in any meaningful sense.¹⁸ Professor Nicol also suggests that in several subsequent judgments, the House of Lords has taken a less expansive view of s 3.

Re S (Care Order...)* (2001): preserving the 'fundamental' features of an Act

In Re S (Care Order: Implementation of Care Plan),¹⁹ the Court of Appeal invoked s 3 to create an entirely new procedure within the Children Act 1989 in order to make the provisions of that Act in relation to care proceedings compatible with Arts 6 and 8.²⁰ The 1989 Act had largely removed the High Courts' previous jurisdiction to supervise closely the way in which a local authority implemented orders made by the court which placed children in the care of the local authority. The Court of Appeal in S considered that this scheme was inconsistent with Arts 6 and 8, and so read into the 1989 Act a judicial power for the court to specify particular targets in the care order which, if breached by the local authority, would entitle the court to intervene.

Lord Nicholls, delivering the only substantial judgment in the House of Lords,²¹ offered a principle of general application to the scope of s 3:

[39]... Interpretation of statutes is a matter for the courts; the enactment of statutes, and the amendment of statutes, are matters for Parliament.

[40] Up to this point there is no difficulty. The area of real difficulty lies in identifying the limits of interpretation in a particular case. This is not a novel problem.... For present purposes it is sufficient to say that a meaning which departs substantially from a fundamental feature of an Act of Parliament is likely to have crossed the boundary between interpretation and amendment. This is especially so where the departure has important practical repercussions which the court is not equipped to evaluate. In such a case the overall contextual setting may leave no scope for rendering the statutory provision Convention compliant by legitimate use of the process of interpretation...

In this 'particular case', Lord Nicholls considered that the Court of Appeal had undermined a 'fundamental feature' of the Children Act 1989; namely that Parliament had sought to prevent the courts exercising the kind of supervisory role within the child care system which would be created by the Court of Appeal's conclusion.²² This reasoning underlines the presumption that s 3 cannot be used to alter the schematic nature of particular statutory regimes, but is instead limited in scope to statutory provisions which have an essentially isolated or free-standing character.

¹⁸ Nicol D (2004a) 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson' Public Law 273.

¹⁹ [2001] EWCA Civ 757, [2001] 2 FCR 450.

²⁰ The judicial assumptions variously being that either the Court was giving effect to Art 8 ECHR per se or (without discussion) that Art 8 ECHR and Art 8 Sch 1 HRA had the same meaning.

²¹ [2002] UKHL 10, [2002] 2 AC 291. The House of Lords saw no distinction between the ECHR articles and the Convention Rights.: cf Lord Nicholls at para 36: 'Even if the Children Act is inconsistent with articles 6 or 8 of the Convention...'; and para 50: '...even if there is incompatibility between the Children Act 1989 and articles 6 or 8 of the Convention, ...'.

²² See especially paras [42]–[44] of the judgment.

Lord Nicholls also advanced a further principle which would likely restrict the range of substantive results which s 3 could be invoked to achieve:

[41]...When a court, called upon to construe legislation, ascribes a meaning and effect to the legislation pursuant to its obligation under s 3, it is important the court should identify clearly the particular statutory provision or provisions whose interpretation leads to that result. Apart from all else, this should assist in ensuring the court does not inadvertently stray outside its interpretation jurisdiction.

This observation seems to re-inject a dose of literalism into the s 3 interpretive process, and might be thought to make it more difficult to justify a Litster/Marleasing approach to s 3 which empowers a court to read particular words or even entire phrases into a statutory text. That is of course what was done in R v A, albeit in respect of an ‘isolated’ rather than ‘schematic’ legislative provision. Lord Nicholls did not in terms disapprove of the method used in R v A, but it is difficult to conclude otherwise than that his judgment in S could sensibly be read by judges in lower courts as intended to limit the circumstances in which such an approach could be applied.²³

Bellinger v Bellinger* (2003): rejecting a systemic change of meaning

This conclusion is reinforced by the subsequent decision in Bellinger v Bellinger,²⁴ in which Lord Nicholls again gave the leading judgment. The claimant in Bellinger had been classified (correctly as a matter of then extant law) as a male at birth. The claimant subsequently had gender reassignment treatment, and had conducted herself as a woman since 1975. In 1981, the claimant underwent a marriage ceremony with a male partner. Under the terms of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s 11(c), any ‘marriage’ would be void if the partners were not respectively a ‘man’ and a ‘woman’. Domestic law equated gender for this purposes with the gender assigned to a person at birth. Thus the claimant and her husband were both ‘men’, and consequently no marriage had occurred.²⁵ The Bellingers subsequently contended that domestic law was incompatible with Arts 8 and 12 of Sch 1 of the HRA.²⁶

In several decisions in the 1980 and 1990s,²⁷ the ECtHR had held that the United Kingdom’s refusal to allow post-operative trans-sexual persons to alter their legal gender classification was not incompatible with the Convention. It would therefore seem that the conclusion reached by the High Court in Corbett would not have been inconsistent with Art 12 ECHR and presumably Art 12 Sch 1 HRA. However, by the time the Bellingers’ case reached the House of Lords, the ECtHR had changed its view, and had concluded in *Goodwin v the United Kingdom*²⁸ that United Kingdom law was inconsistent with Art 12

²³ Professor Nicol also invokes the House of Lords’ judgment in R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] UKHL 46, [2003] 1 AC 837 in support of this argument. For an alternative perspective see Kavanagh A (2004) ‘Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach’ Public Law 537.

²⁴ [2003] UKHL 21, [2003] 2 AC 467.
²⁵ See Corbett v Corbett (otherwise Ashley) (No. 1) [1970] 2 WLR 1306. The judgment offers a fascinating snapshot of social history and the role of the law in making it.

²⁶ Which concern the right to private and family life and to marry. Interestingly, even though the Bellingers expressly framed their case with reference to their Convention Rights, the House of Lords conducted its analysis on the basis of whether s 11 was compatible with the ECHR: see especially Lord Hope at para 70 and Lord Nicholls at para 50.

²⁷ Rees v United Kingdom (1986) 9 EHRR 56; Cossey v United Kingdom [1993] 13 EHRR 622.

²⁸ [2002] 2 FCR 577.

ECHR in so far as it prevented a transsexual person marrying another person of the ‘same’ gender.²⁹

No suggestion appears to have been made at any stage of Bellinger that Goodwin did not also settle the meaning of Art 12 of Sch 1 HRA 1998. The point might appear pedantic, but it is not without significance. Under the scheme of the HRA, it would have been possible for the House of Lords to conclude that the moral basis of modern British society was such that the principle recognised as part of Art 12 of the Convention by the ECtHR was not an element of the Convention Right articulated in Art 12 Sch 1 HRA. This conclusion would certainly have placed the United Kingdom under an obligation in the international law sphere to alter s 11 accordingly, but it would have had no impact on domestic law. Equally of course, had the ECtHR in Goodwin held that s 11 was consistent with Art 12 ECtHR, it would still be open to Mrs Bellinger to argue that s 11 was incompatible with her statutory Convention Right under Art 12 of Sch 1 HRA 1998.³⁰ It is curious that this issue, so clearly envisaged by the scheme of the Act and so bluntly stated by Lord Irvine during the Bill’s passage, passed most lawyers by in the early years of the HRA’s implementation.

In the event, the primary question before the House of Lords in Bellinger was whether s 3 of the HRA empowered the Court to read s 11 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973—and specifically the terms ‘man’ and ‘woman’—in a fashion which rendered domestic law consistent with the ECtHR’s judgment in Goodwin. All members of the Court held that the answer to this question was ‘No’, but the unanimous conclusion rested on rather different reasons.

Lord Hope appeared to conclude that since it was then (and presumably remains) beyond the capacity of medical science to provide a person with what he termed ‘the equipment’³¹ needed to make that person fertile in his/her chosen gender identity, it is simply not ‘possible’ as a matter of objective fact for ‘man’ and ‘woman’ within s 11(c) to mean anything other than the gender assigned at birth.

The other substantive judgments (by Lords Hobhouse and Nicholls respectively) approached the issue in a fashion which was perhaps better attuned to the sensitivities of the claimant and people in her position. Both opinions seemed to accept that ‘whether a person was a ‘man’ or a ‘woman’—either in a general sense or for specific purposes—was a question of law, not of biological fact. The question to be answered was not whether the claimant was a ‘man’ or a ‘woman’, but which law-makers could legitimately decide that point. Lords Hobhouse and Nicholls evidently took the view that Mrs Bellinger’s claim raised a profoundly systemic question. Whether or not she was a ‘woman’ was a question which had implications going far beyond the validity of her marriage. Lord Nicholls identified; ‘education, child care, occupational qualifications, criminal law (gender specific offences), prison regulations, sport, the needs of decency and birth certificates’³² as areas of social policy on which gender reassignment would have a significant and obvious impact. Equally problematic, in Lord Nicholls’ view, was what degree of transgender medical treatment would a person have to undergo ²⁹ Under domestic law, the claimant in Bellinger could have married a person classified at birth as a ‘woman’. This would be so even if that person had undergone gender reassignment treatment to appear and live as a ‘man’.

³⁰ Cf the assertion in the white paper that the Act would set a floor, not a ceiling for the substantive scope of human rights protection; see ‘Human Rights IV: The Human Rights Act 1998’, n 1, ch 21, p 636 above. The argument has particular resonance if the ECtHR is closely divided in its judgment. HRA s 2 is as applicable to dissenting judgments of the ECtHR as to unanimous or majority opinions.

³¹ [2003] UKHL 21, [2003] 2 AC 467 at para 57.

³² Ibid, para 45.

before he/she should be regarded as having altered his/her initial gender for a particular purpose?³³

When are the implications of change ‘systemic’ rather than ‘individuated’?

The initial cogency of this ‘systemic implications’ justification for concluding it was not ‘possible’ to use s 3 in this case should perhaps be questioned. It was manifestly open to the House of Lords to limit the ratio of Bellinger to the question of the validity of a marriage. Mrs Bellinger could be a ‘woman’ for that purpose. Whether she, or persons in like circumstances, would be a ‘woman’ for other legal purposes would then be left to be litigated on a case-by-case basis as and when particular questions arose. That conclusion would have no disabling effect upon Parliament’s legal capacity to revisit the ‘marriage’ question in any subsequent legislative initiative dealing with the legal gender classification of persons who had undergone gender re-assignment treatment. Such a judgment would perhaps have injected an additional sense of urgency and importance into the respective minds of government ministers and MPs as they considered how best to respond to this issue.³⁴

The point to be made here is a simple, if somewhat cynical, one. Whether a particular statutory provision has a systemic or isolated character is itself a matter for judicial determination. The use of such dichotomous classification criteria as tools with which to structure the use of s 3 displaces rather than resolves the difficult question which s 3 creates.

Bellinger also offered further guidance on the use of s 4. There is no requirement in the HRA that a court which cannot ‘save’ a Convention non-compliant term through s 3 must then issue a declaration of incompatibility. Section 4 creates a power: it does not impose a duty. The government intervened in the proceedings to argue that, inter alia, no declaration should be issued as it accepted that domestic law breached the Convention and was formulating proposals for new legislation. That the Blair government took this position, notwithstanding the rather contentious political nature of eliminating discrimination against transgender people, is perhaps in itself a good illustration of the power of the ECHR and the HRA to safeguard some human rights norms against domestic bigotry even within the political—rather than judicial—arena.³⁵ The new legislation was subsequently enacted as the Gender Recognition Act 2004.

In Bellinger, however, the House of Lords saw little weight in the government’s contention that a Declaration of Incompatibility should not be issued. It is perhaps not an exaggeration to suggest that Bellinger supports the proposition that s 4 creates a very strong, if not quite irrebuttable, presumption that a declaration of incompatibility should be made whenever a statutory term’s breach of a Convention Right cannot be avoided by use of s 3.

Ghaidan v Mendoza (2004): an individuated not systemic change of meaning

That this aspect of HRA jurisprudence remains mired in uncertainty is confirmed by the House of Lords’ judgment in Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza.³⁶ Mr Godin-Mendoza was ³³ Ibid, paras 39–44. For more extensive comment see Kavanagh (2004) op cit; Nicol D (2004) ‘Gender reassignment and the transformation of the Human Rights Act’ LQR 194.

³⁴ The position adopted by the House of Lords—and the criticism that can be levelled at it—are precisely the same as those arising from Megarry VC’s conclusion in Malone that he should not recognise even a very narrowly drawn limited right to privacy at common law; see ‘Malone v Metropolitan Police Commissioner (1979)’, ch 18, pp 567–569 above.

³⁵ Or, more prosaically, of the Blair government’s determination to pursue policies that its members thought morally correct even in the face of ‘bigoted’ opposition.

³⁶ [2004] UKHL 30, [2004] 2 AC 557. For comment see Young A (2005) Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza: avoiding the deference trap’ Public Law 23; Loveland I (2003) ‘Making it up as they go along: the Court of Appeal on succession rights in tenancies to same sex partners’ Public Law 222.

the same-sex partner of a man who had occupied a house leased from Mr Ghaidan with the status of a 'protected tenant' under the Rent Act 1977. Under the terms of the 1977 Act (as amended in 1988) the husband or wife or spouse (a term taken to include non-married cohabitants of different genders) of a deceased protected tenant was able to succeed to a statutory continuation of the tenancy. A 'family member' (if he/she had resided in the property for the year prior to the tenant's death) was entitled to succeed to a less beneficial 'assured' tenancy.³⁷ A resident who was neither a spouse nor family member had no extra-contractual occupancy rights at all on the death of the tenant. Shortly before the HRA came into effect, the House of Lords held in *Fitzpatrick v Sterling Housing Association*³⁸ that a person in Mr Ghaidan-Mendoza's position could properly be regarded as a 'family member' of the deceased tenant, but not as his/her spouse. The outcome clearly discriminated against same-sex couples on the basis of their sexual orientation.

Shortly after Fitzpatrick was decided, the ECtHR held for the first time that sexual orientation discrimination was presumptively prohibited by Art 14 and Art 8 ECHR. The matter in issue in *Salgueiro v Portugal*³⁹ was a custody dispute in which an appellate Portuguese court overruled a first instance judgment awarding custody of a child to S, the child's father. The Court's reason for overruling the lower court was based solely on S's homosexuality. The ECtHR concluded that such discrimination breached the Convention. At the end of 2003, in Karner v Austria,⁴⁰ the ECtHR applied the Salgueiro principle squarely to the issue of succession rights in tenancies.

Mr Ghaidan-Mendoza argued that domestic law was incompatible with Arts 8 and 14 ECHR, and his case was analysed in that way by the court.⁴¹ The precise wording of the phrase in issue within the relevant statutory provision⁴² was: 'a person who was living with the original tenant as his husband or wife shall be treated as the spouse of the original tenant....' Mr Mendoza's argument was that para 2(2) should be read in a way which would expand the literal formulation 'as his husband and wife' beyond mere categories of physical gender—which if Bellinger is to be taken as correct are concepts beyond judicial redefinition—to include the particular types of emotional and physical relationship which characterised a marriage or heterosexual cohabitation partnership and which could just as readily be met in a same-sex partnership.

In accepting this argument, Lord Nicholls reviewed and attempted to clarify the body of principle which had built up around the use of s 3. He began his analysis with a question:

[27]...What is the standard, or the criterion, by which 'possibility' [in s 3] is to be judged?

A comprehensive answer to this question is proving elusive. The courts, including your Lordships' House, are still cautiously feeling their way forward as experience in the application of s 3 gradually accumulates.

The point at which Lord Nicholls seemed to have arrived was that courts should eschew use of s 3 to lend Convention compliant meanings to statutory terms if this would produce a meaning 'inconsistent with a fundamental feature of [the] legislation.'⁴³ What this notion of 'fundamental' appears to mean is that the court should satisfy itself that the meaning it might give to a statutory provision is consistent with the policy objectives that Parliament was seeking to achieve when the term was enacted. In addition to introducing this 'fundamental feature' barrier to an expansive use of s 3, Lord Nicholls also ³⁷ A protected statutory tenancy is subject to rigorous rent control, while an assured tenancy is not.

³⁸ [2001] AC 127; see 'Conclusion', ch 21, p 659 above.

³⁹ (2001) 31 EHRR 47. ⁴⁰ [2003] 2 FLR 623, [2004] 2 FCR 563, (2004) 38 EHRR 24.

⁴¹ See especially Lord Steyn at [2004] UKHL 30, [2004] 2 AC 557 at para 38; Lord Nicholls at para 6.

⁴² Rent Act 1977, Sch 1, para 2(2). ⁴³ [2004] UKHL 30, [2004] 2 AC 557 at para 33.

reiterated the views expressed in Re S and Anderson that it was not constitutionally appropriate for courts to deploy s 3 to produce results that would have far-reaching systemic implications.

If neither a fundamental nor systemic matter was in issue however, Lord Nicholls indicated that it was appropriate for s 3 to be used to achieve what would from a traditional understanding of the sovereignty of Parliament and the separation of powers be regarded as very unorthodox results:

[32]... Section 3 enables language to be interpreted restrictively or expansively. But s 3 goes further than this. It is also apt to require a court to read in words which change the meaning of the enacted legislation, so as to make it convention-compliant. In other words, the intention of Parliament in enacting s 3 was that, to an extent bounded only by what is 'possible', a court can modify the meaning, and hence the effect, of primary and secondary legislation.

Lord Nicholls saw no systemic implications for a modification of the previously accepted meaning and effect of the Rent Act provision in issue.⁴⁴ Nor did he consider that construing that provision to include same-sex partners ran counter to the social policy purpose underlying the legislation, which policy he took to be extending the benefit of succession to; 'couples living together in a close and stable relationship'.⁴⁵

It would therefore be appropriate for the court to change the original meaning of para 2.2 by reading in additional words. Perhaps surprisingly, Lord Nicholls did not think any particular linguistic exactitude was needed in this regard: 'The precise form of words read in for this purpose is of no significance. It is their substantive effect which matters.'⁴⁶

Lord Steyn's view: a wrong turning

While Lord Steyn agreed with both the result reached by Lord Nicholls and the reasons underlying it, his judgment advocated a rather more forceful approach to s 3 and—consequently—less frequent use of s 4. Lord Steyn had not sat in Bellinger. In Mendoza, he expressed concerns that courts when faced with a non-Convention compliant statutory term were making insufficient use of s 3. Lord Steyn identified twenty-five such cases. In ten, the incompatibility had been removed by use of s 3. In fifteen, a s 4 declaration had been issued. These statistics, Lord Steyn suggested, 'reinforce the need to pose the question whether the law has taken a wrong turning'.⁴⁷

That 'wrong turning' arose from the relative priority afforded to s 3 and s 4 as remedial devices in the event of a Convention article/Right being breached. Lord Steyn asserted that s 3 was intended by Parliament to be the dominant remedy in such circumstances. As such, the notion of 'possible' within s 3 should be accorded a very expansive meaning. Unlike Lord Nicholls, Lord Steyn held that Marleasing and the consequential judgments of the House of Lords in Pickstone and *Litster*⁴⁸ provided the proper guide to the potential of s 3 as an interpretive device. Lord Steyn appeared to accept that s 3 should not be used to undermine the scheme of a particular statute, but in terms of principle his approach ⁴⁴ That he reached this conclusion without offering any considered discussion of the point is perhaps a nice illustration of the way in which displacement tools can be invoked to gloss over difficult analytical questions.

⁴⁵ [2004] UKHL 30, [2004] 2 AC 557 at para 35.

⁴⁶ Ibid, para 35. One might wonder if para 2(2) could in any event have been construed to produce the effect for which Mr Mendoza argued through a really quite conservative form of literalism. If one's attention focuses on the word 'as' in the phrase 'as his husband or wife' one might quite credibly assert that the 'as' denotes the nature of the emotional and physical relationship between the couple rather than their physiological identities.

⁴⁷ Ibid, para 39.

⁴⁸ See 'Pickstone v Freemans' and 'Litster v Forth Dry Dock Engineering', ch 12, pp 397–398 above.

towards s 3 is rather difficult to reconcile with the arguments offered by Lord Nicholls in the same case.

Notwithstanding the statistics noted by Lord Steyn in Mendoza, there is as yet little indication of any deluge of declarations of incompatibility flooding across the United Kingdom's legal landscape. This consequence can be seen as—in part—an indication of the judiciary's willingness to read ss 3–4 of the Human Rights Act as an invitation to redefine the courts' interpretive role in a radical fashion. We might also attribute it however to the emergence of a new common law principle informing the courts' approach to human rights issues.

II. The notion of 'deference' to legislative judgment

In an early review of the court's use of the Human Rights Act,⁴⁹ Paul Craig argued that the Court of Appeal and House of Lords have developed a doctrine of 'deference' in respect of questions arising under the Act; that deference being owed by the courts to the decisions made by elected executive and legislative bodies. The doctrine appeared to be an indigenous version (and variation) of the 'margin of appreciation' principle within the jurisprudence of the EComHR and the ECtHR.⁵⁰

The margin of appreciation principle is generally taken as recognising that the Convention requires that the ECtHR affords Signatory States a measure of autonomy in determining if a prima facie derogation from a Convention entitlement can be permitted; ie it is a doctrine existing in international law, the purpose of which is to 'save' or 'justify' a nation's intrusion into the sphere of a given ECHR provision. However, in Craig's view, the emergent concept of deference in domestic law goes rather further than this:

[I]t is equally clear that deference may be of relevance in determining the initial scope and applicability of Convention rights, as well as the application of limitations placed on those rights.... The early jurisprudence has however applied deference at an earlier stage. It has done so as part of the initial determination as to the scope of the right in question...⁵¹

To use the terminology deployed in chapter twenty, Craig's argument is that domestic courts appear to be accepting that the scope of the 'presumptive entitlement' element⁵² of certain Convention Rights is a matter for political as well as judicial definition. Professor Craig draws on several authorities raising Art 6 issues to support this proposition.

The issue before the Court of Appeal in *R v Lambert, Ali and Jordan*⁵³ was the compatibility of various provisions of the Homicide Act 1957 and the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 with Art 6 ECHR. In finding that neither provision was incompatible with the Convention, Lord Woolf CJ (giving the sole judgment) offered a general statement of principle as to the appropriate method for the courts to follow in HRA cases:

It is also important to have in mind that legislation is passed by a democratically elected [sic] Parliament and therefore the Courts under the Convention should, as a matter of constitutional principle, pay a degree of deference to the view of Parliament as to what is in the interest of the public generally when upholding rights of the individual under the Convention.⁵⁴

⁴⁹ Craig P (2001) 'The courts, the Human Rights Act and judicial review' LQR 592; (original emphasis).

⁵⁰ See 'A four stage inquiry', ch 19, pp 591–593 above.

⁵¹ Craig (2001) op cit p 592; original emphasis.

⁵² See 'A four stage inquiry', ch 19, pp 591–593 above.

⁵⁴ [2002] QB 1112 at para 17.

⁵³ [2002] QB 1112, [2001] 2 WLR 211.

The concept does not seem to entail the domestic court saying that: 'The meaning of the Convention article is X, but—in deference to the views of Parliament—we hold that the meaning of the relevant Convention Right is Y'. Rather the proposition appears to be: 'In the absence of an ECtHR judgment dealing squarely with this precise issue, we do not think that the legislative provision in issue can breach the Convention because Parliament is a democratically elected law-maker'. To put it slightly differently, the concept seems to rest on a second-guessing by United Kingdom courts of how the ECtHR would decide a particular case; ie because the domestic court assumes that the ECtHR would conclude that the impugned law/action falls within the margin of appreciation that the ECtHR would extend to the United Kingdom as a country, then it is appropriate for a domestic court to defer to Parliament's view of what Convention Rights require.

This principle was reiterated by Lord Hoffman in the House of Lords in Alconbury, a case concerning the compatibility of aspects of the land use planning system with Art 6 ECHR:

In a democratic country, decisions as to what the general interest requires are made by democratically elected bodies or persons accountable to them...

There is no conflict between human rights and the democratic principle. Respect for human rights requires that certain basic rights of individuals should not be capable in any circumstances of being overridden by the majority, even if they think that the public interest so requires. Other rights should be capable of being overridden only in very limited circumstances. These are rights which belong to individuals simply by virtue of their humanity... But outside these basic rights there are many decisions which have to be made every day (for example about the allocation of resources) in which the only fair method of decision is by some person or body accountable to the electorate.⁵⁵

Lord Hoffman's dichotomy between 'basic rights' (in respect of which courts should be unwilling to defer to legislative conclusions) and 'allocation of resources' questions (when deference to legislative opinion is more appropriate) echoes Lord Hope's analysis in R v DPP, ex p Kebilene:

The Convention should be seen as an expression of fundamental principles rather than as a set of mere rules.... In some circumstances, it will be appropriate for the courts to recognise that there is an area of judgment within which the judiciary will defer, on democratic grounds, to the considered opinion of the elected body or person whose act or decision is said to be incompatible with the Convention.... It will be easier for it [ie deference] to be recognised where the questions involve issues of social or economic policy, much less so where the rights are of high constitutional importance or are of a kind where the courts are especially well placed to assess the need for protection.⁵⁶

This judicial recognition of a 'hierarchy' of Convention Rights jurisprudence lends a further layer of elaboration to the way in which the HRA can be applied by the courts. The need for s 3 to be applied in an expansive fashion—or for s 4 to be invoked—is reduced if one accepts the presumption that it is legitimate within a scheme of human rights protection for politicians to determine through the majoritarian process of legislation what the content of those fundamental human rights should be.⁵⁷

⁵⁵ R (Alconbury Developments Ltd and others) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2003] 2 AC 325 at paras 69–70.

⁵⁶ [2000] 2 AC 326, at 380–381, [1999] 3 WLR 972 at 994.

⁵⁷ The proposition of course ignores the arguable inadequacies of the parliamentary process as a source of law. At this juncture one might usefully place the notion of 'deference' alongside the analysis of the

This is illustrated by the outcome of Wilson v First County Trust in the House of Lords.⁵⁸ The view taken by the Court was that, even if the HRA had been applicable to the contract in question, s 127 of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 was not incompatible with Art 1 of the First Protocol ECHR. While it was accepted that s 127(3) worked ‘drastic’ or ‘harsh’ consequences even on a lender who had acted throughout in good faith,⁵⁹ the Court approached its assessment of s 127 vis-à-vis Art 1 with a clear preconception as to the correct allocation of decision-making responsibility on such a question:

[70] In approaching this issue... courts should have in mind that theirs is a reviewing role. Parliament is charged with the primary responsibility for deciding whether the means chosen to deal with a social problem are both necessary and appropriate. Assessment of the advantages and disadvantages of the various legislative alternatives is primarily a matter for Parliament. The possible existence of alternative solutions does not in itself render the contested legislation unjustified... The court will reach a different conclusion from the legislature only when it is apparent that the legislature has attached insufficient importance to a person’s convention right. The readiness of a court to depart from the views of the legislature depends upon the circumstances, one of which is the subject matter of the legislation. The more the legislation concerns matters of broad social policy, the less ready will be a court to intervene.⁶⁰

If lent a broad meaning, as in Wilson in the House of Lords, the ‘deference’ principle might often spare courts the difficulty of grappling with the meaning of s 3 and thence the inter-relationship between s 3 and s 4. This might seem an attractive proposition. It becomes much less so when one considers that ‘deference’ has the potential to be a mechanism for the abdication of judicial responsibility, in that it transfers interpretive authority from the courts to the legislature.

The deference principle is rooted in a perception of the separation of powers which speaks to the courts’ acceptance of their constitutionally subordinate position to Parliament. But this notion of subordination needs to be deployed carefully, for it is one in which quite discrete aspects of the judiciary/legislature relationship can easily—and misleadingly—be conflated.

The courts’ ‘subordination’ to Parliament is a matter concerned primarily with those institutions’ respective capacities to give legal effect to substantive moral values. It is a question of hierarchy. A court which regards a legislative value as morally abhorrent when measured against orthodox common law principles cannot refuse to apply the legislative provision in issue; although it can of course lend meanings to legislative texts which defy any rational linguistic explanation and appear de facto at least to reject the court’s formally subordinate position.⁶¹

This is a wholly distinct proposition from the suggestion that the courts are ‘subordinate’ to Parliament in the sense that Parliament has any legitimate claim to expect its understanding—or that of an executive body—of the legal meaning of the measures it enacts to prevail over the meaning arrived at by the courts. This is a question of function.

judiciary’s constitutional role offered by Lord Mustill in Fire Brigades Union; see ‘Lord Mustill’s analysis’, ch 20, pp 632–633 above.

⁵⁸ [2003] UKHL 40, [2004] 1 AC 816; Wilson v First County Trust (2001) in the Court of Appeal, pp 663–665 above.

⁵⁹ Ibid, per Lord Nicholls at para 72.

⁶⁰ Per Lord Nicholls at para 70.

⁶¹ Obvious examples being Liversidge v Anderson (Liversidge v Anderson (1942)’, ch 3, pp 69–71 above) and Anisminic v Foreign Compensation Commission (Anisminic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission (1969)’, ch 3, pp 77–78 above).

Notwithstanding the occasional invocation of the romantic shibboleth of Parliament as 'the High Court of Parliament', Parliament qua legislature—nor the House of Commons within it—is not a judicial body.⁶² That Parliament might have the power to accord itself through statute a nominally 'judicial' jurisdiction should it wish to do so is beyond dispute. But while that might make Parliament a 'court' in a formalistic legal sense, it would not do so legitimately if we measure legitimacy against accepted tenets of the anglo-american constitutional tradition.⁶³

Unhappily, our courts seemed to have blurred this distinction between hierarchy and function, and used the notion of deference in effect to abdicate their traditional constitutional responsibilities to tell us what it is that Parliament has actually done in enacting legislation. The abdication is selective and uncertain in scope. 'Deference' has been presented as a concept of general application, although the extent to which courts should 'defer' is already established as one dependant on the context of the case under consideration. If lent too broad a meaning, the deference principle could substantially compromise the 'fundamental' (in the sense of supra-party political) nature of Convention Rights.⁶⁴ A second concern is more prosaic. The notion of a hierarchy of rights may seem to be a coherent concept in principle, but will surely prove to be very complex and prone to inconsistency when put into practice.

The difficulty that the idea of deference creates for an expansive understanding of human rights protection is perhaps best put by Professor Allan:

...[T]here is no role for any distinct doctrine of deference to fulfil. Its invocation above and beyond the ordinary constraints inherent in judicial review amounts to an abdication of the judicial role and a failure to protect legal rights.⁶⁵

It was not until 2009 that the higher courts appeared to recognise the possibility of a co-existence between Convention articles and Convention Rights whose identical texts bore different legal meanings. The point was clearly made in R v Horncastle,⁶⁶ in which the Supreme Court approved the conclusion of the Court of Appeal (which was in effect if not in express terms) that the meaning of Art 6 of Sch 1 of the HRA should not be the same as that of Art 6 ECHR. The substantive issue at stake in Horncastle was the admissibility in criminal trials of hearsay evidence from witnesses who were either dead at the time of the trial or too frightened to give oral evidence. The Supreme Court declined to follow the ECtHR's Grand Chamber's ruling in *Al-Khawaja and Tahery v United Kingdom*⁶⁷ that the admissibility of such evidence would breach Art 6 if it was the 'sole or decisive' reason for conviction.

⁶² See for example Stephen J in Bradlaugh v Gossett (1884) 12 QB; and Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Pepper v Hart [1993] AC 593.

⁶³ See the discussion of South Africa's 'High Court of Parliament' at 'Harris v Minister of the Interior—the aftermath', ch 3, pp 55–56 above.

⁶⁴ See Leigh I (2002) 'Taking rights proportionately' Public Law 265; Edwards R (2002) 'Judicial deference under the Human Rights Act' Modern LR 859; Jowell J (2003) 'Judicial deference: servility, civility or institutional capacity' (2003) Public Law 592.

⁶⁵ Allan T (2006) 'Human rights and judicial review: a critique of "due deference"' Cambridge Law Journal 671.

⁶⁶ [2009] EWCA Crim 964; [2010] 2 AC 373.

⁶⁷ (2009) 49 EHRR 1. Analysis of Horncastle has thus far been primarily rooted in its specific implications for the law of evidence; on which see in particular Dennis I (2010) 'The right to confront witnesses: meanings, myths and human rights' Criminal Law Review 255. For a consideration of the case from a constitutional law perspective see. Metcalfe E (2010) 'Free to lead as well as to be led: Section 2 of the Human Rights Act and the relationship between the UK Courts and Strasbourg' Justice Journal 7.

The Court underlined the impact of HRA s 2 as being to lend only persuasive and not binding status to ECtHR authority:

10 Mr Tim Owen QC, for Mr Horncastle and Mr Blackmore, submitted that we should treat the judgment of the Chamber in Al-Khawaja as determinative of the success of these appeals. He submitted that this was the appropriate response to the requirement of section 2(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 that requires a court to 'take into account' any judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in determining any question to which such judgment is relevant... .

11 I do not accept that submission. The requirement to 'take into account' the Strasbourg jurisprudence will normally result in the domestic court applying principles that are clearly established by the Strasbourg court. There will, however, be rare occasions where the domestic court has concerns as to whether a decision of the Strasbourg court sufficiently appreciates or accommodates particular aspects of our domestic process. In such circumstances it is open to the domestic court to decline to follow the Strasbourg decision, giving reasons for adopting this course....

In rejecting Al-Khawaja and related ECtHR authorities as authoritative determinants of the meaning of Art 6 of Sch 1 of the HRA, Lord Phillips observed:

107 [T]hat case law appears to have developed without full consideration of the safeguards against an unfair trial that exist under the common law procedure. Nor, I suspect, can the Strasbourg court have given detailed consideration to the English law of admissibility of evidence, and the changes made to that law, after consideration by the Law Commission, intended to ensure that English law complies with the requirements of article 6(1)(3)(d).

The House of Lords did not bluntly reject the legitimacy of ECtHR authority. Rather Lord Phillips suggested that it was appropriate for domestic courts to enter into a 'dialogue' with the ECtHR in such cases, his assumption apparently being that in a subsequent judgment the ECtHR might be persuaded by the reasoning of the domestic court to reverse or modify its previous judgment. This would in turn enable the domestic courts to accept that Art 6 of Sch 1 of the HRA bore the same meaning as Art 6 ECHR. Lord Phillips did not specify what the House of Lords would do if the ECtHR chose to confirm its previous conclusions.

Some indication on this point and on the potentially fractious nature of this process of 'dialogue' more generally was given between 2004 and 2009 by a series of ECtHR and House of Lords judgments dealing with the effect of Art 8 on English law regulating residential possession proceedings.⁶⁸ The House of Lords had initially concluded in *LB Harrow v Qazi*⁶⁹ that Art 8 provided no protection to people at risk of being evicted from their homes. The ECtHR promptly indicated in *Connors v United Kingdom*⁷⁰ that Art 8 required that the proportionality of eviction be assessed by a court. The House of Lords thereafter responded (in LB Lambeth v Kay)⁷¹ by saying that any such requirement was met by ordinary principles of judicial review. Shortly afterwards in *McCann v United Kingdom*⁷² the ECtHR held that ordinary principles of judicial review did not suffice for proportionality purposes. The House of Lords in *Birmingham City Council v Doherty*⁷³ subsequently declined to accept this position, with both Lord Hope and Lord Scott noting ⁶⁸ The details are laid out in Loveland I (2009a) 'A tale of two trespassers: reconsidering the Impact of the Human Rights Act on rights of residence in rented housing' European Human Rights Law Review 148 (part 1) and 495 (part 2); (2010) 'The shifting sands of Art 8 jurisprudence in English housing law' European Human Rights Law Review 151.

⁷⁰ (2004) 40 EHRR 189.

⁷¹ [2006] UKHL 10; [2006] 2 AC 465.

⁷² (2008) 47 EHRR 40.

⁷³ [2008] UKHL 57, [2009] 1 AC 367.

in rather intemperate terms that the ECtHR did not understand English law. In *Kay v United Kingdom*⁷⁴ (which was the Strasbourg sequel to LB Lambeth v Kay) the ECtHR again reiterated its position however, whereupon the Supreme Court (including Lords Hope and Scott) accepted in *Manchester City Council v Pinnock*⁷⁵ that Art 8 of Sch 1 of the HRA did require there to be proportionality review in such circumstances and that proportionality review had to involve the court in more intensive evaluation of the merits of the landlord's decision than was provided for by Wednesbury irrationality.

The episode is of especial interest to housing lawyers, but Pinnock is also significant in broad constitutional terms for giving a clear indication of the extent to which the Supreme Court will allow the content of domestic law to be de facto determined by the ECtHR:

48.....This Court is not bound to follow every decision of the EurCtHR. Not only would it be impractical to do so: it would sometimes be inappropriate, as it would destroy the ability of the Court to engage in the constructive dialogue with the EurCtHR which is of value to the development of Convention law (see e.g. R v Horncastle)..... Where... there is a clear and constant line of [ECtHR] decisions whose effect is not inconsistent with some fundamental substantive or procedural aspect of our law, and whose reasoning does not appear to overlook or misunderstand some argument or point of principle, we consider that it would be wrong for this Court not to follow that line.

The phraseology adopted by the Supreme Court in Pinnock obviously leaves some appreciable scope for domestic courts to reject ECtHR authority as a determinant of the meaning of Convention Rights. As such, the principle forcefully underlines the autonomous character of Convention articles and Convention Rights and is perfectly consistent with the meaning of HRA s 2. It remains to be seen however if this realisation becomes normalised within the process of HRA litigation.

The question of precedent

The issue of precedent and internal judicial hierarchies is one question which perhaps entirely escaped the MPs who supported enactment of the HRA. Several hypothetical scenarios might be explored to illustrate this point.⁷⁶ The question we might ask in respect of each scenario is whether the High Court and/or Court of Appeal should regard themselves as bound to follow precedent set by the House of Lords/Supreme Court if that precedent appears to articulate a legal rule incompatible with a Convention Right.

In scenario A, a post-2000 case, the House of Lords/Supreme Court concludes, having considered relevant ECtHR jurisprudence as required by HRA s 2, that law X (be it a statutory provision or a common law rule) is consistent with a particular Convention Right. Shortly afterwards, the ECtHR rules that the precise domestic law in issue is incompatible with the relevant Convention article.

In scenario B, the House of Lords/Supreme Court concludes, having considered relevant ECtHR jurisprudence as required by HRA s 2, that law X is compatible with a particular Convention Right. Shortly afterwards, the ECtHR rules that a similar law existing in another Signatory State is incompatible with the relevant Convention article.

In scenario C, in a case decided before (perhaps many years before) the HRA came into force, the House of Lords decided that the meaning of a statutory provision or common law rule was X. Many years later, before the issue of whether such a law is compatible with a Convention Right is considered by the House of Lords/Supreme Court, the ECtHR rules that the precise domestic law in issue (if its meaning is X) is incompatible with the relevant Convention article.

⁷⁴ [2011] HLR 2.

⁷⁵ [2011] UKSC 6, [2011] 2 WLR 220.

⁷⁶ I assume for these purposes that domestic courts have appreciated the distinction drawn by the HRA between Convention Rights and Convention articles.

In scenario D, in a case decided before (perhaps many years before) the HRA came into force, the House of Lords decided the meaning of a statutory provision or common law rule is X. Many years later, before the issue of whether such a law is compatible with a Convention Right is considered by the House of Lords/Supreme Court, the ECtHR rules that a similar law existing in another Signatory State is incompatible with the relevant Convention article.

Ordinarily of course we expect the High Court and Court of Appeal simply to follow and apply judgments of the House of Lords/Supreme Court. There is no express provision in the HRA to rebut that presumption. But each of the scenarios outlined above raises an arguable difficulty from an HRA perspective if we are to assume both that the lower courts must follow the precedents set by the House of Lords/Supreme Court and that the meaning of Convention Rights is determined by the judgments of the ECtHR as to the meaning of the relevant Convention article.

The difficulty is perhaps most acute in scenario C. In this situation, there is no House of Lords/Supreme court ruling that law X is compatible with the Convention Right in issue. The question has simply never been considered by a domestic court. The meaning of law X is clear, but that meaning is evidently also incompatible with the meaning of the ECHR.

One might suggest that if the lower court nonetheless followed the House of Lords' ruling it would be acting unlawfully per HRA s 6, given that s 6 does not in terms indicate that a lower court may lawfully breach Convention Rights if it does so because it is applying a precedent set by a higher court. The inference then arising is that the lower court might be 'saved' from acting unlawfully if we assume that s 6 impliedly incorporates the rules of precedent and judicial hierarchy.⁷⁷ That assumption might however be thought constitutionally problematic because it could be seen as allowing a common law principle to override the statutory protection of Convention Rights.

The issue came before the House of Lords in D v East Berkshire Community NHS Trust.⁷⁸ The rule of domestic law in issue was the judgment of the House of Lords in X (Minors) v Bedfordshire County Council.⁷⁹ In X, the House of Lords had held that children who had suffered abuse and mistreatment while in the care of a local authority social services department could not sue the local authority in negligence for any physical or psychiatric injuries they had received. The conclusion rested on the assumption that it would be contrary to public policy to allow any such claims to go forward because the prospect of being sued would deter local authorities from carrying out their statutory duties with sufficient rigour.

Six years later the claimants in X succeeded in a claim before the ECtHR—*Z v United Kingdom*⁸⁰—that they had been subject to inhuman and degrading treatment contrary to Art 3 ECHR and that the rule in X denied them any effective remedy contrary to Art 13 ECHR. Several subsequent ECtHR judgments involving other states also indicated that a so called 'blanket immunity' provision of this sort in relationship to government bodies' child care powers breached various provisions of the Convention.

⁷⁷ This assumption would rest on an empirical fiction. The point does not appear to have been considered by MPs during the passage of the Bill.

⁷⁸ [2005] UKHL 23, [2005] 2 AC 373.

⁷⁹ [1995] 2 AC 663.

⁸⁰ (2001) 34 EHRR 97.

In D, the Court of Appeal held that it was not bound by the judgment of the House of Lords in X. The Court appeared to hold⁸¹ that the effect of the Human Rights Act was that in circumstances where the ECtHR had held that a specific rule of domestic law promulgated by a higher court breached the Convention then any binding effect that rule once had in domestic law was removed. The Court of Appeal also seemed to suggest that any such precedential effect would be lost if the ECtHR subsequently held that similar domestic laws breached the Convention. The House of Lords approved this reasoning. Both courts—and these we must recall were judgments which pre-dated Horncastle and Pinnock—evidently considered that the meanings of Convention Rights and Convention articles were invariably the same.

It is of course open to the House of Lords/Supreme Court to alter the rules of precedent and judicial hierarchy, with respect both to its own powers (as it did in 1966)⁸² and indeed the powers of lower courts. The rules exist at common law, and the House of Lords/Supreme Court is competent to alter the common law as it thinks fit. For the Court of Appeal to have taken that step is conceptually much more problematic, for if the Court of Appeal has such a power presumably so does the High Court (and perhaps every other court). It is unfortunate that the House of Lords' judgment in D did not make this point more forcefully. That it did not do so makes it hard to avoid the conclusion that both the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords were according the ECtHR what was in effect an appellate (ie final court of appeal) status within the schemata of the HRA.

In Kay,⁸³ the House of Lords resiled substantially from the suggestion that its reasoning in D created a rule of general application. The general rule should in fact be that lower courts would continue to be bound by ordinary rules of precedent, even if it seemed clear that a particular domestic law was in breach of a Convention article/Right. The primary reason for that conclusion had little to do with the de facto hierarchical relationship between domestic courts and the ECtHR implied by D, but lay in concerns about legal certainty. Because there would often be substantial scope for domestic courts to disagree about the precise meaning of ECtHR judgments, a rule which allowed lower courts to invoke those judgments as a justification for departing from otherwise binding domestic authority would be a recipe for inconsistency and confusion. The proper course for a lower court to follow would be to apply the domestic law but to hear argument on the Convention (Right) point and if it regarded those arguments as well-founded to say so and grant permission for an appeal to a higher court. A lower court could depart from binding authority only if several preconditions were met. Firstly the judgment in issue had been decided before the HRA came into force. Secondly, no consideration has been given to ECHR issues by the domestic court. And thirdly the specific domestic judgment has subsequently been found by the ECtHR to breach the Convention in an action brought by the individuals who lost the domestic proceedings.⁸⁴

In essence, Kay tells us that there is no HRA equivalent to the EC law immediacy doctrine articulated by the ECJ in Simmenthal.⁸⁵ Whether that substantive conclusion is morally desirable from an abstract rule of law perspective is obviously open to dispute. But from the viewpoint of a rather more pragmatic concern with legal certainty, the position taken in Kay appears eminently sensible.

⁸¹ [2003] EWCA Civ 1151, [2004] QB 558 at paras 79–84.

⁸² See 'The 1966 Practice Statement', ch 3, pp 75 above.

⁸³ [2006] 2 AC 465 at paras 40–45.

⁸⁴ [2006] UKHL 10, [2006] 2 AC 465 at para 45 per Lord Bingham; 'But such a course is not permissible save where the facts are of that extreme character'

⁸⁵ See 'Immediate precedence', ch 11, pp 375–376 above.

III. The horizontality of the Act

The courts have charted a rather erratic course through the murky waters of s 6 of the Act. As commentators had predicted, two major questions have arisen. The first relates to the breadth of the concept of a 'public authority' for s 6(1) purposes. The second concerns the impact that the Act has had on legal relationships between private parties.

As suggested above, the definition of 'public authority' within s 6 of the Act was a question likely to generate considerable litigation. The answer given by the courts on this point might have a substantial bearing on the impact of the Act, in so far as that answer would determine which legal actors were bound to respect Convention Rights. The point also bears closely on the distinction between de facto and de jure understandings of the 'horizontal effect' argument.

The identification of a particular individual or body as a 'public authority' means that any action against her or it based on the HRA 1998 would be (nominally) 'vertical' in nature. But one must beware of allowing labels to obscure realities. By interpreting the notion of a public authority very broadly, the courts could pull many ostensibly 'private' individuals or corporations within s 6 without formally recognising horizontal effect at all. Conversely, a narrow construction of 'public authority' would be largely irrelevant if the courts were to assume that s 3 of the Act and their own status as public authorities per s 6 compelled them to issue Convention-compliant judgments irrespective of the identities of the parties to litigation.

The meaning of 'public authorities'

An ostensibly straightforward question as to the reach of the public authority principle was raised in Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank.⁸⁶ The Chancel Repairs Act 1932 empowers parochial church councils (PCCs) to impose costs of maintaining church buildings on owners of land which was once owned by the church. The defendants had been issued with a substantial bill by their local PCC, and claimed that this infringed Art 1 of the First Protocol to the Convention. The Court of Appeal accepted that the PCC was a public authority within s 6. In part this was because the PCC derived its powers from statute. This should not per se be regarded as a conclusive point however. It may be that a more important factor underpinning the Court's conclusion was the nature of the PCC's power. The power in issue was regarded by the Court of Appeal as essentially one of taxation, which is generally seen as a government function.⁸⁷

An early analytical principle: the 'close assimilation' test

A different factual situation arose in Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association v Donoghue.⁸⁸ The appellant was a notionally private sector housing association. However, in de facto terms the housing association was essentially a management takeover of the housing operation previously controlled by the London Borough of Tower Hamlets.⁸⁹ The litigation was triggered by the association's attempt to evict one of ⁸⁶ [2001] EWCA Civ 713, [2002] Ch 51, [2001] 3 WLR 1323.

⁸⁷ The Court went on to conclude that the tax imposed on the defendants breached Art 1 of the First Protocol, in that it was arbitrary and disproportionate as it bore no relation to the value of the land itself. For further discussion, see Dawson I and Dunn A (2002) 'Seeking the principle: chancel, choices and human rights' Legal Studies 238; Oliver D (2001) 'Chancel repairs and the Human Rights Act' Public Law 651.

⁸⁸ [2001] EWCA Civ 595, [2002] QB 48, [2001] 3 WLR 183.

⁸⁹ See the discussion of the privatisation of council housing at 'X. Privatising local government', ch 10, pp 324–326 above.

its tenants; a tenant whose tenancy had been granted when the housing was owned by the local authority.

For present purposes, the central issue before the Court of Appeal was whether the association fell within the scope of s 6(3)(b); ie was it—a ‘person certain of whose functions are of a public nature’. Lord Woolf CJ’s leading judgment accepted that the notion of public authority in s 6: ‘should be given a generous interpretation’.⁹⁰ Lord Woolf suggested that guidance as to the meaning of public authority could be found in administrative law cases concerned with whether particular bodies should be subject to judicial review.⁹¹ But, in terms of broad principle, the Court of Appeal rejected the suggestion that private individuals or organisations which contracted with public authorities to provide the means for those authorities to discharge legal obligations themselves became public authorities for s 6 purposes:

The fact that a body performs an activity which otherwise a public body would be under a duty to perform cannot mean that such a performance is necessarily a public function. A public body in order to perform its public duties can use the services of a private body. S 6 should not be applied so that if a private body provides such services, the nature of the functions are inevitably public.⁹²

On the facts of the case, the Court of Appeal considered that the Association should be regarded as performing a public function because it was ‘so closely assimilated’ with the local authority.

Application of what might be termed the ‘close assimilation’ test led to a different conclusion in R (Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation.⁹³ The National Assistance Act 1948, s 21(1) places a duty on local authorities to provide accommodation for certain vulnerable people. Section 26 then allows local authorities to discharge the s 21 duty by placing people in facilities owned and run by charities.⁹⁴ Several local authorities placed residents in a home run by a charity, the Leonard Cheshire Foundation, for people in need of intensive care. The Foundation subsequently decided that it wished to close the particular home where Mrs Heather lived. The Court of Appeal concluded that the Foundation was not a public authority. The Court accepted that Poplar required that s 6 be given a broad interpretation. However it distinguished the factual position of the Foundation and the Housing Association in Poplar. The Court saw no reason for assuming that there was a ‘close assimilation’ between the local authorities and the Foundation. This conclusion was clearly driven by policy concerns. As in Poplar, the Court evidently saw no merit in the argument that every privately-owned hotel or nursing home should be regarded as a public authority just because a government body bought its services to house people to whom the government body owed a duty.⁹⁵

⁹⁰ [2001] EWCA Civ 595, [2002] QB 48 at 67.

⁹¹ See the discussion in ch 16 above. ⁹² [2001] EWCA Civ 595, [2002] QB 48 at 67.

⁹³ [2002] EWCA Civ 366, [2002] 2 All ER 936.

⁹⁴ See the discussion of Servite Housing at “Private” actors and “public” functions: the Servite Housing case (1997), ch 16, pp 526–527 above.

⁹⁵ Servite Housing indicated that Leonard Cheshire Homes would not be amenable to judicial review. Leonard Cheshire could plausibly have been decided differently. It is not an extravagant proposition to assert that a private company whose commercial relationship with an individual citizen exists only because a government body is under a legal obligation to the individual should be regarded as stepping into the government body’s shoes for human rights purposes.

A more refined analytical principle? 'Core' and 'hybrid' or 'functional' public authorities

The 'close assimilation' test deployed by the Court of Appeal in Poplar has obvious attractions as a means to determine if a body is a public authority. Its main shortcoming however is that it seems to focus primarily on the identity of the body concerned (and/or the intimacy of its relationship with an organisation that is obviously a public authority) rather than on the function that the body is performing. HRA s 6(3)(b) is cast in terms of function rather than identity, and in more recent cases the higher courts have cast doubt on the appropriateness of an assimilation test.

Aston Cantlow in the House of Lords

The House of Lords in Aston Cantlow took a very different approach to that followed by the Court of Appeal.⁹⁶ The Court indicated that s 6 required a distinction to be drawn between what may be termed 'core' and 'hybrid' public authorities. This dichotomy was substantially shaped by a consideration not pursued before the Court of Appeal. Article 34 of the Convention empowers the ECtHR to receive petitions from 'persons, groups of individuals and non-governmental organisations'. Section 7 of the HRA identifies such petitioners as potential 'victims' of infringements of Convention rights for the purposes of domestic law. The House of Lords in Aston Cantlow was much concerned to avoid the potential difficulty of defining 'public authorities' under s 6 in a fashion which effectively negated the capacity of a 'non-governmental organisation' ever to present itself as a 'victim' in respect of Convention rights. That incapacity should apply only to a 'core' public authority.

There is some circularity in this reasoning.⁹⁷ But members of the Court did offer some freestanding criteria to be used in assessing whether a body was a 'core' body for this purpose. Lord Nicholls' formulation was perhaps the most expansive:

[T]he phrase 'a public authority' in s 6(1) is essentially a reference to a body whose nature is governmental in a broad sense of that expression. It is in respect of organisations of this nature that the government is answerable under the convention. Hence, under the Human Rights Act a body of this nature is required to act compatibly with convention rights in everything it does. The most obvious examples are government departments, local authorities, the police and the armed forces. Behind the instinctive classification of these organisations as bodies whose nature is governmental lie factors such as the possession of special powers, democratic accountability, public funding in whole or in part, an obligation to act only in the public interest, and a statutory constitution...⁹⁸

No member of the Court felt that the PCC could be classified in this way:

Its functions... clearly include matters which are concerned only with the pastoral and organisational concerns of the diocese and the congregation of believers in the parish. It acts in the sectional not the public interest... [I]t is essentially a domestic religious body. The fact that the Church of England is the established Church of England may mean that various bodies within that Church may as a result perform public functions. But it does not follow that PCCs themselves perform any such functions.⁹⁹

⁹⁶ [2003] UKHL 37, [2004] 1 AC 546, [2003] 3 WLR 283.

⁹⁷ And we can now expect complications to arise on the domestic impact of the ECtHR's jurisprudence on this point: cf Davis H (2005) 'Public authorities as victims under the HRA' Cambridge LJ 315; Quane H (2006) 'The Strasbourg jurisprudence and the meaning of a "public authority" under the HRA' Public Law 106.

⁹⁸ [2004] 1 AC 546 at para 7.

⁹⁹ Ibid, per Lord Hobhouse at para 86.

The Court's conclusion on this point was reinforced by the ECtHR's own decision in *Holy Monasteries v Greece*¹⁰⁰ in which the ECtHR held that the 'established' Greek Church could bring an action against the Greek state in respect of the confiscation of its property.

Nor did the House of Lords accept that the PCC was performing a 'function of a public nature' within s 6(3)(b) in this case. The Court indicated that it would not be possible to offer any definitive answer to what might amount to a public function for these purposes. Any such answer would have to be substantially dependent upon the factual character of the particular body and the particular function in issue. On the facts of Aston Cantlow itself, the Court concluded that the 'function' under consideration lacked a 'public' character. Rather than characterise what the PCC was doing as analogous to levying a tax, the House of Lords regarded the PCC as simply enforcing a private law obligation comparable to a restrictive covenant or a civil debt.¹⁰¹

R (Beer) v Hampshire Farmers Market Ltd (2004)

The impact of Aston Cantlow was promptly considered in the Court of Appeal in R (on the application of Beer) v Hampshire Farmers Market Ltd.¹⁰² Hampshire Farmers Market Ltd was de jure a private company. However it had initially been created and operated by Hampshire County Council as a device to stimulate the agricultural sector of the local economy by promoting weekend markets at which local farmers sold their produce direct to the public. The Council subsequently decided to hand control of the operation to the local farmers involved. It assisted them in establishing a limited company, provided office space and logistical support to the company, and a former council employee took on a senior position in the new company. The company was given control, inter alia, of granting licences to farmers who wished to participate in the market sales. Mr Beer was refused a licence, in a fashion which—by the time the case reached the Court of Appeal—was accepted to have been procedurally unfair. The issues before the Court were whether the company was subject to judicial review at common law, and whether it was a public authority within s 6.

Dyson LJ's judgment observes that the answer to these two questions would often—but not always—be the same on any given set of facts. Two factors in this case led him to conclude that the company was both a 'hybrid' public authority and amenable to judicial review. The first was the very close assimilation between the company and the county council; the council had created the company; the company 'stepped into the council's shoes' in terms of its functions; and the council continued to provide substantial support to the company. This element of the judgment is essentially an endorsement of the Court of Appeal's reasoning in Poplar. The second, and perhaps more idiosyncratic, factor was that the venues where the markets were held had traditionally been regarded as places to ¹⁰⁰ (1994) 20 EHRR 1. In emphasising the importance of the ECtHR's case law on this point, the House of Lords also indicated that no great reliance should be placed for s 6 purposes on the ostensibly similar issue of whether a body was amenable to judicial review under domestic law or whether—in the context of EC law it was an 'emanation of the state' for Marshall purposes: see 'The horizontal and vertical direct effect of directives? Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority (1986)', ch 11, pp 381–382 above.

¹⁰¹ See generally Meisel F (2004) 'The Aston Cantlow case: blots on English jurisprudence and the public/private law divide' Public Law 2; Donnelly C (2005) 'Leonard Cheshire again and beyond: private contractors, contract and s 6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act' Public Law 785; Sunkin M (2004) 'Pushing forward the frontiers of human rights protection; the meaning of public authority under the Human Rights Act' Public Law 643.

¹⁰² [2003] EWCA Civ 1056, [2004] 1 WLR 233. For an interesting discussion see Hough B (2005) 'Public regulation of markets and fairs' Public Law 586.

which the general public had a right of access. As such, the company was in a sense acting as a steward of a public rather than private interest.

YL v Birmingham and Others (2007)

The Court of Appeal's decision in Leonard Cheshire was not appealed to the House of Lords, but the matter was revisited in 2007 in YL v Birmingham and Others.¹⁰³ Birmingham council had contracted with a private company, Southern Cross, for Southern Cross to provide the residential care which Birmingham was obliged to offer to persons with an entitlement under s 21 of the National Assistance Act 1948. Southern Cross had such agreements with many local authorities. In 2007, it provided 29,000 residential care places, of which 80% were s 21 placements.

YL was an elderly lady, suffering from Alzheimer's disease. Southern Cross wished to evict her from her care home because of her erratic behaviour. YL had no contract with Southern Cross; nor, as matters then stood following Servite Housing,¹⁰⁴ could she challenge the propriety of her eviction by judicial review. Unless Southern Cross was a public authority, YL would have no means of bringing the matter before the courts. It seems likely that the care home was YL's home for the purposes of Art 8, and that her eviction from it would have amounted to an interference with her Art 8 entitlements. However the case was argued on the basis of the preliminary issue of whether Southern Cross was a public authority.

Both Lord Bingham and Baroness Hale considered that Southern Cross was performing a public function in relation to its accommodation of YL and was thus a public authority within HRA s 6. Lord Bingham evidently saw little difficulty in reaching that conclusion:

20. When the 1998 Act was passed, it was very well known that a number of functions formerly carried out by public authorities were now carried out by private bodies. Section 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act was clearly drafted with this well-known fact in mind. The performance by private body A by arrangement with public body B, and perhaps at the expense of B, of what would undoubtedly be a public function if carried out by B is, in my opinion, precisely the case which section 6(3)(b) was intended to embrace. It is, in my opinion, this case.

Lord Bingham and Baroness Hale identified four factors leading to this conclusion. The first was that Parliament in enacting the 1948 legislation had assumed a positive obligation towards people accommodated under s 21. The second was that such people were atypically vulnerable to abuse and exploitation and so, correspondingly, needed greater protection. The third was that the service performed by the private contractor was, in effect, the service that would otherwise have to be performed by Birmingham Council. And the fourth was that the service was being substantially financed by public funds.¹⁰⁵

Baroness Hale and Lord Bingham were however in a minority. The majority view, put perhaps most forcefully by Lord Scott (supported by Lords Mance and Neuberger), did not accept that Southern Cross was caught by HRA s 6. Lord Scott rejected the suggestion that just because Southern Cross was providing services which the council could have provided itself did not mean that Southern Cross itself was performing a public function.

¹⁰³ [2007] UK HL 27, [2008] 1 AC 95, [2007] 3 WLR 112.

¹⁰⁴ See "Private" actors and "public" functions: the Servite Housing case (1997), ch 16, pp 526–527 above.

¹⁰⁵ Cf Baroness Hale at para 65: '... While there cannot be a single litmus test of what is a function of a public nature, the underlying rationale must be that it is a task for which the public, in the shape of the state, have assumed responsibility, at public expense if need be, and in the public interest'.

Lord Scott was concerned that if this argument were accepted, there would be no limit to the range of functions and bodies which would fall within HRA s 6:

[30]...If every contracting out by a local authority of a function that the local authority could, in exercise of a statutory power or the discharge of a statutory duty, have carried out itself, turns the contractor into a hybrid public authority for section 6(3)(b) purposes, where does this end? Is a contractor engaged by a local authority to provide lifeguard personnel at the municipal swimming pool a section 6(3)(b) public authority? If so, would a local authority employee engaged by the local authority as a lifeguard at the pool become a public authority? Could it be argued that his or her function was a function of a public nature? If Southern Cross is a section 6(3)(b) public authority, why does it not follow that each manager of each Southern Cross care home, and even each nurse or care worker at each care home would, by reason of his or her function at the care home, be a section 6(3)(b) public authority?

This is an extravagant reading of the implications of accepting the minority position. There is little difficulty in drawing a qualitative distinction between a contractor providing lifeguards at a swimming pool and a contractor providing intensively supportive residential care to elderly people suffering from debilitating medical conditions. Local authorities are, for example, required to provide s 21 care: they are not obliged to provide swimming pools. Nor are swimming pool attendants qua swimming pool attendants in a position to impact significantly on any person's human rights. Conceivably a swimming pool might refuse entry to a person on a basis which breaches Art 9 or Art 10, and one might concede (having swum in our imaginations to the deep end of a barely credible empirical example) that a 'public authority' lifeguard who declined to rescue a drowning child on the basis of the child's race or gender or religious belief would breach—inter alia—Art 2 and/or Art 9 and/or Art 14. A care home, in contrast, is always intimately involved with a resident's Art 8 entitlements. Additionally, very few patrons of a local authority swimming pool will be 'vulnerable' in the sense identified by Lord Bingham and Baroness Hale. In contrast, every single one of Southern Cross's s 21 residents would be a vulnerable person.

Nor did the majority seem to attach any significance to the fact that Southern Cross derived so much of its income—and profit—from residents placed in its facilities by local authorities and paid for by public funds. As Lord Scott put it:

26. Southern Cross is a company carrying on a socially useful business for profit. It is neither a charity nor a philanthropist. It enters into private law contracts with the residents in its care homes and with the local authorities with whom it does business. It receives no public funding, enjoys no special statutory powers, and is at liberty to accept or reject residents as it chooses (subject, of course, to anti-discrimination legislation which affects everyone who offers a service to the public) and to charge whatever fees in its commercial judgment it thinks suitable. It is operating in a commercial market with commercial competitors.

27... There is no element whatever of subsidy from public funds. It is a misuse of language and misleading to describe Southern Cross as publicly funded.

Lord Scott's reasoning here resembles the 'close assimilation' test: since Southern Cross was not in any sense 'assimilated' to Birmingham Council it was not a public authority. The majority view provides an obvious and—it might be thought—unhappy incentive for local authorities and other government bodies to 'contract-out' provision of public services to organisations whose primary concern is simply to make profits rather than provide appropriate services.¹⁰⁶

¹⁰⁶ The majority did accept that private service providers which exercised coercive powers over their 'customers' might be public authorities in respect of some of their functions. The obvious examples of this would be privatised prisons or hospitals accommodating people detained under mental health legislation.

One might also wonder at the correctness of the assertion that Southern Cross received ‘no public funding’. The frailty of this reasoning is readily demonstrable. Had Birmingham offered Southern Cross a rent free fully-furnished building in which to accommodate residents and as a result paid the company a much lower weekly fee for each of its s 21 placements, the public funding paid to the company would be both obvious and substantial. If Southern Cross pays for its own buildings and furnishings by using a portion of the much higher fee it therefore charged to Birmingham, the element of public funding may be less obvious but it is no less substantial.¹⁰⁷

Some indication that the minority position in YL was closer to the then government’s perception of what types of activities the public authority concept was supposed to cover was given shortly after the judgment, when the government announced that legislation would be promoted specifically to designate care providers such as Southern Cross as public authorities for HRA s 6 purposes.¹⁰⁸

Weaver v London and Quadrant Housing (2008)

Shortly after YL was decided, the High Court surprisingly produced a much more expansive application of the public authority concept in R (on the application of Weaver) v London and Quadrant Housing Trust.¹⁰⁹ Ms Weaver was an ‘assured tenant’ of London and Quadrant. The assured tenancy regime is laid out in the Housing Act 1988, and includes a provision (known as ‘ground 8’) which gives landlords an absolute right to regain possession of a leased property if the tenant is more than eight weeks in arrears with her rent when proceedings are begun and at the date of the trial. London and Quadrant began ground 8 proceedings against Ms Weaver, whose sole defence to the claim was that she had a substantive legitimate expectation that such proceedings would only be initiated as a last resort.

To argue that point, Ms Weaver had to establish either that London and Quadrant was amenable to judicial review or/and that it was a public authority. Given the High Court’s ¹⁰⁷ See also Lord Mance at para 105: ‘Public funding takes various forms. The injection of capital or subsidy into an organisation in return for undertaking a non-commercial role may be one thing; payment for services under a contractual arrangement with a company aiming to profit commercially thereby is potentially quite another’: and of Lord Neuberger at para 165: ‘It seems to me much easier to invoke public funding to support the notion that a the service is a function of a ‘public nature’ where the funding effectively subsidises, in whole or in part, the cost of the service as a whole, rather than consisting of payment for the provision of that service to a specific person’.

¹⁰⁸ Subsequently enacted as the Health and Social Care Act 2008 s 148. For an insightful discussion of the broader issues of the impact of privatisation of public services on the reach of HRA protections see Donnelly C (2010) ‘Positive obligations and privatisation’ Northern Ireland Legal Quarterly 209. An unhappy footnote to the YL case, nicely illustrative of the fiscal as well as ideological difficulties attendant on privatisation of welfare state services, is that Southern Cross encountered severe financial difficulties in 2008, by which time two of its founders had left with, respectively, £7.9m and £6.6m payouts from share sales. A substantial element of those payouts was presumably derived from s 21 placements paid for by local authorities. One might wonder if that £14.5m might have been more beneficially spent on providing better care for the residents; see The Guardian, 1 July 2008. The company collapsed entirely in 2011, prompting panicky pledges by the coalition government that steps would be taken to safeguard residents’ occupancy of their homes; see for example Bawden A and Alcock R (2011) ‘Care homes in the balance’ The Guardian, 25 May 2011

(<http://www.guardian.co.uk/society/2011/may/25/southern-cross-care-homes-in-balance>); Walker D (2011) ‘Cameron’s faith in the market should have been shaken by Southern Cross’ The Guardian, 11 July 2010

(<http://www.guardian.co.uk/public-leaders-network/2011/jul/18/cameron-faith-market-shaken-southern-cross>).

¹⁰⁹ [2008] EWHC 1377 (Admin), [2009] 1 All ER 17.

judgment in Servite Housing and that of the House of Lords in YL, it might have been thought that both arguments would be difficult to make out.

London and Quadrant is a charity, its purpose being to provide housing. It also has the status of a ‘registered social landlord’ (‘RSL’). It is not a body created by statute, nor (unlike Poplar HARCA) did it come into being as the result of privatisation of council housing stock. The High Court¹¹⁰ took the view that London and Quadrant was both a public authority within HRA s 6 and amenable to judicial review in respect of its housing management functions. Several factors led to this conclusion.

Firstly, London and Quadrant received substantial amounts of money in grants from the Housing Corporation (a government body) to buy or develop new properties. Secondly, most of its lettings were to persons nominated by local authorities; and as an RSL was statutorily required to co-operate with local authorities for this purpose. Thirdly, as a charity, London and Quadrant could not be categorised as a commercial, profit-making (and thus presumptively private for HRA purposes) organisation in the orthodox sense. Fourthly, and perhaps most importantly, the thrust of government housing policy in recent years had been to have RSLs increasingly take over the role in respect of providing low cost accommodation previously performed by local councils.¹¹¹

The judgment is of great significance in practical terms. Its immediate effect would be to provide tenant defendants in possession proceedings with grounds of defence—namely the various grounds of judicial review—which would not previously have been available to them. In many circumstances, these grounds would add little to the explicit statutory protection which Parliament has granted to housing association tenants. But since that protection does not extend to all such tenants in all situations, nor to residents who were not tenants at all, Weaver introduced a significant change to domestic residential possession law.

The conclusion reached by the High Court in Weaver was subsequently upheld by the Court of Appeal.¹¹² The Court of Appeal suggested however that the proper way to analyse such a case was to consider whether the claimant’s attempt to evict the defendant from her home was a ‘public function’ for s 6 purposes rather than whether the claimant was per se a ‘public authority’. That reasoning is of course wholly consistent with the Aston Cantlow judgment.

In more general terms, the cases discussed above could be taken to suggest that the courts have got into something of a muddle in respect of the meaning which should be accorded to the public authority concept. But even an entirely coherent body of authority on this issue would not settle the question as to the reach of the Human Rights Act. Of equal or perhaps greater significance on that point is the way in which the courts have dealt with cases raising what were referred to above as ‘scenario 3’ and ‘scenario 4’ situations.

Imposing Convention Rights on private individuals and organisations

The Court of Appeal’s judgment in *Wilson v First County Trust (No 2)*¹¹³ took a rather conservative approach to the impact of s 3. The House of Lords saw no need to tackle that issue as it concluded that the HRA did not impact upon the contract in question and in ¹¹⁰ Sitting as a two judge court; Richards LJ and Swift J.

¹¹¹ As noted in ch 10, this policy shift was initiated by the Thatcher governments in the 1980s. The trend has been continued by the Blair and Brown administrations; see “Opting out” and Housing Action Trusts’, ch 10, pp 326–327 above.

¹¹² [2009] EWCA Civ 587, [2010] 1 WLR 363.

¹¹³ [2001] EWCA Civ 633, [2002] QB 74, [2001] 3 WLR 42.

any event the relevant statutory provision was compatible with the Convention. But the decision also has implications for the Act's reach into the ostensibly 'private' sphere.

Wilson concerned the construction of the Consumer Credit Act 1974, s 127. In so far as s 127 regulates the relationship between private lenders and borrowers it creates a 'horizontal' relationship. The Court of Appeal however (without evidently giving any thought to the horizontality question) 'verticalised' the dispute by in effect treating the first instance judgment as the defendant on appeal.¹¹⁴ The Court (whether by design or happy accident is not clear) cut through much of the conceptual difficulty attending the horizontal/vertical effect debate by essentially making Parliament—in the sense of s 127 as construed by the trial court—the 'defendant'. The action in the case was 'horizontal' only inasmuch as Ms Wilson provided the procedural peg on which the substantive argument as to the compatibility of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 s 127 with the Convention (Right) could be hung. The question of horizontality was not pursued before the House of Lords. To put the point differently; one issue of principle which could be extracted from Wilson is that Human Rights Act litigation in which the substance of the relationship between the parties turns on the interpretation of statutory provisions is always 'vertical' in nature irrespective of the identity of the parties.¹¹⁵

The same conclusion can be drawn from Mendoza. No issue was taken by either counsel or the various courts which heard Mendoza as to the 'horizontal' of the action. Mr Mendoza's landlord was not a public authority in either a core or functional sense. Mr Ghaidan had conceded the point that the HRA was applicable to the case because of the interactive effect of the court's twin obligations under s 3 to read the relevant provisions of the Rent Act in a Convention compliant fashion and under s 6 (qua public authority) not to act in an unlawful manner unless required to do so by primary legislation. The point was best put by Keene LJ in the Court of Appeal:¹¹⁶

[37]... First, the concession made on behalf of the respondent that the appellant's rights under the European Convention on Human Rights are relevant to the construction of para 2 of Sch 1 to the Rent Act 1977, even though this is litigation between two private individuals, was a proper one. Section 6(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 ('the 1998 Act') makes it unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right, and by virtue of s 6(3)(a) this court is a public authority. It follows that this court cannot act incompatibly with a Convention right, unless (see s 6(2)) the court is acting to give effect to or enforce provisions of or made under primary legislation which cannot be read or given effect in a way which is compatible with such a right.

[38] That patently takes one to s 3 of the 1998 Act, with its obligation on the court to read and give effect to primary and secondary legislation in a way compatible with Convention rights 'so far as it is possible to do so'...

On this analysis of the HRA—which was not questioned in the House of Lords—the 'real' defendant in Ghaidan v Mendoza, as in Wilson, was the statutory term which mandated a particular outcome in any dispute between private parties in the respective positions of the litigants in these cases.

If the HRA is read in this way, the designation of courts as 'public authorities' within HRA, s 6 simply reiterates their s 3 obligation when questions of statutory interpretation arise. The consequences of the courts' designation as 'public authorities' within s 6 for the ¹¹⁴ Ibid, at paras 18–19; per Sir Andrew Morritt VC.

¹¹⁵ This would not require the conclusion that Leonard Cheshire was wrongly decided. On the facts of that case, there was no direct statutory relationship between the Foundation and the applicant. The parties were rather indirectly linked together through their respective statutory relationships with a local authority.

¹¹⁶ [2002] EWCA Civ 1533, [2003] Ch 380, [2003] 2 WLR 478.

purposes of ‘horizontalising’ Convention Rights in actions between private parties then becomes pertinent only in respect of litigation which raises the question of whether existing common law rules should be modified or—if the court faces a legal void—whether new common law rules should be recognised/created to limit the autonomy of private parties in their dealings with each other. The initial case law on this point suggested that the courts might be inclined de facto—but certainly not de jure—to give certain Convention Rights horizontal effect.¹¹⁷

As noted in ch 21, the House of Lords had suggested in Reynolds that the HRA might trigger important developments in the common law.¹¹⁸ Immediately prior to the HRA coming into force, Sedley LJ in *Redmond-Bate v Director of Public Prosecutions*¹¹⁹ (a judgment dealing with the inter-relationship between freedom of expression and the common law concept of breach of the peace)—echoed the suggestion that the HRA would have a significant impact on the content of the common law:

(10)....Parliament has now enacted the Human Rights Act 1998, requiring every public authority, including the police and the courts, to give effect to the scheduled Convention rights unless statutory provision makes it impossible to do so. The bulk of the Act is not yet in force: Ministers have announced their intention to bring it into force on October 2, 2000. But in this interregnum it is far from immaterial. Not only is it now accepted that the common law should seek compatibility with the values of the Convention insofar as it does not already share them; executive action which breaches the Convention already runs the risk, if uncorrected by law, of putting the United Kingdom in breach of the Convention and rendering it liable to proceedings before the European Court of Human Rights. There is, therefore, and has been for a long time, good reason for policing and law in this field to respect the Convention... (emphasis added).

(13) To speak of rights at all in this context is to recognise the constitutional shift which is now in progress. ... (emphasis added).

Sedley LJ subsequently sat in one of the first Court of Appeal cases following the coming into force of the HRA. The applicants in *Douglas and Zeta-Jones v Hello! Ltd*¹²⁰ were unlikely candidates for the roles of flag-bearers of a right to privacy in English law. As noted above, prior to 2000 neither the courts nor Parliament had thought it desirable to introduce such a law.¹²¹ Douglas and Zeta-Jones, both film stars, had signed a lucrative deal with a popular magazine—OK—for exclusive coverage of their wedding. Elaborate security precautions were put in place to prevent any unauthorised photos or sound recordings being made. Another magazine nonetheless managed to acquire some photos of the event and planned to feature them in its next edition. Douglas and Zeta-Jones then sought an injunction to prevent publication. This was granted at first instance.

The Court of Appeal subsequently lifted the injunction, but did so in a judgment which initially appeared to have significant implications for both the emergence of a right to privacy at common law and the likely horizontal impact of the HRA. All three judges¹²² in the Court of Appeal appeared to approve the approach to horizontality advocated by Pannick and Lester;¹²³ namely that the courts should see the Human Rights Act as providing a ¹¹⁷ Much of the following passage is drawn from the submissions made in a skeleton argument in litigation in which I acted as junior counsel to Andrew Arden QC. I owe him some considerable thanks for his testing and refinement of the arguments I put forward.

¹¹⁸ ‘Conclusion’, ch 21, pp 659 above.

¹¹⁹ ((QBD) [2000] HRLR 249).

¹²⁰ [2001] QB 967, CA.

¹²¹ See the discussion of Malone at ‘Malone v Metropolitan Police Commissioner (1979)’, ch 18, pp 567–569 above.

¹²² Sedley, Brooke and Keene LJ.

¹²³ See ‘A division of academic opinion on the horizontal effect issue?’, ch 21, pp 650–651 above.

legislative spur for more rapid development of indigenous common law principles.¹²⁴ For Sedley LJ, the spur was sufficient for him to accept that; ‘We have reached a point at which it can be said with confidence that the law recognises and will appropriately protect a right of personal privacy.’¹²⁵ Keene LJ appeared to endorse this view. Brooke LJ adopted a more conservative approach, preferring to conclude that the claimants would find a remedy in an extended version of the tort of breach of confidence.

The subtleties of the various judgments unsurprisingly prompted some divergence of opinion as to the degree of horizontalisation which the Act might subsequently attain.¹²⁶ Even cautiously construed however, Douglas and Zeta-Jones supports the proposition that the passage of the Human Rights Act has provided a sharp stimulus to the courts to stretch the reach of existing common law principles to cover interferences with Convention rights by bodies other than ‘public authorities’. The Court considered that the existing law of breach of confidence could be extended in these circumstances to protect the claimant’s Art 2 and Art 8 rights.

Further powerful support for that viewpoint was provided by a High Court judgment—*Venables v Newsgroup Newspapers Ltd*¹²⁷—issued shortly after Douglas. Venables had been convicted of murder when he was a child. He was shortly to be released from imprisonment, and feared he would be the subject of vigilante vengeance attacks if his identity and whereabouts became matters of public knowledge. He therefore sought an injunction against all media sources to prevent publication of any information that could reveal his new identity and home, on the basis that such publicity would unacceptably jeopardise his right to privacy under Art 8 and his right to life under Art 2.

Dame Butler Sloss P followed the reasoning in Douglas in drawing the following conclusion:

That obligation [ie of s 6(1)] on the court does not seem to me to encompass the creation of a free standing cause of action based directly on the articles of the convention.... The duty on the court, in my view, is to act compatibly with convention rights in adjudicating on existing common law causes of action, and that includes a positive as well as a negative obligation.¹²⁸

The House of Lords subsequently addressed this issue in Wainwright v Home Office.¹²⁹ Wainwright was not a case in which horizontality was not strictly in issue, as the defendant was a public authority. However the judgment offered guidance as to the intensely important question in respect of both ‘horizontal’ and ‘vertical’ actions of whether or not the HRA directly or indirectly created a right to privacy at common law. The claimants had been strip searched—in a fashion which was accepted to breach Home Office guidelines—while visiting a family member in prison. One had been subject to a battery which subsequently caused him psychiatric damage. The other claimant had not been the victim of a battery, but was left feeling humiliated and offended by the search. That one claimant had an existing remedy in damages in respect of the battery was uncontentious. The difficult ¹²⁴ Cf Sedley LJ [2001] QB 967 at 1002; ‘[I]f the step from confidentiality to privacy is not simply a modern restatement of the scope of a known protection but a legal innovation—then I would accept... that this is precisely the kind of incremental change for which the Human Rights Act is designed...’; Keene LJ at 1011: ‘[T]he courts as a public authority cannot act in a way which is incompatible with a convention right: s 6(1). That arguably includes their activity in interpreting and developing the common law, even where no public authority is a party to the litigation’.

¹²⁵ See Moreham N (2001) ‘Douglas v Hello! Ltd—the protection of privacy in English private law’ MLR 767; Young A (2002) ‘Remedial and substantive horizontality: the common law and Douglas v Hello! Ltd’ Public Law 232. On subsequent developments see Beyleveld D and Pattinson S (2002) ‘Horizontal applicability’ LQR 623; Morgan J (2002) ‘Questioning the “true effect” of the Human Rights Act’ Legal Studies 259.

¹²⁷ [2001] Fam 430, [2001] 2 WLR 1038, [2001] 1 All ER 908.

¹²⁸ [2001] Fam 430 at 446.

¹²⁹ [2003] UKHL 53; [2004] 2 AC 406, [2003] 3 WLR 1137, [2003] 4 All ER 969.

point before the House of Lords was whether the claimants also had an action for breach of privacy.

The House of Lords rejected the assertion that English law should recognise a general remedy for breach of privacy in English law. The Court approvingly referred to Megarry VC's analysis in *Malone*¹³⁰ to explain why it was inappropriate for such an initiative to be taken at common law. Nor did the Court consider that such a wide-ranging right was required by the Convention. Its reading of the ECtHR's jurisprudence led it to conclude that what was required was that remedies be available to deal with specific instances of breaches of Art 8. Nor, on the facts, did the Court accept that a breach of Art 8 had even occurred. That the claimants were distressed or humiliated by the search did not in itself amount to an invasion of the claimants' privacy entitlement under the ECHR.

The contention that the HRA could not found 'new' causes of action at common law might however be qualified (as a matter of substance if not of form) in the light of the House of Lords' judgment in Campbell v MGN.¹³¹ In Campbell, the Court held (unanimously in principle but by a 3–2 majority on application of the facts) that the model Naomi Campbell had a remedy in breach of confidence in respect of the publication by a newspaper of photographs of her attending a drug rehabilitation programme. This conclusion had quite a radical effect on the substance of the common law. The tort of breach of confidence had previously been assumed to require that there be a pre-existing relationship between the parties which per se generated an expectation of confidence, as between a husband and wife or an employer and employee for example. In Campbell, the House of Lords accepted that a pre-existing relationship was unnecessary. What was important was the nature of the information disclosed. There is certainly force to the argument that the judgment effectively created a new tort rather than simply extended an existing one.

In respect of the broader issue impact of the HRA on the propriety of courts altering the common law, two passages of the judgment are especially significant. Lord Nicholls observed at para 19:

In applying this approach, and giving effect to the values protected by article 8, courts will often be aided by adopting the structure of article 8 in the same way as they now habitually apply the Strasbourg court's approach to article 10 when resolving questions concerning freedom of expression. Articles 8 and 10 call for a more explicit analysis of competing considerations than the three traditional requirements of the cause of action for breach of confidence identified in Coco v A N Clark (Engineers) Ltd [1969] RPC 41; (emphasis added).

In slightly different language, Lord Hope made the same substantive point at para 86:

The language has changed following the coming into operation of the Human Rights Act 1998 and the incorporation into domestic law of article 8 and article 10 of the Convention. We now talk about the right to respect for private life and the countervailing right to freedom of expression. The jurisprudence of the European Court offers important guidance as to how these competing rights ought to be approached and analysed. I doubt whether the result is that the centre of gravity, as my noble and learned friend, Lord Hoffmann, says, has shifted. It seems to me that the balancing exercise to which that guidance is directed is essentially the same exercise, although it is plainly now more carefully focused and more penetrating. (emphasis added).

¹³⁰ Malone v Metropolitan Police Commissioner (1979), ch 18, pp 567–569 above.

¹³¹ [2004] UKHL 22, [2004] AC 457. For (a very) critical comment see Morgan J (2004) 'Privacy in the House of Lords, again' LQR 563.

Nor did the House of Lords (per Lord Nicholls) see any difficulty in applying this concept in an action between private parties:

17... . The values embodied in articles 8 and 10 are as much applicable in disputes between individuals or between an individual and a non-governmental body such as a newspaper as they are in disputes between individuals and a public authority.

18... . It is sufficient to recognise that the values underlying articles 8 and 10 are not confined to disputes between individuals and public authorities. This approach has been adopted by the courts in several recent decisions, reported and unreported, where individuals have complained of press intrusion.

Although these cases deal primarily with privacy entitlements, there is no obvious barrier to the concepts of a ‘more explicit analysis of competing considerations’ (per Lord Nicholls) or a ‘more carefully focused and more penetrating’ balancing exercise (per Lord Hope) being of general application. The very nature of common law reasoning is to find the proper balance for the law to strike between competing considerations. The effect of HRA s 2 is to make the ECtHR’s views on the meaning of Convention articles a matter which must be taken into account by domestic courts in determining the meaning of Convention Rights. The s 2 duty is no less applicable when common law rules rather than statutory provisions are in issue. Common law rules which have been formulated without adequate judicial attention being given to such considerations¹³² will necessarily be subject to re-evaluation as and when they come before the courts.¹³³

The principle articulated by Lord Nicholls and Lord Hope in Campbell can quite properly be seen as the methodological equivalent—when common law rules are before the court—of the HRA s 3 requirement imposed on the courts in respect of statutory provisions. That this duty in respect of the common law may sensibly be seen as a corollary of the court’s obligations under HRA s 3 in respect of statutory provisions is made clear in the Court of Appeal’s judgment in HRH Prince of Wales v Associated Newspapers Ltd:¹³⁴

25.... Section 3 of the Human Rights Act 1998 requires the court, so far as it is possible, to read and give effect to legislation in a manner which is compatible with the Convention rights. The English court has recognised that it should also, in so far as possible, develop the common law in such a way as to give effect to Convention rights. In this way horizontal effect is given to the Convention. This would seem to accord with the view of the European Court of Human Rights as to the duty of the court as a public authority....; (emphasis added).

An alternative framework for analysis

The extent to which the HRA has a horizontal impact has presented the courts with a difficult question to which we have thus far been given a complex answer. Several propositions might however be advanced.

¹³² Such rules formulated prior to 1990 are unlikely to have given any attention at all to ECHR considerations.

¹³³ The position is nicely summarised in Clayton R and Tomlinson H (2nd edn, 2008) The law of human rights at 5.136–5.137:

(5) The impact on the common law and rules of precedent

5.136 The inclusion of the court as a public authority under section 6(3) of the HRA places the court under a duty to ensure that the common law is not developed incompatibly with Convention rights....

5.137 One of the most striking effects of the HRA has been its impact on the law of precedent. The Act comprehensively affects most areas of English law: and requires that common law principles be re-examined in the light of the new approach....

¹³⁴ [2007] EWHC 522 (Ch), [2008] Ch 57 per Lord Phillips CJ.

Firstly, where the substantive outcome of litigation is dependent upon the meaning attached to a statutory provision, the identity of the parties is irrelevant. All such situations are lent a vertical character by s 3.

Secondly, the courts have adopted a sufficiently expansive approach to the meaning of 'public authority' per s 6 to ensure that some notionally horizontal actions acquire a vertical character because of the identity of the claimant/defendant.

Thirdly, if no statutory provision is in issue and neither party is a public authority, the court qua public authority per HRA s 6:

- (a) is obliged where the substantive outcome of the case is dependent on an existing rule of common law to alter that rule of common law to ensure that the common law is Convention Right-compliant;
- (b) is obliged where the existing common law does not produce a Convention Right-compliant outcome but could do so if it were extended in a modest and orderly fashion to make that extension;
- (c) is not obliged, where no extendable rule of common law exists, to create an entirely new rule to render the relationship between the parties Convention Right-compliant.

This perspective takes us towards the universalistic understanding of HRA horizontality favoured by Professor Wade and Murray Hunt prior to the Act coming fully into force. The strength of these analyses is that they invite us to see the identification of 'courts' in s 6 as being concerned primarily with a jurisdictional rather than institutional phenomenon. From this viewpoint, the target of s 6 is not the (common) law-maker but what the (common) law-maker makes. The target is the (common) law. And the court acts unlawfully if it creates (or for the more traditionally minded 'discovers') or applies a rule of common law which is incompatible with a Convention Right.

One might however analyse and label this understanding of the notion of 'horizontal' effect in a rather different fashion. It may be that a better way of framing the issue is in terms of differing types of 'verticality'. Four types of verticality might be identified, only one of which is concerned at all with the identity of the parties. Type 1 arises when the party allegedly contravening a Convention right is a public authority. Type 2 occurs when the outcome of litigation depends upon the meaning given by the court to a legislative provision. Type 3 is in issue when the outcome of litigation depends upon the meaning given by the court to an existing rule of common law. And type 4 comes into play when the outcome of litigation depends on the courts' capacity to extend an existing rule of common law.

The House of Lords/Supreme Court has been reluctant to offer any definitive view on this question. The matter will no doubt fall to be decided within the next few years. But the only certain conclusion which might yet be drawn is that the precise nature of the horizontal impact of the Act will at least in the short term continue to be a subject on which a good deal of judicial and academic attention will be focused.

IV. Proportionality as a ground of review of executive action

Domestic courts have traditionally been unwillingly (at least overtly) to apply proportionality as a ground of review of executive action. It is quite clear however that the 'necessary in a democratic society' test used in many provisions of the Convention demands that courts subject the merits of government action to far more rigorous scrutiny than would be required by orthodox principles of English administrative law. This proposition has been endorsed albeit rather cautiously by domestic courts, with the result that government actions interfering with Convention Rights will in some circumstances be subjected to proportionality review.

The initial judicial response: the Daly and Alconbury cases

This development is well-illustrated by the House of Lords' judgment in R (Daly) v Secretary of State for the Home Department.¹³⁵ The case concerned the legality of a policy adopted by the Home Secretary to exclude prisoners from their cells while the cells were being searched. Mr Daly contended that the policy breached Art 8, inasmuch as such searches could be conducted even if the prisoner had legally privileged correspondence in his cell at the time. The policy had been adopted to minimise the possibility that searches for contraband material could be compromised by prisoners being able to intimidate, obstruct or otherwise influence prison officers during the search. These are obviously rational objectives, and there would be little scope for assuming such a policy to be irrational per se in the Wednesbury/GCHQ sense. Daly's challenge to the policy's lawfulness was tightly focused: he argued that it was not 'necessary' per Art 8(2) to achieve those objectives to leave privileged correspondence in the cell during the search.

Lord Steyn framed the issue in the following way:

There is an overlap between the traditional grounds of review [irrationality] and the approach of proportionality. Most cases would be decided in the same way whichever approach is adopted. But the intensity of review is somewhat greater under the proportionality approach...¹³⁶

The primary distinction between the two approaches was, in Lord Steyn's view, that: 'the doctrine of proportionality may require the reviewing court to assess the balance which the decision-maker has struck, not merely whether it is within the range of rational or reasonable decisions'.¹³⁷ On the facts, the House of Lords suggested that the policy was disproportionate. To comply with Art 8, the policy should be modified to permit legally privileged correspondence to be safely sealed prior to any search.

Both Lord Steyn and Lord Bingham indicated that proportionality review would arise in respect of Convention Rights as a result of the requirements imposed on the courts by the Human Rights Act. They did not advocate that it should be accepted as a principle of domestic common law. Lord Cooke's concurring judgment took that larger step. He concluded that the very loose test of irrationality put forward by Lord Greene MR in Wednesbury: 'was an unfortunately retrogressive decision in English administrative law, in so far as it suggested that there are degrees of unreasonableness and that only a very extreme degree can bring an administrative decision within the legitimate scope of judicial invalidation'.¹³⁸

Lord Slynn appeared to adopt a similar viewpoint—not expressly shared by his colleagues—in R (Alconbury Developments) v Secretary of State for the Environment.¹³⁹ The case concerned the compatibility of the land use planning system with Art 6 ECHR, and in particular the degree of judicial scrutiny to be applied to planning decisions taken by the Secretary of State for the Environment in which central government had a financial interest. The House of Lords concluded in Alconbury that if a Convention Right was engaged by a government decision that could be characterised as being a 'policy' matter, ¹³⁵ [2001] UKHL 26, [2001] 2 AC 532, [2001] 2 WLR 1622, [2001] 3 All ER 433.

¹³⁶ [2001] 2 AC 532 at 547. ¹³⁷ Ibid.

¹³⁸ Ibid., at 549. This may be seen as advocating the same kind of 'ripple effect' from Convention Rights into the whole field of administrative law as has been seen in respect of some EC law principles; see 'III. EC law, parliamentary sovereignty and the UK courts: phase two', ch 12, pp 395–398 above.

¹³⁹ [2001] UKHL 23, [2003] 2 AC 295, [2001] 2 WLR 1389, [2001] 2 All ER 929.

a loose regime of judicial supervision akin to Wednesbury irrationality might suffice to make the overall process Convention compliant.

A more elaborate approach: the Denbigh High School and Miss Behavin cases ‘Proportionality’ is an umbrella term. It could bear a purely substantive meaning, entailing only a narrowing of the range of permissible substantive outcomes that a government body might produce compared to the range that would be possible under the more expansive notion of irrationality. Proportionality in that sense would empower a reviewing court to insist that a particular decision fell within a narrow(er) range, and necessarily entails an effective shift of decision-making power as to matters of substance from the executive to the courts. A second form of proportionality review might entail a purely procedural enhancement of judicial control over executive behaviour by insisting that an executive body’s decision-making process goes through certain specified steps and/or that a particular set of factors are taken into account before the substance of the decision is determined. Proportionality in that sense increases the likelihood that government decisions will fall within a narrower range than is permissible under irrationality review, but does not guarantee that they will do so. This approach to proportionality necessarily entails an effective shift of decision-making power as to matters of procedure from the executive to the courts, but does not necessarily rebalance powers in substantive terms.

The approach taken by the Convention and the ECtHR to proportionality review combines both procedural (that a government decision pursues one of more of various specified objectives) and substantive (that it interferes no more than is ‘necessary’ with Convention entitlements) elements.¹⁴⁰ In Alconbury and Daly, the House of Lords approach to proportionality view within the context of HRA litigation appeared to be concerned primarily, perhaps wholly, with matters of substance. Shortly thereafter, however, the Court of Appeal suggested that a procedural approach to proportionality review was also required by the Act.

The applicant in *R (SB) v Governors of Denbigh High School*¹⁴¹ was a schoolgirl whose adherence to a particular understanding of Islam led her to feel that she could only attend a school which allowed her to wear a form of clothing known as a jilbab. The students at the (state) school were predominantly Muslim in religious orientation, as was the headteacher and several of the school governors. The relevant statutory regime left the power to decide whether state schools would have a uniform, and if so what the uniform would be, to the governing bodies of individual schools. The governing body at Denbigh High had consulted widely on its uniform policy, and had adopted various options, including a shalwar kamazee for girls which was considered to be consistent with mainstream Islamic beliefs as to appropriate dress for girls. The uniform policy had been in force before the applicant first entered the school, and she had complied with it for some years. There were several other state schools in the vicinity where the jilbab was permitted.

The applicant contended that the school’s refusal to allow her to wear the jilbab breached her entitlements under Art 9 ECHR to manifest her religious beliefs.¹⁴² That contention seemed extravagant given existing ECtHR authority, which indicated—primarily in the ¹⁴⁰ See ‘The jurisprudential methodology of the convention’ ff, ch 19, pp 590–591 above.

¹⁴¹ [2006] UKHL 15, [2007] 1 AC 100.

¹⁴² Article 9. Freedom of thought, conscience and religion

¹ Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance.

context of employment cases—that Art 9 was not engaged, still less breached, by restrictions on an individual’s capacity to express her/his religious beliefs in circumstances where the individual was at liberty to seek other employment.¹⁴³ That view was taken by the High Court in Denbigh.¹⁴⁴

However, the Court of Appeal¹⁴⁵ subsequently held that Art 9 was engaged on these facts, and that the school’s policy was presumptively not ‘necessary in a democratic society’—ie that it failed the proportionality test—because in making the policy the school had not structured its decision-making procedure in the correct way:

75 The decision-making structure should therefore go along the following lines. (1) Has the claimant established that she has a relevant Convention right which qualifies for protection under article 9(1)? (2) Subject to any justification that is established under article 9(2), has that Convention right been violated? (3) Was the interference with her Convention right prescribed by law in the Convention sense of that expression? (4) Did the interference have a legitimate aim? (5) What are the considerations that need to be balanced against each other when determining whether the interference was necessary in a democratic society for the purpose of achieving that aim? (6) Was the interference justified under article 9(2)?¹⁴⁶

This essentially procedural understanding of proportionality did not exclude the possibility that the substance of the uniform policy could be reconciled with Art 9. It did however mean that a substantive choice to that effect could not be arrived at if it was not made through the rigidly structured process which the Court of Appeal laid down.

The Court of Appeal’s reasoning was sharply criticised by several academic commentators.¹⁴⁷ The concern expressed was that it was wholly impracticable to expect all decision-makers in public authorities to adopt what was an essentially judicial approach to the decision-making process. This is a point strongly reminiscent of the judicial debate as to the content of the procedural fairness doctrine in the early part of the twentieth century.¹⁴⁸

The approach was nonetheless followed in an Art 10 context in Belfast City Council v Miss Behavin Ltd.¹⁴⁹ The case concerned a local authority power to licence sex shops in its area. Belfast City Council had refused to grant a licence to a shop owned by the Miss Behavin company in a particular neighbourhood. It had done so for a variety of reasons, any one or combination of which would certainly have meant that the decision was not irrational in a Wednesbury sense. The council’s decision had not however been structured in a way that obviously considered and applied Art 10 criteria in a manner analogous to the test laid out in Denbigh in respect of Art 9. As in Denbigh, the Court of Appeal held that this failure to follow a tightly structured decision-making process rendered the decision itself disproportionate.

The Court of Appeal’s judgments in both Denbigh and Miss Behavin were reversed when the cases came before the House of Lords. The Lordships (unanimously in both cases) considered that the Court of Appeal had misunderstood the scope of the proportionality principle in HRA litigation. There was no basis for assuming that proportionality should ² Freedom to manifest one’s religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of public safety, for the protection of public order, health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

¹⁴³ Cf X v Denmark (1976) 5 DR 157; Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976) 1 EHRR 711; Ahmad v United Kingdom (1981) 4 EHRR 126.

¹⁴⁵ [2005] EWCA Civ 199, [2005] 1 WLR 3372.

¹⁴⁴ [2004] EWHC 1389 (Admin), [2004] ELR 374.

¹⁴⁶ Ibid; per Brooke LJ.

¹⁴⁷ See for example Poole T (2005) ‘Of headscarfs and heresies: The Denbigh High School case and public authority decisionmaking under the Human Rights Act’ Public Law 685.

¹⁴⁸ See ‘The initial rise, dilution and fall of the audi alterem partem principle’, ch 15, pp 477–481 above.

¹⁴⁹ In the High Court of Northern Ireland [2004] NIQB 61; in the Court of Appeal [2005] NICA 35, [2006] NI 181; in the House of Lords [2007] UKHL 19, [2007] 1 WLR 1420.

be given a procedural meaning. Proportionality review should be concerned solely with the outcome of the decision-making process:

The Court of Appeal's decision-making prescription would be admirable guidance to a lower court or legal tribunal, but cannot be required of a head teacher and governors, even with a solicitor to help them. If, in such a case, it appears that such a body has conscientiously paid attention to all human rights considerations, no doubt a challenger's task will be the harder. But what matters in any case is the practical outcome, not the quality of the decision-making process that led to it.¹⁵⁰

The judgments also confirmed that the intensity of review arising under the proportionality test might often be greater than required under the irrationality test. The point is perhaps best put by Lord Bingham in Denbigh:

30 Secondly, it is clear that the court's approach to an issue of proportionality under the Convention must go beyond that traditionally adopted to judicial review in a domestic setting. The inadequacy of that approach was exposed in Smith and Grady v United Kingdom (1999) 29 EHRR 493 para 138, and the new approach required under the 1998 Act was described by Lord Steyn in R (Daly) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2001] 2 AC 532, paras 25–28, in terms which have never to my knowledge been questioned. There is no shift to a merits review, but the intensity of review is greater than was previously appropriate, and greater even than the heightened scrutiny test adopted by the Court of Appeal in R v Ministry of Defence, ex p Smith [1996] QB 517, 554. The domestic court must now make a value judgment, an evaluation, by reference to the circumstances prevailing at the relevant time....

In both cases, the House of Lords indicated that the relevant Convention Rights were not interfered with at all by the decisions in issue. But even if Arts 9 and 10 respectively were engaged, the House of Lords was satisfied that there were entirely credible reasons for both the school and the local authority to have reached the substantive conclusions that they did. In such circumstances, there could be no basis for concluding that the decisions were disproportionate.

Blurring the issue? Doherty v Birmingham City Council (2008) and Manchester City Council v Pinnock (2009)

There would perhaps be little useful purpose served by the domestic courts accepting that the protection of Convention Rights demanded that interference with such rights be subject to proportionality review by a court if the substance of proportionality review was no more intensive than was available under the Wednesbury irrationality test. The impact of the HRA on the effective allocation of power between Parliament, the executive and the courts depends in large part on the content of proportionality review. The more closely that concept requires courts to examine the merits of statutory provisions, common law rules or executive action then (to put it crudely) the more powerful the courts become.

It would be premature to seek to identify clear principles on which one could firmly predict the rigour which domestic courts should scrutinise particular governmental interferences with Convention Rights.¹⁵¹ It might be suggested that this issue will lead the courts to develop a more elaborate notion of justiciability than the (in retrospect) rather crude test outlined in GCHQ.¹⁵² It also seems tolerably clear that the question of intensity of review will be closely related to the ‘hierarchy of rights’ concept discussed above in the context of the deference principle.

¹⁵⁰ [2006] UKHL 15, [2007] 1 AC 100 at para 31, per Lord Bingham. That reasoning might not apply however if the Convention Right in issue was an entitlement to a particular type of procedure.

¹⁵¹ For a helpful discussion of the early cases see Leigh I (2002) 'Taking rights proportionately' Public Law 265.

¹⁵² See 'III. Full reviewability—the GCHQ case (1983)', ch 4, pp 105–106 above.

That much confusion attends the question of just how intense proportionality review should be in order to meet Convention requirements is nicely illustrated by the House of Lords’ judgment in Doherty v Birmingham City Council.¹⁵³ The issue before the Court was what level of scrutiny should be applied to a public authority landlord’s decision to commence proceedings seeking possession of a person’s home in circumstances where the relevant legal regime did not grant the trial court full jurisdiction over all matters of fact and law. The various opinions offered by members of the court on this question were—to put it kindly—rather lacking in clarity.

At para 52 of his judgment, Lord Hope observed that the: ‘grounds on which the decision to claim possession could be judicially reviewed were whether it was arbitrary, unreasonable or disproportionate’. This might be taken as suggesting that proportionality is being offered here as an additional ground of review. Then in para 53, Lord Hope refers only to Wednesbury unreasonableness as the basis of review. In para 55, Lord Hope seemed to approve a more intensive (than irrationality) version of proportionality: ‘It would be unduly formalistic to confine the review strictly to traditional Wednesbury grounds’; and also to an endorsement of irrationality review: ‘The test of reasonableness should be... whether the decision to recover possession was one which no reasonable person would consider justifiable’.

In para 70 Lord Scott used irrationality and proportionality interchangeably: ‘The question for the court would be whether the local authority’s decision to [seek to] recover possession of the property in question was so unreasonable and disproportionate as to be unlawful’. Such interchangeability is hard to understand. A decision which is irrational will always be disproportionate, but it by no means follows that a decision which is disproportionate will be irrational. Matters become more uncertain in para 76, when Lord Scott stated that a public law challenge could not succeed unless the trial court considered that a decision to seek possession was: ‘one to which the council could not reasonably have come’. That formula is redolent of the much-quoted Lord Greene MR definition of irrationality,¹⁵⁴ but para 76 continues by saying that if the decision passes the Lord Greene test then it would also be ‘proportionate’. The analysis is repeated at para 85:

.... An article 8 defence requires the judge to review the lawfulness of the local authority’s decision to recover possession of the property in question and, in doing so, to review the factors that a responsible local authority ought to have taken into account in reaching its decision. The proportionality of the decision in all the circumstances of the case would be central to the review and if the local authority’s decision could be shown to be outside the range of reasonable decisions that a responsible local authority could take, having regard both to the circumstances of the defendant as well as to all the other relevant circumstances, the decision would be held to be unlawful as a matter of public law.

Lord Mance (at para 135) referred with evident approval to the short line of ‘anxious scrutiny’ cases which predate the coming into force of the HRA,¹⁵⁵ and quoted Laws LJ’s comment in Begbie that: ‘The Wednesbury principle itself constitutes a sliding scale of review, more or less intrusive according to the nature and gravity of what is at stake’.¹⁵⁶ After suggesting that public authority landlords are also bound to regard respect for a person’s home as a relevant consideration when exercising their discretion to initiate possession proceedings, Lord Mance then concluded (at para 136) that in possession proceedings the court should ‘relax’ Wednesbury perceptions of review so that trial courts engage in a ‘more straightforward’ examination of reasonableness than the orthodox understanding of irrationality would permit.

¹⁵³ [2008] UKHL 57, [2009] 1 AC 367. ¹⁵⁴ See ‘II. Irrationality’, ch 14, p 464 above.

¹⁵⁵ Especially R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex p Bugdaycay [1987] AC 514.

¹⁵⁶ R v Secretary of State for Education and Employment, Ex p Begbie [2000] 1 WLR 1115 at 1130; cited in para 135 of Doherty.

As noted above, Doherty was one of a long line of cases in which the House of Lords engaged in what we might (perhaps euphemistically) call a ‘dialogue’ with the ECtHR as to the requirements of the proportionality principle in the context of residential possession proceedings. Shortly after Doherty, in *Manchester City Council v Pinnock*¹⁵⁷ the Supreme Court formally accepted that proportionality review was an element of Art 8 Sch 1 HRA in such litigation. Yet the Supreme Court also suggested that this ‘new’ level of review would affect the outcome only of ‘very exceptional’ cases. This might be thought a surprising assertion, which must rest on the presumption that there really is very little difference between proportionality and irrationality review. Guidance of this sort may prove rather difficult for trial courts to apply. It would nonetheless seem plausible to conclude that in the light of Daly, Denbigh, Doherty and Pinnock a substantial amount of governmental activity will receive more exacting judicial examination than has hitherto been the case.

Conclusion

The focus of these last five chapters has been in explicit terms on the changing moral and legal status of ‘human rights’ norms within the United Kingdom’s constitutional order. But, at a higher level of abstraction, the concern of the chapters has been very much—if thus far only implicitly—with our understanding of the concept of the rule of law. In charting the way in which the politics and law of the constitution have dealt with the issue of human rights protection, we have constantly been analysing a familiar issue: namely ‘what government can do and how government can do it’.¹⁵⁸

The Human Rights Act has appreciably changed the way in which those questions might now be answered. There is no doubt that the Act has already had a significant impact on domestic administrative law and has triggered—at least for the moment—extensive changes in the balance of power between executive bodies and the courts. Furthermore, in so far as our understanding of the sovereignty of Parliament rests on an assumption that judges should adopt a literalist approach to construing legislation, the way in which the judiciary has thus far used s 3 also has important implications for the balance of power between Parliament and the courts.

It is trite—but nonetheless important—to reiterate the point that none of the moral values identified in the text of the HRA and in its initial application by the courts are entrenched in a legal sense. The Act itself, and the body of case law built upon it, could be swept away in part or in their entirety should Parliament choose to do so. It is also too soon to make any definitive assertions about the extent to which—if any—the HRA has acquired a status of ‘moral entrenchment’ or to which it has lent greater legitimacy and practical force to pre-existing moral suppositions about the proper scope of constitutional governance in a democratic society. Nonetheless, some plausible suggestions might ¹⁵⁷ [2001] UKSC 6, [2010] 3 WLR 1441.

¹⁵⁸ See ‘The Rule of Law and the Separation of Powers’, ch 3, p 50 above.

be offered. And in pursuit of that objective, we might consider two controversies which arose in 2003 and 2004 in the always politically sensitive field of immigration policy.¹⁵⁹

Judicial supremacism revisited?

In his speech to the Labour Party conference in October 2001, delivered following the terrorist attacks in the USA on September 11, Prime Minister Blair linked the issue of people seeking asylum in this country with terrorism, and promised that the way in which asylum seekers were treated by the law would be changed:

New extradition laws will be introduced; new rules to ensure asylum is not a front for terrorist entry. This country is proud of its tradition in giving asylum to those fleeing tyranny. We will always do so. But we have a duty to protect the system from abuse. It must be overhauled radically so that from now on, those who abide by the rules get help and those that don't, can no longer play the system to gain unfair advantage over others.¹⁶⁰

The Blair government lost little time in persuading Parliament to give those sentiments legal effect.

The Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 s 55

One step promptly taken by the Blair government to discourage 'bogus' asylum seekers was to insert a provision into an immigration and asylum Bill (at a very late stage of the Bill's parliamentary passage)¹⁶¹ which forbade the provision of any welfare support to asylum seekers who had not declared themselves as such as soon as it was reasonably practical for them to have done so after entering the country. The policy was a watered-down version of the initiative taken through delegated legislation by the Major government some years earlier, which initiative had been held ultra vires by the Court of Appeal in the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants case.¹⁶² The new policy was enacted in s 55 of the 2002 Act. However, s 55 provided that support should not be withheld if to do so would breach an applicant's Convention Rights.

A refusal of support under s 55 was challenged in R (on the application of Q) v Secretary of State for the Home Department.¹⁶³ Collins J held the refusal unlawful on various grounds, including a lack of procedural fairness and a failure by decision-makers to consider if leaving the applicants in a state of effective destitution was compatible with Arts 3 and 8 ECHR. There then followed a very public denunciation of Collins J by the then Home Secretary, David Blunkett. Echoing the way in which Conservative MPs had attacked the democratic credentials of the courts a few years earlier,¹⁶⁴ Mr Blunkett and some Labour MPs attacked the constitutional propriety of Collins J's decision.¹⁶⁵ Mr Blunkett greeted the judgment in the following terms in an interview with the BBC:¹⁶⁶

¹⁵⁹ For a more detailed account see Le Sueur A (2004) 'Three strikes and it's out....' Public Law 225; and McGarry J (2005) 'Parliamentary sovereignty, judges and the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants etc) bill' Liverpool LR 1.

¹⁶⁰ <<http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/2001/oct/02/labourconference.labour6>>.

¹⁶¹ See Bradley A (2003) 'Judicial independence under attack' Public Law 397.

¹⁶² See 'R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants', ch 20, pp 630–631 above. ¹⁶³ [2003] EWHC 195 (Admin), (2003) 100(15) LSG 26, Times, 20 February 2003.

¹⁶⁴ See 'The judicial supremacism controversy', ch 20, pp 623–632 above.

¹⁶⁵ For details see Bradley (2003) op cit. See also Hickman T (2008) 'The courts and politics after the Human Rights Act: a comment' Public Law 84 at p95: 'The reaction of government ministers to adverse judicial decisions is rarely charitable and, moreover, frequently so misrepresents the judgment that one hopes they have not had the time to read it and have relied instead on a brief from a political adviser....'

¹⁶⁶ <<http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/uk/2779343.stm>>.

Frankly, I'm personally fed up with having to deal with a situation where Parliament debates issues and the judges then overturn them. I don't want any mixed messages going out so I am making it absolutely clear today that we don't accept what Justice Collins has said. We will seek to overturn it. We will continue operating a policy which we think is perfectly reasonable and fair.

Mr Blunkett then held a series of interviews with newspapers, and wrote an article for the Sunday tabloid newspaper the News of the World, in which he made similarly derogatory comments about judges in general and Collins J in particular. Mr Blunkett had evidently failed to appreciate the constitutional distinction between his view of what the law allowed him to do and what the law actually did allow him to do. From a senior member of the government which had promoted the HRA just five years earlier, such disdain for or ignorance of orthodox constitutional principles is quite remarkable.¹⁶⁷

Collins J's judgment was largely upheld by the Court of Appeal.¹⁶⁸ Mr Blunkett appeared to accept the correctness of this conclusion, and the Home Office modified its decision-making procedures to ensure that the new policy could be lawfully applied. Shortly thereafter, the government returned to address in even clearer terms its concern to limit the role played by the judiciary in immigration and asylum matters.

The ouster clause provisions in the Immigration and Asylum Bill 2003

One of the government's subsequent proposals to prevent asylum seekers 'playing the system' appeared in the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants) Bill in 2003. Until 2002, appeals against a Home Office decision to refuse an asylum application were initially heard by Immigration Adjudicators, who were in effect equivalent in status and expertise to district judges, the lowest tier of the professional judicial hierarchy. Thereafter, an appeal on a point of law lay to a more specialised Immigration Appeal Tribunal (IAT), generally consisting of two lay members and a legal qualified 'vice president', who was equivalent in status to a circuit judge. If the IAT refused to hear an appeal, its decision was open to challenge by way of judicial review.

The judicial review challenge was replaced by a statutory right of review by the High Court in the National Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 s 101. This was a very fast track form of judicial supervision. The application was to be entirely on paper, and had to be made within ten days of the IAT decision being made. The 'hearing' itself would then be conducted within a further ten days.

This streamlined procedure was evidently not sufficiently expeditious for the Blair government. The 2003 bill proposed that the Adjudicators and IAT be merged into a single body, the Asylum and Immigration Tribunal (AIT), which would offer a single hearing to replace the two-stage process. The Bill also included the following provision (cl 11)—formulated no doubt with Gilmore and Anisminic in mind¹⁶⁹ to amend the 2002 Act:

108A Exclusivity and finality of Tribunal's jurisdiction

- (1) No court shall have any supervisory or other jurisdiction (whether statutory or inherent) in relation to the Tribunal.

¹⁶⁷ See the analysis of Mr Blunkett's reaction in The Daily Telegraph, 21 February 2003 and The Independent, 20 February 2003. For a broader selection of Mr Blunkett's (considered) views of the relationship between the government and the judiciary see Blunkett D (2006) The Blunkett tapes: my life in the bear pit pp 282, 288, 327, 332, 344, 365, 637.

¹⁶⁸ [2003] EWCA Civ 364, [2004] QB 36, [2003] 3 WLR 365, [2003] 2 All ER 905.

¹⁶⁹ See 'Ouster clauses—Gilmore (1957) and Anisminic (1969)', ch 3, pp 76–78 above.

- (2) No court may entertain proceedings for questioning (whether by way of appeal or otherwise)—
 - (a) any determination, decision or other action of the Tribunal...
- (3) Subsections (1) and (2)—
 - (a) prevent a court, in particular, from entertaining proceedings to determine whether a purported determination, decision or action of the Tribunal was a nullity....

The proposal attracted substantial criticism within Parliament and among the legal profession including—perhaps most notably—senior members (both retired and serving) of the judiciary. The former (Conservative) Lord Chancellor, Lord Mackay of Clashfern, described the Bill as: ‘Very obnoxious... I just hope that Parliament is not prepared to see the ordinary courts of law prevented from intervening to protect claimants from breaches of natural justice’.¹⁷⁰ Lord Steyn, in a lecture delivered at the Inner Temple, made similar comments.¹⁷¹ The theme common to all such criticism was the accusation that the government was seeking to use its effective control of Parliament’s sovereignty to enact a provision which was manifestly inconsistent with orthodox understandings of the rule of law. The most significant criticism came from Lord Woolf CJ. Ten years earlier, Lord Woolf had written an academic article in which he had mused about circumstances in which judges might be inclined overtly to deny the sovereignty of Parliament and to invalidate certain statutory provisions:

There are however situations where already, in upholding the rule of law, the courts have had to take a stand. The example that springs to mind is the Anisminic case... Since that case Parliament has not again mounted such a challenge to the reviewing power of the High Court. There has been, and I am confident there will continue to be, mutual respect for each other’s roles.

However, if Parliament did the unthinkable, then I would say that the courts would also be required to act in a manner which would be without precedent. Some judges might choose to do so by saying that it was an un rebuttable presumption that Parliament could never intend such a result. I myself would consider there were advantages in making it clear that ultimately there are even limits on the supremacy of Parliament which it is the courts’ inalienable responsibility to identify and uphold. They are limits of the most modest dimensions which I believe any democrat would accept. They are no more than are necessary to enable the rule of law to be preserved.¹⁷²

In March 2004, shortly after the new asylum Bill was published, and speaking as the senior member of the judiciary, Lord Woolf returned to that theme in a public lecture and placed cl 11 squarely in the context of axiomatic presumptions as to constitutional morality:

In discussions which have taken place between the judiciary and the Government, there have been attempts to justify the clause, but these are specious and unsatisfactory. It is particularly regrettable that the Lord Chancellor and Secretary of State should find it acceptable to have responsibility for promoting this clause.

I understand that the Lord Chancellor has recently said that the clause is not intended to exclude habeas corpus. In view of the language of the clause this surprises me. It also surprises me because, if the clause does not exclude habeas corpus, then I would have thought it inevitable that it will, in practice, lead to an increase in delay. This is because the right to apply for habeas corpus does not involve the safeguard of a requirement as to leave. It also surprises me that the Government does not see it as inconsistent to promote a clause designed to ¹⁷⁰ The Times, 27 February 2004. ¹⁷¹ The Times, 4 March 2004.

¹⁷² (1995) ‘Droit public: English style’ Public Law 57.

exclude the courts from performing their basic role of protecting the rule of law at the same time that it is introducing the present constitutional reforms. Their actions are totally inconsistent and I urge the Government to think again.... The implementation of the clause would be a blot on the reputation of the Government and undermine its attempts to be a champion of the rule of law overseas. I trust the clause will have short-shrift in the Lords, but, even then, the attempt to include it in legislation could result in a loss of confidence in the commitment of the Government to the rule of law.¹⁷³

Effective judicial resistance to ouster clauses is not without precedent. The Anisminic episode in the late 1960s provides an obvious example of this happening, and that in an era when the notion of human rights protection played little meaningful part in our constitutional discourse. Lord Woolf's intervention in 2004 was not however in the form of a judgment. It was essentially a political initiative, albeit one in which the notion of 'politics' bore a constitutional rather than party-based meaning. The speech excited a flurry of comment to the effect that members of the judiciary were preparing themselves to invoke Diceyan notions of the rule of law to overturn Diceyan notions of the sovereignty of Parliament by accepting jurisdiction to review the AIT actions (or indeed its 'purported' actions) notwithstanding the existence of the ouster clause.¹⁷⁴

Whether such 'revolutionary' intent would have been acted upon was—perhaps unfortunately—never put to the test. Thirty-five Labour backbenchers voted against the proposal at second reading,¹⁷⁵ and the Blair government was sufficiently persuaded (or alarmed) by the force (and the sources) of opposition to cl 11 that the proposal was withdrawn ten days after Lord Woolf's speech.

Conclusion

These two episodes nicely illustrate both the potential and limitations of human rights norms as a mechanism to prompt reconsideration of constitutional orthodoxies above and beyond the narrower question of assessing the legal impact of the HRA itself. Both the narrow and broader questions are further explored in chapter twenty-three, which focuses on the issue of governmental powers to deprive individuals of their physical liberty because of their suspected involvement in 'criminal' activities. In concluding this chapter however, we might return to the issue of the 'moral entrenchment' of the HRA.

While Leader of the Opposition, David Cameron had called for the repeal of the Human Rights Act.¹⁷⁶ In the run-up to the 2010 general election, the Conservative party announced in its election manifesto that: 'To protect our freedoms from state encroachment and encourage greater social responsibility, we will replace the Human Rights Act with a UK Bill of Rights'. The Liberal Democrat Party, in contrast, was firmly supportive ¹⁷³ 'The rule of law and a change in the constitution'; available at <<http://www.dca.gov.uk/judicial/speeches/lcj030304.htm>>.

¹⁷⁴ See for example the article by Jeffrey Jowell (2004) 'Immigration wars' The Guardian March 2; available online at:

<<http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/2004/mar/02/law.immigration>>; and a longer treatment of the issue by the same author (2004) 'Heading for constitutional crisis' New Law Journal (19 March) 401. Dyer C (2004) 'Profile of Lord Woolf' The Guardian March 5; available at:

<<http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/2004/mar/05/ukcrime.immigrationandpublicservices>>.

¹⁷⁵ See the report in The Times, 2 March 2004.

¹⁷⁶ See for example <<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/uknews/1560975/David-Cameron-Scrap-the-Human-Rights-Act.html>>.

of the HRA.¹⁷⁷ The Liberal Democrat leader (and Deputy Prime Minister) Nick Clegg put his party's position very bluntly at the 2011 Liberal Democrat Annual conference: '[L]et me say something really clear about the Human Rights Act. In fact I'll do it in words of one syllable: It is here to stay'.¹⁷⁸

These differing views were an obvious potential source of tension within the coalition administration. Those differences were initially at least subsumed within a wide-ranging expression of intent in the coalition's programme for government:

We will establish a Commission to investigate the creation of a British Bill of Rights that incorporates and builds on all our obligations under the European Convention on Human Rights, ensures that these rights continue to be enshrined in British law, and extends and protects British liberties. We will seek to promote a better understanding of the true scope of these obligations and liberties.¹⁷⁹

The depth of this ostensibly bi-partisan commitment was put to the test early in 2011 when the ECtHR held that United Kingdom law which denied voting rights to all prisoners serving custodial sentences was incompatible with the Convention.

The immediate roots of the controversy lay in the ECtHR's 2005 judgment in Hirst v United Kingdom.¹⁸⁰ Hirst considered the compatibility of the Representation of the People Act 1983¹⁸¹ s 3 with Art 3 of the First Protocol ECHR.¹⁸² Section 3 automatically removes voting rights from any person serving a custodial sentence (of any length and for any crime). The automatic exclusion is of relatively modern vintage, having been introduced in the RPA 1969 on the recommendation of a Speaker's Conference which reported in 1968.¹⁸³ The policy rationale underpinning the provisions appeared to be that by committing a crime prisoners had forfeited their presumptive entitlement to participate in the electoral process. In more grandiose theoretical terms, we might say that Parliament had decided that prisoners were no longer to be seen as part of the people whose consent underpinned the legitimacy of the governmental system.

The ECtHR in Hirst accepted that on a matter such as this Signatory States would enjoy a wide margin of appreciation. It indicated however that the breadth of that margin might be affected by the extent to which the domestic law in issue had been the subject of a recent and reasoned debate by the country's law-makers. Since neither the Commons nor Lords ¹⁷⁷ Liberal Democrats (2010) Our manifesto at p 94; (<http://www.libdems.org.uk/our_manifesto.aspx>).

¹⁷⁸ 21 September 2011; (<http://www.libdems.org.uk/news_detail.aspx?title=Nick_Clegg's_speech_to_Liberal_Democrat_Conference&pPK=00e086ba-d994-4146-bb14-60ce615d0>).

¹⁷⁹ At p 11; (<http://www.direct.gov.uk/prod_consum_dg/groups/dg_digitalassets/@dg/@en/documents/digitalasset/dg_187876.pdf>)

¹⁸⁰ (2006) 42 EHRR 41.

¹⁸¹ 3.— Disfranchisement of offenders in prison etc.

(1) A convicted person during the time that he is detained in a penal institution in pursuance of his sentence... is legally incapable of voting at any parliamentary or local government election.

(2) For this purpose—

(a) "convicted person" means any person found guilty of an offence... but not including a person dealt with by committal or other summary process for contempt of court... .

(c) a person detained for default in complying with his sentence shall not be treated as detained in pursuance of the sentence... [eg for non-payment of a fine]... .

(3) It is immaterial for the purposes of this section whether a conviction or sentence was before or after the passing of this Act.

¹⁸² 'The High Contracting Parties undertake to hold free elections at reasonable intervals by secret ballot, under conditions which will ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature.'

¹⁸³ See generally White I (2011) Prisoner's voting rights pp 9–11.

had addressed the issue, the margin would be rather narrower than it could be. The Court also noted that it had been accepted in previous ECHR litigation that a voting disqualification imposed on persons serving a seven-year sentence for possession of explosives and a three-year sentence for tax fraud did not breach Art 3 of the First Protocol.¹⁸⁴ The difficulty which the ECtHR identified in Hirst was the automatic and universal nature of the RPA 1983 s 3 provision. The most trivial sentence attracted the same disqualificatory consequence as the most serious sentence and there was no scope in any circumstances for a domestic court to consider the proportionality of the loss of voting rights. It was for these reasons that the Court held that the United Kingdom was in breach of its treaty obligations.¹⁸⁵ There is nothing novel about the application of this principle in Convention jurisprudence. The ECtHR has been consistently sceptical about the acceptability of laws which have a ‘blanket’ character of this sort.¹⁸⁶

Hirst therefore did not hold that restrictions on voting rights for prisoners was per se incompatible with the Convention. The judgment very clearly accepts that domestic lawmakers can legitimately conclude disenfranchisement is an acceptable element of conviction for a serious crime and also suggests that removal of voting rights could be attached to less substantial crimes so long as some mechanism existed in domestic law for a judicial consideration of the proportionality of disqualification in a given case. It was certainly quite credible to assume that any change to the law need not encompass Mr Hirst per se, given that he was serving a life sentence for manslaughter.

The (then) Labour government appreciated this point, and began a consultation process to explore how domestic law might be altered. It seemed however that the Blair and Brown governments were in no hurry to resolve this issue, presumably because relaxing the ban would have been unpopular with many voters. No proposals had been put before Parliament before the 2010 general election. By that point, the domestic courts had accepted that RPA 1983 s 3 was incompatible with the Convention, rejected the suggestion that it was ‘possible’ per HRA 1998 s 3 to construe RPA 1983 s 3 in a Convention-compliant manner and issued a Declaration of Incompatibility.¹⁸⁷ The Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe had criticised the United Kingdom for its tardy response to the issue. And then in November 2010 the ECtHR ruled in *Greens and MT v United Kingdom*¹⁸⁸ that the United Kingdom should modify its law within six months.

Greens prompted a vast outpouring of bucolic criticism in much of the populist press, the criticism rooted in part in moral distaste for the enfranchisement of any prisoners and in part in the familiar assertion that British ‘sovereignty’ was under attack from ‘foreign judges’. The Daily Mail newspaper led the charge, greeting the judgment in Greens with the headline ‘Toasting victory with cannabis and bubbly, the axe killer who won ¹⁸⁴ In Holland v Ireland (App no. 24827/94), Comm. Dec. 14.04.1998 and Mathieu-Mohin v Belgium (A/113): (1988) 10 EHRR 1 respectively.

¹⁸⁵ For a thoughtful analysis supportive of the ECtHR’s conclusion see Easton S (2006) ‘Electing the electorate: the problem of prisoner disenfranchisement’ Modern LR 443.

¹⁸⁶ See for example the discussions at ‘Blurring the issue? Doherty v Birmingham City Council (2008)’ and ‘Manchester City Council v Pinnock (2009)’, ch 22, pp 697–698 above.

¹⁸⁷ Smith v Scott (2007) SLT 137; Chester v Secretary of State for Justice [2010] EWCA Civ 1439, [2011] 1 WLR 1436. The judgment of Laws LJ in Chester merits attention for its broader treatment of the implications of the HRA for the relationship between Parliament, the government and the courts. It was also notable that Chester—Horncastle notwithstanding—continued to couch analysis in terms of compatibility with the Convention and not with Convention Rights.

¹⁸⁸ (2011) 53 EHRR 21. The time for compliance was subsequently extended to mid-2012.

convicts the vote'.¹⁸⁹ A follow up article in April 2011 announced: 'Euro judges trample UK sovereignty and insist: You WILL give prisoners the vote'.¹⁹⁰ Both articles were notable for their substantial misrepresentation (whether willful or ignorant) of the reasoning behind and implications of Hirst and Greens.

One should perhaps not have high expectations of the intellectual rigour and political integrity of tabloid journalists, but it is rather more concerning (if not surprising) to see such sentiments voiced by members of the Commons. In a manner reminiscent of the assertions made by Conservative MPs during the 'judicial supremacism' episode,¹⁹¹ some members of the house fulminated with indignant fury at the temerity of the ECtHR during debates held in January and February 2011. In February, the Commons debated a motion moved by the Conservative MP David Davis and the Labour MP (and former Foreign and Home Secretary) Jack Straw that:

[T]his House notes the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights in Hirst v the United Kingdom in which it held that there had been no substantive debate by members of the legislature on the continued justification for maintaining a general restriction on the right of prisoners to vote; acknowledges the treaty obligations of the UK; is of the opinion that legislative decisions of this nature should be a matter for democratically-elected lawmakers; and supports the current situation in which no prisoner is able to vote except those imprisoned for contempt, default or on remand.¹⁹²

Mr Davis and Mr Straw proceeded on the basis that the debate would in itself meet the concern expressed by the ECtHR in Hirst that the issue of prisoner disenfranchisement had not properly been considered in Parliament. It would rather perhaps overstate the case to say that Mr Straw and Mr Davis were entering into a dialogue with the ECtHR. Both MPs suggested that Hirst extended the reach of the Convention beyond its proper moral boundaries and saw no likelihood of alteration in domestic law in response to the judgment.

The debate highlighted the seemingly widely held view among contemporary MPs that it could never be legitimate for any moral values to be beyond the reach of ordinary parliamentary majorities, and an apparently similarly widespread view that the United Kingdom should withdraw from the Convention altogether.¹⁹³

¹⁸⁹ 3 November 2010; <<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1325930/Axe-killer-toasts-prison-vote-victory-cannabis-Champagne-Youtube.html#ixzz1YOn6X5QS>>.

¹⁹⁰ <<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1376350/Prisoner-vote-ban-Euro-judges-trample-UK-sovereignty-dismiss-appeal.html#ixzz1YOoTvXYh>>. An analysis of the legal accuracy of the assertions made in text of the article might provide the basis of an enlightening term paper for students.

¹⁹¹ See 'III. The judicial supremacism controversy', ch 20, pp 623–632 above.

¹⁹² HCD 10 February 2011 c 493.

¹⁹³ Ibid c 495: David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): '... Giving votes to any prisoners is quite incomprehensible to our constituents, who sent us here to make the rules and the laws, not to have the European Court make them for us?'; Ibid at c 496: Robert Halfon (Harlow) (Con) '[I]t is rather strange that we are being forced to do this by the European Court of Human Rights, many of whose own judges come from authoritarian regimes? Is it not time to withdraw from its jurisdiction?'; Ibid at 505: Gary Streeter (South West Devon) (Con) '[T]here comes a time when it is necessary to take a stand. I argue that right now, on this issue, it is right for this House, today, to assert its authority. The judgment of the ECHR in the Hirst case flies in the face of the original wording and purpose of the European convention on human rights, in which it was clearly intended that each signatory should have latitude in making decisions on the electoral franchise in that country'; ibid at 505: Andrew Bridgen (North West Leicestershire) (Con): 'Is it not clear from previous speakers that the Strasbourg Court is seeking to extend its power? Is it not the duty of hon. Members to resist that power grab?'

The Prime Minister David Cameron had perhaps invited disdain for the ECtHR's judgments (and the Court itself) from Conservative MPs by expressing a personal disinclination to see any alteration in domestic law. The government's formal position was presented to the Commons in a much more sober and thoughtful fashion by the Attorney-General, Dominic Greive, who recognized that Hirst by no means held that the Convention required all prisoners to be allowed to vote and saw the central task facing the government as promoting an amendment to domestic law which satisfied the respective demands of the ECtHR and Parliament.¹⁹⁴ MPs seemed to be initially unpersuaded by this approach. The motion was carried by 234 votes to 22, which rather suggested that the government would face great difficulty in eventually persuading Parliament to make any alteration at all to domestic law. Should it eventually succeed in so doing, however, we might, albeit cautiously, feel inclined to conclude that the Convention and the Human Rights Act are beginning to establish themselves as a morally entrenched element of the modern constitution.

Suggested further reading

Academic commentary

Allan T (2006) 'Human rights and judicial review: a critique of "due deference"' Cambridge LJ 671

Bradley A (2003) 'Judicial independence under attack' Public Law 397

Nicol D (2011) 'Legitimacy of the Commons debate on prisoner voting' Public Law 681

White I (2011) Prisoner's voting rights

Kavanagh A (2004) 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach' Public Law 537

Nicol D (2004) 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson' Public Law 273

Craig P (2001) 'The courts, the Human Rights Act and judicial review' LQR 592

Hickman T (2008) 'The courts and politics after the Human Rights Act: a comment' Public Law 84

Jowell J (2003) 'Judicial deference: servility, civility or institutional capacity' (2003) Public Law 592

Woolf H (2004) 'The rule of law and a change in the constitution'; available online at <<http://www.dca.gov.uk/judicial/speeches/lcj030304.htm>>

Case law and legislation

Aston Cantlow... [2003] UKHL 37, [2003] 3 WLR 283

Bellinger v Bellinger [2003] UKHL 21, [2003] 2 AC 467

Campbell v MGN [2004] UKHL 22, [2004] AC 457

Douglas and Zeta-Jones v Hello! Ltd [2001] QB 967 (CA)

Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza [2004] UKHL 30, [2004] 2 AC 557

¹⁹⁴ Ibid at c 509 et seq. See also the contribution of Dennis McShane ibid at c 507 et seq. The debate and the understandings of participants in it are informatively analysed by Professor Nicol (2011) 'Legitimacy of the Commons debate on prisoner voting' Public Law 681–691.

R v A [2001] UKHL 25, [2001] 3 All ER 1

R (SB) v Governors of Denbigh High School [2006] UKHL 15, [2007] 1 AC 100

R (Daly) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2001] UKHL 26, [2001] 3 All ER 433

Re S (Care Order: Implementation of Care Plan) [2001] EWCA Civ 757, [2001] 2 FCR 450

Wainright v Home Office [2003] UKHL 53, [2003] 4 All ER 969

YL v Birmingham and Others [2007] UK HL 27, [2008] 1 AC 95, [2007] 3 WLR 112

Chapter 23

Human Rights VI: Governmental Powers of Arrest and Detention

There is substantial scope for a wide range of wholly credible views to be advanced on the question of the relative hierarchical positions which particular moral values should occupy within a society's constitutional order, and relatedly, on the question of whether or not (and if yes, to what extent) that hierarchy of moral values should be expressed in a fashion which can be enforced as a matter of law before the courts rather than left to the realm of self-restraint on the part of legislators or government officials. Several scenarios which raised sharp moral conflicts were broached in hypothetical terms in the introductory chapter of this book, and as our journey through the political and legal topography of the British constitution has progressed we have encountered many more real world examples of the way in which these often difficult questions of weighting competing values have been addressed and resolved. This chapter focuses on what might widely be regarded as an axiomatic illustration of the moral issues with which constitutional law must deal in a democratic society: the powers of government officials in respect of persons suspected of involvement in 'criminal' activities.¹

That our constitution's adherence to the 'rule of law' may have a formalistically legal rather than substantively moral basis because of Parliament's unconfined power to make hitherto unlawful actions lawful is of course illustrated by the fate of Mr Liversidge, who, we may recall,² was detained for some five years at the instigation of Sir John Anderson, the Home Secretary in Churchill's war-time coalition government. For most of that time Mr Liversidge was held in a prison camp. Mr Liversidge had not been convicted of a crime. He had not been tried for any criminal offence, nor even been arrested in the expectation that he would be charged. As the majority of the House of Lords told us however, Parliament had enacted a law which meant that Mr Liversidge had been quite lawfully detained.

¹ It should be recognised that important constitutional questions—often as a matter of law and always as a question of morality—may arise over whether particular conduct should be criminal at all; see for example the discussion of, inter alia, R v Brown at 'R v Brown (1994)', ch 18, pp 570–571 above; R v R (martial rape exemption) at 'Retrospectivity at common law? Rape within marriage' ff, ch 3, pp 81–83 above; and R v Lemon at 'Blasphemy at English common law in the "modern" era: R v Lemon (1979)', ch 18, p 579 above. For the limited purposes of this chapter the constitutionality (in both the legal and moral sense) of crimes is taken as given.

² See 'Liversidge v Anderson (1942)', ch 3, pp 69–71 above.

There is little difficulty in concluding that—for some five years—Mr Liversidge had been deprived of his liberty in an acute sense. We might also feel that we could safely conclude that the nature of Mr Liversidge’s imprisonment was seen even at the time (and all the more so now) as an extraordinary consequence of extraordinary times. That we draw that conclusion is a powerful indicator of the fact that traditional constitutional morality attaches great importance to preserving people’s physical liberty, a supposition which leads in turn to the assumption that governmental attempts to restrict that liberty should be narrowly constrained as a matter of substance and rigorously proven as a matter of process.³

‘Liberty’ under Art 5 ECHR

Less than a decade after Liversidge was decided, the framers of the ECHR identified the preservation of individual liberty as a vital element of human rights protection:

Article 5. Right to liberty and security

- 1 Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law:
- a the lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court;
 - b the lawful arrest or detention of a person for non-compliance with the lawful order of a court or in order to secure the fulfillment of any obligation prescribed by law;
 - c the lawful arrest or detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence or when it is reasonably considered necessary to prevent his committing an offence or fleeing after having done so;...⁴

The ECtHR’s perception of what is meant by ‘liberty’ is perhaps best illustrated by its 1980 judgment in Guzzardi v Italy.⁵ Mr Guzzardi had been detained under a law which authorised the detention of—inter alia—‘idlers and vagrants’ even though the persons concerned had not been tried for or convicted of any criminal offence. Mr Guzzardi’s detention took the form of an order which required him to live in a designated area of a small, sparsely populated island off the coast of Sardinia. He was under house arrest at night, had limited access to the telephone, was required to report to the police twice a day and could only leave the island with the permission of and under the supervision of the police. The order lasted for over a year. The ECtHR considered that the cumulative effect of these restrictions was tantamount to Mr Guzzardi being in an open prison. The Court also offered general guidance for assessing whether there had been a deprivation of liberty:

[92] In order to determine whether someone has been deprived of his liberty with the meaning of Article 5, the starting point must be his concrete situation and account must be taken of a whole range of criteria such as the type, duration, effects and manner of implementation of the measure in question.

³ Lest it be thought that such governmental action would be presented by such constitutional devices as giving liberty an entrenched legal status as in the Fifth Amendment to the US Constitution, we might recall that the US government imprisoned without trial for periods of several years over 100,000 Americans of Japanese descent during World War II on the sole grounds that—because of their ancestry and appearance—they might pose a threat to the American war effort; see Korematsu v United States (1944) 323 US 214. For a fierce critique see Rostow E (1945) ‘The Japanese-American cases—a disaster’ Yale LJ 489.

⁴ The textual structure of Art 5 ECHR is rather different from that of provisions such as Art 8 or 10, in that it states a series of specified exceptions to the presumptive entitlement of liberty rather than using the ‘necessary in a democratic society’ formula.

⁵ (1980) 3 EHRR 333. See also the wide-ranging discussion in Engel v The Netherlands (1976) 1 EHRR 647.

While a condition analogous to detention in a gaol would seem clearly to amount to a deprivation of liberty, the ‘whole range of criteria’ principle adumbrated in Guzzardi has also led the Court to conclude that situations falling short of imprisonment in the orthodox sense might engage Art 5. In several judgments, the Court has indicated that twenty-four hour ‘house arrest’ can amount to a deprivation of liberty.⁶ In contrast, the ECtHR has also held that night time or weekend curfews which required a person to be in her home for designated periods did not engage Art 5.⁷ The issue appears to be another aspect of the Convention in respect of which Signatory States enjoy a broad margin of appreciation.

Nonetheless, the Commission and Court have been prepared to hold that involuntary detention which lasts only for very short periods of time can engage Art 5. In X and Y v Sweden,⁸ for example, the EComHR concluded that detention of only one hour (prior to deportation) could amount to a deprivation. A similar conclusion was reached in X v Austria,⁹ in which the applicant had been detained for barely an hour in order that a blood sample could be taken from him.

This chapter considers the extent to which the government is empowered to restrict the physical liberty of persons who have not been put on trial for, nor convicted of a criminal offence. Much English law, even in the relatively modern era, was formulated and applied without explicit reference being made to the provisions of the ECHR Art 5, an historical circumstance which provides a useful opportunity to evaluate the consistency of domestic law with Art 5’s requirements. That objective is pursued in a series of discrete sections. Sections 1 and 2 consider police powers lawfully to restrict an individual’s physical autonomy by subjecting her to involuntary detention. Section 1 assesses those powers in the context of what are termed ‘ordinary’ offences: section 2 is concerned with powers of detention in respect of ‘terrorist offences’.¹⁰

The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984

Much of the domestic law delineating governmental powers of detention and investigation addressed in this chapter now derives from a single piece of legislation, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (a measure generally referred to by the acronym ‘PACE’). Specific provisions of PACE are assessed below, but the legislation is of sufficient significance to the analysis presented in this chapter to merit some general introductory comments being made.

The Act is perhaps better seen as an attempt to codify and clarify a hitherto disparate and sometimes obscure collection of statutory and common law powers than as marking a fundamental break with the previous law. PACE was enacted to implement, in broad terms, the proposals of a Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure established by a Labour government in 1977. The Commission reported in 1980. Its proposals received a broad welcome. An initial Bill published in 1982 was eventually enacted in 1984. The second Thatcher government had sought to introduce a substantial number of amendments into the Bill, but most of these were—somewhat unusually—withdrawn or modified in the face of significant opposition both within and outside Parliament. The leading commentator on the Act, Professor Zander, suggests the history of the Act is a good example of the law-making process operating as constitutional idealists would wish:¹¹

⁶ Cf Vachev v Bulgaria [2004] ECHR 42987/98; Mancini v Italy (2001) App no 44955/98.

⁷ Raimondo v Italy (1994) 18 EHRR 237. ⁸ (1976) 7 DR 123. ⁹ (1979) 18 DR 154.

¹⁰ The treatment of these issues in this chapter is both brief and very selective. Readers seeking a more extensive introduction to the subject might refer to the excellent studies in Fenwick H (2007, 4th edn) Civil liberties and human rights chs 11–14; and Feldman D (2002, 2nd edn) Civil liberties and human rights in England and Wales part II.

The Committee stage in the House of Commons broke the record for the highest number of sittings... There was extensive debate about the proposals before the Conservative government introduced first one and then a second Bill. Both Bills were massively amended by the government... [T]he vast majority of amendments were moved by the Government because Ministers and officials were persuaded that they represented genuine improvements in the proposed legislation...¹²

The then Home Secretary Leon Brittan described PACE as:

... A long overdue reform and modernisation of the law governing the investigation of crime. The Government's aim has throughout been to ensure that the police have the powers they need to bring offenders to justice, but at the same time to balance those powers with new safeguards to ensure that these powers are used properly, and only where and to the extent that they are necessary.¹³

PACE dealt with a wide range of police powers. The Act sought to structure and refine the content and use of such powers both by explicit and closely targeted provisions in the legislation itself, and also by making provision for the Home Secretary to issue various 'Codes of Practice' specifying how particular powers ought to be used. Codes were initially required in respect of powers of search without arrest, the treatment (including questioning) of detained persons, search of premises and seizure of property, and the tape-recording of interviews with detained persons. No provision was initially made for a Code in respect of powers of arrest, an omission which was not remedied until 2005. The legal status of Codes was somewhat uncertain. PACE did not provide that a police breach of a relevant Code rendered police action unlawful, nor that breach was per se a criminal or tortious act. Section 67(11) did state that a breach of a Code could be taken into account by a court in any related proceedings, but what that might mean was far from clear.

I. Deprivation of liberty for 'ordinary' offences

This section divides its analysis of police powers to restrict an individual's physical liberty into three parts. The first considers powers of 'arrest'. The second addresses powers of detention which arise consequent upon arrest but before the detained person is charged with any offence. The final part considers situations in which a person can lawfully be detained without actually being arrested.

Powers of arrest

An arrest has occurred when an individual has been deprived of her liberty: the concept is more a matter of fact than of legal nicety.¹⁴ Presumptively, an arrest could be both a tort and a crime upon the part of the person carrying it out. And just as Mr Carrington had to ¹¹ Cf the Burkean ideal alluded to in ch 5; see 'Crown and commons—the original intent and the subsequent rise of "party" politics' ff, ch 5, pp 119–120 above.

¹² See Zander M (1995, 3rd ed) The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 pp x–xi.

¹³ Ibid, p v.

¹⁴ For relatively recent House of Lords discussions of the point see Spicer v Holt [1977] AC 987; and Holgate-Mohammed v Duke [1984] AC 437.

try (unsuccessfully as it turned out) to find a lawful justification for his intrusion into Mr Entick's printshop in order to rebut Mr Entick's claim for trespass,¹⁵ so a person carrying out an arrest must find lawful justification for his actions;¹⁶ justification which could be found only in statute or common law.

The great majority of lawful arrests are now made under statutory authority. There are very few situations in which a power of arrest still arises at common law, and these are considered briefly below. There are also situations, arising both under common law and statute, where arrest can lawfully be made by any person.¹⁷ The focus of this section remains limited however to arrests made by police officers.

At common law

The most significant common law power of arrest now available to the police relates to situations in which it is feared that a breach of the peace is occurring or about to occur.¹⁸ The leading modern authority on the meaning of a 'breach of the peace' (which is not per se a criminal offence)¹⁹ is the Court of Appeal's 1984 judgment in R v Howell, where the Court held that:²⁰

We entertain no doubt that a constable has a power of arrest where there is reasonable apprehension of imminent danger of a breach of the peace; so for that matter has the ordinary citizen... We are emboldened to say that there is a breach of the peace whenever harm is actually done or is likely to be done to a person or in his presence to his property or a person is in fear of being so harmed through an assault, an affray, a riot, an unlawful assembly or other disturbance. It is for this breach of the peace when done in his presence or the reasonable apprehension of it taking place that a constable, or anyone else, may arrest an offender without warrant.

Howell can be taken as placing a limitation on police powers, in so far as there was a widespread perception before the case was argued that breach of the peace did not require a fear of immediate physical violence occurring. However, the case also confirmed that the power of arrest arose at the point when the breach of the peace could reasonably be apprehended; it was not necessary that the breach had actually occurred.

The Court of Appeal has subsequently stressed (in 1998) that the power should not be regarded as a routine element of police conduct. In Foulkes v Chief Constable of Merseyside, Beldam J observed that:

... the common law power of a police constable to arrest where no actual breach of the peace has taken place but where he apprehends that such a breach may be caused by apparently lawful conduct is exceptional... [A]lthough I am prepared to accept that a constable may exceptionally have power to arrest a person whose behaviour is lawful but provocative, it is a power which ought to be exercised by him only in the clearest of circumstances and when he is satisfied on reasonable grounds that a breach of the peace is imminent... there must... be a ¹⁵ See 'Entick v Carrington (1765)', ch 3, pp 52–53 above.

¹⁶ Cf Diplock LJ in Dallison v Caffery [1965] 1 QB 348 at 370: 'Since arrest involves trespass to the person and any trespass to the person is prima facie tortious, the onus lies on the arrestor to justify the trespass by establishing reasonable and probable cause for the arrest.'

¹⁷ See the discussions in Bradley A and Ewing K (2002, 13th edn) Constitutional and administrative law pp 481–7; Parpworth N (2006, 4th edn) Constitutional and administrative law pp 436–46.

¹⁸ For a helpful overview of the history of the power see Williams G (1954) 'Arrest for breach of the peace' Criminal LR 578.

¹⁹ See Williamson v West Midlands Chief Constable [2003] EWCA Civ 337; [2004] 1 WLR 14.

²⁰ [1982] QB 416; [1981] 3 WLR 501; (1981) 73 Cr App R 31.

sufficiently real and present threat to the peace to justify the extreme step of depriving of his liberty a citizen who is not at that time acting unlawfully.²¹

Howell (a 1981 case) was argued and decided without any reference being made to Art 5 ECHR. Prima facie, the power appears compatible with Art 5 ECHR, since any arrest would notionally be made pursuant to the Art 5.1(c) proviso. That supposition seems to be confirmed by Foulkes, which was also decided (and argued) without any reference being made to Art 5.

Shortly after Foulkes was decided, the ECtHR in *Steel and others v United Kingdom*²² considered that while breach of the peace was not per se a crime in English law, it could properly be considered as an 'offence' within the meaning of Art 5(1)(c). The Court also considered that in the aftermath of Howell, the notion of a breach of the peace was sufficiently precisely (and narrowly) defined to provide a lawful basis for arrest:

55. In this connection, the Court observes that the concept of breach of the peace has been clarified by the English courts over the last two decades, to the extent that it is now sufficiently established that a breach of the peace is committed only when an individual causes harm, or appears likely to cause harm, to persons or property or acts in a manner the natural consequence of which would be to provoke others to violence. It is also clear that a person may be arrested for causing a breach of the peace or where it is reasonably apprehended that he or she is likely to cause a breach of the peace.

Accordingly, the Court considers that the relevant legal rules provided sufficient guidance and were formulated with the degree of precision required by the Convention.

Breach of the peace and 'wilful obstruction' of a police officer

The power of arrest at common law for breach of the peace is also of great significance in respect of the criminal offence of obstructing a police officer in the execution of her duty; (now found in the Police Act 1996 s 89(2)).²³ That duty extends to preventing breaches of the peace. In circumstances where a prosecution is brought against a person for failing to comply with a police officer's instructions which were issued because the officer considered a breach of the peace was occurring or likely to occur, the person can obviously raise in her defence the argument that the officer had no proper basis for reaching that conclusion. The effect of the judgments in Howell and Foulkes was to enhance the utility of the defence by narrowing the circumstances in which a breach of the peace could reasonably be apprehended. Shortly after the HRA came into force, the judgment of the High Court (per Sedley LJ) in *DPP v Redmond-Bate*²⁴ provided an important analysis of the inter-relationship between this common law principle and various articles of the ECHR.

Ms Redmond-Bate, a fundamentalist Christian, had been espousing her religious beliefs from the steps of Wakefield Cathedral. Her speech eventually attracted a crowd, which in the opinion of a police officer, was sufficiently antagonised by what she was saying that a breach of the peace was likely to occur. When Ms Redmond-Bate refused the officer's request that she stop speaking, the police officer arrested her under s 89 and she was convicted in the Crown Court. The High Court quashed the conviction. Sedley LJ was led to this conclusion in part by his understanding of longstanding common law principles. On a proper understanding of the facts of the case, any threat of a breach of the peace came from the crowd, not from Ms Redmond-Bate, whose actions were not per se unlawful. In that sense, the judgment forcefully restated the old common law principle ²¹ [1998] 3 All ER 705 at 711.

²² [1999] 28 EHRR 603.

²³ The offence is one of considerable longevity; previously it was contained in the Police Act 1964 s 51.

²⁴ (1999) 163 JP 789; [2000] HRLR 249.

laid out over a century ago in Beatty v Gilbanks,²⁵ to the effect that police action in the face of threatened disruption to peaceful protest should be targeted at the putative disrupters rather than at the protestor. In Sedley LJ's view, an individual who persisted in lawful conduct when told to stop by a police officer could not be guilty of wilful obstruction.

Although the HRA was not then in force, Sedley LJ went on to consider the compatibility of this common law rule with various provisions of the Convention.²⁶ As noted in chapter twenty-two,²⁷ Sedley LJ suggested that the coming into force of the HRA was part of a 'constitutional shift' in which notions of 'rights' were gaining increased prominence and significance. In relation to this specific area of human rights protection, he took the view that the common law as he understood it was quite consistent in substantive terms with the requirements of the Convention.

What one might term the express suffusion of ECHR principles into domestic understandings of the breach of the peace concept was demonstrated by the Court of Appeal's subsequent judgment in Bibby v Chief Constable of Essex,²⁸ in which the Court drew upon Redmond-Bate to provide a more systematic exposition of what was meant by 'exceptional' per Foulkes. Schiemann LJ indicated that six tests would have to be satisfied before the power of arrest could be deployed:

1. There must be the clearest of circumstances and a sufficiently real and present threat to the peace to justify the extreme step of depriving of his liberty a citizen who is not at the time acting unlawfully
2. The threat must be coming from the person who is to be arrested.
3. The conduct must clearly interfere with the rights of others.
4. The natural consequence of the conduct must be violence from a third party.
5. The violence in 4 must not be wholly unreasonable.
6. The conduct of the person to be arrested must be unreasonable.

Many of the leading cases on breach of the peace and obstruction of police officers have involved fairly mundane social situations in which disputes over relatively trivial matters have escalated out of hand. Howell, for example, arose from a fracas which occurred when police were called to put an end to a rowdy, middle of the night party which was disturbing local residents. Mr Bibby was a bailiff, who had been arrested by a police officer during a heated altercation with a debtor whose goods the bailiff was entitled to seize.²⁹ The 'human rights' dimension of case such as Redmond-Bate are perhaps more readily apparent. The significance of a case such as Bibby perhaps lies in its evident normalisation of ECHR ideas within the court's analysis of the proper scope of common law powers of arrest.

Statutory powers of arrest

Common law powers of arrest are now quantitatively insignificant compared with those arising under statutory provisions. There is a long and complex history of particular police forces being empowered by private Acts of Parliament to exercise a power of arrest ²⁵ (1882) 9 QBD 308; see 'The classic dilemma—Beatty v Gillbanks (1882)', ch 18, pp 561–562 above.

²⁶ Since Ms Redmond-Bate was making a religious/political speech at the time of her detention, Arts 9, 10 and 11 ECHR as well as Art 5 were relevant to this inquiry.

²⁷ See 'Imposing Convention Rights on private individuals and organisations', ch 22, pp 687–688 above.

²⁸ (2000) 164 JP 297; [2000] RA 384, [2000] Po LR 107, The Times, April 24, 2000.

²⁹ The Court of Appeal overturned the trial judge's conclusion that the arrest was lawful, on the basis that in so far as a breach of the peace could have been regarded as imminent in the circumstances, the threat came from the debtor rather than the bailiff.

in particular circumstances,³⁰ but the enactment of powers of arrest through public Acts on a nationwide basis is a development of more modern vintage.³¹ Many such arrests are carried out in pursuance of a warrant of arrest granted by a magistrate under the terms of s 1 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 in respect of a person who has committed or is suspected of having committed an offence.³² Should the warrant prove on later examination to be invalid, the arrest effected under it would be unlawful. However, as long ago as 1750 Parliament had enacted a provision (s 6 of the Constables Protection Act)³³ to prevent any action for unlawful arrest being brought against a police officer in such circumstances.³⁴

Until the mid-1960s, police officers had extensive but rather ill-defined powers at common law to arrest without a warrant any person who they had reasonable grounds to suspect had committed, was in the process of committing, or was about to commit, a felony.³⁵ This and various other common law powers were first put on a statutory basis in the Criminal Law Act 1967, as part of wide-ranging initiative by the then Labour Home Secretary, Roy Jenkins, to modernise all aspects of the criminal justice system. Those reforms were subsequently taken further by PACE.

The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984—and its 2005 amendments

Section 26 of PACE expressly repealed most of the existing statutory powers of arrest. In their place, the new Act introduced a stark distinction between two sets of circumstances in which a police officer would be entitled to arrest a person without having a warrant to do so.

Arrestable and non-arrestable offences

PACE drew a sharp (but now redundant) distinction between 'arrestable offences' under s 24 and 'non-arrestable offences' under s 25. As the label implies, 'arrestable offences' were the more serious crimes, such as—inter alia—murder, kidnapping, theft and causing grievous bodily harm.

Section 24(4)–(7) empowered a police officer to arrest any person whom she had 'reasonable grounds' for suspecting had committed, is committing or was about to commit an arrestable offence. The Act did not itself further define the notion of 'reasonable suspicion'. The meaning lent to that concept by the courts would therefore be of great ³⁰ Which would obviously mean that invocation of the power when the requisite circumstances did not exist would be unlawful; see Christie v Leachinsky [1947] AC 573.

³¹ On the distinction between public and private Acts see 'Private Bills' ff, ch 5, pp 135–136 above.

³² 1 Issue of summons to accused or warrant for his arrest.

(1) On an information being laid before a justice of the peace that a person has, or is suspected of having, committed an offence, the justice may issue—

(a) a summons directed to that person requiring him to appear before a magistrates' court to answer the information, or

(b) a warrant to arrest that person and bring him before a magistrates' court.

³³ '[N]o action shall be brought against any constable... or against any person or persons acting by his order and in his aid, for anything done in obedience to any warrant under the hand or seal of any justice of the peace.'

³⁴ Cf the judgment of McNaghten J in Horsfield v Brown [1932] 1 KB 355:

If the constable acts in obedience to the warrant, then, though the warrant be an unlawful warrant, he is protected by the statute of 1750, but if the warrant be a lawful warrant, and he executes it in an unlawful way, then no action is maintainable against the magistrate, but an action is maintainable against the constable.

³⁵ See the discussion by Lord Diplock in Dallison v Caffery [1965] 1 QB 348, [1964] 3 WLR 385. For a rather antiquated overview see Turner J (1962, 18th edn) Kenny's Outlines of criminal law pp 561–567. See also Williams G (1954) 'Arrest for felony at common law' Criminal LR 408.

significance in determining the reach of the power. The higher the court set the bar of 'reasonableness'—and the more rigorously judges required themselves to be satisfied that the bar was passed in a given case—the less scope there would be for the power to be used. An approach to reasonableness in s 24 which simply equated the term with the administrative law concept of irrationality would afford the power a very broad scope.

Prior to PACE coming into effect, authoritative guidance as to the meaning of the notion of 'suspicion' in relation to powers of arrest had been provided by Lord Devlin's judgment in Hussein v Chong Fook Kam, which drew a clear distinction between 'suspicion' and 'proof':

Suspicion in its ordinary meaning is a state of conjecture or surmise where proof is lacking; 'I suspect but I cannot prove'. Suspicion arises at or near the starting point of an investigation of which the obtaining of prima facie proof is the end. When such proof has been obtained, the police case is complete; it is ready for trial and passes on to its next stage. It is indeed desirable as a general rule that an arrest should not be made until a case is complete. But if an arrest before that were forbidden, it would seriously hamper the police...³⁶

There was no reason to assume that this guidance would not remain authoritative in respect of powers created by PACE.

The Act was introduced in the same year as the House of Lords offered authoritative guidance as to the meaning of 'reasonable' in s 24's statutory predecessor, the Criminal Law Act 1967 s 2(4), which was worded in the same way as s 24.³⁷ The appellant in *Holgate-Mohammed Appellant v Duke*³⁸ had been arrested on suspicion of having carried out a burglary. The basis of the arresting officer's reasonable suspicion was identification evidence from the victim. Lord Diplock's leading judgment held that an arrest made under s 2(4) would be unlawful only if the officer had no bona fide belief that the arrested person was guilty of the offence or that the belief was Wednesbury unreasonable. Such a test would mean that the power could be exercised on the basis of little evidence or evidence which was not prima facie especially credible.

The Court of Appeal subsequently developed a three stage test to be applied to assess if an officer's suspicion met the requirements of s 24. The appellant in *Castorina v Chief Constable of Surrey*³⁹ had been arrested on suspicion of burgling a company from which she had recently been sacked. The Court of Appeal underlined the point that s 24 did not require the officer to believe that the person arrested was indeed guilty of the offence, but merely that a suspicion to that effect was honestly held. In a more prescriptive vein, the Court of Appeal that a trial court in assessing the lawfulness of an arrest under s 24(6) should ask itself three questions:

- (a) Did the arresting officer suspect that the person arrested was guilty of the offence;
- (b) were there reasonable grounds for that suspicion;
- (c) did the officer exercise his discretion to make the arrest in accordance with Wednesbury principles.⁴⁰

³⁶ [1970] AC 492 at 498. See also the judgment of Scott LJ in Dunbell v Roberts [1944] 1 All ER 326. Hussein is a Privy Council rather than House of Lords judgment, and therefore strictly only of persuasive authority in respect of matters of domestic law. It has however consistently been followed by domestic courts.

³⁷ '2 (4) Where a constable, with reasonable cause, suspects that an arrestable offence has been committed, he may arrest without warrant anyone whom he, with reasonable cause, suspects to be guilty of the offence'.

³⁸ [1984] AC 437, [1984] 2 WLR 660.

³⁹ (1996) 160 LG Rev 241; (1988) 138 NLJ Rep 180; Times, June 15, 1988.

⁴⁰ [1996] LG Rev Rep 241 at p 249.

Castorina indicates that there is both a subjective and objective dimension to the reasonable suspicion test. If the arresting officer herself had no belief in the person's guilt when the arrest was made, the existence of even a substantial body of relevant information known to other officers at the time of the arrest cannot stop the arrest from being unlawful.

Professor Zander characterised the Castorina test as: '[N]ot a very exacting standard'.⁴¹ The courts' evident unwillingness to subject the PACE 'reasonable suspicion' regime to a very rigorous level of scrutiny is nicely illustrated by the Court of Appeal's judgment in Hough v The Chief Constable of the Staffordshire Constabulary.⁴² Mr Hough was arrested, at gun point, by a police officer who had been told over the radio that there was an entry on the police national computer to the effect that Mr Hough was suspected of illegal possession of a gun and was considered armed and dangerous. The information proved erroneous. The issue before the Court was whether the s 24 reasonable suspicion test applied only to the belief of the arresting officer or whether it should also be applied to the officer who entered the relevant information on the computer. The trial judge had applied the latter test, and since the Chief Constable led no evidence as to the reasonableness of the computer entry, found the arrest to be unlawful. The Court of Appeal reversed that conclusion, holding that it was the belief only of the arresting officer that was relevant and that in most circumstances it was perfectly reasonable for an officer to rely on information of that sort without making any attempt to evaluate its credibility.

In 2003, in Cumming v Chief Constable of Northumbria,⁴³ the Court of Appeal considered if—in the post-HRA era—the notion of irrationality should be lent a tighter meaning. Cumming was one of a group of local authority employees who monitored CCTV cameras. During the course of an investigation into car theft, the police formed the view that one of the employees must have altered a CCTV tape that might contain evidence relating to the car theft. All of the employees were arrested on the assumption that one of them must have altered the tape (which would have amounted to the offence of attempting to pervert the course of justice), and that the formal process of arrest would be more likely to induce the employees to provide useful information than merely inviting them to be interviewed.

The Court of Appeal saw no basis for concluding that an enhanced level of scrutiny should apply to the third branch of the Castorina test:

It has to be remembered that the protection provided by Article 5 is against arbitrary arrest.... I do not therefore consider that Article 5 required the court to evaluate the exercise of discretion in any different way from the exercise of any other executive discretion, although it must do so, as I have said, in the light of the important right to liberty which was at stake.⁴⁴

The s 25 power of arrest in respect of 'non-arrestable offences'⁴⁵ was more tightly drawn. The power was exercisable when a lesser offence had been, was being or was about to be committed and a police officer believed that one or more of specified (in s 25(3)) 'general arrest conditions' were satisfied. These conditions include circumstances where the officer did not know and could not easily find out the name or address of the person arrested (which would of course make the issue of an arrest warrant problematic); and ⁴¹ (1995) op cit at p 69. He cites more forceful criticism of Castorina from Clayton R and Tomlinson J (1988) 'Arrest and reasonable grounds for suspicion' Law Society Gazette (September 7) 22 at p 26; 'If the police are justified in arresting a woman of good character on such flimsy grounds, without even questioning her as to her alibi or possible motives, the law provides very scant protection for those suspected of crime'.

⁴² [2001] EWCA Civ 39, [2001] Po LR 6.

⁴³ [2003] EWCA Civ 1844, [2004] Po LR 61.

⁴⁴ Ibid, at para 44.

⁴⁵ The terminology is unhappily oxymoronic.

those where the officer has reasonable grounds for thinking—inter alia—that the person is injured, and/or may injure himself or others or damage property.

The High Court confirmed in *Edwards v DPP*⁴⁶ that s 25 created a dual test comparable to the one outlined in respect of s 24 in Cascarino. It would not suffice that there was a credible, even strong reason to think that one or more of the arrest conditions was satisfied. It was also necessary that the arresting officer had the conditions in his/her mind when she made the arrest.⁴⁷

The 2005 amendments

The power of arrest provisions of PACE have latterly been amended by the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005. The 2005 reforms were an element of what Tony Blair described in a 2004 speech as his governments' 'war on crime',⁴⁸ a policy which he portrayed as rejecting what he termed the 'liberal consensus' on crime issues of recent years which placed too much emphasis on the interests of those accused or suspected of crimes and much too little emphasis on the interests of victims of crime and ordinary 'law-abiding citizens'.⁴⁹ The Home Office had previously indicated in a consultation paper—*Policing: modernising police powers to meet community needs*⁵⁰—that the PACE regime should be amended by: '[M]oving towards a straightforward, universal framework which focuses on the nature of an offence in relation to the circumstances of the victim, the offender and the needs of the investigation'.⁵¹

The Home Office proposed that this end could best be achieved by abolishing the distinction between arrestable and non-arrestable offences. This policy was enacted in what is now PACE s 24A. The amended legislation creates a police power of arrest for any offence in the following terms:

24A Arrest without warrant: constables

- (1) A constable may arrest without a warrant—
 - (a) anyone who is about to commit an offence;
 - (b) anyone who is in the act of committing an offence;
 - (c) anyone whom he has reasonable grounds for suspecting to be about to commit an offence;
 - (d) anyone whom he has reasonable grounds for suspecting to be committing an offence.
- (2) If a constable has reasonable grounds for suspecting that an offence has been committed, he may arrest without a warrant anyone whom he has reasonable grounds to suspect of being guilty of it.
- (3) If an offence has been committed, a constable may arrest without a warrant—
 - (a) anyone who is guilty of the offence;
 - (b) anyone whom he has reasonable grounds for suspecting to be guilty of it.

Taken alone, these elements of s 24A extend powers of arrest. The section continues however by providing that the power may only be used if the police officer has reasonable grounds to believe that it is necessary to arrest the person concerned for one or more of ⁴⁶ [1993] 97 Cr App R 301. The case is significant for other reasons and is discussed more fully below.

⁴⁷ 'The first requirement is that the relevant condition shall have appeared to the officer at the time and then secondly the question whether that condition was in fact fulfilled or not': ibid, at 307 per Evans LJ.

⁴⁸ Available at <<http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/2004/jul/19/immigrationpolicy.ukcrime>>.

⁴⁹ The accuracy of Mr Blair's historical premise is calmly and comprehensively undermined by David Feldman in (2006) 'Human rights, terrorism and risk; the roles of politician and judges' Public Law 364.

⁵⁰ (2004); <<http://www.statewatch.org/news/2004/aug/police-powers-consult.pdf>>.

⁵¹ At para 2.5.

a list of specified reasons in s 24(5). Many of these echo ‘grounds of arrest’ in the former s 25, (which has now been repealed), but several other factors have been added, including protecting a child or vulnerable person from the person to be arrested, and—in s 24(5)(e): ‘to allow the prompt and effective investigation of the offence or of the conduct of the person in question’.

The insertion of the word ‘necessary’ is certainly a linguistic nod towards the sentiments of the ECHR⁵² If the courts were to take a rigorous approach to the issue of necessity the presumptive extension of police powers displayed in s 24A might turn out to have little effect in practice. It is as yet too soon to offer any sensible conclusion as to the way in which the new provisions will be interpreted by the courts.

Giving reasons for arrest

Art 5(2) ECHR requires that:

Everyone who is arrested shall be informed promptly, in a language which he understands, of the reasons for his arrest and of any charge against him.

In Christie v Leachinsky,⁵³ decided three years before the ECHR came into being, the House of Lords had held that a similar principle existed at common law. Mr Leachinsky was a dealer in waste fabrics. He was arrested by Christie, a police officer who suspected him of handling stolen cloth. Christie had however purported to arrest Leachinsky under powers conferred on him by a private Act of Parliament promoted by Liverpool Council. Christie knew he had no such power, since it could only be used in respect of persons whose name or address were unknown to the arresting officer, but evidently invoked it because doing so was ‘more convenient’ than seeking a warrant.

The House of Lords held that arrest without a warrant in such circumstances was unlawful. Viscount Simon’s judgment drew upon a series of what he considered to be long established⁵⁴ propositions on this point:

1. If a policeman arrests without warrant on reasonable suspicion of felony, or of other crime of a sort which does not require a warrant, he must in ordinary circumstances inform the person arrested of the true ground of arrest. He is not entitled to keep the reason to himself or to give a reason which is not the true reason.... [A] citizen is entitled to know on what charge or on suspicion of what crime he is seized.
2. If the citizen is not so informed, but is nevertheless seized, the policeman, apart from certain exceptions, is liable for false imprisonment.
3. The requirement that the person arrested should be informed of the reason why he is seized naturally does not exist if the circumstances are such that he must know the general nature of the alleged offence for which he is detained.
4. The requirement that he should be so informed does not mean that technical or precise language need be used. The matter is a matter of substance, and turns on the elementary proposition that in this country a person is, prima facie, entitled to his freedom and is only required to submit to restraint on his freedom if he knows in substance the reason why it is claimed that this restraint should be imposed.

⁵² Although as noted above (fn 13) Leon Brittan use the word in describing the objectives of PACE itself.

⁵³ [1947] AC 573.

⁵⁴ Viscount Simon began his review of the authorities by turning to a textbook first published in 1755: ‘Burn’s Justice Of The Peace is a work of acknowledged authority which has gone through more than thirty editions. It originally appeared in 1755, and the author, the Rev Richard Burn, DCL (who also brought out three successive editions of Blackstone’s Commentaries), deals in detail with the law of arrest without warrant. He says (vol. I, p 302) that “where a constable acts without warrant by virtue of his office of constable, he should, unless the party be previously acquainted with it, notify that he is a constable, or that he arrests in the Queen’s name, and for what,”’...; ibid, at 586.

Viscount Simon's judgment laid great stress—in both substantive and rhetorical terms—on a common law tradition of maximising individual liberty.⁵⁵ The sentiments appear to echo those offered by Lord Atkin five years earlier in Liversidge v Anderson, sentiments which the majority of the Court considered had been rejected by Parliament in approving the text of reg 18b. Like any rule or principle of common law, the propositions advanced so firmly by Viscount Simon could be abrogated in 'ordinary' as well as in 'extraordinary times'.

The Christie principle does now have a statutory basis in PACE s 28, which provides that:

28 Information to be given on arrest

- (1) Subject to subsection (5) below, where a person is arrested, otherwise than by being informed that he is under arrest, the arrest is not lawful unless the person arrested is informed that he is under arrest as soon as is practicable after his arrest...
- (3) Subject to subsection (5) below, no arrest is lawful unless the person arrested is informed of the ground for the arrest at the time of, or as soon as is practicable after, the arrest.
- (4) Where a person is arrested by a constable, subsection (3) above applies regardless of whether the ground for the arrest is obvious

The common law principles outlined in Christie are echoed in the requirements of s 28. The appellant in *Edwards v Director of Public Prosecutions*⁵⁶ was one of several suspected cannabis users who had been arrested by police officers late one evening in a busy street after a violent altercation. It was entirely likely on the facts of the case that the officer could lawfully have arrested Ms Edwards on the basis that Ms Edwards was committing a non-arrestable offence (possession of cannabis) and that one or more of the grounds of arrest in PACE s 25 was satisfied. The officer had, however, in nicely prosaic terms, told Ms Edwards that she was 'nicked for obstruction'. Unhappily for the officer, the previously extant statutory power of arrest for obstruction had been repealed by PACE s 26. The arrest was therefore unlawful.⁵⁷

Edwards shows very clearly the two purposes inherent in the requirement to give reasons for arrest. The first is that it removes the possibility that a person can be—or feels she can be—arrested arbitrarily. The second is that it provided a yardstick against which the lawfulness of the arrest can subsequently be measured. The importance of these considerations led Evans LJ in Edwards to observe—notwithstanding his evident sympathy for the difficult position in which the officer found himself—that: '[I]t has to be borne in mind that giving correct information as to the reason for an arrest is a matter of the utmost constitutional significance in a case where a reason can be and is given at the time'.⁵⁸

Edwards was decided in 1993, without any reference being made to Art 5. The compatibility of s 28 with Art 5(2) came before the ECtHR in Fox, Campbell and Hartley v United ⁵⁵ 'If a policeman who entertained a reasonable suspicion that X had committed a felony were at liberty to arrest him and march him off to a police station without giving any explanation of why he was doing this, the prima facie right of personal liberty would be gravely infringed. No one, I think, would approve a situation in which, when the person arrested asked for the reason, the policeman replied: "That has nothing to do with you. Come along with me." Such a situation may be tolerated under other systems of law, as, for instance, in the time of lettres de cachet in the eighteenth century in France, or in more recent days when the Gestapo swept people off to confinement under an overriding authority which the executive in this country happily does not in ordinary times possess. This would be quite contrary to our conceptions of individual liberty. If I may introduce a reference to the well known book, Dalton's Country Justice, that author, dealing with arrest and imprisonment, says: "The liberty of a man is a thing specially favoured by the common law"; ibid, at 588.

⁵⁶ (1993) 97 Cr App R 301, [1993] Crim LR 854, (1993) The Times, March 29.

⁵⁷ Zander equally prosaically observes that the officer should simply have said: 'You're nicked for suspected possession of cannabis': (1995) op cit at p 71.

⁵⁸ [1993] Cr App Rep 301 at 308.

Kingdom.⁵⁹ The Court concluded in Fox that Art 5(2) requirement that reasons be given for a deprivation of liberty did not necessarily require that those reasons be especially detailed:

40... Whilst this information must be conveyed 'promptly' (in French: 'dans le plus court délai'), it need not be related in its entirety by the arresting officer at the very moment of the arrest. Whether the content and promptness of the information conveyed were sufficient is to be assessed in each case according to its special features.

There is no obvious basis to assume that the test offered in Edwards would not suffice for these purposes. The Court of Appeal's 2004 judgment in *Taylor v Chief Constable of Thames Valley Police*⁶⁰ confirmed the presumption that s 28 met Art 5's requirements. The appellant in Taylor was a 10-year-old boy. He had been arrested on 31 May 1998 in respect of his activities at an anti-vivisection rally on 18 April 1998, when it appeared he had engaged in violent disorder by—inter alia—throwing stones. The reason given for his arrest was that he had been engaged in violent disorder at Hillgrove Farm on 18 April. In an action for unlawful arrest, the trial judge held that the arresting officer should have been more specific in the information he gave (ie by saying the appellant had been throwing stones), bearing in mind the 'special features of the case'; namely the appellant's age and the lapse of time since the events occurred.

The Court of Appeal held that such specificity was not required either by s 28 or Art 5:

Neither the claimant nor his mother could be expected to be in any doubt why he was being arrested. It was for his part in the previous violent disorder. There was no need to specify the precise way in which he was said to be taking part. Whatever are the various ways in which violent disorder can be committed, 'violent disorder' was a good description of what had happened on the previous occasion without more. Associated with its time and place, it permitted the claimant and his mother to respond, if either had wished, that the claimant was not there or that he was doing nothing wrong.⁶¹

The powers of arrest which Parliament (through statute) and the courts (through the common law) have bestowed upon government officials clearly amount to a deprivation of liberty, albeit in a chronologically limited sense. Perhaps of more significance—and certainly for arrested persons who are not subsequently prosecuted for having committed any offence—are the powers which government officials possess in respect of an arrested person after she has been arrested. In what circumstances, and for what period of time, can the person continue to be deprived of her physical freedom?

Powers of detention after arrest

PACE was significant in amending the police's statutory powers to detain arrested persons for questioning prior to them being charged or released. PACE's immediate predecessor was the Magistrates Court Act 1980. Section 43 of that Act required that a person detained for an offence which was not 'serious' had to be brought before a court or released within ⁵⁹ (1990) 13 EHRR 157. The case is discussed more extensively in section II below.

⁶⁰ [2004] EWCA Civ 898, [2004] 1 WLR 3155.

⁶¹ Ibid, at 3167; per Clarke LJ. Contrast the Court's approval of a finding of unlawful arrest on rather different facts; '[I]n Murphy v Oxford 15 February 1985 a person arrested for burglary was told that he was being arrested on suspicion of burglary in Newquay. As Sir John Donaldson MR put it, no mention was made either of the fact that the premises in Newquay were a hotel or of the date on which the offence was committed. The arrest was held to be unlawful'; ibid, at 3166.

twenty-four hours. If the offence was 'serious', however, s 43(4) did not place express limits on the duration of detention, but provided that the arrested person be brought before the court 'as soon as practicable'. The distinction between a 'serious' and 'non-serious' offence was not drawn by the Act, which given the significance of the difference was a thoroughly unsatisfactory abdication of responsibility by Parliament. Munro's review of the law at the time⁶² described the law on the point as 'notoriously inadequate'.⁶³ Munro noted that as long ago as 1825 the courts had identified a common law principle to the effect that a period of three days' detention without charge was unacceptably long, and would amount to false imprisonment,⁶⁴ but that there was little in the way of contemporary authority on the question. The High Court's 1981 judgment in *Re Sherman and Apps*⁶⁵ indicated that 'as soon as practicable' in s 43⁶⁶ should read as authorising a maximum of forty-eight hours' detention. Moreover, Donaldson LJ also held that it was a 'fundamental' common law principle: 'That when a police officer who is making inquiries of any person about an offence has enough evidence to prefer a charge against that person for the offence, he should without delay cause that person to be charged or informed that he may be prosecuted for the offence'.⁶⁷

PACE treats the issue in a much more structured fashion. The scheme of the Act divides powers of detention into distinct time periods.⁶⁸ Section 30 requires any arrested person to be brought as soon as practicable to a police station. On arrival at the police station, or twenty-four hours after her arrest (whichever time is earlier), the detention clock in relation to the arrested person begins to run. Section 41 authorises an initial detention period of twenty-four hours. If the arrest has been for an indictable offence,⁶⁹ that period may then be extended (per s 42) to thirty-six hours by a senior officer if certain conditions are met.⁷⁰ Under s 43, a further period of detention up to ninety-six hours in all may be authorised by two magistrates at a hearing which the arrested person is entitled to attend.

The rationale underpinning ss 41–43 is that an arrested person should have her liberty restored to her if the police are unable to gather sufficient evidence to sustain the person being charged with an offence. To frame the matter in rather more grandiloquent constitutional terms, PACE manifests Parliament's conclusion that a person's physical liberty is (ordinarily) a sufficiently important moral value that it may not be abrogated for more than ninety-six hours on the basis merely of police suspicion that the person has committed a serious criminal offence.

⁶² Munro C (1981) 'Detention after arrest' Crim LR 802. ⁶³ Ibid, at 802.

⁶⁴ Wright v Court (1825) 4 B & C 596. ⁶⁵ (1981) Cr App Rep 266.

⁶⁶ At the time of Apps' arrest, the provision in force was the identically worded s 38 of the Magistrates Courts Act 1952. ⁶⁷ (1981) Cr App Rep 266 at 269.

⁶⁸ This summary is both concise and selective. No discussion is offered of the potentially significant role of the 'custody officer' (see PACE ss 35–36) nor of the distinction drawn by the Act between 'designated' and 'non-designated' police stations for detention purposes.

⁶⁹ Ie an offence of sufficient seriousness to be triable in the Crown Court.

⁷⁰ 42. Authorisation of continued detention.

- (1) Where a police officer of the rank of superintendent or above who is responsible for the police station at which a person is detained has reasonable grounds for believing that —
 - (a) the detention of that person without charge is necessary to secure or preserve evidence relating to an offence for which he is under arrest or to obtain such evidence by questioning him;
 - (b) an offence for which he is under arrest is a serious arrestable offence; and
 - (c) the investigation is being conducted diligently and expeditiously, he may authorise the keeping of that person in police detention for a period expiring at or before 36 hours after the relevant time.

The ninety-six hour maximum detention provided for in PACE is also presumptively consistent with Art 5(3) ECHR, which provides that:

Everyone arrested or detained in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1.c of this article shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release pending trial. Release may be conditioned by guarantees to appear for trial.

The ECtHR has been unwilling to specify an acceptable maximum period of detention in these circumstances.⁷¹ The reluctance is no doubt attributable both to the wide variety of circumstances in which arrests are made, and to the presumption that states should enjoy a fairly wide margin of appreciation on such matters. In one of its earliest decisions, issued in 1966, the EComHR indicated that a four-day period would not be inconsistent with Art 5.⁷² More recently, in *Brogan v United Kingdom*⁷³ (which is discussed below in the context of ‘terrorism’ cases), the Court suggested that a narrower view ought to be taken of acceptable time limits in relation to persons arrested for ‘ordinary’ criminal offences.

Powers of detention without arrest

It is one of the more widely-held myths of English law that the police have—and have always had—a general power to detain people for short periods in order that, as it is often euphemistically put, the person concerned can ‘help the police with their inquiries’. The reality is nicely illustrated by the oft-cited case of Kenlin and another v Gardner.⁷⁴ Kenlin and his friend (a Mr Sowoolu) were teenage boys, who were calling round at friends’ houses to inform their friends about a forthcoming rugby match. Their activities aroused the suspicions of two plain clothes policeman, who sought to question the boys about what they were doing, but did not purport to arrest them. The boys did not believe that the officers were indeed police officers, and struggled when the officers sought to detain them. The boys were subsequently convicted of assaulting a police officer in the execution of his duty.⁷⁵

The conviction was overturned in the High Court. The Court’s brief judgment is comprised mostly of a recitation of the facts of the case. Winn LJ’s leading opinion does not cite nor discuss a single authority, and is not couched at any point in a style which deals overtly with matters of constitutional principle. The Court’s characterisation of the officers’ actions portrays them as prosaic, even mundane:

What was done was not done as an integral step in the process of arresting, but was done in order to secure an opportunity, by detaining the boys from escape, to put to them or to either of them the question which was regarded as the test question to satisfy the officers whether or not it would be right in the circumstances, and having regard to the answer obtained from that question, if any, to arrest them.⁷⁶

One might almost be forgiven for missing the constitutional significance of the conclusion Winn LJ reached in the next paragraph of his judgment; namely that the officer had committed an assault on the boys because he had no power either at common law or rooted in statute to detain the boys for questioning without having first arrested them. The officer ⁷¹ See the discussion in Starmer K (1999) European human rights law pp 227–231.

⁷² X v Netherland (1966) 9 Yearbook 564. ⁷³ (1989) 11 EHRR 117.

⁷⁴ [1967] 2 QB 510, [1967] 2 WLR 129. ⁷⁵ Under what was then Police Act 1964 s 51.

⁷⁶ [1967] 2 QB 510 at 519.

was therefore not acting in the 'execution of his duty' at the time of the altercation, and therefore the boys could not have committed an offence under s 51.

Some ten years later, in R v Lemsatef, the Court of Appeal restated the Kenlin principle in more forceful terms:

First, it must be clearly understood that neither customs officers nor police officers have any right to detain somebody for the purposes of getting them to help with their inquiries. Police officers either arrest for an offence or they do not arrest at all. Customs either detain for an offence or they do not detain at all. The law is clear. Neither arrest nor detention can properly be carried out without the accused person being told the offence for which he is being arrested. There is no such offence as 'helping police with their inquiries.' This is a phrase which has crept into use, largely because of the need for the press to be careful about how they report what has happened when somebody has been arrested but not charged. If the idea is getting around amongst either Customs and Excise officers or police officers that they can arrest or detain people, as the case may be, for this particular purpose, the sooner they disabuse themselves of that idea, the better.⁷⁷

It should also be noted that Art 5 does not expressly identify 'helping police with their inquiries' as a legitimate basis for depriving a person of her liberty, an omission which underlines the sentiment that government officials should have a reasonable basis for assuming a person to have engaged in criminal activities before detaining her.

At common law

Notwithstanding the mythical nature of the supposed requirement that the police may detain persons to help with their inquiries, there has long been and remains a power at common law for officers (and indeed private individuals) to exercise a power of detention without arrest when a breach of the peace is occurring or seems likely to occur. The existence of the power was confirmed by the House of Lords in Albert v Lavin,⁷⁸ in which Lord Diplock observed:

[E]very citizen in whose presence a breach of the peace is being, or reasonably appears to be about to be, committed has the right to take reasonable steps to make the person who is breaking or threatening to break the peace refrain from doing so; and those reasonable steps in appropriate cases will include detaining him against his will. At common law this is not only the right of every citizen, it is also his duty, although, except in the case of a citizen who is a constable, it is a duty of imperfect obligation.⁷⁹

Albert v Lavin arose out of trivial facts. Mr Albert had tried to jump the queue at a bus stop, and was prevented from doing so by an off-duty police constable. A more recent judgment of the House of Lords—*R (Laporte) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire*⁸⁰—illustrates very clearly the constitutional significance of the power to detain people because of an anticipated breach of the peace. The claimant in Laporte was among three coachloads of protesters who in March 2003 were travelling by coach from London to join a protest against the Iraq war at an RAF base in Gloucestershire. The coaches were heading towards a protest planned at Fairford, where several demonstrations—of varying degrees of legality—had been held in the previous few months.

⁷⁷ [1977] 1 WLR 812 at 816; per Lawton LJ.

⁷⁸ [1982] AC 546, [1981] 3 WLR 955, [1981] 3 All ER 878.

⁷⁹ [1982] AC 546 at 565.

⁸⁰ [2006] UKHL 55, [2007] 2 AC 105.

Gloucestershire police had been monitoring the convoy and were under the impression that the party included a substantial number of militant protestors known as Wombles,⁸¹ whose reputation evidently indicated to the police that violent protest might occur when the protestors got to Fairford. The Gloucestershire constabulary therefore decided to ‘stop and search’ the convoy when it came to Lechlade, within a few miles of the protest site. Quite how many ‘Wombles’ were among the protestors was never ascertained, but the police did find and confiscate a number of items, some of which—such as ‘a can of red spray paint... a safety flare... and 5 polycarbonate home-made shields’⁸²—might obviously have been used for non-peaceful purposes.

This evidence, along with their pre-existing intelligence, led the police to believe it was justifiable to stop the coaches, to detain all of the passengers on board (albeit not to arrest them), to require the drivers to turn the coaches around and then—accompanied by a police escort—to drive the coaches and their passengers back to London; thereby not only preventing the protestors from expressing their views in the planned demonstration but also—since the coaches had no toilets and the police did not allow them to stop en route during the two and a half hour trip—subjecting them to some appreciable discomfort and inconvenience.

All of this was done on the presumed basis that the police had reasonable grounds to believe that a breach of the peace would occur if the coaches were allowed to proceed to Fairford, and that such reasonable belief justified the detention of the passengers in the sense both of stopping them joining the protest and sending them all the way back to London.

Ms Laporte challenged the lawfulness of the police action on the basis of its alleged breach of Arts 5, 10 and 11 ECHR. The challenge was made both to the police’s decision to prevent her going to Fairford and to the decision to force her to return to London. At first instance, the High Court upheld the decision to prevent the passengers joining the protest, but held that their subsequent forced return to London was unlawful.⁸³ Those conclusions were subsequently upheld by the Court of Appeal.⁸⁴ The House of Lords took a less indulgent view of the police’s powers to interfere with Ms Laporte’s physical liberty and freedom of expression, holding unanimously that both elements of the police’s actions were unlawful.

The argument in all three courts had proceeded on the common assumption that the police’s power to arrest a person on the basis of an officer’s belief that a breach of the peace was about to occur required that there be a reasonable basis for the police to believe that violent disorder would occur and would do so imminently.⁸⁵ The police did not contend that these conditions were satisfied when the protestors’ coaches were stopped at Lechlade. Any arrest in those circumstances would have been unlawful at common law and thus also a breach of Arts 5, 10 and 11 ECHR. Ms Laporte and her fellow protestors were however not arrested. Rather they were prevented from going to their planned destination, forcibly detained on a bus, and then driven against their wills some eighty miles back to London.

⁸¹ An acronym for the clumsily named ‘White Overalls Movement Building Libertarian Effective Struggles’.

⁸² [2006] UKHL 55, [2007] 2 AC 105 at para 11.

⁸³ [2004] EWHC 253 (admin); [2004] 2 All ER 874.

⁸⁴ [2004] EWCA Civ 1639; [2005] QB 678.

⁸⁵ Lord Bingham offered (at para 30) Glanville Williams’ analysis as a correct statement of the law: see (1954) ‘Arrest for breach of the peace’ Crim LR 578. The case law most relied upon by the police to sustain the proposition was Albert v Lavin [1982] AC 546 and Foulkes v Chief Constable of Merseyside [1998] 3 All ER 705.

The Chief Constable's argument in Laporte was in essence that interferences with individual liberty falling short of arrest would be lawful if the interference was 'reasonable' in the circumstances and that police assessment of reasonableness was something which courts should be slow to second guess. The submission rested largely on the High Court's judgments in *Piddington v Bates*⁸⁶ and Moss v McLachlan,⁸⁷ in both of which the Court had upheld the detention of protestors even though there was no evidential basis to believe that a breach of the peace was immediately likely to occur.

Ms Laporte's rebuttal was that the common law, properly construed, drew no meaningful distinction between arrest and other forms of detention, and required imminence in either circumstance. Alternatively, she contended that the Chief Constable's action on the particular facts of her case could not withstand scrutiny under the 'necessary in a democratic society' limb of Arts 10 and 11.

The House of Lords accepted both of Ms Laporte's arguments. Lord Bingham felt that the weight of domestic legal authority pointed towards a requirement of 'imminence' of a breach of the peace to justify both arrest and detention or interference falling short of arrest.⁸⁸ Piddington v Bates was dismissed as an 'aberrant' decision, while Moss was read as a case which properly accepted an unusually lengthy notion of immediacy because of the particular facts of the case and the context in which they arose.⁸⁹

From the perspective of preserving freedom of expression on political issues, Laporte is an obviously welcome development. The legal principle being argued for by the police in Laporte was one which would have lent considerable uncertainty to the substantive scope of lawful police interference with per se peaceful speech and protest and which would likely have had a significant deterrent effect on many citizens' readiness to engage in such activities. But the judgment also has a more general narrowing effect on the polices' common law powers of detention. Laporte also provides us with another example of the courts concluding that the common law has independently developed to a point of substantive compatibility with the Convention. It is perhaps plausible to conclude however that the presence of the HRA on the constitutional landscape has nudged common law development on this point further and faster than would otherwise have been the case.

Under statute

In addition to their limited common law powers, police officers traditionally had a miscellany of narrowly tailored statutory powers which permitted them to detain people without arrest in certain circumstances. A good example of such a power is s 23(2) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, which provides that:

- (2) If a constable has reasonable grounds to suspect that any person is in possession of a controlled drug in contravention of this Act or of any regulations made thereunder, the constable may—
- (a) search that person, and detain him for the purpose of searching him;
 - (b) search any vehicle or vessel in which the constable suspects that the drug may be found, and for that purpose require the person in control of the vehicle or vessel to stop.⁹⁰

⁸⁶ [1961] 1 WLR 162.

⁸⁷ [1985] IRLR 76.

⁸⁸ At para 50.

⁸⁹ At para 51. Moss arose during the miner's strike of the 1980s. The Court upheld the arrest of miners who refused police instructions to abandon their plans to join a demonstration at a colliery several miles from where the arrest took place. Police action in that era had often been attended by extraordinary violence and brutality towards protestors, sometimes in response to similar behaviour by striking miners towards the police. See the collection of essays in Fine B and Millar R (1985) Policing the miners' strike.

⁹⁰ The Firearms Act 1968 gave a similar power to search persons and vehicle for—obviously—guns.

As with powers of arrest, various Acts of Parliament also gave geographically limited and subject specific powers of detention—usually for the purposes of conducting a search—to some police forces. For example, the Metropolitan Police Act 1839 s 66 gave officers in London a power to stop and search people whom it was thought might be carrying stolen goods.

The patchwork nature of these powers was regarded as both inadequate and unhappily uncertain by the Phillips Commission and by Parliament in the early 1980s,⁹¹ which led Parliament to enact a much more wide-ranging power in PACE s 1. This proved a controversial initiative, in part as a matter of principle but also because of the somewhat arbitrary way in which it seemed that existing statutory powers of ‘stop and search’ were being used. Zander notes that the ‘success rate’ (in terms of the numbers of arrests of people stopped) of searches under s 23 in the late 1970s was little more than 20%, while in the same era barely 10% of people stopped under s 66 were subsequently arrested.⁹²

The core of the power lies in s 1(2):

(2) [A] constable—

(a) may search

(i) any person or vehicle:

(ii) anything which is in or on a vehicle,

for stolen or prohibited articles....

(3) This section does not give a constable power to search a person or vehicle or anything in or on a vehicle unless he has reasonable grounds for suspecting that he will find stolen or prohibited articles....

Like powers of arrest under PACE, the stop and search power requires both that the officer has a suspicion that she will find stolen or prohibited goods, and that the suspicion has a reasonable basis. The category of ‘stolen articles’ is self-explanatory. ‘Prohibited articles’ encompasses weapons or items (such as tools) which might be used in carrying out other criminal activities; (burglary and car theft being the obvious examples). In a nod to the ‘Englishman’s home is his castle’ principle, the power did not extend to people or vehicles on land used as a dwelling unless the officer had reasonable grounds to believe that the person did not live in the dwelling or have permission from the occupier to be there, or that the vehicle was not controlled by the occupier or there with her permission.

The s 1(2) power was also subject to provisions in s 2 which—inter alia—required the officer to identify herself to the persons searched, and state what she was searching for and on what grounds she considered the search to be justified. Section 3 then made provision for a record of searches to be made by the officer. A particular concern was that ‘stop and search’ powers—especially under s 23—were used by the police on the basis of empirically unfounded presumptions about the propensity of particular ethnic or cultural groups to be in possession of illegal drugs, and that a similarly unfounded discriminatory ethos would inform the use of the much broader powers granted under PACE.

The second Thatcher government sought to meet or diffuse the controversy on this point by producing a Code of Practice (Code A) on the way in which the powers should be used. The most oft-quoted part of the original Code stressed that an officer’s reasonable suspicion must have both an objective and an individuated basis:

1.6... Reasonable suspicion may exist for example where information has been received such as a description of an article being carried or of a suspected offender; a person is seen acting covertly or warily or attempting to hide something; or a person or a person is carrying ⁹¹ See Zander (1995) op cit pp 3–4.

⁹² Ibid, at 4.

a certain article at an unusual time or in a place where a number of burglaries or thefts are known to have taken place recently...

1.7 Reasonable suspicion can never be supported on the basis of personal factors alone. For example a person's colour, age, hairstyle, or manner of dress, or the fact that he is known to have a previous conviction for possession of an unlawful article, cannot be used alone or in combination with each other as the sole basis on which to search that person. Nor may it be founded on the basis of stereotyped images of certain persons or groups as more likely to be committing offences...

Similar provisions are found at paras 2.1–2.3 of the 2009 version of the code. Notwithstanding these provisions, empirical evidence indicates that stop and search powers under PACE are used disproportionately frequently against non-white persons.⁹³

Both the Act and the Code address the manner of any search in some detail. Para 3.1 of the Code says that: 'Every reasonable effort must be made to reduce to the minimum the embarrassment that a person being searched may experience'. That rather vague objective is buttressed by more explicit prohibitions in the Act itself, such as s 2(9) which provides that the s 1 power does not extend to requiring a person to remove items of clothing other than a coat, jacket or gloves in public.⁹⁴ The Code also suggests (in para 3.3) that officers should make efforts to secure the person's consent to a search rather than have her submit to an involuntary search; that the period of detention should not exceed the time needed for the search, and that the search itself should be conducted expeditiously.

The Act also makes extensive provision (in s 3) for a record to be kept of all searches. The supposed importance of that requirement—which if met would provide both a basis for assessing the propriety of police behaviour in a given case and a body of empirical evidence relating to overall use of the power—is reiterated in para 4 of Code A.

Pre-arrest powers of detention are, in the main, powers of extremely limited chronological duration, often being measured in minutes rather than hours. If exercised in a bona fide manner, they will on many occasions present no more than an irritation or inconvenience to the persons detained. As yet, the ECtHR has not given any clear indication that detention of this sort will necessarily amount to a deprivation of liberty within Art 5. It may of course do so if a particular individual is subjected to such searches on a frequent or regular basis and no evidence of criminal activity is ever uncovered.

II. Deprivation of liberty for 'terrorist' offences

While the ECtHR has consistently held that a 'deprivation' within Art 5 is not limited to detention in a jail in the orthodox sense, it should also be stressed that the scheme of the Convention permits states to derogate from Art 5—and most other provisions of the ECHR—in certain circumstances. The scenario in which Art 15⁹⁵ has most often been invoked in relation to governmental powers of arrest and detention has been when states have felt that their internal security is threatened by the actual or expected activities of 'terrorist' groups. One of the first Art 5 cases with which the ECtHR had to deal was Lawless v Ireland.⁹⁶ Mr Lawless was a member of the IRA, and had been detained without trial for five months by the Irish government. Such a detention would presumptively ⁹³ See Fenwick (2007) op cit pp 1124–1126 and the sources cited therein.

⁹⁴ The Code (para 3.5) but not the Act specifies that a search involving the removal of any other clothing shall not be done by officers of the opposite sex to the person detained unless the person so requests.

⁹⁵ See 'Contingent rather than absolute entitlements', ch 19, p 591 above.

⁹⁶ (1961) 1 EHRR 15.

breach Art 5 since the Irish government had not detained Mr Lawless for any of the purposes identified in Art 5(1), but Ireland argued before the Court that it was entitled under the derogation provisions of Art 15 to permit such actions. Art 15 provides:

1. In time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation any [State] may take measures derogating from its obligations under the Convention to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation...

The Court held in Lawless that the notion of ‘public emergency...’ meant: ‘an exceptional situation of crisis or emergency which affects the whole population and constitutes a threat to the organised life of the community’.⁹⁷ It then accepted that the activities of the IRA in Ireland at that time were sufficiently grave to meet that test.⁹⁸ The ECtHR also concluded that prolonged detention of persons without trial was not a measure that went beyond what was; ‘strictly required by the exigencies of the situation’. Equally significantly, the Court held that when Art 15 was in issue states could expect to enjoy a wide margin of appreciation in respect both of whether an emergency existed and what steps should be taken to address it.

For successive British governments in the post-war era, the political instability of Northern Ireland has until very recently been the major reason for promoting legislation which interferes in an ‘extraordinary’ fashion with individual liberty. Until 1922, Ireland had been part of the United Kingdom, and had been so since the Act of Union of 1800. Following what was in effect revolution and civil war in the early decades of the twentieth century, the Republic of Ireland came into being as a separate nation state in 1922, while the northern parts of Ireland (‘Northern Ireland’) remained part of the United Kingdom. Unlike Scotland and Wales at that time however, Northern Ireland had a form of devolved government, the composition and powers of which were set by the Government of Ireland Act 1922. Parliament also granted the Northern Ireland government (in the Civil Authorities (Special Powers) Act 1922 s 1) a very broad ‘legislative’ authority:

1(1) The [government] shall have power, in respect of persons, matters and things within the jurisdiction of the Government of Northern Ireland, to take all such steps and issue all such orders as may be necessary for preserving the peace and maintaining order,....

Provided that the ordinary course of law and avocations of life and the enjoyment of property shall be interfered with as little as may be permitted by the exigencies of the steps required to be taken under this Act.

Section 1 provided an obviously broad base for the government of Northern Ireland to pursue its preferred policies in respect of suspected ‘terrorists’. From the 1950s onwards, the extent to which the use of those powers diverged from ordinary constitutional presumptions became increasingly apparent.

Powers of arrest and detention in the 1945–1977 era

In much the same way as the Irish government had reacted to IRA terrorism in the mid-1950s, the Northern Irish government in the mid-1950s made several orders under the ⁹⁷ At para 28.

⁹⁸ 28... [T]he existence at the time of a ‘public emergency threatening the life of the nation’ was reasonably deduced by the Irish Government from a combination of several factors, namely: in the first place, the existence in the territory of the Republic of Ireland of a secret army engaged in unconstitutional activities and using violence to attain its purposes; secondly, the fact that this army was also operating outside the territory of the State, thus seriously jeopardising the relations of the Republic of Ireland with its neighbour [ie Northern Ireland]; thirdly the steady and alarming increase in terrorist activities from the autumn of 1956 and throughout the first half of 1957’.

Special Powers Act which were prima facie inconsistent with ECHR Art 5. Regulation 10 empowered a police officer to arrest without a warrant any person for the purposes of interrogation.⁹⁹ The only other precondition for the arrest was that that the officer considered that arresting the person would assist the 'preservation of peace and maintenance of order'. Reg 10 allowed for up to forty-eight hours detention of the arrested person.

Like reg 10, reg 11(1) did not refer to 'terrorism' in an explicit sense. Reg 11 permitted arrest without warrant by a police officer, a member of the armed forces or any other person authorised by the government. There was, in contrast to reg 10, no specified purpose for the arrest. However the arresting officer did have to suspect that the person arrested had acted, was acting or was about to act 'in a manner prejudicial to the preservation of peace or the maintenance of order'. There was no express requirement that the suspicion be reasonable. Reg 11(1) also permitted the detention of an arrested person before charge for up to seventy-two hours. This period could be consequential on the forty-eight hour detention permitted by reg 10, so allowing for a 120 hour (five day detention) in all.

Regulation 11(2) authorised the continuing detention of a person arrested under reg 11(1). No express limit was placed on the duration of the time for which the arrested person could be held before being charged with any offence, although as a matter of practice it seemed that a twenty-eight day maximum was observed.

Reg 12 made provision for a further period of detention (referred to as 'internment'). Reg 12 empowered a government Minister to order the detention of any person who he/she suspected of acting in a manner prejudicial to public order if the Minister considered it expedient to do so. No limit was placed on the length of internment, which would continue for as long as the Minister wished. The scheme of reg 12 was much like that used in reg 18b of the Defence Regulations during WWII. An interned person was entitled to have her detention examined by a Committee of a judge and two non-legal members. However the detainee was not granted any express entitlement to appear before the committee, nor call witnesses nor cross-examine any witnesses appearing for the Minister, nor be legally represented at a hearing. The Committee could recommend, but not order, a person's release.

The compatibility of these measures with Art 5 was not put to the test until the 1970s. The regulations provoked huge controversy in 1971, when in response to an escalation of IRA activities the Northern Ireland government invoked regs 10, 11 and 12 to arrest, detain and intern hundreds of people it suspected of being IRA activists or supporters. Nearly 3,000 people were arrested under reg 10, some 1200 of whom were also subsequently detained under reg 11(1). 1250 detention orders were made under reg 11(2), and almost 800 people were interned under reg 12. This policy appeared to exacerbate rather than calm the political situation. The continuation of both terrorist activities and widespread political unrest prompted Edward Heath's (Conservative) government to promote a Bill, enacted as the Northern Ireland (Temporary Provisions) Act 1972 to—in effect—suspend the existence of Northern Ireland's devolved government and institute a system of 'direct rule' through prerogative powers (taking the form of Orders in Council) exercised by a newly created Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. The reg 10, 11 and 12 powers were retained (with 'internment' being renamed 'interim custody' and 'detention'), but given a new statutory source; the Detention of Terrorists (Northern Ireland) Order. The powers were then enacted as primary legislation within the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1973. The Heath government had taken the view that these powers of arrest were unlikely to meet the requirements of Art 5, and had sought a derogation under Art 15 ECHR. That position was maintained by the Labour government elected in 1974.

⁹⁹ This was essentially a statutory creation of a police power to require persons 'to help police with their inquiries'; ie the power that was held in Kenlin not to exist at common law.

That derogation was sought is perhaps in itself a good indication of the level of political legitimacy—if not legal enforceability—that the ECHR then enjoyed within governmental circles in Britain.¹⁰⁰ The then Irish government (overlooking perhaps the policies pursued by its 1950s predecessor) promptly initiated proceedings against the United Kingdom before the ECtHR, seeking to establish that the powers were incompatible with Art 5 and not justifiable through a derogation under Art 15.

By the time that the matter came before the Court in 1978, everyone detained under the order had either been released or charged with an ‘ordinary’ crime. Nonetheless, some of the persons detained or interned had spent a period of several years in jail without having been convicted of nor even charged with any offence. The United Kingdom government did not contest that the measures breached Art 5, relying instead on the validity of its derogation.

The ECtHR accepted that reasoning. It had no doubt (echoing its view in Lawless) that the level of terrorist violence in Northern Ireland in the 1970s amounted to ‘an emergency threatening the life of the nation’. It was also persuaded that the policies pursued in the order went no further than was ‘strictly required’. The Court noted in particular the scale of the violence,¹⁰¹ the military nature of the IRA, and the difficulties of gathering evidence securing convictions through the ordinary criminal process because of the widespread IRA intimidation of potential witnesses.

Powers of arrest after Ireland v United Kingdom

By the mid-1980s, the level of political violence in Northern Ireland had declined significantly. Parliament had also taken steps to clarify the nature of the extraordinary powers available to the government, not least by expressly framing the problem in issue as ‘terrorism’ rather than using the euphemistic notion of ‘peace and order’. Parliament offered a definition of ‘terrorism’ in s 31(1) of Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 Act:

[T]errorism’ means the use of violence for political ends and includes any use of violence for the purpose of putting the public or any section of the public in fear; ‘terrorist’ means a person who is or has been concerned in the commission or attempted commission of any act of terrorism or in directing, organising or training persons for the purpose of terrorism; ...¹⁰²

The statutory definition of terrorism may have had certain symbolic ends, but in a narrower legal sense it served the instrumental purpose of lending lawful status to police powers that would be regarded as legally excessive (because morally indefensible) in respect of ordinary crimes. Both Conservative and Labour governments in the United Kingdom were sufficiently alarmed by the terrorist activities of extremist political groups (including, but not only the IRA) in Northern Ireland during the 1970s and 1980s to promote Bills which created powers of arrest which gave greater authority to police officers than they possessed in respect of ‘ordinary’ crimes. Provision was made for example in the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 s 11 that: 'Any constable may arrest without warrant any person whom he suspects of being a terrorist'. Thus there was no requirement in the text of s 11 that the officer's suspicion should have a 'reasonable' basis.

¹⁰⁰ The United Kingdom (and Ireland) joined the EC in 1972. While the Convention was not part of the EC’s legal structure, for the United Kingdom to have breached the Convention on such a high profile issue within months of joining the EC would not have played very well with other Member State governments.

¹⁰¹ Cf at (1978) 2 EHRR 25 at para 44: ‘[F]rom August to December 1971... there were a total of 146 persons killed, including 47 members of the security services and 99 civilians, 729 explosions and 1437 shooting incidents’.

¹⁰² That definition was retained throughout the latter part of the twentieth century; cf Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989; ‘[T]errorism means the use of violence for political ends and includes any use of violence for the purpose of putting the public or any section of the public in fear.’

The House of Lords subsequently confirmed in *McKee v Chief Constable for Northern Ireland*¹⁰³ that no such presumption should be read into the provision. The arresting officer's basis for suspicion in McKee was simply that he had been told by his sergeant that Mr McKee was suspected of being a terrorist. The House of Lords unanimously held that this was sufficient to make the arrest lawful:

On the true construction of section 11(1) of the statute, what matters is the state of mind of the arresting officer and of no one else. That state of mind can legitimately be derived from the instruction given to the arresting officer by his superior officer. The arresting officer is not bound and indeed may well not be entitled to question those instructions or to ask upon what information they are founded...

[O]n the true construction of the statute the powers of arrest under section 11 are not qualified by any words of 'reasonableness.' The suspicion has to be honestly held but it need not be a reasonable suspicion as well.¹⁰⁴

The compatibility of that reasoning with Art 5 ECHR came before the ECtHR in Fox, Campbell and Hartley v United Kingdom.¹⁰⁵ The Court concluded that the absence of any requirement at all in s 11 that the belief be reasonable as well as bona fide could not be reconciled with Art 5:

[35] The 'reasonableness' of the suspicion on which an arrest must be based forms an essential part of the safeguard against arbitrary arrest and detention which is laid down in article 5(1) c...[A] 'reasonable suspicion' presupposes the existence of facts or information which would satisfy an objective observer that the person concerned may have committed the offence. What may be regarded as 'reasonable' will however depend upon all the circumstances.

The ECtHR accepted that when terrorism was in issue, the basis of any 'reasonable' suspicion could not fully be disclosed in any court proceedings as this might jeopardise the effectiveness of the police investigation and/or the safety of informants:

[34]... Nevertheless the Court must be enabled to ascertain whether the essence of the safeguard afforded by Article 5(1)(c) has been secured. Consequently the respondent Government has to furnish at least some facts or information capable of satisfying the Court that the arrested person was reasonably suspected of having committed the alleged offence. This is all the more necessary where, as in the present case, the domestic law does not require reasonable suspicion, but sets a lower threshold by merely requiring honest suspicion....

The only basis of suspicion for the detention of the appellants which the government advanced in Fox was that the appellants had previous convictions for terrorist related activities. The ECtHR held that this could not suffice to justify the arrest.

By the time Fox was decided, the mere suspicion test in s 11 had been repealed and replaced with a requirement that the suspicion was 'reasonable' under (what was initially) s 12(1) of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984:

Subject to subsection (2) below, a constable may arrest without warrant a person whom he has reasonable grounds for suspecting to be—....

(b) a person who is or has been concerned in the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism...¹⁰⁶

¹⁰³ [1984] 1 WLR 1358.

¹⁰⁴ Ibid at 1361–1362; per Lord Roskill.

¹⁰⁵ (1990) 13 EHRR 157.

¹⁰⁶ Re-enacted verbatim in the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989.

Some indication as to quite how much (or how little) difference this new form of words made to the nature of police powers of arrest in relation to suspected terrorists was given by the House of Lords in O'Hara v Chief Constable of the RUC.¹⁰⁷ Mr O'Hara had been arrested by a police officer acting on the orders of a senior officer, following a murder that was presumed to be a terrorist act. The sole basis for the officer's belief that Mr O'Hara was a terrorist was a briefing given by the senior officer concerned. The trial judge had characterised the evidential basis of the officer's belief as 'scanty'.¹⁰⁸ A unanimous House of Lords held that even 'scanty' evidence could suffice for these purposes. The s 12 test would not be satisfied if an officer simply followed an order to arrest a person without forming the view that the person might indeed be guilty of a terrorist offence.¹⁰⁹ However, the notion of 'reasonable' was to be given a broad, Wednesbury-type meaning:

The information acted on by the arresting officer need not be based on his own observations, as he is entitled to form a suspicion based on what he has been told. His reasonable suspicion may be based on information which has been given to him anonymously or it may be based on information, perhaps in the course of an emergency, which turns out later to be wrong. As it is the information which is in his mind alone which is relevant however, it is not necessary to go on to prove what was known to his informant or that any facts on which he based his suspicion were in fact true. The question whether it provided reasonable grounds for the suspicion depends on the source of his information and its context, seen in the light of the whole surrounding circumstances.¹¹⁰

A briefing given by a senior officer would presumptively satisfy this test. The House of Lords also considered that this understanding of the law was consistent with the view of Art 5 ECHR advanced by the ECtHR in Fox. That assumption was subsequently approved by the ECtHR in O'Hara v United Kingdom.¹¹¹ Echoing the position adopted by Lord Devlin in Chong Fook Kam,¹¹² the ECtHR stressed that the evidential threshold necessary to justify an arrest could fall substantially short of that required to justify a charge against the arrested person.¹¹³ The Court was also satisfied by the bona fides of the UK government's submissions that the information which underlay the briefing that led to the arrest had come from four separate informers, all of whom were regarded as reliable. Furthermore, the Court reiterated its observation in Fox that Art 5 did not require States to disclose the identities of informants in terrorist cases.

The ECtHR's seal of approval for the principle inherent in s 12 and its application on the facts of O'Hara goes some substantial way to legitimising the moral preferences expressed by Parliament in the PT(TP)A s 12. But the legislation itself and its construction by the domestic courts are not beyond criticism.

The House of Lords' judgment in O'Hara was drawn upon in both Cumming and Hough as a guide to the meaning of reasonable suspicion in PACE s 24. That might be ¹⁰⁷ [1997] AC 286, [1997] 2 WLR 1, [1997] 1 All ER 129.

¹⁰⁸ Rather surprisingly, Mr O'Hara's lawyers had chosen not to cross-examine the officer as to the contents of the briefing.

¹⁰⁹ What Lord Steyn referred to as the 'subjective' element of the test.
¹¹⁰ Per Lord Hope; [1997] AC 286 at 298. This being the 'objective' element of the test. Lord Steyn agreed that Parliament had not required much judicial scrutiny of the objective element: '[A] constable must be given some basis for a request to arrest somebody under a provision such as section 12(1), e.g. a report from an informer'. [1977] AC 286 at 294.

¹¹¹ (2002) 34 EHRR 32.

¹¹² Fn 35 above.

¹¹³ At para 36; '[T]he standard imposed by Article 5(1)(c) does not presuppose that the police have sufficient evidence to bring charges at the time of arrest. The object of questioning during detention under sub-paragraph (c) of Article 5(1) is to further the criminal investigation by way of confirming or dispelling the concrete suspicion grounding the arrest. Thus facts which raise a suspicion need not be of the same level as those necessary to justify a conviction, or even the bringing of a charge...'

thought to be an unfortunate use of precedent. While the words used in s 24 and s 12 of the PT(TP)A were the same, they were found in statutes which had very different purposes. The matters before the courts in Hough and Cumming were morally mundane instances of everyday criminality—elements of the ordinary business of law enforcement. O'Hara—in contrast—occurred in the realm of the morally extraordinary.

Conceding—for the sake of argument—that a potent terrorist threat or state of war does indeed exist, the supposition that Parliament should afford government officials greater authority in countering those threats than it grants to those officials in respect of 'ordinary' crime is unproblematic. Legislators might therefore be properly criticised for using identical or very similar textual formulae to express their preferences as to the extent of governmental powers to address those two very different scenarios. And courts which construed such powers on the basis of the legislative text without regard to the text's context might be thought to be engaging in an overly formalistic approach to the task of statutory construction.¹¹⁴

Powers of detention after Ireland v United Kingdom

Although no government used the power of internment in Northern Ireland after 1975, Parliament underlined the distinction between 'ordinary' crimes and 'terrorist' activity by enacting s 12(4)–(5) of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984. This provided that:

- (4) A person arrested under this section shall not be detained for more than forty eight hours after his arrest; but the Secretary of State may, in any particular case, extend the period of forty eight hours by a period or periods specified by him.
- (5) Any such further period or periods shall not exceed five days in all.

Section 12(4)–(5) therefore extended, by two days, the period of post-arrest detention previously available under the Detention of Terrorists (Northern Ireland) Order. Given that the scale of the terrorism problem in Northern Ireland had diminished since the early 1970s, the extension of the time period might seem surprising.

It might also be recalled that PACE, enacted in the same year as s 12(4)–(5), imposed a ninety-six hour maximum period of pre-charge detention on arrested persons. PACE also required that detention beyond thirty-six hours had to be approved by a court. The requirement of judicial supervision is a clear manifestation in a practical sense of the theoretical principle of the separation of powers: Parliament has recognised that detention for more than thirty-six hours is such a grave interference with individual liberty that it is not appropriate to place such a power solely in the hands of the executive branch of government. A similar provision was applicable in Northern Ireland in respect of non-terrorist offences.¹¹⁵

However the seven day period authorised by s 12(4)–(5) of the PT(TP)A 1984 does grant that power exclusively to the Home Secretary, and expressly excluded any role for the courts. It appeared that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland routinely granted extensions when asked to do so. Between 1984 and 1987 an extension was refused in barely 2% of cases.¹¹⁶

¹¹⁴ Although if one's concern was to maximize individual autonomy and constrain governmental power, one might welcome judicial use of interpretive presumptions formulated in the context of 'ordinary' police powers to define the meaning of anti-terrorist provisions.

¹¹⁵ Magistrates Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 Art 131.

¹¹⁶ Brogan v United Kingdom (1989) 11 EHRR 117 para 17.

The use of the s 12 powers of post-arrest, pre-charge detention came before the ECtHR in Brogan v United Kingdom.¹¹⁷ The main submission made by the applicants, who had been detained for periods of between four and six days, was that s 12 was inconsistent with the requirement of Art 5(3) ECHR which provides that every person arrested: 'shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power....'. There was no Art 15 derogation in force at this time. The United Kingdom therefore argued before the Court that the substantially longer period of detention applicable to 'terrorist' arrestees than to persons arrested for ordinary crimes was a necessary response to the difficulties of evidence gathering in respect of terrorist offences, and to the impracticality of revealing in court details of the suspicions which underlay the arrest. The ECtHR was not persuaded by this argument. It concluded that the concept of 'promptly' demanded that arrested persons be brought before a court very quickly,¹¹⁸ and that the difficulties cited by the United Kingdom government were not sufficient to justify so prolonged a period of detention.¹¹⁹

The presumption that anti-terrorism legislation enacted in the 1970s and 1980s imposed 'extraordinary' limitations on individual liberty is underlined by the fact that the Acts invariably included a requirement that their continued applicability was dependent upon annual approval by the two Houses of Parliament, although in practical terms one should perhaps not expect that governments would face exacting scrutiny when seeking such approval. More significantly perhaps, the PT(TP)A 1979 and the PT(TP)A 1984 were each enacted only for a five-year period, a proviso which compelled any government which wished to retain such powers to take on the political challenge of pushing a new Bill through the Commons and Lords.

Powers of arrest and detention in the post-1977 era

David Feldman has latterly referred to a problem of 'legislative creep' within criminal justice policy generally and anti-terrorist measures particularly:

The law of criminal procedure in England and Wales is full of powers originally granted to deal with very serious offences... which come to be normalised, or regarded as equally applicable to other offences, over the course of five, ten or twenty years.¹²⁰

It might also be suggested that a second and third dimension of this phenomenon are, respectively, a government predilection to promote (and a parliamentary predilection to approve) Bills which both expand the definition of 'very serious offences' and also grant evermore substantial powers to government to address them.

In 2000, Parliament enacted a Blair government Bill (as the Terrorism Act 2000) which contained a notably more far-reaching definition of 'terrorism' than had previously been used:

1.–Terrorism: interpretation

- (1) In this Act 'terrorism' means the use or threat of action where—
 - (a) the action falls within subsection (2),
 - (b) the use or threat is designed to influence the government or to intimidate the public or a section of the public, and ¹¹⁷ (1989) 11 EHRR 117.

¹¹⁸ The French language version of the ECHR uses 'aussitôt' in Art 5(3), the English translation of which would be 'immediately' or 'as soon as possible'.

¹¹⁹ The Court expressly declined (at para 60) to indicate what maximum period of detention was permissible for 'ordinary' offences.

¹²⁰ (2006) op cit at p 370.

- (c) the use or threat is made for the purpose of advancing a political, religious or ideological cause.
- (2) Action falls within this subsection if it—
 - (a) involves serious violence against a person,
 - (b) involves serious damage to property,
 - (c) endangers a person's life, other than that of the person committing the action,
 - (d) creates a serious risk to the health or safety of the public or a section of the public, or
 - (e) is designed seriously to interfere with or seriously to disrupt an electronic system.
- (3) The use or threat of action falling within subsection (2) which involves the use of firearms or explosives is terrorism whether or not subsection (1)(b) is satisfied.

Since Parliament has also chosen to give s 1 extra-territorial effect,¹²¹ it is difficult to disagree with Professor Walker's observation that: 's.1 is significantly broader than its predecessor'.¹²² The broadening of the definition per se is per se of limited intrinsic significance. The importance of the breadth of the definition lies in its consequential application as a justification for the exercise of governmental powers against 'terrorists' (actual or suspected) which could not be used in respect of 'non-terrorist' activities. To put the matter perhaps rather simplistically, the grant of quite extraordinary powers of arrest and detention to police officers in respect of 'terrorist' activities would be of minimal importance if 'terrorism' itself were defined in extremely narrow terms, since very few people would fall within the 'terrorist' test.¹²³ In contrast, even a minor extension of police powers of arrest and detention would represent a substantial threat to orthodox notions of individual liberty if the definition of 'terrorism' which permitted the use of those powers was very broad.

The 'temporary' nature of the anti-terrorism legislation of the 1970s–1990s was also brought to an end by the Terrorism Act 2000, which has overhauled, extended and given 'permanent' status to governmental powers to interfere with the liberty of persons suspected of involvement with terrorist activity. The Act may be seen in part as a legislative response to one of the worst terrorist actions in Northern Ireland, the Omagh bombing in 1998. However, the issue of the extent of the proper extent of governmental powers in relation to terrorism had been the subject of a bipartisan inquiry chaired by the law lord, Lord Lloyd in the mid-1990s, and much of the Act gave legal force to the inquiry's recommendations.¹²⁴

In respect of powers of arrest without a warrant, s 41 retained the formula that a police officer may arrest a person whom she 'reasonably suspects to be a terrorist'. Section 41

¹²¹ Per s 1(4):

- (a) 'action' includes action outside the United Kingdom,
- (b) a reference to any person or to property is a reference to any person, or to property, wherever situated,
- (c) a reference to the public includes a reference to the public of a country other than the United Kingdom, and
- (d) 'the government' means the government of the United Kingdom, of a part of the United Kingdom or of a country other than the United Kingdom.

¹²² See the thoughtful discussion of the way in which terrorism is defined in Walker C (2007) 'The legal definition of terrorism in United Kingdom law and beyond' Public Law 331. It is perhaps a trite point to note that many 'terrorists' have subsequently come to be regarded as freedom fighters and great statesmen. Madison would have been a terrorist within the terms of the 2000 Act, as presumably would Nelson Mandela and Menachem Begin. Closer to home—in the chronological and jurisdictional senses—the current Deputy First Minister of Northern Ireland, Martin McGuinness, was for many years regarded as a 'terrorist' by successive British governments.

¹²³ It would of course be very significant to persons who did fall within the test.

¹²⁴ Lord Lloyd (1996) Inquiry into legislation against terrorism.

and Schedule 8 of the Act permit pre-charge detention of arrested persons for up to fourteen days, but—consistent with the ECtHR’s interpretation of Art 5 in Brogan—detention beyond forty-eight hours must be authorised by a court. The Blair government sought to justify the substantially increased maximum period of detention by suggesting that modern day terrorists were far more sophisticated in concealing their activities than their predecessors had been.¹²⁵

The primary source of terrorist activity in the United Kingdom at that time continued to be various extremist political groups in Northern Ireland. That position was shortly however to change. In his speech to the Labour Party conference in October 2001, delivered a month after the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington DC, then Prime Minister Blair painted an apocalyptic picture of a western world under imminent threat of further terrorist outrages, a danger that would have to lead to profound changes in our views of human rights in general and personal liberty in particular:

It was the events of September 11 that marked a turning point in history, where we confront the dangers of the future and assess the choices facing humankind....

Here in this country and in other nations round the world, laws will be changed, not to deny basic liberties but to prevent their abuse and protect the most basic liberty of all: freedom from terror.¹²⁶

From 2001, the Blair and Brown governments sought substantially to increase the government’s powers to detain suspected terrorists prior to the persons concerned being charged with any offence. In 2005, the government promoted a Bill which allow for ninety (90) days pre-charge detention of terrorist suspects. Such a long period of detention was considered inappropriate both by opposition parties and a sufficiently large number of backbench Labour MPs that—as noted in chapter five¹²⁷—the Blair governments suffered their first defeat in the Commons. Both houses did however approve a twenty-eight day limit, doubling the previous maximum period. The policy was enacted as s 23 of the Terrorism Act 2006.

That the bombings of 7 July 2005 are the only significant ‘Al- Qaeda’ related terrorist attack carried out in the United Kingdom since 2001 would suggest either that the Blair governments were indeed much exaggerating the threat and/or that the twenty-eight day period of detention is sufficient for the police and security services to establish if detained suspects are indeed involved in terrorist activities. Gordon Brown’s Labour government nonetheless thought it necessary to become embroiled in an intense political battle early in 2008 in both houses and in the media over its proposal to increase the period of post-arrest detention of suspected ‘terrorists’ from a maximum of twenty-eight days to forty-two days. The purported rationale underlying the proposal was that modern day terrorists were so sophisticated in their operation that twenty-eight days could not suffice for evidence gathering purposes. The moral premise in issue here—which Mr Brown seemed unwilling to acknowledge—was that it was preferable to take the chance that ‘innocent’ people be detained for a much longer period than risk ‘guilty’ people not being charged. The passage of the measure in the Commons again produced the unlikely spectacle of the Conservative Party opposing the measure on the basis that it interfered excessively with civil liberties. Few backbench Labour MPs were prepared to vote against the government on the issue, a state of affairs which rather weakens Cowley’s recent arguments that Labour MPs have latterly been much more independently minded than ¹²⁵ For a forceful critique of the Act and its rationale see Fenwick (2007) op cit pp 1146–1148.

¹²⁶ <<http://www.guardian.co.uk/politics/2001/oct/02/labourconference.labour6>>.

¹²⁷ See ‘A more assertive and independent house?’, ch 5, pp 153–154 above.

they were in the past.¹²⁸ The proposal was subsequently rejected in the House of Lords, at which point the government accepted defeat.¹²⁹ It seems unlikely that the forty-two day detention period would be regarded by the ECtHR as compatible with Art 5 ECHR, or indeed by the domestic courts, which have taken a reasonably rigorous approach to other 'extraordinary' legislative initiatives promoted by the Blair government.

Indefinite detention without charge, trial or conviction under the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001

Mr Liversidge was lawfully detained—but not arrested, charged or convicted—because the Home Secretary presumably took the view that to leave Mr Liversidge at liberty might present a threat to the successful prosecution of the war. We will likely never know whether there was any credible basis for Sir John Anderson's evident suspicions about Mr Liversidge. But we can safely assume that 'the life of the nation' has never been in graver jeopardy than it was in 1940. We might accept—but should perhaps do so with some scepticism—that the threat to life, limb and property in Britain posed by 'Al Qaeda' terrorist activity in the early years of the twentieth century was sincerely perceived by Ministers in the Blair government to be substantial. We might also accept—with more scepticism—that the perception was well-founded. But however severe the threat, it was clearly de minimis compared to with the dangers posed by German military forces during World War II, and might strike many observers as distinctly less substantial than that posed by IRA activities in the 1970s and 1980s.¹³⁰

The Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 was nonetheless rushed through Parliament in the aftermath of the September 11 bombings in New York and Washington DC, a context in which members of the government, vociferously assisted by much of the mass media, painted a picture of the United Kingdom as being at immediate risk of large scale terrorist attacks. Faced with what were apparently extraordinary times, Parliament accepted the government's invitation to enact extraordinary measures. That the Blair government exaggerated the dangers and deliberately fanned media hysteria on the issue seems entirely likely. What is beyond dispute, however, is that any suggestion that careful consideration was given by MPs to the measures (the Act had 129 sections) contained in the Bill is utterly implausible.¹³¹

The Act included new powers of detention of persons who had not been charged with nor convicted of any crime. But in contrast to the situation which pertained in World War II (in respect of suspected German sympathisers) and in the 1970s (in respect of suspected Irish terrorists), these powers would fall to be measured by the domestic courts against the requirements of the ECHR and the HRA 1998.

The provision before the House of Lords in *A v Secretary of State for the Home Department*¹³² was s 23 of the Act. Section 23 empowered the Home Secretary to detain without criminal charge for an indefinite period any foreign national whom the Home Secretary certified to be a terrorist if the person did not consent to being deported to his home country. The policy—which rested in part on a presumption that the government would not be able to prove that suspects had committed any criminal offence—was prima facie incompatible with Art 5(1) ECHR. The government therefore sought to avoid the possibility of a declaration of incompatibility in respect of s 23 by claiming that the threat ¹²⁸ See 'A more assertive and independent house?', ch 5, pp 153–154 above.

¹²⁹ See The Guardian 13 October 2008.

¹³⁰ See fn 102 above.

¹³¹ A point which might be borne in mind when considering the propriety of domestic courts' development of the 'deference' principle in HRA cases; see 'II. The notion of 'deference' to legislative judgment, ch 22, pp 672–675 above.

¹³² [2004] UKHL 56, [2005] 2 AC 68.

posed by terrorists was such as to justify a derogation under Art 15 ECHR from Art 5 ECHR, on the basis that the United Kingdom was faced by a ‘public emergency threatening the life of the nation’.¹³³

The House of Lords—sitting as a nine-judge court to emphasise the importance of the case—accepted (over a notable dissent by Lord Hoffman) that the requisite ‘public emergency’ existed. However, it also held that s 23 did not meet the additional requirement in Art 15 that any derogation be limited to ‘the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation.’ The Court considered that s 23 clearly failed to satisfy a key element of the proportionality test. The supposed purpose of s 23 was to protect the public against terrorist attacks. But since a putative detainee could in effect free herself from detention by agreeing to be deported, the Court understandably reasoned that s 23 was not a rational means to achieve that purpose. The notion that a ‘terrorist’ would be unable to plot terrorist attacks against targets in Britain from her/his homeland and then to re-enter the country and carry out the attacks and/or use other individuals to do so was clearly risible. The Court also concluded that s 23 breached Art 14’s prohibition on nationality based discrimination. Assuming there was indeed a real emergency in existence, there was no convincing basis for assuming that terrorist attacks would not be planned or carried out by British nationals.¹³⁴ Given that s 23 lent itself to only one Convention non-compliant meaning, no issue arose as to the use of s 3 of the HRA. The Court therefore issued a declaration of incompatibility.¹³⁵

The judgment was (predictably) denounced in some media and political quarters as an affront to democracy. As has been suggested repeatedly in this book, the presumption that any political value favoured by elected law-makers is ‘democratic’ simply because its makers are elected is at best grossly over-simplistic and at worst dangerously misleading. Any sophisticated notion of democratic governance would identify two major objections to s 23. The first would relate to the rushed and truncated nature of the deliberative process within the Commons and Lords as to the merits of the proposed Act. The second would focus on the ludicrously ineffective and grossly discriminatory substantive provisions. If one’s understanding of democratic governance embraces the proposition that politicians should be prevented from giving legal effect to policies which impose grotesque restrictions on basic liberties, or even the more modest proposition that it should be very difficult for politicians to achieve such results, s 23 was an obscenity and in saying so the House of Lords was upholding rather than undermining notions of democratic governance.

While the judgment of the House of Lords is per se significant as an indicator of the way in which the HRA has led the courts to feel they may now appropriately venture into areas of political controversy which might previously have been regarded as having a demonstrably ‘non-justiciable character’, it may be that we should attach even more importance to the way in which the government responded to the judgment. The government did not choose, as it was legally entitled to do, to proceed on the basis that s 23 should remain in effect notwithstanding its incompatibility with the Convention. Instead, the government ¹³³ The mechanism by which the HRA gives domestic effect to a derogation is per s 14 by empowering the government to issue a ‘derogation order’—which is strictly speaking a statutory instrument. A prima facie breach of a Convention Right loses its unlawful domestic nature if the derogation is in force.

¹³⁴ Indeed, the only Al-Qaeda related terrorist attack in Britain—the bombings of July 2005—were carried out by four British citizens.

¹³⁵ See further Dwyer D (2005) ‘Rights brought home’ LQR 359; Feldman D (2005) ‘Proportionality and discrimination in anti-terrorism legislation’ Cambridge LJ 270; Shah S (2005) ‘The UK’s anti-terror legislation and the House of Lords: the first skirmish’ Human Rights LR 403.

promoted—and Parliament enacted—a new provision which would replace s 23 with a less draconian 'control order' applicable to nationals and non-nationals which restricted the movements of suspected terrorists.

'Control orders' under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005

The episode continued when the compatibility of the 'control order' regime with Art 5 came before the courts in 2006 and 2007. The powers were enacted in the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005. A 'control order' was defined in s 1 as a measure which placed restrictions on individual autonomy in respect of such matters as—inter alia—her place of residence, the hours during which she may leave her residence, where she may travel, whom she might meet and talk to, and her access to communication and information media. The Act distinguished between 'derogating' and 'non-derogating' control orders. The former may generally only be imposed by a court which is satisfied that there is some evidentiary basis for believing the individual concerned to be involved in terrorist activity, that the order is necessary to protect the public, and that an Art 15 state of emergency exists. A non-derogating order, in contrast, may be imposed by the Home Secretary if she has reasonable cause to believe the individual is involved in terrorist activity and the order is necessary to protect the public. In neither case is it necessary that the person subject to the order has been charged with or even arrested for any offence, although breach of an order is itself a crime, punishable with up to five years imprisonment.

The control order at issue in *Secretary of State for the Home Department v JJ and others*¹³⁶ was a non-derogating order that required JJ to live in a designated one bedroom flat, and to remain there other than between 10 am and 4 pm, during which time he was permitted to go out within a prescribed area. He was not permitted access to a mobile phone or the internet, and could only receive visitors approved by the Home Office.

At trial, the primary matter before the Court was whether the restrictions imposed upon JJ amounted to a deprivation of liberty. Sullivan J had considered that the combined effect of these restrictions was sufficiently close to detention in an open prison to amount to a deprivation of liberty within Art 5.¹³⁷ That conclusion was subsequently upheld both in the Court of Appeal¹³⁸ and (albeit only by a three to two majority) in the House of Lords. The majority view—most fully expressed by Lord Bingham—was wholly supportive of Sullivan J's reasoning and conclusion. In a related appeal, however, the House of Lords was unanimous in holding that a similar order which imposed only twelve rather than eighteen hours per day of house arrest, would not engage Art 5.

Rather than resort to the type of vehement attack on the judiciary sometimes favoured by some of her predecessors, the then Home Secretary Jacqui Smith responded quietly to the judgment in JJ by modifying the period of house arrest in the order, thereby bringing the policy within what the House of Lords had indicated were acceptable Art 5 parameters.

¹³⁶ [2007] UKHL 45, [2008] 1 AC 385, [2008] 1 All ER 613. JJ is one of several linked cases dealing with control order issues. See also Secretary of State for the Home Department v MB [2007] UKHL 46, [2008] 1 AC 440, [2007] 1 All ER 657; Secretary of State for the Home Department v E [2007] UK HL, [2008] 1 AC 499, [2008] 1 All ER 699.

¹³⁸ [2006] EWCA Civ 1141, [2007] QB 446.

¹³⁷ [2006] EWHC 1623 Admin.

Conclusion

It is possible that—if the HRA had not been enacted—domestic courts would have identified some flaw in the way that the powers of indefinite detention created by the Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 were used by the Home Secretary, and that particular detention orders would have been found unlawful. It is also possible that senior judges would have taken the opportunity in judgments concerning s 23 to have made comments as to the difficulty of reconciling the provision with traditional ideas of constitutional propriety. Either or both eventualities would have to some extent undermined the legitimacy of the power. Neither would have done so however to the extent of the declaration of incompatibility that the HRA enabled the House of Lords to issue. Whether the government's response to A—and thereafter to JJ—represented a sincere desire by Ministers to remain within the confines of a more tightly drawn notion of governance according to the rule of law or was rather attributable to a fear of the political consequences of ignoring the House of Lords' rulings is perhaps of little importance. The most significant point to be taken from the episode is that a government with majority support in Parliament for policies which the domestic courts held to be inconsistent with the ECHR chose to respect those judicially identified limits on the legitimate (but not, of course, the legal) boundaries of legislative power.

The constitutional landscape thus far marked out by the HRA is clearly complicated, and is likely to become more so the longer that the Act remains in force. But it would be very premature to regard the Human Rights Act as having had in any systemic sense a revolutionary effect in the sphere of constitutional law. The crucial point to be laboured (perhaps painfully) here is that the HRA does not—and makes no attempt to—endow the Convention with the status of a constituent framework of political values, existing beyond the reach of reform or repeal by a simple legislative majority. The protection offered to civil liberties by the Human Rights Act is in legal terms ephemeral and (at this point in time) in political terms precarious. Its substance may be promptly modified by whichever political faction can command even a bare Commons and Lords majority. As suggested in chapter twenty-two, some Labour Ministers and MPs were not averse to castigating judges who produced judgments which upheld ECHR principles, and both Prime Minister Blair and senior members of his cabinet occasionally intimated that the Act should be amended. Prominent members of the Conservative party were more forthright in expressing their dislike of the Act,¹³⁹ and had the party secured an outright majority in the Commons at the 2010 general election a Bill to abolish or restrict the scope of the Act may very well have been promoted by the government.

Rights recognised as 'fundamental' at common law prior to the HRA coming into force are obviously no less ephemeral than those contained in legislation. The Human Rights Act does not even attempt to embrace the basic moral principles that, over two hundred years ago, Jefferson, Madison and their colleagues articulated in the US Constitution: namely that, as Madison put it, in the United States: 'the censorial power is in the people over the government, and not in the government over the people'.¹⁴⁰ ¹⁴⁰ A helpful guide to Madison's views on the point are offered by his speech in the House of Representatives on June 1789, when he spoke to move adoption of the First Amendment to the Constitution; see Fisher L (3rd edn, 1996) Constitutional law vol 2, pp 551–555).

¹³⁹ See for example The Guardian, 23 August 2004 ('Tories may repeal Human Rights Act'; The Guardian, 12 May 2006 ('Cameron calls for repeal of Human Rights Act'); The Independent, 13 May 2006 ('Cameron threatens to scrap Human Rights Act').

Once made, this observation raises a larger question. It takes little reflection to lead one to ask whether the greatest threat to the pervasive, long-term respect for human rights in modern British society stems from the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty. The final chapter of this book thus returns to the question of whether it is possible in legal terms to entrench fundamental values within the UK's constitution, and, if so, which values should be chosen and how should they be protected.

Suggested further reading

Academic commentary

Feldman (2006) 'Human rights, terrorism and risk; the roles of politician and judges' Public Law 364

Walker C (2007) 'The legal definition of terrorism in United Kingdom law and beyond' Public Law 33

Munro (1981) 'Detention after arrest' Crim LR 802

Case law and legislation

R (Laporte) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire [2006] UKHL 55, [2007] 2 AC 105

Ireland v United Kingdom (1978) 2 EHRR 25

Guzzardi v Italy (1980) 3 EHRR 333

R v Howell [1982] QB 416

Steel and others v United Kingdom [1999] 28 EHRR 603

Home Office (2004) Policing: modernising police powers to meet community needs

Albert v Lavin [1982] AC 546

Christie v Leachinsky [1947] AC 573

Chapter 24

Conclusion

The question of constitutional reform is in itself worthy of book length examination. This final chapter does not offer a detailed prescription of the ways in which the United Kingdom's constitution should be structured. Its concern rather is briefly to address the issue which is perhaps of most interest to constitutional lawyers, and which logically precedes any discussion of the substance of truly radical constitutional reform. That issue is whether it is legally possible to entrench legislation in a manner which safeguards it from repeal by the traditional 'simple majority in Commons and Lords plus Royal Assent' formula; and, if such a legal device can be found, under what political circumstances might it legitimately be employed?

I. Entrenchment of fundamental law re-visited

As suggested in chapter two, it now seems rather less difficult to construct a legal argument supporting the idea of entrenched legislation than it was in the 1950s, when the Harris and McCormick cases triggered a rash of interest in the possibility of finding domestic limitations to Parliament's evidently sovereign legal status. The orthodox Diceyan view, so persuasively restated by Professor Wade in 1955, need not be repeated here. The argument that such orthodoxy need no longer be construed as binding rests on several premises, both formalist and functionalist in nature. Some of these were evident but underdeveloped when Wade and indeed Dicey himself outlined the traditionalist viewpoint; others have emerged far more recently, as a result both of modern political history and contemporary judicial practice.

Issues of legality and legitimacy

The first issue we might address is a problem raised by linguistic imprecision, an imprecision that has in turn produced considerable conceptual confusion. The conceptual confusion may arise if one fails to distinguish between two quite different routes to achieve the same moral/political ends. If one should somehow succeed in legally 'binding' future Parliaments to respect particular values, then one has necessarily succeeded in entrenching those values. But one need not necessarily have to achieve the former result to bring about the latter consequences; it may be that one can now entrench legislation without having to destroy 'Parliament's' legal sovereignty. This argument assumes that entrenchment need not place any limits at all on 'Parliament's' legislative capacities; rather it need only convince the High Court that it has—if invited to do so by Parliament in a particular political context—an appropriate role to play in controlling the internal proceedings of the Commons and the Lords and the prerogative powers of the Monarch.

A different way of analysing the problem

To illustrate this argument, we might begin with a hypothetical entrenching provision, contained in a ‘Constitution Act’ passed in the ordinary manner. The Constitution Act specifies that a statutory provision (whether enacted prior or subsequent to the Constitution Act) affecting an entrenched value detailed in the Constitution Act (which would include the entrenching provision itself) would have legal force only if the court was satisfied that the following criteria had been met:

1. the Act concerned had begun its parliamentary passage in the Commons;
2. the Commons had voted for it by a two thirds majority at third reading before sending it to the Lords;
3. the Lords had voted for it by a two thirds majority at third reading before sending it for the Royal Assent;
4. the Monarch had granted the Royal Assent only after establishing that the requisite majorities had been achieved in both houses.

We may then assume that a subsequent ‘Parliament’ purports to pass an ‘Act’ by the traditional simple majority plus Royal Assent formula that contains terms breaching the provisions of the Constitution Act.

It is tempting to conclude simply that a citizen who asked the court to obey the Constitution Act and disapply or invalidate a later statute would be asking the judiciary to override the wishes of Parliament, which had seemingly enacted the subsequent provision. However, steps 1–3 of the entrenchment process can be analysed in a rather different way. They could be seen as merely asking the courts to ‘question’ the proceedings adopted in each house in respect of a Bill. Step 4, in contrast, could be seen as simply requiring the courts to undertake the now uncontentious task of reviewing an exercise of the prerogative.¹

The argument assumes that ‘Parliament’ has the legal capacity to regulate the powers of its component parts—that the Commons, the Lords, and the Monarch as parts of Parliament are legally inferior to Parliament itself. If this view is accepted, it seemingly follows that Parliament may enact legislation placing specific limits on the legal competence of either house or of the Monarch. The hypothetical Constitution Act essentially provides that the Commons would be acting ultra vires its powers in sending a Bill which infringed the Constitution Act to the Lords if the Bill had not attracted a two-thirds majority; similarly, the House of Lords would be acting ultra vires in sending that Bill for the royal assent if it was not supported by that enhanced majority of peers; while the Monarch would be acting ultra vires if she assented to such a measure without having established that the requisite majorities in each house had been achieved.

There is similarly a need here for precision in describing what the High Court would be doing if it declined to disapply a subsequent statute which infringed the Constitution Act, on the basis of the orthodox theory that no Parliament can bind its successors. In refusing to disapply such a statute, the courts would in effect be concluding that the privileges of each house (steps 1–3)² and/or privilege plus the royal prerogative (steps 1–4) and/or the royal prerogative alone (step 4) outrank legislation in the constitution's legal hierarchy.

¹ It is perhaps feasible to argue that the granting of the Royal Assent is itself a ‘proceeding in Parliament’. This would however seem implausible, given that privilege and Art 9 emerged as devices to protect the two houses against the Monarch. But for the purposes of this argument, the legal source of the Royal Assent is irrelevant.

This rationale would draw us into a rather bizarre series of conclusions. It was suggested in chapter two that the orthodox view does indeed recognise one limit on Parliament's sovereign authority—namely that it cannot bind itself and its successors. But the orthodox view seemingly also requires us to accept three further constraints to Parliament's omnipotent legal power—namely that it cannot remove the Commons and Lords' powers to approve a Bill by simple majority vote, nor attach conditions to the Monarch's legal capacity to give the Royal Assent. To accept one limit to a nominally unlimited power might perhaps be accommodated as an inconvenient necessity: to accept four suggests that the integrity of the central argument is seriously flawed.

It is most unfortunate that the common elision in constitutional parlance of Parliament itself and the two houses of Parliament (but particularly the Commons) has so thoroughly pervaded analysis of the question of sovereignty as well as the question of privilege.³ A perfect example of this is provided by Lord Simon's previously quoted observation in Pickin,⁴ that the exclusive right of each house to control its own proceedings is a 'concomitant' of the sovereignty of Parliament. That view is however fundamentally misconceived, as a matter both of simple logic and of constitutional history. To allow each house an unfettered and apparently unfetterable power to control its own proceedings is not a concomitant of parliamentary sovereignty, but a blatant denial of it. By suggesting that each house has such an 'exclusive power', Lord Simon is setting privilege above both common law and statute. One thus finds oneself facing the oxymoronic proposition that Parliament possesses its legal sovereignty not because it cannot bind itself and its successors, but because it cannot bind its component (and hence inferior) parts.

The suggestion that one might entrench legislation in Britain by placing limits on the powers of the respective houses of Parliament rather than on those of Parliament itself is not, it should be stressed, a novel idea. Heuston had advanced a very similar thesis in 1964.⁵ Heuston chose to support his argument with reference to the litigation in Commonwealth countries which we discussed in chapter two. This might be thought to weaken both the legal and political force of his thesis. As Wade observed in 1955, there is little point in invoking this case law in the British context.⁶ The entrenchment formulae in issue in Trethowan and Harris each enjoyed a certain, unambiguous legal and political status because they were 'created' by a British statute which the 'peoples' of New South Wales and South Africa had accepted as expressing their preferred constituent moral values.⁷ Since the British Parliament has no 'creator' in this sense,⁸ we might assume (as traditionalists always have) that the 'manner and form' principle cannot be applied here.

But this involves perhaps too ready a dismissal of the Trethowan rationale. Heuston's argument has also been offered more recent support by Paul Craig, in a thesis premised on a discussion of basic, indigenous constitutional principles rather than a speculative ² Wauchope and Pickin might thus be reclassified as cases which did not concern the sovereignty of Parliament at all, but the non-justiciability of the privileges of the two houses. That analysis gains additional force when we recall that the 'rules' in issue in those cases were the internal rules of the Commons, not rules imposed on the house by statute.

³ See 'Conclusion', ch 8, p 258 above.

⁴ At 'Substance or procedure? the enrolled Bill rule', ch 2, pp 30–31 above.

⁵ Heuston R (2nd edn, 1964) Essays in constitutional law ch 1.

⁶ See 'Are Trethowan, Harris and Ranasinghe relevant to the British situation?', ch 2, pp 40–42 above.

⁷ In the case of South Africa, 'the people' was obviously an extremely narrow concept, which would not be regarded as legitimate in the modern context.

⁸ I leave aside for present purposes any arguments rooted in the Treaty/Acts of Union; see 'Is parliamentary sovereignty a British or English concept?', ch 2, pp 43–46 above.

importation of inapposite foreign case law.⁹ This was discussed at some length in chapter twelve in the context of the Factortame judgments.¹⁰ Both authors operated under something of a disadvantage when advancing their ideas. Heuston, writing in 1964, laboured under the handicap of courts' adherence to the principle that exercise of the prerogative was not reviewable under any circumstances, a common law rule which would presumably incline the judiciary to consider the Royal Assent beyond legal scrutiny. In post-GCHQ era, that principle no longer presents an obstacle to entrenchment. Similarly, both Heuston and Craig's critiques were formulated when the courts were seemingly not prepared to examine events that occurred in either house during the passage of a Bill in order to ascertain the meaning of a statute. In the aftermath of Pepper v Hart, it seems clear that Art 9 of the Bill of Rights (whatever its legal status)¹¹ is no longer regarded by the courts as an insuperable barrier to questioning either house's proceedings.

There is a clear danger here that one simply ends up suggesting that entrenchment is now possible because the courts have embraced an increasingly expansive notion of justiciability, in which the legitimacy of judicial intervention is determined not by the legal identity of the institution whose actions are being impugned, but by the nature of the question the courts assume they are being asked. (In the hypothetical Constitution Act, the terms of the entrenchment procedure itself simply require the courts to perform a simple arithmetic calculation, and are thus obviously justiciable. Care would also have to be taken that the Act's substantive terms were similarly amenable to judicial analysis: we might accept here for the sake of argument that those terms simply embraced the provisions of the Convention, which are also clearly matters courts can address).¹² To do so would in effect return us to Jennings' view that the 'rule of recognition' is a common law concept.¹³ This would however be no solution at all to the entrenchment conundrum, rather it makes the legal problem even more vexed.

As Jennings suggested, accepting that the rule of recognition was a common law concept implies that it could be redefined by Parliament. But equally (and this is a point on which we did not dwell in chapter two) it could be redefined by the courts without any parliamentary initiative having been undertaken at all. In formal terms, if the rule of recognition is a purely common law phenomenon, there is no legal barrier to the House of Lords suddenly deciding that it would not 'recognise' any statute that impinged upon particular moral or political values, or that it would 'recognise' such statutes only if they had been enacted with an enhanced Commons and/or Lords majority. Jennings' thesis, taken to its logical conclusion, suggests that the common law is legally superior to Acts of Parliament, that the courts and not the legislature are the ultimate source of legal authority, and that we might, as a matter of law, find that at any moment the courts had exercised a power explicitly to refuse to apply statutes of which they disapproved. The extravagant interpretation of the principle espoused in Dr Bonham's Case would thereby be reasserted, and the 1688 revolution would have been waged in vain.

Some commentators—one thinks primarily of Professor Griffith—might find that alarming prospect made rather too real by Laws LJ's judgment in Thoburn v Sunderland ⁹ (1991) op cit.

¹⁰ See 'IV. The end of parliamentary sovereignty? Or its reappearance?' ff, ch 12, pp 399–407 above.

¹¹ See "Redefining parliament"—Pepper v Hart (1993), ch 8, pp 244–248 above.

¹² Although one lesson that we should learn from the Harris saga in South Africa is that the requirement of super-majorities to protect entrenched rights can be sidestepped by cynical governments unless both the mechanism for selecting members of the legislature and the process of appointing judges are themselves entrenched values; see further 'Harris v Minister of the Interior—the aftermath', ch 3, pp 55–56 above and Loveland (1999) op cit ch 11.

¹³ See 'Jennings' critique and the 'rule of recognition', ch 2, pp 35–43 above.

City Council.¹⁴ Thoburn was an EC-related case, focused on the ostensibly prosaic issue of whether fruit and vegetables had to be sold in metric rather than imperial measurements. In the course of his judgment, Laws LJ endorsed the presumption that the European Communities Act 1972 possessed 'special' constitutional status, and was as such immune to the doctrine of implied repeal. Laws LJ also made two assertions of perhaps broader interest. The first was that the doctrine of implied repeal was itself a creature of the common law—rather than, as Wade's analysis of orthodox theory would suggest—an element of the constitution's 'ultimate political fact'. As a creature of the common law, of course, the doctrine of implied repeal would always be subject to extension, contraction or abolition at the behest of the higher courts. The second was that other statutes—which Laws LJ termed 'constitutional' statutes—enjoyed the same status as the European Communities Act:

We should recognise a hierarchy of Acts of Parliament: as it were 'ordinary' statutes and 'constitutional' statutes. The two categories must be distinguished on a principled basis. In my opinion a constitutional statute is one which (a) conditions the legal relationship between citizen and State in some general, overarching manner, or (b) enlarges or diminishes the scope of what we would now regard as fundamental constitutional rights.... Examples are the Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights 1688, the Act of Union, the Reform Acts which distributed and enlarged the franchise, the HRA, the Scotland Act 1998 and the Government of Wales Act 1998. The ECA clearly belongs in this family.¹⁵

Thoburn was not appealed to the Court of Appeal. It presently stands therefore as little more than a point of departure for further speculation about the nature of Parliament's legislative authority. As a mechanism within the sphere of administrative law to force Parliament in the text of legislation—and by extension the government in the text of the Bills it promotes—to be utterly candid about the objectives an Act it is intended to achieve, Laws LJ's conclusion perhaps has much to commend it. Characterised in this way, the judgment may be seen as little more than an extension of developing principles of statutory interpretation. Even generously construed, however, the judgment cannot be seen as advocating a 'revolutionary' limitation of Parliament's law-making powers.

Further judicial fuel was however added to this particular jurisprudential fire by the obiter comments of several members of the House of Lords in R (on the application of Jackson and others) v Attorney-General.¹⁶ Lord Steyn put the point in this way:

81.... But, apart from the traditional method of law making, Parliament acting as ordinarily constituted may functionally redistribute legislative power in different ways. For example, Parliament could for specific purposes provide for a two-thirds majority in the House of Commons and the House of Lords. This would involve a redefinition of Parliament for a specific purpose. Such redefinition could not be disregarded.

Lord Hope made similar observations:

104..... Our constitution is dominated by the sovereignty of Parliament. But Parliamentary sovereignty is no longer, if it ever was, absolute. It is not uncontrolled in the sense referred to by Lord Birkenhead LC in McCawley v The King [1920] AC 691, 720. It is no longer right to say that its freedom to legislate admits of no qualification whatever. Step by step, gradually but surely, the English principle of the absolute legislative sovereignty of Parliament which Dicey derived from Coke and Blackstone is being qualified.

¹⁴ [2002] 1 CMLR 1461. ¹⁵ [2002] 1 CMLR 1461 at para 62.

¹⁶ [2005] UKHL 56, [2006] 1 AC 262. See 'One parliament or three? Jackson v Attorney-General', ch 6, pp 187–190 above.

105. For the most part these qualifications are themselves the product of measures enacted by Parliament. Part I of the European Communities Act 1972 is perhaps the prime example.

Baroness Hale took the argument one step further:

163. If the sovereign Parliament can redefine itself downwards, to remove or modify the requirement for the consent of the Upper House, it may very well be that it can also redefine itself upwards, to require a particular Parliamentary majority or a popular referendum for particular types of measure. In each case, the courts would be respecting the will of the sovereign Parliament as constituted when that will had been expressed. But that is for another day.

It is readily apparent that any search for a purely legal solution to the entrenchment question in that more expansive sense—namely that Parliament cannot through even the most express of statutory formulae achieve certain objectives—is likely to be severely hampered by the conceptually tangled constitutional undergrowth which has now grown so luxuriantly from the soil of the 1688 settlement. But Craig's critique is also helpful to advocates of entrenchment in that it asks us to consider not what the traditional rule is, but what the traditional rule is for? This approach then forces us to consider that entrenchment should not be analysed as a legal issue, but as a moral one. The central question that is raised is 'Are there sound reasons for regarding particular political values as so important that they should not be subject to amendment or repeal by simple parliamentary majorities?'

Questions of legitimacy

The parliamentary sovereignty doctrine appears to have emerged as a crude device to prevent enactment of factional legislation in a pre-democratic society. Yet it is quite clear that by the early twentieth century, shifts in the political context in which the doctrine operated meant that it had evolved into a constitutional device which would in most circumstances facilitate achievement of entirely the opposite result. The combined impact of the Commons' dominance within Parliament, and of minoritarian governments within the Commons, generally places uninhibited legislative power within the grasp of political factions which represent the preferred political views of only a minority of the population. It is perhaps in this political reality, rather than in tortuous arguments about legal practicality, that the real difficulties posed by entrenchment actually lie. For in such a context, we might plausibly wonder whether even if the entrenchment of particular political values was possible as a matter of law, would it be defensible as a matter of morality if it was triggered simply by a legislative initiative enacted by Parliament?

The entrenching device upheld by the Privy Council in Trethowan offers a very poor model for the creation of fundamental, supra-parliamentary values in the British context. The effect of such a provision would be to place the power to entrench laws in the hands of a barely majoritarian or even minoritarian faction. There would seemingly have been no legal impediment to a legislature introducing 'manner and form' legislation which rooted the preferences of the then governing party so deeply that they could not in practice be changed—by insisting for example on 75% or 80% majorities in both houses, or requiring similar levels of support in a referendum.

Transposed to the modern British context, this would have permitted the Thatcher or Major governments to impose their own preferred brand of minoritarian ideology on the substantial majority of the electorate which consistently chose not to support them. Similarly, a future Labour government which took the view that it should attempt to entrench certain social democratic moral values against an extremist right wing administration would be doing so with (on the most optimistic of electoral predictions) 50% of the vote on an 85% turnout.

One would have to embrace a rather peculiar view of democracy to discern any moral legitimacy in a process which allowed minority factions within modern British society to impose entrenched 'fundamental' political values on the entire population. Such 'reform' would be the very antithesis of the supra-majoritarianism required to shape the outlines of the US Constitution and the unanimity needed to fashion and subsequently amend the provisions of the EC Treaties. Its terms would be not consensual but coercive: its rationale would be not pluralist but authoritarian: its effect would be not to empower 'the people' but to oppress them.

Thus even if we assume entrenchment is legally possible, we do not thereby prove that it is constitutionally desirable. As has been stressed throughout this book, constitutional law forms but one ingredient (albeit an important one) of a complex constitutional recipe. Issues of politics and morality as well as mere legality pervade the much larger and more complex issue of constitutionality.

There would seem to be only two ways that entrenchment could plausibly claim to have a legitimate constitutional basis. The legitimacy of constituent moral values appears to depend primarily on the breadth of consensus that they attract. The rationale underpinning this principle was perhaps best articulated, as we saw in chapter one, in Madison's celebrated critique of factionalism: the higher the level of support required to enact a law, the less likely it is that the law concerned will be arbitrary, oppressive or intolerant, because its terms will express a compromise between groups of citizens holding different moral and political views. The Americans chose the 'two thirds of Congress plus three quarters of the States' rule to protect the terms of this initial compromise. We have seen that other constitutions have adopted devices which differ in their detailed form—the 'substantial provincial support' formula discovered by the Canadian Supreme Court in 1982, or the two-thirds of both chambers sitting in joint session criterion originally upheld by the South African Supreme Court in Harris (No 1) and Harris (No 2), or the legislative majority plus referendum approach favoured in New South Wales—but which serve a broadly similar function.¹⁷

Two-thirds or three-quarters legislative majorities clearly do not eliminate the possibility that a country will produce oppressive laws. Such countries are however less likely to do so than those whose constitutions permit unfettered minoritarian or bare majoritarian law-making. But in the British context, this 'enhanced legislative majority' route to entrenchment could be followed only by a government which enjoyed hitherto unachieved levels of electoral support, in terms both of Commons seats and share of the popular vote. There would seem no prospect of a single political party coming remotely close to achieving such levels of popular approval. The position could presumably only be reached if the Labour Party won a comfortable Commons majority, attracting perhaps 45% of the vote, but rather than govern as a single party chose to initiate major constitutional reform with the support of a Liberal Party which had maintained its recent average electoral support of around 20%. Ideally, such a coalition would also detach at least a handful of MPs from the left-wing of the Conservative Party, and attract the support of Scots, Welsh and Irish nationalist members of the Commons. The legitimacy of such reform would be further enhanced if the various governing parties had announced their intentions prior to the general election; the government could then more convincingly argue that the consent of their supporters to a constitutional revolution was informed.

In the absence of such a broad coalition, a minoritarian or barely majoritarian government seeking to entrench certain basic values could only stake a plausible claim to legitimacy by promoting substantive reforms which would both reduce its own share of political power and enhance the political influence wielded by opposition parties. The claim would however be a weak one, since many observers might genuinely doubt that any political party could ever be motivated by such selfless objectives. In these circumstances, a reformist government would necessarily be embarking on an elitist and ostensibly unrepresentative course of action.

¹⁷ See respectively 'A-G for New South Wales v Trethowan (1931)' ff, ch 2, pp 36–37 and 'V. Can conventions become laws? 2: Patriating the Canadian constitution', ch 9, p 287, above.

It would nevertheless be rash to assume a reform of this nature could not be 'democratic'. The moral quandary such a government would face forces us rather to focus again on the intimate linkage between matters of substance and process in the context of constitution building which were adverted to in chapter one. One should perhaps add that this observation applies, albeit perhaps with less force, to a context in which reform attracted overwhelming popular support. Even a super-majoritarian coalition government could not defensibly claim much legitimacy for its plans unless it sought to entrench principles which both restricted its own authority and increased the political power exercised by citizens who did not support its 'revolution'.

Legitimacy in process? A Liberal Democrat proposal

The Liberal Democrat Party offered a relatively detailed vision of a reformed British constitution in a 1990 policy paper, entitled 'We the people ...'. As might be surmised from its title, the paper drew heavily on the American constitutional model, in matters both of abstract theory and practical detail. We the people devoted considerable attention to planning a reform process which would enhance the legitimacy of the 'fundamental' values it hoped to introduce.

As suggested above, any attempt by a single party government returned under the existing electoral system to entrench constitutional values with any significant degree of fixity would be most unlikely to have a legitimate moral base: the breadth of popular consent such a government attracted would simply be too narrow to justify the imposition of constituent principles. We the people clearly recognised this difficulty, and offered an ingenious mechanism to overcome it.

Had the Liberals won a Commons majority at the 1992 general election, its government would have promoted Bills to reform the Commons' electoral system on the basis of the single transferable vote (STV) mechanism, and to establish a body to be called the 'Constituent Assembly'. Parliament would then be dissolved, and a general election fought on the basis of the new STV electoral system. The Constituent Assembly would be composed of the members of the Commons returned under the basis of the new STV electoral system. The Assembly would have been empowered by the previous Parliament to adopt (by a two-thirds majority) a new constitutional settlement, within which certain political values (inter alia the ECHR, the STV electoral system, and (extensive) devolved powers to the Scots, Welsh and Northern Irish and regional governments) would all assume supra-parliamentary status. These values would be entrenched in the procedural sense; they could be amended only with the approval of two thirds of both houses sitting separately.

In legal terms, using the Constituent Assembly to implement a constitutional revolution might be thought something of a nonsense: Parliament presumably cannot create something more powerful than itself. It would however seem that We the people proceeded on the assumption that its proposals were at root designed to achieve a political rather than legal objective. By requiring a two-thirds majority of a body chosen by the STV system to create the new constitution, the Liberal programme ensured that its terms could not be given legal effect unless they enjoyed a very high level of popular support. The proviso that the Commons should in effect wear a different political hat when assessing the merits of fundamental reform would also have served a useful legitimising purpose, in so far as it would focus both MPs and the public's attention on the gravity of the task being undertaken.

For adherents to a pluralist perception of democracy, the Liberal Party's inability to mobilise greater electoral support is something of a disappointment. There is no doubt that We the people offered a radical and far-reaching programme to modernise Britain's constitutional arrangements. One might of course suggest that the Liberals' limited electoral support is in itself indicative of 'the people's' disinclination to have the constitution reformed in any meaningful way. The only immediate prospect of the Liberal programme being implemented would be for the party to hold the balance of power in a hung Commons, and to convince one of the main parties that pursuing its reforms was an acceptable price to pay for the benefit of forming a coalition government for one parliamentary term. It would however seem unlikely that either the Labour or Conservative Parties would accept such reasoning. Certainly the balance of power in the aftermath of the 2010 general election did not enable the Liberal Democrats to make such radical constitutional reforms the price of its participation in the coalition government. Nor, indeed, would the reforms enjoy much legitimacy if their opponents could plausibly argue that the major partner in the coalition had been 'blackmailed' into accepting them.

Conclusion

Prime Minister Blair stressed in the preface to the Scotland's Parliament white paper that Scots devolution was best seen as just one part of a much broader programme of constitutional reform. There is no doubt that—in terms of its commitment to establishing a pluralist political culture—the Blair governments stand head and shoulders above any of their twentieth-century predecessors. This is obviously evidenced in its devolution legislation. But it is also apparent in the government's embrace of the ECHR and the provisions of the Amsterdam Treaty: the protection of individual rights is an essential element of a diverse democratic polity. The same observation may be made about the Blair government's promotion of the Constitutional Reform Act 2005. The Act's objectives were more modest than its grandiose title would suggest but we might still accept that the Act's transfer of the judicial functions of the House of Lords to a new Supreme Court and the creation of a new Judicial Appointments Commission to select judges are valuable reforms which further underline the Blair government's atypical (among its post-war predecessors of either party) readiness to use its Commons majority to promote laws which limited its own powers.

Yet these initiatives, desirable though they may be, can hardly be seen as engineering a constituent reformation of our political system. Their longevity is by no means assured. It is perhaps something of a misnomer to speak at all of the law of the British constitution, whether we are considering legislation of great or recent vintage, or rules of common law. This misdescription does not simply arise from the obvious fact that so much of the organisation and behaviour of contemporary government rests on the non-justiciable basis of convention. More seriously, it derives from the constant vulnerability of those principles which are expressed in justiciable form to whichever political faction has temporary control of the House of Commons. To search for constitutional law in a society which has thus far rejected the concept of subjecting its system of governance to constituent legal principles is to embark upon a generally fascinating, often frustrating, but ultimately always fallacious journey.

Having begun the journey into this book with a quotation from Thomas Jefferson's Declaration of Independence, we might, in the interests both of substantive and stylistic symmetry, end it with the words of Jefferson's great friend and colleague, James Madison:

No doctrine can be sound that releases a legislature from the control of a constitution. The latter is as much a law to the former, as the acts of the former are to individuals; and although alterable by the people who formed it, it is not alterable by any other authority; certainly not by those chosen by the people to carry it in to effect. This is so vital a principle ... that a denial of it cannot possibly last long or spread far.¹⁸

Britain has of course denied the principle for over 300 years. To many observers that may suggest the principle is an unnecessary ingredient of a democratic society. To others, it may in contrast indicate that an attempt to grapple with this elemental ingredient of constitutional morality is long overdue.

Suggested further reading

Academic commentary

Corwin (1928) 'The higher law background of American constitutional law Parts I and II' Harvard LR 149 and 365

Heuston (2nd edn, 1964) Essays in constitutional law ch 1

Allan (1985) 'Legislative supremacy and the rule of law' Cambridge LJ 111

Bailyn (1967) The ideological origins of the American revolution

Case law and legislation

R (on the application of Jackson and others) v Attorney-General [2005] UKHL 56, [2006] 1 AC 262

Harris v Doneses (Minister of the Interior) (no. 2) (1952) 4 SA 769 (A)

¹⁸ Padover S (ed) (1953) The Complete Madison p 344.

This page intentionally left blank

Bibliography

- ADONIS A (1988) 'The House of Lords in the 1980s' Parliamentary Affairs 380–401.
- (1990) Parliament today (Manchester: Manchester University Press).
- (2nd edn, 1993) Parliament today (Manchester: Manchester University Press).
- AHIER J AND FLUDE M (eds) (1983) Contemporary education policy (London: Croom Helm).
- AKEHURST M (1982) 'Revocation of administrative decisions' Public Law 613–627.
- ALDER J (1994) Constitutional and administrative law (London: Macmillan).
- ALDERMAN R AND SMITH M (1990) 'Can British Prime Ministers be given the push by their parties?' Parliamentary Affairs 260–276.
- ALDERMAN R AND CARTER N (1991) 'A very Tory coup: the ousting of Mrs Thatcher' Parliamentary Affairs 125–139.
- ALLAN T (1983) 'Parliamentary sovereignty: Lord Denning's dexterous revolution' Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 22–33.
- (1985) 'Legislative supremacy and the rule of law' Cambridge LJ 111–143.
- (1986) 'Law convention and prerogative' Cambridge LJ 305–320.
- (1993) Law, liberty and justice (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1995) 'Equality and moral independence: public law and private morality', in Loveland I. (1995a) infra.
- (1997) 'Parliamentary sovereignty: law, politics and revolution' LQR 443–452.
- (2006) 'Human rights and judicial review: a critique of "due deference"' Cambridge LJ 671–692.
- ALLEN C (1942) 'Regulation 18B and reasonable cause...' LQR 232–242.
- ALLEN N AND BIRCH S (2011) 'Political conduct and misconduct: probing public opinion' Parliamentary Affairs 61–81.
- ALTER K (2001) Establishing the supremacy of European law (Oxford: OUP).
- ANDERSON O (1967) 'The Wensleydale peerage and the position of the House of Lords in the mid-nineteenth century' English Historical Review 486–502.
- ANSON W (5th edn, 1922) The law and custom of the constitution (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- ARKINSTALL J AND O'BRIEN C (2002) 'Table of cases under the Human Rights Act' European Human Rights LR 364–388.
- ARNSTEIN W (1983) The Bradlaugh case (Columbia, Missouri: University of Missouri Press).
- ARNULL A (1987) 'The incoming tide: responding to Marshall' Public Law 383–399.
- ASCHER K (1983) 'The politics of administrative opposition—council house sales and the right to buy' Local Government Studies 12–20.
- ATRILL S (2005) 'Nulla poena sine lege in comparative perspective...' Public Law 107.
- AUDIT COMMISSION (1990) The administration of the community charge (London: HMSO).
- BAGEHOT W (1963 ed by Crossman R) The English constitution (London: Fontana).
- BAILEY S (1982) 'The Contempt of Court Act 1981' MLR 301–316.
- BAILEY S AND PADDISON R (eds) The reform of local government finance in Britain (London: Routledge).
- BAILEY S, HARRIS D AND JONES B (1977; 2nd edn, 1992; 3rd edn, 1998 4th edn) Civil liberties (London: Butterworths).

- BAILYN B (1967) The ideological origins of the American revolution (Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press).
- BAINES P (1985) 'The history and rationale of the 1979 reforms', in Drewry G (ed) The new Select Committees (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- BAKER D, GAMBLE A, AND LUDLUM (1993) 'Whips or scorpions? The Maastricht vote and Conservative MPs' Parliamentary Affairs 147–166.
- BAKER K (1993) The turbulent years (London: Faber).
- BALDWIN N (1999) 'The membership and work of the House of Lords', in Dickson and Carmichael (eds) The House of Lords: its parliamentary and judicial roles (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- BALL W, GULAM W AND TROYNA B (1990) 'Pragmatism or retreat? funding policy, local government, and the marginalisation of anti-racist education', in Ball and Solomos infra.
- BALL W AND SOLOMOS J (eds) Race and local politics (London: Macmillan).
- BALSOM D AND MCALLISTER I (1979) 'The Scottish and Welsh devolution referenda of 1979' Parliamentary Affairs 394–409.
- BAMFORTH N (1993) 'The scope of judicial review—still uncertain' Public Law 239–248.
- (1998) 'Parliamentary sovereignty and the Human Rights Act 1998' Public Law 572–582.
- (1999) 'The application of the Human Rights Act to public authorities and private bodies' Cambridge LJ 159–170.
- BANNER C AND BOUTLE T (2004) 'Challenging the Commons' New Law Journal 1466.
- BARENDT E (1987) Freedom of speech (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1989) 'Spycatcher and freedom of speech' Public Law 204–212.
- (1993) 'Libel and freedom of speech in English law' Public Law 449–464.
- (1995) 'Constitutional law and the Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme' Public Law 357–366.
- (1998) An Introduction to Constitutional Law pp 86–93 (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- BARKER R (1986) 'Obedience, legitimacy and the state', in Harlow C (ed) Public law and politics (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- BASH L AND COULBY D (eds) The Education Reform Act: competition and control (London: Cassell).
- BATES ST J (1988) 'Scrutiny of administration', in Ryle M and Richards P (eds) The Commons under scrutiny (London: Routledge).
- BEALEY F (1988) Democracy in the contemporary state (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- BEARD C (1990) 'An economic interpretation of the Constitution', in Birmbaum J and Ollman infra.
- BEATSON J (1987) '"Public" and "private" in English administrative law' LQR 34–65.
- BEATSON J AND MATTHEWS M (2nd edn, 1987) Administrative law (London: OUP).
- BEIBR R (1984) 'The settlement of institutional conflicts on the basis of Article 4 of the Treaty' CMLRev 505–523.
- BENNET P AND PULLINGER S (1991) Making the Commons work (London: Institute for Public Policy Research).
- BENNION F (1997) Statutory interpretation (Oxford: OUP).
- (2000) 'What interpretation is "possible" under s.3(1) of the Human Rights Act?' Public Law 77–91.
- BEVAN V (1981) 'Is anybody there?' Public Law 431–453.
- BEYLEVELD D AND PATTINSON S (2002) 'Horizontal applicability' LQR 623–647.
- BINGHAM T (1993) 'The European Convention on Human Rights: time to incorporate' LQR 390–400.
- BIRNBAUM J AND OLMANN B (eds) The United States Constitution (New York: New York University Press).
- BLAKE R AND LOUIS W (eds) Churchill (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- BLOM-COOPER L (1982) 'The new face of judicial review: administrative changes in Order 53' Public Law 250–261.

- BLUNKETT D (2006) The Blunkett tapes: my life in the bear pit (London: Bloomsbury).
- BOATENG P AND STRAW J (1996) Bringing rights home (London: Labour Party).
- (1997) 'Bringing rights home: Labour plans to incorporate the ECHR into UK law' European Human Rights LR 71–80.
- BOGDANOR V (1976) 'Freedom in education' Political Quarterly 149–159.
- (1979) 'The English constitution and devolution' Political Quarterly 36–49.
- (1983) What is proportional representation? (Oxford: Martin Robertson).
- (1988) 'Introduction', Bogdanor V (ed) Constitutions in democratic politics (Dartmouth Publishing: Aldershot).
- (1999) 'Reform of the House of Lords: a sceptical view' Political Quarterly 375–381.
- (1999a) 'Devolution: decentralisation or disintegration' Political Quarterly 185–194.
- (2009) The new British constitution (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- BONNER D AND STONE R (1987) 'The Public Order Act 1986: steps in the wrong direction?' Public Law 202–230.
- BORTHWICK R (1973) 'Public Bill Committees in the House of Lords' Parliamentary Affairs 440–453.
- (1979) 'Questions and debates', in Walkland S (ed) The House of Commons in the twentieth century (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1988) 'The floor of the house', in Ryle M and Richards P (eds) The Commons under scrutiny (London: Routledge).
- BOULTON C (ed) (21st edn, 1989) Erskine May's treatise on the law, privileges, proceedings and usage of Parliament (London: Butterworths).
- BOWLEY M (1985) Housing and the state 1919–1945 (London: Allen & Unwin).
- BOYCE B (1993) 'The democratic deficit of the European Community' Parliamentary Affairs 458–477.
- BOYLE A (1982) 'The Contempt of Court Act 1981' Human Rights Review 148–150.
- (1986) 'Political broadcasting, fairness and administrative law' Public Law 562–596.
- BOYRON S (2002) 'In the name of European law: the metric martyrs case' European LR 771–779.
- BRADLEY A (1981) 'Administrative justice and the binding effects of official acts' Current Legal Problems 1–20.
- (1988) 'Police powers and the prerogative' Public Law 298–303.
- (1991) 'The UK before the Strasbourg Court', in Finnie W, Himsworth C and Walker N (eds) Edinburgh essays in public law (Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press).
- (1997) 'Collateral challenge to enforcement decisions—a duty to apply for judicial review' Public Law 365–370.
- BRADLEY A (1990) 'Press freedom, governmental constraints and the Privy Council' Public Law 453–461.
- (2003) 'Judicial independence under attack' Public Law 397–407.
- BRADBURY J AND MITCHELL J (2005) 'Devolution; between governance and territorial politics' Parliamentary Affairs 287–302.
- BRADLEY K (1987) 'Maintaining the balance' Common Market LR 41–64.
- BRANSON N (1979) Populism (London: Lawrence and Wishart).
- BRAZIER M (9th edn, 1993) Street on torts (London: Butterworths).
- BRAZIER R (1992) Constitutional reform (Oxford: OUP).
- (1990) Constitutional texts (Oxford: OUP).
- (1994) 'It is a constitutional issue: fitness for Ministerial office in the 1990's' Public Law 431–451.
- (1999) 'The constitution of the United Kingdom' Cambridge LJ 96–128.
- BRIDGES L et al. (1987) Legality and local politics (Aldershot: Avebury).
- BRIGGS A (ed) Chartist studies (London: Macmillan).

- BROCK M (1973) The Great Reform Act (London: Hutchinson).
- BROGAN H (1986) History of the USA (Harmondsworth: Pelican).
- BROWN K (ed) The first labour party (London: Croom Helm).
- BROWN L AND KENNEDY T (1994) The Court of Justice of the European Communities (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- BROWN R (1987) 'The Beard thesis attacked: a political approach', in Birnbaum and Olson supra.
- BROWN W (1899) 'The Hare system in Tasmania' LQR 51–70.
- BROWNE-WILKINSON, LORD (1992) 'The infiltration of a Bill of Rights' Public Law 397–410.
- BULL D (1980) 'School admissions: a new appeals procedure' Journal of Social Welfare Law 209–233.
- BURROWS H (1964) 'House of Lords: change or decay?' Parliamentary Affairs 403–417.
- BURTON I AND DREWRY G (1972) 'Public legislation a survey of the session of 1971–1972' Parliamentary Affairs 145–185.
- (1978) 'Public legislation: a survey of the sessions of 1975/77' Parliamentary Affairs 140–162.
- BUSH M (1983) 'The Act of Proclamations: a reinterpretation' American Journal of Legal History 33–53.
- BUTLER D (1953) The electoral system in Britain 1918–1951 (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1976) 'The Australian crisis of 1975' Parliamentary Affairs 201–210.
- BUTLER D, ADONIS A AND TRAVERS T (1994) Failure in British Government: the politics of the poll tax (Oxford: OUP).
- BUTLER D AND BOGDANOR V (eds) Democracy and elections (Cambridge: CUP).
- BUTLER D AND KAVANAGH D (1984; 1988; 1993; 1998) The British general election of 1982; 1987; 1992; 1997 respectively (London: Macmillan).
- (2002) The British general election of 2002 (London: Macmillan).
- (2005) The British general election of 2005 (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan).
- BUTLER D, PENNIMAN H AND RANNEY A (1981) Democracy at the polls (Washington DC: American Enterprise Institute).
- BUTLER D AND SLOMAN A (1975) British political facts (London: Macmillan).
- BUXTON, LORD JUSTICE (2000) 'The Human Rights Act and private law' LQR 48–67.
- BUXTON R (2nd ed, 1973) Local Government (Harmondsworth: Penguin).
- CANE P (1980) 'The function of standing rules in administrative law' Public Law 303–328.
- (1981) 'Standing, legality and the limits of public law' Public Law 322–339.
- (1992) 'Private rights and public procedure' Public Law 193–200.
- (1995) 'Standing, representation and the environment', in Loveland I (ed) A special relationship? (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1995) 'Standing up for the public' Public Law 276–285.
- (3rd edn, 1996) An introduction to administrative law (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- CANNON J (1973) Parliamentary reform 1640–1832 (Cambridge: CUP).
- CENTRE FOR CONTEMPORARY CULTURAL STUDIES (1981) Unpopular education (London: Hutchinson).
- CHADWICK A (2011) 'Britain's first live televised leaders' debate: from the news cycle to the political information cycle' Parliamentary Affairs 24–44.
- CHAPMAN R AND HUNT M (eds) (1987) Open government (London: Routledge).
- CHESTER N (1977) 'Questions in the House', in Walkland S and Ryle M (eds) The Commons in the seventies (London: Martin Robertson).
- CHESTER N AND BOWRING M (1962) Questions in parliament (London: OUP).
- CLAES M AND DEWITTE (1998) 'Report on the Netherlands', in Slaughter A, Stone Sweet A and Weiler J (eds) The European

- courts and national courts* (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- CLARK A (1993) Diaries (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson).
- CLARK D (1975) 'Natural justice: substance or shadow' Public Law 27–63.
- COHN, M (2009) 'Judicial review of non-statutory executive powers after Bancourt: a unified anxious model' Public Law 260–282.
- COLEMAN D AND SALT J (1992) The British population (Oxford: OUP).
- COLLEY L (1996) Britons (London: Vintage).
- CONSTITUTION UNIT (2001–December) Monitor p 2.
- COOKE, LORD (1997) 'Mechanisms for entrenchment and protection of a Bill of Rights: the New Zealand experience' European Human Rights LR 490–495.
- COOPERS AND LYBRAND (1988) Local management of schools (London: Coopers and Lybrand).
- COPPEL J AND O'NEILL A (1994) 'The European Court of Justice: taking rights seriously' Legal Studies 227–245.
- CORBETT R (1985) 'The 1985 intergovernmental conference and the Single European Act', in Pryce R (ed) The dynamics of European integration (London: Croom Helm).
- (1989) 'Testing the new procedures; the European Parliament's first experiences with its new "Single Act" powers' Journal of Common Market Studies 362–372.
- CORNFORD T AND SUNKIN M (2001) 'The Bowman Report: access and the recent reforms of the judicial review procedure' Public Law 11–20.
- CORWIN E (1928) 'The higher law background of American constitutional law (parts I and II)' Harvard LR 149–175 and 365–409.
- COULBY D (1989) 'From educational partnership to central control', in Bash L and Coulby D (eds) The Education Reform Act (London: Cassell).
- COWEN D (1952) 'Legislature and judiciary: part I' Modern Law Review 282–296.
- (1953) 'Legislature and judiciary: part II' Modern Law Review 273–298.
- COWLEY P AND STUART M (2001) 'Parliament: a few headaches and a dose of modernisation' Parliamentary Affairs 238 at 253–255.
- (2002) 'Parliament: mostly continuity, but more change than you'd think' Parliamentary Affairs 270.
- COWLING M (1967) 1867: Disraeli, Gladstone and revolution (Cambridge: CUP).
- CRAIG J (1959) 'Parliament and Boundary Commissions' Public Law 23–45.
- CRAIG P (1991) 'Sovereignty of the UK Parliament after Factortame' Yearbook of European Law 221–255.
- (1992) 'Once upon a time in the west: direct effect and the federalisation of EEC law' Oxford Journal of Legal Studies.
- (1993) 'Francovich, remedies and the scope of damages liability' 109 LQR 595–621.
- (1994) 'The common law, reasons and administrative justice' Cambridge LJ 282–302.
- (3rd edn, 1994) Administrative Law (London: Sweet & Maxwell).
- (1996) 'Substantive legitimate expectations in domestic and Community law' Cambridge LJ 289–312.
- (1997) 'Formal and substantive conceptions of the rule of law' Public Law 467–487.
- (1997a) 'Public law and control over private power', in Taggart M (ed) The province of administrative law (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- (1998) 'The Treaty of Amsterdam: a brief guide' Public Law 351–355.
- (1998a) 'Collateral attack, procedural exclusivity and judicial review' LQR 535–538.
- (4th edn, 1998b) Administrative law (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- (2001) 'The courts, the Human Rights Act and judicial review' LQR 592–612.

- CRAIG P AND DE BURCA G (2nd edn, 1998) EU law (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- CRAIG P AND DEBURCA B (3rd edn, 2002) EU law (Oxford: OUP) pp 358–369.
- CRAIG P AND WALTERS M (1999) ‘The courts, devolution and judicial review’ Public Law 274–308.
- CRAWFORD C (1915) ‘The suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act and the Revolution of 1689’ The English Historical Review 613–630.
- CROSBY S (1991) ‘The Single market and the rule of law’ ELRev 451–465.
- CROSLAND C (1952) ‘The transition from capitalism’, in Crossman R (ed) New Fabian Essays (London: Turnstile).
- CROSS C (1961) The fascists in Britain (London: Barrie Books).
- CROSS J (1967) ‘Withdrawal of the Conservative party whip’ Parliamentary Affairs 169–175.
- CULLINGWORTH J (1979) Essays in housing policy (London: Allen & Unwin).
- CURTICE J (2005) ‘Turnout: electors stay home again’ Parliamentary Affairs 776–785.
- CURTIN D (1990) ‘The provice of government: delimiting the direct effect of directives in the common law context’ ELRev 195–223.
- DALE R (1983) ‘Thatcherism and education’, in Ahier J and Flude M (eds) Contemporary education policy (London: Croom Helm).
- DAUSES M (1985) ‘The protection of fundamental rights in the Community legal order’ ELRev 398–417.
- DAVIES H AND STEWART J (1994) The growth of government by appointment: implications for democracy (Birmingham: Local Government Management Board).
- (1994) ‘A new agenda for local governance’ Public Money and Management (October) 29–36.
- DAVIS H (2005) ‘Public authorities as victims under the HRA’ Cambridge LJ 315–328.
- DAWSON I AND DUNN A (2002) ‘Seeking the principle: chancel, choices and human rights’ Legal Studies 238–258.
- DE BURCA G (1993) ‘The principle of proportionality and its application in EC law’ YEL 105–130.
- DE COSTA C (2009) ‘The King versus Aleck Bourne’ Medical Journal of Australia 230–231.
- DENNING, LORD (1985) ‘Re Parliamentary Privilege Act 1770’ Public Law 80–92.
- DENNIS I (2010) ‘The right to confront witnesses: meanings, myths and human rights’ Criminal Law Review 255–267.
- DE SMITH S (1951) ‘The prerogative writs’ Cambridge LJ 40.
- (1955) ‘Boundaries between Parliament and the courts’ Modern Law Review 281–286.
- (1971) ‘The constitution and the Common Market: a tentative appraisal’ 34 MLR 597–614.
- (5th edn, 1985) Constitutional and administrative law (by Brazier R and Street H) (Harmondsworth: Penguin).
- DICKMAN J (1989) ‘Debt and the poll tax’ Municipal Review, (May) 13–15.
- DICKSON B AND CARMICHAEL P (eds) The House of Lords (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- DIKE C (1976) ‘The case against parliamentary sovereignty’ Public Law 283–297.
- DIPLOCK, LORD (1972) ‘The common market and the common law’ The Law Teacher 3–12.
- DOE (1971) Local government in England p 6 (London: HMSO; Cmnd. 4584).
- (1976) Report of the Committee of Inquiry into local government finance (London: HMSO; Cmnd 6453).
- (1977) Housing policy: a consultative document (London: HMSO).
- (1983) Rates (London: HMSO; Cmnd 9008).
- (1983) Streamlining the cities (London: HMSO; Cmnd 9063).
- (1986) Paying for local government (London: HMSO; Cmnd 9414).
- (1988) The conduct of local authority business (London: HMSO; Cmnd 433).

- DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS (1998) A Mayor and Assembly for London (London: HMSO; Cm 3897).
- DOHERTY M (1988) 'Prime Ministerial power and ministerial responsibility in the Thatcher era' Parliamentary Affairs 49–67.
- DOIG A (2002) 'Sleaze fatigue in "The House of ill-repute"' Parliamentary Affairs 389–401.
- DONNELLY C (2005) 'Leonard Cheshire again and beyond: private contractors, contract and s 6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act' Public Law 785–805.
- (2010) 'Positive obligations and privatisation' Northern Ireland Legal Quarterly 209–223.
- DONOUGHMORE, LORD (1932) Report of the Committee on Minister's powers (London: HMSO; Cmnd 4060).
- DREWRY G (1983) 'The National Audit Act—half a loaf' Public Law 531–537.
- (ed) (1985) The new select committees (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1985a) 'Select committees and backbench power' in Jowell J and Oliver, D (eds 2nd edn) The changing constitution (London: OUP).
- (1985b) 'Leaking in the public interest' Public Law 203–212.
- (1988) 'Legislation', in Ryle M and Richards P (eds) The Commons under scrutiny (London: Routledge).
- (1993) 'Mr Major's Charter' Public Law 248–256.
- DREWRY G AND BUTCHER T (1988) The civil service today (Oxford: Basil Blackwell).
- DU BOIS W (1990) 'Slavery and the Founding Fathers', in Birnbaum and Olson supra.
- DUFFY P (1980) 'The Sunday Times case: freedom of expression, contempt of court and the ECHR' Human Rights Review 17–53.
- DUNLEAVY P, JONES G AND O'LEARY B (1990) 'Prime Ministers and the Commons: patterns of behaviour 1868–1987' Public Administration 123–140.
- DWYER D (2005) 'Rights brought home' LQR 359–364.
- EDELMAN M (1964) The symbolic uses of politics (Urbana: University of Illinois Press).
- EDWARD D (1987) 'The impact of the Single European Act on the institutions' CMLRev 19–30.
- EDWARDS R (2002) 'Judicial deference under the Human Rights Act' MLR 859–875.
- EHLERMANN C (1975) 'Applying the new budgetary procedure for the first time' CMLRev 325–343.
- (1987) 'The internal market following the Single European Act' CMLRev 361–409.
- EKINS R (2007) 'Acts of Parliament and the Parliament Acts' 123 LQR 91–115.
- ELCOCK H (2nd ed, 1986) Local government (London: Methuen).
- ELECTORAL COMMISSION (2002) Modernising elections (London: Electoral Commission).
- (2004) The funding of political parties (London: Electoral Commission).
- (2005) 'Spending by political parties and campaign groups at the 5 May UK parliamentary election' www.electoralcommission.org.uk.
- (2005a) Securing the vote (London: Electoral Commission).
- (2011) UK general election 2010 campaign spending report (London: Electoral Commission).
- ELLIOT M (1980) 'Appeals, principle and pragmatism in natural justice' MLR 66–69.
- ELLIS D (1980) 'Collective ministerial responsibility and collective solidarity' Public Law 367–396.
- ELLIS E (ed) (1999) The principle of proportionality in the laws of Europe (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- ELTON G (1953) The Tudor Revolution in government (Cambridge: CUP).
- (1960) 'Henry VIII's Act of Proclamations' English Historical Review 208–222.
- EMILIOU N (1994) 'Subsidiarity: panacea or fig leaf', in O'Keefe D and Twomey P

- (eds) Legal issues of the Maastricht Treaty (London: Wiley).
- EWING K (1987) The funding of political parties in Britain (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1999) 'The Human Rights Act and parliamentary democracy' MLR 79–99.
- (2001) 'Transparency, accountability and equality: the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000' Public Law 542–565.
- EWING K AND GEARTY C (1990) Civil liberties under Thatcher (Oxford: OUP).
- FARRAN S (1996) The UK before the European Court of Human Rights (London: Blackstone Press).
- FELDMAN D (1993) Civil liberties and human rights in England and Wales (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1993a) 'Collateral challenge and judicial review: the boundary dispute continues' Public Law 37–48.
- (1999) 'Proportionality and the Human Rights Act 1998', in Ellis E (ed) The principle of proportionality in the laws of Europe (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- (2005) 'Proportionality and discrimination in anti-terrorism legislation' Cambridge LJ 270–272.
- (2006) 'Human rights, terrorism and risk; the roles of politician and judges' Public Law 364–384.
- FELLA S (2006) 'New Labour, same old Britain? The Blair government and European treaty reform' Parliamentary Affairs 621–637.
- FENNEL P (1986) 'Roberts v Hopwood: the rule against socialism' Journal of Law and Society 401–422.
- FENWICK H (4th edn, 2007) Civil liberties and human rights (London: Routledge-Cavendish).
- FIENGOLD C (1978) 'The little red schoolbook and the ECHR' Human Rights Review 21–47.
- FINER S (1956) 'The individual responsibility of Ministers' Public Administration 377–396.
- FINNIE W, HIMSWORTH C AND WALKER N (eds) Edinburgh essays in public law (Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press).
- FITZPATRICK B (1989) 'The significance of EEC Directives in UK sex discrimination law' Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 336–355.
- FORDHAM M (2001) 'Judicial review: the new rules' Public Law 4–10.
- FORREST R AND MURIE A (1988) Selling the welfare state (London: Routledge).
- FORSYTH C (1985) 'Beyond O'Reilly v Mackman: the foundations and nature of procedural exclusivity' Cambridge LJ 415–434.
- (1987) 'The scope of judicial review: "public duty" not "source of power"' Public Law 356–367.
- (1988) 'The provenance and protection of legitimate expectations' Cambridge LJ 238–260.
- (1997) 'Wednesbury protection of substantive legitimate expectations' Public Law 375–384.
- (1999) 'Collateral challenge and the foundations of judicial review: orthodoxy vindicated and procedural exclusivity rejected' Public Law 364–370.
- FORWOOD N AND CLOUGH M (1986) 'The Single European Act and free movement' ELRev 383–408.
- FOWLER N (1988) Ministers decide (London: Chapman).
- FOXTON D (2003) 'R v Halliday, ex parte Zadig in retrospect' LQR 455–494.
- FREEDLAND M (1995) 'Privatising Carltona: Part II of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994' Public Law 21–27.
- FRENCH D (1978) 'Spy fever in Britain 1900–1915' Historical Journal 355–370.
- FRIEDMANN W (1950) 'Trethowan's case, parliamentary sovereignty and the limits of legal change' 24 Australian Law Journal 103–108.
- FRY G (1970) 'The Sachsenhausen concentration camp case and the convention of ministerial responsibility' Public Law 336–357.

- GAMBLE A (1981) Britain in decline (London: Papermac).
- GANZ G (1986) 'Legitimate expectations: a confusion of concepts', in Harlow C (ed) Law and politics (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- (1990) 'The depoliticisation of local authorities: the Local authorities: the Local Government and Housing Act 1989' Public Law 224–242.
- GASH N (1953) Politics in the age of Peel (London: Longmans).
- GENN H AND RICHARDSON G (eds) (1994) Administrative law and government action (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- GEORGE V AND WILDING P (1976) Ideology and state welfare (London: RKP).
- GHANDI S AND JAMES J (1998) 'The English law of blasphemy and the European Convention on Human Rights' European Human Rights LR 430–451.
- GOODHART A (1942) 'Note' [on Liversidge] LQR 3–8.
- GOLBY M (1993) 'Parents as school governors', in Munn P (ed) Parents and schools (London: Routledge).
- GOLDSWORTHY J (1999) The sovereignty of Parliament (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- GORDON M (2009) 'The conceptual foundations of parliamentary sovereignty: reconsidering Jennings and Wade' Public Law 519–543.
- GORDON P (1990) 'A dirty war', in Ball and Solomos supra.
- GOUGH I (1983) 'Thatcherism and the welfare state': in Hall and Jacques infra.
- GOULD M (1993) 'M v Home Office: government and the judges' Public Law 568–578.
- GRAVELLS N (1989) 'Disapplying an Act of Parliament pending a preliminary ruling: constitutional enormity or common law right' Public Law 568–586.
- GRAY C (1979) 'European Convention on Human Rights—freedom of expression and the thalidomide case' Cambridge LJ 242–245.
- GRIEF N (1991) 'The domestic impact of the ECHR as mediated through Community law' Public Law 555–567.
- GRIFFITH J (1966) Central departments and local authorities (London: Allen and Unwin).
- (1974) Parliamentary scrutiny of government bills (London: Allen & Unwin).
- (1985) 'Judicial decision making in public law' Public Law 564–582.
- (1993) Judicial politics since 1920 (Oxford: Basil Blackwell).
- GRIFFITH J AND RYLE M (1989) Parliament (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- GRISWOLD E (1952) 'The coloured vote case in South Africa' Harvard LR 1361–1374.
- GYFORD J (1985) The politics of local socialism (London: Allen and Unwin).
- HALL S (1983) 'The great moving right show' in Hall and Jacques infra.
- HALL S AND JACQUES M (eds) The politics of Thatcherism (London: Lawrence and Wishart).
- HALL W (1986) 'Contracts compliance at the GLC' Local Government Studies 17–24.
- HAMPSON W (2nd ed, 1991) Local government and urban politics (London: Longman).
- HAMSON C (1954) 'The real lesson of Crichel Down' Public Administration 383–400.
- HANSARD SOCIETY (2000) The challenge for Parliament: making government accountable (London: Vacher Dod).
- HARLOW C (1986) (ed) Public law and politics (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- (1995) 'A special relationship? American influences on judicial review in England', in Loveland (1995a) infra.
- HARLOW C AND RAWLINGS R (1984) Law and administration (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson).
- HARRIS N (1993) Law and education: regulation, consumerism and the education system (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- HART H (2nd edn, 1994) The concept of law (Oxford: Clarendon Press).

- HART J (1992) Proportional representation: critics of the British electoral system 1820–1945 (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- HARTLEY T (2nd ed, 1988) The foundations of European Community law (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1993) ‘Constitutional and institutional aspects of the Maastricht Agreement’ International and Comparative Law Quarterly 213–237.
- (3rd edn, 1994) The foundations of European Community law (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (4th edn, 1998) The foundations of European Community law (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- HASSAN G (ed) (1999) A guide to the Scottish Parliament (Edinburgh: Centre for Scottish Public Policy).
- HATTERSLEY R (1992) ‘The begging of PM’s question time’ The Guardian January 28.
- HAWES D (1992) ‘Parliamentary select committees: some case studies in contingent influence’ Policy and Politics 227–235.
- HAY J (1975) The origins of the Liberal welfare reforms 1906–1914 (London: Macmillan).
- HAYEK F (1944) The road to serfdom (London: RKP).
- HENNESSY P (1986) ‘Helicopter crashes into Cabinet: Prime Minister and constitution hurt’ Journal of Law and Society 423–432.
- (1986a) Cabinet (Oxford: Basil Blackwell).
- HEUSTON R (1964) Essays in constitutional law (London: Stevens).
- (1970) ‘Liversidge v Anderson in retrospect’ LQR 33–68.
- HICKMAN T (2008) ‘The courts and politics after the Human Rights Act: a comment’ Public Law 84–100.
- HIMSWORTH C (1991) ‘Poll tax capping and judicial review’ Public Law 76–92.
- (1995) ‘The delegated powers scrutiny committee’ Public Law 34–44.
- HOBBSBAWM E (1969) Industry and empire (Harmondsworth: Penguin).
- HOFFMAN, LORD (1999) ‘The influence of the European principle of proportionality upon UK law’ Ellis E (ed) The principle of proportionality in the laws of Europe (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- HOGG Q (1947) The case for Conservatism (West Drayton: Penguin).
- HOLDEN B (1988) Understanding liberal democracy (Oxford: Phillip Allan).
- HOLDSWORTH W (1919) ‘The power of the Crown to requisition British ships in a national emergency’ LQR 12–42.
- (1942) ‘Note’ [on Liversidge] LQR 1–3.
- HOME OFFICE (1993) Compensation for victims of violent crime (London: HMSO; Cm 2434).
- (1997) Rights brought home (London: HMSO; Cm 3782).
- HOOD-PHILLIPS O (1982) ‘A Garland for the Lords: Parliament and Community law again’ LQR 524–526.
- HOPE, LORD (1998) ‘Devolution and Human Rights’ European Human Rights LR 367–375.
- HORNE A (1987) Macmillan 1957–1986 (London: Macmillan).
- HORWITZ H (1974) ‘Parliament and the glorious revolution’ Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research 36–52.
- HOUGH B (2005) ‘Public regulation of markets and fairs’ Public Law 586–607.
- HOUGHTON, LORD (1976) Report of the committee on financial aid to political parties (London: HMSO; Cmnd 6601).
- HOUSE OF COMMONS FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE (1981) British North America Acts (London: HMSO).
- HOUSE OF COMMONS PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION SELECT COMMITTEE (2002) Continuing the reform (HC 4941 2001–2002) (London: HMSO).
- HUGHES D AND POLLARD D (1990) Cases and materials on constitutional and administrative law (London: Butterworths).

- HUME D (1978) 'Of the original contract', in Locke J (ed) Social contract: essays by Locke, Hume and Rousseau (London: OUP).
- HUNT M (1997) Using human rights law in English courts (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- (1997a) 'Constitutionalism and the contractualisation of government', in Taggart M (ed) The province of administrative law (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- (1998) 'The "horizontal effect" of the Human Rights Act' Public Law 422–423.
- HUTTON R (1985) The Restoration (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- INGMAN T (9th edn, 2002) The English legal process (London: OUP).
- (13th edn, 2011) English legal process (London: OUP).
- INSTITUTE OF FISCAL STUDIES (1990) Local government finance (London: IFS).
- IRVINE, LORD (1997) 'Constitutional reform and a Bill of Rights' European Human Rights LR 483–493.
- IRVING R (1975) 'The United Kingdom referendum, June 1975' ELRev 3–12.
- IRWIN H (1988) 'Opportunities for back-benchers', in Ryle and Richards infra.
- JACKMANN R (1984) 'The Rates Bill: a measure of desperation' Political Quarterly 161–170.
- JACKSON P (1964) 'The royal prerogative' MLR 709–717.
- (1965) 'War Damage Act 1965' MLR 574–576.
- JAFFE L AND HENDERSON G (1956) 'Judicial review and the rule of law: historical origins' LQR 345.
- JENKINS D (2007) 'The European legal tradition against torture and implementation of Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights' Public Law 15–22.
- JENKINS J (1987) 'The green sheep in Colonel Gaddafi Drive' New Society, 9 January 1987.
- JENKINS R (1952) 'Equality', in Crossman R. (ed) New Fabian Essays (London: Turnstile).
- (1968) Mr Balfour's Poodle (London: Heinemann).
- (1991) A life at the centre pp 144–146 (London: Pan).
- (1994) 'Churchill: the government of 1951–1955', in Blake and Louis supra.
- (1999) Report of the independent commission on the voting system (London: HMSO).
- JENNINGS I (5th edn, 1959) The law and the constitution (London: Hodder and Stoughton).
- (3rd edn, 1959) Cabinet government (Cambridge: CUP).
- (4th edn, 1960) Principles of local government law (London: University of London Press).
- JENNINGS I AND TAMBIAH H (1952) The dominion of Ceylon (London: Stevens and Sons).
- JENSEN M (1990) 'The Articles of Confederation', in Birnbaum and Ollman supra.
- JOHNSON N (1988) 'Departmental select committees', in Ryle and Richards infra.
- JOINT COMMITTEE ON HOUSE OF LORDS REFORM (2002) First Report (HL 171/HC 17)(London: HMSO).
- JONES A (1972) The politics of reform 1884 (Cambridge: CUP).
- JONES B AND KAVANAGH D (6th edn, 1998) British politics today (Manchester: Manchester University Press).
- JONES G (1973) 'Herbert Morrison and Populism' Public Law 11–31.
- (1973) 'The Prime Minister and parliamentary questions' Parliamentary Affairs 260–272.
- JONES H (1958) 'The rule of law and the welfare state' Columbia LR 143–156.
- JONES T (1996) 'The devaluation of human rights under the European Convention' Public Law 430–449.
- (1999) 'Judicial bias and disqualification in the Pinochet case' Public Law 391–398.

- JONES T AND WILLIAMS J (2005) 'The legislative future of Wales' MLR 642–653.
- JOWELL J (2003) 'Judicial deference: servility, civility or institutional capacity' (2003) Public Law 592–614.
- (2004) 'Heading for constitutional crisis' New Law Journal (19 March) 401–403.
- (2006) 'Parliamentary sovereignty under the new constitutional hypothesis' Public Law 562–580.
- JOWELL J AND LESTER A (1988) 'Proportionality: neither novel nor dangerous', in Jowell J and Oliver D (eds) New directions in judicial review (London: Stevens and Sons).
- JOWELL J AND OLIVER D (eds) (1985; 2nd edn, 1989; 3rd edn, 1994) The changing constitution (London: OUP).
- JUDSON M (1936) 'Henry Parker and the theory of parliamentary sovereignty', in Wittke C (ed) Essays in honour of McIlwain (Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press).
- KAVANAGH A (2004) 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach' Public Law 537–545.
- (2005) 'Pepper v Hart and matters of constitutional principle' 121 LQR 98–122.
- KAVANAGH D AND SELDON A (eds) (1994) The Major effect (London: Macmillan).
- KAVANAGH D AND COWLEY P (2010) The British General election of 2010 (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan).
- KAY A, LEGG C AND FOOT J (1985) The 1980 Tenant's Rights in Practice (London: City University).
- KEENAN P (1962) 'Some legal consequences of Britain's entry into the European Common Market' Public Law 327–343.
- KEIR D (1936) 'The case of ship-money' LQR 546–574.
- KEIR D (8th edn, 1966) The constitutional history of modern Britain (London: Adam and Charles Black).
- (6th edn, 1978) Cases in constitutional law (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- KEITH-LUCAS B (1962) 'Populism' Public Law 52–80.
- KELLY A, HARBISON W AND BEIZ H (1983) The American Constitution (New York: W.W. Norton).
- KENNY C (1922) 'The evolution of the law of blasphemy' Cambridge LJ 127–142.
- KENNY M (2009) 'Taking the temperature of the British political elite 3: when grubby is the order of the day' Parliamentary Affairs 503–513.
- KENT S (1989) Sex and suffrage in Britain 1860–1914 (New Jersey: Princeton University Press).
- KLOTT J (1998) 'Report on Germany' in Slaughter A, Stone Sweet A and Weiler J (eds) The European courts and national courts (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- KLUG F (1999) 'The Human Rights Act 1998, Pepper v Hart and all that' Public Law 246–273.
- KLUG F AND STARMER K (2001) 'Incorporation through the "from door": the first year of the Human Rights Act' Public Law 654–665.
- KNIGHT C (2009) 'Expectations in transition' Public Law 15–25.
- KOOPMANS T (1992) 'Federalism: the wrong debate' CMLRev 1047–1052.
- LAFFIN M (1986) Professionalism and policy (Aldershot: Gower).
- LAIRD V (1992) 'Reflections on R. v R' Modern LR 386–392.
- LANE R (1993) 'New Community competencies under the Maastricht Treaty' CML Rev 929–980.
- LANHAM D (1984) 'Delegation and the alter ego principle' LQR 587–611.
- LARDY H (2001) 'Democracy by default: the Representation of the People Act 2000' Modern LR 263–281.
- LARGE D (1963) 'The decline of the party of the Crown' English Historical Review 669–695.
- LASKI H (1926) 'Judicial review of social policy in England' Harvard LR 832–848.

- LASLETT P (1998) 'The social and political theory of Two Treatises of Government', in Laslett infra.
- (1988) 'Two Treatises of Government and the revolution of 1688', in Laslett infra.
- LASLETT P (ed) (1988) Locke—Two Treatises of Government (Cambridge: CUP).
- LASOK D AND BRIDGE J (1991) Law and institutions of the European Community (London: Butterworths).
- LAUNDY P (1979) 'The Speaker and his office in the twentieth century' in Walkland S (ed) The House of Commons in the twentieth century (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- LAW COMMISSION (1976) Report on remedies in administrative law (London: HMSO; Cmnd 6407).
- LAWRENCE I (2006) 'Punishment without law: how ends justify the means in marital rape' Denning LJ 37–50.
- LAWSON, SIR JOHN (1993) 'Is the High Court the guardian of fundamental constitutional rights?' Public Law 59–79.
- (1995) 'Law and democracy' Public Law 72–93.
- (1998) 'The limitations of human rights' Public Law 254–265.
- LAWSON N (1992) The view from No. 11 (London: Lawrence and Wishart).
- LEACH S (1989) 'Strengthening local democracy? The government's response to Widdicombe', in Stewart J and Stoker G (eds) The future of local government (London: Macmillan).
- LEE S (1985) 'Prerogative and public principles' Public Law 186–193.
- (1994) 'Law and the constitution' in Kavanagh D and Seldon A (eds) The Major effect (London: Macmillan).
- LEIGH I (1986) 'A tapper's charter' Public Law 8–18.
- (1992) 'Spycatcher in Strasbourg' Public Law 200–208.
- (2002) 'Taking rights proportionately' Public Law 265–280.
- LEIGH I AND LUSTGARTEN L (1996) 'Five volumes in search of accountability: the Scott Report' MLR 695–725.
- LE MAY G (1957) 'Parliament, the constitution and the doctrine of the mandate' South African Law Journal 33–42.
- LENEMAN L (1991) 'When women were not "persons": the Scottish women graduates case, 1906–1908' Juridical Review 109–118.
- LEOPOLD P (1981) 'References in court to Hansard' Public Law 316–321.
- (1984) 'Parliamentary privilege and an MP's threats' Public Law 547–550.
- (1986) 'Leaks and squeaks in the Palace of Westminster' Public Law 368–374.
- (1989) 'The freedom of peers from arrest' Public Law 398–406.
- (1998) 'The application of the civil and criminal law to members of Parliament and parliamentary proceedings', in Oliver and Drewry infra.
- (1999) 'The report of the Joint Committee on parliamentary privilege' Public Law 604–615.
- LESTER A (1984) 'Fundamental rights: the United Kingdom isolated' Public Law 46–72.
- (1998) 'The Act of the possible....' European Human Rights LR 665–680.
- LESTER A AND PANNICK D (2000) 'The impact of the Human Rights Act on private law: the knight's move' LQR 380–392.
- LE SUEUR A (2004) 'Three strikes and it's out....' Public Law 225–235.
- (2008) 'Gordon Brown's new constitutional settlement' Public Law 21–27.
- LEVY L (1987) 'Introduction', in Levy L (ed) The Making of the Constitution (New York: OUP).
- LEWIN J (1956) 'The struggle for law in South Africa' Political Quarterly 176–181.
- LEWIS A (1991) Make no law (New York: Vintage Books).
- LEWIS T AND CUMPER P (2009) 'Balancing freedom of political expression against equality of opportunity: the courts and the

- UK broadcasting ban on political advertising' Public Law 89–111.
- LIDDINGTON J AND NORRIS J (1979) One hand tied behind us (London: Virago).
- LLOYD, LORD (1996) Inquiry into legislation against terrorism (Cm 3420: London: HMSO).
- LOACH J (1990) Parliament under the Tudors (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- LOCK G (1988) 'Information for Parliament', in Ryle and Richards infra.
- (1989) 'The 1689 Bill of Rights' Political Studies 541–556.
- (1999) 'The report of the Joint Committee on parliamentary privilege' Study of Parliament Group Newsletter (summer) 13–19.
- LOCKHART W, KAMISAT Y, CHOPER J AND SHIFFRIN S (6th edn, 1986) Constitutional law (West Publishing: St Paul, Minnesota).
- LOCKE J (1988) Two treatises of government (Cambridge: CUP).
- LOUGHLIN M (1978) 'Procedural fairness: a study of the crisis in administrative law theory' University of Toronto LJ 280–316.
- (1985) 'Municipal socialism in a unitary state', in MacAuslan P and McEldowney J (eds) Law, legitimacy and the constitution (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- (1985a) 'The restructuring of central-local government legal relations' Local Government Studies 59–73.
- (1986) Local government in the modern state (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- (1992) Public law and political theory (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1994) 'The restructuring of central-local government relations', in Jowell and Oliver supra.
- (1988) Legality and locality (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- LOVELAND I (1992) 'Labour and the Constitution: the "right" approach to reform' Parliamentary Affairs 173–187.
- (1993) 'Racial segregation in state schools: the parent's right to choose?' Journal of Law and Society 341–355.
- (1993a) 'An unappealing analysis of the public-private divide: the case of the homelessness legislation' Liverpool LR 39–59.
- (1994) 'Defamation of government: taking lessons from America?' Legal Studies 206–225.
- (1995) Housing homeless persons (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1995a) (ed) Frontiers of criminality (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- (1995b) (ed) A special relationship? (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1995c) 'The criminalisation of racist violence', in Loveland (1995b) supra.
- (1995d) 'Introduction: should we take lessons from America?', in Loveland (ed) A special relationship? (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1996) Constitutional law (London: Butterworths).
- (1997) 'The war against the judges' Political Quarterly 162–171.
- (1998) Importing the First Amendment (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- (1998a) 'City of Chicago v Tribune Co—in contexts', in Loveland I (ed) Importing the First Amendment (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- (1999) By due process of law: racial discrimination and the right to vote in South Africa 1850–1960 (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- (1999a) 'Constitutional law or administrative law? The Human Rights Act 1998' Contemporary Issues in Law 124–140.
- (1999b) 'Local authorities' in Blackburn R and Plant R (eds) Constitutional reform (London: Longman).
- (2000) 'Reynolds v Times Newspapers in the House of Lords' Public Law 351–357.
- (2000a) Political libels (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- (2003) 'Making it up as they go along: the Court of Appeal on succession rights in tenancies to same sex partners' Public Law 222–235.

- (2009) 'A tale of two trespassers: reconsidering the Impact of the Human Rights Act on rights of residence in rented housing' European Human Rights Law Review Part 1 at 148–169; Part 2 at 495–511.
- (2010) 'The shifting sands of Art 8 jurisprudence in English housing law' European Human Rights Law Review 151–163.
- LOWE N (1979) 'Contempt of Court Act' Public Law 20–28.
- LUSTGARTEN L (1989) The governance of police (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- LUSTGARTEN L AND LEIGH I (1994) In from the cold: national security and parliamentary democracy (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- MACCORMICK N (1978) 'Does the United Kingdom have a constitution?' NILQ 1–20.
- MACKINTOSH J (1962) The British Cabinet (London: Stevens and Sons).
- (1974) 'The report of the Royal Commission on the Constitution 1969–1973' Parliamentary Affairs 115–123.
- MADGWICK P (1966) 'Resignations' Parliamentary Affairs 59–76.
- MAGNUS P (1963) Gladstone (London: John Murray).
- MAIDMENT R (1992) The Supreme Court and the New Deal (Buckingham: Open University Press).
- MAIER P (1963) 'John Wilkes and American disillusionment with Britain' William and Mary Quarterly 373–395.
- MAIT C AND MCCLOUD B (1999) 'Financial arrangements', in Hassan infra.
- MAITLAND F (1908) The Constitutional history of England (Cambridge: CUP).
- MALLESON K (2000) 'Judicial bias and disqualification after Pinochet (No.2)' MLR 119–127.
- MALPASS P AND MURIE A (1987) Housing policy and practice (1987) (London: Macmillan).
- MANDLER P (1990) Aristocratic government in the age of reform (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- MANN F (1979) 'Contempt of court in the House of Lords and the European Court of Human Rights' LQR 348–354.
- MARKESENIS B (1973) 'The royal prerogative revisited' Cambridge LJ 287–309.
- (1986) 'The right to be let alone versus freedom of speech' Public Law 67–81.
- (1990) 'Our patchy law of privacy' MLR 802–809.
- MARRIOT J (2005) 'Alarmist or relaxed? Election expenditure limits and free speech' Public Law 764–784.
- MARRIOT J AND NICOL D (1999) 'The Human Rights Act, representative standing and the victim culture' European Human Rights LR 730–741.
- MARSHALL G (1954) 'What is Parliament? The changing concept of Parliamentary Sovereignty' Political Studies 193–209.
- (1979) 'The House of Commons and its privileges', in Walkland infra.
- (1984) Constitutional conventions (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1986) 'Ministers, civil servants and open government' in Harlow supra.
- (1992) 'Ministerial responsibility, the Home Office and Mr Baker' Public Law 7–12.
- (1998) 'Hansard and the interpretation of statutes', in Oliver and Drewry infra.
- MARSHALL G AND LOVEDAY B (1994) 'The police: independence and accountability', in Jowell and Oliver supra.
- MASHAW J (1976) 'The Supreme Court's due process calculus for administrative adjudication in Matthews v Eldridge...' University of Chicago LR 28–59.
- MASON D (1985) Revising the rating system (London: Adam Smith Institute).
- MATHER F (1962) 'The government and the Chartists', in Briggs A (ed) Chartist studies (London: Macmillan).
- MATTHEW C (1986) Gladstone 1809–1874 (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- MAUDE A AND SZEMEREY J (1981) Why electoral reform? The case for electoral

- reform examined* (London: Conservative Political Centre).
- McAUSLAN P (1983) 'Administrative law, collective consumption and judicial policy' MLR 1–21.
- (1987) 'The Widdicombe Report: local government business or politics' Public Law 154–162.
- McAUSLAN P AND McELDOWNEY J (eds) (1985) Law, Legitimacy and the constitution (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- McBRIDE J (1983) 'The doctrine of exclusivity and judicial review: O'Reilly v Mackman' Civil Justice Quarterly 268–281.
- McCLEAN I (1999) 'The Jenkins Commission and the implications of electoral reform for the UK' Government and Opposition 145–160.
- McCLEAN R (1999) 'A brief history of Scottish home rule', in Hassan supra.
- McELDOWNEY J (1985) 'Dicey in historical perspective', in McAuslan and McEldowney supra.
- (1988) 'The contingencies fund and the Parliamentary scrutiny of public finance' Public Law 232–245.
- McGARRY J (2005) 'Parliamentary sovereignty, judges and the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants etc) bill' Liverpool LR 1–12.
- McHARG A (2006) 'What is delegated legislation?' Public Law 539–561.
- McKAY D (1989) American politics and society (Oxford: Basil Blackwell).
- MEISEL F (2004) 'The Aston Cantlow case: blots on English jurisprudence and the public/private law divide' Public Law 2–10.
- MERRET S (1979) State housing in Britain (London: RKP).
- METCALFE E (2010) 'Free to lead as well as to be led: Section 2 of the Human Rights Act and the relationship between the UK courts and Strasbourg' Justice Journal 7–41.
- MIERS D (1983) 'Citing Hansard as an aid to interpretation' Statute LR 98–102.
- MILIBAND R AND SMITH J (eds) (1975) Socialist Register (London: Merlin).
- MILLER C (1976) Contempt of court (London: Paul Elek).
- MILLER J (1982) 'The Glorious Revolution: "contract" and "abdication" reconsidered' 25 The Historical Journal 541–555.
- MINISTRY OF JUSTICE (2007) The governance of Britain (Cm 7170: London: HMSO).
- (2008) An elected second chamber (Cm 7438: London: HMSO).
- (2009) Bribery: draft legislation (Cm 7570: London: HMSO).
- MIRFIELD P (1979) 'Can the House of Lords be lawfully abolished?' LQR 36–58.
- MITCHELL A (1974) 'Clay Cross' Political Quarterly 165–175.
- MODDOD T (1990) 'British Asian Muslims and the Rushdie affair' Political Quarterly 143–160.
- MONTESQUIEU C (1989) The spirit of the laws (Cambridge: CUP).
- MOREHAM N (2001) 'Douglas and others v Hello Ltd—the protection of privacy in English private law' Modern LR 767–775.
- MORGAN J (2002) 'Questioning the "true effect" of the Human Rights Act' Legal Studies 259–275.
- (2004) 'Privacy in the House of Lords, again' LQR 563–566.
- MORRIS G AND FREDMAN S (1991) 'Judicial review and civil servants' Public Law 485–490.
- MOUNT F (1992) The British constitution now (London: Heinemann).
- MOWBRAY A (1999) 'The composition and operation of the new European Court of Human Rights' Public Law 219–231.
- MULLAN D (1975) 'Fairness: the new natural justice' University of Toronto LJ 280–316.
- MULLAN K (1999) 'The impact of Pepper v Hart' in Carmichael and Dickson (eds) The House of Lords: its parliamentary and judicial roles (Oxford: Hart Publishing).

- MUNN P (ed) Parents and schools (London: Routledge).
- MUNRO C (1976) 'Elections and expenditure' Public Law 300–304.
- (1987) Studies in constitutional law (London: Butterworths).
- (1989) (2nd edn, 1989) Studies in constitutional law (London: Butterworths).
- (2011) 'Parliamentarians, privilege and prosecutions' Scots Law Times 1–4.
- MURDIE A (1990) 'Bailiffs, Henry III, the community charge and all that' Municipal Journal August 17–23.
- MYLES A (1999) 'Scotland's Parliament White Paper', in Hassan supra.
- NALLY S AND DEAR J (1990) 'No surrender' Municipal Journal, October 12–18.
- NATHANSON N (1979/1980) 'The Sunday Times case: freedom of the press and contempt of court under English law and the European Convention on Human Rights' Kentucky LJ 971–1025.
- NEVILLE-BROWN L AND KENNEDY T (1994) The Court of Justice of the European Communities (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- NICOL D (1996) 'Disapplying with relish? The Industrial Tribunals and Acts of Parliament' Public Law 579–589.
- (1999) 'The legal constitution: United Kingdom Parliament and European Court of Justice' Journal of Legislative Studies 131–151.
- (1999a) 'Limitation periods under the Human Rights Act 1998 and judicial review' LQR 216–220.
- (2004) 'Gender re-assignment and the transformation of the Human Rights Act' LQR 194–198.
- (2004a) 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson' Public Law 273–281.
- (2011) 'Legitimacy of the Commons debate on prisoner voting' Public Law 681–691.
- NICOL W (1984) 'The Luxembourg compromise' Journal of Common Market Studies 35–43.
- NICOL W AND SIMONT (1994) Understanding the new European Community (London: Harvester Wheatsheaf).
- NIXON J AND NIXON N (1983) 'The social services committee' Journal of Social Policy 331–355.
- NORRIS M (1996) 'Ex p Smith: irrationality and human rights' Public Law 590–600.
- NORTON P (1979) 'The organisation of parliamentary parties', in Walkland infra.
- NORTON P (1978) 'Government defeats in the House of Commons' Public Law 360–378.
- (1979) 'The organisation of parliamentary parties', in Walkland infra.
- (1980) Dissension in the House of Commons 1974–1979 (London: Macmillan).
- (1982) "'Dear Minister"... The importance of MP to minister correspondence' Parliamentary Affairs 59–72.
- (1985) The Commons in perspective (London: Martin Robertson).
- (1988) 'Opposition to government', in Ryle and Richards infra.
- (2nd edn, 1991) The British polity (London: Longman).
- (2005) Parliament in British politics (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan).
- O'KEEFE D AND TWOMEY P (eds) Legal issues of the Maastricht Treaty (London: Wiley).
- O'LEARY B (1987) 'Why was the GLC abolished' International Journal of Urban and Regional Research 192–217.
- (1987) 'British farce, French drama amid tales of two cities' Public Administration 369–389.
- O'LEARY C (1962) The elimination of corrupt practices in British general elections 1868–1911 (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- O'LEARY S (1996) 'R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex parte Gallagher' Common Market LR 777–793.
- OLIVER D (1982) 'Why electoral reform? The case for electoral reform examined' Public Law 236–239.

- (1990) Government in the United Kingdom (Buckingham: Open University Press).
- (1992) 'Written constitutions: principles and problems' Parliamentary Affairs 135–152.
- (1999) 'An Electoral Commission: an ingenious idea' Public Law 585–588.
- (2001) 'Chancel repairs and the Human Rights Act' Public Law 651–653.
- (2004) 'Constitutionalism and the abolition of the role of the Lord Chancellor' Parliamentary Affairs 754–766.
- OLIVER D AND DREWRY G (eds) (1998) The law and parliament (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson).
- OUSLEY H (1984) 'Local authority race initiatives', in Body and Fudge C (eds) Local socialism (London: Macmillan).
- PADOVER S (ed) (1953) The complete Madison (Norwalk, Conn: Eastern Press).
- PALMER S (1988) 'In the interests of the state' Public Law 523–535.
- (1990) 'Tightening secrecy law: the Official Secrets Act 1989' Public Law 243–256.
- PANNICK D (1984) 'The Law Lords and the needs of contemporary society' Political Quarterly 318–328.
- (1994) 'No logic behind gagging terrorists' empty rhetoric' The Times August 2.
- (1988) 'What is a public authority?', in Jowell J and Oliver D (eds) New directions in judicial review (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- PARPWORD N (2010) 'The Parliamentary Standards Act 2009: a constitutional dangerous dogs measure' Modern LR 262–281.
- PEDLEY R (1958) 'Lord Hailsham's legacy' Journal of Education 4–5.
- (1966) The comprehensive school (Harmondsworth: Penguin).
- PESCATORE P (1972) 'The protection of human rights in the European Communities' CMLRev 73–79.
- (1983) 'The doctrine of direct effect: an infant disease of Community Law' ELRev 155–177.
- PETERSON J (1994) 'Subsidiarity: a definition to suit any vision' Parliamentary Affairs 116–132.
- PHELAN D (1992) 'Right to life of the unborn v promotion of trade in services' MLR 670–689.
- PHILLIMORE, LORD JUSTICE (1974) Report on contempt of court (London: HMSO; Cmnd 5794).
- PHILLIPSON G (1999) 'The Human Rights Act, "horizontal effect" and the common law: a bang or a whimper?' MLR 824–849.
- PIMLOTT B (1992) Harold Wilson (London: Harper Collins).
- PLOTNER J (1998) 'Report on France' in Slaughter A, Stone Sweet A and Weiler J (eds) The European courts and national courts (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- PLUCKNETT T (1928) 'Dr Bonham's Case and judicial review' Harvard LR 30–70.
- (11th ed, 1960) Taswell-Langmead's English constitutional history (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- PLUMB J (1937) 'Elections to the Convention Parliament of 1689' Cambridge Historical Journal 235–254.
- POOLE T (2005) 'Of headscarfs and heresies: The Denbigh High School case and public authority decisionmaking under the Human Rights Act' Public Law 685–695.
- PRYCE R (ed) (1985) The dynamics of European Union (London: Croom Helm).
- PUGH M (1980) Women's suffrage in Britain 1867–1928 (London: The Historical Association).
- (1985) 'Labour and women's suffrage', in Brown K (ed) The first Labour Party (London: Croom Helm).
- PULZER P (1983) 'Germany', in Butler and Bogdanor supra.
- PUNNET R (1968) British government and politics (London: Heinemann).
- PURDUE M (2002) 'The end of estoppel in public law' Journal of Planning and Environmental Law 509–510.

- QUANE H (2006) 'The Strasbourg jurisprudence and the meaning of a "public authority" under the HRA' Public Law 106–123.
- RAAB C (1993) 'Parents and schools: what role for education authorities?', in Munn supra.
- RADCLIFFE, VISCOUNT (1976) Report on Ministerial Memoirs, Cmnd 6386 (London: HMSO).
- RANSON S (1988) 'From 1944–1988: education, citizenship and democracy' Local Government Studies 1–19.
- RANSON S AND THOMAS H 'Educational reform: consumer democracy or social democracy', in Stewart J and Stoker G (eds) The future of local government (London: Macmillan).
- RAWLINGS H (1988) Law and the electoral process (London: Sweet and Maxwell).
- RAWLINGS R (1994) 'Legal politics: the UK and ratification of the Treaty on European Union (parts one and two)' Public Law 254–278 and 367–391.
- (1998) 'The new model Wales' Journal of Law and Society 461–512.
- (2005) 'Hastening slowly: the next phase of Welsh devolution' Public Law 824–852.
- RAWORTH P (1994) 'A timid step forwards: Maastricht and the democratisation of the EC' ELRev 16–33.
- RAYNER G AND WINNETT R (2009) No expenses spared (London: Bantam Press).
- RAZ J (1977) 'The rule of law and its virtue' LQR 195–211.
- REICH C (1963) 'Midnight welfare searches and the Social Security Act' Yale LJ 1346–1360.
- (1964) 'The new property' Yale LJ 733–787.
- (1965) 'Individual rights and social welfare: the emerging legal issues' Yale LJ 1244–1257.
- REID (Lord) (1972–1973) 'The judge as law-maker' Journal of the Society of Public Teachers of Law 22–28.
- RHODES R (1986) The national world of local government (London: Allen and Unwin).
- RICHARD (2004) Report of the Commission on the powers and electoral arrangements of the National Assembly for Wales (Cardiff: National Assembly for Wales).
- RICHARDS P (1970) Parliament and conscience (London: Allen and Unwin).
- RICHARDSON G (1986) 'The duty to give reasons: potential and practice' Public Law 437–469.
- RICHARDSON T (1995) 'The War Crimes Act 1991', in Loveland (1995a) supra.
- RIDLEY N (1991) My style of government (London: Fontana).
- ROBERTSON A AND MERRILL J (3rd edn) Human rights in Europe (Manchester: Manchester UP).
- ROBERTSON G (1999) The justice game (Harmondsworth: Penguin).
- ROBERTSON G AND NICOL A (3rd edn, 1992) Media law (Harmondsworth: Penguin).
- ROBINSON R (1988) 'The House of Commons and public money', in Ryle and Richards infra.
- RODGER (Lord) (2005) 'A time for everything under the law: some reflections on retrospectivity' LQR 57–71.
- ROGERS I (2002) 'From the Human Rights Act to the Charter: not another human rights instrument to consider' European Human Rights LR 343–356.
- ROMANOV R, WHYTE J AND LEESON H (1984) Canada notwithstanding (Toronto: Carswell/Metheun).
- ROSE H (1973) 'The Immigration Act 1971: a case study in the work of Parliament' Parliamentary Affairs 69–91.
- ROSTOW E (1945) 'The Japanese-American cases – a disaster' Yale LJ 489–533.
- ROUSSEAU J (1987) The social contract (edited and translated by C Betts) (Oxford: OUP).
- ROVER C (1967) Women's suffrage and party politics in Britain (London: RKP).
- ROWBOTTOM J (2005) 'The electoral Commission's proposals on the funding of political parties' Public Law 468–476.

- RUDE G (1962) Wilkes and liberty (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- RUSH M (1998) 'The law relating to members' conduct', in Oliver and Drewry supra.
- RUSSELL C (1971) The Crisis of Parliaments (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- RUSSELL M (2000) Reforming the House of Lords. Lessons from overseas (London: OUP).
- RYLE M AND RICHARDS (1988) The Commons under scrutiny (London: Routledge).
- SANDBERG R AND DOE N (2008) 'The strange death of blasphemy' Modern LR 971–986.
- SCARMAN, LORD (1987) 'Human Rights in an unwritten constitution' Denning LJ 129–139.
- SCHERMERS H (1993) 'The European Court of Human Rights after the merger' European LR 493–505.
- SCHIEMANN K (1990) 'Locus standi' Public Law 342–353.
- SCRATON P (1985) "'If you want a riot, change the law": the implications of the White Paper on Public order' Journal of Law and Society 385–393.
- SEDLEY S (1994) 'Governments, constitutions and judges', in Genn and Richardson supra.
- SELGADO E AND O'BRIEN C (2001) 'Table of cases under the Human Rights Act' European Human Rights Law Review 376.
- SEYMOUR C (1970) Electoral reform in England and Wales (Newton Abbot: David and Charles).
- SEYMORE-URE C (1964) 'The misuse of the question of privilege in the 1964–65 session of Parliament' Parliamentary Affairs 380–388.
- (1970) 'Proposed reforms of parliamentary privilege' Parliamentary Affairs 221–231.
- SHAH S (2005) 'The UK's anti-terror legislation and the House of Lords: the first skirmish' Human Rights LR 403–421.
- SHANNON R (1982) Gladstone Vol. 1 (London: Hamish Hamilton).
- SHARLAND A AND LOVELAND I (1997) 'The Defamation Act 1996 and political libels' Public Law 113–124.
- SHARP A (1983) Political ideas of the English civil war (London: Longman).
- SHARPE J (1970) 'Theories and value of local government' Political Studies 153–174.
- SHAW J (1993) EC law (London: Macmillan).
- (2001) 'The Treaty of Nice: legal and constitutional implications' European Public Law 195–207.
- SHELL D (1985) 'The House of Lords and the Thatcher government' Parliamentary Affairs 16–32.
- (1992) The House of Lords (London: Harvester Wheatsheaf).
- (1999) 'The future of the second chamber' Political Quarterly 390–395.
- (2000) 'Reforming the House of Lords' Public Law 193.
- SILK P (1992) How Parliament works (London: Longman).
- SILLS P (1968) 'Report of the Select Committee on parliamentary privilege' MLR 435–439.
- SIMON B (1988) Bending the rules (London: Lawrence and Wishart).
- SIMPSON A (1991) In the highest degree odious (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (2001) Human rights and the end of empire (Oxford: OUP).
- SKIDELSKY R (1968) 'Great Britain', in Woolf S (ed) European facism (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson).
- SKLAIR L (1975) 'The Struggle Against the Housing Finance Act', in Miliband R and Smith J (eds) The Socialist Register (London: Macmillan).
- SLAUGHTER A, STONE SWEET A AND WEILER J (eds) The European courts and national courts (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- SLAUGHTER T (1981) "'Abdicate" and "contract" in the Glorious Revolution' The Historical Journal 323–337.

- SMITH E (1992) The House of Lords in British politics and society 1815–1911 (London: Longman).
- SMITH H (1926) 'The residue of power in Canada' Canadian Bar Review 432.
- SMITH T (1957) 'The Union of 1707 as fundamental law' Public Law 99–121.
- SPECK W (1986) Reluctant revolutionaries (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- STARMER K (1999) European human rights law (London: Legal Action Group).
- STEINER J (1990) 'Coming to terms with EC directives' LQR 144–159.
- (3rd edn, 1992) EC law (London: Blackstone).
- (1993) 'From direct to Francovich: shifting means of enforcement of community law' ELRev 3–22.
- STELLMAN H (1985) 'Israel: the 1984 election and after' Parliamentary Affairs 73–85.
- STEWART J (1983) Defending public accountability (London: Demos).
- STEWART J (2006) 'A banana republic? The investigation into electoral fraud by the Birmingham election court' Parliamentary Affairs 654–667.
- STEWART J AND STOKER G (eds) The future of local government (London: Macmillan).
- STEWART R (1975) 'The reformation of American administrative law' Harvard LR 1667–1812.
- STEYN, LORD (2002) 'Democracy through law' European Human Rights LR 723–726.
- STONE C (1972) 'Should trees have standing? Towards legal rights for natural objects' Southern California LR 450–501.
- SUNKIN M (1987) 'What is happening to applications for judicial review' MLR 432–467.
- (1987a) 'Myths of judicial review' LAG Bulletin (September) 8.
- (1991) 'The judicial review caseload, 1987–1989' Public Law 490–499.
- (2004) 'Pushing forward the frontiers of human rights protection; the meaning of public authority under the Human Rights Act' Public Law 643–658.
- SZYSZCZAK E (1990) 'Sovereignty: crisis, compliance, confusion, complacency' ELRev 480–488.
- (1993) 'Interpretation of Community Law in the courts' ELRev 214–225.
- TAYLOR/DES (1977) A new partnership for schools (London: HMSO).
- TAYLOR P AND GUDGIN G (1976) 'The myth of non-partisan cartography' Urban Studies 13–25.
- THOMAS R (1987) 'The British Official Secrets Act 1911–1939 and the Ponting case', in Chapman R and Hunt M (eds) Open government (London: Routledge).
- THOMPSON E (1975) Whigs and hunters (London: Penguin).
- THOMPSON R AND GAME C (1985) 'Section 137: propoganda on the rates?' Local Government Studies 11–18.
- THORNE S (1938) 'Dr Bonham's case' LQR 543–552.
- TIERNEY S (1998) 'The Human Rights Bill: incorporating the European Convention on Human Rights into UK law' European Public Law 299–311.
- (1998a) 'Press freedom and public interest' European Human Rights LR 419–431.
- (2000) 'Constitutionalising the role of the judge: Scotland and the new order' European LR 49–72.
- (2000a) 'Devolution issues and s 21(1) of the Human Rights Act' European Human Rights LR 380–392.
- TITMUS R (1971) 'Welfare rights, law and discretion' Political Quarterly 133–151.
- TOMKINS A (1998) The constitution after Scott (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (2005) Our republican constitution (Hart: Oxford).
- TOMKINS A AND BIX B (1993) 'Local authorities and libel again' Modern LR 738–744.
- TOTH A (1986) 'The legal status of declarations attached to the SEA' CMLRev 903–812.
- (1994) 'Is subsidiarity justiciable?' ELRev 268–285.

- TRINADADE F (1972) 'Parliamentary sovereignty and the primacy of community law' MLR 375–402.
- TURBEVILLE A (1927) The House of Lords in the eighteenth century (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1958) The House of Lords in the Age of Reform (London: Faber and Faber).
- TURNER J (18th edn, 1962) Kenny's Outlines of criminal law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- TURPIN C (1985; 2nd edn, 1990) British government and the constitution (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson); (3rd edn, 1995) (London: Butterworths).
- UNDERDOWN D (1985) Revel, riot, and rebellion (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- UPTON M (1989) 'Marriage vows of the elephant: the constitution of 1707' LQR 79.
- VILE M (1967) Constitutionalism and the separation of powers (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- VINCENT-JONES P (1986) 'The hippy convoy and criminal trespass' Journal of Law and Society 343–370.
- WADE HRW (1955) 'The basis of legal sovereignty' Cambridge LJ 172–197.
- (1969) 'Constitutional and administrative aspects of the Anisminic case' LQR 198–212.
- (1972) 'Sovereignty and the European Communities' LQR 1–5.
- (1977) 'Judicial control of the prerogative' LQR 325–327.
- (1980) Constitutional fundamentals (London: Steven & Sons).
- (1985) 'The civil service and the prerogative' LQR 190–199.
- (1996) 'Sovereignty—revolution or evolution' LQR 568–575.
- (1996a) 'Habeas corpus and judicial review' LQR 55–70.
- (2000) 'Horizons of horizontality' LQR 217–224.
- WADE HRW AND FORSYTH C (1994) Administrative law (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- WAKEHAM COMMISSION (2000) A House for the future (London: HMSO; Cm 4534).
- WALKER C (1987) 'Review of the prerogative: the remaining issues' Public Law 63–84.
- (2007) 'The legal definition of terrorism in United Kingdom law and beyond' Public Law 331–352.
- WALKER P (1995) 'What's wrong with irrationality?' Public Law 556–576.
- WALKLAND S (ed) The House of Commons in the twentieth century (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- WALKLAND S AND RYLE M (eds) (1977) The Commons in the seventies (London: Martin Robertson).
- WALLINGTON P AND MCBRIDE J (1976) Civil Liberties and a Bill of Rights pp 28–29 (London: Cobden Trust).
- WALSH B (1989) 'Judicial review of dismissal from employment: coherence or confusion' Public Law 131–155.
- WARBRICK C (1998) 'Federalism and free speech', in Loveland I (ed) Importing the First Amendment? (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- WARBURTON M AND MALPASS P (1991) 'Riding the rent rocket' ROOF 27 July/August.
- WARD J (1973) Chartism (New York: Harper Row).
- WARD M (1988) 'Priced out' (1988) Housing 9 (October).
- WARREN S AND BRANDIES L (1890) 'The right to privacy' Harvard LR 193–220.
- WATSON J (2010) 'Clarity and ambiguity: a new approach to the legitimacy in the law of legitimate expectations' Legal Studies 633–655.
- WEARE V (1964) 'The House of Lords—prophecy and fulfilment' Parliamentary Affairs 422–433.
- WEILER J (1981) 'The Community system: the dual character of supra-nationalism' Yearbook of European Law 267–306.
- (1986) 'Eurocracy and distrust...' Washington Law Review 1103–1152.

- WEILER J AND LOCKHART N (1995) 'Taking rights seriously: the European Court and its fundamental rights jurisprudence (parts one and two)' CML Rev 51–94 and 579–627.
- WEIR A (1972) 'Local authority v critical ratepayer—a suit in defamation' Cambridge LJ 238–249.
- WELFARE D (1992) 'The Lords in defence of local government' Parliamentary Affairs 205–219.
- WELSH OFFICE (2005) Better governance for Wales (Cm 6582) (London: HMSO).
- WESTON C (1965) English constitutional theory and the House of Lords (London: RKP).
- WHITAKER R (2006) 'Backbench influence on government legislation? A flexing of parliamentary muscles at Westminster' Parliamentary Affairs 350–359.
- WHITE I AND GAY O (2010) Reducing the size of the House of Commons (London: House of Commons).
- WICKS E (2001) 'A new constitution for a new state? The 1707 union of England and Scotland' LQR 109.
- (2006) The evolution of a constitution (Oxford: Hart Publishing).
- WILLIAMS G (1978) Textbook of criminal law (London: Stevens).
- WILLIAMS K (2000) 'Defaming politicians: the not so common law' Modern LR 748–756.
- WILKS-HEEG S (2005) Purity of elections in the UK: causes for concern (Joseph Rowntree Reform Trust: York).
- WILSON D (2001) 'Local government: balancing diversity and uniformity' Parliamentary Affairs 289–307.
- WILSON H (1979) Final term (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson).
- WILSON T (1988) 'Local freedom and central control—a question of balance', in Bailey and Paddison (eds) The reform of local government finance in Britain (London: Routledge).
- WINTER J (1972) 'Direct applicability and direct effect: two distinct and different concepts in Community law' CML Rev 425–438.
- WINTERTON G (1976) 'The British grund-norm: parliamentary sovereignty re-examined' LQR 591–617.
- (1979) 'Is the House of Lords immortal?' LQR 386–392.
- (1981) 'Parliamentary supremacy and the judiciary' LQR 265–275.
- WITTKE C (ed) (1936) Essays in history and political theory in honour of Charles Howard McIlwain (Cambridge, Mass: HUP).
- (1970) The history of English parliamentary privilege (New York: Da Capo Press).
- WOLFFE W (1987) 'Values in conflict: incitement to racial hatred and the Public Order Act 1986' Public Law 85–95.
- WOODHOUSE D (1994) Ministers and Parliament (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- WOODWARD R (1991) 'Mobilising opposition: the campaign against housing action trusts in Tower Hamlets' Housing Studies 44–56.
- WOOLF H (1986) 'Public law—private law: why the divide?' Public Law 220–238.
- (1995) 'Droit public: English style' Public Law 57–71.
- (2004) 'The rule of law and a change in the constitution'; available on-line at <<http://www.dca.gov.uk/judicial/speeches/lcj030304.htm>>.
- WOOLF S (ed) European fascism (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson).
- YOUNG A (2002) 'Remedial and substantive horizontality: the common law and Douglas v Hello! Ltd' Public Law 232–241.
- (2005) Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza: avoiding the deference trap Public Law 23–34.
- YOUNG H (1991) One of us (London: Pan).
- ZANDER M (1994) The law-making process (London: Butterworths).
- (3rd edn, 1995) The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (London: Sweet and Maxwell).

This page intentionally left blank

Index

Introductory Note

References such as '178–9' indicate (not necessarily continuous) discussion of a topic across a range of pages. Wherever possible in the case of topics with many references, these have either been divided into sub-topics or only the most significant discussions of the topic are listed. Because the entire work is about 'constitutional law' the use of this term (and certain others which occur constantly throughout the book) as an entry point has been restricted. Information will be found under the corresponding detailed topics.

- A-G for New South Wales v
Trethowan 36–7, 156, 289,
403, 750
- A-G v De Keyser's Royal Hotel
Ltd 94–8, 100–1, 109, 395, 453
- A-G v Jones 210–11
- abdication 26, 674–5, 723
- abortion 66–7
- absolute majority systems
223–4
- abuse of power 496–8
- accessibility 203, 346–53,
357–60, 595
- accountability 101, 108, 115,
178, 291, 293, 324
- acto popularis 542, 546, 554
see also citizen's action
- additional member system
(AMS) 333–4
- adjournment debates 141, 145
- administrative functions 477–8
- administrative law 60–2, 78,
445–6, 510, 512–15, 535–7, 693–4 judicial review see judicial review
locus standi see locus standi
- Aga Khan decision 524–6
- age of consent 180, 569
- Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Bill 171
- AJR see judicial review, application for judicial review mechanism
- Al-Mas'ari case 629–30
- Alconbury case 694–5
- alter ego principle 457–8, 462
- always speaking principle
64–5, 79, 93, 452, 659
- American Constitution see
United States, Constitution
- American revolutionaries 4, 7–9, 11–14, 25, 27, 51, 55
- Amsterdam Treaty 416–17,
638, 752
- Anglo-Irish Agreement 109–10
- Anisimic Ltd v Foreign
Compensation Commission
76–8, 86, 204–5, 453, 511,
538, 701–3
- Anne (Queen) 157
- anti-nuclear protesters 493,
529, 564–6
- Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 739, 742
- armed forces 102, 159, 468–9, 682, 731
- arrest 6, 90, 236, 239, 557,
562, 626
- arrestable and non-arrestable offences 716–19, 721, 723
- at common law 713–16
- deprivation of liberty for ordinary offences 712–29
- governmental powers of 709–43
- house 710–11, 741
- Police and Criminal
Evidence Act 1984 w
711–12
- powers of detention after 722–4, 735, 738
- powers of detention without 724–9
- privilege 237–8
- statutory powers 715–16
- for terrorist offences see terrorism
- warrants 110, 716, 718
- arresting officers 717–20, 722, 731, 733–4
- Ashby v White 199, 232, 242
- Asquith, Herbert Henry 162,
165–6, 168–9, 172, 182,
261–2, 270–1
- Aston Cantlow appeal
682–3, 687
- asylum seekers 152, 623, 627, 629–30
Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 s 55 700–1 ouster clause provisions
in the Immigration and
Asylum Bill 2003 701–3
- Attlee, Clement 172, 265, 275,
526, 594–5
- audi alterem partem
477–502, 696 content of procedural fairness 499–501 legal representation
499–500, 626
obligation to give reasons for decisions 500–1
Ridge v Baldwin 482–6, 488,
491, 514, 538
- automatic disqualification
502–3, 505–6
- backbench MPs 122–3, 125,
127, 133–5, 141–5, 147, 150–4
- backwoodsmen 173–4, 328
- Bagehot, Walter 178, 274
- Baker, Kenneth 268, 279–80,
285, 512, 627–9
- Baldry, Tony 624
- Baldwin, Stanley 264, 266
- Balfour, Arthur 142, 161, 240
- Bank of England 277
- Barnard v National Dock
Labour Board 456, 513–14,
529–30, 538
- Bate's Case 88–9, 92
- Beatty v Gillbanks 561–2,
566, 715
- Belfast City Council v Miss
Behavin Ltd 695–6
- Belgium 226, 339, 341–2, 346,
351, 361–2, 650
- Bellinger v Bellinger 667–71

- benefits, welfare 151–2, 329, 551, 623
- Bentley, Derek 110–11
- Bevan, Nye 265
- bias 204, 284, 479, 502–9, 530
 direct financial interests 502–3, 505, 553
Gough test 504–7
 ideological bias in judicial decisions 505–7 non-judicial proceedings 508
Porter v Magill formula 507–8
 real danger of 504–7
- bicameral legislature 155–6, 323 see also House of Lords
- Bill of Rights 90–2, 230–1, 238, 244–5, 559–60, 636–7, 642–3
 American Constitution 16–17
 Art 4 88
 glorious revolution (1688) 25–7
- Bills see legislative process
- bishops 24, 77, 157, 182, 185, 652
- Blackstone, Sir William 30, 92, 101–2, 107, 115, 404, 720
- Blair, Tony 151–3, 180–2, 184–7, 330–2, 433–8, 638–9, 738–9
- blasphemy 233, 578–80, 709
 impact of the ECHR 607–11
- Blunkett, David 700–1
- BNF see British Nuclear Fuels
- Boothroyd, Betty 125–6
- borough councils 195–6, 198, 304–6, 318–23, 328, 516–17, 521–2
- Bottomley, Virginia 143
- Boundary Commission 203–6, 225
- Bradlaugh, Charles 234–6, 246, 675
- bribery 197, 209, 255, 257–8
- Bribery Act 2010 257–8
- Bribery Commissioner v Ranasinghe* 39–41, 43, 187, 371, 746
- British constitution see constitution
- British Nuclear Fuels (BNF) 552
- Brittan, Leon 280–1, 328, 720
- Bromley London Borough Council v Greater London Council* 320–2, 331, 448–9, 472
- Brown, Gordon 112, 132, 153, 191–2, 221, 224, 738
- Brutus v Cozens* 564–5, 597
- Bryce Commission 163, 170
- Burke, Edmund 120, 234, 371, 712
- Burmah Oil Co (Burmah Trading) v Lord Advocate* 78–9, 91, 93, 108, 169, 269
- busybodies 542, 549, 552–4, 653–4
- Butler, R A 57, 103
- Butskellism 57, 296, 306–9, 313, 335, 437
- by-elections 170, 210–11, 217, 234–5, 272, 275
- bye-laws 32, 311, 422, 453, 459, 471–2, 529–32
- Cabinet Ministers 123, 126, 178, 186, 264–7, 274, 277
- Callaghan, James 145, 204–5, 264, 266–7, 274–5, 279, 281
- Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament see CND
- Canada 422, 429–31
 constitution 287–91, 301, 431, 750
 courts 288–90, 430–1, 644, 750
- Carrington, Peter (Lord) 172, 279
- Case of Impositions* 87–8, 91
- Case of Proclamations* 87–8
- Case of Prohibitions* 87, 110
- cash for questions 252–5, 258, 632
- Castells v Spain* 604–6, 614, 648
- Catholics 90, 234, 562, 609
- certiorari 481, 510–11, 513–15, 523, 531, 533
 locus standi 536, 541–4, 552
- Ceylon 39–40, 481–2
- Chamberlain, Joseph 266–7
- Charles I 24, 86, 88–90, 230
- Charles II 24–5, 121, 156
- Chartism 454, 560
- Child Poverty Action Group 551
- China Navigation* 101–2
- Chorlton v Lings* 47, 63, 76, 429–30
- Church of England 207, 609, 652, 682
- Church of Scientology 372, 487
- Churchill, Sir Winston 265, 306–7, 709
- cinemas 61, 455, 465, 471
- citizen's action test 542–3, 548–9
- Citizen's Charters 286
- civil liberties see human rights
- civil servants 105, 149, 278–9, 284–6, 483, 500, 572–4
- Civil Service Appeal Board (CSAB) 500
- civil war 23–4, 26, 28, 87, 90–1, 230, 628
- Clark, Alan 132, 268, 291–2
- Clarke, Kenneth 111, 260
- Clay Cross council 315, 560
- close assimilation test 680–2, 685
- CND (Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament) 493, 564–6
- co-equality 156–60, 168, 178, 199, 271
- coalition governments 154, 220–2, 224–5, 266, 272, 434–5, 750–2
- Cohn-Bendit controversy 376–7, 383–4, 413
- Coke CJ 22, 29, 54, 60, 87–8, 110, 228
- collective responsibility 262–9, 328, 342, 407 from Cabinet to Prime Ministerial Government 274–7 confidence 263–4
 confidentiality 267–9
 unanimity 264–7
- colonies 12–13, 18, 34, 36, 38–9, 41, 113–15 see also United States, Declaration of Independence
- Committee on Standards and Privileges (CSP) 228, 253–5
- committee stage 131–2, 176, 201, 250, 641–2, 644, 712
- common law arrest 713–16
- Commons see House of Commons
- community charge 317, 327–30, 407, 560, 625
- Community law see European Community/Union
- competence 13, 22, 70, 87, 178, 207, 346 constitutional 242, 248
 interpretive 346, 348, 361, 595 legislative 139, 155, 189, 404, 427, 439 limited 164–5, 190, 340, 394
- complementarity 157, 159–60, 168, 183
- confidence rule 263–4, 267
- confidentiality 485, 574–5, 577, 613–14, 690
 and collective responsibility 267–9

- Congreve v Home Office* 451–3, 467, 472
- conscience 12, 182, 589, 695
- consent 7–9, 11–13, 21, 24–5, 295–6, 305–7, 569–70
- age of 180, 569
- informed 12, 126, 239, 251, 292, 328, 335
- of parliament 25–6, 90–1
- popular 12, 306, 335–6, 436, 751
- conspiracy to corrupt public morals 79–80
- constituency system 195, 220, 224
- 1969 controversy 204–5
- 1983 controversy 205
- apportionment 203–4, 211, 222, 225, 441
- Boundary Commission 203–6, 225
- Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 205–6
- size of constituencies 203–5, 421
- constitution 3–19, 25–9, 35–6, 38–40, 54–7, 345–8, 359–64
- see also* Introductory Note
- conventions see constitutional conventions
- definition 3–19
- devolution 421–3, 425–6, 428, 435–6, 438–9, 441, 752
- see also* Scotland; Wales
- Diceyan theory see Diceyan theory
- electoral system see electoral system
- first modern 9–19
- parliamentary sovereignty see parliamentary sovereignty
- as social and political contract 7–9
- constitutional
- conventions 117, 260–2, 269–70, 272–4, 290, 294–6, 424
- avoidance of gross evils 295
- collective responsibility see collective responsibility
- Constitutional Reform and Governance Act 2010 293–4
- Diceyan perspective 261
- functions and sources 261–2
- individual ministerial responsibility see individual ministerial responsibility
- laws and conventions distinguished 287–90
- Matrix–Churchill controversy 291–3, 486, 632
- Monarch see Monarch
- patriation of Canadian constitution 287–90
- Ponsonby rule 112, 293–4
- Scottish 423–4, 431
- Constitutional Reform Act 2005 192, 752
- Constitutional Reform and Governance Act 2010 293–4
- constitutionalism 295, 323
- constitutionality 39, 45, 89, 104–5, 172, 386, 709
- contempt of court 313, 453, 580–3, 592, 605–7, 627–8, 704
- Contempt of Court Act 1981 573, 607, 613, 650
- contempt of the house 232, 249–50, 292
- contracting out 60, 76, 100, 286
- contracts, social and political 7–9
- control orders 741
- conventions see constitutional conventions
- Cooke, Robin 153, 185, 265
- corruption 4, 52, 197, 200–1, 251, 255, 303
- Costa v ENEL* 352–3, 355, 377, 405
- council housing 310, 313–16, 324, 326, 522, 680, 687
- Housing Finance Act 1972 315–16
- privatisation 324–7
- Housing Action Trusts 326–7, 687
- individuated and collective 324–5
- opting out 326
- right to buy 325–6
- Council of Europe 588–9, 626, 705
- council tax 330, 333
- Covent Garden neighbourhood 550
- Crichel Down controversy 278–9, 283, 500, 514
- criminal trespass 566–7
- Cromwell, Oliver 24, 156
- Crosland, Anthony 56, 316, 437
- cross-examination 292, 458, 512, 515, 517–19, 523, 535
- Crossman, Richard 56, 146–8, 267–8, 274–5, 279, 282, 284
- Diaries* 147, 205, 267–8, 283, 287, 290, 574–5
- cruise missiles 565, 573
- CSAB see Civil Service Appeal Board
- CSP see Committee on Standards and Privileges
- Currie, Edwina 280–1, 283
- Daly case 694–5, 697, 699
- Dalyell, Tam 573–4
- Darnel's Case 89–90, 92
- Datafin decision 524–5, 527–8
- De Gaulle, Charles 355, 365–6
- death sentence 110
- Declaration of Right 25–6, 88, 230
- declarations
- false 210–11
- of incompatibility 643–4, 647, 655, 661, 663–5, 669, 739–40
- locus standi 535–49
- defamation 240–2, 585, 603–5, 621
- deference principle 674–5, 698, 739
- Defrenne v Sabena* 375, 381, 569
- delaying powers 167, 172, 189, 287
- delegated legislation 125, 136–9, 164, 170, 177–8, 187–8, 630
- Delors, Jacques 392, 408, 413
- democracy 4–5, 7, 50–1, 194–5, 295–6, 403–5, 657
- definition(s) 4–9
- electoral system see electoral system
- local 304, 309, 317, 320, 324
- representative 303, 426, 584
- rule of law see rule of law
- democratic deficit 385–6, 391, 394–5, 413, 625
- Denbigh High School case 695–6, 699
- Denmark 415, 417–18, 696
- departmental select committees see select committees
- deportation of foreign nationals 113, 458, 470, 480, 486, 627, 630
- deprivation of liberty see also arrest
- Art 5 ECHR 710–11, 722, 729, 741
- for ordinary offences 712–29
- for terrorist offences 729–41
- Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers 603–4, 612, 620–1

- detention 6–7, 69, 89, 709–12, 714–16, 722–38, 740–2 after arrest 722–4, 735, 738 powers of 510, 711–12, 723, 728, 739 pre-charge 735–6
 terrorism see terrorism without arrest 724–9
- devolution 421–3, 425–6, 428, 434–9, 441, 730–1, 752 see also Scotland; Wales
- Dewar, Donald 432–3
- Diceyan theory 22–3, 34–5, 50–1, 53–5, 59, 366–7, 403–4
- Dickens, Geoffrey 241
- direct effect of EC/EU law 349–52, 354–5, 357–66, 372–7, 379–85, 395–6, 412–13
see also indirect effect
 Cohn-Bendit controversy 376–7, 383–4, 413
 directives 358, 372, 375, 380–1, 683
 horizontal see horizontal direct effect
 Member State judicial reaction to direct effect and precedence of EEC law 360–5
Politi 357–8, 363, 366
 regulations 357–8, 363, 366
Van Duyn v Home Office 372–3, 377, 384, 487, 624
 vertical see vertical direct effect
- direct financial interests 502–3, 505, 553
- discovery 512–13, 515–19, 523, 529, 535, 537, 547
- discretion 58, 312–14, 399, 429, 450, 458–60, 519 fettering of 458–60, 512, 530 judicial 545–6
 substantive 491–4, 496
- discrimination 374–5, 379–80, 396–7, 417, 569, 669–70, 740 racial 37, 360, 506, 651
- dismissals 123, 197, 231, 273, 397–8, 482, 523–4
- disorder see public protest and public order
- Disraeli, Benjamin 200–1, 266
- dissolution of parliament 25, 91–2, 107, 162, 210, 225, 269
- divine law 8, 15, 21–3, 26, 29, 502
- divine right 24 see also royal prerogative
- dog-doping 523
- Doherty v Birmingham City Council 676, 697–9, 705
- Donaldson, John (Lord) 205, 500, 524–5, 548–9, 631–2, 722–3
- donations 213–15
- Donoughmore Committee 137–9
- Douglas and Zeta-Jones v Hello! Ltd 689–90
- drink-driving 457
- dualism 236, 240, 243
- Dugdale, Sir Thomas 278
- Duke v GEC Reliance Ltd 396, 398–9
- Duncan Smith, Iain 624
- early day motions 145
- EC see European Community
- ECHR see European Convention on Human Rights
- ECJ see European Court of Justice
- economic policy 150, 160, 265, 272, 275, 296, 407
 as constitutional issue 5
- ECSC see European Coal and Steel Community
- education 57, 144, 147–8, 305–7, 316, 330, 495
- Edward VII 161, 270
- EEC see European Economic Community
- effet utile 351, 357–65, 372–3, 380–1, 386, 405, 412 see also direct effect of EC/EU law
 Cohn-Bendit controversy 376–7, 383–4, 413
- elected Mayors 331–2
- election campaigns 189, 194–5, 197, 203, 206, 232, 306 see also electoral system candidates 207–8
Sanders v Chichester 208–9
 contents and conduct 206–17 financing 209–10
A-G v Jones 210–11
 local not national limit on party spending 211–15
 Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 213–15
 television and radio broadcasting 215–17
 voters 206–7
- election courts 211, 226
- Electoral Commission 205–7, 209, 213–16, 225–6
- electoral system 119, 180, 183, 192, 194–227, 427, 751 constituency system see constituency system election campaigns see election campaigns election expenses 201, 210–11
 Great Reform Act 1832 see Great Reform Act 1832 reforms of 1867–1884 200–2 size of the electorate 1830–1949 196 universal right to vote 200–2 voting systems see voting systems women's right to vote see women's enfranchisement
- elitism 12, 28, 157, 191, 751
- Elizabeth I 45, 89, 229, 234
- Elizabeth II 45, 270
- emergency debates 141, 253, 280
- employment disputes 523–4
- empty chair crisis 355–7
- EMS see European Monetary System
- enrolled Bill rule 30–1, 124, 231, 289, 746
- Entick v Carrington 52–5, 72, 108, 199, 233, 510, 567–8
- entrenchment 34–49, 168, 403, 431, 435, 637–8, 744–53
A-G for New South Wales v Trethowan 36–7, 156, 289, 403, 750
Bribery Commissioner v Ranasinghe 39–41, 43, 187, 371, 746
Harris v Dönges 37, 190, 431
 Jennings' critique and the 'rule of recognition' 35–43
 legality and legitimacy 744–51
 Liberal Democrat proposal 751–2 procedural 35, 37, 156, 295
 substantive 35, 44
- Equal Treatment Directive 396, 625
- errors of judgement 280–2
- estoppel 457, 461–4, 489–90, 497–8
- Euronorms 388–9, 412
- European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC) 338–9
- European Commission of Human Rights (EComHR) 589–90, 594, 596, 605, 607–8, 610, 640

- European Community
 (EC) 338–40, 390–2, 396–8, 400–2, 404–10, 412–16, 418
 1957–1986 see European Economic Community
 Amsterdam Treaty 416–17, 638, 752
Francovich remedy 402, 410–12, 624
 Maastricht Treaty 388, 395, 413–17, 419, 548, 619
 Margaret Thatcher, Bruges speech 392–3, 409, 625
 Margaret Thatcher, resignation 407–10 membership 388, 393, 398–9, 401, 407, 409, 422 normative supra-nationalism 393–5
 parliamentary sovereignty and the UK courts 395–410
Duke v GEC Reliance Ltd 396, 398–9
Factortame litigation 41, 400–7, 409–10, 431, 598, 624–5, 638
Litster v Forth Dry Dock and Engineering Co Ltd 397–9, 418, 643–4, 671
Pickstone v Freemans 397–9, 412, 418, 643–4, 671
R v HM Treasury, ex p Smedley 548–9
 Single European Act see Single European Act
 Social Charter 392–3, 414, 416
- European Convention on Human Rights
 (ECHR) 427–9, 588–614, 636–9, 662–70, 678–9, 710–11, 739–40 see also Human Rights Act 1998
 blasphemy 607–11
 deprivation of liberty 710–11, 722, 729, 741 impact on domestic law 599–611
 contempt of court 605–7
 freedom of expression 601–11
 official secrecy 602
 political libels 602–5
 privacy 599–601
 incorporation of fundamental rights 637–9
 institutional and jurisdictional issues 589–90
- jurisprudential methodology 590–4 contingent rather than absolute entitlements 591 four stage inquiry 591–4 proportionality
 review (ECHR) see proportionality, review status in domestic law 594–9 judicial incorporation 617–19 legal response 596–9 political response 595–6
- European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) 588–95, 597–609, 648–55, 667–8, 676–9, 704–7, 732–4
Castells v Spain 604–6, 614, 648
 judicial supremacism
 controversy 624–6
Lingens v Austria 603–4, 606, 609, 612, 614, 648
 margin of appreciation doctrine 626
Otto-Preminger Institute v Austria 609–10
 UK's record 596, 599
Wingrove v United Kingdom 609–10, 612
- European Court of Justice (ECJ) 344–5, 349–55, 357–65, 371–8, 380–6, 391–8, 410–12 see also European Economic Community; European Community; European Union
Francovich remedy 402, 410–12, 624 indirect effect of directives see indirect effect of directives
 judicial supremacism
 controversy 624–5
 proportionality 470–1
- European Economic Community (EEC) 1957–1986 338–86 see also European Community; European Union democratic deficit 385–6
 human rights protection 385–6 law-making processes 340
 Commission and Parliament 341–2
 Council of Ministers 340–1
- European Court of Justice (ECJ) 344–5 forms of EEC law:
 Article 189 342–4
 normative and decisional supra-nationalism 384–5 status of EC law within legal systems of Member States 345–9
 accessibility 346–51, 357–60
Costa v ENEL 352–3, 355, 377, 405 direct effect and precedence see direct effect of EC/EU law; precedence of EC/EU law empty chair crisis 355–7
 hierarchy 352–5, 357–65
 irrelevance of national law 353–4 status of EC law within legal systems of Member States, Luxembourg Accords 355–7, 384 status of EC law within legal systems of Member States precedence/supremacy see precedence
Van Gend en Loos 349–58, 362–3, 366, 370, 372–3, 377
 Treaty of Rome see Treaty of Rome
 UK accession 365–72
 1975 referendum 371–2
 EEC membership and parliamentary sovereignty 366–8, 370–1, 377–85
 European Communities Act 1972 368–70
Garland v British Rail 379–80, 400, 418
 and implied repeal 378–9
 indirect effect of directives see indirect effect of directives
Macarthys v Smith 378–9
Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority 380–4, 390, 396, 412, 683
- European Monetary System (EMS) 407–8
- European Union (EU) 338, 386, 389, 413–20, 588, 625
 constitution 418–19
 Lisbon Treaty 418–19

- evident utility 44–6
excess of powers 446–55, 538, 553, 627
 presumption of non-interference with basic rights 453–4 relevant and irrelevant considerations 454–5
Exchange Rate Mechanism (ERM) 407–9, 414 exclusionary rule 244–5, 247, 412
exclusivity principle 520, 528, 532 expenses 58, 127–8, 210–11, 244, 256–7, 391, 394 election 201, 210–11 scandal 225, 237, 255–6, 281

Factortame litigation 41, 400–7, 409–10, 431, 598, 624–5, 638
Fagan, Michael 279
fair hearing, right to a see audi alterem partem fairness, procedural see procedural fairness Falklands War 279, 573
Fares Fair 320–1, 448–9
fascists 216, 237, 562–4
federal Europe 388, 408–9, 413 federalism 10, 13, 15, 120, 288, 290, 338–9 female suffrage see women's enfranchisement
fettering of discretion 458–60, 512, 530
fiduciary duty doctrine 304, 312, 321–2, 447–8 financial interests 250, 252, 281, 503–8, 525, 542, 694 direct 502–3, 505, 553
 indirect 503–5
first past the post system 219, 224, 333, 424, 432, 436
fiscal autonomy 309–10, 314–15, 322, 330, 426, 435 fishing rights 46, 400
Foot, Michael 148, 205, 325
Foreign Affairs Committee 150–2 foreign policy 14, 92, 109–10, 113, 148, 390, 425
France 51, 339, 341–2, 355–6, 362–5, 376–7, 413
Francovich remedy 402, 410–12, 624
Franks Committee 514
free movement 339, 352, 372–3, 382, 389–91, 624 free votes 122, 134, 153, 186, 221, 368 freedom from imprisonment, arrest and molestation 236–9 see also parliamentary privilege freedom of expression 601–11, 613, 615, 641, 659 freedom of speech 12, 230–1, 238, 564–5, 571–86, 603, 620–1

 blasphemy 578–80
 contempt of court 580–3
 official secrecy see official secrecy
 political libels 583–6 fundamental human rights 360–1, 631, 656, 673 see also human rights
 consolidation of 619–23

Gaitskell, Hugh 57, 296, 366
Gaming Board 485–6
Garland v British Rail 379–80, 400, 418
GCHQ case 105–7, 109–12, 149, 269, 357, 370, 554 gender discrimination 360, 375, 379, 382, 430
General Elections 161, 171, 211, 219
George I 121
George II 121
George III 121
George V 56, 162, 261, 266, 270
Germany 223–4, 339, 341–2, 359–62, 386, 393–4, 499
Ghaidan v Mendoza 669–70, 688
Gibson v Lord Advocate 46
Giscard D'Estaing, Valéry 418
GLA see Greater London Authority
Gladstone, William Ewart 58, 146, 156, 200–2, 266, 270
GLC see Greater London Council
glorious revolution 24–9, 43, 88, 165, 630
Godden v Hales 90–1
golden rule 63, 66–7, 134, 164, 446, 641
Gough test 504–7
Gouriet 103–4, 540–1
grant penalties 318–20, 327
Great Reform Act 1832 47, 158–9, 194–5, 234, 262, 269, 303 candidate selection 197–8 conduct of election campaigns 197
 constituency system 195 original Bill 198–9
 parliamentary passage 199–200
 qualification for the franchise 196
Greater London Authority (GLA) 332–4
Greater London Council (GLC) 320–3, 332, 448–9, 455, 472, 542, 544 abolition 322–3
green light theories 59, 76, 113, 446, 512
Greenpeace 552, 654
greyhound racing 499, 523
Guantanamo Bay 113
guillotine motions 130–2, 319

habeas corpus 89–90, 233, 239, 243, 480, 533, 702
Hale, Sir Matthew 81–2
Hales, Sir Edward 90–1
Hamilton, Alexander 10, 17–18, 87, 348
Hamilton, Neil 252
Hampden, John 88, 93
Hanratty case 103, 486
Hansard 143, 236, 242, 244–8, 294, 397, 651–2
Hardwicke, Joseph Yorke, 10th Earl of 179–80
Harris v Dönges 37, 190, 431
Hayek, Friedrich von 50, 56–9, 71, 317, 321, 393, 479
Heald, Sir Lionel 572
Heath, Edward 169, 272–3, 282, 309, 315–16, 365, 367–8
Henry VIII clauses 139–40, 319, 369, 428
Heseltine, Michael 265, 267, 274, 276–7, 330, 407, 573–4
Hewart CJ (Lord) 137
hierarchy of rights 476, 675, 698 highest form of law 15, 27, 37, 62
Hinduja brothers 281
Hobart CJ 22
Holt CJ 29, 232–3, 236, 242, 712
homeless persons legislation 135, 207, 460, 501, 516–18, 521 horizontal direct effect 380–1, 396, 569, 648–52, 680, 689, 692–3
Defrenne v Sabena 375, 381, 569
Walrave and Koch 373–5, 381, 648

- horizontal litigation 649–50
horizontality 648–52, 661, 680–93
house arrest 710–11, 741
House of Commons 119–54
 adjournment debates 141, 145
 backbench MPs 122–3, 125, 127, 133–5, 141–5, 147, 150–4
 Cabinet 121–4, 146–7, 156, 261–8, 273–7, 280–2, 408–10
 Crown and commons 119–20
 early day motions 145
 emergency debates 141, 253, 280
 financial support for the opposition 128–9 fusion of powers 121–2
 informal processes 145–6
 Leader of the Opposition 128, 143–4, 179, 263, 272–3, 280, 327 library 126, 145
 majorities 133, 172, 273, 276, 409–10, 631–2, 751–2
 motions on the floor of the house 140–1
 MPs as representatives or delegates 120
 Opposition days 141 parliamentary privilege see parliamentary privilege party discipline 122–4 passage of legislation see legislative process physical layout 122
 Prime Minister 121–3 accountability on the floor of the house 143–5
 private notice questions 143
 procedural rules 124–5
 questions for written answer 145
 questions to ministers 141–3
 resources 126–9
 rise of party politics 121–4 select committees see select committees and separation of powers 119–21, 137, 146, 149 sittings 128, 133, 151
 Speaker 124–6, 142, 229–30
 whips see whips
House of Lords 65–77, 79–82, 154–60, 162–80, 184–93, 398–402, 676–9 bicameral legislatures:
 a functionalist justification 155–6
 delaying powers 167, 172, 189, 287 historical background 156–67
 Bryce Commission 163, 170
 co-equality to complementarity 157–60
 Lloyd George and people's budget 160–3
 Parliament Act 1911 163–6
 Parliament Act 1949 166–7
 Salisbury doctrine 166–7, 262
 Treaty of Utrecht 157, 162
 Lord Chancellor 75, 174, 178, 181, 192, 632, 702
 Lord Speaker 174–5
 modern era 167–74
 1968 reforms 169–70
 1974–1979 parliament 170–2
 Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Bill 171 amendments to government Bills 1970–1990 177 Appointments Commission 184–5
 backwoodsmen 173–4, 328
 Commons and Monarch as subordinate legislature 166, 187–8, 190–1 control of delegated legislation 177–8
 deliberation 175–6
 Earl of Hardwicke 179–80
 expense allowances 179
 Government defeats in the Lords 1964–1986 171 hereditary peers 157, 162, 168–70, 180–2, 184–5, 207, 405
 Hunting Act 2004 187–8
Jackson v Attorney-General 187–91, 748
 Law Lords and Bishops 185
 life peers 168–70, 176, 178–80, 182, 207
 revision of legislation 176–7
 scrutiny of the executive 178–9 sitting hours and attendance 175 and Thatcher governments 172–4
 Trade Union and Labour Relations Bill 171–2 voting house and working house 173–4
 Wakeham Commission 182–5, 191
 party allegiance 160–1, 169
 party discipline 159, 168, 178, 183
 select committees 179
housing 57, 305–7, 313–16, 326–7, 456, 460, 516 council see council housing
Housing Action Trusts 326–7, 687
Housing Finance Act 1972 315, 560
Howard, Michael 99, 286, 624, 627, 629–31
Howe, Sir Geoffrey 277, 292, 409
human rights 151, 182, 385–6, 392, 427–9, 557, 559–743 arrest and detention see arrest; detention asylum seekers, see asylum seekers deprivation of liberty see deprivation of liberty
 ECHR see European Convention on Human Rights freedom of speech see freedom of speech fundamental see fundamental human rights indigenous principle of common law 619–23
Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers 603–4, 612, 620–1
R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants 623, 630, 700
R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Leech (no 2) 621–2, 642, 658 judicial supremacism controversy 624–6 powers of arrest see arrest privacy see privacy public protest and public order see public protest and public order UK's record in the European Court of Human Rights 596, 599

- Human Rights Act 1998
 417, 427–9, 498, 557, 634,
 636–707, 742
 Convention Rights and the common law 644–5, 647–52
 hierarchy of Convention
 Rights 673–5
 horizontality 648–52, 661, 680–93
 imposing Convention Rights on private individuals and organisations 687–92 incorporation of fundamental rights 637–9
 locus standi 654
 political entrenchment
 656–7
 procedural questions 653–5
 public authorities 645–52,
 657, 680–90, 692–3
Aston Cantlow appeal
 682–3, 687
 close assimilation test 680–2, 685
 core and hybrid public authorities 682–3, 685
 definition 646, 680
 lawful breaches of Covention Rights
 646–52
*R (Beer) v Hampshire
 Farmers Market Ltd*
 683–4
Weaver v London and Quadrant Housing
 686–7
YL v Birmingham and Others 684–6
 rights culture within government and parliament 656–7
 s 1 639–40
 s 2 639–40
 s 3 and statutory interpretation 640–3,
 661–2
Bellinger v Bellinger
 667–71
Ghaidan v Mendoza
 669–70, 688
R v A 662–3, 665, 667
*Re S (Care Order:
 Implementation of Care Plan)* 666, 671
 systemic and individuated consequences 665–6
Wilson v First County Trust 663–5, 674, 687
 s 4 declaration of incompatibility
 see declarations, of incompatibility
 s 6 on vertical and horizontal effect 645–7
 separation of powers 637,
 640, 642, 655–6, 662,
 666, 671
 special status for churches and the press 652
- Hume, David 8
hung Parliament 220, 272, 432
Hunting Act 2004 187–8
hybrid Bills 136
hybrid public authorities
 682–3, 685
- illegality 61, 428–9, 445–9, 451–5, 463, 530, 554
 estoppel 457, 461–4
 excess of powers 446–55,
 538, 553, 627
 presumption of noninterference with basic rights 453–4
 relevant and irrelevant considerations 454–5
 fettering of discretion
 458–60
 unlawful delegation of powers 446, 455–8
- Immigration and Asylum Bill
 2003 701–3
immigration controls
Al-Mas'ari case 629–30
 judicial supremacism
 controversy 626–32
 Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002,
 s 55 700–1
 ouster clause provisions
 in the Immigration and
 Asylum Bill 2003 701–3
R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants 623, 630, 700
*R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p
 Moon* 629
Re M 627–9
- implied repeal 31–2, 45, 48, 76,
 378–80, 418–19, 748
Macarthy v Smith 378–80,
 400, 418, 598
- implied terms 55, 60, 72, 100, 392, 648
- imprisonment without trial 18
- inalienable rights 3, 7–9, 19, 22, 38, 161
- income taxes 14, 18, 33, 153,
 161, 251, 426
- incompatibility, declarations of see declarations, of incompatibility
- Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority
 (IPSA) 128, 254–6
- indirect effect of directives 382–4, 393–4,
 625, 641
Von Colson case 382–4, 390,
 393–6, 398–9, 412
- indirect financial interests
 503–5
- individual ministerial responsibility 262, 278–9, 281, 283–6, 335, 457 competence issues 278–80
 errors of judgement 280–2 morality issues 282–3
 Next Steps reforms 285–7
 Parliamentary
 Commissioner for Administration (PCA)
 283–6
 and privatisation 286–7 reforming the executive 283–7
 Sachsenhausen controversy
 284–5
- industrialisation 302–3
- informed consent 12, 126, 239, 251, 292, 328, 335
- injunctions 36, 510–13, 515,
 581–2, 605, 627–8, 689–90
 interim 400–1, 627–8
 locus standi 535–7, 539–42,
 544, 547–8, 552
 temporary 575–6
- interest groups 132, 550–1
- interim injunctions 400–1, 627–8
- international law 32, 51,
 345–51, 361–4, 595,
 597–8, 639
 new legal order of 349, 352, 406
 obligations 32, 367, 380, 382, 396, 415–16, 617
- internment 731, 735
- interpretation see statutory
 interpretation
- IPSA see Independent
 Parliamentary Standards
 Authority
- IRA prisoners 279, 286
- IRA terrorism 626, 730–1

- Iran-Iraq War 291
- Iraq 153, 265, 291–3, 725
- IRC v National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses* 536, 545
- Ireland v United Kingdom* 732–6
- irrationality 61, 106, 428–9, 445, 464–72, 694–5, 698–9 see also unreasonableness test 465–6, 494, 697
 Wednesbury 593, 677, 695
- Italy 339, 341–2, 352–5, 364, 375–6, 410–11, 710–11
- JAC see Judicial Appointments Commission
- James I 24, 87, 110
- James II 24–6, 90
- Jefferson, Thomas 3, 7–9, 12, 14, 19, 22, 28
- Jellicoe, George (2nd Earl) 282
- Jellicoe procedure 176
- Jenkins, Roy 161, 281, 371, 716
- Jennings, Sir Ivor 35–6, 40–2, 261–4, 269–70, 293, 302, 747
- Jessell, Toby 630
- Jews 234
- Jockey Club 480–1, 525–6
- Jones, Fiona 210–11
- Jones, Harry 50, 56, 137, 279
- Jordan v Burgoyne* 564, 597
- journalists' sources 612–14
- Judicial Appointments Commission (JAC) 192, 752
- judicial independence 54–6, 700
- judicial power 18–19, 30, 60, 113, 348, 478, 632
- judicial review 60–2, 76–8, 105–6, 165, 445–533, 654–6, 683–4 application for 510, 515 application for judicial review mechanism (AJR) 510, 515, 517–18, 520–1, 523–4, 526–30, 532–3 differential scope of 101, 106 private and public law remedies 510–33
Aga Khan decision 524–6
Barnard v National Dock Labour Board 456, 513–14, 529–30, 538
Datafin decision 524–5, 527–8
 employment disputes 523–4
 exclusivity principle 520, 528, 532
- Order 53 reforms 514–17
- O'Reilly v Mackman* 517–23, 528–30, 532–3, 535, 547, 553–4
 post-O'Reilly case law 521–8
Roy case 528–30, 532–3, 553
Servite Housing case 526–7, 681, 684, 687
Wachmann decision 524, 527–8
- procedural grounds 475–508 see also audi alterem partem; bias public law principle as a defence in criminal proceedings 529–32 royal prerogative see royal prerogative substantive grounds 445–73
see also illegality; irrationality; proportionality technical and linguistic changes 533
- judicial supremacism
 controversy 623–34, 643, 657–8, 700, 706
- justiciability 240–1, 243, 245, 247, 375, 486–7, 527–9
 proceedings in Parliament 240–8
 actions in defamation 240–1
Case of the Sheriff of Middlesex 242–3 definition of proceedings in Parliament 241
Pepper v Hart 131, 244–8, 257, 284, 397, 412, 600
 references to Hansard 244–8
Stockdale v Hansard 242–4, 246, 256, 294
 and royal prerogative 107, 111–15 test 351, 375, 569
- Keble J 22
- Keeler, Christine 282
- Kent v Metropolitan Police Commissioner* 565–6
- Kilbrandon Commission 421–2
- Kinnock, Neil 280
- Lain* 102–4, 112, 269, 284
- Laker Airways Ltd v Department of Trade* 98–9, 103, 109, 112, 294, 627
- Lambton, Antony (Lord) 282
- Law Commission 65, 514–15, 518, 521, 533, 676
- Law Lords 70, 121, 168, 182, 185, 192, 428
- Lawson, Nigel 265, 328
- Layfield Committee 317
- Leader of the Opposition 128, 143–4, 179, 263, 272–3, 280, 327
- legal representation, right to 499–500, 626
- legislative process 15, 129–40, 156–7, 184–5, 258, 355–6, 391
 delegated legislation 136–9
 Donoughmore Committee 137–9
 guillotine and closure 130–2, 319
 Henry VIII clauses 139–40, 319, 369, 428
 hybrid Bills 136
 private Bills 30–1, 135–6, 177, 488, 657, 716
 private members' Bills 30, 130, 133–5, 145, 216, 657
 report and third reading 132–3 revision in the House of Lords 176–7 see also House of Lords second reading 130–5, 152, 163, 199, 257, 416, 656–7
 standing committees 131–2
 ten minute rule Bills 135
- legitimacy 85–6, 172–3, 185–6, 231, 269–70, 330, 749–52
 Liberal Democrat proposal 751–2 political 287, 563, 568, 732
 substantive 271, 385
- legitimate expectations 487–96, 498, 500 entitlement to procedural or substantive benefit 487–99
 substantive 493–8, 526–7, 686
- Lemon v United Kingdom* 607–11
- Lenthell, William 230
- Lester, Anthony 651–2
- lex et consuetudo parliamenti* 228, 231–2
- lex posterior* rule 32, 139, 369
- libels 233, 241–2, 583–5, 602, 604, 612, 620–1 blasphemous 578–9, 608, 611
 political 583–6, 596, 602, 620, 648
- liberty 12, 16, 53–4, 72–3, 710, 712–15, 717–19 see also deprivation of liberty

- life peers 167–70, 176, 178–80, 182–3, 207, 213, 215
Lilley, Peter 623, 630
Lingens v Austria 603–4, 606, 609, 612, 614, 648
Lisbon Treaty 418–19
literal rule 63–6, 72–4, 96, 238, 395, 398, 450
Litster v Forth Dry Dock and Engineering Co Ltd 397–9, 418, 643–4, 671
Liversidge v Anderson 69–71, 73–4, 76–7, 448, 575–6, 709–10, 739
Lloyd George, David 160–3, 305
local government 173, 206, 261, 296, 301–36, 422, 456
 authoritarianism 316–18
 Blair government's reforms 330–4 governance of London 332–4
 Local Government Acts 1999 and 2000 331–2
Bromley London Borough Council v Greater London Council 320–2, 331, 448–9, 472
 community charge 327–30, 407
 constitutional status 306–8 council housing see council housing elections 225–6, 317, 423, 704
 fiscal autonomy 309–11
 grant penalties 318–20, 327
 Greater London Authority (GLA) 332–4
 Greater London Council (GLC) 320–3, 332, 448–9, 455, 472, 542, 544 judicial role 311–13, 320–2 localism and tradition 302–6
 London Transport Executive (LTE) 320–1
 metropolitan counties 322
 Municipal Corporations Act 1835 303–6, 335, 447 physical boundaries of local authorities 308–9 privatisation 323–7
 housing see council housing housing, privatisation Widdicombe Report 323–4
 ratecapping 318–20, 322, 327
 taxation and representation 309–11 localism 302–3, 305, 334, 477
Locke, John 8–9, 11, 14–15, 51, 53
locus standi 512–13, 533, 535–55, 568, 654
 acto popularis 542, 546, 554
 certiorari 536, 541–4, 552
 citizen's action test 542–3, 548–9 declaration and injunction 537–41
 Human Rights Act 1998 654
 injunctions 535–7, 539–42, 544, 547–8, 552
Inland Revenue Commissioners case 544–8 mandamus 543–4
 private law stream 547–8
 representative standing 550–3
 Supreme Court Act 1981, s 31(3) 544–50
 threshold issue 545–7
London see local government
London Tramways judgment 74–5, 81
London Transport Executive (LTE) 320–1
Lord Chancellor 75, 174, 178, 181, 192, 632, 702
Lord Speaker 174–5
 LTE see London Transport Executive
Luxembourg Accords 355–7, 384
Maastricht Treaty 388, 395, 413–17, 419, 548, 619
Macarthy v Smith 378–80, 400, 418, 598
McConnell, Jack 433–4
McCormick v Lord Advocate 45–6, 421, 424
Mackay, James (Lord) 247, 632, 702
Macmillan, Harold 265, 275, 282, 308, 365
Madison, James 10–17, 27–8, 120, 155, 295, 338, 742 magistrates' identity 549
Magna Carta 24–6, 89, 748
Major, John 208, 277, 291, 330, 409, 630
majoritarianism 10, 13–14, 133, 155, 162, 218, 404
Malone v Metropolitan Police Commissioner 567–9, 599–601, 622, 650, 669, 689, 691
mandamus 459, 510–11, 515, 533, 536, 543–5
Mandelson, Peter 281 manner and form 34–7, 39, 41, 290, 379, 403, 746 marital rape 79–83, 592, 647
market liberalism 56–7
Marlow, Tony 630
Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority 380–4, 390, 396, 412, 683
Mary II 26, 52, 91
Matrix-Churchill controversy 291–3, 486, 632
Mawhinney, Brian 632
Mayors, elected 331–2 meaningful day in court 58, 350, 479
Melbourne, William Lamb (2nd Viscount) 303
Mellor, David 282–3
Members of Parliament see MPs
Middlesex (Sheriff of) 242–3
Milk Marketing Board 450–1
Mill, John Stuart 47, 221 ministerial responsibility see collective responsibility; individual ministerial responsibility mischievous rule 63, 67–8, 238, 565, 641
Miss Behavin case 695–6
Mitterand, Francois 392
Monarch 23–8, 86–93, 187–91, 260–2, 269–73, 403–4, 745–6
 choosing a Prime Minister in a hung Parliament 272 granting a dissolution after a transfer of party loyalty 272–3 royal assent 30, 35–7, 42–3, 163, 260, 271–2, 744–7 monetary union 407–8, 413–14 money Bills 163, 190
Montesquieu, Charles, Baron de 51
Moonie religious cult 629–30 morality 120, 157, 201, 282–3, 316, 709–10, 749–50 see also MPs, ethical standards
Morgan, Rhodri 437–8, 440
Moseley, Oswald 562–3
MPs 120, 122–8, 131–5, 141–6, 195–8, 237–40, 247–59 backbench 127, 133, 143, 147, 191–2, 623–4, 631–2 ethical standards 250–8
 Bribery Act 2010 257–8

- cash for questions scandal
 252–5, 258, 632
 Nicholls Committee 255
 Nolan Commission
 252–5, 632
 parliamentary privilege and expenses
 scandal 256–7
 register of members’ interests 251–2
 opposition 138, 141–2, 144, 146, 252, 283
 as representatives or delegates 120
Municipal Corporations Act
1835 303–6, 335, 447

Nairn v University of St
Andrews 47, 429–30
National Greyhound Racing
Club 523
National Health Service 58,
 66, 154, 186, 265, 296, 381 national list systems 222–3 national security 93–4, 98,
 106–7, 110–12, 486, 572–5, 591–2
 nationality 373, 417, 700, 740
Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002,
 s 55 700–1
 natural justice 61, 476, 478–84, 486–7, 490–1, 499, 550 natural law 8, 15, 21–3, 29, 623 negligence 482, 521–2, 524–5, 583, 678
 Netherlands 341–2, 346, 349,
 355, 650, 710, 724
 New South Wales 36–7, 41–2,
 289, 403, 750
 New Zealand 246, 642–3
 Next Steps reforms 285–7
 no-confidence motions
 263–4, 273
 Nolan Commission 252–4, 632
nolle prosequi 101–2 normative and decisional
 supra-nationalism 384–5 normative supra-nationalism
 384, 393–5
 Northern Ireland 109, 203, 220, 467, 730–3, 735, 737–8 nuclear weapons 33, 111 nurses 61, 66–7, 685

 oaths 24, 42, 180, 234–6, 292, 478
 obscenity 539, 594, 605, 652, 740
 official secrecy 572–8
 impact of ECHR 602

 Official Secrets Act 1989
 577–8
Ponting case 573–4, 577, 613
Spycatcher litigation 574–8,
 602, 608, 610–12
Tisdall case 573–4, 613
Ombudsman 283–6, 451
one vote one value 204–6 opinion polls 216, 220, 277, 329, 416
opt out 326, 347, 352–3, 591, 625
Order 53 reforms 514–17
O’Reilly v Mackman 517–23,
 528–30, 532–3, 535, 547,
 553–4
Otto-Preminger Institute v
Austria 609–10
ouster clauses 76–8, 96, 165,
 205, 428, 518, 535
Anisminic Ltd v Foreign
Compensation Commission
 76–8, 86, 204–5, 453, 511,
 538, 701–2
 Immigration and Asylum
 Bill 2003 701–3
R v Medical Appeal Tribunal, ex p Gilmore 76–7, 96,
 165, 453, 518, 535, 701

PAC see Public Accounts Committee
Pannick, David 322, 612, 642,
 651, 689
Parkinson, Cecil 282–3
Parliament Act 1911 163–6,
 187, 189–90, 272, 306
Parliament Act 1949 166–7,
 188–9, 287, 289, 658
Parliamentary Bills see
 legislative process
Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration
 (PCA) 283–6, 451
Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards (PCS) 253–4
parliamentary privilege
 228–59, 289, 467, 600
 admission, retention and expulsion of members
 232–9
 Ashby v White 199,
 232, 242
 Paty’s case 232–3, 236, 242
 Article 9 of the Bill of Rights 230–2
 Bradlaugh, Charles 234–6
 Case of the Five Members 230
 contempt of the house 232, 249–50, 292
 and defamation actions 240–2
 and expenses scandal 256–7
 freedom from imprisonment, arrest and molestation 236–9
 informed consent principle 239–40
 justiciability of proceedings in Parliament see justiciability, proceedings in Parliament
 Privileges Committee Report (1967) 250
 regulation of MPs’ ethical standards see MPs, ethical standards
 Strode’s case 229–30
 Wentworth’s defence of freedom of discussion
 229–30
 Wilkes, John 233–4
Parliamentary Privilege
Act 1770 237–8, 241, 244
parliamentary sovereignty
 21–49, 54–5, 75–9, 369–70,
 397–9, 403, 746–8
 British/English concept 43–6 continuing theory 34 conventional basis 295–6
 Diceyan (orthodox) theory
 22–3
 and EC/EU membership
 366–8, 370–1, 377–85,
 395–410 see also European Community (EC),
 parliamentary sovereignty
 and the UK courts
 enrolled Bill rule 30–1, 124, 231, 289, 746
 and entrenchment see
 entrenchment
 implied repeal 31–2, 45, 48, 76, 378–80, 418–19, 748
 and inconsistency with international law 32–4
 Jennings’ critique and the ‘rule of recognition’ 35–43 legal authority of principle 29–34
 political source 24, 24–9, 88, 165
 pre-1688 21–2
 and rule of law 75–8
 self-embracing theory 34 substance or procedure 30–1
 and women’s enfranchisement
 46–8

- parochial church councils (PCCs) 680, 682–3
- parole 494–5, 501
- party discipline 122–4, 159, 168, 178, 183
- party list system 222
- party politics 119, 126, 141, 143, 154–5, 168, 657
- Paty's case* 232–3, 236, 242
- PCA see Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration
- PCS see Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards
- pecuniary interests 251–2, 541, 544, 549
- Peel, Sir Arthur 236
- Peel, Sir Robert 159, 269
- peers see House of Lords
- people's budget 160, 162, 240, 305
- Pepper v Hart* 131, 244–8, 257, 284, 397, 412, 600
- Pergau Dam project 449, 529, 626
- petitions of right 93, 95, 511, 627
- phone tapping 493, 567–9, 599–601, 650
- Pickstone v Freemans* 397–9, 412, 418, 643–4, 671
- Pinochet, Augusto 505–7
- planning permission 463, 466–7, 508, 514, 531, 538, 550
- pocket boroughs 198–9
- Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 711–12
- 2005 amendments 716–20
- police powers 108, 595, 712–13, 719–20, 731–2, 734, 737 see also arrest
- Politi* 357–8, 363, 366
- political advertising 203, 215–16
- political contracts 7–8, 71
- political libels 583–6, 596, 602–5, 620, 648
- Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 205–6, 211, 213
- poll tax see community charge
- Ponsonby rule 112, 293–4
- Ponting case* 573–4, 577, 613
- popular consent 12, 306, 335–6, 436, 751
- Porter v Magill* formula 507–8
- postal voting 225–6
- Powell, Enoch 252
- powers of arrest see arrest
- pre-charge detention 735–6
- precedence of EC/EU law 352–5, 357–61, 363–5, 367, 372–3, 375–7, 413
- Member State judicial reaction to 360–5
- Simmenthal* 375–6, 382, 384, 401–2, 679
- prerogative of mercy 103, 107, 110
- prerogative powers see royal prerogative
- prerogative remedies 510–12, 514–15, 518, 520, 533, 535, 541 see also judicial review
- Prescott, John 150
- prescription charges 265
- press freedom 559, 577, 581, 607, 612–13, 620, 652
- pressure groups 307, 546, 549–50, 553, 611, 637, 653
- Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 741
- Prime Minister 121–3 see also House of Commons; names of individual Prime Ministers
- accountability on the floor of the house 143–5
- hung Parliament 272
- question time 144
- Prior, James 279
- prisoners 89, 453–4, 494–5, 499–501, 621–2, 694, 704–7
- entitlement to home leave 495
- IRA 279, 286
- loss of remission 516–19
- mail 454, 622
- parole 494–5, 501
- privacy 451, 567–71, 588, 599–601, 648, 669, 689–91
- Douglas and Zeta-Jones v Hello! Ltd* 689–90
- impact of the ECHR 599–601
- Malone v Metropolitan Police Commissioner* 567–9, 599–601, 622, 650, 669, 689, 691
- R v Brown* 570–1, 601, 709
- sado-masochistic sexual behaviour 569–71, 601
- speech and communication 567–9, 599–601
- private Bills 30–1, 135–6, 177, 488, 657, 716
- private law remedies 511–12, 523, 536 see also judicial review
- locus standi see locus standi
- private members' Bills 30, 130, 133–5, 145, 216, 657
- private notice questions 143
- privatisation 285–7, 526–7, 680, 686–7
- council housing 324–7
- Privileges Committee 228, 237, 241, 249–50, 253
- Privy Council 36–7, 40, 121, 238, 241, 428–30, 481–3
- procedural entrenchment 35, 37, 156, 295
- procedural fairness 100, 106, 475–6, 484–91, 499–500, 502, 507–8 see also audi alterem partem
- procedural unfairness 101, 104, 106, 428 see also judicial review, procedural grounds
- proceedings in Parliament 165, 255–6, 429
- definition 241
- justiciability 240–8
- Profumo, John 282
- proportional representation 192, 221, 223, 441
- proportionality 223, 445, 469–73, 492–4, 645, 693–9, 705
- review 470, 497, 645, 647, 677, 693–9
- Alconbury case* 694–5
- Belfast City Council v Miss Behavin Ltd* 695–6
- Daly case* 694–5, 697, 699
- Denbigh High School case* 695–6, 699
- Doherty v Birmingham City Council* 676, 697–9, 705
- test 471–2, 489, 495–6, 622, 696–7, 740
- Public Accounts Committee (PAC) 146, 149–50, 584, 586
- public authorities 374–5, 381, 492, 497–8, 518–19, 523, 591
- definition 646, 680, 686–7
- and Human Rights Act 1998 645–52, 657, 680–90, 692–3
- hybrid 682–3, 685
- public Bills 30, 167
- public good 10, 13, 103, 480, 542
- public health 302, 305, 372, 377
- public interest 58, 456, 493–4, 497–8, 576–7, 581, 613–14
- public law remedies 510, 513, 536 see also judicial review
- locus standi see locus standi
- public opinion 80, 159, 180, 195, 200, 212, 252

- public policy 372, 519, 525, 570, 581–2, 620, 630
- public protest and public order 53, 199, 376–7, 560–7, 604, 696, 731
- Beatty v Gillbanks* 561–2, 566, 715
- Brutus v Cozens* 564–5, 597
- Jordan v Burgoyne* 564, 597
- Kent v Metropolitan Police Commissioner* 565–6
- Public Order Act 1936 562–6
- Public Order Act 1986 566–7
- public safety 73, 96, 377, 457, 591, 696
- purposive interpretation 68–9, 72–3, 96–7, 189, 350, 398, 641
- qualified majority 340–2, 355–6, 390, 394, 625
- question time 141–4
- questions to ministers 141–3
for written answer 145
- R (Alconbury Developments) v Secretary of State for the Environment* 694–5
- R (Beer) v Hampshire Farmers Market Ltd* 683–4
- R (Daly) v Secretary of State for the Home Department* 694–5, 697, 699
- R (SB) v Governors of Denbigh High School* 695–6, 699
- R v A* 662–3, 665, 667
- R v Allen* 101–2
- R v Brown* 570–1, 601, 709
- R v C* 82, 84
- R v Gough* 504–7
- R v HM Treasury, ex p Smedley* 548–9
- R v IRC, ex p Rossminster Ltd* 69, 71–4, 448, 479, 540, 565, 567
- R v Lemon* 579, 610, 709
- R v Medical Appeal Tribunal, ex p Gilmore* 76–7, 96, 165, 453, 518, 535, 701
- R v R (marital rape exemption)* 79, 81–2, 84–5, 592, 647, 709
- R v Secretary of State for Social Security, ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants* 623, 630, 700
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Fire Brigades Union* 99–100, 294, 627, 633–4
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Leech (no 2)* 621–2, 642, 658
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Moon* 629
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Northumbria Police Authority* 108–9, 248
- race-horse trainers 480
- radio 131, 215–17, 451, 467–8, 630, 718
- radioactive waste 552
- Ramsay, Captain A 237
- rape, marital 79–83, 592, 647
- ratecapping 318–20, 322, 327
- Re M* 627–9
- Re S (Care Order: Implementation of Care Plan)* 666, 671
- real danger of bias 505–7
- real likelihood formula 503–5
- reasonable cause 69–70, 448
- reasonable suspicion 710, 716–18, 720–1, 728–9, 733–4
- reasonableness 107, 314, 470, 563–4, 698–9, 717–18, 733
- reciprocity 351, 364
- recognition, rule of 35, 35–43, 187, 403, 747
- red light theories 59, 96, 113, 350, 446, 476, 479
- Redcliffe-Maud Commission 308–9
- Redwood, John 625
- Rees-Mogg, William (Lord) 415, 548
- referendums 36–7, 224, 371–3, 415–19, 422–3, 426, 435–6
- register of members' interests 251–2
- regulations, direct effect 357–8, 363, 366
- relator action 104, 547
- religious beliefs 16, 417, 578, 589, 609–10, 652, 695–6 see also blasphemy
- representative actions 550–3
- representative government 10, 12, 14, 120
- representative standing 550–3
- residential care 526, 684–5
- Resolutions in Anderson* 89–90, 230, 243
- retrospectivity 78–85, 592, 709
- marital rape 79–85
- War Damage Act 1965 78–9, 91, 177
- Ridge v Baldwin* 482–6, 488, 491, 514, 538
- Ridley, Nicholas 268, 280, 408
- right to a fair hearing see audi alterem partem
- ripple effect 371, 412, 422, 473, 619, 694
- Roman Catholics 234
- Rousseau, J-J 7–8
- Roy case 528–30, 532–3, 553
- royal assent 30, 35–7, 42–3, 163, 260, 271–2, 744–7
- royal prerogative 86–115
- Bate's Case* 88–9, 92
- Case of Impositions* 87–8, 91
- Case of Proclamations* 87–8
- Case of Prohibitions* 87, 110
- Darnel's Case* 89–90, 92
- definitional controversy 92–3
- full review 105–15
- excluded categories 107, 109–10, 370
- foreign affairs 109–10
- GCHQ case 105–7, 109–12, 149, 269, 357, 370, 554
- justiciability 107, 111–15
- post-GCHQ 107–11
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Northumbria Police Authority* 108–9, 248
- Godden v Hales* 90–1
- habeas corpus* 89–90
- limited review 100–5
- China Navigation* 101–2
- constitutionality of reform 105
- developments in the 1960s and 1970s 102–4
- Gouriet* 103–4, 540–1
- Hanratty* 103, 486
- Lain* 102–4, 112, 269, 284
- Laker Airways* 103
- prerogative of mercy 103, 107, 110
- relationship with statute and rule of law 93–100
- A-G v De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd* 94–8, 100–1, 109, 395, 453
- Laker Airways Ltd v Department of Trade* 98–9, 103, 109, 112, 294, 627
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Fire Brigades Union* 99–100, 294, 627, 633–4

- royal prerogative (Cont.)
Re Petition of Right 93–4 superiority of statute 94–7
Zamora, The 94–5, 107, 112, 575
Resolutions in Anderson 89–90, 230, 243
 source of prerogative
 powers 86–90
 cases pre-1688 87–90
 post 1688 90–3
- rule of law 50–85, 92–7, 99–101, 403–5, 511–14, 535–7,
 702–3
 Diceyan perspective 50–6 process or substance 53–4
Entick v Carrington 52–5,
 72, 108, 199, 233, 510,
 567–8
 judicial independence 54–6 judicial regulation of government behaviour
 59–62
 ouster clauses see ouster clauses and parliamentary sovereignty 75–8 see also
 parliamentary sovereignty in the pre-welfare state 50–6 red light and green light theories 59
 retrospectivity see retrospectivity royal prerogative see royal prerogative stare decisis see stare decisis wartime 71, 73, 78, 480, 730 in the welfare state 56–9
 Hayek, Friedrich 57
 Jones, Harry 50, 56–9
- Russell, John (Lord) 200
- SACE SpA 358, 363, 366,
 372–3, 376
- Sachsenhausen controversy
 284–5
- sado-masochistic sexual behaviour 569–71, 601
- Salisbury doctrine 166–7, 169,
 172, 180, 262, 426
- Salmond, Alex 434–5
- Salvation Army 561–3
- Sanders v Chichester* 208–9
- Scientology 373, 487–8
- Scotland 32–3, 43–7, 203, 214, 420–8, 430–6, 440–1 demands for devolution
 421–2
 Kilbrandon Commission
 421–2
- Parliament 43–5, 422–33,
 435–6, 439, 752
 autonomy 427–9
 elections 433–5
 Treaty of Union 34, 43–6, 369, 421
 entrenched provisions
 44–5
Gibson v Lord Advocate 46
McCormick v Lord Advocate
 45–6, 421, 424
- Scotland Act 1978 422–3
- Scotland Act 1998 423–36,
 441, 748
 2003 and 2007 elections
 434–5 autonomy of Scots
 Parliament 427–9
 colonial case law on legislative autonomy
 429–31
 continuing sovereignty of the UK Parliament 431–2 first Scottish parliament and government 432–3
- Scott, Sir Richard 292
- Scottish Constitutional Convention 423–4, 431
- Scottish Nationalist Party 423, 425–6, 434
- search powers 712, 728–9
- second reading 130–5, 152,
 163, 199, 257, 416, 656–7
- secondary legislation 342–5,
 351–2, 354–5, 359–61, 364,
 372–3, 385–6
- security services 105, 493,
 574–7, 732, 738
- select committees
 House of Commons 146–51
 1979 reforms 148–51
 Crossman reforms 146–7
 House of Lords 179
- Sellafield 552
- separation of powers 10, 13, 15,
 50–85, 155, 301–2, 438–9
 and House of Commons
 119–21, 137, 146, 149
 Human Rights Act 1998
 637, 640, 642, 655–6, 662,
 666, 671
- Servite Houses case* 526–7, 681,
 684, 687
- sex discrimination legislation
 378–9, 381, 396
- sexual indiscretion 282–3
- sexual orientation 281, 417,
 468, 471, 652, 670
- Sheriff of Middlesex case*
 242–3
- Ship Money* 88–91, 93–5, 102, 104, 575
- Short, Edward 129, 251–2
- Sierra Leone arms
 controversy 150–1
- Simmenthal* 375–6, 382, 384,
 401–2, 679
- simple majority voting
 341, 394
- simultaneous political pluralism 334, 441
- Single European Act 388–93 democratic deficit and treaty amendment 385, 391–2, 394–5, 413, 625
 domestic disquiet 392–3 terms 388–90
- single transferable vote
 (STV) 222, 224, 751
- slavery 19, 28–9
- Social Charter 392–3, 414, 416
- social policies 148, 312–13,
 389, 414, 434, 668, 674
- social services 148, 287, 305–6, 320–1, 437, 551
- South Africa 37–9, 41–2, 55,
 104, 190, 541, 746–7
- sovereignty see parliamentary sovereignty
- Speaker 124–6, 142, 229–30
- Spycatcher* litigation 574–8,
 602, 608, 610–12
- St John Stevas, Norman
 148–50, 289
- standing see locus standi
- standing armies 8, 25–6, 28
- standing committees 130–2,
 137–8, 176
- stare decisis* 62, 74–5, 81
 1966 Practice Statement 75
London Tramways
 judgment 74–5, 81
- Statute of Westminster 38–9,
 287, 425, 430–1
- statutory instruments 136–8,
 178, 369, 740
- statutory interpretation 95–7,
 231, 244–5, 377–9, 640–4,
 661–3, 665–7
 always speaking principle
 64–5, 79, 93, 452, 659
- EC law
see direct effect; European Court of Justice
see direct effect; European Court of Justice;
 European Community
 (EC), parliamentary sovereignty and the UK
 courts

- golden rule 63, 66–7, 164, 446, 641
- Human Rights Act 1998, s 3
640–3, 661–2
Bellinger v Bellinger
667–71
Ghaidan v Mendoza
669–70, 688
R v A 662–3, 665, 667
Re S (Care Order: Implementation of Care Plan) 666, 671
systemic and individuated consequences 665–6
Wilson v First County Trust 663–5, 674, 687
- literal rule 63–6, 72–4, 96, 238, 395, 398, 450
Liversidge v Anderson 69–71, 73–4, 76–7, 448, 575–6, 709–10, 739
- mischievous rule 63, 67–8, 238, 565, 641
- principles 62–74, 94, 350, 448, 617, 640
- purposive (teleological)
interpretation 68–9, 72–3, 96–7, 189, 350, 398, 641
R v IRC, ex p Rossminster Ltd 69, 71–4, 448, 479, 540, 565, 567
references to Hansard 244–8
- Stockdale v Hansard* 242–4, 246, 256, 294
- Stonehenge 566
- Strasbourg court see European Court of Human Rights
- Straw, Jack 192, 639, 706
- Strode's case* 229–30
- Stuart Monarchs 24–5, 27, 86–7
- STV see single transferable vote
- super-majorities 21, 56, 338, 402, 637, 747, 751
- supra-nationalism 341, 384–5, 393, 395, 619
- Supreme Court Act 1981, s 31(3) 544–50
- taxation 9, 88–9, 161, 245, 309, 680
- taxi licences 480
- teleological interpretation see purposive interpretation
- television 131, 215–17, 451, 467–8, 591
- ten minute rule Bills 135
- Tenant's Charter 324–5
- terrorism 6, 467–8, 624, 700, 711, 719, 729–40
- combating of as constitutional issue 6–7
- control orders 741
- definition 732, 737
- indefinite detention without charge, trial or conviction 739–42
- powers of arrest after Ireland v United Kingdom 732–5
- powers of arrest and detention in the 1945–1977 era 730–6 in the post-1977 era 736–41
- powers of detention
after Ireland v United Kingdom 735–6
- TEU see Treaty on European Union
- thalidomide controversy 581, 605–7
- Thatcher, Margaret 172–3, 276–7, 285–7, 317, 324–7, 335–6, 574–8
- authoritarianism in central/local relations 317–18
- Bruges speech 392–3, 409, 625
- House of Lords and Thatcher governments 172–4
- resignation 407–10
- third reading 132–3
- Thorneycroft, Peter 265
- Tisdall case* 573–4, 613
- tort law arrest and trespass 712–13 libel 583–5, 602–4
- torture 6–7, 588
- Trade Union and Labour Relations Bill 171–2
- trade unions 64, 105–6, 171, 423, 486, 525, 589 closed shop 171
industrial action without union approval 267
- trans-sexualism 625
- treason 69, 89, 181, 230, 575
- treaties 33, 43–6, 293–4, 339–59, 362–4, 366–70, 378–82
unincorporated 367, 597–8
- treaty amendment 340, 356, 385, 391, 408, 416
- treaty obligations 345, 358, 367, 401, 410–11, 597, 705–6
- Treaty of Amsterdam 416–17, 638, 752
- Treaty of Rome 370, 372–7, 386, 388, 391, 405–7, 414–15 see also direct effect of EC/EU law; precedence of EC/EU law founding principles 339–65
- Treaty of Union see Scotland, treaty of Union
- Treaty of Utrecht 157, 162
- Treaty on European Union (TEU) 386, 410, 413–15, 619
- trespass 22, 52–4, 62, 477, 510, 567–8, 713
- trial by newspaper 582
- Trudeau, Pierre 288–90
- turnout 6, 161, 218, 224–6, 317, 334, 372
- ultimate political facts 54, 62, 71, 162, 191, 200, 290
- ultra vires 32, 311, 314, 461, 499, 621–2, 745
- unanimity 285, 341, 356, 390, 394–5, 750
and collective responsibility 264–7
- unemployment benefits 5, 58
- unincorporated treaties 367, 597–8
- unitary state 301–2, 324, 424
- United States 12, 21, 98, 301, 347–8, 576, 582–4
Bill of Rights 16–17
Congress 14–18, 21, 27, 39, 126, 155–6, 347–8
Constitution 10, 12–14, 18–19, 21, 149, 347–8, 559–60
Declaration of Independence 3, 22, 25–6, 28, 424, 753
- universal right to vote 200–2
- unlawful delegation of powers 446, 455–8, 478, 512–13, 530
- unreasonableness 61, 100, 445, 656, 694, 698 see also irrationality
- urbanisation 302–3
- Van Duyn v Home Office* 372–3, 377, 384, 487, 624
- Van Gend en Loos* 349–58, 362–3, 366, 372–3, 377, 380, 405–6
- vertical direct effect 374, 381–2, 520, 683
- veto powers 156–8, 162, 199–200, 202, 271, 340, 625
- Victoria, Queen 270, 617

- violence 8, 65, 195, 561–3, 570–1, 714–15, 732 violent disorder 583, 722, 726
Von Colson case 382–4, 390, 393–6, 398–9, 412
voters 6, 197–202, 206–7, 209–10, 222–4, 233–5, 331–5, 418–19 voting systems 39, 48, 221–6, 340, 342, 417 absolute majority systems 223–4
 counting the vote 217–20
 enhancing turnout 225–6
 European Union 343, 356
 first past the post system 219, 224, 333, 424, 432, 436
 German system 223
 party list system 222
 proportional representation 192, 221, 223, 441
 prospects of reform 223–6 single transferable vote (STV) 222, 224, 751 strong government thesis 224

Wachmann decision 524, 527–8
Wakeham Commission 182–5, 191
Waldegrave, William 291
Wales 203, 214, 307, 317, 420, 422–3, 427–8 devolved government after 1998 436–41
 Government of Wales Act 1998 436–9, 748
 Government of Wales Act 2006 439–41
 Welsh Assembly elections 438–40
Wales Act 1978 422
Walpole, Sir Robert 121–2
Walrave and Koch 373–5, 381, 648 war, waging of as constitutional issue 5–6
War Crimes Bill 177
War Damage Act 1965 78–9, 91, 177
war-related injury 462 wartime rule of law 71, 73, 78, 480, 730 wasted vote problem 219, 222–3
Weaver v London and Quadrant Housing 686–7
Wednesbury see irrationality; unreasonableness welfare state 56–9, 211, 279, 306, 526
Wellington, Arthur Wellesley, 1st Duke of 200, 335
Westland Affair 149, 265, 280
Wheat Commission 453
whips 122–4, 132, 146–8, 150, 152–3, 173–4, 368

Whitehouse, Mary 549–50, 579–80, 608
Whitelaw, William 279, 600
Widdicombe Report 323–4
Wilkes, John 52, 233–4, 239, 242, 246
William III (of Orange) 24, 26, 33, 91
William IV 195, 199, 269, 303
Wilson, Harold 133, 267–8, 273–4, 308–9, 321–2, 366–7, 371–2
Wilson v First County Trust 663–5, 674, 687
Wingrove v United Kingdom 609–10, 612
Winterton, Nicholas 150, 152
women's enfranchisement 46–8, 202, 221
Woolas, Phil 217
Working Time Directive 625
World Development Movement 448–9, 474, 529, 553 wrecking amendments 132, 172, 199–200, 205, 303
Wright, Peter 574–6, 578, 602

Yeo, Tim 282–3
YL v Birmingham and Others 684–6

Zamora, The 94–5, 107, 112, 575